The VV. add another Article (pp. 583-585), in which they contend that, apart from the second Decree of the Holy Inquisition, the negative opinion does not appear improbable from the Bulls of Gregory XV and Benedict XIV. Whether this assertion is free of grave injury to the Constitution of Benedict XIV, let it be the judgment of the more prudent. For, as is evident from the words of Benedict XIV cited above, those Decrees of the Holy Inquisition contain the interpretation and declaration of the Letters or Constitution of Gregory XV, and as such the same Benedict approves and confirms them and adds to them the strength of inviolable Apostolic firmness. And since these things are so, who indeed would dare so to represent the Interpretations and Declarations of the Holy Inquisition, confirmed by an oracle of the Pontiff of this kind, as alien to the sense of the Gregorian Constitution, that he should think himself permitted to hold and proclaim as not improbable what those Interpretations and Declarations define not to be probable?

But let us come to the reasons of the VV. The first is (p. 503) that in the Constitution of Gregory those words, "or shall have held illicit and indecent conversations or dealings with them," are to be understood of conversations and dealings which proceeded from the Confessor. - I ask: If not the Confessor but the woman first begins to hold indecent conversations, and the Confessor consequently also indulges in the shameful conversation and prolongs it, will he not be to be denounced because the shameful conversation was begun not by him but by the woman? That interpretation must therefore be called absurd, since it leads to absurdities. Say the same of an indecent dealing. For one who proposes as well as one who admits and accepts the proposed matter is most properly said to have a dealing; indeed, it is not even necessary for this that those who negotiate about the matter finally agree; for it is sufficient that they present themselves ready to agree if the incidental conditions are pleasing. For these are properly said to have had a dealing concerning that matter.

The other reason of the VV. is that in section 7 of the Constitution those penitents whom confessors know to have been solicited by others are said to be admonished concerning the obligation of denunciation. Therefore, the VV. conclude, it is presupposed that the confessor at least indirectly solicited. - Reply. The words of section 7 of the Constitution are these: Let him admonish concerning the obligation of denouncing the solicitors, or, as stated above, THOSE HOLDING DEALINGS. And again: But if they have omitted this office [of the confessor], or have taught the penitents that they are not bound to denounce soliciting confessors, OR THOSE HOLDING DEALINGS, as above, etc. Therefore, those holding dealings, or those having a shameful dealing, are also said to be denounced. Nor indeed should the VV. say that by the Constitution the Confessor is said to admonish only those who were solicited. For, to omit other things now, do not all those who know that shameful dealings took place in confession also have the obligation of denouncing that confessor, as we have seen above? Why, then, should the penitent who was a participant in the dealing be excluded?

In the third place the VV. add (pp. 584-585): If it were sufficient to hold illicit and indecent conversations or dealings, even if the confessor does not solicit by these conversations or dealings, nor has the intention of soliciting, then a confessor would also be to be denounced who, without any necessity or reasonable cause, deliberately and minutely examines a penitent confessing a sin against the sixth commandment about the circumstances, but does so from depraved curiosity and delight in things of this kind without any intention of soliciting... for he truly holds indecent and illicit conversations with the penitent. Reply. I concede the whole. For if, as the VV. concede, this confessor truly holds the indecent and illicit conversations which are expressly treated in the Apostolic Constitutions of Gregory XV and Benedict XIV, why would he not be to be denounced? - The VV. say, he did not have the intention of soliciting. - Reply. Let others see whether this excuse can have any value before the judges. Meanwhile, it is manifest that in the case the nature of the work and the intrinsic end of the work tend toward solicitation, since by the name of solicitation comes whatever provokes to venereal acts. But surely intention is no more necessary here than in giving scandal; for I do not think, according to the opinion of St. Alphonsus and even of the VV., that the guilt of scandal is absent if the work and the intrinsic end of the work of itself produce scandal, even if the intention of the one acting is not directed toward giving scandal. Moreover, whatever pertains to this case could have been passed over, and the consequence which the VV. wished to draw from it for denying the obligation of denouncing a confessor who had a shameful and indecent dealing with a woman in confession could have been denied. For what parity does an indecent manner of questioning have with a shameful dealing between a penitent and a confessor?

And the VV., relying upon three reasons of this kind, judged it must be concluded that the interpretation of the Gregorian Constitution proposed by them IS AT LEAST SUFFICIENTLY PROBABLE. Whether rightly, let those judge to whom the juridical judgment of so grave a matter pertains. But what certain of the VV. add (pp. 584-585), in order to fasten an interpretation of this kind also upon the Constitution of Benedict XIV, needs no reply. It is enough to remember that Benedict XIV in his Constitution holds the Constitution of Gregory XV ratified and confirmed in this manner: Which [he says] We wish to be held here as inserted word for word.

One thing must not be omitted: the VV. did not hesitate to write the following concerning Benedict's confirmation of the preceding Decrees: Insofar, finally, as in the same Constitution the Decrees of the Holy Inquisition from the year 1661 are confirmed, this confirmation proves nothing, because these Decrees are simply mentioned by the Pontiff but are not explained, and therefore, if there is doubt about their sense, they are the more to be interpreted in that sense which accords with the Constitution itself. - Leaving aside other things for now, let this be asked: What do they mean by a sense which accords with Benedict's Constitution itself? For it is manifest that in those Decrees to which Benedict adds the strength of inviolable and Apostolic firmness certain doubts are resolved whose solution you will not find in Benedict's Constitution itself, just as certain things are found more expressly explained in the Constitution of Gregory XV than in the Constitution of Benedict, which otherwise has certain things more explicitly than are perceived in Gregory's Constitution. What indeed will you conclude from this? In the Gregorian Constitution, for example, confessors who held indecent dealings in confession are expressly said to be denounced; but in Benedict's Constitution these are not expressly said to be denounced. Will you rightly conclude from this, as the VV. do concerning the decrees, that Benedict only mentioned the Gregorian Constitution but did not explain it, and therefore in doubt the interpretation must be received in the sense which accords with Benedict's Constitution? In brief: Benedict XIV not only confirms the Gregorian Constitution, but in the same manner confirms the interpretations and declarations of it which are contained in the Decrees of the Holy Inquisition. Moreover, to wish to elicit the sense either of the Gregorian Constitution or of the Decrees interpreting and declaring it from the Constitution of Benedict, even in those matters which it has less expressly, is a method and manner of interpretation not only altogether novel to the schools, but contrary to the common sense of men.

The VV. add (p. 585) an article with the title: Whether it can be imputed as a fault to St. Alphonsus that he did not know the Decrees of the Holy Inquisition from the year 1661. But no one calls this into controversy; and since it is evident that the holy Doctor used the Edicts or fragments of Edicts of the Holy Inquisition which he was able to see as a norm for writing, he would most religiously have accommodated his doctrine also to these Decrees if he had known them, nor, it must be held as certain, would he ever have used those empty reasons touched upon above to defend any opinion of his against those Decrees, which, moreover, he would have known to have been so solemnly confirmed by the strength of inviolable and Apostolic Authority.

Rather, it is opportune to admonish here that from that preconceived opinion concerning the confessor who is not to be denounced if he merely consented to solicitation, the holy Doctor Alphonsus came to another resolution which perhaps can be admitted even much less. For (book 6, no. 682), asking Whether a confessor who, having been solicited by a penitent to intercourse, refuses and turns aside to touches alone is to be denounced, he replies that it can probably be denied. The reason, he says, is that a woman soliciting to intercourse virtually provokes also to touches, which ordinarily are preliminary to intercourse; hence it is verified that the confessor then does not solicit but, having been solicited, consents. - But, as is evident, the two Decrees cited in the text exclude this opinion a fortiori, and that shameful dealing concerning which we have already spoken plainly reveals itself here, especially since the confessor himself actually invites and incites the penitent to evil, even though the penitent is judged to be ready for this. Hence in this case we have, furthermore, that mutual solicitation in which the Holy Inquisition establishes that the denunciation must necessarily be made in the eighth of the Decrees so often cited; in it, to the question, Whether, when the confessor and the penitent solicit one another, the confessor is to be denounced, the reply was, Yes, and the negative opinion is not probable; indeed, Benedict XIV, section 2 of the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, expressly speaks of this case in these words: Even if.... the solicitation between the confessor and the penitent was mutual.

We also have another resolution among those sixteen Decrees of the Holy Inquisition, with which the doctrine of the holy Doctor Alphonsus may seem not sufficiently consonant. For he asks (book 6, no. 683), Whether a confessor soliciting only to venially indecent acts is to be denounced. And after reporting the affirmative opinion of others, he adds: But the second and more probable opinion denies.... Nevertheless all agree... that if from the circumstances it were certainly inferred that by that slight act the priest had the intention of proceeding further, then the solicitation is to be judged grave. Moreover, in the third of the aforesaid Decrees, to the question, Whether a confessor, in soliciting, is to be denounced on account of the smallness of the matter, the reply was: Since in venereal matters there is no smallness of matter, and, if there were, it is not present in the matter at hand, they judged that he is to be denounced and that the contrary opinion is not probable. In defense of St. Alphonsus, however, it can perhaps be said that, when the holy Doctor names acts slightly indecent, he wished to designate something which has nothing in common with venereal matters. But that clause of the Decree also seems not to be passed over: And if [smallness of matter] were granted, it is not granted in the matter at hand. For the words, in the matter at hand, do not signify, in venereal matters; therefore they signify, in solicitation to something in any way less than honorable. And if this indeed is the sense of the Decree, then what the holy Doctor (loc. cit.) adds in this manner would not be sufficiently efficacious: On the other hand, an act which in itself is slight against chastity cannot become grave in the sacrament; otherwise any venial sin in the matter of truthfulness, patience, or humility would become grave in the sacrament, which no one asserts. For, as someone could reply, it is one thing for a priest in administering the sacrament to sin slightly against the virtue of chastity; it is another for a confessor in the confession itself to provoke the penitent to something less than honorable; between these two most diverse things a character of irreverence and indecency can rightly seem to intervene. But let the judgment concerning these matters belong to the wiser.

592. ○ QUESTION 3. Does the obligation of denunciation bind if the guilty party has been reformed, or if the solicitation occurred a long time ago?

Reply to the first. Yes, because the Pontiff does not intend only the reform of the guilty party, but also his punishment, so that the injury to the Church may be repaired and the scandal made good [11].

[11] Two decrees of the Holy Inquisition can pertain to this. The one is the thirteenth of the sixteen so often mentioned, in which, to the question, Whether a Confessor who, on account of the solicitation of another, abjured (namely, under compulsion by the Holy Inquisition that he abjure a slight or vehement suspicion of heresy) is to be denounced, the reply was that the negative opinion is not probable, and therefore he is to be denounced; this was also resolved on July 20, 1628. And the other which is cited here is a decree (in Giraldi, loc. cit., p. 641, no. VI) by which it was defined that a solicited woman is bound to denunciation even if she knew that the solicitor had spontaneously appeared. Moreover, since abjuration in the Holy Inquisition itself is the strongest sign of reform, and voluntary self-accusation is the greatest indication of reform and repentance, and nevertheless according to the cited decrees these things do not excuse from denouncing the confessor, a fortiori other signs of reform which are usually enumerated will not excuse, some of which are plainly equivocal and others exceedingly difficult to ascertain.

Reply to the second. Yes likewise, for the same reasons; for if one who committed the crime a long time ago were not to be denounced, the reason would surely be that he was judged already to have been reformed; but this reason does not avail, as was just said. Furthermore, who could determine what is a long or a short time? Nevertheless, that circumstance would have to be disclosed to the Superior [12]. - St. Ligorius, no. 686.

[12] This question stands expressly resolved in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, section 2, where it is defined that the confessor is to be denounced even if a long time has already elapsed after the solicitation itself. Refer here also what the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition declared on May 11, 1707 (in Giraldi, loc. cit., p. 641, no. VIII), namely, that a girl who was solicited while in a state of simplicity and without knowledge of the indecency is bound to denounce the soliciting Confessor after she has become capable and acquired knowledge of the past solicitation.

593. ○ QUESTION 4. Is the penitent excused from making the denunciation on account of fear that he may incur the indignation and rebuke of the person denounced?

Reply. No. The reason is that this vexation must be regarded as of the least account in a matter of such moment and one pertaining to the common good [13]. For it cannot be compared with the innumerable and very great evils arising from the corruption of a Priest.

[13] Nevertheless, it must be conceded that one is excused who would reasonably fear from the denunciation grave harm to his life, reputation, or temporal goods. For each person has a natural right to avert these harms, which prevails over positive law. Furthermore, the Church is not accustomed to urge observance of her laws with so grave an inconvenience. Yet where the solicitation arose from contempt of the sanctity of the sacrament or the destruction of souls would follow, the reason of the common good and submission to Religion would have to be preferred to private harm.

QUESTION 5. Is absolution to be denied to a penitent who refuses to denounce a soliciting Priest?

Reply. Yes, for otherwise the law would generally become useless and ineffectual. Therefore, in the most prudent manner he can, the Confessor must take care that the denunciation be made, namely, by deferring or even denying absolution to a penitent who refuses to obey.

Nevertheless, those things which Cardinal Albitius has as follows in On Inconstancy in the Faith, chapter 35, must be observed: It was resolved on June 28, 1597, February 28, 1598, and April 15, 1612, that when a woman is noble and modest and cannot be induced to give testimony, the Sacred Congregation is to be consulted in the City (Rome). But if outside the City, the Bishop or Inquisitor is to be consulted; if they have difficulty, let them consult the Sacred Congregation; but if not, let them give Confessors the faculty of absolving the penitent who for just causes refuses to denounce; she is nevertheless to be absolved under the condition that, when the causes cease, she is bound to do this, and also that she no longer approach the Confessor by whom she was solicited.

But in places where the observance of the Pontifical Decrees is not enforced, what must be done in these cases is to be learned from the Bishop [14].

[14] All Constitutions issued against those soliciting in confession extend their force universally to individual nations and comprehend Greeks as well as Latins within their scope. From the Constitution Etsi Pastoralis of Benedict XIV, section IX, no. V.

Nevertheless, those who dwell in the regions of schismatics, heretics, and Mohammedans, although subject to the Constitutions against solicitors, are to be absolved and freed from this burden of denunciation, according to a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office of February 21, 1630, in those local circumstances in which there is no hope that the person denounced will be punished, women cannot denounce without danger and infamy, and it is believed that the persons denounced can easily escape punishment by having recourse either to schismatic Bishops or to unbelieving lay judges, the aforesaid reasons being considered; nevertheless, they must be admonished that, when the dangers and impediments related above have ceased, they are bound to denounce (in Giraldi, loc. cit., pp. 640-641).

594. ○ QUESTION 6. Is a Confessor to be denounced who in confession asked a woman where she lived, if he afterward solicited her at home?

Reply. Yes, because, although the question put in confession seems indifferent, nevertheless it is afterward known from the circumstances that it was put for the purpose of soliciting. - St. Ligorius, no. 676.

QUESTION 7. Is a Priest to be denounced who, when asked by a woman to hear her confession, solicits her?

Reply. Yes, according to the fourth of the aforesaid Decrees, if the solicitation takes place in the confessional or in the place of confession. Not so if the solicitation takes place outside the place of confession and without the pretext of confession [15].

[15] To Question IV, Whether a Confessor who solicits a woman who says in the confessional that she wishes to confess on the following day and dissuades her from confession is to be denounced, the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition replied: if the solicitation takes place outside the place of confession and without the pretext of confession, the negative opinion is probable; otherwise, if it takes place in the Confessional or in the place of confession. Hence the opinion of St. Alphonsus is not to be admitted when he writes (book 6, no. 678) that a confessor who, when asked to hear a confession, turns aside and solicits is to be denounced, although he had not yet taken his seat nor had the woman knelt. To this also pertains the Response to Question XV, Whether a Confessor who, sitting in the confessional, solicits a woman standing before the confessional without simulating confession is to be denounced; the reply was that the negative opinion does not lack its probability. Moreover, no simulation of confession can be present in the case, because, since women do not confess while standing before the confessional, every appearance or suspicion of confession is absent.

595. ○ QUESTION 8. Is one to be denounced who, having learned a woman's frailty in confession, afterward solicits her at home?

Reply. It must be affirmed if he solicits the woman as a person whose disposition or frailty he learned from confession, and indicates this by words or in some other manner [16].

[16] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 678, doubt 2) skillfully refers this case to the clause of solicitation made on the occasion of confession, namely, when the Confessor, using knowledge from confession by which he has learned the penitent's frailty or inclination toward evil, or what she has done or desired to do with others, or the straits in which she is situated, or the necessities by which her constancy is pressed with a hard trial, etc., takes occasion from it to solicit her. The reason is that, since the occasion and impulse for soliciting flow from the confession heard, it is said with sufficient truth, with St. Alphonsus, that the solicitation takes place on the occasion of confession.

Nevertheless, for the penitent to be bound to denounce, it is necessary that it be established by certain indications that the occasion for soliciting was in fact taken from it. These indications are sufficiently present if, while soliciting, the confessor puts forth either certain words or some sign which refers to any of the aforesaid things known to him through confession; in this there can also be a sin against the sacramental seal. But it does not pertain to the substance of this case that these things happen shortly after confession; for even after a long time, the occasion for soliciting taken from it retains the same nature. But what St. Alphonsus reports from Roncaglia, that by force of the same clause a priest who solicits a woman while promising that he will hear her confession is to be denounced, seems plainly beside the point.

QUESTION 9. Is a Confessor to be denounced who praises a woman for her beauty?

Reply. This must be discerned from the manner of speaking or from other circumstances. For if he seems to act from a depraved affection, he is to be denounced; but not so if he speaks from a certain imprudence or mere levity [17]. - St. Ligorius, no. 703, etc.

[17] The twelfth of the sixteen Decrees of the Holy Inquisition so often cited accords with these things. For to the question, Whether a Confessor, if he praises a penitent for beauty and comeliness, is said to solicit her and therefore is to be denounced, the reply was that, if that praise is serious and savors of no depraved intention, the negative opinion is probable; otherwise it is not probable.

The Sacred Congregation judged that the same answer was to be given (decree XVI) to the question, Whether a confessor who, while hearing confession, gives a gift to a woman, so that he is said to have solicited her, is to be denounced. For it refers the matter to the response made to the twelfth question. Certainly, as St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 703) observes, this of itself is something indifferent, and the malice will have to be taken from the circumstances, namely, from the condition of the penitent, the quality of the gift, its quantity, and the manner in which it is given.

596. ○ QUESTION 10. Is faith readily to be placed in women accusing a Priest of solicitation?

Reply. No; but the circumstances of things and persons must be diligently weighed both by the Confessor and by the Superiors. For more than once women have been seen who, from envy, hatred, jealousy, or some other perverse end, atrociously calumniated entirely innocent Clerics. Therefore, all the circumstances must be weighed by mature examination, especially when the woman shows herself ready and prompt to obey the precept of denunciation.

Furthermore, take care to observe that, according to the Constitution of Benedict XIV, the crime of false accusation of solicitation is reserved to the Apostolic See, but without censure [18].

[18] Indeed, Benedict XIV established the same penalty against those commanding, counseling, and all who can be called procurers. Thus in the Constitution Sacramentum, section 3: And since certain wicked persons are found who, moved either by hatred or anger or some other unworthy cause, or incited by the impious persuasions of others, or by promises, or flatteries, or threats, or in any other manner... falsely accuse innocent priests of solicitation before ecclesiastical judges, in order, therefore, that such nefarious audacity and so detestable a crime may be restrained by fear of the greatness of the penalty, let every person who has involved himself in an execrable crime of this kind, or who has wickedly procured that it be done by others, perpetually lack hope of obtaining absolution from any priest... except from Us and Our Successors....

But the Superiors [19], once the truth of the crime is known with certainty, must proceed very cautiously, so that they may correct the guilty party according to the gravity of the offense, and not indiscriminately punish a fault long since past, or committed accidentally from frailty, just as one that is recent or committed from habit; likewise, so that at the same time they may consult the good of Religion, the Priesthood, and the matter itself, forestalling scandals and rumors insofar as this can be done.

[19] By Superior in this place must be understood either an Inquisitor of the Holy Office or the Ordinary of the place; for a denunciation can be brought at will to either one according to the Pontifical Constitutions.

597. ○ QUESTION 11. What are the penalties against solicitors?

Reply. The penalties against solicitors from the Bull of Gregory XV are suspension from the exercise of Orders, deprivation of benefices, dignities, and offices of every kind, and perpetual incapacity for them; and, furthermore, as regards Regulars, deprivation of active and passive voice. Nevertheless, they are all ferendae sententiae [20].

[20] Add that Benedict XIV, through the organ of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, decreed on August 5, 1745, that henceforth priests... soliciting to shameful acts in the act of sacramental confession, or on its occasion or pretext... besides the penalties inflicted upon them by law and the Apostolic Constitutions... also incur perpetual incapacity for the celebration of the Sacrifice. Concerning this decree St. Alphonsus observes (book 6, no. 705) that, for a penalty of this kind to be incurred, a declaratory sentence of the judge is required, namely, from the general principle concerning privative or disqualifying penalties when the guilty party cannot himself carry out the penalty without his own infamy. Indeed, in the Instruction of the Most Holy Inquisition issued February 20, 1867, the following is read (no. 12): It must be noted that all penalties of this kind, and the very incapacity for celebrating the most holy Sacrifice of the Mass prescribed in the decree of Benedict XIV of August 5, 1745, are only ferendae sententiae.

598. ○ QUESTION 12. How is a denunciation to be made?

Reply. 1. The denunciation is to be made orally insofar as possible, not merely in writing. Therefore, the solicited woman must present herself before the Ordinary or Inquisitor, wherever a tribunal of the Inquisition exists, and declare the act of solicitation, without, however, in any way disclosing her own consent, if she gave any.

2. The denunciation is to be made to the Inquisitor or Ordinary of the place in which the penitent is staying, even if the soliciting Confessor belongs to another diocese. For it pertains to the local Ordinary or Inquisitor to receive the sworn denunciation and transmit it to the Bishop of the guilty priest.

3. If the denunciation cannot be made orally, it is to be made by a letter signed with one's own name and surname, or at least through an intermediary. For the obligation of denouncing the solicitor is not so much that of approaching the Superior personally as of reporting the delinquent to him, as Benedict XIV speaks in his Bull [21]. But one who is bound to the end is also bound to the means.

[21] The Author had before his eyes these words of Benedict XIV (Constitution Sacramentum, section 2): Let Confessors furthermore take diligent care not to impart sacramental absolution to penitents whom they know already to have been solicited by others unless, first bringing the aforesaid denunciation into effect, they have indicated the delinquent to the competent judge, or at least pledge and promise that they will denounce him as soon as they can.

4. The Confessor, however, is not bound to undertake the burden of transmitting the denunciation to the Ordinary; rather, he satisfies his office by admonishing the penitent to denounce the solicitor properly at an opportune time. He can nevertheless offer his assistance if he judges it expedient; but knowledge of the matter must be received outside confession. - St. Ligorius, no. 699.

5. If the person solicited cannot in any manner be induced to carry out the denunciation in such a form, because she is affected, namely, by fear or insuperable shame, let her permit the Bishop to be informed of the matter; he can delegate someone to receive the denunciation. This faculty was granted to Bishops and Inquisitors by an Indult of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition with the consent of the Pontiff. But the delegated Priest must take an oath to preserve silence and to fulfill faithfully the office committed to him. - Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, September 27, 1624.

6. In every case a denunciation made through anonymous letters is altogether insufficient and wholly invalid, just as if it had not been made, as the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition declared several times. - See Analecta Iuris Pontificii, September 1855, etc., etc. [22].

[22] If letters are sent to the Father Commissary or Assessor of the Supreme Tribunal with the name of the writer, in which a denunciation is contained, they are customarily remitted to the Inquisitors or Bishops, so that, after summoning the writer to themselves, they cause him to acknowledge them under oath, question him specifically concerning the things contained in them, and, after reducing them to the form of a denunciation, place them at the beginning of the Process, and examine witnesses informed about their contents. Albitius, On Inconstancy in the Faith, chapter 35, no. 21.

7. Solicited women are not bound to make the denunciation if Inquisitors or Bishops or their Vicars, living in distant regions, cannot be approached without grave inconvenience. But when the impediment ceases, for example, at the visitation of the Bishop, the obligation of denunciation must be urged. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office declared on January 22, 1727.

Chapter II. On the Office of the Minister

Article I. On the Office of the Minister in Confession

We must treat: 1. of the duties of the Confessor in general; 2. of his manner of acting with the various classes of penitents.

§ I. On the Duties of the Confessor

A fourfold duty or office is assigned to the Confessor, namely: 1. of Father; 2. of Physician; 3. of Teacher; 4. of Judge.

Point I. On the Office of Father

599. ○ The Confessor is a spiritual father who gives spiritual life to the penitent, or restores and fosters it; for in the tribunal of Penance he acts in the place of the best of all parents, namely, Christ Himself, and therefore is called by penitents by the sweetest name of Father. But that which stands out above all in the name of a true father is distinguished and inexhaustible charity. For what love is stronger than the love of a father? What is truer, purer, more chaste, more constant, fuller of solicitude, and more alien to personal advantage, indeed more ready and prompt for every kind of privation and inconvenience? Such, therefore, must be the charity of the Confessor, so that, clothed with the bowels of the mercy of Christ Jesus, Who came not to call the just but sinners, he may know how to deal attentively, patiently, and meekly with sinners (Leo XII, in the Bull for the Great Jubilee of the year 1825). Thus a good father will sustain all things for his spiritual children: For charity is patient.... bears all things.... endures all things. 2 Cor. 15:4.

The Confessor must be full of charity toward penitents at the beginning, during the course, and at the end of confession. Concerning these things it is profitable to hear St. Ligorius himself speaking in the Practice of the Confessor, at the end of the larger theological work, and also in Apostolic Homilies, treatise 21.

600. I. At the Beginning of Confession. - "First, the Confessor must employ charity in receiving everyone kindly, whether they are poor, uneducated, or sinners. Some take time only for hearing the confessions of long-standing devout persons or distinguished persons, because they do not have enough courage to repel these from themselves; yet if some wretched sinner approaches them, he is heard grudgingly and, loaded with reproaches, is driven away. Hence it happens that the wretched man, after exerting the greatest force upon himself to come to confess his sins, feeling himself received so harshly, conceives a hatred for the Sacrament of Penance; and, despairing of being able to find anyone who will aid him and absolve him from sins, he plunges headlong with loosened reins into the slippery course of a ruined life and falls into despair of salvation. Good Confessors act otherwise when sinners of this kind flock to them: they receive them kindly and, as a victor over captured prey, exult, considering that it has fallen to them to snatch a soul from the hands of the devil. They know that this Sacrament was properly instituted not for the just but for sinners; for venial faults do not need sacramental absolution in order to be remitted, since they can be effaced in many other ways. They also know that Christ declared in these words: For I came not to call the just, but sinners. Mark 2:17. Therefore, the Confessor, clothing himself with the bowels of mercy, the more he finds souls stained by the multitude and enormity of sins, the more he should embrace them with greater charity, in order to gain them for God, and furnish them his aid in these or similar words: 'Come, brother, be of good courage; do not fear; confess your sins without trepidation. Open everything confidently; be ashamed of nothing. It does not matter if you have not looked into every recess of your conscience; it is enough if you answer what is asked. Give thanks to God, Who has awaited you until now for penance. Now your life must be changed. Rejoice, because God certainly forgives you all sins, however enormous, if you have a good will; and for this reason He has awaited you, that He might spare you. Therefore say everything with a cheerful heart; conceal nothing under wrappings....'"

601. II. During the Course of Confession. - "He must show far greater charity while receiving the confession. Let him take care not to show himself impatient or affected by weariness; nor let him show that he is struck with amazement by the sins which are related, provided the penitent is not so hardened or insolent that he would disclose numerous and atrocious sins without any shame and without any displeasure or feeling of soul; for then he must strive according to his strength to make the penitent perceive how great their deformity and enormity are. Therefore, a sharper correction is then required, so that he may awaken from a lethal lethargy. It is indeed true that during the act of confession Confessors ought to abstain from making a correction, lest perhaps penitents, terrified, keep back sins; nevertheless, this is understood as a general rule. Moreover, it is often expedient not to proceed to further things, but immediately to correct the penitent, especially when he confesses a very enormous sin, or if he has been habituated in some vice, so that he may comprehend the gravity of the sin. Yet let him take care not to exasperate or terrify him. Therefore, after he has corrected him as much as necessary, let him immediately encourage him to confess the remaining sins, saying: 'Come, brother, do you wish to recover from this vice? Is it so? And because you are ready to do this, be of good courage. Therefore relate the remaining sins, withholding nothing. Thus say everything with a strong heart; confess everything sincerely, for God is ready to spare you....'" (no. 4.)

602. III. At the End of Confession. - "At the end of confession it is also necessary that the Confessor apply himself with more vehement ardor and zeal, so that he may cause the penitent to perceive the gravity and multitude of his sins and the wretched state of damnation in which he is found; but let him always do this with the greatest charity. Nevertheless, it is more fitting then to use graver words, so that he may thus be able better to return to good fruit of mind; yet he must bring it about that the penitent understands that what is said to him proceeds not from an angry disposition, but from singular love and compassion for his soul. This can be expressed in this manner: 'My son, do you perceive the evil which you have wrought? What evil has your God ever done to you, Whom you have so ruinously despised? If no one had ever been so hostile to you as Jesus Christ, could you have behaved worse toward Him? But, I ask you, consider who this Jesus is. He is the One Who, although He was God and needed nothing, became man for your sake and willed to die upon the cross in order to redeem you from hell. Ah, my son, if you had died meanwhile, if you had died this night, where would you have gone? Where would you now be? You would be in the eternal fire of hell. What will become of you if in the future you continue to live the life you have led until now? Will you be able to be saved thus? Awaken, and see that, unless you change your ways for the better, you are already damned. What good have you gathered for yourself from so many sins? Come, my son, withdraw from evil, cease to sin, and commit yourself entirely into the arms of God, which are extended to receive you: it is enough how much you have sinned against Him. I wish to help you with my whole heart and all my strength; come to me always as it pleases you, for you will find a father who will receive you kindly. Behold, now resolve firmly that you wish to become holy. It depends upon you. For God is always ready, and for this reason He has granted you this time, so that you may turn away from evil and do good. O how good it is to have God as a friend!....'" etc.

Point II. On the Office of Physician

The Confessor is a true physician of souls, since he must deliver them from the various diseases of sin, free them from the depraved affections of the passions, and restore them to divine grace. Therefore, the Confessor, as a skillful physician, must: 1. know the cause of the evil; 2. heal it; 3. guard against relapse. Let us hear St. Ligorius again in the same place.

603. I. The Confessor Must Know the Cause of the Disease. - "In order that the Confessor may meet the infirmities of his penitent with suitable remedies, the origin and cause of all his spiritual diseases must be known. Some inquire nothing besides the species and number of sins: if they see the penitent disposed, they absolve him immediately; but if not, without expending one word, they dismiss him at once, saying with a sidelong glance: 'Depart from me, because I cannot absolve you.' Good Confessors proceed otherwise: for they first investigate the origin and gravity of the disease by inquiring about the habit of sin, the occasions, the time, the place, the persons with whom, and the concurrence of circumstances. For thus they will be better able to correct penitents, dispose them for absolution, and apply salutary remedies." (no. 6.)

604. II. He Must Heal the Disease. - "Once the origin and gravity of the disease are known, let the Confessor proceed to make the due admonitions. And although, as a father, he ought to listen to penitents with charity, nevertheless, as a physician, he is bound to admonish and correct them as much as necessary, especially those who, burdened with many mortal sins, rarely approach the Sacrament of Penance.... Nor ought the Confessor then to regard the other penitents who surround him.

For, as St. Francis Xavier used to say, it is better to hear the confessions of a few properly made than the disordered and fruitless confessions of many. Here it must be observed how wrongly those Confessors act who, if they encounter an indisposed penitent, immediately order him to depart from them lest they spend any time with him.... And it matters little that others wait or depart without confession; for the Confessor must render an account on the day of judgment only for this one who now confesses to him, not for the others...." (no. 7.)

"After the due corrections or admonitions, it is better that he labor to dispose the penitent for absolution through acts of true sorrow and purpose. Therefore I wish Confessors to be admonished that very few penitents, especially the uneducated, approach confession after first making an act of sorrow. Some Confessors think that they have sufficiently fulfilled their office if they merely question penitents of this kind in the following manner: 'Come, do you ask pardon from God for all these things?' (which in truth is not a true act of sorrow); 'Do you repent from your heart of all your sins?' And, without any other word intervening, they bestow absolution upon them. Entirely different from this is the practice of good Confessors. For these labor first of all that penitents (the discussion concerns those held by mortal sins) conceive true sorrow and detestation of sins. And first they prepare them through an act of attrition, for example: 'My son, where ought you now to be for eternity? In hell. Ah! You would be tormented in that fire! Nor would any hope remain for you to be delivered from there! You would remain there, abandoned by all and rejected by God for all eternity! Therefore, do you repent of having offended God on account of the hell which you have merited?' Afterward let him take care that an act of contrition be elicited in this manner: 'My son, what have you done? You have sinned against God, the supreme and infinite good; you took no account of Him; you turned your face away from Him; you cast Him behind your back; you despised His friendship and grace. Come, therefore, because you have offended God, infinite goodness, do you now repent with your whole heart? Detest and hold in hatred above all evils all the injuries with which you have undeservedly afflicted so good a God. Are you not now ready to die a thousand times [1] rather than commit these things in the future?...." (no. 10.)

[1] See what was noted above at no. 459.

605. III. He Must Guard Against Relapse. - The Confessor will guard against relapse by assigning to the penitent remedies suited to the disease. The remedies are either general or particular.

1. The general remedies are: 1. devout prayer and love toward God; 2. frequent invocation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the holy Guardian Angel, and one's patron Saint; 3. frequent reception of the Sacraments and confession immediately after any mortal sin has been committed; 4. consideration of the eternal truths, especially death and the last end, according to that saying: Remember thy last things, and thou shalt never sin. Ecclus. 7:40;

5. remembrance of the presence of God when temptation presses, saying: God sees me; 6. an evening examination of conscience with sorrow of soul and purpose; 7. mental prayer and pious reading, especially for Priests.

2. Particular remedies will be assigned according to the diversity of vices [2]. For example, to one who is held by some hatred, let it be suggested that he commend daily to God the person whom he hates [3], reciting the Lord's Prayer for him, etc. And when he is disturbed by the memory of an injury, let him remember the insults with which he himself has afflicted God. Let one who has fallen into shameful sins be enjoined to avoid idleness and flee evil companions and depraved occasions. Let one who has contracted a depraved habit in this vice over a long time be prescribed to avoid not only proximate occasions but also certain remote ones which, for one so weak, are as though proximate. Above all, however, let the Confessor take care that this person receive Communion frequently, because the Eucharist is called wine springing forth virgins. And so concerning the others.

[2] Most useful for this purpose is the little work of Philippus Maria Salvatori, published several times at Rome under the title Practical Instruction for New Confessors.

[3] This must be prudently weighed, whether it will be profitable; furthermore, care must be taken lest the penitent believe himself bound to it, or think that, unless he also adds this, he has not sufficiently fulfilled the precept of loving enemies. See vol. I, no. 226.

The Confessor will assign other remedies [4] according to his prudence, after considering the circumstances of occasions, persons, etc. For prudence is the chief quality which ought to excel in a physician. - See St. Ligorius, Practice of the Confessor, no. 15; and Apostolic Homilies, treatise 2, nos. 5 and 6.

[4] Those things must not be passed over in this place which Cardinal De Lugo wisely observes concerning the office of a physician (Moral Responses, book 1, doubt 28, no. 5): "The penitent," he says, "is bound only to fulfill the penance imposed upon him by the Confessor. But as regards other things, the Confessor can indeed declare to the penitent those things to which the penitent is otherwise bound under sin, for example, restitution, abandoning the proximate occasion of sin, abstaining from such a usurious contract, and other similar things; if the penitent does not have the intention of observing them, he is not disposed for absolution. Nevertheless, the Confessor cannot command him under sin to do anything else except that which he imposes as penance, in imposing which he acts as a judge. But as regards other things he acts as a Physician, whose part is not to command, but to counsel and declare to the sick person what means are necessary or useful for preserving or recovering health."

Point III. On the Office of Teacher

In order that the Confessor may rightly fulfill the office of teacher, he must have sufficient knowledge to instruct penitents suitably.

Section I — On the Knowledge of the Confessor

606. Principles. - I. The Confessor is bound under grave sin to know all those things which are required for the proper fulfillment of his office. - Thus all teach with St. Ligorius in the Practice of the Confessor and in the Apostolic Homilies, where he speaks thus: I affirm that a Confessor who exposes himself to hearing confessions without sufficient knowledge is in a state of damnation. The reason is that otherwise a Confessor of this kind exposes himself to the evident danger of performing so grave an office badly, with injury to the Sacrament and great harm to souls.

Therefore God requires special knowledge from His Ministers, as is evident from various words of Sacred Scripture: The lips of the Priest shall keep knowledge, and they shall seek the law at his mouth. Mal. 2:7. - Because thou hast rejected knowledge, I will reject thee, that thou shalt not perform the office of priesthood to Me. Osee 4:6. - If the blind lead the blind, both fall into the pit. Matt. 15:14. - Woe to you, blind guides! Matt. 23:16. - It is also evident from innumerable testimonies of the Holy Fathers: No art is presumed to be taught unless it is first learned by attentive meditation. The pastoral magisterium is therefore undertaken with great temerity by the unskilled, since the government of souls is the art of arts. - St. Gregory, Pastoral Rule, part 1, chapter 1.

607. ○ II. The Confessor, however, is not bound to have such perfect knowledge that he can always immediately and by himself solve every doubt which occurs; rather, it is sufficient that he can do this in cases which commonly occur and that, concerning more difficult cases, he at least know how to doubt [1]. For greater knowledge can be had only with greater difficulty, since not even the more learned can immediately resolve every case. Nor is the Confessor bound to discern concerning each sin accused whether it is mortal or not, since this is often impossible; rather, it is sufficient that he hear each one as it was committed and judge concerning it [2], both according to common principles and according to the circumstances of the matters explained by the penitent, and that he know how to apply a suitable remedy. - St. Ligorius, no. 627.

[1] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 627), with the Salmanticenses, Suarez, and the common opinion, judges it sufficient if the Confessor understands the things which more frequently occur and knows how to doubt concerning the others.

And Cardinal De Lugo: It is not necessary that, in the doubts which occur, he himself be able to resolve everything; it is sufficient if he knows common cases and at least knows how to doubt concerning the more difficult ones, so that he may consult books or more skilled men (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 70).

[2] Cardinal De Lugo confirms these things (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 70): This knowledge need not be so great that he can discern concerning everything which the penitent says whether it is mortal or venial; for often not even the most learned can do this, partly because they cannot know the fact itself perfectly, whether the penitent consented with full deliberation or not, and partly because even the law itself cannot be known in every matter. It is therefore sufficient if, in those things which commonly occur, he knows whether they are mortal or venial.... And immediately afterward (ibid., no. 71): Hence I infer that it is not required that the confessor judge concerning everything which he hears from the penitent whether it is grave or light, indeed not even whether it is a sin; but concerning common things. Let him hear and understand the rest, and afterward absolve with the due intention.

Nor ought it then to disturb the Confessor that afterward he knows with certainty what was uncertain to him during confession. St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 627), with Suarez, admonishes to the point that, although in some case the Confessor does not discern which things are grave or light, nevertheless, if the penitent in good faith declares his sin, the confession is valid; and although it is afterward noticed that it was mortal, there is no reason for it to be repeated in another confession.

608. Resolutions. - 1. Every Confessor is bound to know all those things which pertain to the validity, substance, integrity, and effect of the Sacrament of Penance, and which are required for its licit administration both on his part and on the part of the penitent.

2. He must also know the common obligations and those proper to states of life, the various species of sins, their circumstances changing the species [3], the principles for discerning between mortal and venial sins, and which things are mortal and venial in the individual precepts, at least according to the general principles and the common opinion of Theologians. Likewise, which acts are valid and licit [4]. The reason is evident, because he must know that concerning which he is to judge; otherwise he will not be able to render an equitable judgment.

[3] Concerning this point several things should be observed. 1. Where there is disagreement among the Doctors whether some circumstance induces a diversity of species, just as the penitent is not bound to confess it, neither is the confessor bound to inquire about it; on this matter the little work of Thomas Tamburini entitled Method of Expeditious Confession will be read with profit. 2. Even if this diversity of species is present, nevertheless, when it appears that the penitent did not advert at all to that special malice, there will be no need for the confessor to inquire about it. 3. Furthermore, it will pertain to the prudence of the confessor whether he ought to admonish the penitent concerning that special malice according to the rules which will be given below concerning admonishing a penitent. Hence St. Alphonsus (book 3, no. 150): Moreover, it is not always expedient to admonish an uneducated penitent of this kind concerning the gravity of perjury if the admonition is foreseen as not readily profitable.

[4] When the Confessor must judge concerning these things as regards what is to be done in the future, but he himself remains doubtful, and it is not convenient either here and now to employ means for dispelling the doubt or afterward to speak to the penitent again, this admonition of Cardinal De Lugo will be useful (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 71): When counsel must be given for the future, or restitution imposed, or a doubtful contract prohibited, or something similar, if the confessor himself cannot resolve it by himself, it will be good counsel to ask the penitent whether he is prepared to consult skilled men and to abide by their judgment concerning that doubt. If the penitent promises, let him absolve, declaring to him the obligation which he has of consulting one or more persons concerning that doubt.

3. He must know reserved cases [5] and censures in force, impediments of matrimony, the conditions of contracts, the various causes of restitution, the roots and occasions of sins, the remedies to be applied to them, the salutary and suitable satisfactions to be imposed, etc.

[5] Cardinal De Lugo wisely admonishes (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 70) that those who have the faculty of absolving from reserved cases by a Bull or another privilege are in a better condition. For he experiences less difficulty who can remember from a brief catalogue the sins from which he cannot absolve penitents.

4. Therefore a Confessor sins who knows that he lacks the aforesaid knowledge, even if he hears confessions solely from charity and obedience. Nor does the approval of the Bishop excuse him of itself; for this does not give the knowledge due from the nature of the matter, nor supply its defect [6]. - St. Ligorius, Apostolic Homilies, no. 100.

[6] Nevertheless, this must be limited if the subject does not indeed know with certainty that he is ignorant of necessary things, but is troubled by doubts concerning his own sufficiency, by which even more skilled men of a timid disposition are not rarely distressed. De Lugo speaks aptly (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 72): I infer, secondly, that one sins gravely who without the knowledge respectively required exposes himself to hearing confessions; in this there is no difference, formally speaking, between a regular and a secular confessor, since each is bound by a precept of natural law. Nevertheless, there can be a material difference insofar as a Religious who doubts his fitness and sufficiency for that ministry can more easily lay aside that doubt when the Prelate, who knows him well, judges him fit and imposes such an office upon him.

Although De Lugo says these things only of a Religious, they nevertheless have place also as regards a secular priest if in like manner the Bishop knows the subject well and constrains him to the ministry.

Furthermore, the case of necessity must be excepted; in it, as De Lugo says (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 73), although a priest is ignorant and unlearned, he ought to hear the confession and absolve, because the knowledge of the confessor is required for the integrity of the confession; but since in that danger material integrity is not required, but it is sufficient to perceive some sin, or even sin in general, the ignorance of the confessor will not be an obstacle in that case. Hence the same must be said when Christians who are held in servitude among unbelievers have only one ignorant and unlearned priest, as Suarez teaches (On Penance, disputation 28, section 2, no. 6), because this too is reputed a morally extreme necessity.

609. ○ 5. The Superior also sins who gives an ignorant Confessor permission to hear Confessions, because he consents to and cooperates in his sin [7].

[7] Nevertheless, the Doctors admonish that necessity sometimes brings it about that this ministry must be committed even to the less learned. Hence St. Alphonsus (book 3, no. 628), after saying that necessity excuses in this matter if otherwise penitents would have to lack confession for a long time, as happens among captives, then adds: And the Doctors say the same concerning small towns or galleys, where, as they say, if learned priests cannot be had, less learned ones can be appointed; they are nevertheless to be admonished of the obligation of learning.

Thus Cardinal De Lugo also observes (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 74) that Prelates who place unlearned and uneducated men over the ministry in these circumstances are to be excused. "I add," he says, "that on this ground Prelates who in some small and remote towns place unlearned and uneducated men over them as Pastors are often excused; for they generally do this because, on account of the small stipend, scarcity of provisions, and poverty of the inhabitants, no learned man is found who wishes to undertake that care. Hence, since those sheep cannot be assisted otherwise, as I suppose, it is better that in such necessity they have an unlearned confessor than that they be left entirely without every remedy. Nevertheless, the Prelate ought to admonish the pastor concerning the defect of knowledge from which he suffers and the obligation which he has of acquiring, if he can, the doctrine necessary for fulfilling his ministry. For the pastor and confessor always has this obligation, although the Prelate is sometimes excused by the necessity of the sheep when he sends a less sufficient minister."

6. The penitent himself also sins who deliberately chooses an unfit Confessor. If, however, anyone is in good faith, the confession will be valid, because on the part of the penitent there is an integral declaration of sins and the due disposition of soul; on the part of the Confessor there is at least knowledge of the sins under the confused character of sin, which suffices for the matter of the Sacrament [8].

[8] Cardinal De Lugo nevertheless intimates an exception in this manner (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 72): Likewise, one who chooses an unfit person for this office sins; and not only the Prelate, but also a penitent who has the faculty of choosing a Confessor and knows that he is not fit, although approved, sins by choosing him, unless the penitent is such that by his own learning he can supply the ignorance of the confessor, as was said.

7. Experience cannot supply knowledge, but can only assist it; but where it is deprived of the aid of knowledge, it will impel the rash confessor into very many and very grave errors.

8. Therefore every Confessor is bound to apply himself diligently to the study of Moral Theology; and, as St. Ligorius asserts, Apostolic Homilies, no. 100: He ought never to interrupt that study, because among so many diverse and mutually dissimilar matters which pertain to this science, many, although read, fall from the mind with the passage of time because they occur more rarely; therefore it is necessary always to recall them to mind by frequent study.

9. Hence it is evident how gravely those err who regard the science of Moral Theology as easy and scarcely worthy of any attention, repeatedly saying that nearly all cases can be resolved by some common sense together with a knowledge of general principles. - The same St. Ligorius speaks aptly, book 6, no. 628: Those who desire this office of hearing confessions should not easily persuade themselves that they can render themselves sufficiently fit for so great an office without long study of moral science, for which it certainly does not suffice to run through some little summary of those which circulate; nor is it sufficient to know the general principles of this faculty, as some who despise casuists suppose. For moral science is not only very necessary to the Christian commonwealth, since the good government of souls depends upon it, but also exceedingly difficult: both because it requires a general knowledge of all other sciences, duties, and arts [9]; because it embraces so many diverse matters remote from one another; and because in great part it consists of so many positive laws which are found cited only among casuists, and especially among more recent ones, since laws of this kind appear daily. Finally, it becomes most difficult on account of the innumerable circumstances of cases upon which the variety of resolutions depends; for according to the diversity of circumstances different principles must be applied, and in this the difficulty consists, since it cannot be done without great discussion or an accurate reading of several books which examine and elucidate the matters.

[9] Cardinal De Lugo wisely admonishes with others (On Penance, disputation 21, no. 70) that the knowledge required in a Confessor is not the same for all. For less suffices for some to hear the confessions of children or rustics; in others more is required for hearing merchants, judges, etc., who have more difficult cases. But for the confessions of a learned man much less is required, because the Confessor can be instructed by the penitent himself.

Section II — On the Obligation of Instructing Penitents

610. Principles. - I. The Confessor is bound to instruct penitents in all those things which pertain to receiving the Sacrament rightly here and now. The reason is that, since the Priest is the minister of the Sacrament, he must procure its valid and licit reception and therefore impart the instruction necessary here and now.

II. He must instruct penitents when he notices that someone is ignorant of any of those things which are necessary for living as a Christian, such as, for example, his own obligations. - St. Ligorius, no. 607 ff.

III. Nevertheless, of itself and strictly, he is not bound to instruct them concerning all the things which they themselves ought to know and can learn elsewhere. The reason is that the office of teacher in the Confessor pertains of itself only to the right administration of the Sacrament of Penance. Per accidens, however, an obligation from charity could be present when the penitent could acquire this knowledge for himself, either by himself or through another, only with very great difficulty [10]. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

[10] This obligation of charity is not special to Confessors, but common to all who know the necessity of their neighbor and can provide for him without grave inconvenience. A special obligation belongs to pastors, who owe it from their office.

The obligation of the Confessor will especially be present when the penitent is ignorant of those things which are necessary to know for salvation by a necessity of means. How this is to be understood, however, is well explained thus by Sporer (On Penance, no. 796): The Confessor who notices this (and it is frequent in children and rustics) is bound to instruct him in the manner of which he is capable here and now, not indeed doctrinally, so that he can comprehend, understand, retain in memory, and recite those things; but for the time it is sufficient that he intimate to him the obligation of learning and supply his ignorance by proposing to him the articles to be believed, so that he may elicit an act of faith concerning each one. For example: Do you believe that God is one in essence and three Persons, etc., as I and the Church believe? I believe.... Do you believe whatever the Holy Roman Church believes, and do you wish to die in her? I believe.... Furthermore: Are you sorry that you are so ignorant and have been negligent, etc.? I am sorry.... Do you firmly propose, when you have obtained a suitable occasion, that you will take care to be instructed and wish diligently to learn those things which are necessary for salvation? Certainly. If he elicits these acts, it suffices for the instruction to be furnished by the Confessor here and now and for sufficient disposition for the sacrament, etc.

611. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must a penitent laboring under ignorance concerning some obligation always be admonished?

Reply 1. Yes, if the ignorance appears vincible, that is, if the Confessor notices that the penitent doubts in such a way that good faith is already absent. The reason is that no danger threatens in giving the admonition; otherwise, the penitent acting with that doubt is not free from sin. Reply 2. If ignorance of some obligation is invincible, the penitent must be admonished if fruit is hoped for from the admonition; but not, generally speaking, if it is not hoped for. The reason is that on the one hand this admonition would not profit, and on the other it would harm him, since after being admonished he would sin formally in the future. - St. Ligorius, no. 610, and others commonly.

Therefore, the penitent must be admonished: 1. whenever he himself asks about the malice of some matter, because, since he doubts the lawfulness of the matter, he is no longer in invincible ignorance [11]; 2. whenever the silence of the Confessor would harden him in the purpose of carrying out an evil matter; 3. whenever his ignorance concerns the primary principles of natural law or their proximate conclusions, because such ignorance, if possible, cannot remain invincible for a long time; 4. whenever, if the admonition is omitted, the penitent would remain in a proximate occasion of sinning formally [12]. - St. Ligorius, no. 615.

[11] The reason is, says De Lugo (On Penance, disputation 22, no. 29), that the silence of the Confessor would be an approval of the error, which is never lawful. See St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 616.

Sanchez excepts (On Matrimony, book 2, disputation 38, no. 14) when the penitent is moved to ask by a mere scruple (he calls a scruple a doubt from a false or frivolous reason); for then he judges that, if the admonition is foreseen to be harmful, the confessor can remain silent or reply that he should lay aside a scruple of this kind. The reason is that a scruple does not remove good faith. - De Lugo (loc. cit.), however, admits this only so far as the Confessor can indeed pretend that he did not hear, did not attend, or forgot to reply, so that the penitent may thus remain in the good faith which he previously had, yet not confirmed by the authority of the Confessor himself. - But if the reason for asking is truly frivolous, for example, if he raises a doubt concerning the validity of matrimony because he celebrated it in the state of sin, at a prohibited time, by a fictitious testimony of freedom of state, or contrary to a previously emitted oath or vow, it does not appear why the Confessor (who from another true cause, but one unknown to the penitent, knows that the matrimony is invalid) cannot reply that that reason is empty and the scruple vain.

[12] The hypothesis of a penitent who believes himself bound where there is no obligation, or even thinks that a grave obligation is present where only a light one is present, must not be passed over. This ignorance, as always harmful, must always be removed.

QUESTION 2. Is an admonition to be given in doubt whether it will profit or harm?

Reply 1. Yes, if it will more probably profit; not so if it will more probably harm. - St. Ligorius, no. 916. - De Lugo. - Salmanticenses, etc., against some.

Reply 2. In a doubt equally balanced on either side, generally speaking, formal evils are to be avoided rather than material ones. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others [13].

[13] Doctors commonly hold that an admonition which is foreseen as merely harmful is to be omitted, even if the ignorance results in the detriment of a third party. Thus also St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 614). The excellent reason, touched upon by Sanchez and then by De Lugo (On Penance, disputation 22, no. 26), is that the admonition does not even profit the creditor and harms only the penitent.

The case is different, however, when the common good is at issue, as St. Alphonsus observes with others (loc. cit., no. 615), for example, if someone in good faith believed himself to be a priest when he was not; his ignorance, as De Lugo says (disputation 22, no. 30), would redound to the common harm of those who receive a sacrament from him.

And to this pertains the case, which not rarely troubles the mind of the confessor, of a denunciation to be made which is ordered not to the private good of the person sinning but to the prevention of a common harm. This harm could indeed be so grave and so imminent that the obligation of denouncing would bind even with danger to life. Nevertheless, the Confessor, insofar as this can be done, must take care that the matter be carried out with the least danger to the denunciant. For to prevent, for example, a conflagration or treason, it is not always necessary either that the name of the denunciant be known or that he himself disclose the matter.

But when the harm does not appear so imminent, there must be weighed on the one hand the gravity of the harm and on the other the difficulty of denouncing which arises from the circumstances of persons, places, the business, etc. From consideration of these things it will be necessary to determine whether the gravity of the harm ought to impel the Confessor to admonish even with a slight hope of fruit and thus with grave danger of uselessly casting the penitent into bad faith, or whether the absence of every prudent hope of fruit ought rather to bring it about that, after the remedy against the common harm has been despaired of, he does not uselessly add grave harm to the penitent by removing his good faith.

Hence it is that in cases of solicitation, although denunciation is ordered not to the reform of the solicitor but to the common good, nevertheless the Apostolic See has sometimes been accustomed to dispense from denouncing. From this it is also evident that St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 694) established too generally that an admonition can never be omitted when the common harm is at issue.

612. ○ QUESTION 3. Is a spouse to be admonished of the invalidity of the matrimony on account of an occult impediment which the Confessor discovers?

Reply. No, generally speaking, until the Confessor has obtained a dispensation, unless it can be obtained immediately and easily from the Pope or Bishop. The reason is that very great inconveniences would generally follow from it, for example, danger of infamy, scandal, quarrels, or incontinence, etc., and consequently material fornication would become formal. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 611. - Elbel, no. 471, etc.

But can the Confessor oblige the spouse who is ignorant of the impediment and refuses the debt to render it? Reply. Yes. The reason is that, while the spouse is persuaded that the matrimony is valid, he is bound to render the debt so that he may follow the dictate of conscience. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others commonly [14].

[14] Sanchez speaks well (On Matrimony, book 2, disputation 38, no. 8) as regards those who would wish the Confessor merely to say generally that spouses are bound to render the debt: I confess that I do not grasp what difference there is between these statements: Render the debt; and, The wife is bound to render the debt; since each manner of speaking tends toward the same end, namely, to induce that spouse to render the debt. And if to induce by direct words were a fault, to induce by indirect words would not be free of it, since on the part of the Confessor the intention is the same in each manner of speaking, and the penitent understands precisely the same thing. Furthermore, because, since the penitent must be left in that ignorance, he sins mortally, supposing it, by not rendering; therefore the confessor is bound not to absolve unless he proposes that he will render it afterward. Therefore he can compel him to render it; and thus the confessor does not command an evil thing, but a thing owed, in view of the circumstances which occur.

613. ○ QUESTION 4. Is a penitent about to contract matrimony to be admonished of an unknown impediment?

Reply. Generally speaking, the admonition is to be given. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 612. - The reason is that after the matrimony the ignorance can cease without difficulty, for example, because it is discovered that consanguinity, affinity, etc., exists between the spouses; and then, besides the ready danger of sinning formally, other most grave inconveniences can follow, namely, scandals, quarrels, and perhaps even the separation of the spouses, etc. - Nevertheless, probably except the case in which no fruit at all is hoped for from the admonition and the impediment cannot easily be discovered; because it is better to permit material sin until a dispensation is obtained than to furnish the occasion of certain formal sin. - Lacroix, book 6, part 3, no. 540.

Point IV. On the Office of Judge

We must treat: 1. of instructing the cause; 2. of rendering the sentence.

Section I — On Instructing the Cause, or on the Obligation of Questioning Penitents

614. Principles. - I. The Confessor is bound to question penitents concerning the species, number, and circumstances changing the species; concerning the causes of sins, habit, and proximate occasions, whenever he reasonably presumes or prudently doubts that these things have not been sufficiently declared. The reason is that the Confessor, as minister of the Sacrament, must procure its integrity and, as judge, must obtain for himself the knowledge necessary for rendering an equitable judgment. This is also evident from the Fourth Lateran Council and from the Roman Ritual. - St. Ligorius, no. 617, and Practice of the Confessor, no. 19.

II. The Confessor is not bound to question the penitent except with some ordinary diligence. The reason is that the penitent himself is bound to examine himself not with the greatest but only with moderate, that is, ordinary diligence. But the obligation of the Confessor cannot be graver than that of the penitent, since the Confessor is bound to examine the penitent only secondarily, or in default of him. - St. Ligorius, Practice of the Confessor, no. 20.

III. The Confessor is not bound to question penitents who, although uneducated, seem sufficiently instructed for their condition and diligent in confessing sins with their circumstances according to their state and capacity. - A fortiori, it is not necessary to examine those who confess frequently and rarely sin gravely, such as devout persons, Religious, and Ecclesiastics, unless something necessarily to be explained appears to be omitted by them. - St. Ligorius, no. 607, II and III; Apostolic Homilies, no. 103.

615. Rules for the Practice of Questioning. - I. Rule. Questioning must be moderate, and therefore the Confessor must take care not to be too anxious in questioning. Otherwise, questioning, and consequently confession itself, will be grave and burdensome both to himself and especially to the penitent. Hence let him never ask useless things or permit them to be narrated to him. Therefore let him attend to those things which the Roman Ritual has: Let him take care not to detain anyone with curious or useless questions, especially younger persons of either sex, or others, by imprudently questioning them about that which they do not know, lest they suffer scandal and thereby learn to sin.

And St. Ligorius, no. 607: Let the Confessor not be too anxious in questioning, but let him ask only about those things which probably pertain to the penitent according to his condition. And in the Practice of the Confessor, no. 21: Let him ask only about sins into which they can easily fall, their condition and capacity being considered. Thus also Billuart (dissertation 6, article 10, section 2): In a moral examination (the Confessor ought to examine) not with the greatest and exquisite, but with human and moderate diligence, and conformably to the capacity of the penitent. For the Priest is not bound to examine the penitent more than the penitent himself is bound to examine himself, since the Confessor is bound to examine him in default of the penitent. But the penitent is not bound to examine himself with the greatest and exquisite diligence, but with human and moral diligence. Nor does it matter that, if the Confessor examined more, perhaps he would discover more; for here attention must be paid not only to the material integrity of confession, but also lest the Sacrament be rendered burdensome and odious to penitents by the greatest and excessive industry in examining. It is therefore sufficient if the Confessor prudently judges that the penitent omits nothing. Sporer, no. 792, has the same in nearly the same words. - Salmanticenses, chapter 12, no. 21. - Reuter, The New Confessor, chapter 3, at the end, etc.

616. II. Rule. - Questioning must be discreet; namely, the Confessor must question with great prudence, diligently taking care: 1. not to ask about sins which probably were not committed, considering the condition and capacity of the penitent, etc.; 2. not to ask about those things from which the penitent may learn to sin or may suffer scandal, according to what was just said from the Roman Ritual; 3. not to ask with curiosity or levity even concerning those things about which inquiry must be made, for example, immodestly concerning immodest things, etc., etc. In a word, he must strive that in every question gravity, piety, modesty, and paternal charity alone appear, as the nature and dignity of this office require. - See the Roman Ritual. Hence: 1. he must be very cautious in questioning concerning the matter of lust, especially with women, adolescents, and children, who can suffer scandal much more easily. For how many unhappy penitents have lost innocence and soul because of an incautious question or explanation of the Confessor! But with married persons let him never make mention of the conjugal debt without grave cause (Sacred Penitentiary, June 8, 1842); and it will be sufficient, when the matter requires, to ask the woman whether she has furnished due fidelity and obedience to her husband in all things.

2. The rule admitted by all must be diligently observed: In the matter of lust it is much better to fall short in many things than to exceed in one by reason of the integrity of confession. Therefore, in doubt whether in such a case you can or ought to question, the negative side must always be followed; for it is a lesser evil that the integrity of confession be lacking than to incur the danger of losing a soul.

617. III. Rule. - Questioning must be opportune, that is, it must be done at the time and in the manner which are suitable. But certain questions are ordinarily to be asked before confession, though few, lest the penitent be offended, for example: How long has it been since he confessed? Was he absolved? Did he fulfill the penance [1]?... Is he at peace concerning his past life? This last question should be asked only when the penitent has not confessed for a long time or when a general confession is undertaken from a determined time. - The other questions concerning condition, state, age, etc., will more suitably be asked, as occasion is given, during the course of confession. Thus, on the one hand, every suspicion of curiosity and levity will be avoided, and on the other the penitent will answer more easily when his confidence in the Confessor has been increased.

[1] The Author does not contend that these questions must always be asked, but only that, if at any time, after certain things have been heard, it seems that they should be asked, they are more suitably asked at the beginning.

But those Confessors err who wish always to make a certain judgment concerning the quality of the sin, whether it is grave or light, and torment penitents in order to know with what intention or what conscience they did this; for these will often answer whatever happens to come into their mouth, so that, when questioned a little afterward concerning the same matter, they will deny what they had previously affirmed. The case is different, however, if they appear sufficiently instructed, or if there is doubt about full consent given to a temptation. Generally, unless the circumstances counsel otherwise, it can be presumed that the penitent apprehended the object of the sin as it is evil in itself.

618. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What must the Confessor do in doubt concerning the sincerity of the penitent?

Reply. It is a common rule and a received axiom: The penitent is to be believed when speaking both for himself and against himself. The reason is that in the sacred tribunal the penitent is at once the accused and a witness, his own accuser and advocate, and moreover in doubt he is always to be presumed truthful. Therefore, after suitable questions, the Confessor must absolve a penitent who denies. - St. Ligorius, no. 631.

619. ○ QUESTION 2. What must the Confessor do if he knows with certainty that some sin is being concealed or denied by the penitent?

Reply 1. If he knows it from the confession of another, he must, lest the seal of confession be violated, question only generally, as he otherwise would have done or ought to have done. But if the penitent, when questioned, denies it, let him reply nothing; rather, if he can do so without arousing suspicion, let him merely exhort him generally to open his conscience with all confidence. Whether the Confessor ought to absolve such a penitent is disputed. - St. Ligorius, after reporting the opinions of others, concludes thus: In my judgment, Croix thinks better, that in this case he should by no means absolve, but should merely say some prayer in order to conceal the denial of absolution [2]. - More commonly, however, other Doctors with Suarez, On Penance, disputation 32, section 3, no. 9, teach that absolution is to be denied only when it is altogether evident that the penitent is lying against the integrity of confession. Indeed, several say that absolution is to be granted in every case to a penitent denying his sin whenever knowledge of this sin has been obtained solely from the confession of another, namely, an accomplice, because this knowledge is to be held as nothing, since it was acquired from the confession of another. This, moreover, is sufficiently probable. Reply 2. If he knows it outside confession, of itself he must absolve the penitent who denies it, because the penitent speaking for himself and against himself is to be believed; nor can the report of another of itself produce greater faith than the declaration of the penitent himself; therefore the Confessor is no more bound to believe others than the penitent. For if the penitent committed that sin, the Confessor must presume that he either forgot his sin, confessed it to another, has a just cause for concealing it, or that the reporters were instead deceived. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - Billuart, ibid.

[2] Illsung first introduced this opinion and practice (treatise 6, disputation 6, question 4, article 7, section 4, no. 128), relying upon a fallacious citation of Suarez, who (On Penance, disputation 32, section 3, no. 9) indeed teaches the opposite. Croix borrowed the same from Illsung (book 6, part 2, no. 1969), together with the fictitious support of Suarez, adding through inadvertence a citation of Dicastillus, whom Illsung had cited for another purpose. To these St. Alphonsus (no. 631) added Viva, who (On Penance, question 8, article 5, no. 2), although he reports the opinion of Suarez and De Lugo less exactly, nevertheless in no way adheres to that opinion. Therefore, that entire opinion is owed to an hallucination which wrongly adduced the authority of Suarez, Dicastillus, and Viva.

 The VV. oppose thirty-four columns (pp. 587-603) to the twenty-four lines of which this and the immediately following Note consist. Nevertheless, so great a bulk has more appearance than substance. As the matter demands, we shall give an account of those things which are said in the Note.

In this first little Note the question is whether a confessor can absolve a penitent concerning whom he knows from the confession of another that a sin is being concealed. But in the Note it is said that Illsung replied in the negative, relying upon a fallacious citation of Suarez, who indeed teaches the opposite. Therefore, that Illsung relies upon a citation of Suarez is beyond controversy. But the words of Suarez cited by Illsung prove that he cites Suarez fallaciously. These words of Suarez are (loc. cit. above in the Note): It is replied that as a rule one must stand by the confession and word of the penitent. Hence, however much (Illsung incorrectly has from whatever source) the confessor knows the sin of the penitent from the report of others, he is bound in this judgment to believe the penitent himself rather, for the reason given. Then, if the confessor himself saw the sin with his own eyes and can probably judge that the penitent confessed that sin to another, he can dissemble and believe that he then denies it because he is not bound to confess it again. But if it is altogether evident that he is lying against the integrity of confession, he is not bound so to stand by the words of the penitent that he cannot use his knowledge to convince and reprove the penitent himself. Moreover, Illsung argues from this text thus: According to Suarez, the confessor is not bound to stand by the words of the penitent if it is altogether evident that he is lying. But from the confession of another which has been heard, it can become altogether evident that the penitent is lying. Therefore.

But the reasoning is fallacious and contrary to the mind of Suarez if, according to Suarez, that complete evidence cannot be referred to a case of knowledge drawn from the confession of another. That, according to Suarez, that complete evidence cannot be referred to knowledge drawn from the confession of another is manifestly evident from these words of the same author: HOWEVER MUCH the confessor knows the sin of the penitent FROM THE REPORT OF OTHERS, etc. For the word however much embraces whatever certitude the Confessor can have from the confession of another. Therefore Illsung relies fallaciously upon the authority of Suarez.

The VV. here object (p. 589) that the words of Suarez, as a rule one must stand by the word of the penitent, are to be referred also to knowledge received from the report of others. - Reply. I deny the whole. For the context evidently proves that the word as a rule indeed intimates the exception which he adds, if the confessor saw it with his own eyes and cannot conjecture that the penitent confessed that sin to another; but the word however much in no way permits an exception as regards knowledge received from the report of another.

2. It is added in the Note that Croix borrowed from Illsung the false citation of Suarez and, furthermore, through inadvertence added the false citation of Dicastillus, whom Illsung had cited for another purpose. It is easily evident that these things are so. For Dicastillus, in the place which Illsung cites (On the Eucharist, disputation 9, no. 491), disputes whether the administration of the Eucharist can be simulated by giving an unconsecrated particle and, from this, generally whether it is lawful to simulate the administration of Sacraments. But Illsung cites him to prove that absolution can be simulated. Yet Dicastillus has not even one word concerning our present question. Therefore, through mere inadvertence Croix added the fallacious testimony of Dicastillus to the fallacious support of Suarez.

3. Finally, it is added in the Note that St. Alphonsus took from Croix the citations of Suarez, Illsung, and Dicastillus, and added to these Viva, who, although he reports the opinion of Suarez and De Lugo less exactly, nevertheless in no way adheres to that opinion (namely, of Illsung). - These things too are demonstrated with little business. For Viva indeed says

(loc. cit. in the Note) that a penitent is not to be absolved if the confessor prudently judges that the penitent denies the sin from shame; but he nowhere says that this prudent judgment is had in the case of St. Alphonsus. Moreover, he reports the opinion of De Lugo and Suarez less exactly; for these did not say, if the confessor prudently judges, but if it is altogether evident. Therefore, in their opinion, a judgment, unless it is altogether evident, will not be prudent. But De Lugo (disputation 22, no. 22) denies that a judgment which rests upon the testimony of another penitent is evident and therefore prudent. You ask, he says, what if the confessor knows evidently from the confession of others that Peter committed such a sin, which he himself afterward denies in confession? It is replied that it is contradictory for him to know this evidently from the confession of others, since that entire knowledge is resolved into the testimony of another penitent. And these things can suffice to give an account of those things which had been written in this brief little Note.

For the opinion of St. Alphonsus the VV. add (pp. 592-594), besides Henno, who inclines to that opinion, also the authorities of Babenstuber, Reuter, and Voit. - Reply. St. Alphonsus had already observed that not all Authors thought the same in this question; this ought therefore to seem even less surprising because different authors frame different hypotheses. Moreover, Babenstuber, Reuter, and Voit, no less than St. Alphonsus, manifestly transcribed from Illsung and Croix.

Finally, the VV. conclude this part thus (p. 594): But it matters little whether more or fewer Authors approved the opinion of Father Illsung; for the holy Doctor approved it not on account of extrinsic authorities, but on account of intrinsic reasons which are certainly evident and convincing. - Reply. The holy Doctor in fact adduces no reason, but merely cites the Authors whom we indicated in the Note; the Note itself also, as is evident, merely has certain things concerning the Authors cited by the holy Doctor. Moreover, if truly evident reasons were present, as the VV. boast, we would not thus have dissenting Authors. For why, in a matter which depends especially upon prudent judgment, would we have as blind in an evident matter Suarez and Cardinal De Lugo, easily the foremost of the Theologians?

And let these things suffice for those sixteen columns which the VV. wrote against the eight lines of the preceding little Note. We shall subjoin to the Note itself the response to the other eighteen columns which the VV. added against the sixteen lines of the following Note.

I said, of itself; for if the confessor is altogether certain of the sin committed by the penitent because, for example, he himself saw him stealing, heard him blaspheming, etc., or knows it from the certain report of others [3], he cannot absolve one who denies, provided he is certain that the latter has not forgotten his sin and has no motive for concealing it; for this rule, The penitent is to be believed, etc., avails indeed in a matter less certain, but not in a matter evidently certain.

[3] These words, if he knows it from the certain report of others, etc., seem to have slipped inadvertently from Benjamin Elbel (On Penance, conference 17, no. 454), from whom St. Alphonsus then took them, and our Author from him also. For Elbel adds that all think thus, although, even by the admission of St. Alphonsus, this is manifestly false, and that doctrine is the common one which Suarez expresses thus (On Penance, disputation 32, section 3, no. 9): However much the Confessor knows the sin of the penitent from the report of others, he is bound in this judgment to believe the penitent himself rather, for the reason given.

Indeed, Elbel himself teaches the opposite (On the Sacraments in General, conference 2, no. 44), where he proposes this case: "A certain bridegroom confessed that on the preceding night he had acted shamefully with his bride; and because the Confessor knew that he had already relapsed several times and was unwilling to avoid the proximate occasion, he dismisses him without absolution. Immediately after him the bride, very well known to the Confessor, approaches; nevertheless, perhaps fearing the denial of absolution, she says not a word about the sins of lust committed with the bridegroom. The Confessor doubts whether he ought to absolve." And he replies: "If the bride denies that she committed anything against chastity, he is bound to absolve her, because he is bound to place faith in the penitent as at once the accused and the accuser, speaking both for herself and against herself."

 It could seem incredible that from this brief Note the VV. could have taken matter with which to fill eighteen solid columns. For they heap together from everywhere texts of Authors by which they prove that a confessor cannot impart absolution to a penitent when he is altogether certain, when he knows evidently, that the penitent mendaciously and in bad faith denies the grave sin which he committed. But surely, with so great an apparatus of arms, are they not fighting against shadows?

For in the Note merely a certain defect of coherence in Elbel was noted: while he teaches that the confessor is bound in the proposed case to absolve the bride at least under a condition, he then says that absolution is to be denied if the confessor becomes more certain of the state of the penitent from the report of others. In what sense the words of Elbel in the Note are to be understood is evident from the fact that the opinion which St. Alphonsus attests to be commonly handed down is opposed to him. But this opinion is of this kind (book 6, no. 631): A distinction must be made: if he knows outside confession and knows by his own knowledge, for example, by seeing him steal or hearing him blaspheme, without doubt he ought not to absolve if he denies it, provided there is not a prudent doubt, etc. But if the confessor has it from suspicion or from the report of others, Suarez, Laymann, Holzmann, Sporer, and others also commonly say that after diligent questioning he ought as a rule to absolve. But if you understand the words of Elbel as referring to that certainty by which, for example, in Fagundez, cited by the VV. (p. 597), the Confessor is certain of someone's concubinage FROM PUBLIC NOTORIETY, the question is indeed reduced to such a condition that you seek adversaries to attack in vain. For this reason it was said that the VV. fashioned shadows for themselves against which they turned their arms.

620. ○ QUESTION 3. How in particular must the Confessor deal with the uneducated?

Reply. Ordinarily the Confessor himself must examine the more uneducated, because, if left to themselves, they will not examine themselves better; and if they are dismissed, they will never return better disposed. Indeed, deterred by the difficulty of examining their conscience, they will easily abstain from confession. - St. Ligorius, no. 607.

Section II — On Rendering the Sentence, or on Granting, Deferring, or Denying Absolution

621. Principles. - I. Absolution must be granted from justice and under grave obligation to every penitent who has confessed properly and is disposed. The reason is that in the very act of confession a certain quasi-contract has been entered into, by force of which a penitent who has confessed properly and is disposed has a right to receive the Sacrament. Otherwise, an intolerable burden would be imposed upon the penitent without just cause, namely, that he make a confession to another, without being able moreover to trust with certainty that he will receive absolution from this new Confessor. Furthermore, this is also demanded by the end of the institution of the Sacrament and the tribunal of Penance, which was instituted by Christ for the purpose of imparting mercy. Therefore, a Priest denying absolution to a disposed penitent would act unjustly, abuse the power of the keys, and render the Sacrament odious.

II. Nevertheless, absolution can be deferred for a brief time, even for a penitent rightly disposed [4], and even without his consent, when, namely, the Confessor judges that this is useful for his reform. The reason is that the deferral of absolution is not its denial; and although a disposed penitent has a right to absolution, nevertheless, he does not have, at least speaking per se, a right to obtain it immediately. For the Confessor is not only a judge, but also a physician [5], and therefore, if If, therefore, you inquire into the origin of this practice, you will easily find that it is owed to the zeal for devising everywhere new expedients by which, in certain circumstances, the faithful might perhaps seem capable of being helped more fully; but its reason and end were situated principally in this: that a penitent who, through sluggishness in fulfilling some obligation, was accustomed to weave new delays day after day, month after month, and even year after year, might at length be stirred to put his hand to the work. You have an example in St. Antoninus (part 3, title 14, chapter 19, section 19), where, treating of those who, as he says elsewhere (part 2, title 2, chapter 8, section 35), always procrastinate and are found annually promising the confessor that they will make restitution, and afterward do not do so, he rejects the opinion of those (ibid., section 2) who thought that these persons were to be absolved under the condition of future restitution, and admits the opinion of William that they ought to be absolved simply and without condition; then he adds: After the Confessor has considered that such persons have done this several times, PERHAPS IT WOULD BE A GOOD PRECAUTION to tell such persons that they should first make restitution and afterward come to confession, or for absolution.

[4] It is of the greatest importance to consider the origin and reason of this practice. Although scarcely any trace of it appears in the writings of the more ancient Theologians, one would nevertheless wrongly take occasion from this, with certain Jansenists, to attribute it to them as its first authors, even though those same men then most notably abused the discipline of canonical penance to deter the faithful from the Sacraments, and were sometimes able, under a feigned appearance of zeal, to impose upon certain Catholics.

But that these Doctors treat of a disposed penitent is manifestly evident from the fact that they suggest deferral of absolution not as necessary, but as merely useful, to be employed from mere counsel and only sometimes. Thus, for example, Suarez (loc. cit.), although he treats of a habit which, as he says, has in a certain way passed into nature, after saying that the penitent's purpose is to be believed notwithstanding any preceding frequency and inconstancy of his, finally adds: If he has proposed more frequently to be corrected and does not do so, suitable remedies must be employed.... Finally, if these should not suffice, IT WILL SOMETIMES BE USEFUL to defer absolution for some days, IN WHICH HE MAY BE COMPELLED TO WATCH, etc. He repeats the same (On Penance, disputation 32, section 2, no. 4) concerning a man who, being placed in a proximate necessary occasion of sinning, relapses again and again: Nor is absolution to be denied to him, even if he relapse again and again, especially if he restrains himself somewhat and gradually diminishes the number of sins, as Navarrus noted, chapter 3, no. 21. SOMETIMES, however, absolution can be deferred (note well: can, not must).

And Sanchez (On the Decalogue, book 2, chapter 32, no. 45): If the penitent does not bear it very painfully, and it is hoped that he will not thereby be drawn away from confession, but rather that it will be a medicine, it will be A COUNSEL to defer absolution, employing the greatest possible gentleness; but if the opposite is hoped, it will not be a counsel.

Filliucci (loc. cit., question 10, no. 320): The remedies are frequent confession, almsgiving.... If these should not profit, a deferral of absolution for some days would be useful.

Gregory Sayrus (loc. cit., no. 8): SOMETIMES, however, it is a most salutary COUNSEL, as Medina, Peter of Aragon, Emmanuel Rodriguez, and Ludovicus Lopez rightly note, not to absolve before, etc.

Palaus (loc. cit., no. 6): FROM COUNSEL the priest will be able to defer absolution if he judges that the deferral will be profitable.

Bonacina (loc. cit., no. 7): Absolution does not seem to be denied to a penitent who has a firm purpose of abstaining in the future from oaths of this kind.... I add... that absolution can be deferred whenever the confessor shall have judged that this is expedient for the salvation of the penitent.

Azor (loc. cit., question 4): Although absolution is not to be denied simply, it nevertheless seems that it should be deferred for a time, so that he may meanwhile devote some effort to this; unless there is otherwise a just cause by which he ought to be absolved from sins immediately.

Reginaldus (loc. cit., no. 87): It is a salutary counsel to defer absolution for such a person, so that he may thus be induced to beware of relapse by watching more attentively.

Cardinal De Lugo (On Penance, disputation 14, no. 166): Finally, IT WILL SOMETIMES BE USEFUL to defer absolution for some days, etc.

Cardinal Toletus (book 3, chapter 18, no. 3): In these cases it is A USEFUL COUNSEL that absolution be deferred, after the whole confession has been heard, until some correction appears.

And this indeed is the practice against which John Sanchez fought with so much ardor (Selected Disputations, etc., disputation 9, from no. 11), contending, not indeed that penitents are to be absolved indiscriminately even if there can be doubt about their disposition, as certain men wrongly impute to him, but that, generally speaking, the hope of greater fruit expected from the deferred absolution of one who is disposed is vain, and consequently that the counsel of deferring absolution for this penitent is not commonly salutary. Hence he further inferred that, when this cause for deferral ceases, the right of the penitent to absolution prevails, so that, since the priest, as his adversaries admit, can absolve immediately, by that very fact he is bound not to defer it. But these things do not in fact oppose the preceding principle of the Doctors; for they too freely and unanimously agree that this medicine is not to be employed when it appears likely to harm rather than to profit. Whether, however, it is at times expedient on account of the fruit hoped for from it is a question pertaining to prudence, concerning which the Author presently treats. Nevertheless, that it can sometimes profit does not seem capable of being denied against the opinion of so many Doctors.

It will be useful to note this one thing: that a few persons proceeded further and contended that the confessor not only can defer absolution, but is bound to do so. But these either labor under an equivocation when they call the penitent disposed, or certainly affirm this against the common opinion. No means can ever be called necessary unless it is the only one. Moreover, the assertion that, with a penitent already disposed for absolution, the only means by which he may be compelled to carry something out is deferral of absolution smacks of a hypothesis altogether too improbable.

[5] Concerning the office of physician, see what we noted above from Cardinal De Lugo (in the note to no. 605).

You will see this expedient suggested more frequently among Theologians who are somewhat less ancient when they treat of the obligation of employing certain means for correcting a depraved habit, especially one which impels to evil semi-deliberately or even indeliberately, although those acts are culpable in their cause, namely, in sluggishness and neglect of correction, which in these circumstances place a man in a continual state, as they say, of mortal sin. Hence the reason why the Doctors generally touch upon this matter not where they treat of the Sacrament of Penance, but where they treat of the Second Precept of the Decalogue, and accordingly of the depraved habit of blaspheming, rashly swearing, and then committing perjury. Thus the Salmanticenses, treatise 17, On an Oath, chapter 2. - Suarez, On an Oath, book 3, chapter 8, no. 7. - Sanchez, On the Decalogue, book 2, chapter 32, where he treats of blasphemy, and book 3, chapter 5, where he treats of the habit of swearing. - Bonacina, On the Second Precept, disputation 4, question 1, part 14. - Filliucci, treatise 25, chapter 10, on blasphemy and an oath. - Sayrus, Clavis Regia, book 5, chapter 5, where he treats of an oath. - Palaus, On an Oath, disputation 1, point 9. - Viva, On the Precepts of the Decalogue, question 7, article 7, On Perjury. - Trullench, Exposition of the Decalogue, book 2, chapter 1, doubt 20. - Azor, part 1, book 11, chapter 3, On an Oath. - Reginaldus, book 18, On the Second Precept of the Decalogue. The same is to be said of Bartholomew Medina, Emmanuel Rodericus, Ludovicus Lopez, and others whom it would be lengthy to enumerate. he judges that such a remedy will be notably [6] profitable to the soul of the penitent, he can prudently use it. - Thus expressly St. Ligorius, no. 462, and in the Practice of the Confessor, no. 76. - Lacroix, no. 1764.

[6] How grave the cause must be on account of which the confessor employs this remedy, otherwise not necessary but merely useful, with a disposed penitent is clearly understood from those things which were disputed above (nos. 499 and 500). For there we saw from the common opinion of the Doctors that for anyone unwillingly to be deprived of the benefit of absolution is so grave a matter that a deferral beyond one or two days, according to Suarez, Viva, Renzi, Fagundez, Herincx, and others cited by the Salmanticenses (St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 490), furnishes a sufficient cause why the penitent may licitly set aside either the natural precept of not defaming one's neighbor in a grave matter, or the divine precept concerning the integrity of confession; because, as De Lugo says (On Penance, disputation 16, no. 416), it is a grave thing to be in the state of sin for three days; which he can deservedly fear, since it is difficult to have a true act of contrition; wherefore he will do no small thing if, on account of the reputation of his neighbor, he defers confession for two days. Indeed, St. Alphonsus judged a deferral not only of two days, but even of one day excessive. But to me, he says (loc. cit.), it seems harsh that one who is in mortal sin should remain without absolution even for a day; and Antoine does not seem to dissent from him (chapter 2, question 13, reply 3), where he says that one who is in the state of mortal guilt is not absolutely bound to wait. Therefore, if absolution, as the Author adds with the common opinion of the Doctors, is not to be deferred when the deferral falls into no slight inconvenience of the penitent, it is readily evident with how much caution and prudent sobriety the Confessor must employ this remedy.

I said, at least speaking per se; because, if absolution cannot be deferred without inconvenience to the penitent, it must be granted immediately; for the penitent is then judged to have a strict right to obtain it immediately. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others commonly.

622. ○ III. Absolution is altogether to be denied in every case, even that of extreme necessity, to penitents who are certainly indisposed. But absolution is to be denied to penitents who are doubtfully disposed outside the case of grave necessity; in a necessity of this kind, however, absolution under condition can, and indeed must, be imparted. - St. Ligorius, nos. 431 and 432.

623. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is it often expedient to defer absolution for a sufficiently disposed penitent for the sake of a remedy or experiment [7]?

[7] It seems to pertain to an experiment rather than to a remedy when the confessor defers absolution because of a doubt not indeed about future constancy in fulfilling some obligation, but about the present will of the penitent. To this seem in part to pertain the things which De Lugo has (On Penance, disputation 14, no. 167), where, perhaps with none of the Doctors preceding him, he institutes the question: Whether sometimes, when the confessor could believe a penitent saying that he here and now has sorrow and a purpose, he can nevertheless, FOR BETTER PROVING and confirming that purpose, defer absolution for some days. But most frequent experience advises that this way is less suitable for that end and profits altogether little. Reason confirms it. For anyone who deceives himself and the confessor by affirming that he has a will which he does not in fact have will indeed bear this patiently here and will restrain himself until he obtains absolution, just as others who deceive themselves and the confessor abstain for some time before the paschal feasts from their accustomed sins, interrupt for a little while, or rather suspend, disgraceful friendships, etc., so that they may soon obtain absolution more easily; but that deferral of absolution alone should be thought to have induced that will which perhaps was previously lacking, and consequently that the confessor should be rendered more certain of the present disposition of the penitent, there is nothing which solidly persuades this.

Reply. The solution of the question depends upon various circumstances; but attention must principally be given to the greater good of the penitent.

Hence: 1. Absolution is never to be deferred when the deferral is foreseen as more likely to harm. This is evident from what has been said. 2. Nor is it to be deferred if the penitent would incur from the deferral a mark of infamy [8]. 3. Absolution is rarely to be deferred for a disposed penitent unless he himself accepts the deferral sufficiently easily; otherwise it would profit him with greater difficulty. For the rest, no certain rule can be established [9]; and if at any time some deferral of absolution appears expedient, it must be made only for a brief time, for example, for three, five, or eight days, etc. Sometimes, where it can easily be done, it will be useful to defer absolution even for one day or a few hours.

[8] Above (no. 621) the Author had already said that the same is to be done if absolution cannot be deferred without inconvenience to the penitent, as, for example, if he must lack the Sacrament for a long time, or repeat the confession before another, or undergo the burden of a long journey, or incur a mark, if not of infamy, at least of astonishment or a suspicion that absolution was denied, or lose an occasion of gaining an indulgence, etc.

2. Nevertheless, St. Alphonsus does not omit to indicate when, generally speaking, the outcome of this greater advantage can scarcely be hoped for. Thus he says (book 6, no. 463): That I may pronounce my judgment here, I say that if the penitent has relapsed on account of an intrinsic cause or frailty, as happens in sins of pollution, morose delectation, hatred, blasphemy, and the like, I think absolution should RARELY be deferred for a recidivist who is sufficiently disposed.... I said rarely; for I judge that one should not regularly depart FROM THE COMMON OPINION handed down by Sanchez, Decalogue, book 2, chapter 32, no. 45; Laymann, chapter 4, no. 10; De Lugo, disputation 14, no. 166; Filliucci, treatise 7, instruction, chapter 3; Abelly, On Penance, chapter 5, section 20, no. 3; Dicastillus, disputation 10, doubt 29; Navarrus, chapter 3, no. 21; Croix, no. 1822, with the common opinion, as he asserts; Salmanticenses, chapter 5, no. 68; Sporer, chapter 2, no. 330; Toletus, book 5, chapter 13; namely, that absolution is not to be deferred for a penitent who has relapsed from intrinsic frailty, because in such a penitent it is to be hoped more that the grace of the Sacrament will be profitable than a deferral of absolution. From this context someone could conclude that, if St. Alphonsus, while pronouncing his judgment, departs somewhat from the common opinion, he departs not so as to incline toward the more benign way, but toward the stricter one. For he signifies that he departs from the common opinion in this, that he says absolution is sometimes, although rarely, to be deferred for recidivists of this kind, while the common opinion, by his own testimony, teaches that it is not to be deferred. And to this surely someone could refer these words of the same St. Alphonsus (no. 460): I think that he by no means errs who directs himself according to opinions commonly received from Doctors of no humble reputation.

3. But that he thinks somewhat differently concerning those who are involved in some proximate occasion of sinning will recur below for fuller explanation. For now it may be noted only that when Blessed Alphonsus (no. 464) endeavors with many arguments to confirm what he had said, namely, that absolution is regularly not to be deferred for those who relapse from intrinsic frailty, because it is to be hoped that the grace of the Sacrament will profit them more than deferral of absolution, he brought forward for this purpose also these words of the Salmanticenses from the treatise On Penance, chapter 5, no. 68: Why is more to be hoped from a sinner who, through deferral, does not have grace than from one established by absolution in the friendship of God?

Moreover, the Salmanticenses in fact altogether affirm this concerning those who relapse not merely from intrinsic frailty, but also from an occasion of sinning from which they cannot separate themselves either physically or morally; and they prefer that for these also, without interposing a deferral of absolution, you rather confer the benefit of absolution and the grace of the Sacrament twice, for example, today and again after eight days. John Baptist Faure agrees with them (Theological Doubts, etc., doubt 4, section 8): Other things being equal, it is more useful for a disposed penitent to receive the Sacraments of the Church twice than once; that is, it is more useful to be absolved and also to communicate this Sunday, and again to be absolved and communicate on the following Sunday, than to do the same thing only on the following Sunday and not now. For the twofold reception of the Sacraments merits and confers greater sanctifying grace in this world, greater glory in the future world, and a richer abundance of helps for each end.

4. On this matter it will not be useless to bring forward those things which John de Dicastillo has (On Penance, disputation 10, doubt 29, nos. 573-578), and which the Salmanticenses followed: What (he says) if, various means having been tried, he still miserably relapses? Here certainly not a few are at a loss, and I confess that I have not rarely been at a loss. For what some say, that absolution is to be deferred for them several times until some correction appears, experience has proved not rarely to harm, unless it is done meanwhile as he is better instructed and the whole matter is considered according to those things which I said in disputation 6, doubt 21. Here note that which he says, as he is better instructed, and, as he has below, as he is better disposed; for this is what Father Gury had before his eyes when he presently adds that it is sometimes useful to defer absolution for one day, or for a few hours, etc., namely, when the end of the deferral is not that the penitent should at length overcome the difficulty, for example, in making restitution, in pardoning an offense, in asking pardon, in destroying an obscene book or picture, etc., but that by some pious meditation, by more fervent prayers, or by some work of piety or mercy, he may dispose himself better and receive the Sacraments with greater devotion and richer fruit.

5. Note also that Dicastillus says that experience has proved that deferral not rarely harms. Indeed, Cardenas (Theological Crisis, part 4, disputation 39, chapter 2, no. 12) thinks the contrary is to be concluded from the little story he brings forward of a certain woman who, receiving the deferral with great indignation, departed; but returned on the following day full of contrition and tears, saying: If the other confessors had acted thus with me, I would not have persisted so long in depraved morals. But you might call this argument almost childish; and St. Alphonsus will meet us, saying (no. 464): How many unhappy persons I myself have known who, on account of denied absolution, cast themselves into despair and wandered for many years alienated from the Sacraments!

6. Why, however, deferral not rarely harms, Dicastillus adds this reason also: For the rest, deferral precisely as such rarely profits and often harms..., and Confessors experience that it does not always turn out well, indeed that it often turns out badly. For thus many change their Confessor, so that now a new series of remedies may begin and they may receive the benefit of absolution for the first occasions; and if afterward it does not succeed with him, they change and proceed to another, renewing the cause and litigation from the beginning.

7. Then, returning to the method of those who think that penitents of this kind are to be absolved only several times, he says: But what is to be done if, although he does not approach another confessor nor omit confession for a year, but consults the same confessor again and more frequently and asks to be absolved, nevertheless no correction appears? Is he thus to be rejected? Or rather is he sometimes to be absolved? Surely, if he is never absolved throughout the whole year, what can that non-absolution profit, IF OTHERWISE HE IS CAPABLE HERE AND NOW when he approaches? For if he is not capable, there is no question, but it is certain that he is not to be absolved. But if HE IS CAPABLE WHEN HE APPROACHES, and it is thought that absolution is sometimes to be denied as a medicine, why so many times and not more frequently? Or why, if he is always capable, is it not always conferred upon him, especially if it is already known by experience that it is not very troublesome to him to be deprived of absolution several times? Hence I do not see what advantage that remedy can then have; indeed, it has rather the disadvantage that he is deprived of the grace of the Sacrament and of the helps which are accustomed to be given in view of its worthy reception and otherwise would not be given. On account of these and similar things, I judge (I confess) that the aforesaid remedy of denying absolution is rarely to be used; and it always seems harsh to me to deprive a penitent otherwise capable of so great a grace. Nor do I esteem the fear or trouble of denied absolution to profit so much as the helps of grace and the grace itself of imparted absolution, apart from the suitability of a time granted for better instructing and disposing him, as I have already said.

8. But that Dicastillus says these things concerning those who relapse on account of an occasion of sinning which is indeed necessary but proximate is evident from the words immediately following (loc. cit., no. 576): Therefore, in this matter, when just and reasonable causes for not removing the aforesaid occasion subsist, even if the penitent relapses more frequently, he is neither to be compelled to remove that occasion nor to be deprived of absolution, even if he is a most frequent recidivist; rather he is to be exhorted to come frequently to confession, and other means are to be employed which, with the state and opportunity of the person considered, seem expedient to a prudent Confessor, in which matter there are no, indeed scarcely can there be, any certain rules assigned.

9. He gives the reason for these things thus (ibid., no. 577): This doctrine is thus declared, insofar as it can be done by me. Either that absolution is then to be denied on account of the frequency of sinning, or on account of the occasion not avoided. Not on account of the latter, because, as we suppose, he is not bound here and now to avoid it; not on account of the former, as the argument made proves, because that denial of absolution can scarcely profit except perhaps most rarely, and the frequency of Confession and the frequent benefit of absolution will profit more. Therefore, it is to be denied on no account, IF THE PENITENT IS OTHERWISE CAPABLE.

10. Finally, he concludes the matter with these things, which the Salmanticenses also adopted (no. 578): Therefore, just as in sins in which the occasion can be removed neither morally nor physically, as happens in the sin of masturbation, the Doctors and the practice of Confessors rather have frequent confession before the same Confessor enjoined than deprive one who comes of absolution; so in these sins, in which, if not a physical, at least a moral impossibility of turning away from the occasion is found, neither the remedy of separation from the occasion nor the remedy of denying absolution seems to be exacted, since Christ instituted this Sacrament not only to blot out past sins but to guard against future ones. But when absolution is denied, or (which is the same in the present matter) deferred, the Sacrament is denied, and consequently the remedy instituted by Christ against future sins. But who ever saw that it is necessary to deprive a sick person, otherwise capable of the remedy, of the best and greatest remedy for healing a wound, in order that the wound may be healed? Therefore I conclude that it is scarcely necessary, when the penitent is capable of absolution, to use a remedy of this kind, unless perhaps when absolution is deferred for a brief time so that he may be disposed still more perfectly, if this is hoped for, to receive... absolution.... For correction can rarely be hoped for from mere deferral of absolution. And surely I do not see why more is to be hoped (these are the words first transcribed by the Salmanticenses and afterward by St. Alphonsus) from a sinner who is merely attrite and consequently does not have the grace and friendship of God before absolution is conferred, than from that same person already established in the friendship of God through absolution conferred. But if he approaches not merely attrite but contrite, it seems much more harsh and incongruous to me to deprive one who is a friend of God and loves Him above all things, not now on account of past sins but on account of fear of future ones, of the benefit of the Sacrament and absolution.

11. But what was noted concerning the words of the Salmanticenses can likewise be noted concerning the words of the Roman Ritual, which St. Alphonsus (no. 464) likewise brings forward to prove that absolution is regularly not to be deferred for those who relapse from intrinsic frailty, and which are as follows: For those who easily relapse into sins, it will be most useful to counsel them to confess frequently. For no distinction is had here whether anyone relapses from intrinsic frailty alone or also under the impulse of some proximate occasion which cannot be avoided; nor does the same Ritual reckon either of these among those to whom it afterward says absolution is to be denied or deferred.

 To this Note, which otherwise consists almost entirely in reporting the opinions of others, the VV. oppose twenty columns (pp. 768-778), and indeed columns written in a sufficiently fervent style. But in truth not much is needed to satisfy their complaints.

First, therefore, the VV. (p. 769) are vehemently indignant because in Note no. 2 it is said that someone could conclude from the context of St. Alphonsus that St. Alphonsus, if he departs somewhat from the common opinion, does not depart so as to incline toward a more benign way, but toward a stricter one. And they add: 1. that it can escape no sensible and attentive reader that in that proposition there is merely a less correct construction, and that the word regularly, which pertains to the second part of the proposition, was transferred into the first either by a slip of the pen, an error of the copyist (thus), or of the printer. - 2. They add (p. 770) that Father Ballerini knows well what St. Alphonsus says in the texts immediately preceding and how he explains his doctrine in the Apostolic Man and the Practice of the Confessor; and hence anyone can judge whether, by a manner of acting of this kind, unworthy of a Theologian, Ballerini has preserved the rights both of truth and of Blessed Alphonsus. - 3. Finally, they take an argument (p. 770) from the fact that in the Cause of the Beatification of St. Alphonsus the Promoter of the Faith objected that the doctrine of St. Alphonsus concerning recidivists was too benign, namely, that ordinarily speaking, it profits habitual sinners, recidivists, and those in occasions more that absolution be imparted to them when they approach disposed... contrary to the mind of Alexander VII and Innocent XI.

Reply. Someone may deservedly find it marvelous that the VV. could be struck with so great an indignation for this reason alone: that someone could have believed that the holy Doctor, IF AT ANY TIME HE JUDGED that one should depart somewhat from the common opinion, inclined toward the stricter rather than the more benign way. For what? Does not the holy Doctor, in this very question concerning whether absolution is to be deferred for penitents otherwise rightly disposed, depart, as we shall presently see, from opinions which he himself calls common and most probable, inclining toward the stricter opinion? Why, then, could one think only by an absurdity that even in the disputed text the holy Doctor had departed at least somewhat from the common opinion? Indeed, since the disputed text clearly bears this sense on its face (nor were the VV. able to deny it), why could it appear so absurd to attribute to the holy Doctor the opinion which the text plainly bore on its face, that whoever did not suspect a corrupted syntax must be considered senseless and drowsy? And the VV. seem certainly to have considered too little upon whom that grave designation of a senseless and drowsy reader ultimately falls. Indeed, beginning from the edition of the year 1757, which is called the first Venetian edition after two Neapolitan ones, down to the most recent editions of our age, this text of the holy Doctor is read thus in all. Therefore, shall we regard as senseless and drowsy all those who read the Moral Work of the holy Doctor for a century and more, and indeed inquired most diligently into his doctrines, because they did not notice so enormous a fault in the syntax of the text? Let the excellent Father Haringer, the associate of the VV., bear this patiently; for he also, who prepared the Regensburg edition of 1846 and illustrated it with his Notes, suspected nothing of this perversion of syntax, and consequently he too will have to hear himself called a senseless and drowsy reader. But no more concerning point 1.

To point 2. Reply. I deny that from the immediately preceding texts it is so manifestly evident that the aforesaid fault of syntax is contained in the disputed text that only the senseless and drowsy did not see it. For in book 6, no. 463, the holy Doctor, after setting forth two opinions on the proposed question, merely adds two things: first, it is better said that no certain rule can be established in this matter; second, that I may pronounce my judgment here, I say, etc. But what is elicited from these things such that this fault should strike the eyes? Indeed, since the holy Doctor seems in a certain way to oppose his own judgment to the two opinions which he had set forth, while one of those is the one which the VV. contend is to be ascribed here to the holy Doctor, the preceding texts can rather suggest the opposite. Nor should the VV. say (p. 769) that among the Authors alleged by the holy Doctor for the common opinion there is no one who teaches that absolution is never to be deferred for those sufficiently disposed who relapse from intrinsic frailty, from whom, therefore, the holy Doctor thinks one should rarely depart. - Reply 1. Among them you have Laymann, Filliucci, Navarrus, and Toletus, from whose testimonies you will extract nothing. 2. The Salmanticenses (chapter 5, no. 68) do not treat only of recidivists from intrinsic frailty; therefore they do not pertain to the matter; indeed, concerning these they have these words: The Doctors and the practice of confessors rather have frequent confession before the same confessor enjoined than deprive one who comes of absolution. But Sporer, cited with others by the holy Doctor, has these most clear words (chapter 2, no. 330): The penitent will have to be absolved as often as he seriously proposes to amend in the future and wholly to abstain, provided that the Confessor prudently believes that he truly proposes and speaks seriously. Therefore, what the VV. assert so confidently is not true.

But as to what the VV. add, that this manner of acting is unworthy of a theologian and that the rights both of truth and of the holy Doctor were unworthily violated because the doctrine of Blessed Alphonsus could have been elicited more clearly from the Apostolic Man and the Practice of the Confessor: let it be omitted for now whether, through this comparison, the sense resulting from the Moral Work is excluded; let it also be omitted whether all the writings of the holy Doctor, indeed whether all parts of the same work, always bear altogether the same opinion, which it will surely be quite difficult to assert and defend; but let it be permitted to ask: Is sufficient discretion exercised toward the readers of the Moral Work of Blessed Alphonsus if it is exacted from them that, for every single proposition or opinion, they take upon themselves the burden of inquiring into all the Works and Opuscules of the holy Doctor, otherwise to incur the designation and accusation of a manner of acting unworthy of a theologian and of a right violated against truth and the holy Doctor? Let the excellent Father Haringer whom we praised also bear this patiently from his associates; he, when preparing the edition of the Moral Work, sometimes added notes taken from other opuscules, but nevertheless subjected no Note to the disputed text.

What of the fact that not even the holy Doctor escapes those insulting accusations? For he surely knew what he had written in the Apostolic Man and the Practice of the Confessor; he himself several times diligently reviewed his Moral Work. What, therefore, is the reason that he always preserved untouched the disputed text, which, as was said, is read in the same way in all editions, even the first? Will the VV. represent the holy Doctor himself also as senseless or drowsy?

To point 3, finally. Reply. Let the antecedent pass, and I deny the consequent. I said, let the antecedent pass, because an apt argument for solving the doubt concerning the disputed text can be taken neither from the words of the Promoter of the Faith nor from those of the Defender. I said, I deny the consequent; and let the VV. find the reason for themselves in those things which it is known happened in the cause of the Doctorate of Blessed Alphonsus. Indeed, in the Additional Summary Father Ballerini is accused once and again of having represented the holy Doctor Alphonsus, in a certain little Dissertation, by a sacrilegious and blasphemous jeer as a man not of sound mind; which nevertheless the VV. themselves confessed had fallen from their pen through a mere hallucination. From this, then, let it be argued how much weight is sometimes to be attributed to the sayings of defenders. And let these things suffice concerning the objections of the VV. against no. 2; for otherwise it pertains little to the purpose of the things said there whether or not the holy Doctor departs somewhat from the common opinion.

As regards the other parts of the preceding Note, the VV. attack for seven columns (pp. 773-776) that which is said concerning the Salmanticenses (no. 10), namely, that they adopted those things which are brought forward there from Dicastillus. For after filling almost three solid columns, almost beside the matter, with texts of the Salmanticenses, they conclude (pp. 774-775) that the Salmanticenses hold a middle way between Thomas Hurtado and Dicastillus and approve neither opinion. Father Ballerini (they say, p. 775) affirms that the Salmanticenses follow the opinion of Dicastillus; but the opposite is manifestly evident from the text brought forward.

Let us therefore subjoin this text (On Penance, chapter 5, no. 68): Although absolutely speaking the remedy of deferring absolution greatly pleases Thomas Hurtado...; on the contrary, Dicastillus asserts that experience has proved this sharp remedy not rarely to harm, unless it is done meanwhile for an hour or for a time, while the penitent is better instructed or something is prescribed according to the rules of prudence; and he judges NOT WITHOUT REASON that the frequency of confession and the frequent benefit of absolution MORE FREQUENTLY profit; and just as, in sins in which the occasion cannot be wholly removed even physically, as happens in the sin of masturbation, the Doctors and the practice of Confessors rather have frequent confession before the same confessor enjoined than deprive one who comes of absolution, so in those sins in which, if not a physical, at least a moral impossibility of turning away from the occasion is found, FREQUENCY RATHER THAN DEFERRAL WILL MORE FREQUENTLY HELP THE SICK PERSON OTHERWISE CAPABLE OF THE REMEDY OF ABSOLUTION, since Christ instituted the Sacraments not only to blot out past sins but to guard against future ones. BESIDES, why is more to be hoped from a sinner who is merely attrite and consequently does not have the grace and friendship of God before absolution is conferred, than from that same person already established in the friendship of God by absolution conferred AND VERY FREQUENTLY RECEIVING THE SACRAMENTS? Thus the Salmanticenses. Now I ask: Do they not approve the doctrine of Dicastillus when they write: HE JUDGES NOT WITHOUT REASON, etc.? Do not those words marked here in capital letters, which the Salmanticenses supply to add force to the opinion of Dicastillus, indicate approval? How, therefore, do the VV. not hesitate to affirm that the opposite IS MANIFESTLY EVIDENT from the text brought forward?

The VV. (p. 775) bring forward the words of the Note (no. 3) concerning the Salmanticenses, that they prefer that for these also, without interposing a deferral of absolution, for example, for eight days, you rather confer the benefit of absolution and the grace of the Sacrament twice, namely, today and again after eight days; then they add: But the Salmanticenses have not even a word about this matter, and the distinguished Professor attributes to them what Father Faure says in his Doubts.

Reply. In the Note the opinion of the Salmanticenses is reported, but not word for word; otherwise, according to custom, it would have been marked in a different type. But you have their opinion repeated not once but several times, where they praise the frequent benefit of absolution and frequency of confession rather than deprivation of absolution; where they expressly say: Frequency rather than deferral will help the sick person; and finally where they praise one very frequently receiving the Sacraments.

The VV. add (p. 775): From this genuine doctrine of the Salmanticenses, which we have now explained, St. Alphonsus in no way differs.

Reply. I deny what is supposed, namely, that the genuine doctrine of the Salmanticenses is explained by the VV., as we have already seen. For the rest, to define by a decisive argument whether or not the opinion of St. Alphonsus differs from the doctrine of the Salmanticenses, it suffices to have noted this one thing. For the distinction is very well known which the holy Doctor establishes between absolving those who fall and relapse from intrinsic frailty (see Note no. 2) and absolving those who are situated in an occasion, even a necessary one: he establishes that absolution is rarely to be deferred for the former; but for the latter, when they approach confession for the first time, that it is always to be deferred, as the VV. themselves (p. 776) say in these words: Therefore the holy Doctor declares that, supposing absolution can conveniently be deferred, he himself would always defer it for a penitent situated in a necessary occasion and approaching confession for the first time. But the Salmanticenses, as is evident from their text brought forward, treat both penitents in the same way in that place, so that from the practice observed with those who fall from intrinsic frailty they deduce the practice to be observed with those who are situated in the aforesaid occasion. It is therefore manifestly false that the holy Doctor Alphonsus does not differ from the doctrine of the Salmanticenses.

And indeed the VV. make this falsity openly evident by their own words. For, as is evident from their words brought forward, the practice which pleases St. Alphonsus more is that, as often as it can conveniently be done, absolution should always be deferred for occasionaries of this kind. But the VV. themselves, as we saw above, contend (although falsely) that the Salmanticenses held a middle way between Hurtado and Dicastillus. Thus they say (p. 775): But (the Salmanticenses) approve neither opinion, but hold the middle way already indicated above, namely, that deferral is SOMETIMES expedient. Therefore, by the admission of the VV. themselves, that enormous difference stands between the doctrine of the Salmanticenses and that of St. Alphonsus which intervenes between SOMETIMES and always.

Finally, the VV. (p. 777) censure what is said in the Note (no. 5) concerning Cardenas: In part, say the VV., they have nothing to do with the matter, because Cardenas there speaks of habitual sinners; in part they are false, because Cardenas there thus concludes: But for this great prudence is required in the Confessor; for remedies which profit some can harm others on account of the different dispositions of the sick.

Reply. In the question now at issue, whether imparted absolution or deferral of absolution can profit a disposed penitent more, and indeed prescinding from those circumstances in which it is already evident even from the common opinion of the Doctors which counsel is to be preferred, in this question, I say, even St. Alphonsus judges that absolution is rarely to be deferred for habitual sinners who fall from intrinsic frailty. Since, therefore, Cardenas, by an argument taken from that little story, shows himself more severe even concerning these, his citation pertains to the matter a fortiori when occasionaries are treated.

As regards the other part of the censure: Reply. Those words of Cardenas conclude nothing. For each person frames the laws of prudence according to his own judgment, so that even those who are considered most severe think and profess that they are led by prudence. But toward which side Cardenas inclines there can be learned even from this: that when (no. 6) he poses the question concerning one who has a purpose of correction KNOWN EVEN TO THE CONFESSOR, afterward (no. 19), in order to contend against Sanchez that the grace of the Sacrament confers no greater strength for not sinning than deferral of absolution, he objects, contrary to the hypothesis of the question, that perhaps on account of a defect of purpose the Sacrament is not valid. Behold what the name of prudence is worth in the mouth of certain men.

[9] 1. Thus wisely St. Alphonsus; for since the penitent in the case is supposed to be disposed for receiving grace in the Sacrament, and since this immense benefit ought not to be deferred except on account of some greater advantage of the penitent, the judgment must be taken from the proportionate outcome which can be expected from the deferral; and since this judgment depends upon the prudent consideration of all the circumstances, the saying of the ancients consequently holds here, that there is no science of particulars, and therefore no certain rule can be handed down. Whether it is expedient (say the Salmanticenses, On Penance, chapter 5, no. 68) here and now, abstracting from circumstances, we cannot certainly determine, since it depends upon many things which are easily varied according to the diversity of subjects; hence, after these have been maturely weighed, it will pertain to the judgment of the prudent to impart absolution here and now or to defer it for a time....

624. ○ QUESTION 2. Is certainty concerning the disposition of the penitent required in order that he may be absolved?

Reply 1. Absolute certainty is not required, nor even strict moral certainty, such as is required in the other Sacraments, for example, concerning the consecration of the Eucharist. The reason is that the Sacrament of Penance scarcely admits a more certain judgment of this kind.

Reply 2. A prudent judgment, or broad moral certainty, which, as St. Alphonsus says, is equivalent to prudent probability, is required and suffices. For penitents commonly display only a probability of disposition. - Thus St. Ligorius, no. 461 [10]. - Suarez, disputation 32, section 2, no. 1, and others commonly. - The Catechism of the Council of Trent, no. 60, agrees, where it is read: If, after hearing the Confession, the Priest judges that neither diligence in enumerating the sins nor sorrow in detesting them has been altogether lacking to the penitent, he can be absolved.

[10]  The words of St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 461) are: It suffices that the confessor have a prudent probability concerning the disposition of the penitent and that, on the other hand, no prudent suspicion of indisposition stands in the way; otherwise scarcely anyone could be absolved, since whatever signs penitents give furnish only a probability of disposition, as Suarez rightly teaches. See the opinion of Suarez in the following Note.

625. ○ QUESTION 3. What are the ordinary signs of sufficient disposition?

Reply. The principal signs are the following: 1. if the penitent confesses candidly and humbly; 2. if he asserts from the heart that he is sorry for his sins and has a firm purpose of not sinning hereafter; 3. if he sincerely declares all sins, even the greater and shameful ones; 4. if he has freely approached confession from some pious motive; 5. if, from a desire of conversion, he has already ceased from sin. - Lacroix, no. 1734 [11].

[11] St. Alphonsus (no. 460) reckons nearly all these signs among the extraordinary signs of disposition.

Those words of Suarez seem more pertinent to the matter (On Penance, disputation 32, section 2, nos. 1-2): Before (the priest) absolves, it is necessary that he prudently and probably judge the penitent to be disposed, because otherwise he would expose himself to the danger of erring and would act without sufficient knowledge. It remains to be explained what the Confessor ought to do in order to judge this prudently and satisfy his conscience. In this it must be observed that this disposition of the penitent arises from two things, namely, displeasure with the past and a purpose for the future. And indeed, as regards displeasure, the Confessor can easily satisfy himself; because, if the penitent in the very manner of his confession and accusation gives signs of sorrow, or certainly if he is a man not very uneducated and appears well-mannered, the Confessor is bound to employ no diligence in this; he will nevertheless always do well by proposing and counseling detestation of sin; and when he does not have sufficient signs of sorrow, he can and must ask the penitent whether he detests the sin from his heart, and he is bound to believe him when he affirms it. And the same is to be said concerning a purpose for the future, when from the confession no special obligation arises of making restitution or leaving some proximate occasion of sinning, but only the common and general obligation of not sinning hereafter.... Nor is it necessary that the Confessor persuade himself and judge even probably that it will so happen that QUESTION 4. Is the Confessor bound to arouse sorrow in the penitent?

Reply 1. Yes, if the penitent does not appear sufficiently disposed; the reason is that one who absolves an indisposed person exposes the Sacrament to the danger of frustration, but if he dismisses him without absolution, he exposes him to the danger of remaining for a long time in the state of mortal sin, or even of not returning again. - St. Ligorius, no. 608.

Reply 2. No, if the penitent appears sufficiently instructed and disposed, as are well-mannered penitents and those who confess frequently. For then the Confessor is bound to nothing, neither by reason of charity, since the penitent does not need special help, nor by reason of reverence for the Sacrament, which is exposed to no danger. - St. Ligorius, no. 608. - Laymann, chapter 13, no. 10. - Sporer, no. 792.

626. ○ QUESTION 5. To whom principally is absolution to be denied?

Reply. According to the Roman Ritual and St. Charles Borromeo, it is to be denied: 1. to those who give no signs of sorrow or are unwilling to amend their life; 2. to those who are unwilling to restore another's property, pay debts, repair injured honor or reputation, or repair any other grave harm, when they are able; 3. to those who are unwilling to use the remedies which are necessary for correction or for preventing a fall; 4. to those who refuse to lay aside enmities and hatreds, to pardon an offense, or to be reconciled with enemies; 5. to those who are unwilling to abstain from usury, superstitions, illicit arts and trades, or any evil work; 6. finally, to those who are unwilling to leave a proximate occasion of sinning when they can, or who provide an occasion to others [12].

[12] You will have all these things, and many others which could easily be added, in this brief rule: namely, that absolution is to be denied to ALL and only those who refuse to fulfill some grave obligation.

627. ○ QUESTION 6. Can a debtor be absolved before he makes restitution?

Reply. Yes, if the Confessor discovers that the debtor is prepared to make restitution as he ought. But if the penitent has either several times not kept his promises of making restitution, or it is prudently foreseen that he will not keep his purpose, it is expedient that the Confessor exact restitution before he absolves, unless some grave reason nevertheless advises otherwise [13].

[13]  In the preceding Edition this little Note had been placed here: See concerning this question the doctrine of St. Antoninus in the Note to no. 621. But in that place these things were said concerning St. Antoninus: "St. Antoninus (part 3, title 14, chapter 19, section 19), treating of those who, as he says elsewhere (part 2, title 2, chapter 8, section 3), always procrastinate and are found annually promising the confessor that they will make restitution, and afterward do not do so, rejects the opinion of those (ibid., section 1) who thought that these persons were to be absolved under the condition of future restitution, and, admitting the opinion of William that they ought to be absolved simply and without condition, then adds: After the Confessor has considered that such persons have done this several times, perhaps it would be a good precaution to tell such persons that they should first make restitution and afterward come to confession, or for absolution." This opinion of St. Antoninus indeed confirms what Father Gury has, namely, that in circumstances of this kind it is expedient for the confessor first to exact restitution, etc.

This passage of St. Antoninus stung the VV. not a little, since it seems to differ from the doctrine of Daniel Concina, into whose opinion St. Alphonsus also went (book 3, no. 682, and Apostolic Man, treatise 10, no. 105), writing in the latter place: When the penitent can make restitution immediately, regularly speaking we say WITH CONCINA that the confessor CANNOT absolve the debtor unless he first makes restitution. And in the other place: But the second opinion, which Father CONCINA holds, altogether pleases me, that regularly the debtor IS NOT TO BE ABSOLVED unless he first makes restitution, when restitution is morally possible for him. Therefore, concerning the preceding Note and the citation of St. Antoninus, the VV. write (p. 757): Father Ballerini badly confounds two disparate passages and badly interprets them, and supposes in St. Antoninus a most lax doctrine which neither here nor any other of the older theologians who treat diffusely of restitution hands down.

Reply. In the one place (part 3, title 14, chapter 19, section 19), St. Antoninus treats generally of those who do not perform that to which they are bound, but defer it, for example, to make restitution. But in the other place (part 2, title 2, chapter 8, section 3), he treats of those who, since they are bound to make restitution, certainly ought to live more sparingly so that they may gather what they are to restore, and nevertheless do not do so, but always procrastinate and are found annually promising the confessor, etc. Therefore, in the one place St. Antoninus touches upon the general question; in the other he touches upon a particular case which is contained under the general question. To what the VV. object, therefore, that in the Note two disparate passages are confounded, I reply with a distinction: disparate in location, I concede; disparate as regards the question, I deny. For the rest, it is sufficiently evident of itself that the words taken from the aforesaid place in part 2, always procrastinate, etc., are employed in the Note to indicate generally the condition of penitents of this kind, which St. Antoninus again indicates in the cited place from part 3, saying that such persons have done this several times, etc., and not insofar as those former words are said there of that special case.

Let us come to the accusation of bad interpretation, which appears incredible by the very fact that in the Note the mere words of St. Antoninus are reported without gloss.

The opinion of William which is indicated in the Note is contained in these words in St. Antoninus (loc. cit. from part 3): But if the priest believes or doubts that the one confessing will not perform the penance, or that to which he is otherwise bound, such as to make restitution or the like, William says that the Confessor ought not on this account to exact a promise, vow, or oath, but it suffices if (the one confessing) says that he has a purpose of doing it. And thus he ought to absolve simply and without condition, after nevertheless making a declaration, if he is held suspect, that if he does not do it, he will render the fruit of confession void for himself. Thus William. Moreover, since the VV. (p. 759) say that St. Antoninus supports William (which nevertheless is not altogether true, as we shall presently see), let it be permitted to argue ad hominem thus: St. Antoninus supports William teaching that the confessor OUGHT TO ABSOLVE a penitent if, without any promise or oath, he says that he has a purpose of doing, or making restitution, however suspect the penitent may be held. Therefore, the doctrine of St. Antoninus is not the doctrine of Concina adopted by St. Alphonsus; nor does any bad interpretation appear here.

But the VV. wished to infer something else from William. It is manifest, therefore, they

We must treat: 1. of those who are situated in an occasion of sin; 2. of habitual sinners and recidivists; 3. of devout and timorous penitents. say, that (William) supposes that such a penitent is not to be absolved who, after making that declaration, received absolution and returns to confession without having made restitution. - Reply. I deny this entirely: 1. because it is asserted gratuitously; for the words of William in no way indicate or suggest it; 2. because it is in no way evident that William said these things only of one who had not broken the purpose of the preceding confession; 3. because St. Antoninus stands in the way, who judged that William's opinion, as though too general, should in some way be circumscribed or moderated by those things which we subjoin here.

For St. Antoninus, after bringing forward the opinion of William, proceeds thus: But because many deceive themselves, promising in every confession to make restitution and the like, and always defer; after the confessor has considered that such persons have done this several times, PERHAPS IT WOULD BE A GOOD PRECAUTION to tell such persons that they should first make restitution and afterward come to confession or for absolution, or to assign them some suitable time within which they ought to carry it out. Hence thus: St. Antoninus, as the adversative particle But manifestly signifies, wished to except something from William's general opinion, or wished to moderate it by some qualification. Therefore, either St. Antoninus did not grasp the force of William's opinion, or in the mind of St. Antoninus some exception or moderation of this kind seemed necessary to be added to William's opinion. But any moderation of this kind would have been superfluous if William's opinion bore the meaning which the VV. fabricate, namely, if in William's mind absolution was to be deferred, at least by way of some good precaution, for a penitent who returns without yet completing restitution. Therefore, no bad interpretation of ours has crept in here, but, from the testimony of St. Antoninus, this supposition and interpretation of the VV. is plainly gratuitous and fabricated at pleasure.

Meanwhile, from this latter text of St. Antoninus, the VV. (loc. cit.) wish to deduce that in his mind it is a good precaution for the confessor to defer absolution until the penitent has in fact made restitution, or to assign a suitable time within which he ought to carry it out, and (as the VV. infer a little later) within that time they may absolve him. - Reply. The VV. pervert the opinion of St. Antoninus under more than one head. For: 1. St. Antoninus did not say that it is a good precaution generally to defer absolution until he has made restitution, but to tell them that they should make restitution first; which supposes that this can then be done promptly and within a short time. 2. What the VV. add, that a time is to be assigned within which the confessor can absolve, bears a plainly absurd sense. For either it is supposed that within that time the thing which the penitent ought to do is to be carried out, so that, the matter having been accomplished, he can be absolved, and thus this second member of the disjunction falls back into the first; or the penitent is supposed to be absolved within that time even if he has not fulfilled his duty, and then this assignment of time becomes insipid. Therefore, that assignment of time does not pertain to deferral of absolution, but merely presents the second of the three modes by which St. Antoninus (ibid.) had said beforehand that the confessor can impose something upon the penitent, namely, by way of a declaration of a common obligation. And here it must be noted that this opinion of St. Antoninus is not restricted to the obligation of restitution, but extends to anything else which someone is bound to do. Hence he begins the paragraph by saying: The confessor imposes something upon the penitent in three ways: in one way, by way of counsel and exhortation.... In another way, by way of a declaration of a common obligation.... In a third way, by way of special satisfaction for things committed....

Furthermore, the VV. (loc. cit.) think light for understanding this text of St. Antoninus is to be drawn from another place, namely, from part 2, title 2, chapter 8, section 3, where, as we said, he treats of those who, by living sparingly, ought to gather something for making restitution, but who always procrastinate concerning that which they can do, and are found annually promising the confessor to make restitution, and afterward do not do so. - Reply. Perhaps the fact that the VV. use this comparison of passages will seem marvelous to someone. For if they reproached us because, by taking certain words from this passage in part 2, we badly confounded disparate passages, how do they now not hesitate themselves to have recourse to this passage, as though for them they now cease to be disparate passages? For the rest, since in the case the circumstances are such that the confessor cannot say, as above, that they should first make restitution, St. Antoninus thus applies that general rule disjunctively to these circumstances, namely, that they do not appear to be absolved unless they first act, that is, begin to put their hand to the work, or arrange the affair efficaciously so that it may have execution, that is, efficaciously resolve to put the matter into execution and determine something concerning the manner of doing it; by which things, as is evident, he does not impose the necessity of denying absolution. Hence St. Antoninus does not depart from his general norm.

Let us conclude: the doctrine of St. Antoninus and the doctrine of Concina manifestly differ from one another. The latter establishes that regularly the confessor CANNOT absolve unless the penitent has first made restitution, and does not distinguish whether he had confessed this previously and then proposed and promised it but did not keep the promise, if not several times, at least once. St. Antoninus, on the contrary, teaches only concerning those who have several times broken their purpose or faith that PERHAPS IT IS A GOOD PRECAUTION (which words present a counsel rather than a norm always and necessarily to be observed) to use either one of two remedies: namely, either to impose that they first make restitution and then come for absolution, or to fix a time within which they ought to carry out the affair, lest, by deferring the matter in the accustomed way to an uncertain time, they finally arrive, as before, at the point that they return to confession in the following year with the matter still undone. And indeed the VV., as we saw, do not hesitate to accuse the Note as though it supposes in St. Antoninus a most lax doctrine, although the mere words of St. Antoninus are reported. But perhaps it is not marvelous that the doctrine of St. Antoninus can seem most lax in comparison with the doctrine of Concina, whom the holy Doctor Alphonsus did not hesitate to call most rigorous.

the penitent will abstain from sinning; but it is sufficient that he judge that the penitent now has such a purpose, although after a brief time he is going to change it. THUS ALL AUTHORS TEACH.*

QUESTION 7. Can, or indeed must, a penitent be absolved who wishes to follow an opinion opposed to the opinion of the Confessor?

Reply. Yes, if it is truly probable, or at least if the penitent is prepared to stand by the judgment of another learned and prudent man. - Recall what was said On Conscience, volume 1, no. 78.

§ II. On the Manner of Acting with Various Kinds of Penitents

Point I. On Those Who Are Situated in an Occasion of Sin

628. Definition. - An occasion of sin is generally defined as an external circumstance which, either from its own nature or from the frailty of the man who is found in it, allures or induces to sin. Hence it differs from a danger of sinning, under which designation comes whatever impels to sin, whether it is intrinsic or extrinsic.

Division. A multiple occasion is distinguished, namely: proximate or remote, absolute or relative, voluntary or necessary, present or not present.

1. A proximate occasion is that in which men commonly sin for the most part; but a remote occasion is that in which men commonly do not sin for the most part. - St. Ligorius, no. 452 [1].

[1]  Against this definition the VV. (p. 942, no. 140) oppose these words of St. Alphonsus (Apostolic Man, last treatise, no. 1): Certain Authors hold that an occasion is not proximate unless it is one in which a man has fallen almost always or for the most part; but the more common and truer opinion teaches that the proximate occasion is that in which someone has sinned frequently. They then also allege book 6, no. 452.

Reply. The holy Doctor here rejects two definitions; for, as he interprets himself, when he calls one part truer, he does not regard the opposite as probable.

Nevertheless, as regards the first, perhaps there will be someone who doubts whether the holy Doctor sufficiently grasped the sense in which that definition was employed. We have this sense in De Lugo (disputation 14, no. 149), where he writes: Some say that a proximate occasion is defined by Gregory in canon Negotium, On Penance, distinction 5, namely, one which we cannot, or certainly cannot without difficulty, use without sin. This, however, needs moderation. For Pope Leo in canon Qualitas 2 and canon Contrarium 3, On Penance, distinction 5, says that commerce or military service cannot be exercised without sin except with the greatest difficulty; and nevertheless it is certain that a merchant or soldier is not bound to leave these offices; hence in Luke 3 St. John the Baptist did not counsel soldiers to leave military service, but to observe the laws of that state. Others therefore add that a proximate occasion is one which a man, the circumstances being considered, never or almost never uses without sin, as one who keeps a concubine at home. From these things it is sufficiently deduced that account is not taken here of the frequency of falls, from which it would be defined whether this is a proximate occasion for someone; rather, it is asked what circumstances are to be called a proximate occasion, whatever frequency of falls may at length be assigned, so that it can be called truly proximate.

As regards the other definition, the holy Doctor indeed seems to refer the words for the most part to the frequency of falls with respect to the man who is situated in that occasion. But the context of the holy Doctor is not without some difficulty. For in that same place (Apostolic Man, last treatise, no. 1), which the VV. object, St. Alphonsus shortly before thus defines a proximate occasion: A proximate occasion, speaking per se, is that in which men commonly fail for the most part. Hence Gury seems to have taken his definition from St. Alphonsus word for word. How, therefore, is it reconciled that St. Alphonsus appears to reject the definition which he himself hands down in the same place?

Likewise, in another place (book 6, no. 452) the holy Doctor writes: Others define a proximate occasion as one in which the penitent is believed never or rarely to abstain from sin. This definition perhaps seems to be taken in the sense which we reported above from De Lugo. The holy Doctor continues: But this definition does not please; it is better said with Sanchez, Holzmann, De Lugo, Suarez, Collet, Wigandt, Croix, Viva, and Father Segneri that a proximate occasion per se is that in which men commonly sin for the most part. Behold, therefore, the holy Doctor again adopts (it is better said, he says) that definition which he seems to reject elsewhere. How are these things easily reconciled?

And indeed, even in this place, when he defines a proximate occasion per accidens, he says: Either because this man, although not almost always nor more frequently, has nevertheless frequently fallen in that occasion. But now the same difficulty seems to occur here. For here the word frequently, since it is opposed to the word more frequently, intimates that, in order to constitute a proximate occasion, it is not necessary that the man sin in it more often than he does not sin. And since these things are so, how are they now reconciled with the preceding definition, that a proximate occasion is one in which men sin for the most part? For for the most part certainly is not said of those who abstain from sin more often than they sin.

I indeed would not doubt that these passages of the holy Doctor which seem to conflict with one another can be suitably reconciled, especially if the sense in which, as we saw with De Lugo, others define a proximate occasion is kept before the eyes; nevertheless, I find no trace or mention of that sense in the holy Doctor. Yet this is sufficiently manifest: the VV. would consult better for the honor and reverence of the holy Doctor if, before censuring the writings of others, they inquired somewhat more diligently into the doctrine of that same holy Doctor.

2. An absolute occasion, or one per se, is that which of itself induces to sin and accordingly is such with respect to men taken commonly; a relative occasion, or one per accidens, is that which, although it is not an occasion with respect to others, is nevertheless such with respect to someone, his frailty being considered.

3. A voluntary occasion is one which can easily be left; but a necessary occasion is one which cannot be removed physically or morally.

4. A present occasion, or one in esse, is one which someone has with him without actually seeking it, for example, if he keeps a concubine at home or is accustomed to sin with a maidservant; an occasion not present, or one non in esse, is one which someone does not indeed have in actuality but easily finds, such as a tavern in relation to a drunkard, or a mistress in relation to her lover.

629. Principles. - I. Absolution is not to be denied to a penitent situated in a remote occasion, even if he is unwilling to leave it. The reason is: 1. because it does not induce a proximate danger of sinning mortally; 2. because too harsh an obligation would be imposed upon the penitent, since occasions of this kind generally cannot be avoided morally. - St. Ligorius, Apostolic Man, last treatise, no. 2 and following.

II. A penitent who refuses to leave a voluntary proximate occasion of sin is never to be absolved, whether that occasion is proximate per se or per accidens, whether in esse or non in esse. This is evident from proposition 61 condemned by Innocent XI, which reads thus: One who is situated in a proximate occasion which he can and will not leave can sometimes be absolved; indeed, he directly and deliberately seeks it or thrusts himself into it.

III. But absolution cannot be denied on account of that occasion to a penitent who is situated in a necessary proximate occasion, if he is otherwise found disposed and wishes to use the prescribed remedies. The reason is that no one is bound to the impossible, whether physically or morally; and otherwise an occasion of sinning is not of itself a sin, nor does it place a man under a necessity of sinning. - St. Ligorius, no. 453.

630. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can a penitent who sincerely promises that he will leave a proximate occasion of sinning be absolved before he has left it?

Reply 1. Yes, per se, if it concerns an occasion non in esse, when the penitent, as we suppose, is truly disposed and the danger of breaking his purpose does not appear grave [2].

[2] Some grave danger could threaten from the circumstance of some effort which must necessarily be employed to avoid the occasion, as the Author presently notes. But when this difficulty is absent and the danger seems to threaten solely from human frailty or inconstancy, see the doctrine of Suarez reported above in the note to no. 625.

I said per se, because if the circumstances require some effort, for example, in fleeing some companion, or in not approaching some house in certain circumstances of time, persons, etc., then it will pertain to the prudence of the Confessor to weigh whether it is expedient that the penitent first overcome the difficulty. Reply 2. No, generally speaking, if it concerns a present occasion, or one in esse, which can easily be left immediately. If, however, the penitent gives extraordinary signs of sorrow, so that it can be believed that the danger of inconstancy in his purpose is absent, he can be absolved, especially if a reasonable cause is added, for example, a mark arising from omitting Communion, a solemnity, an indulgence, etc. - According to the mind of St. Alphonsus, the same is to be said if the penitent cannot return to the same Confessor, or at least cannot return except after a long time. For then, says the holy Doctor, he not only can be absolved, but has a right to receive absolution.

631. ◦ QUESTION 2. Can one be absolved who, while situated in a necessary occasion, always relapses in the same manner after employing the remedies?

Reply 1. Perhaps the supposition could be denied [3]. For it can scarcely happen that, when the remedies are employed, some correction does not follow if they are proposed opportunely and suitably to the circumstances.

[3] At first sight St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 457) seems to deny that this penitent can be absolved. But it is evident from the context that he asserts this with Croix when there is no hope of correction, namely, as Croix says (book 5, no. 261), cited by St. Alphonsus, when someone can in no way bring it about that a formal danger of sinning is not joined to the external occasion, and, in other words, can in no way bring it about that the proximate danger becomes remote. Moreover, this is that hypothesis which the Author deservedly says is to be denied as absurd; for when remedies are suitably suggested and faithfully employed, a relapse could indeed be rendered morally impossible, for example, if, when external sins are at issue, conversation of a man alone with a woman alone is faithfully avoided.

But because St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), after Croix (loc. cit.), seems to attack Cardinal De Lugo and others alleged there, it is not to be thought that these authors either disputed about that incongruous hypothesis or taught that due disposition is never lacking to a penitent who always relapses in the same manner. Indeed, the same St. Alphonsus (no. 457, at the end) finally returns to the opinion of De Lugo, which he furthermore calls most common, namely, that this penitent can be absolved if he approaches with true sorrow and purpose. Thus De Lugo also says (On Penance, disputation 14, no. 158): Even after that experience of no progress, true sorrow and the required purpose can stand without a will to remove the occasion with so great a loss. Therefore, the penitent can be absolved; for nothing else is required except confession with sorrow and purpose. That true sorrow with the required purpose can stand even then, although the occasion perseveres, the same St. Alphonsus teaches thus (no. 455): The Doctors commonly affirm that the penitent is not bound to leave the occasion if otherwise he would suffer grave harm, provided that meanwhile he is prepared to use the prescribed means.... The reason is that an occasion of sinning is not in itself a sin, nor does it bring a necessity of sinning; wherefore true detestation of sins and a firm purpose of not relapsing and of employing the due remedies can well stand with it. But that sorrow and purpose of this kind can be had even after a preceding experience of inconstancy, St. Alphonsus himself, as we saw above, supposes, and the thing itself cries out. For to what end would you suspend absolution so that the penitent might resist more efficaciously, if you believe a purpose of this kind to be impossible? But go to Cardinal De Lugo himself (disputation 14, nos. 158-159), and those things which St. Alphonsus objected from the vain hypothesis of Croix will appear of no moment.

Reply 2. In the case, the general rule would have to be employed which St. Ligorius [4] proposes with the Author of the work entitled Instruction for New Confessors, namely, Francis Giordano, a priest of the Congregation of the Mission, who published his work at Rome in the year 1726, and which was afterward reprinted at Rome in 1841. A rule of this kind is (cited work, part 1, chapter 10, no. 244) that it should be maturely weighed whether, in practice, it is more difficult to remove the occasion than to avoid sin, with the occasion present, or whether it is easier. If it is more difficult to remove the occasion, let it be decided that it is morally impossible to remove it. And this norm, as the Author himself acknowledges, he took from the work of Venerable Paul Segneri entitled The Instructed Confessor (chapter 5), where these things are found: The precept of fleeing the occasion was imposed by natural law to diminish sins, not to increase them. Therefore, when removing the occasion is more difficult in practice than, with the occasion present, effectively avoiding sin, there can be no obligation of removing it; otherwise the danger of doubling the guilt would be increased by those very means which are prescribed by law to destroy it.

[4]  The VV. rightly note (p. 605, in the note) that the holy Doctor Alphonsus has nothing about this general rule and did not allege the aforesaid Author for this purpose. **

For the rest, the things said here by Father Gury directly attack the opinion which Claude Croix (against very many, as he himself admits, book 5, no. 261) defends as more likely, and toward which St. Alphonsus also inclines as though truer: namely, that in the case someone is bound to leave the occasion even with the loss of all goods of fortune, reputation, and life. For this he furthermore falsely alleges certain authors cited by John Sanchez, as he says, and Stoz, neither of whom in fact has any of these things.

Indeed, whether with the same Croix you fashion the chimerical hypothesis of a man who can in no way bring it about that the proximate danger ceases, or whether you speak better of one who continually relapses into the same sins because through frailty he sometimes omits the use of the means, it will always be true that this opinion of Croix is neither consonant with reason nor capable of being prudently reduced to practice.

And surely, by the law of nature the penitent is indeed bound to avoid a proximate danger. But since this can be obtained in two ways, namely, either by using suitable means so that the danger becomes remote, as they say, or by removing or fleeing the occasion, the penitent is bound by the law of nature only to one or the other. By what right, therefore, will the Confessor impose this one upon him rather than the other? Can the Confessor, as we saw with De Lugo above in the note to no. 605, command anything other than what is necessary?

Moreover, since it is manifest that that which is judged morally impossible because more difficult to execute can neither be nor ought to be imposed upon the penitent, will it truly be easier to undergo the danger of all one's goods, as Croix says, both of fortune and of reputation and even of life, than to employ some remedies for diminishing the danger of sinning?

Furthermore, if, according to the evident reasoning of Venerable Father Paul Segneri, the Confessor ought to prefer that which removes the penitent further from the danger of sinning, he surely can never choose that in which the penitent is more certain to sin. Therefore the Confessor will never prudently prefer that which must appear less probable of execution.

But is it not less probable that the flight from the occasion with so great a danger will be hoped for than the suitable use of means for diminishing the danger? And it is surely marvelous that Croix (loc. cit.) shows that he is moved in no way by the reasoning of Pallavicini, whom he alleges, namely, that if the obligation of avoiding the occasion with so great a danger is imposed, the penitent will ordinarily violate it and will not leave the occasion; hence the imprudent Confessor will attain this alone: that he furnishes a certain occasion for committing still more sins!

For the rest, even if that indiscreet obligation is not imposed, another way is available to the Confessor, since meanwhile he can, where the matter requires, suspend absolution, so that the penitent may be efficaciously moved to employ the suitable means. For, as John Sanchez says (disputation 10, no. 10), judgment must be rendered concerning these as persons having a habit of sinning, not as persons having an occasion, since it does not lie in their choice to avoid it. And if some moral diligence appears in the penitent, the rule of Suarez will avail (On Penance, disputation 32, section 2, no. 4), that absolution is not to be denied to him, even if he relapse again and again, especially if he restrains himself somewhat and gradually diminishes the number of sins; which Navarrus noted, chapter 3, no. 21. Sometimes, however, absolution can be deferred and some greater penance or precaution employed.

It must also be added that, if the Confessor finds the penitent so frail and even inconstant in employing the means that he must judge him less disposed for absolution on account of a defect of efficacious purpose, he will still imprudently exact from so frail, infirm, and weak a man that which is more difficult and morally impossible for him; and much more imprudently will he rigidly and harshly reject him from himself. For thus he will attain this alone: that the despairing penitent is immersed more deeply in sins. On the contrary, charity, kindness, and patience in often receiving and hearing him will obtain at least this: that he is neither wholly abandoned to the devil, nor altogether casts aside the means and prayers, nor has the way cut off by which he can be helped by counsels and exhortations, and that he knows access to reconciliation always lies easily open to him; just as the Doctors advise must be done where they treat of the confessions of a prostitute, a usurer, and others of this kind, who are not sufficiently disposed but have some less efficacious desire of correction or a better life, or only a velleity. Nor surely in the case ought the confessor to forget the opinion by which Suarez (On Religion, treatise 5, book 3, chapter 8, no. 7) concludes concerning this argument: Nor can human infirmities of this kind be cured more efficaciously by man.

 Against this Note and the one immediately preceding, the VV. heap together thirty-four columns (pp. 603-620), or rather fill them with a vast mass of useless things. I said useless, since they scarcely, if at all, touch the hinge of the matter. And the VV. surely held a most convenient way of extricating themselves from the difficulties when they write (p. 620): We omit to refute specifically the intrinsic reasons which Father Ballerini brings forward for his opinion, lest we undertake a superfluous labor; for the preceding explanation of the doctrine which St. Alphonsus holds sufficiently reduces all those reasons to nothing.

But this is altogether false. And surely those intrinsic reasons which are indicated in the Note are contained in these very few points: 1. The penitent is indeed bound by the law of nature to avoid a proximate danger. But since this can be obtained in two ways, namely, either by using suitable means so that the danger becomes remote, or by removing or fleeing the occasion, the penitent is bound by the law of nature only to one or the other. Therefore, the confessor cannot impose this one upon him rather than the other. And the reason is that the Confessor is not a legislator and accordingly, excepting sacramental satisfaction, cannot by command impose upon a penitent anything to which the penitent is not bound by some other law. Moreover, I ask: Does anything occur in the explanation of the doctrine of St. Alphonsus which the VV. set forth beforehand by which this principle might perhaps be overthrown? Indeed, will anyone think that this principle can be shown to be false?

Another principle is this: It is manifest that, of two means by which the end can be obtained, the one which, as more difficult to execute, is judged morally impossible can neither be nor ought to be imposed upon the penitent by the Confessor. But it is more difficult to undergo the danger of all one's goods, as Croix says, both of fortune and of reputation and even of life, than to employ some remedies for diminishing the danger of sinning. Therefore.

There is added a confirmation from the observation of Venerable Father Segneri, which is a certain consequence of the preceding principle. Namely, the Confessor ought to prefer that which removes the penitent further from the danger of sinning, and accordingly can never choose that in which the penitent is more certain to sin. Therefore the confessor will never prudently prefer that which must appear less probable of execution. But the flight from the occasion with so great a danger (of all goods, namely, of fortune, reputation, and even life) is hoped for less probably than the suitable use of means for diminishing the danger. Therefore.

Moreover, in that whole explanation of the doctrine of St. Alphonsus to which the VV. refer the reader, they have not even a word about these things, much less have they attempted to reply to anything. This alone can be seen: that they endeavor (p.

619) to weaken the reasoning brought forward by Venerable Segneri by adducing these words of his, which are read shortly after the text brought forward here: In doubt, always hold to the stricter side, because this, as we have seen, is the more favorable to the penitent. These, as is evident, do not pertain to the matter, because the rule proposed by that same Venerable Author and confirmed above by unshaken reasons in no way concerns doubtful cases. Therefore the VV. in fact reply nothing to the preceding intrinsic reasons, however much they pretend that they have replied; St. Alphonsus never used so wretched an artifice for evading contrary reasons, and we most certainly believe he never would have used it.

Thus, in the explanation of the doctrine of St. Alphonsus which the VV. set forth beforehand through six columns (pp. 608-610), this alone pertains to the matter: that they attempt to show that the hypothesis thus described by Croix (book 5, no. 261) is not chimerical: When someone can in no way bring it about that a formal danger of sinning is not joined to the external occasion, or, in other words, when someone can in no way bring it about that the proximate danger becomes remote. This hypothesis we called absurd in the Note, namely, when remedies are suitably suggested and faithfully employed.

To prove that these things are falsely said, the VV. propose two examples, one of which, however (p. 610), taken from Cardenas, does not pertain to the matter. For Cardenas (part 4, dissertation 40, no. 145) proposes the case of a concubine who, if she resists the lust of her accomplice, will most certainly be expelled by him from the house; and, this having been done, she will perish from hunger. I said that this example does not pertain to the matter; for where is there any place here for employing remedies by which the danger may become remote, when this single choice is given her: either to sin or to be expelled from the house, about to perish from hunger? It is the same, namely, as when Mattathias was given the choice either to eat swine's flesh or to undergo death. And if the hypothesis of Claude Lacroix were ultimately directed to this, surely every controversy would be absent. But Lacroix (loc. cit.) asserts that most weighty Authors stand for the opposite opinion, whom he afterward also calls very many; and at the end he seems also to permit the contrary practice, saying: He who wishes to defend the first, more benign opinion should read the Defense of Gobat. Therefore the hypothesis of Lacroix is altogether another.

And to this clearly pertains the other example which the VV. (p. 608) fashion: namely, of a young man who is not his own master and desperately loves a female relative with whom he is compelled to live in the same house. Having committed several sins with her and being agitated by the stings of conscience, he approaches confession. The Confessor, recognizing that this occasion is necessary, prescribes THE CUSTOMARY REMEDIES for him, especially that he should endeavor to avoid being alone with her. The penitent omits none of the prescribed things and faithfully avoids being alone with her; but he does not avoid the accomplice, who industriously seeks him and by flatteries and solicitations brings him to the point that he again falls miserably and sins, if not by consummated acts, at least by imperfect acts or by consenting interiorly. He returns to the confessor, who does not hesitate to absolve one in no way negligent in employing the remedies. He returns again and yet again, a recidivist in the same manner.

He does not sin except when he is sought and solicited by the accomplice, so that the supposition, always in the same manner, is true in the strictest sense. But at length the confessor... defers absolution for him. The penitent returns, nevertheless again a recidivist in the same manner. From this the VV. conclude: You therefore have in the strictest sense the case which St. Alphonsus proposes, and only two questions remain: 1. Whether in this case there is hope of correction, and 2. What the confessor must do.

Reply. The Confessor, as the VV. say, prescribed the customary remedies. But I ask: why did he omit certain other remedies, indeed less customary, but altogether suitable to the circumstances? The penitent, they say, omits none of the prescribed things and faithfully endeavors to avoid being alone with her; but he does not avoid the accomplice. And below: He does not sin except when he is sought and solicited by the accomplice. But concerning Blessed Thomas it is read that he drove away with a firebrand even the woman who had been introduced to shake his constancy. Why, therefore, did the confessor not persuade the young man that, after first admonishing her in vain even with harsh words, he should at length drive away with a firebrand the wicked woman whom he now thoroughly recognizes as a snare to himself and a fatal cause of eternal damnation? And if he did not have a firebrand at hand, that he should receive her with slaps and kicks? For who does not know that this kind of remedy, if the others do not profit, is most suitably and not rarely employed, and further ought to be employed, both by a man with a wanton woman and by a woman with a wanton man?

But, what is more marvelous, the VV. finally arrive at the opinion which they seem to attack. For after wrongly fashioning that the confessor had employed all the remedies, and further had fallen from every hope of obtaining correction, and finally had seriously declared to the young man that no hope of salvation remained for him unless he left his paternal home, they present the young man himself as so disposed that, solicitous for his eternal salvation, he either leaves his paternal home or, about to attempt the utmost, straining every power and nerve and imploring divine help more fervently than usual and with his whole heart, resists the solicitation of the accomplice and finally emerges victorious in this contest.... Indeed, even if he did not immediately enter into these sound counsels, nevertheless his watchful conscience would not permit him to languish in sins and would not cease to cry out until he had fulfilled one or the other in deed. Thus indeed the VV. (pp. 608-609).

But: 1. From these things it is now plainly gathered that the hypothesis of Croix is therefore chimerical and absurd, concerning a penitent who can in no way bring it about that a formal danger of sinning is not joined to the external occasion, or, in other words, who can in no way bring it about that the proximate danger becomes remote. For in this very case, which they otherwise present so that no hope of correction shines forth, they themselves suppose that the young man, after taking up a more fervent effort, can thus resist the solicitation of the accomplice so that he finally emerges victorious in this contest. Therefore they confess that, even while the present occasion perseveres, the proximate danger can become remote when suitable remedies are employed. Therefore they say contradictory things when they assert both that no hope of correction is present and nevertheless that a change of morals is to be hoped for.

2. Therefore they concede that the aforesaid young man is not necessarily to leave his paternal home, but that one or the other is to be chosen by him: either that with a firmer will he employ suitable means for conquering the temptations, or certainly that he flee from the occasion by leaving his paternal home, if he is unwilling to undertake the care and labor of employing the means. For otherwise, as the VV. very well write (p. 608), it is certain that this penitent can resist the solicitation and does not resist on account of a defect of purpose; for no commands, divine grace assisting, is impossible for anyone to observe. Therefore, the conclusion against them is that, if purpose is lacking, the cause is to be sought in this: that suitable means are either not suggested and prescribed to him by the confessor, or he himself does not faithfully use them.

Hence there is a consequence against the opinion which Croix prefers. For if the penitent is bound only to one or the other, and satisfies his obligation if he chooses and holds to one of the two ways of escaping the danger of sin, the confessor therefore cannot impose one determined way of the two by command; and much less ought or can he prescribe that way which, since it is more difficult to execute, exposes the penitent, as Segneri said, to a more certain danger of sin.

From these things the reply to the texts of Authors which the VV. heap together through thirteen columns (pp. 610-617) easily discloses itself. Namely, the obligation which they urge of leaving the occasion is to be understood conditionally: namely, when the penitent does not bring himself to employ the suitable and indeed necessary remedies which render the danger remote from proximate.

The VV. complain, and indeed gravely censure (p. 607), that the hypothesis fashioned by Croix is called absurd and chimerical, while the practice consequently proposed by him according to that incongruous hypothesis, namely, of exacting from the penitent that which, according to the words of Segneri, exposes him to a more certain danger of sinning, is called imprudent, indiscreet, and not consonant with reason, when St. Alphonsus also preferred it, whose virtues and consequently prudence have nevertheless already been declared to have attained the heroic degree.

Reply to point 1. The VV. themselves, as we saw above, reject that hypothesis and prove it false while they seem to wish to defend it. As regards point 2, how, first of all, will the VV. prove that the holy Doctor praises that practice when, on account of its difficulty in comparison with the use of other means, it induces the penitent into a more certain danger of sinning? But then this kind of argument manifestly proves too much. Indeed, above (see the Note to no. 627, question 6) we saw, in this matter of prudence, namely, when the question is whether or not absolution is to be deferred for a penitent who has not yet satisfied the obligation of making restitution, that the doctrine of St. Antoninus differs from the doctrine of St. Alphonsus. And since the virtues and further the prudence of each were declared to be in the heroic degree, and indeed St. Antoninus possessed such dexterity in explaining counsels that he was called by the common praise ANTONINUS OF COUNSELS, as the Roman Breviary has, how can these things be reconciled in this manner?

Point II. On Habitual Sinners and Recidivists

632. ○ An habitual sinner, insofar as he is distinguished from a recidivist, according to more recent authors is said to be one who has contracted a habit of some sin into which, nevertheless, he has not yet relapsed after confession. But a recidivist is called one who has contracted a habit and, after confession, relapses into the same sin. - St. Ligorius, no. 457 [1].

[1] The Author attributes these definitions to the more recent authors because in fact a distinction of this kind between an habitual sinner and a recidivist belonged only to certain more recent writers: so that the former is called one who has contracted a habit of some sin which he has not yet confessed (they add that a habit is contracted by an act repeated five times in a month); but the latter is one who, after once confessing following the contraction of such a habit, has relapsed into the same sins (see St. Alphonsus, Practice of the Confessor, nos. 70-71). These indeed can perhaps be admitted in some sense, as also that one should be called a recidivist who, after confession, relapses into a sin even of a different species, as a certain Franzoia wished with some others, who disfigured rather than illustrated the Marrow of Moral Theology of Hermann Busembaum with his Notes. But in the theological acceptation, the Doctors understand a frequent relapse into the same sins after many confessions without any correction, as Cardinal De Lugo says (On Penance, disputation 14, no. 166); or, as the Salmanticenses have (treatise 17, chapter 2, no. 167): The question concerns one who, having been admonished more frequently, always remains in the same state, applying no care on his part so that he may return to better fruit. And Gobat (Experimental Theology, treatise 7, case 16, no. 518): When moral Theologians treat of recidivists..., they speak only of those recidivists who continue to commit the same mortal sin even after a purpose of correction and after several confessions, as John Sanchez, De Lugo, Lessius, and Filliucci express. And Venerable Father Segneri (The Instructed Christian, part 3, discourse 22): I intend to speak of another kind of recidivists, and they are those who, after confession, immediately return to the same fault without any correction and without any effort to correct themselves. And Ludovicus of Granada describes the same persons: when they have first confessed their crimes at this time, they immediately relapse into the same things and remit nothing of their depraved habit and license of swearing, perjuring, lying, defaming, cursing, imprecating evil, and coveting, nor do they embrace any office of virtue and piety, but remain the same as they had been before. Thus this most holy man in Andreucci, who from the common opinion of the Doctors (In the Opuscule The Recidivist Confessor, section 1, in the appendix to volume 2 of Busembaum's Marrow, Rome, 1844, Press of the Propagation of the Faith) gathers that these three things are required to constitute a recidivist in the theological acceptation: 1. frequent relapse after several confessions; 2. relapse into sins of the same species; 3. a defect of every correction, even one begun.

Therefore, consideration of an habitual sinner who is not a recidivist in this sense can pertain here only when someone, perhaps abstaining from confession for several years and frequently relapsing into the same sins by force of the contracted habit, needs the particular care of the confessor, as laboring under that habit which, as Suarez says (On Religion, treatise 5, book 3, chapter 8, no. 7), has in a certain way passed into nature. For the Theologians inquire into a habit of this kind, and further into the difficulty of correcting it, not into the one more recently devised by the more recent writers.

The reason is readily evident why this diversity between the Theologians of the School and certain more recent writers in handing down the notions of an habitual sinner or a recidivist must be kept before the eyes. For once it is evident that these notions are received differently by the Theologians and by those more recent writers, it will manifestly appear that the subject of disputation is different for each, and that the authority and support of Theologians who were disputing about another subject are therefore wrongly invoked for theories built upon the new notion, although each uses the same terms.

Rules

633. Rule I. - Every habitual sinner can always be absolved, even the first time he confesses the depraved habit, although no correction has preceded, provided that he seriously proposes this and shows signs of repentance, even if only ordinary. - St. Ligorius, no. 450, and others commonly [2].

[2] This is against Juvenin and that Ludovicus Habert who, on account of his pertinacity in attacking the Constitution Unigenitus, was expelled from the Sorbonne

Academy and died unhappily in exile at Blois on April 7, 1718. They, with certain others, require that true conversion first be proved through correction of life; otherwise, as Juvenin says in his condemned Theological Institutions (see the Index of Prohibited Books, Rome, 1744, under JUVENIN, and more recent editions under Theological Institutions), On Penance, dissertation 5, chapter 5, article 1, it is morally certain that an affection for mortal sin is found in them. In these words you see two things badly confounded: namely, a certain inclination to evil, or better, a certain facility of some power toward its acts, and a deliberate affection for mortal sin. And from this it would surely be proved that all are affected toward mortal sin and accordingly are always unworthy of the benefit of absolution, since, as Scripture says (Genesis 8:21), the sense and thought of the human heart are prone to evil from youth.

Against these St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 459) urges these words of the Roman Catechism (On the Sacrament of Penance, no. 60): If, after hearing the confession, the priest judges that neither diligence in enumerating the sins nor sorrow in detesting them has been altogether lacking to the penitent, he can be absolved. And he adds: Note, HAS NOT BEEN ALTOGETHER LACKING. And indeed these things fit the matter excellently. Yet it may seem to someone that this must be asked: why do those words of the Catechism, which are most general, not equally avail even when the penitent has relapsed into the same sins after confession, but are gratuitously restricted to this single case?

Rule II

But absolution is to be denied to an habitual sinner if he refuses to employ the means prudently proposed by the Confessor and necessary for conquering the habit. The reason is that by this very fact he does not sincerely wish to be corrected, although he asserts that he wishes to change his life; and therefore he is simply indisposed [3].

[3] These things pertain to the general doctrine concerning which it was said above (no. 626) that whoever refuses to fulfill some certain and grave obligation is incapable of absolution.

634. Rule III. - A recidivist furnishing extraordinary or special signs of sorrow can be absolved as often as he comes. The reason is that by extraordinary signs of sorrow every prudent suspicion which the preceding falls, even if frequent, could have induced is removed, and the Confessor can prudently judge the penitent to be sufficiently disposed. - I said can be absolved, but not that he necessarily must be; for the Confessor can defer absolution in this case if he judges that the deferral will be useful to the penitent, although ordinarily it is more expedient that it not be deferred [4]. - St. Ligorius, no. 460, and Practice of the Confessor, no. 76.

[4] See those things said more diffusely concerning this argument above (no. 621).

635. Rule IV. - A recidivist, even one furnishing only ordinary signs of contrition [5], can be absolved and generally must be whenever absolution cannot easily be deferred. The reason is that, on the one hand, he can be judged absolutely to be sufficiently disposed from the ordinary signs, and, on the other hand, there is a grave reason for absolving him, lest he remain for a long time in the state of mortal sin; but before the Confessor absolves such a person, he will employ care to dispose him better and more certainly to receive the benefit of absolution [6].

[5] Above, in the Note to no. 625, we observed that the Author calls ordinary almost those signs which St. Alphonsus reckons among the extraordinary.

[6] Concerning this necessary care in Confessors, see the Note to the following number 27.

636. Rule V. - A recidivist returning with the same depraved habit, with no effort employed and none of the means prescribed by the Confessor fulfilled, cannot be absolved unless he shows extraordinary signs of sorrow. Thus St. Ligorius [7]: The third common opinion which we follow, and which Sanchez, Palaus, Bonacina, De Lugo, Petrocorensis, Sporer, Azor, Viva, Laymann, Holzmann, Anacletus, Milante, Wigandt, and the Salmanticenses, treatise 17, chapter 2, nos. 168 and 170, with Suarez, Sayrus, Hurtado, Prado, Rodriguez, Lopez, etc., hold, teaches, that a recidivist sinner returning with the same depraved habit cannot be absolved unless he brings extraordinary signs of his disposition....

The reason is that, in order that a confessor may absolve a penitent, he must be morally certain of his disposition; hence, although a sinner confessing for the first time is to be judged disposed, because (as we said) no presumption to the contrary stands against him, nevertheless, when he has already been admonished in another that frequent relapse furnishes a sign, or at least gives a prudent suspicion, that his repentance is not true; for one who firmly proposes (De Lugo well says, disputation 14, no. 160) a thing morally possible for himself does not so easily forget his purpose, but perseveres at least for some time and falls with greater difficulty or less frequently (book 6, no. 459).

[7] I would say that it was not done by chance that the Author alleges only St. Alphonsus for this doctrine. For (and these things are said only so that the rights of history and truth may be preserved) he indeed brings forward many authors (loc. cit.) and does not hesitate to call this opinion of his common. But: 1. Most of those whom he alleges here are the very same whom you have cited above in the note to no. 621, namely, Sanchez, Suarez, Palaus, Bonacina, Azor, Sayrus, Hurtado, De Lugo, etc.; and for the rest he indicates no other places of theirs than those which we brought forward there. Moreover, their opinion, which we indicated there by their own words brought forward, differs from this thesis by the whole heaven; for they expressly affirm, or manifestly suppose, that the penitent can be absolved, and propose a deferral of absolution as merely useful, and accordingly to be employed only from salutary counsel and only sometimes. Hence it seems attributable only to a slip of the eyes or of memory that St. Alphonsus took the citations from treatise 17, chapter 2, no. 168 of the Salmanticenses, as he himself alleges them there. For those Doctors are indeed brought forward there; but the opinion for which they are invoked there is not the thesis of St. Alphonsus, but another, which the Salmanticenses thus express: Although IT IS A SALUTARY COUNSEL to defer absolution when such a deferral is believed likely to profit...; yet if the penitent approaches with sorrow and a firm purpose..., the confessor CAN ABSOLVE HIM, even if hitherto, after being admonished several times, he has not taken care to be corrected. These words are as consonant with the sense of the Doctors alleged as they differ from the opinion of St. Alphonsus.

2. But St. Alphonsus himself (loc. cit.) also manifestly reveals that his doctrine is one thing and the opinion of the Doctors whom he had alleged for himself a little before is another. For not long afterward, after mentioning the opinion of Sanchez, Laymann, De Lugo, Palaus, Viva, Sporer, and others that a recidivist can well be absolved several times, even if he has relapsed in the same manner and employed no remedy, he adds: I venerate the authority of such great Doctors; but I have never been able to acquiesce in their opinion. But what the Doctors named here by St. Alphonsus hold, namely, that a recidivist can be absolved several times even if, etc., is common without exception to all whom he had previously cited for himself, and even to the author of the theology for the use of the Seminary of Perigueux, although the latter is accustomed to follow the footsteps of Juvenin, Habert, and Gennett rather than those of the theological schools.

3. If there are a few who introduce mention of an extraordinary sign of disposition, they do not exact this as a condition without which the Confessor cannot absolve, but either merely say that it also contributes to discerning disposition, as De Lugo (On Penance, disputation 14, no. 166), or mention it as a case in which, contrary to what St. Alphonsus thought (nos. 463-464), absolution is not to be deferred, as Laymann (On Penance, chapter 5, no. 10). Therefore you will find only the Salmanticenses who, in treatise 17, chapter 2, no. 170, hand down as more probable that then it will not only be a salutary counsel to defer absolution, but the Confessor will be bound to do so. Nevertheless, their opinion also departs from the opinion of St. Alphonsus. For first, they judge other opinions probable as well (ibid., no. 167), the first of which (ibid., no. 168), against the opinion of St. Alphonsus, teaches that absolution can be conferred, although it can sometimes be salutary from counsel to defer it. Then they limit that obligation of deferring absolution (ibid., no. 170), unless some scandal or other extrinsic inconvenience follows from denied absolution; by which limitation they all but overthrow the thesis of St. Alphonsus, while by that very fact they concede that, speaking per se, absolution can be conferred. Finally (ibid., no. 168), they themselves treat of one who, having been admonished MORE FREQUENTLY, always remains in the same state, etc.; wherefore they too must now be reckoned among those to whose opinion St. Alphonsus says, as we recently saw, that he was never able to acquiesce.

4. Likewise, if some whom the Salmanticenses (no. 170) most eagerly sought out used those phrases, cannot be absolved, are not to be absolved, nevertheless their opinion favors in no way either the opinion of St. Alphonsus or even that of the Salmanticenses. And surely, what support does it give to their theory that Sanchez (On the Decalogue, book 2, chapter 32, no. 45), when he says that one accustomed to blasphemies can be absolved, indeed is to be absolved, nevertheless excepts a case in which scandal is to be repaired: unless, he says, he furnished enormous scandal to others by those blasphemies, and thus the Confessor judged that his private consolation was to be postponed, and that it was expedient for the divine glory that he not be absolved until he had satisfied for the public scandal by striving for the correction of his life? And this is the same as what Bonacina says (On the Second Precept, disputation 4, question 1, point 14, no. 7): By reason of the scandal which one who perjures himself is accustomed to furnish to others, absolution is to be denied according to the judgment of a prudent confessor; for scandal is to be prevented. Again, what support does it give their theory that Ludovicus Lopez and Bartholomew Medina, alleged by them, said that one who does not have a purpose of correcting the vice is not to be absolved? For Lopez, proposing his own opinion and that of Medina (Instruction of Conscience, part 1, chapter 25), says: Medina seems to subscribe to this opinion of Soto, that one who is everywhere held by a habit of swearing, without choice and consideration whether he swears what is true or false, AND LACKS A TRUE PURPOSE of rooting out the wicked habit, is not to be absolved. But if he resolves upon correction and with a good will has embraced the remedies enjoined upon him by the Confessor, there is no reason why absolution should be prolonged for him. What does it profit that Rodriguez, alleged by them (Summary, part 1, chapter 192, no. 13), said these things while transcribing Medina? But one who is so defective in his depraved habit that in confession itself he swears at every word ought not to be absolved for that time. Indeed, Ludovicus Lopez (loc. cit.) regards as more rigorous that which Medina had suggested and which Rodericus takes from Medina: that one who has burst forth into many oaths, snatched into them by the evil habit by which he is held, and who, although he had previously confessed this several times, never furnished correction, is not to be absolved but is to be sent away so that for some days he may conduct himself attentively toward rooting out so pernicious a habit. And the reason which Medina brings forward here for deferring absolution introduces another enormous difference between their opinion and the recent opinion of St. Alphonsus. Namely, St. Alphonsus, according to the theories of Juvenin and the like, universally denies that a penitent of this kind can be absolved, since he must be judged indisposed; but most of the Doctors whom either he himself or the Salmanticenses allege do otherwise. For these, as we noted elsewhere above in the note to no. 621, since they treat especially of vices of the tongue, regard deferral of absolution as a mere expedient for at length arousing and stimulating the sluggishness of those who, by force of a depraved habit, break forth into blasphemous or perjurious words that are even less deliberate and who are in a continual state of mortal sin, as Trullench also notes (On the Decalogue, book 2, chapter 1, doubt 20, no. 6), though he was wrongly cited for that reason by the Salmanticenses, unless they employ suitable care for correcting the vice. Indeed, as Medina expressly observes (Instruction of Confessors, book 1, chapter 54, section 5), since this sin is in the tongue rather than in the heart or affection, they disputed nothing about the disposition of the penitent; and therefore Azor also (part 1, book 11, chapter 3, question 4), himself wrongly alleged by the Salmanticenses, after saying, Nevertheless, absolution seems to be deferred for a time so that he may meanwhile devote some effort to it (to correcting the habit), immediately adds: unless there is otherwise a just cause by which he ought to be absolved from sins immediately.

If there are some who introduce discussion of deferring absolution on account of a suspicion that the penitent has approached less disposed, they do not propose it as a rule to be universally observed with recidivists, but say only that there is a place for a suspicion of this kind sometimes or at some time; concerning this we shall treat in the following Note. Furthermore, they themselves suppose that a penitent of this kind has already been absolved several times; in which, again, St. Alphonsus, as we saw, professes that he departs from them.

5. And these things, although few in view of the gravity of the argument (for the brevity of the Note does not permit more things which would make for a clearer demonstration of the matter), can suffice to establish that the preceding opinion of St. Alphonsus, whenever it is considered whole with all its parts, can be called, rather than common, contrary to the common opinion of the Doctors. Yet this is not said as any censure of that opinion, but only, as was said above, so that its own place and right may remain for historical truth, and from this there may remain the faculty of using that canon which the same St. Alphonsus (no. 460) praises, saying: I think that he by no means errs who directs himself according to opinions commonly received from Doctors of no humble reputation. For the rest, in what manner the opinion of St. Alphonsus can in some way be drawn toward the common opinion, we shall indicate in the following Note.

6. Meanwhile, note that the reason which the Author brings forward for that rule, and which certain others are accustomed to bring forward, is not free from a logical fault (for this must not be concealed). For grant that, after confession, someone has relapsed into the same sins in the same manner and, if you wish, even in a worse manner and measure; this could perhaps introduce some suspicion that the purpose in that confession was less efficacious; and I said, perhaps some suspicion, because, since the human will is subject to change, not even from a subsequent relapse can we logically argue to some defect of the preceding confession, since this must very often be ascribed not to a defect of a most sincere purpose, but, as daily experience teaches, to frailty and inconstancy after a sincere purpose. But if someone wishes further to argue from preceding falls to a defect of sorrow and purpose in the present, no law of logic permits it, as all Theologians reason excellently with St. Thomas.

 Indeed, it is not our intention, nor can it be, to pursue the VV. through those two hundred and eighty columns by which, with almost useless labor, they oppress every most patient reader. It will suffice us at present to give a sufficient account of those things which we noted concerning this argument.

It is said in the Note (no. 1) that St. Alphonsus did not hesitate indeed to call his opinion common; nevertheless, as is added (no. 5), it can be called, rather than common, contrary to the common opinion of the Doctors. Yet, so that a fair judgment may be formed concerning this affirmation, the words which are added there must not be neglected: WHENEVER IT IS CONSIDERED WHOLE WITH ALL ITS PARTS. Yet the VV. nowhere seem to have taken any account of these words throughout those two hundred and eighty columns.

Therefore, the first reason why we affirmed this is the one which we touched upon above in the Note to no. 632: namely, because the notion both of an habitual sinner and of a recidivist which St. Alphonsus hands down and Gury followed (see above no. 632 and below no. 638) is one thing, while that commonly handed down by the Doctors is another. Moreover, as was observed there, once it is evident that these notions are employed in a different sense by the Theologians and by those more recent writers, it will manifestly appear that the subject of disputation is different for each and that the authority and support of Theologians who were disputing about another subject are therefore wrongly invoked for theories built upon the new notion, although each uses the same terms.

To this reasoning, which otherwise is neither slight nor abstruse, you will seek in vain throughout those two hundred and eighty columns for any reply whatsoever.

And indeed in that Note to no. 632 we neither expressly attributed those new notions of an Habitual Sinner and a Recidivist to the holy Doctor, out of a certain reverence for him, nor there expressly deduced against him that latter conclusion. Nevertheless, if the VV. preferred this way of defending the holy Doctor, not so that they might defend his doctrine as it truly is in itself, but so that they might endeavor to show its consonance with the common doctrines of the schools, which is a question not of right but of fact, surely it was in no way lawful to neglect this part of the question, which is of the gravest moment.

We brought forward another reason for our affirmation, and one manifestly decisive, in the Note (no. 2), namely, by bringing forward those words of the holy Doctor himself: I venerate the authority of such great Doctors; but I have never been able to acquiesce in their opinion; where he says that he departs from the opinion of Sanchez, Laymann, De Lugo, Palaus, Viva, Sporer, and OTHERS. It does not pertain here now to inquire whether the opinion which the holy Doctor professes is better, or the opinion of those in whom he says he was never able to acquiesce; the question now concerns the fact itself: Does the holy Doctor depart from the common opinion? Concerning the controversy touched upon there by the holy Doctor, the VV. write (p. 656): St. Alphonsus, AGAINST SEVERAL DOCTORS alleged for the first proposition, who judge that such a (recidivist) can be absolved up to the third or fourth time, establishes the following doctrine: An Habitual Sinner, or one Habituated, who, having already once been admonished, has relapsed in the same manner, cannot be absolved, etc. Here the VV. speak the truth, but not the whole truth: namely, they admit that the holy Doctor departs from the Authors whom he had alleged for his own thesis. But if, by the admission of the VV. themselves, St. Alphonsus departs from the opinion of those great Doctors whom he himself had alleged for his doctrine, why, I ask, are they so angry with those who perhaps say that those Authors in no way support the thesis of the holy Doctor?

But I said that the VV. have here confessed the truth, but not the whole truth. For they say that St. Alphonsus established his thesis against several; which is most true. But the word several can indicate either simply many or, taken comparatively, some greater multitude in comparison with the contrary party. Yet in neither sense does that word express the whole truth. Why? Because the holy Doctor Alphonsus had no Author whom he could allege for his opinion, nor did the VV. find anyone, nor will they find anyone, unless perhaps they have recourse either to those who, as St. Alphonsus says (book 6, no. 459), with intolerable rigor say that an habitual sinner can never be absolved unless his correction is established by long experience, or to someone among those who perhaps resolved to transcribe St. Alphonsus for themselves, whose support otherwise would not prove that the holy Doctor did not depart from the unanimous opinion of all the Doctors.

And since it is most openly evident, even from the most express testimony of the holy Doctor Alphonsus, that he departed from the most common and indeed the unanimous opinion of all the Doctors, what finally is to be thought of those two hundred and eighty columns by which the VV. wish to contend that it was asserted only through calumny that the opinion of St. Alphonsus can be called, rather than common, contrary to the common opinion of the Doctors? To these things add what we indicated above: that the notions both of an Habitual Sinner and of a Recidivist which St. Alphonsus adopts are employed in another sense by all the Doctors whom he alleges, so that even if the theses of the holy Doctor agreed verbally with the theses of the Doctors, they would nevertheless differ in sense. Therefore it is so much the more confirmed and becomes perspicuous that the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, whenever it is considered whole with all its parts, can be called, rather than common, contrary to the common opinion of the Doctors. Yet this was not said, as was observed in the Note, as any censure of that opinion, but only so that its own place and right may remain for historical truth and from this there may remain the faculty of using that canon which the same St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 460) praises, saying: I think that he by no means errs who directs himself according to opinions commonly received from Doctors of no humble reputation.

These things having been set forth beforehand, which pertain to the substance of the matter, let us come to the remaining parts of the Note, which are of lesser moment, since they present incidental little questions.

And as regards those things contained in no. 1, behold, the VV. (p. 660) do not hesitate to affirm that the thesis of St. Alphonsus, who says that a recidivist cannot be absolved, etc., is altogether the same as that of the Authors whose express words we reported in the Note to no. 621 and whom the Salmanticenses bring forward (treatise 17, chapter 2, no. 168) for the opinion which establishes that a recidivist of this kind can be absolved absolutely, although it is sometimes useful for him to defer absolution. The VV. handle this argument through twenty-four columns and contend (p. 680) that the Salmanticenses falsely alleged these authors for that opinion. Surely it was a most unhappy design by which they undertook to fight against the manifest evidence of fact; yet a reader who has already been able to observe very frequently that this is customary with them will not be astonished.

Let the testimonies brought forward above in the Note to no. 621 be read, I ask; they suppose a penitent sufficiently disposed and capable of absolution. Is such the penitent whom St. Alphonsus denies can be absolved? There we brought forward, for example, the express words of Suarez, where he says that it sometimes profits to defer absolution for a recidivist penitent of this kind. But the VV. object (p. 669) that the text of Suarez is brought forward there truncated, because these words were omitted: But if at length experience proves that these (remedies) do not suffice, the penitent will sometimes have to be compelled to remove the occasion, etc. But is the thesis of St. Alphonsus of which we speak this: that the confessor can and ought sometimes to intimate to the penitent the obligation of removing the occasion? Whoever abounds in leisure and patience may read these and other things of this kind, merely suitable for imposing upon readers who are accustomed to judge from the great mass of volumes.

With the context of the holy Doctor considered more diligently, another reason presents itself on account of which we may say that the holy Doctor alleged the Authors brought forward by the Salmanticenses in no. 168 not altogether beside the matter, however much their opinion is opposed to the opinion which the thesis of the holy Doctor defends. For let these words of St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 459) be considered: The first part (namely, of the thesis) is against the first opinion, which says that recidivists ought always to be absolved when they approach the Sacrament.

Let it now be omitted whether anyone in fact professed this most absurd doctrine. The VV. (p. 680) affirm that John Sanchez professes it in truth; and thus they openly make it evident that they did not read Sanchez, just as they themselves say that St. Alphonsus did not read other Authors whom he cites for the same opinion, but took the citations of them from the Salmanticenses. I said that the VV. did not read John Sanchez. For elsewhere, in the Note to no. 621, we already observed that this absurd opinion was wrongly ascribed even to John Sanchez, since he merely contends that absolution is not to be deferred for a penitent rightly disposed on account of the hope of greater fruit. Thus he says (Selected Disputations, disputation 9, no. 11): It is inferred that it will not be a most salutary counsel sometimes to deny absolution to one having a habit of sinning, however much Sayrus, Suarez, Sanchez, Reginaldus, Toletus, Sa, and others counsel it. For if the confessor can LICITLY absolve the penitent, as they themselves admit, he will be bound to do so; for the penitent has a right that absolution not be denied to him, IF HE IS WORTHY, unless by his own consent. I certainly believe that the aforesaid authors, when they say that it will be a right counsel to deny absolution to a penitent having a habit of sinning, did not understand this absolutely, but with the penitent's consent first having been given. Yet I judge absolutely that it will never be a right counsel to deny absolution, however much the penitent may consent, supposing that it can be licitly imparted. For when it is denied, it ought to be done for this end, that the penitent may be rendered more cautious for preventing sins. Yet I do not understand that greater strength for avoiding sins will inhere in the penitent if he lacks sacramental grace and the other helps proceeding from the Sacrament than if he is clothed with it and them. And since counsel ought to concern the better good, surely I do not grasp that it is a better good for the penitent to lack the grace of the Sacrament for some time than to be clothed with it, etc. These are the words of Sanchez, which nearly return to that opinion of St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 464): It is to be hoped more that he will be corrected through the help of grace received in the Sacrament than through deferral of absolution. Therefore, the holy Doctor judged that absolution is rarely to be deferred for these persons.

But how it happened that St. Alphonsus depicted the opinion of Sanchez in such different colors, as we explained, so that he even hurled against it the condemnation of proposition 60 among those proscribed by Innocent XI, can scarcely be understood: Although no hope of correction appears, absolution is not to be denied, provided that he declares orally that he is sorry and proposes correction. Indeed, the Salmanticenses, from whom the VV. (p. 680) say that the holy Doctor transcribed these things, treat of a sinner who approaches with sorrow and a stated purpose (loc. cit., no. 169); but they had said (ibid., no. 167), if he approaches with sorrow for past things and firmly proposes correction for the future, and again (no. 168), if the penitent approaches with sorrow and a firm purpose. Such, namely, is the penitent whom Sanchez, Bonacina, Sayrus, Palaus, Suarez, etc., alleged there, require so that then he can be absolved absolutely. Yet, against this opinion of theirs, it is surely marvelous that even the VV. (p. 677) do not hesitate to object the aforesaid condemnation of proposition 60, relying, namely, upon those most wretched later additions to the Salmanticenses.

But to return to the matter, whatever may be the case concerning these miseries, it is manifest from what has been said that the holy Doctor Alphonsus wished to establish his thesis even against this opinion which he reports in the first place, whatever opinion he may at length have fashioned for himself. Moreover, since this opinion, as he himself inexactly explains it, established that recidivists ought always to be absolved whenever they approach the Sacrament, the reason is now evident why he could oppose to this opinion not only the authors whom the Salmanticenses in no. 170 allege for the opinion which the holy Doctor himself followed, but also those whom the Salmanticenses allege in no. 168, who teach, namely, that it is sometimes useful to defer absolution for these sinners. For does not Sanchez also, as we saw, have these authors, namely, Suarez, Sanchez, Bonacina, Sayrus, etc., as opposed to himself?

Let us conclude two things from this. First, to give an account of why St. Alphonsus alleged Suarez, Sanchez, Palaus, etc., for his thesis, it is not necessary to suppose a slip of the eyes or memory. For the purpose he proposed to himself of attacking the opinion of Sanchez or of others, as he had fashioned it for himself, the Authors whom the Salmanticenses reported both in no. 168 and in no. 170 certainly pertained to the matter. And since this twofold citation contributed to the purpose of the holy Doctor, the correction was consequently not most wise which the VV.

confession, and has fallen in the same manner, with no effort employed and none of the means prescribed by the confessor fulfilled, say (p. 680, in the Note) was introduced into the Mechlin editions of 1845, Regensburg of 1846, and Turin of 1847, which deleted the citation of no. 168.

But secondly, it must altogether be retained that the authors brought forward by the Salmanticenses in no. 168 likewise do not stand for the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, not insofar as he refutes the opinion of Sanchez, but insofar as he establishes his own opinion, so that they can rightly be alleged for this, as was already shown above. Let the VV. have for themselves in this matter also the support of those who prepared the editions just mentioned, since they, not considering how that citation could conduce to the purpose of the holy Doctor, therefore judged that it was to be suppressed because they knew sufficiently well that those Authors were opposed to the opinion of the holy Doctor considered in itself.

We must now come to those things which are contained in the Note (no. 3) concerning extraordinary signs of sorrow; these, however, when the explanations of the VV. are added, scarcely have any difficulty. First, the VV. (p. 682) take care to remove the odium of a new term, namely, extraordinary signs; and according to that saying of the Poet, If it is lawful to use great examples in small matters, they bring forward those things which Benedict XIV writes in the work On the Beatification of the Servants of God, book 2, chapter 28, nos. 6 and 7: namely, that a doctrine cannot be qualified as new when some new word is employed, not so that a new thing may be signified, but so that the mysteries of our faith may be explained more easily and contrary heresies refuted.

Then the same VV. (p. 653, in the Note), to show that a new doctrine does not lie beneath the new term, and at the same time to soften whatever rigidity the term extraordinary sign may bear, first observe that those signs of sorrow which the holy Doctor calls extraordinary were taken from Authors wherever they mention some sign of the disposition of penitents. St. Alphonsus, they say, gathered the extraordinary signs which are had separately in individual Doctors and set them forth jointly.

They then add: From this exposition it is at the same time evident that St. Alphonsus in admitting extraordinary signs shows himself not more rigorous but rather most mild, since these signs are of the widest latitude. For it can scarcely be thought, at least according to those things which commonly and regularly occur, that a recidivist not lacking true sorrow and a sufficient purpose would not bring forward one or another of these signs, since even a smaller number of sins, or some continence after the last confession, or fulfillment of the means prescribed by the confessor, suffices. It is therefore evident that St. Alphonsus in no way exacts extraordinary contrition, but extraordinary signs of sincere ordinary contrition; indeed, he does not even exact extraordinary signs in the strict sense, or signs rare and scarcely possible, but requires only that a penitent who has relapsed in the same manner should bring forward, beyond the accustomed confession and the customary doubtful declarations (add: if, nevertheless, he brings forth even these somehow and does not merely add to the confession, I have nothing else) of sincere sorrow and firm purpose, some solid and proven sign from which a prudent confessor can form for himself a judgment concerning his disposition.

And surely we shall have the holy Doctor altogether mild in this matter, especially if, where he exacts an extraordinary sign, he ultimately wishes to exclude only the opinion against which, as we saw above, he opposes the first part of his thesis, namely, the opinion condemned in the aforesaid proposition 60 among those proscribed by Innocent XI. And indeed this also seems to intimate that the holy Doctor, among other reasons, objects this condemned proposition against that very opinion, as he himself, as we said, apprehends it; otherwise than that most inept addition to the Salmanticenses praised by the VV., which objects the condemned Proposition even against the first opinion among the Salmanticenses and its patrons, whom indeed the holy Doctor alleges for his thesis.

Hence, indeed, it is evident that it was not without cause that it was finally added in the Note (no. 5) that the opinion of St. Alphonsus can in some manner be drawn toward the common opinion; this was afterward done more fully in the following Note, where we reported the mind of the holy Doctor. And you have things corresponding to those where he says (book 6, no. 459): As often as the penitent brings true signs of sorrow and purpose, so often can he rightly be absolved. And after bringing forward the testimonies of Sts. Jerome and Chrysostom, he proceeds: Hence the Author of the book published at Rome, whose title is Instruction for New Confessors, part 1, chapter 15, no. 356, thus says: If the relapse arises from one's own frailty, without another voluntary extrinsic cause, it is almost rashness to say that every one who relapses is indisposed. And therefore in chapter 9, no. 213, he says that a sinner who has relapsed through the force of an evil habit is to be absolved immediately if he has a firm will to employ the means for correcting himself; and he adds: And we judge that to act otherwise would be excessive rigor, and that the Confessor, by acting thus, would depart from the true spirit of the Church and of the Lord, and from the nature of the Sacrament, which is not only a judgment but a salutary medicine.

To these, moreover, add the conclusion which the holy Doctor (book 6, no. 461) deduces from the doctrine of the Roman Catechism, saying: Therefore, whenever it is not known to the Confessor that sorrow was altogether lacking to the penitent, he can absolve him; and from this, when these principles have been weighed, you will readily infer that the mind of Blessed Alphonsus can most easily be reconciled at last with the common doctrine.

Finally, as regards those things which are said in the Note (no. 6) concerning the argument which Gury uses to establish his rule, the VV. complain most bitterly (p. 692), as though they displayed a grave injury against the holy Doctor; and all the more because in the same Note (no. 4) it is premised that the theory of Juvenin and those like him savors of that principle that a recidivist cannot be absolved, since he must be judged indisposed: as though, the VV. say (p. 693), it were not a reproach when it denounces the holy Doctor as a follower of the theory of Juvenin, whose Institutions were condemned, and of Ludovicus Habert, who came to an unhappy end.

Reply. Did St. Alphonsus not often elsewhere allege Juvenin and Ludovicus Habert in support of some opinion approved by himself? Is not this very thing seen in this same paragraph, where he writes: See Juvenin, Theological Institutions, book 7, p. 408, and the Salmanticenses, etc.? Is anyone who therefore says that St. Alphonsus adopted the opinion of Juvenin to be thought to reproach the holy Doctor as a follower of Juvenin's condemned Theological Institutions? Let that be so if it were affirmed in the Note that Juvenin's Institutions were proscribed because he said that an habitual sinner, whenever he approaches confession, is never to be judged disposed for absolution. But this is not affirmed in the Note.

For the rest, the words of St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 459) are of this kind: When he himself (the penitent) has already been admonished in another confession, and has fallen in the same manner, with no effort employed and none of the means prescribed by the Confessor fulfilled, that frequent relapse furnishes a sign, or at least gives a prudent suspicion, that his repentance is not true. And Gury, after St. Alphonsus, adds the reason: For one who firmly proposes to avoid sin does not so easily forget his purpose, but perseveres at least for some time and falls with greater difficulty or less frequently; these are in fact the words of De Lugo (disputation 14, no. 160), and the words of De Lugo are brought forward there by St. Alphonsus.

But there is no small difference between the opinion of De Lugo and the opinion of St. Alphonsus. First, De Lugo disputes about one who is situated in a proximate occasion of sinning; St. Alphonsus and Gury do not. Then De Lugo (ibid., no. 156) speaks of one who, having been absolved more frequently, always relapses in the same manner; but St. Alphonsus speaks of one who has once been admonished and absolved. Moreover, De Lugo (ibid., no. 160) says that a suspicion of this kind can SOMETIMES have place per accidens, just as Sporer (On Penance, no. 330) and Laymann (On Penance, chapter 5, no. 10) say that this can happen AT TIMES; but St. Alphonsus hands it down as a general norm never to be omitted in judging recidivists.

And indeed, to establish his opinion, St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) brings forward the words of Isidore: He worthily performs penance who so bewails past evils that he does not commit future ones again; from whom the holy Doctor copied these words here does not appear. For Faure (Theological Doubts, doubt 3, section 4) shrewdly warns that the moderns copied this and other propositions of this kind from the impious Arnauld, and he shows that the ancient Doctors had formerly objected these propositions to themselves and explained them. And surely Peter Lombard (book 4, distinction 14) had thus replied to this objection: The aforesaid words, To repent is to bewail what was done before and not to commit things to be bewailed, can rightly be taken thus: that they are referred not to different times but to the same time; namely, that at the time when he bewails the evils committed, he does not by his will commit deeds to be bewailed. St. Raymond also has things corresponding to these (book 4, distinction 14).

And after Raymond, St. Thomas employed the same reply thus (III, question 84, article 10, reply to objection 4): It must be said that to repent is to bewail what was done before and not to commit things to be bewailed, namely, while one weeps, either in act or in purpose. For he is a mocker and not a penitent who, at the same time as he repents, does that of which he repents, or proposes that he will again do what he has done, or even actually sins in the same or another kind of sin. But that someone afterward sins either in act or in purpose does not exclude that his repentance was previously true. For the truth of a prior act is never excluded by a subsequent contrary act. For just as one who afterward sits truly ran, so one who afterward sins truly repented.

And in these things you have the reason why it was said in the Note that the rule of judgment proposed by Gury after St. Alphonsus is not free from a logical fault. A relapse, St. Alphonsus says, furnishes a sign, or at least gives a prudent suspicion, that his repentance is not true.

If the holy Doctor had said, that his repentance was not true, namely, in the preceding confession, even thus that saying of St. Thomas would meet him: One who afterward sins truly repented. For, as he says elsewhere (On IV Sentences, distinction 14, question 1, article 4, minor question 2), however much efficacy some virtue may have, it does not remove flexibility from free choice while one is in the state of the way. Likewise, that which is future cannot belong to the substance or integrity of any virtue except insofar as it is present in apprehension or in the will, because virtue as regards the habit does not await something in the future.... Hence, since penance is a virtue, and insofar as it is a Sacrament does not extend beyond the act of virtue, future continuation will not belong to the essential integrity of penance except insofar as it is in the purpose; and therefore repentance can be true, and nevertheless someone can afterward fall away from it. To this indeed pertains what St. Alphonsus also has (book 6, no. 459): De Lugo, disputation 14, no. 166, teaches well with Suarez, Sanchez, Reginaldus, Henriquez, and others commonly, that sufficient disposition is present sorrow and purpose, not future correction; and thus the penitent can be absolved even though he is judged likely to relapse.

But if the inference from a relapse into sins does not hold for excluding true preceding repentance, then a fortiori a relapse furnishes no argument for judging the present disposition of one who now approaches.

Hence St. Alphonsus afterward also tempers his aforesaid opinion thus (loc. cit.): Although a relapse furnishes some suspicion, it nevertheless does not exhibit a certain sign of indisposition; for it can well happen that the penitent truly had a firm will not to relapse and yet relapsed through the force of a depraved habit. These words surely import that the holy Doctor intimates that, from true preceding repentance, it can be argued that disposition is not lacking in the present either. And in fact, as the holy Doctor himself had premised, on the one hand the penitent is not to be presumed evil, so that he would wish to approach the Sacrament indisposed; on the other hand, he is presumed disposed while he confesses his sins, since spontaneous confession itself is a sign of contrition, unless some positive presumption to the contrary stands in the way, namely, as he adds (ibid., no. 460), unless it appears that the penitent approaches confession merely from the obligation of the paschal precept, or impelled by parents, a tutor, a master, etc. But if relapse in the same manner furnishes some suspicion of indisposition, namely, of a will not so firm and efficacious for employing remedies, nevertheless, as the holy Doctor himself adds (ibid., no. 459), whenever the penitent brings extraordinary signs of sorrow, that suspicion of indisposition is removed by them; and then the Confessor will be able prudently to judge that his penitent is sufficiently disposed. Moreover, since those sufficient signs of disposition which the holy Doctor calls extraordinary, if perhaps they are lacking when the preceding habit of life is considered, can, according to the teaching of St. Alphonsus himself, appear in and from the confession itself, as is handed down in the following Note, it again becomes clear how the opinion of St. Alphonsus can be reconciled with the common doctrine of others, however harsh the things which he had premised may appear. Yet those things will not appear harsh if the suspicion which a relapse repeated more frequently into the same sins without any correction casts upon him moves the Confessor, not indeed to decide a priori that the penitent is indisposed and to be dismissed without absolution, but to inquire more accurately, according to his office, into the penitent's present disposition.

637. Rule VI. - A doubtfully disposed recidivist is to have absolution deferred for some time, until a prudent sign of disposition appears. - St. Ligorius, Practice of the Confessor, nos. 71 and 72; Apostolic Man, last treatise, nos. 9 and 10 [8].

[8] That, except in a case of necessity, a doubtfully disposed penitent cannot licitly be absolved, namely, one whom no prudent reason persuades to be sufficiently disposed to receive grace in the Sacrament, ought to be beyond controversy. And from this is to be sought the reason why Theologians sometimes admonish that one should act thus with those recidivists who display either no indication, or certainly an ambiguous indication, of a good will, so that a not imprudent suspicion arises that they may here and now lack the suitable dispositions. But it is one thing that a penitent in that condition cannot be absolved, and another that he ought to be dismissed to be absolved at another time; as though either that delay had the power of procuring disposition, or patience in returning were a more certain indication of a better disposition in the penitent, or, on the contrary, it were not more expedient, indeed the office of the Confessor, then to employ every care so that, as far as it can be done with the grace of God, he may dispose the penitent to receive rightly the benefit of absolution.

Would that the words with which His Holiness Pope Leo XII, in announcing the Jubilee to the whole world (Constitution Charitate Christi, December 25, 1825, section 5), admonished Confessors were fixed in the minds of all priests: Many indeed (he says) present themselves altogether unprepared to the ministers of the Sacrament of Penance, but very often they are of such a kind that from unprepared they can be made prepared, provided that the priest, clothed with the bowels of the mercy of Christ Jesus, who came not to call the just but sinners, knows how to deal with them diligently, patiently, and gently. But that those, and those alone, are here called unprepared who lack an essential disposition is evident from what follows: For those alone are to be judged unprepared, not those who have committed even the gravest crimes, or who have been absent from confession even for very many years, for the mercy of the Lord is without number and the treasure of his goodness is infinite; nor those who, being uncultivated in condition or slow in understanding, have not sufficiently examined themselves, since by almost no diligence of their own would they accomplish this without the assistance of the priest himself; but those who, after the necessary diligence has been employed by him in questioning them, yet not so as to burden them beyond measure, and after every effort of charity has been exhausted in exciting them to detestation of their sins..., are nevertheless prudently judged to lack the sense of sorrow and repentance by which they may at least be disposed to obtain the grace of God in the Sacrament (these are the words of the Council of Trent concerning attrition). From these things it is evident that even those who not merely are doubtfully disposed but manifestly approach indisposed can be absolved, since the patience, gentleness, and industrious charity of the priest can then and there obtain this: that from unprepared they become prepared, and that the Confessor can prudently judge this.

Therefore, the Supreme Pontiff further does not omit to censure those who, rather than undertake this care so that with solicitous charity they may reconcile sinners to God, enter upon an easy way of freeing themselves from this burden by sending penitents away to be absolved at another time. Therefore, after he indicated who are to be judged incapable of the benefit of absolution, such (he says) are those who give NO signs of sorrow, who are unwilling to lay aside hatreds and enmities, or to restore the goods of others if they can, or to abandon the proximate occasion of sinning, or in some other manner to forsake sins and amend their life for the better; or those who have given public scandal, unless they make public satisfaction and remove the scandal; he immediately gravely warns how far the conduct of those who, as soon as they hear some graver sin or perceive someone infected with a manifold kind of sins, at once declare that they cannot absolve, departs from the manner of an experienced physician who likewise pours wine and oil into the wounds of the injured man. They refuse to heal those very persons (the Supreme Pontiff proceeds) for whose care they were especially appointed by him who says: Those who are well have no need of a physician, but those who are ill. Wherefore he deservedly declares that a priest of this kind is more indisposed to hear confessions than a sinner approaches confession unprepared: But if he (the priest) neglects to perform this, surely he is no more to be called prepared to hear than the others are to approach confession.

From these things this also is gathered: it is not to be feared that a sufficient sign of disposition cannot be had even if no delay of absolution is employed, which otherwise is very often a fallacious test of disposition. St. Alphonsus also warned of this very thing (book 6, no. 459), where he writes: Nor is it true that a test of time alone is the sole sign of a changed will; for a change of will depends upon divine grace, which does not need time but operates in an instant, and therefore can be manifested not only through a trial of time but also through certain other signs. Indeed, sometimes other signs of present disposition manifest a change of will much better than experience of time; for those signs directly indicate the disposition of the penitent, but experience only indirectly: so much so that it can NOT RARELY happen that someone restrains himself from vices even for a long time for the respectability of this world (for example, that he may obtain absolution or be admitted to paschal Communion) ..., and nevertheless is not rightly disposed. Therefore, as often as the penitent brings true signs of sorrow and purpose, so often can he rightly be absolved. As regards these words, take care to observe that there are indeed some sins into which one falls from affection and with an affection tenaciously adhering to some unlawful object, for example, when from hatred and a desire for revenge someone detracts from his neighbor, wishes or even inflicts evils upon him, or when one ruinously coveting riches pursues unlawful gains, or desperately loves some woman with whom he has an adulterous relationship, etc.; and with these surely a discourse about a change of will fittingly occurs, since it ought to detest what it ardently loved.

But in many other sins, even if they are perpetrated from a certain habit, you would wrongly seek this affection toward the object of sin, as, for example, very often happens in sins of the tongue and frequently also in impurity. Hence it happens that a man indeed relapses again and again, yet not as though giving himself wholly to sin, but rather overcome by a certain sloth and frailty, at the same time accusing himself and soon repenting of the deed, now struggling against the vice, now succumbing to it through weakness, and always bearing the yoke of the vice in some manner unwillingly. Moreover, with one of this kind, as is evident, the matter concerns a will not so much to be changed as to be strengthened, so that he may become accustomed to watch more attentively if sins of the tongue are at issue, to resist more strongly if other vices are at issue, and to use suitable safeguards more diligently.

For the rest, since St. Alphonsus, when he requires extraordinary signs of disposition, appears finally to understand nothing other than what he has in the cited text, namely, some true sign of sorrow and purpose, so that he thinks one lacking some extraordinary sign (Practice of the Confessor, no. 71) to be designated in proposition 60 condemned by Innocent XI as one who merely declares orally that he is sorry and proposes correction, he will not with difficulty be reconciled in this respect with the common opinion of the Doctors and with the practice which the Supreme Pontiff and teacher of teachers, Leo XII, commends in the cited Constitution. For no one of the Doctors taught that one should be absolved who, as the Pontiff says, is prudently judged to lack the sense of sorrow and repentance by which he may be disposed to obtain grace in the Sacrament. Nor, again, does St. Alphonsus, as is evident from the cited text, contend that a delay of absolution is necessary so that the disposition even of a recidivist may either become sufficiently known if at first it appears doubtful, or may even be acquired if perhaps it appears altogether lacking to the penitent as he approaches. Indeed (loc. cit., no. 460), among the signs which he himself calls extraordinary, he also enumerates this: If the penitent, at the admonition of the Confessor, signifies that he has attained a new knowledge of his iniquity or of the danger of his damnation.

The method by which this end can be attained without the trial of deferred absolution, and at the same time the practice commended by the Supreme Pontiff Leo XII retained, you have set forth as clearly as briefly by Philip Mary Salvatori in the opuscule published several times at Rome with the title Practical Instruction for New Confessors; concerning this, however, see what we noted above at no. 519, p. 405. He deservedly affirms that, just as this method cannot be observed without labor, so it cannot be omitted by the Confessor without fault where it is needed; and the things which we brought forward above from the Constitution of Leo XII confirm this. Thus, as that pious and learned Author, most practiced in the ministry of hearing the confessions of men of this kind, observes (part 2, section 1), even if the penitent, either at first encounter or even during confession, furnishes no other indication among those which others have called extraordinary by which the Confessor may judge sufficiently concerning his disposition, nevertheless, when the confession has been completed not without the suitable assistance of a patient and gentle priest, if the latter undertakes efficaciously to place before the eyes of the penitent the gravity, deformity, and baseness of his sins and vices; then the most evil effects of sins, the harms, the detriment to the soul, the danger to eternal salvation, and the treasure of wrath accumulated by a disordered life, as well as the vain hope of consulting for himself when the hour of death is already at hand and the judgment of God is imminent; and then also if he suggests an easy way by which he can both meet these evils and enter upon the right way of salvation; if, moreover, he adds to these things that every penitent must seriously weigh that sacramental absolution obtains an effect corresponding to the dispositions of those confessing, and accordingly, just as it looses and cleanses one who sincerely repents, so it binds more tightly those who lack the sense of true repentance and heaps sacrilege upon their other sins; if, I say, the Confessor proposes all these and other things of this kind, and does so not with the zeal of one indignant but rather with the great charity of one who has compassion and solicitously desires the salvation of penitents, the praised Author deservedly concludes that it cannot happen that the penitent does not exhibit some sufficient sign of his mind. Therefore, to one who affirms that he acts sincerely and that he wishes to perform those things which the Confessor requires, the Confessor can with a safe conscience impart absolution, even if the penitent has previously given no other sign of his conversion.

The reason is that, since in these circumstances that testimony of the penitent cannot reasonably be attributed either to ignorance or to fraud, that which is like an axiom among all Theologians now avails: the penitent is to be believed both for himself and against himself. I said, not from fraud, because in the present case deceit has no end or cause, since it would merely turn to the destruction of the liar. Hence the distinction which St. Thomas notes between one speaking in confession about himself and about others (Opuscule 7, otherwise 12, question 6): In confession, the sinner confessing is to be believed both for himself and against himself; but he is in no way to be believed against another; otherwise an occasion of feigned confession and fraudulent defamation would be given to many. But, on the contrary, when the penitent speaks about himself, the holy Doctor thus intimates the reason (On IV Sentences, distinction 17, question 3, article 3, minor question 5, reply to objection 2): As regards this knowledge (namely, through the manifestation of confession), the priest cannot receive greater certainty than by believing the subject, BECAUSE THIS IS FOR THE RELIEF OF HIS OWN CONSCIENCE; hence in the forum of confession a man is believed both for himself and against himself.

And diligently observe those most weighty words of the holy Doctor: He cannot receive greater certainty than by believing the subject. And surely, does not the fact that Confessors with a safe conscience absolve penitents as though they had confessed integrally rest upon this one canon, although experience teaches that those who sacrilegiously conceal sins approach not infrequently? And even if someone wishes to follow the theory of extraordinary signs, can these not also be simulated? Indeed, is not the complaint frequent that Confessors are very often deceived by an appearance of piety and devotion fabricated by some for other ends? And yet who would for that reason rightly reproach Confessors? Or who will require Confessors, in order to guard against deceptions, to have faith in no one even when no prudent reason for denying faith is present? Would not the economy by which, according to the testimony of St. Thomas with all Theologians, the whole administration of this Sacrament is governed thus be overturned from its foundation?

Hence the Supreme Pontiff Leo XII, while commending the aforesaid practice in the cited Constitution, does not omit to censure those morose Confessors to whom (as he says) scarcely any signification of sorrow and purpose seems sufficient for them to think that they can absolve; and they think that they have at last adopted a safe counsel if they send men away to be absolved at another time.

Nor is St. Alphonsus to be said to dissent from these things or to require anything more; from him it will be useful to copy these words (book 6, no. 461): As regards our proposition, it suffices that the Confessor have a prudent probability concerning the disposition of the penitent and that, on the other hand, no prudent suspicion of indisposition stands in the way; otherwise scarcely anyone could be absolved, since whatever signs penitents give furnish only a probability of disposition, as Suarez rightly teaches, On Penance, disputation 32, section 2, no. 1, where he says that it is necessary and sufficient that the Confessor prudently and probably judge that the penitent is disposed. And this seems sufficiently expressed in the Roman Catechism, On Penance, no. 60, where it is said: If, after hearing the confession, the priest judges that neither diligence in enumerating the sins nor sorrow in detesting them was altogether lacking to the penitent, he can be absolved. Therefore, whenever it is not positively known to the Confessor that sorrow was altogether lacking to the penitent, he can absolve him. Hence the Author cited above, Instruction for New Confessors (namely, Giordanini), part 1, chapter 15, no. 360, speaks thus with Esparza: Whence we finally establish here the conclusion which is the key of this whole matter: nothing else is required for administering penance than a prudent probable judgment concerning the disposition of the penitent. Hence, if the circumstances do not found a prudent doubt that he is not sufficiently disposed, the Confessor ought not trouble himself or the penitent to have evidence of it, which is impossible. And to this conduces the text in chapter A nobis 2, On the Sentence of Excommunication, where it is said: The judgment of the Church sometimes follows an opinion which can both deceive and be deceived. Thus far St. Alphonsus.

Some are accustomed to be moved by this: that the facility of absolving which is introduced through this practice may produce a facility of relapsing into the same sins. To this objection a reply could indeed be made with the praised Salvatori (loc. cit.), whose words are these: I reply first: I too had heard it said thus and in speculation believed it, but practice undeceived me. I have not yet found one person of ruined life who cast himself headlong into wickedness because of ease found in Confessors; but I have found many who did so because of excessive harshness and difficulty in absolving. But then it must be altogether denied that there is a facility of absolving and a consequent facility of relapse when the Confessor, rather than freeing himself in a convenient manner by saying that he cannot absolve, whereby the penitent departs in the same and perhaps a worse state, as being indignant against both the priest and the Sacrament, undertakes immense labor himself and brings it about that the penitent is then absolved when, exhibiting sufficient signs of sincere and serious repentance, he furnishes a prudent hope that sacramental absolution will be salutary for him.

For the rest, it is not excluded by these things that absolution can sometimes be deferred, where the matter requires it, according to those things which we already noted above (at no. 621). Yet as regards this also, that which the Supreme Pontiff Leo XII warns in the cited Constitution is to be kept before the eyes: With whatever mind those who approach the Sacrament of Penance may come, nothing is more to be guarded against by him (the Confessor) than that anyone... depart hostile to the Sacrament of reconciliation.... Wherefore, if there is a just cause why absolution is to be deferred, let him persuade those confessing in words as humane as he can that both his office and duty and their own salvation altogether require this, and let him most gently allure them to return as soon as possible, so that, when those things which were salutarily prescribed have been faithfully performed, they may be loosed from the bonds of sins and refreshed by the sweetness of heavenly grace. And surely, whoever has any experience in receiving confessions will confess that what the praised Salvatori affirmed (loc. cit.) is most true; it is better to report it in his own words: And here I cannot refrain from saying something which, every time I remember it, makes my spirit shudder. Among the very many whom I encountered while hearing confessions in hospitals, or who had altogether withdrawn for many years from confession, or had made them incomplete and sacrilegious for many years,

I found in the greater part (and other Confessors told me they had observed the same) that the origin of this arose from the bad reception encountered with some Confessor.

 It has seemed proper here to satisfy certain doubts which the distinguished priest Aemilius Berardi raised concerning the things said above about Recidivists in the opuscule On Recidivists, Faenza, 1873.

1. The distinguished Berardi writes (pp. 6-7): Ballerini, Frassinetti, and Gury said some things pertinent to the matter so that they might open an easier way. But... concerning recidivists they do not determine the new facilities sufficiently openly, clearly, and precisely.

Reply. Setting aside for now the cause both of Frassinetti and of Gury, especially since the latter in this Compendium followed St. Alphonsus almost exactly as regards Recidivists, I would confidently say that it was never my intention to bring forward new facilities of this kind, both because I never held anything more important than to follow the well-worn ways of approved Doctors, and because, after the most exact studies of so many Doctors, it will indeed seem sufficiently difficult to bring forward anything new. But if anything in these Notes seemed new to some, you may say that this occurred per accidens, insofar as something was again brought to light from the most abundant treasury of our teachers which could seem new to some, especially after, from the past century, even in our Italy, many schools had been invaded by the works and doctrines, for example, of Gennetti, Witasse, Merbesius, Collet, Juvenin, Ludovicus Habert, Antoine, and others of this flour. To remedy these evils also, indeed especially, divine providence raised up Blessed Doctor Alphonsus.

2. The distinguished Berardi adds (p. 7): But what he (Ballerini) thinks concerning the benign opinion, which indeed concedes that recidivists can be absolved several times but afterward obliges absolution to be deferred for them unless they furnish some extraordinary sign, he does not declare sufficiently openly. On the one hand, he seems to exclude even then the obligation of deferring absolution, to deny the necessity of any extraordinary sign, and to reject the theory of extraordinary signs.... On the other hand, it seems altogether that he requires some extraordinary sign, namely, insofar as the penitent displays more manifest sorrow on account of a certain special admonition of the Confessor.

Reply. Ballerini thinks that which all think, or at least ought to think, namely: 1. that one who is not disposed cannot be absolved, and that one who appears disposed can be absolved; 2. that it is the office of the Confessor to discern whether or not the penitent brings disposition, that is, as the Council of Trent says, sorrow of mind and detestation of the sin committed with the purpose of not sinning for the future; this office is necessary both if the penitent is habitual and a recidivist and if he is not such; 3. that it is to be gathered from the circumstances in what manner the Confessor may become sufficiently certain concerning this disposition. For sometimes this disposition appears sufficiently from the character and state of the penitent or other circumstances; sometimes the Confessor will remain uncertain about it; sometimes he will discover that it is altogether lacking. In the first case, there is no reason why the Confessor should be further solicitous; in the second, he will employ means to dispel the doubt; in the third, he will undertake the care of rendering the indisposed penitent disposed, if it can be done, with divine grace.

But that some, for the sake of a certain clarity, have distinguished the indications from which disposition is inferred into ordinary and extraordinary, or into common and special, let it be so, provided that they propose the matter sufficiently clearly; for Gury, for example, Gury calls certain signs ordinary which St. Alphonsus judges extraordinary; and again, that which is ordinary in Peter will seem extraordinary in John; indeed, according to the diverse judgment of Confessors, that will happen to be extraordinary for one which will not even be approved as ordinary by another. The Constitution of Leo XII, concerning which above in the Note, censures morose Confessors of this kind. For the rest, the substance of the matter resides in this: that the Confessor, from wherever he finally draws the arguments for judgment, form that prudent judgment concerning the disposition of the penitent which St. Alphonsus also, as we intimated in this and the preceding Note, judged sufficient for absolving rightly. Whether these arguments or indications of disposition are to be called ordinary or extraordinary according to the theories of some may seem a question of lesser moment.

3. The distinguished Berardi asks (p. 8): What if, either on account of a defect of fervor in this admonition (of the Confessor), or however fervent it may be, the penitent never furnishes any special sign? Can he nevertheless always be absolved, or is there then a true obligation to dismiss him without absolution? What Ballerini thought is not sufficiently clear.

Reply. The solution of this doubt is easily gathered both from the text of Gury and from the appended Notes; namely, whenever the sufficient disposition of the penitent cannot be established, the norm which the most common doctrine hands down as to be observed with a doubtfully disposed penitent is at hand.

4. The distinguished Berardi adds (p. 29): All say, or manifestly suppose, that the Confessor not merely can by counsel, but is bound to defer absolution for recidivists unless they furnish some extraordinary sign. Therefore, the opinion of Ballerini does not seem accurate when he writes: You will find only the Salmanticenses who hand down as more probable that then it will be not only a salutary counsel to defer absolution, but the Confessor will be bound to it.

And on the same matter the distinguished man writes (p. 43): Father Ballerini makes another objection as follows: Ten theologians, that is, De Lugo, Sayrus, Bonacina, Toletus, etc., establish no obligation of deferring absolution for recidivists; indeed, they openly suppose that they can always be absolved. Then, after many things, he concludes (p. 48): Therefore, for manifold reason this objection of Father Ballerini also seems to fall.

And concerning the same matter the distinguished man had already premised (p. 10): Ballerini says that, if you except the Salmanticenses alone..., the other earlier theologians expressly affirm or manifestly suppose that the penitent can be absolved, and they propose the delay of absolution as merely useful, and therefore as to be admitted only from salutary counsel and only sometimes.

Reply. Those ten theologians are not brought forward by Ballerini against the practice of deferring absolution for recidivists who lack an extraordinary sign of sorrow, and much less to prove that recidivists of this kind can always be absolved. And, to speak plainly, it is somewhat difficult to understand how the distinguished Berardi or anyone else could persuade himself that this monstrosity of doctrine was handed down or defended by us. Indeed, according to them, if a recidivist bringing no extraordinary sign is not to be held as positively indisposed, he is at least to be judged one concerning whom it is not established whether he is disposed. But what reason do they bring forward that they do not hesitate to affirm that, according to the opinion of Ballerini, a recidivist concerning whom it is in no way established whether he is disposed can always be absolved? Indeed, who among theologians ever brought forward this prodigy of opinion? For we know indeed that this opinion was attributed to John Sanchez; but it was observed in the preceding Note that this was done erroneously, not to say through mere calumny.

For the rest, the purpose for which those ten theologians were brought forward is manifestly evident from the scope of that Note (Note to no. 621). There the discourse is expressly about a penitent rightly disposed; that the remedy of deferred absolution can usefully be employed with him so that he may be impelled to correct a depraved habit is confirmed by the authority of those ten theologians. Indeed, that the testimonies of the Doctors alleged there concern a rightly disposed penitent is proved there from the fact that they call the delay of absolution merely useful, not necessary. But that those Doctors, as the Note says in such express words, discuss A DISPOSED PENITENT is manifest from this: that they suggest a delay of absolution not as necessary but as merely useful, and from mere counsel, and as to be employed only sometimes. These words surely indicate sufficiently of themselves that according to us also a delay of absolution is necessary whenever the penitent is found less disposed or his disposition is not sufficiently established. But because the phrase extraordinary signs is not employed there to indicate a rightly disposed penitent, let the distinguished Berardi pardon us. First, this was not the place; second, let whoever wishes hold this phrase as necessary, so far as we are concerned. But let indulgence in turn be granted us, so that, since this manner of speaking did not seem necessary for so many centuries, no one be bound by this new theological law, much less understood wrongly if he uses another manner of speaking in accordance with the received custom of theologians.

5. Here perhaps the distinguished Berardi will observe that these ten theologians are brought into the discussion also in the Note immediately preceding this one, where the discourse concerns Recidivists.

Reply. This is most true. But at the same time it is true that those Doctors are alleged there, not indeed so that their opinion may be expounded concerning the manner of acting with recidivists or of judging their disposition, but only so that it may be shown that the holy Doctor Alphonsus alleged less pertinently these Doctors and those passages of theirs which had been brought forward by us in the Note to no. 621. Therefore, when the distinguished Berardi says, Ballerini says that, if you except the Salmanticenses alone..., the other earlier theologians expressly affirm or manifestly suppose that the penitent can be absolved, etc., this indeed expresses the sense which he seemed to himself able to attribute to Ballerini, but not the sense which either the words or the context of Ballerini's Notes bear.

Likewise, it is true, as the distinguished man has it, that when the contexts of the Notes are compared, the praised Doctors appear as opposed to the Salmanticenses. Indeed, because of the evidence of the fact, the matter could not be otherwise; for the Salmanticenses themselves (treatise 17, chapter 2, no. 170) openly profess that they depart from the opinion of those Doctors, which otherwise they call probable. Nevertheless, lest a sense less consonant with the truth be affixed to this opposition, the purpose on account of which mention is made in the preceding Note both of the aforesaid Doctors (no. 1) and of the Salmanticenses (no. 3) must be kept before the eyes. Namely, just as the sole end of bringing those Doctors upon the scene (no. 1) was to show that the opinion of the holy Doctor Alphonsus was one thing, but that of those Doctors whose allegations he himself indicated that he had taken from no. 168 of the cited passage of the Salmanticenses was another, so also the reason for discussing the Salmanticenses (no. 3) was that it might become manifest that the opinion of the holy Doctor differed also from the judgments of the Salmanticenses, from whom nevertheless he seems to have drawn his opinion. Moreover, from the fact that there seems to be exhibited there a different cause on account of which the doctrine of St. Alphonsus differs now from that of the praised Doctors and now from the opinion of the Salmanticenses, it surely does not follow that the reason for the opposition between those Doctors and the Salmanticenses is that which the distinguished man assigns. Indeed, there was no concern in the Note to add anything more about the question as the Salmanticenses treat it, since it in no way pertained to the purpose of the Note. But if it is examined, there will appear without difficulty both another reason for the aforesaid opposition and also the reason why the opinion of the Salmanticenses can be called altogether singular.

They namely institute the question (loc. cit., no. 167) concerning one who has the habit of perjuring or blaspheming, who approaches confession with sorrow for past things and FIRMLY PROPOSES correction for the future. Then (no. 168) they bring forward the first opinion, which is probable to them, that although it is a salutary counsel to defer absolution when such a delay is believed likely to profit, yet if the penitent approaches with sorrow and a FIRM PURPOSE, the Confessor can absolve him. In bringing forward the second opinion they add that the penitent not only can but ought to be absolved if he approaches with sorrow and the AFORESAID PURPOSE..., unless from some circumstance he judges that he does not have true sorrow.

But do not these things display that state of the penitent which, as we have seen, St. Alphonsus also judged sufficient so that he can be absolved? Does not the allegation of Suarez, Sanchez, Palaus, etc., who are brought forward as judging that the penitent is sufficiently disposed so that he can be absolved, confirm this very thing? Does not the allegation of the second opinion also persuade this, where John Sanchez is brought forward as contending against the authors of the first opinion that absolution is never to be deferred, because the grace of the Sacrament profits more than a delay of absolution? Finally, do not the Salmanticenses themselves concede that this penitent can be absolved if some extrinsic reason seems to require it? Therefore, the opposition between the Salmanticenses and the Authors from whom they depart is not to be understood in such a sense as though the latter were judged to have thought that even a penitent whose sufficient disposition is not established can be absolved. Rather, when the whole context is considered, it is easy to conclude that the Salmanticenses declined somewhat toward a doctrine more severe than even that of St. Alphonsus himself, insofar as they required singular signs of sorrow where the penitent could already be recognized as sufficiently disposed. Nevertheless, it cannot be denied that certain elements are mingled there, which is not new in this work, and these leave complete coherence in that accumulation of matters to be desired.

For the rest, the greater good of the penitent must always be considered; thus very well St. Ligorius, no. 459. Concina (chapter 10, no. 24) says: That you may avoid the sin of erring, if you see that by two or three absolutions you can cure the sick person, be rich in mercy. The correction of the sinner is a safer norm than all rules for either imparting or denying absolution.

638. Questions. - QUESTION 1. When is a habit judged to have been contracted?

Reply 1. This cannot be determined by a general rule, because some contract a greater facility toward a certain sin by a few acts, for example, three or four, than others do by committing it more frequently; hence neither is one who has sinned many times in a certain kind always to be held habitual, nor is one who has begun to sin three or four times always to be held non-habitual. Reply 2. Generally speaking, a sin repeated more frequently in a short time more easily induces a habit of it than if it were repeated the same number of times over a longer interval of time. - St. Ligorius, Practice of the Confessor, no. 70.

639. ○ QUESTION 2. What are the extraordinary signs of sorrow?

Reply. The following are commonly listed: 1. if the penitent has employed a much greater effort than before to correct himself, or if he has been notably corrected; a fortiori, if he has now wholly changed his life for the better; 2. if he confesses with great shame a sin long concealed; 3. if he has used more diligently the remedies prescribed by the Confessor;

4. if he has undertaken a long journey in order to make confession properly; 5. if he urgently requests to make a general confession or wishes to repeat the greater part of the sins of his past life; 6. if he was induced to confess by an extraordinary motive, namely, by a sermon heard, the death of some friend, etc.; 7. if he confesses with great humility and with words redolent of compunction of heart, at least ordinarily; 8. if he spontaneously asserts that he wishes altogether to avoid sin despite every inconvenience; a fortiori, if he says that he would rather die than sin; 9. if he gives forth sighs or groans, or sheds tears, at least ordinarily; 10. not rarely even spontaneous confession can be held as an extraordinary sign of sorrow, especially in those young men and men who must overcome themselves and human fear in order to approach confession.

640. ○ QUESTION 3. Can absolution be denied to an habitual sinner who refuses to confess several times in the year?

Reply. No, per se, if he appears sufficiently disposed from another source; because there is no precept of confessing several times in the year, and there are other means which can be enjoined for conquering the habit. Such persons are rather to be induced gently and firmly to approach more frequently, for example, on the feast of Pentecost, of the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, of the Nativity of the Lord, etc.

QUESTION 4. What is to be done with those who confess immediately before contracting matrimony and who hitherto have been addicted to a depraved habit?

Reply 1. If they have been accustomed to sin with each other, they can be absolved more easily; for the occasion will cease through matrimony.

Reply 2. The difficulty is greater if the depraved habit arises from another source; nevertheless, it is more expedient to absolve such persons, at least conditionally, than to dismiss them unabsolved, unless their indisposition is certainly established [9].

[9] A question of this kind and the solution added savor of the theory which not even the Author himself approves, namely, of those who define every habitual sinner a priori as indisposed and incapable of absolution. Those things which the Author premised above (from no. 633) also conflict with this theory. The certain doctrine of the Catholic schools is that any penitent, whether habitual or not, cannot be absolved if he does not appear disposed, but can be absolved if he furnishes sufficient indications of true repentance. And since in the case a delay of absolution induces grave inconvenience, when he appears sufficiently disposed he not only can but ought to be absolved without delay.

Point III. On Devout Penitents

The Confessor is appointed not only to absolve sinners, but also to direct souls in the way of perfection; for the Lord repeats to all Confessors what he formerly said to Jeremiah: Behold, I have appointed you over the nations, that you may root out and destroy, build and plant.

General Rules of Direction

641. Rule I. - Before all things, let the Confessor strive to perceive the intimate movements and condition of the souls of penitents, so that he may be able to accommodate instruction to their capacity and nature; for not all are to be led by the same spirit, nor are all to be governed in one manner. - See St. Ligorius, Practice of the Confessor, no. 99 and following.

Rule II. Let him lead penitents to perfection by degrees and in an orderly manner, so that they first strive to attain the first degree of virtue before they contend for the highest; for example, let them first learn to act with a right intention [1] and to perform ordinary actions rightly before they think upon higher things; let them first learn to bear light things patiently before they desire grave things; let them first learn to suffer with an even mind before they wish to rejoice in adversities [2].

[1] Understand a right intention negatively, that is, that they not add a disordered end to actions good from their object. For if you understand a right end, that the action may please God, be done for the love of God, etc., you have not the first or lowest degree of virtue but the highest, which resides in the exercise of perfect charity.

[2] Observe nevertheless that saying: The Spirit breathes where he wills; moreover, some, God thus permitting, are infected with defects while otherwise they abound in great gifts of God and solid fruit of virtues.

Rule III. Let him teach all that the perfection of each consists in this: that they perform ordinary works well; for example, that they pray well, assist at Mass, exercise themselves in labors, take bodily refreshment in the manner which is fitting, converse blamelessly with their neighbor, and finally rightly discharge all the things incumbent upon them from their office and state.

642. Rule IV. - Let him opportunely test penitents professing devotion, so that he may observe by what spirit they are led, whether of God or of the world, of love or of fear, and what affection is predominant in them, which must first be mortified. Nevertheless, not all are to be tested and treated in the same manner, but caution and discretion are needed. Thus those who are prone to sadness are to be received more kindly, lest they fall into dejection of spirit; souls as yet tender, whom God first conciliates to himself, are also to be treated more gently; but if souls are nobler or stronger, or have extraordinary benefits of God, a certain severity is to be joined to gentleness. But let the Confessor take care that the test not be open [3]; otherwise it profits nothing.

[3] Let him take care especially that he use tests of this kind more than sparingly and very rarely. For occasions of recognizing the spirit by which penitents are led will offer themselves spontaneously a hundred times.

Rule V. Let him not impose, indeed, where there is need, let him moderate extraordinary penances; but let him so instruct souls that they themselves spontaneously request them. Nor is trust to be placed in the spirit of those who are discovered studiously pursuing extraordinary things, unless certain signs are present that they are led by divine impulse. If someone is observed to be tenacious of his own judgment in matters to be done, he is to be corrected gently [4].

[4] Whether one is to deal gently with a person tenacious of his own judgment or not seems rather to be determined from his character and circumstances after these have been perceived. This surely is of the greatest importance: that the Confessor remedy this vice altogether efficaciously. For tenacity of judgment will with difficulty be reconciled with that perfect obedience without which scarcely any progress in true virtue can be hoped for and the danger of a grave fall also is not feared in vain. On this matter St. Ignatius Loyola (Letter on the Virtue of Obedience, section 11) fittingly brings forward the words of Cassian (conference 2 of Abbot Moses, chapter 11): By no other vice does the devil draw and lead a monk so precipitously to death as when, after the counsels of his elders have been neglected, he persuades him to trust in his own judgment, decision, and doctrine.

Rule VI. Let him take care that those who can approach sacred Communion frequently confess every week or at least twice in the month [5].

[5] At the same time, however, let him take care that, if perhaps persons of this kind cannot approach confession at stated times, they do not for that reason abstain also from Holy Communion.

See more in St. Ligorius, Practice of the Confessor.

Article II. On the Office of the Minister After Confession

There is a twofold obligation of the Confessor after confession: 1. per accidens, as regards repairing defects committed; 2. per se, as regards keeping the seal.

§ I. On the Obligation of Correcting Defects Committed in Confession

643. Principles. - I. An error concerning the validity of the Sacrament committed with grave fault or grave negligence, supposing grave harm to the penitent [1], must be repaired even with grave inconvenience to the Confessor. The reason is that the Confessor, from his office and from the quasi-contract entered into with the penitent, is bound to administer the Sacrament rightly to him. But if the error is inculpable or lightly culpable, the Confessor is indeed bound from justice [2], but with lesser inconvenience. - St. Ligorius, no. 619.

[1] Grave harm or danger to the penitent would be present if, for example, you absolved altogether invalidly or in no manner a sick person near death who would for that reason incur danger to eternal salvation; or also, as St. Alphonsus says (no. 619), if the penitent were in grave danger of not confessing again, for example, while he undertakes a long sea journey. But this grave harm to the penitent would be absent when, even if the Confessor absolves beyond his faculties from reserved censures and sins, or imparted absolution altogether invalidly or in no manner, nevertheless, in the first case the reserved sins would also have been indirectly remitted to the penitent in good faith, as we suppose, while in the other cases a remedy would not be lacking either in the reception of the Eucharist, which per accidens, according to the common doctrine with St. Thomas, would confer first grace upon a man having attrition, or in a subsequent confession with another priest, by which even the preceding sins would be indirectly remitted, no differently than happens with sins omitted through forgetfulness.

But when that grave danger threatens the penitent, and accordingly the Confessor must admonish the penitent in order to repair the error, there are some who say generally that permission must be sought from him, because according to the common opinion the seal forbids the priest to speak, even with the penitent himself after a completed confession, about matters heard in it, etc.; and if the penitent refuses permission, nothing remains to be done by the Confessor. But St. Alphonsus (no. 622) deservedly excepts the case of absolution imparted either in no manner or invalidly. The reason is that, when the Confessor merely says, for example, that he did not absolve him, surely neither shame is cast upon the penitent nor does any reproach of sin intervene, and accordingly the reason why the penitent would be unwilling and the confession would thereby be rendered burdensome is absent. These are the causes why a priest, spontaneously mixing conversation with the penitent about things heard from him in Confession, is judged to act against the seal. For the rest, in the case the Confessor would not be bound to acknowledge that he culpably erred; it would suffice to say that an error intervened, or even more simply that it is necessary for him to absolve him again. But if the penitent, not yet admonished, returns to the same Confessor, it will not even be necessary to admonish him concerning the error; for if he is excited to sorrow for all the sins previously confessed also, the present absolution will be directly terminated also to the preceding sins.

[2] St. Alphonsus, whom the Author alleges in this place, prefers that a Confessor who has erred inculpably is bound only from charity, unless he is the pastor of the penitent. But, as seems truer to others, the priest indeed hears the confession from charity; nevertheless, after the confession has been heard, he is bound from justice to complete the Sacrament, because he is bound from his office, however spontaneously undertaken, and from a certain quasi-contract. This condition of the Confessor remains the same even if he has erred without fault. Therefore, according as the error was culpable or inculpable, the obligation of the Confessor will differ, not because it presses now from justice and now from charity, but only as the obligation of keeping another unharmed differs according as harm is inflicted through a formal injury or a merely material one; or also as the obligation of restoring a thing unjustly taken away differs from the obligation of seeking the owner of a thing which someone found by chance. For the latter indeed undertakes the care of the thing from charity, but after this care has been undertaken he is bound, not from charity but from justice, to guard the thing and, as the circumstances require, to seek its owner.

 The VV., about to defend the holy Doctor Alphonsus, construct nearly eight columns (pp. 621-624) against this Note. Thus, therefore, they argue (p. 623): If someone gratuitously received a deposit from mere charity, he nevertheless is bound from justice to preserve and guard the thing with that diligence with which diligent men are accustomed to preserve and guard things of this kind.... But if, after the aforesaid diligence has been employed, the thing perishes or deteriorates without any fault, he is bound to nothing at all from the title of justice. And concerning the example proposed in the Note they add: After he has received the thing found, though from mere charity, into his deposit and care, he is bound from justice not only to seek the owner, as the circumstances require, but also to guard the thing with ordinary diligence; but if the thing perishes or deteriorates without fault on his part, and afterward the owner claims it, he is bound to nothing. And from these things they conclude: Therefore, there is no obligation from the title of justice for a Confessor who has erred inculpably to repair the harm. But if the Confessor is nevertheless bound, he is bound only from charity, and indeed from that general law of charity by which we are obliged to assist our neighbor and to avert temporal and spiritual harms from him insofar as this can be done without grave inconvenience.

Reply. I deny the Supposition and accordingly the parity; and from this I deny the Consequent and the Consequence. The supposition is that through the error of the Confessor the matter has been brought into such a state that it cannot be repaired through those means to which the same Confessor is bound from his office, just as provision cannot be made through that diligence to which a depositary is bound for a thing deposited which has already perished without the fault of the depositary. But that this is manifestly false appears from the very state of the question. For if the error of the Confessor is supposed irreparable, it is wrongly disputed whether he is bound to correct it from justice or only from charity. Moreover, St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 619) affirms that the Confessor is bound from charity to amend his error. Therefore, the question does not concern a thing reduced to such a condition that it can be compared with a deposited thing which has already perished.

In its own manner, a somewhat more fitting comparison would be with a depositary who through an inculpable error perhaps sold or gave away the thing deposited, or placed it in a place in which he afterward observed that it would perhaps perish or suffer harm. Let the question then be posed: Would this man be bound from charity alone, or rather from justice, to recover the thing perhaps sold or given away, if it can be done, or to remove the thing from the place in which it would suffer harm? And still more clearly to our matter: Would the diligence to which the depositary is bound from justice require that, in the hypothesis, he take care to recover the thing handed over to another, or remove it from a harmful place, or would we call this an office of mere charity? Let it therefore be concluded that the VV. deduced a false consequence from an incongruous parity.

Nor, indeed, was St. Alphonsus led by such a parity or argument when he asserted that in the hypothesis the Confessor is obliged from charity alone to admonish the penitent concerning an error committed by himself. The holy Doctor (loc. cit.) seems to have used this reasoning: the obligation in the case does not press under grave inconvenience; therefore the Confessor is bound from charity alone. Yet none of the Doctors whom St. Alphonsus alleges there reasons thus. For all derive the obligation of admonishing from the office of the Confessor, however much they add that in the hypothesis it does not press with great detriment or inconvenience. De Lugo explains the matter well (On Penance, disputation 22, no. 62), whom St. Alphonsus also alleges:

Everyone (De Lugo says) is bound FROM JUSTICE not only not to inflict evil directly and purposely upon his neighbor, but also to take care, insofar as he CONVENIENTLY CAN, that harm contrary to the right of his neighbor does not arise from his action; for example, if you inadvertently set fire to another's house, you are bound from justice, as soon as you notice it, to extinguish the fire if you can conveniently do so, although another who did not set the fire would be bound not from justice but from charity to extinguish it. For although the action was inculpable, it was nevertheless yours, and you are bound to take care that your neighbor suffer no detriment in his own goods from your action, if you conveniently can; for this obligation is lesser than that other obligation of not harming positively, and therefore you are not bound to this unless you can conveniently prevent it. Likewise, if in good faith you defamed someone, thinking that the crime which you had heard about him was true, you ought afterward, if you conveniently can, once the error is known, to repair his reputation and extinguish the fire of reputation which you had inculpably kindled. But the same De Lugo (loc. cit.) had excellently premised this principle, namely, when the error happens without grave fault: Then, he says, according to the rule established above it must be said that he ought, if he conveniently can, to admonish the penitent concerning the error; OTHERWISE THE IGNORANCE OF THE PENITENT WILL NOW BEGIN TO BE IMPUTED TO HIM.

II. An error concerning the accidents of the Sacrament is not to be repaired outside confession if the Confessor conducted himself in this matter only negatively, even culpably. The reason is that the Confessor is not bound to procure the integrity of the Sacrament and the utility of the penitent except in confession, as a spiritual physician and minister of the Sacrament. But an error is to be repaired even outside confession if it was committed positively and with grave fault, because by natural law everyone must remove the cause of evil which he positively and voluntarily placed [3]. Nevertheless, the permission of the penitent must be sought; if the penitent denies it, the Confessor is bound to nothing further. - St. Ligorius, no. 620.

[3] That the Author seems to require for the obligation of admonishing outside confession that the error was committed with grave fault appears indeed to be against the more common opinion of the Doctors. They (see De Lugo, On Penance, disputation 22, no. 63, and St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 620) concede only that one who has erred to the harm of the penitent without fault or with light fault is excused from giving the admonition by a lighter cause than if the error proceeded from grave fault. In this matter, there are moreover to be weighed, on the one hand, the inconvenience and detriment of the Confessor in admonishing, as well as whatever burden there may be to the penitent in renewing a discourse about the matter of confession, and, on the other hand, the harm or danger to be feared from the error. This can be lighter, if, for example, the Confessor erroneously said that the penitent is not bound to fast or to hear Mass and things of this kind; or graver, if, for example, the Confessor so deceived the penitent that he remains in a proximate occasion, or does not remove a scandal, or contracts an invalid marriage, etc.

III. There will be no obligation to admonish outside confession if the defect concerns the integrity of confession, because this error can scarcely, or not even scarcely, harm the penitent or others [4]. - Thus commonly.

[4] Some distinction seems to be employed here. For it is one thing if the Confessor merely did not take care that the confession be integral; it is another, as De Lugo says (On Penance, disputation 22, no. 73), if he was the positive cause why the penitent did not confess integrally, saying, for example, that it was not necessary to confess the species or number of sins. In the first case, the doctrine of the Author avails; concerning this see Suarez (On Penance, disputation 32, section 6, no. 8). In the other case, those things which were said in the preceding note rather have place. Yet there are two things which seem to diminish this obligation of admonishing outside confession. One is that in the following confession another Confessor will ask both the species and the number and will instruct the penitent who perhaps hesitates on account of the error with which he had been imbued, and accordingly will correct the error; and from this the necessity of admonition ceases. The other is the fact that in the case an admonition, from the nature of the matter, which necessarily concerns grave sins, introduces a discourse about them and thereby brings great shame to the penitent; and for this reason his offense can deservedly be feared. Hence a fortiori that which St. Alphonsus (no. 619) had observed concerning the omission of an admonition in the case of invalid absolution avails: for in our case more than in that case this offense and burden to the penitent arise of themselves.

644. Questions. - QUESTION 1. To what is a Confessor bound who improperly released a penitent from making restitution, or, on the contrary, obliged him to it?

Reply 1. If from malice, vincible ignorance, or grave negligence he improperly released the penitent, he is bound to correct the error; and if he does not correct it, or if the penitent, who otherwise would have made restitution, has meanwhile become unable to make restitution, the Confessor himself is bound to make restitution in his place, because he violated the right of the creditor, namely, by impeding the restitution owed to him.

Reply 2. Likewise, if from malice or grave ignorance or negligence he obliged the penitent to undue restitution, he is bound from justice to retract the error; and if the penitent has already made restitution, he is bound to compensate him for the harm.

Reply 3. If inculpably or from light negligence he improperly obliged the penitent or released him from the obligation, he is bound from justice to correct the error, but not with so grave an inconvenience. The reason is that, on the one hand, everyone is bound from justice to prevent his own action, even an inculpable one, from causing another a harm which he can easily prevent; and, on the other hand, an obligation with grave inconvenience does not ordinarily arise from light fault or merely material fault. - St. Ligorius, no. 621.

645. ○ QUESTION 2. To what is a Confessor bound who omitted to admonish a penitent concerning restitution to be made?

Reply 1. If he foresees the harm, he is bound to admonish the penitent concerning the obligation with some inconvenience, if no fault or only light fault intervened, at least by reason of charity; but with greater inconvenience if he sinned gravely in the omission. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 624.

Reply 2. More probably, he is not bound to make restitution, even if he sinned gravely by omitting the admonition. The reason is that the Confessor is not bound from justice to prevent harm to the one to whom restitution is owed. Recall the things said in the Treatise on Justice and Right, where negative cooperators are discussed, no. 691. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

646. ○ QUESTION 3. Is one bound to restitution who from only light fault released a penitent from the obligation of making restitution, if he afterward neglects to admonish him when he can easily do so?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that, although the Confessor released the penitent from restitution without at least grave fault, nevertheless, since his counsel continues to influence the harm of the creditor, once the error is known he is bound from justice to remove the cause of the harm, if he can easily do so. - St. Ligorius, no. 622, and others commonly.

QUESTION 4. Can a Confessor, without the permission of the penitent, speak with him outside confession about a defect committed in confession?

Reply. No, if the penitent has already departed. The reason is that this admonition outside confession is burdensome to the penitent. Moreover, after absolution the judgment is complete; nor does it matter that the admonition is made to repair a defect of the same confession. - St. Ligorius, no. 622; Lacroix, no. 1776, etc. Nevertheless, if the error of the Confessor brings the penitent into danger of salvation, for example, if he had not absolved him, he could, even without permission being sought, disclose his error abruptly by saying, for example, that he had not absolved him. Surely in this way neither is the seal broken nor can a reasonable offense of the penitent be present. - St. Ligorius, no. 619.

§ II. On the Seal of Confession

The seal of confession is the religious obligation of preserving secrecy concerning those things which are known from sacramental confession.

We must treat: 1. of the obligation of the seal; 2. of the subject of the seal; 3. of the object of the seal; 4. of the various ways of violating it.

Point I. On the Obligation of the Seal

647. Principles. - I. There is the strictest obligation of preserving the seal of confession inviolably. This is established: 1. from natural law, and indeed under the title both of justice and of religion; 2. from positive divine law, at least implicitly, for from the institution of Christ confession must be secret; therefore by that very fact the obligation of preserving the seal was imposed upon Confessors by Christ; 3. from ecclesiastical law, as is established from several passages of canon law, especially from the Fourth Lateran Council, chapter 21, Omnis utriusque sexus, where it is said: But let the Confessor take every care not in any way to betray the sinner by word or sign or in any other manner; but if he should need more prudent counsel, let him seek it cautiously without any expression of the person.

II. The obligation of the seal of confession always presses in every case, so that in no possible case is it lawful to reveal anything heard and received in confession. The reason is manifestly evident, because if some exception could be given, men would always fear that such a sin might be that cause for licitly breaking the seal, and consequently the Sacrament would become odious. Moreover, no cause of obtaining a good or avoiding an evil can compensate for this evil of hatred of the Sacrament. - See St. Ligorius, no. 634.

III. The obligation of the seal arises from every and only sacramental confession, namely, one which is made with the intention of accusing oneself and obtaining absolution. It is said, first, from every, because then the whole reason of the precept is present; and this avails even if absolution was not conferred for any cause whatever, since the confession is made in order that absolution may sometime be received. It is said, second, from only, because sacramental confession alone introduces the obligation of the seal, since any other manifestation has no relation to the Sacrament of Penance. - St. Ligorius, no. 536, etc.

648. Resolutions. - 1. A confession knowingly made to a layman or to a priest lacking jurisdiction does not introduce the obligation of the seal, but only that of natural secrecy. It would have to be said otherwise if the priest were believed approved, because the confession on the part of the penitent is truly sacramental.

2. If someone approaches a Confessor with the intention of deceiving him, mocking him, drawing him into sin, or extorting something from him, he does not accuse himself in order to the Sacrament, and consequently there is no obligation of the sacramental seal.

3. If someone opens his conscience to a Confessor without the will of receiving absolution, but in order to obtain counsel or to satisfy in some manner the command of a Superior, only the obligation of natural secrecy presses, because this is not done in order to absolution.

649. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is there slightness of matter in a violation of the seal?

Reply. No, at least in direct revelation. The reason is that even the slightest matter includes the whole reason of the precept. - St. Ligorius, no. 635.

I said, at least in direct revelation, because if the danger of indirect revelation is very remote or little probable, lightness of matter can be given. For if some revelation should then perhaps follow, it would have to be judged to follow by chance and per accidens.

650. ○ QUESTION 2. Is it lawful to use a probable opinion in the matter of the seal?

Reply. No, because it is not lawful to use a probable opinion to the prejudice of a certain right which another possesses, etc. Therefore, the Confessor is bound to the seal even in doubt whether something was said by the penitent in order to confession. - St. Ligorius, no. 633 [1].

[1] It will be useful to add here what Diana has on this matter (volume 1, treatise 8, at the beginning), in the proem to the Treatise on the Sacramental Seal: Perhaps you will wonder (he says), friendly reader, that in the following Treatise I always embrace the stricter opinions, although in other matters I have willingly adhered to more benign opinions for relieving consciences. But I judged that this should deservedly be done. For lax opinions concerning the present matter render the Sacrament of Penance odious and burdensome, which every right reason demands should be rendered easy and light by us. Therefore, in these matters, when two opinions are present, that one must always be chosen which favors the Sacrament, to whose most holy tribunal penitents are to be attracted rather than withdrawn. Add that, although speculatively speaking many of the opinions written below against the sacred seal are probable, nevertheless, as the opposing Doctors themselves concede, when they are reduced to practice without sin, one must proceed with such great circumspection that they judge it can scarcely be done without some scandal. Therefore, I rightly think that in this matter Confessors must always hold in favor of the sacred seal.

QUESTION 3. What should a Confessor reply to one asking about things heard in confession or about absolution imparted?

Reply. As regards the first, let him reply, even with an oath interposed if there is need, that he knows nothing or has heard nothing, because he has no communicable knowledge. - Thus all.

As regards the second, let him reply: I have discharged my office; or, Are such questions to be asked? - St. Ligorius, Apostolic Man, no. 148.

Point II. On the Subject of the Seal

651. Principles. - I. Every Confessor is primarily bound to the seal, whether true or fictitious and by error believed legitimate, and consequently even a layman who should pretend to be a priest and hear confession. The reason is that whenever someone confesses in order to the Sacrament, whoever hears him contracts by that very fact the obligation of the seal; otherwise hatred of the Sacrament would follow from it. - Thus all.

II. Those are secondarily bound who become participants in the confession, or all those to whom knowledge of the confession comes in any manner, whether from the confession itself or from means ordered to it. It is said, first, from the confession itself, for the matter accused comes to their knowledge on the same occasion; therefore the same cause on account of which the obligation of the seal is given is present, namely, lest hatred of the Sacrament be created. It is said, second, from the means, for hatred of the means redounds upon the end itself.

Hence the following are bound to the seal: 1. interpreters employed in making confession [1]; 2. Superiors from whom outside the Sacrament the faculty of absolving, or of receiving absolution from a reserved case, is sought; 3. those who hear the sin while someone confesses, whether deliberately or even inculpably, and likewise if others should perhaps hear it from them; 4. those who write the confession of the uneducated or of those ignorant of the language of the Confessor [2], especially if confession cannot be made in another manner; 5. Doctors consulted by the Confessor with the permission of the penitent; 6. all those to whom the Confessor sacrilegiously or imprudently manifested sins heard in confession. - St. Ligorius, nos. 647 and 648.

[1] Namely, if someone spontaneously wishes to confess through an interpreter; for, as was said elsewhere, no one is ever bound to this.

[2] Of these also that which was said about employing an interpreter avails, namely, that no obligation to use these means is present.

652. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is the penitent also obliged by the seal with respect to the Confessor?

Reply 1. He is not bound to the sacramental seal, because the obligation of the seal is only in favor of the penitent.

Reply 2. But he is bound to natural secrecy concerning those things which he cannot reveal without unjust harm to the Confessor, or contrary to his reasonable will, or without injury and contempt of the Sacrament. - St. Ligorius, no. 647.

QUESTION 2. Can the Confessor speak with the penitent concerning the latter's confession?

Reply 1. He can speak in confession about all past confessions [3].

[3] Understand this if some grave cause requires it. For even within confession, unless a long habit of confessing to the same priest has introduced a certain familiarity between him and the penitent, it is ordinarily burdensome to penitents that the memory of sins which they confessed at other times be renewed. Indeed, it is still less profitable, nor is it pleasing to penitents, that after a long time the Confessor appear mindful of old sins; and, on the contrary, it is profitable that the Confessor, as a minister of God, display in himself what is said of the Lord God himself: You have cast all my sins behind your back (Isaiah 38:17); and, He will cast all our sins into the depths of the sea (Micah 7:19); and, I will remember their sins and iniquities no more (Hebrews 10:17).

Reply 2. He can also speak after absolution before the penitent has departed, or if he afterward returns. The reason is that, although the Sacrament is complete, the judgment nevertheless still morally continues.

Reply 3. Outside the sacred tribunal he cannot speak even one word with him, without the penitent's permission, concerning those things which pertain to his confession. Except the case in which the penitent himself first speaks about his conscience [4]. - St. Ligorius, no. 651.

[4] That is, if he speaks of those things which were the matter of confession; for not every discourse introduced by the penitent about matters of his conscience grants the faculty of speaking about all the things heard from him in confession. Indeed, the Confessor ought not go beyond the matter about which the penitent spoke.

653. ○ QUESTION 3. Is one who reads a paper on which the penitent wrote his confession bound to the seal?

Reply 1. No, per se. The reason is that this is not a means ordered of itself to confession and therefore does not of itself induce the obligation of the sacramental seal, but only of natural secrecy. Nevertheless, this presses per se under grave sin unless the matter concerns the slightest faults. - St. Ligorius, no. 650.

Reply 2. Per accidens the obligation of the seal can be present if the paper were or had been a necessary means for confession; for example, if it were written by a mute person or directed to a Superior on account of some reservation [5]; likewise if the paper had already been handed to the priest; but especially if someone were to read it while it is in the hand of the Confessor or in the act of confession, or if it had been lost by the Confessor himself [6], because in these cases it pertains to confession. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

[5] It was already observed elsewhere that no one, not even a mute person, is bound to write; and if the Superior who can grant the faculty for reserved cases is absent, it was already said elsewhere that the penitent can confess to another, by whom he may be directly absolved from the non-reserved sins, and thus the reserved sins also be indirectly remitted.

[6] Cardinal De Lugo, from whom these things were taken, does not limit the case to a paper lost by the Confessor himself, but says generally (On Penance, disputation 23, no. 48): Indeed, even if after absolution someone found it in the confessional, it seems probable that he would be bound to the seal, because it seems to be the confession itself remaining. But it can be left in the confessional also by the penitent, whether he received it back after it had been read by the Confessor, and by the best counsel the Confessor will always return the paper to the penitent, or whether the penitent confessed from the writing. Wherefore it seems that the canon discussed above at no. 650, question 2, must also be employed here.

654. ○ QUESTION 4. Is a Doctor consulted by the penitent himself bound to the seal of confession?

Reply. No, at least more probably, if he is consulted concerning a confession to be made to another; but he is bound only to natural secrecy. The reason is that the obligation of the seal arises from sacramental confession alone, in which the penitent manifests sins in order to absolution. - St. Ligorius, no. 549; Suarez, disputation 33, section 4; Billuart, dissertation 8, article 3, against some who therefore affirm it because revelation would render confession odious. But, as St. Ligorius deservedly replies, not confession itself but the consultation would become odious.

I said above, if he is consulted concerning a confession to be made to another, because if the penitent consults him concerning a confession to be made to that same man, he is bound by the seal, since this consultation must be held as a confession begun.

Point III. On the Object of the Seal

655. Principles. - I. The object of the seal is all sins confessed [1], and all things which pertain to the individual explanation of the sins. The reason is that the reason of the seal presses not only for the sins but also for all those things which assist in explaining them; and, moreover, these constitute one thing with the sins.

[1] It is certain (De Lugo says, disputation 23, no. 50) that all mortal sins, and indeed venial sins also, are matter of the seal, yet with this distinction: mortal sins not only in species but also in genus; but venial sins in species and not in genus. For the Confessor can say: This man confessed his venial sins to me. For by the very fact that he confessed, he is supposed to have confessed venial sins; wherefore, just as he can say that the man confessed, so he can say that he confessed venial sins and received penance for them.

II. The object of the seal is also whatever was manifested in confession whose revelation would turn to the burden of the penitent and to hatred of the Sacrament, because the seal was introduced lest the faithful be withdrawn from the Sacrament of Penance by fear of revelation.

656. Resolutions. - The following fall under the seal of confession:

1. All circumstances of sins, even those declared after absolution, for they are morally one with the sins already accused; indeed, the same is to be said even if it were doubtful whether the circumstances were declared in order to confession or not.

2. The sins of an accomplice, even if they were revealed together with the sin without necessity, because they were said from the intrinsic occasion of confession.

3. Penance imposed, unless perhaps it is very light or one of those which are customarily imposed for the slightest faults. - St. Ligorius, no. 604 and following.

4. Defects manifested through confession in order to explain the nature of a sin; for example, if a penitent says that he received sacred Orders with an irregularity because he is illegitimate, etc. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

657. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Do the virtues and scruples of a penitent fall under the seal?

Reply as to the first. No, per se, unless a burden to the penitent or to others follows from it [2].

[2] To this also pertain extraordinary gifts of God and charisms. As De Lugo judges (On Penance, disputation 23, no. 58), and after him St. Alphonsus (no. 642) with others, they can become matter of the seal at least indirectly when they are manifested in order better to declare the malice of one's own sin on account of ingratitude. Diana, however (volume 1, treatise 8, resolution 19), thinks that this rarely has place; but he agrees with De Lugo that the penitent can bind the Confessor under natural secrecy to conceal these virtues and gifts. For the rest, the reason brought forward why virtues and gifts can become matter of the sacramental seal does not seem to have great force.

 At the final words of this Note the VV. write (p. 643, in the Note): Nevertheless, Father B. must concede that the same (reason) is at least probable and therefore cannot licitly be rejected or neglected by the Confessor.

Reply. According to all, and also St. Alphonsus, some reason, in order to produce the probability of an opinion, must be grave and solid. Moreover, in the case, although from the revelation of extraordinary gifts someone could conjecture that those gifts were manifested by the penitent not only for the sake of direction but also to declare his own malice and ingratitude, what indeed will you find in this which in some manner pertains to the seal of confession? Let someone conjecture, so be it, that perhaps the penitent on account of those gifts was affected by more intense sorrow for his sins. But since penitents enriched with gifts of this kind are accustomed to conceive the most intense sorrow even for the slightest defects, what at length does that conjecture imply which can be referred to a violation of the sacramental seal?

St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 641) excepts the case if those gifts are stated in order to explain some defect. But even this reason seems sought from too far away. For will it be against the seal of confession to say that the penitent is either a Religious, or marked with sacred Orders, or married, or a schoolmaster, etc., because the penitent manifested some one of these circumstances in order to manifest some defect?

Therefore, the matter seems to be reduced to those limits which De Lugo proposes thus (disputation 23, no. 58): Sometimes (those gifts) can be stated in order to declare some sin better, for example, ingratitude toward God after these or those gifts and benefits of God; or inconstancy in good after such a firm purpose of procuring perfection, and things of this kind. And then I believe that they pertain to the seal, since they are now, at least indirectly, matter of confession; AND, MOREOVER, IT APPEARS THAT THE PENITENT DOES NOT WISH TO MANIFEST THEM OUTSIDE CONFESSION, BUT TO RETAIN THEM UNDER THE MOST STRICT SEAL OF CONFESSION. Why indeed did he add this final condition?

Reply as to the second. Yes, because scrupulosity is in some manner matter of confession, and, moreover, a burden to the penitent would follow from such a manifestation. - St. Ligorius, no. 644; Lacroix, no. 1947; De Lugo, etc. [3].

[3] A scruple is certainly matter of the seal when someone confesses as a sin that which is not such, but which by a false judgment was thought by him to be a sin. Thus De Lugo (On Penance, disputation 23, no. 59), who nevertheless judges otherwise concerning scrupulosity, as also concerning other defects of the penitent, which, he says (ibid., no. 60), the Confessor can gather from the very manner of confessing. Concerning these, some seem to suppose that they are contained under the seal and therefore that the Confessor cannot say without violating it that the penitent is scrupulous, spends time on impertinences and trifles, breaks the head of the hearer, is morose, and things of this kind. But I believe more truly that they are not contained, as Navarrus, chapter 8, no. 12, says that it is not against the seal if someone says that such a penitent pounds the head of the Confessor with his minutiae. The reason is that some defects are manifested by the penitent to declare his conscience and sins, and these are contained under the seal. Others are done there by the penitent himself, which the Confessor does not hear from the report of the penitent but himself sees and perceives; and just as these are not spoken secretly, so they are not under the seal.

Hence St. Alphonsus also (no. 644) concedes that the Confessor can flee a penitent who is commonly known to be prolix, restless in confessing, etc., because it clearly appears that the Confessor flees lest he be affected by weariness and an irksome loss of time from his natural prolixity and restlessness. Nevertheless, the same St. Alphonsus, both as regards other defects (no. 643) and as regards scrupulosity (no. 644), says that he does not acquiesce in the opinion of De Lugo and rather adheres to the opinion of Tamburini, who teaches against De Lugo that it is not lawful to reveal them. But it is false that De Lugo concedes that it is lawful to disclose those things about which the question is; for both he himself and Navarrus contend only that this manifestation is not a violation of the sacramental seal. It is one thing for some manifestation not to be a violation of the sacramental seal, and another for that manifestation to be lawful, since it can be against the law of natural secrecy. St. Alphonsus himself had excellently distinguished these two things (no. 642). You have an example of a revelation which can render confession odious and yet is not a violation of the seal below at no. 659.

 The VV. do not approve (p. 642, in the Note), first, Cardinal De Lugo's distinction between defects which are manifested by the penitent to declare his conscience and sins, and other defects which the Confessor does not hear from the report of the penitent but himself sees and perceives. Likewise, second, they do not approve the distinction between a manifestation which is a violation of the sacramental seal and a manifestation which is not licit, as being contrary to the law of natural secrecy, but nevertheless is not a violation of the sacramental seal.

And they reply: That these things may be answered briefly, it suffices to recall the twofold rule handed down by the holy Doctor on this matter. The first general rule is that the seal is injured whenever he uses confession... to the burden of the penitent (Apostolic Man, treatise 16, no. 157). The second: It is not lawful to use a probable opinion to the prejudice of a certain right which another possesses; but the penitent possesses the right that he suffer no burden on the occasion of his confession (book 6, no. 633).

Reply. As regards the second of the aforesaid distinctions which the VV. reprove, surely while writing these things they seem to have forgotten what on the preceding page (641) they themselves had written thus: The sole question treated here is whether the Confessor breaks the seal, not whether he speaks licitly and sins by no other reason. But surely they treat of speech which imports manifestation, for the question concerns a Confessor who says that in confession he heard the sin of a Religious of such an Order. Why, therefore, do they not apply to themselves the twofold rule of the holy Doctor which they object against the Note? Weight and weight; measure and measure!

As regards the former distinction of Cardinal De Lugo, here also the VV. seem to have forgotten those things which St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 642) has thus: It is asked whether a Confessor breaks the seal who divulges the natural defects of his penitent, namely, that he is ignoble, poor, or ignorant, deaf, and things of this kind. It is replied: If the Confessor learned such defects insofar as they were manifested by the penitent in order to explain and more fully to manifest his conscience (as he says a little afterward), then they certainly fall under the seal, as is commonly held, etc., with De Lugo, etc. But it is otherwise if the Confessor learned those defects insofar as the penitent disclosed them incidentally or impertinently to confession, as is also commonly said.... And this is very probable. The reason is that, since the penitent voluntarily discloses such defects without any order to explaining sins, he seems in no way to subject them (nor could he subject them) to the keys of the seal, since they pertain in no way to confession. And in these words you now have the distinction of Cardinal De Lugo. Indeed, St. Alphonsus goes still further, for he speaks of defects which the penitent voluntarily discloses, while De Lugo treats not of defects voluntarily disclosed by the penitent, but of those which the Confessor himself sees and perceives, and which he would observe no differently even if he were conversing with the penitent not on the occasion of hearing confession but about a mathematical matter.

QUESTION 2. Do the natural defects of a penitent fall under the seal, for example, that he is deaf, stammers, is poor, ignorant, lame, and so forth?

Reply 1. Yes, if the Confessor learned such defects from the declaration of the penitent, or insofar as they were manifested in order to declare sins [4], because then they have a connection with confession, and their declaration would render the Sacrament odious.

[4] It can scarcely be understood how the fact that the penitent stammers, is lame, deaf, etc., pertains to declaring sins. Moreover, since these defects cannot be hidden from others, they cannot even be matter of natural secrecy. Rather, the fact that someone is ignorant of the office which perhaps he exercises, for example, that of a physician, advocate, pastor, Confessor, teacher, etc., could pertain to declaring sins.

 Here the VV. (p. 643, in the Note) censure Father Gury because he does not report the true doctrine of St. Alphonsus exactly; then they refer to Apostolic Man (treatise 16, no. 154), where the holy Doctor, they say, distinguishes among the defects stated indiscriminately by Gury, namely, defects whose manifestation the penitent can of itself bear with difficulty, and defects which are not a source of shame or reproach to him.

Reply. Gury reports the defects indiscriminately, just as St. Alphonsus sets them forth indiscriminately, who has (book 6, no. 642): That he is ignoble, poor, or ignorant, deaf, and things of this kind. And again (ibid., no. 643): That he lisps, is deaf, uncultivated, of dull intelligence, etc. Indeed, even in the passage which the VV. allege from Apostolic Man (treatise 16, no. 154), he has thus: The natural defects of the penitent also fall under the seal (as we already intimated), for example, that he is deaf, stammers, is poor, ignorant, etc., whenever knowledge of them is had from confession..., even if the penitent were to set forth such defects of his without necessity but only for a better explanation of his sins. Therefore, there was no reason for the VV. to reproach Gury because he reports these defects indiscriminately, etc.; nor likewise was there reason to censure the Note because it says therein that it scarcely appears how the fact that the penitent stammers, is lame, deaf, etc., pertains to declaring sins. For the rest, since among defects of this kind some can pertain to the matter of the seal and others in no way, as we saw in the preceding Note to be admitted even by the VV., but Gury there treats only of the seal and merely expounds the doctrine of St. Alphonsus concerning this, it was not necessary for him to introduce a discourse there concerning other distinctions, since they do not pertain here.

Reply 2. No, however, if the Confessor learned those defects only incidentally. - St. Ligorius, no. 642, and others commonly, against some.

658. ○ QUESTION 3. Do sins committed in confession itself, for example, impatience or insult toward the Confessor, fall under the seal?

Reply 1. No, per se, because, as is evident, the penitent does not confess those faults.

Reply 2. Yes, nevertheless, in most cases, although only per accidens, because, even though those sins are not per se matter of the seal, they nevertheless often involve in some manner per accidens a danger of revelation; for they furnish a probable judgment that the Confessor either was unwilling to absolve the penitent or rebuked him more severely on account of a graver fault, etc. [5].

[5] Thus De Lugo, who denies that these things are under the seal (On Penance, disputation 23, no. 60), and St. Alphonsus, who affirms it (no. 643), are excellently reconciled.

 The VV. also wished to censure this short Note (p. 643, in the Note), saying: Father Gury has reconciled nothing, nor did he intend to reconcile anything, since he reports the opinion of the holy Doctor in nearly the same words.

Reply. I altogether deny it. For in Reply 2 Gury added the word IN MOST CASES, which St. Alphonsus has neither in book 6, no. 643, nor in Apostolic Man, treatise 16, no. 154. But that word reconciles the holy Doctor, who rightly affirms that these things are under the seal when they involve in some manner a danger of revelation, with Cardinal De Lugo, who rightly denies it whenever they do not involve this danger; for example, if the penitent broke forth into words of grave impatience because the Confessor, having interrupted the confession, ran to assist a man in the church itself who had been seized by a sudden apoplexy.

But a theft committed by the penitent to the harm of the Confessor himself during confession would not fall under the seal. Indeed, if it were established that the thief came to confess so that he might have an occasion for stealing, the sins accused by him would not be matter of confession, since such a confession would not be true but only simulated.

659. ○ QUESTION 4. Does one violate the seal who says that he heard such a person in confession?

Reply. No, for the fact that someone approaches confession is known externally or outside confession. Moreover, this is not odious per se but rather brings praise. Nevertheless, the Confessor would be bound to natural secrecy if someone had approached confession secretly. For the rest, sometimes a suspicion of grave sin could thus be introduced per accidens. - St. Ligorius, no. 638.

QUESTION 5. Does one violate the seal who says that he absolved such a penitent?

Reply. No, per se, because in such a case that cannot be burdensome to the penitent. Nevertheless, in some circumstances it could become burdensome to others concerning whom the same cannot be said. - Thus commonly. Therefore parents, teachers, masters, when asking about absolution given to children or subjects, are to be referred to the penitents themselves. Nuns devoted to the care of the sick in hospitals are accustomed to ask similar questions, so that they may know whether they ought to prepare the things necessary for administering Viaticum; they likewise are to be referred to the sick, or it is better that permission be sought from the sick person to admonish the Nuns or others. It will suffice, however, to say to the sick person: I will give notice, etc. [6].

[6] Understand this when the sick person is to receive the Holy Eucharist; for when he ought to omit Holy Communion, it will seem less suitable for the Confessor to assume for himself this care of admonishing others about the matter.

660. ○ QUESTION 6. Can a Confessor who hands a penitent a certificate in testimony of confession declare that he was absolved?

Reply. Absolutely not. The reason is that a comparison would be made with penitents who could not be declared absolved, and consequently an indirect revelation of confession would follow. - St. Ligorius, no. 639 [7]. The holy Author excepts the case in which the certificates were printed and it was said in them that absolution had been given, because such certificates would be handed to all.

[7] St. Alphonsus in fact has none of these things. But, setting aside the question whether it is ever expedient to testify concerning absolution imparted, it is manifest that the resolution of the Author has place only when that comparison and the consequent inconvenience intervene.

QUESTION 7. How is a certificate of confession to be drawn up?

Reply. It is customarily drawn up thus: I, the undersigned, testify that I heard the confession of N. on such a day, etc. The Confessor subscribes his name to this certificate. Or more briefly: I heard such a person in confession on such a day, etc. It can also be said: I heard a sacramental confession, because every confession which is made in order to receive absolution is sacramental, whether absolution was given or not.

661. ○ QUESTION 8. Does a Confessor violate the seal who denies a certificate of confession to an indisposed penitent?

Reply 1. Yes, whenever he denies the certificate to a penitent asking for it outside confession. The reason is that he uses knowledge from confession for acting externally, and indeed with a great burden to the penitent.

Reply 2. Yes, even if the penitent who was not absolved asks for the certificate within confession and the matter concerns those circumstances in which it is customarily given or is required by the Superiors of the penitent, as often happens at Paschal time for students of colleges, servants, etc. The reason is that from the denial of the certificate it becomes known to others that the penitent was not rightly confessed or absolved, and therefore there will be an indirect violation of the seal. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 639; Elbel, no. 492; Sporer, no. 839, etc.

Reply 3. No, however, if the penitent asks for the certificate in confession outside the aforesaid circumstances, or when it is not customarily given to all or is not required by Superiors. The reason is that then the Confessor, saying nothing, conducts himself merely negatively and does not approve that confession by a positive testimony, to which he is not bound. Moreover, the penitent is not compelled by necessity to declare to others that he was not absolved; hence, if he says this, he himself discloses his indisposition, not the Confessor. - Thus De Lugo, disputation 23, no. 87, with others.

Sometimes, however, the Confessor can give a certificate of confession even to an indisposed penitent on account of various inconveniences which would follow from its denial; nor will he then cooperate in the sacrilege of the penitent, who perhaps will use this testimony of confession in order to receive a Sacrament of the living, for example, the Eucharist or matrimony, in the state of sin. The reason is that the penitent will have to attribute this to his own malice. - Elbel, no. 492.

Reply 4. No, also, whenever the penitent made a simulated confession, for example, to flee punishment, avoid infamy, or seize a certificate, as if a young man confessed thus with matrimony in view: I did what young men of my condition are accustomed to do; nothing else remains to be said; I do not seek absolution, but a testimony that confession has been made. For the seal is not broken whether the certificate is denied within or outside confession. The reason is that the seal arises from sacramental confession alone, which is in no manner had here. Nor generally can the Confessor grant such persons a certificate, because without sufficient reason he would cooperate in their future sacrilege. Moreover, he would assert a falsehood, namely, that they had confessed, which is not true. - De Lugo, disputation 23, no. 87; Elbel, no. 494, etc.

662. ○ QUESTION 9. What should a Confessor do upon discovering that the penitent is deaf?

Reply 1. If he observes the deafness at the beginning of confession, he ought to enjoin the penitent to return at a suitable time and place.

Reply 2. If he discovers it in the course of confession, he generally cannot enjoin the penitent in a loud voice to return, lest he introduce into others a suspicion that the man confessed grave matter; but let him hear the sins in the best manner he can and, after omitting questions, impart absolution to the penitent absolutely if he judges him disposed, or conditionally if he doubts the disposition; and let him impose a light penance upon him, lest others judge that he sinned gravely. - Thus St. Ligorius, no. 642, with others commonly.

663. ○ QUESTION 10. Can the Confessor admonish an accomplice, with the permission of the penitent, or another person for correcting the accomplice?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that an accomplice acquires no right to the sacramental seal from the confession of another accomplice, for this seal was instituted in favor of penitents alone; and therefore the right of secrecy is acquired only by the one who entrusts it. - St. Ligorius, no. 641, and others most commonly.

Ordinarily, however, it is not expedient that the Confessor seek such permission [8]; but it will be better to induce the penitent to disclose this to him outside confession; indeed, it will be still better that the penitent himself report the matter to another who can bring a remedy to the evil. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

[8] Recall here the things said above (no. 501) concerning Confessors who seek the name of an accomplice even for correction, and concerning the Constitutions of Benedict XIV on the same matter.

Point IV. On the Various Ways of Violating the Seal

664. ○ The seal can be violated in two ways: 1. directly, by expressly revealing something pertaining to the secrets of Confession, for example, if it is said, Titius did this, etc.; 2. indirectly, by saying or doing something from which someone can know or suspect a sin or defect [1] of the penitent known in confession alone, or from which shame, vexation, disgrace, harm, or any burden whatever can arise for the penitent or others, for example, accomplices [2].

[1] Distinguish, however, among defects; for, as was said above at no. 657, the revelation of just any defect does not import a violation of the seal.

[2] Understand these things with the suitable limitations which can be taken from the foregoing. For not every word or deed of a Confessor from which vexation, disgrace, harm, or a burden to the penitent follows pertains to the breaking of the sacramental seal, but only that from which some direct or indirect revelation follows of those things which pertain to the seal. Thus, for example, if the Confessor reveals that someone came also to seek alms, intercession, mediation for entering into peace, etc. Otherwise, the priest indeed will not be free from fault, but he will not sin against the seal.

 The VV. censure this short Note (p. 643, in the Note) because, they say, the distinction between a burden which is or is not against the seal involves a begging of the question.

Reply. The VV. do not seem to have sufficiently examined the first words of the Note, where it is said that the limitations can be taken from the foregoing. For in the foregoing that distinction is sufficiently declared. The VV. have an example in St. Alphonsus (Apostolic Man, treatise 16, no. 154), where he writes: If the penitent were commonly known to be excessively prolix and troublesome in confessing, the Confessor does not break the seal if he were to flee from him..., when that penitent at the same time was commonly held to be of a good conscience. Behold an act of the Confessor which surely happens to be burdensome to the penitent and nevertheless is not against the seal.

Rule I. The seal is violated indirectly whenever penitents or others can deservedly be offended by things said or done by the Confessor from knowledge had in confession alone [3]. But it is not judged violated if the penitents would regard these things indifferently. The reason for each is sufficiently established from the things said above. - Thus commonly.

[3] Understand this if the Confessor uses knowledge of those things which, according to the foregoing, are matter of the sacramental seal. The second part of this rule must also be rightly understood; for if the matter concerns the seal, the Confessor will sin no less against it even if he believes that perhaps the penitents would not take it ill.

Rule II. In doubt whether in such a manner of speaking or acting there is danger of revelation or offense, one must stand for the safer side, or the one favoring the seal. - Thus commonly; and it is established from the things said above, no. 650.

Rule III. There is no violation of the seal if someone narrates a sin heard in confession in such a manner that the sinners cannot be revealed by any indication. Nevertheless, apart from the utility of instruction or of seeking counsel, one must generally abstain from similar narrations; the reason is that lay hearers, especially the simple, are easily scandalized, suspecting that the seal is violated. And sometimes in these frequent and promiscuous conversations there is danger that someone may be brought into suspicion concerning the penitent, and indeed that revelation may follow.

665. Resolutions. - The secrecy of confession is indirectly violated by:

1. One who, praising one above others whom he heard, says that he committed only venial sins, because the others are thereby easily brought under suspicion of mortal fault.

2. One who speaks with others about a sin of the penitent known through confession alone, although they know it from another source, even if the hearers do not notice that it was received from confession.

3. One who says that he did not absolve such a person, that he sent him away until such a time, that he has not yet absolved him, or that the confession has not yet been completed [4]. The reason for the last is that a long confession ordinarily denotes many sins or the indisposition of the penitent, unless it were known to be a general confession or one resumed after a long time, so that the penitent would not take this ill. Likewise, one who says of Titius, known as a thief, that he confessed his thefts to him with great contrition.

[4] It differs from these if the Confessor merely says that someone will return to him, since a penitent can and in fact does return for reasons other than those listed by the Author; and, moreover, it is sometimes necessary to tell someone this so that free access to the Confessor may lie open to the penitent. But what the Author adds, that the penitent would not take this ill, pertains to this case.

4. One who rebukes a penitent in a loud voice or in another manner intelligible to bystanders [5], for this is both grave for the penitent and introduces into others the suspicion that he confessed grave sins; a fortiori if by raising his voice excessively he were to repeat the sins of the penitent or question him about their circumstances.

[5] Understand this unless it is established that the penitent is rebuked for another cause, for example, on account of importunities, etc.

5. One who speaks with another Confessor about the sins of some penitent, even if he confessed the same sins to each.

6. One who, after hearing the confessions of a few persons, says that he heard such a sin, although he conceals the person; for each one suffers some suspicion against himself from that revelation. Likewise, one who so narrates sins known from confession that the hearers can by some reason conjecture or suspect who committed them.

7. One who, when narrating the sins of some person which he knew outside confession, adds some circumstance known from confession alone; or one who uses knowledge from confession to determine or confirm the matter more precisely.

666. ○ 8. One who should say that he heard a grave sin in such a monastery, even if he did not name the person, because the individual Religious of that community suffer detriment [6]. A fortiori, one would violate the seal who should say that such sins are committed in that community. It is otherwise, however, if he should say that he heard the grave sin of some Religious in general without naming his Order, because this is neither a revelation of the seal nor does it redound to the burden of the penitent or of any Order, since among the various Orders there are not lacking some less good Religious. But scandal to the laity must be carefully guarded against.

[6] If the individual Religious of that house suffer detriment, it is manifest that he who confessed the sin is also a participant in the infamy and burden, since he too is a part of that house; and hence arises the true reason why this turns to the prejudice of the seal.

St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 654) attributes the opposite opinion, which denies that the seal is violated through this, to Escobar (book 16, no. 752), and, in Escobar, to Nugno, Fagundez, Candido, and Henriquez, whom, however, I know not how, he afterward alleges for the other contrary opinion. Moreover, Henriquez (book 6, chapter 21, no. 6, note e) brings forward for himself Navarrus, Ledesma, Victoria, Mantica, and other more recent authors, as he says; to these, from Diana (volume 1, treatise 8, resolution 12), Malderus can also be added. But two things concerning these occur as needing observation. For, first, most of them discuss not a Monastery or Community but a Religion or Religious Order. Second, they deny that the seal is violated in the strict sense only to this extent, and indeed merely by way of opinion, insofar as such a Confessor can be punished as a revealer of confession, as Nugno says in Diana (volume 1, treatise 8, resolution 11, no. 3), or, as Malderus has it, insofar as he can be punished with the ordinary penalty inflicted against breakers of the seal. For the rest, these Doctors do not deny that one sins more or less gravely according to the quality of the crime. Indeed, Fagundez (On the Second Precept of the Church, book 6, chapter 5, no. 12) expressly admits with Suarez that one sins against the seal. Suarez has these things on this argument (On Penance, disputation 33, section 3, no. 8): One must take the greatest care lest the community to which such a person belongs be offended, as if he should designate a RELIGION in particular, because in truth this now redounds to a notable burden of the penitent on account of the injury which is done to the Community. See St. Antoninus and Navarrus, Peter Soto and Ledesma, who says that in the strict sense this is a breaking of the seal. But Navarrus says that in the strict sense it is not against the seal, although it is a sin. But surely it is not just any sin, but one against the Sacrament; therefore it is also against the seal. And Escobar, after he had said (loc. cit.) that a Confessor of this kind sins most gravely while he involves so great a Community in infamy, concludes that a priest speaking so incautiously is indeed worthy to be barred from this most grave ministry, which requires men endowed with prudence.

Since these things are so, and since the aforesaid Authors say these things not of a Monastery or Community but of a Religious Order, or certainly also of a Religious Order, while they themselves acknowledge that they have held a more lax way than others in this matter, the opinion which St. Alphonsus embraced, surely much more lax, concerning one who detracts from some Religious Order from knowledge of confession will with difficulty be admitted. For after he said (loc. cit.) that the seal is violated if the Confessor says that a Religious from such a Community confessed a grave sin to him, or that such sins are committed in that Community, he immediately adds: Not so, as Father Concina says..., if he merely said that he had heard the sin of a Religious of a certain Order, because this is neither a revelation of the seal nor does it redound to the burden of the penitent, since in every Order there are some bad men; hence neither does scandal arise nor is the Religion defamed, unless that Religion were of stricter observance. These things are not only against the opinion of all Theologians, and also of those who seemed to hold a more lax opinion about this, but are supported by reasons which no one will easily admit.

And surely who would seriously say that the penitent is not burdened by this? Grant, indeed, that his person is not betrayed; but will it not be grave for the penitent that from his confession an imprudent Confessor takes occasion to defame the whole Order? Indeed, does not the penitent himself, as a member of the same Community, as Suarez also observed above, participate in the infamy? Indeed, this can deservedly appear so grave that no one can call into doubt that a penitent who prudently believes that his sin will thus be revealed by the Confessor can conceal it in confession; for there is a sufficient cause, namely, the danger of infamy both to himself and to his own Order.

But as for what is added, that neither scandal nor infamy to the Religion arises because in every Order there are some bad men, no one will easily admit it. For that there are some bad men in every Order is customarily based partly upon that general reason that not even the College of the Apostles lacked its Judas, and partly upon light conjectures and uncertain and empty rumors. Moreover, the lighter the conjectures of the multitude are, the more atrocious surely becomes the injury of the Confessor who reveals. And even if some religious family did not have a good odor among the people, would not its infamy be notably increased and confirmed by so authentic a testimony of the Confessor? When this report has become widespread, are not the individual persons of some Order customarily despised among the people as though each had perpetrated that crime? Finally, does not a burden far from slight, does not grave scandal, arise even if only the memory of these things is renewed? Add that, in the concrete, the case of a Religious Order scarcely differs from the case of one monastery. For when the Confessor says that he heard this in confession, the matter is surely circumscribed to some monasteries, at most, from which some Religious could have approached him. Add that certain religious families consist of very few monasteries, and indeed an entire Order sometimes consists of not very many men.

To conclude, perhaps one would not wander completely from the truth who should suspect that the opinion which we have reported is owed to a mere slip of the eyes, whereby those things which could be said by some concerning a Religious man generally were transferred to a Religious of a particular Order. For although Suarez, as is evident from the cited words, scarcely distinguishes the two cases with others and judged that one sins against the seal both if by revelation you injure some particular Religious Order and if, with the particular Order kept silent, you speak generally about a Religious man, nevertheless there were not lacking some (see Candidus, disquisition 24, article 50, doubt 8) who judged that in the latter case the aforesaid inconveniences at least in some measure cease; with these the Author also agrees.

 The VV. oppose forty-two columns (pp. 624-645) to this Note. But, as often elsewhere, or better, if ever elsewhere, here surely one must lament the method to which they devote themselves. Otherwise, so enormous a mass does not need a lengthy reply.

The VV. take the first head of accusation (p. 625) from these words of the Note: Most of them (the Authors) discuss not a Monastery or Community but a Religion or Religious Order. Against these the VV. establish (p. 626): St. Alphonsus, when speaking of a Community, rightly ascribes to the negative opinion the Authors alleged by him for the same.

Reply. First, since St. Alphonsus professes as the truer opinion the one which teaches that in the proposed case the seal is broken, it ought indeed to have happened rather pleasingly even to the VV. that even those whom the holy Doctor thought opposed to him, relying upon the words of Escobar from whom he copied those allegations, were shown to agree with the holy Doctor. But the fervor for accusing these poor Notes never fails to prevail among the VV. Second, whatever may be the case concerning this, it had first to be observed that in the Note other Authors besides those alleged by the holy Doctor are brought forward; then, that the Note does not say that all but that most discuss a Religious Order rather than a Monastery. Therefore, there was no reason for the VV. immediately to think that St. Alphonsus, who at length, as we said, had merely copied his allegations from Escobar, was directly attacked by these things. But third, is it true that all the Authors alleged by St. Alphonsus discuss a Community or Monastery? Let this now be conceded to some extent concerning Escobar and Fagundez; but can the same be said of the other three, namely, Nugno, Henriquez, and Candidus?

And the words of Nugno, in Diana, volume 1, treatise 8, resolution 11, no. 3, are: Some say that he sins by the sin of revelation of the seal who, even if he does not name the person, nevertheless names the PARTICULAR RELIGIOUS ORDER to which such a penitent belonged; and this is a probable opinion; nevertheless, it does not appear so certain that such a Confessor could be punished as a revealer of Confession.* Therefore, does Nugnus discuss a Monastery, or a particular Religious Order? Why do the VV. suppress these things and, contrary to the evidence, establish that thesis and, in addition, charge the Note with false accusation?

The same is to be said of Henriquez, who, in that same place (book 6, or On Penance 3, chapter 21, no. 6), which Escobar, copied by St. Alphonsus, indicates, has thus: To narrate sins, even mortal sins, heard in confession, when knowledge of the person can in no way be reached, is not contrary to the seal; nor is it so if he says that in Seville, or in such a place where it is established that he heard the confessions of many, grave crimes are committed...; or if concerning A CERTAIN RELIGIOUS ORDER IN GENERAL he says that offices are sold, or that some other sin is customarily committed. Where here is there mention of a Monastery?

Vincentius Candidus, however (Disquisitions 24, On Confession, article 10, doubt 8), does indeed speak of a Monastery; but he goes over to the opinion opposite to that which St. Alphonsus himself, after Escobar, attributes to him. Behold his words: I say thirteenthly: But if the Confessor speaks of some place not very extensive, or if concerning some Monastery in which he heard Confessions he says that grave crimes are committed in it, he seems to break the seal of confession; for it can happen that a suspicion which is not slight is conceived concerning some particular person, and that some suffer loss of reputation (thus incorrectly printed iacturae famam for iacturam famae). See St. Antoninus and Coninck. Candidus, namely, uses the same reason which St. Alphonsus also brings forward for his same opinion, saying (book 6, no. 654, doubt 2): The reason is that then the individual members of that Convent suffer harm. And thus the Confessor will likewise violate the seal if he says that such sins are committed in that Convent. Far be it from us to accuse the holy Doctor Alphonsus here, since he merely copied these citations from Escobar; nevertheless, when from those five citations we find three wrongly adduced, how do the VV. (l.c.) write with the greatest confidence that St. Alphonsus, when speaking of a Convent, rightly ascribes to the negative opinion the Authors cited by himself for it?

But this also deservedly displeases us: while the VV., as though about to prove their aforesaid thesis, lead their readers about through eleven columns (pp. 626-631), they in some way reserve its proof and the refutation of the Note for the following article, writing (p. 627): It is not true that most of them (the Authors whom Father Ballerini enumerates) discuss not a Monastery or Convent but a Religious Order. Some speak of an Order; others, however, of an Order and a Monastery; but very many, whom we shall allege in Article 2, speak of a Monastery or Convent alone. Accordingly, anyone reading these things would now believe that in the following second Article the VV. were going to show both that St. Alphonsus rightly ascribes to the negative opinion the Authors cited by himself, and that the Authors enumerated by Ballerini, at least most of them, speak not of a Religious Order but of a Monastery, and indeed incline to the negative opinion. Yet (what otherwise can scarcely seem credible) the reader will finally discover that he is being wonderfully trifled with through these things. For in that entire mass of material in the second article, through seventeen columns, of those three Authors cited by St. Alphonsus only Candidus is mentioned, whom we have already seen above to be falsely alleged. But of the Authors enumerated by Ballerini (wonderful to say!) not even a word in those seventeen columns. And the VV. had indeed brought forward in the first article some texts of Navarrus; but even in these not the least mention occurs either of a Religious Order or of a Monastery or Convent. They bring forward from book 6, chapter 21, no. 6, a text of Henriquez; but Henriquez names a certain religious order, by no means a monastery. What, then, is to be concluded from this? Let it be permissible to conclude thus: This method of disputing concerning theological matters, and of resolving the objections of those who dissent, was never employed by the holy Doctor Alphonsus, nor ever approved by him.

We said above that it must be conceded that Escobar and Fagundez, to whom we shall also add Aversa, denied that one sins against the sacramental seal if someone says that he heard a grave sin in such a monastery, provided, however, that he keeps the person silent. But we added that this must be conceded ONLY TO A CERTAIN EXTENT. Why, then?

The reason, though most briefly, had been indicated in the Note by these words: Only to this extent do some deny that the seal is violated strictly speaking, insofar as such a Confessor can be punished as a revealer of Confession, as Nugnus says; or, as Malderus has it, insofar as he can be punished by the ordinary penalty inflicted against breakers of the seal. Namely, the object of the sacramental seal is not understood in the same way by all theologians, and therefore some seem to restrict it more narrowly, while others extend it more broadly. For there are those who repeatedly employ seal in the sense in which it is designated in ecclesiastical law; and for that reason, with Navarrus (Manual, chapter 8, no. 3), they restrict its object thus: Christ willed that under this obligation there should be included not only mortal and venial sins, but also their circumstances, necessarily or voluntarily confessed, and any other things whatsoever which, although they are not sins, nevertheless are such that, when they are disclosed, it can be disclosed, directly or indirectly, in general or in particular, that he who confessed had confessed that he committed some mortal sin or some particular venial sin, even if it were most slight. Therefore, according to these, the seal is not said to be injured properly and strictly unless from the revelation it can be known that someone, for example, Thomas, had confessed some mortal sin or some particular venial sin. Hence the consequence drawn by Navarrus (l.c., no. 16): The Confessor acted badly, although he is not called a revealer of confession, by speaking thus: In such a place (the name of the place in which he hears confessions being expressed) grave crimes are perpetrated. And in fact the text of the Law (Omnis utriusque) has thus: But let him (the priest) take care altogether lest by word or sign or any other manner whatsoever he in any respect betray the sinner; but if he should need more prudent counsel, let him cautiously seek it without any expression of the person; since we decree that he who shall have presumed to reveal a sin disclosed to him in the penitential judgment is not only to be deposed from the priestly office, but is also to be thrust into a strict monastery to do penance. From these things it is evident that for an injury of the seal of this kind there is required the revelation both of the sin and of the sinner.

Most commonly, however, the object of the seal is understood according as, once the divine institution of the Sacrament and its obligation are posited, the natural law itself requires the prohibition of any revelation whatsoever which can impede confession and render it odious; so that the Confessor can be guilty of violating the seal even if from his revelation it is not known that, for example, Andrew had confessed a mortal sin or some particular venial sin. To the point is Lucius Ferraris (Seal of the Sacrament, no. 22): Under the sacramental seal fall all sins, both mortal and venial, not only of the penitent himself but also of an accomplice. Likewise, the circumstances of sins and natural defects by the revelation of which infamy or some other inconvenience can befall the penitent, and confession thus be rendered odious; for such circumstances, for example, that someone is illegitimate, is of obscure lineage, and things of this kind, cannot be manifested by the Confessor without breaking the sacramental seal. COMMON. And the reason is that the sacramental seal obliges one to conceal everything which can render confession odious; but through the revelation of the aforesaid and similar things confession is rendered odious, since a burden is thus imposed, etc. And that the sacramental seal is employed by the holy Doctor Alphonsus in precisely this sense, and that questions are resolved by him according to this sense, is a matter most certain.

With these things premised, let us return to Escobar. Concerning the Confessor who says, A certain Religious from that Convent confessed a grave sin to me, he writes (book 16, no. 752): That Confessor sins most gravely, branding the community with so great an infamy; nevertheless, he is not a violator of the sacred seal. But St. Alphonsus, on the contrary (book 6, no. 654): Then the seal is violated; the reason is that, although the person is not then revealed, nevertheless, since the revelation issues in the infamy of the whole community, it also redounds to the burden of the penitent.... And therefore from such a revelation confession would be rendered odious to him. Each, therefore, asserts that in the case the Confessor sins gravely. Why, however, does one deny and the other affirm that the Confessor is a violator of the seal, unless because one judges concerning the seal according to ecclesiastical law and the other according to divine law? But the mind of Escobar shines forth better from these things (l.c., no. 750): When the place is not so extensive and the sin or vice is not so public, it does not appear that this can be done without harm to the inhabitants, and sometimes without injury to confession, on account of the occasion which would be furnished for suspicions. I think, nevertheless, that for this reason the penalties of one revealing confession are for the most part not incurred, because the sins of the penitent are not manifested, but those of the town. Thus he. Moreover, in these words you have Escobar expressly employing violation of the seal according to ecclesiastical law, under which penalties are inflicted. Furthermore, you have him admitting that sin is thus committed with injury to confession. But this, namely, is the sin concerning which Suarez, cited in the Note, said: But certainly it is not just any sin, but one against the Sacrament; therefore also against the seal.

But say precisely the same also of Fagundez. For he indeed appears here to prefer the opinion of Navarrus and Henriquez to the opinion of Suarez. But he could not affirm, nor did he affirm, this as regards a Monastery, since neither of them, as we said, makes any mention of a Monastery. He adhered, therefore, to the aforesaid Authors insofar as with them he judged concerning violation of the sacramental seal according to ecclesiastical law. But, no differently from Escobar, he then falls back into the doctrine of Suarez. For (On the Second Precept of the Church, book 6, chapter 4, no. 2), where he speaks of Confessors who injure a community or religious family by naming a religious order in particular or a Monastery, he indeed adds: Ledesma and Suarez think, strictly speaking, that this is a revelation of the seal; but Henriquez and Navarrus, on the contrary, think that, strictly speaking, it is not contrary to the seal. Nevertheless, with the latter he adds that it can sometimes be a mortal sin of scandal, sometimes one having the malice of infamy to the whole community. But Fagundez himself (ibid., chapter 1, no. 2) derived the malice of violating the seal from this: that it is contrary to two virtues, first, against the virtue of justice, insofar as it is contrary to the reputation of one's neighbor; second, against the virtue of religion and the reverence due to the Sacrament, toward which it commits irreverence and inflicts the greatest injury... by rendering (it) burdensome and fearful to men. Now, is irreverence and injury of this kind toward the Sacrament absent whenever, through an imprudent revelation of those things which were heard by a priest in confession, a religious family or Monastery is bespattered with infamy? Does the Sacrament of Penance become any less intolerable and odious? Therefore, there remains one sole reason for reconciling Fagundez with Fagundez, namely that which we have stated: that he understands in the stricter sense that violation of the seal which is the object of ecclesiastical law.

But now let us pass to those things which the VV. oppose against the second part of the Note. They prefix to Article 2 this title (p. 631): The false and rash assertion of Ballerini, that the doctrine of St. Alphonsus is lax and contrary to the opinion of all Theologians, is refuted. And concerning the rashness they add these things (p. 632): Either this assertion of Ballerini is right and to be believed, and then we can scarcely understand why the Holy See, in the solemn declaration, "Nothing is worthy of censure," did not condemn at least this opinion; or the assertion of Father Ballerini is of singular rashness.

Reply. I deny the supposition, namely, that in the Note the opinion of St. Alphonsus is designated as lax. For it presents an altogether different sense when you call an opinion absolutely lax or strict, and when comparatively, and therefore relatively to another, you call an opinion laxer or stricter. Hence it comes about that you can comparatively call some opinion stricter which, nevertheless, you would wrongly call strict. And an example is at hand in the present question, even as regards St. Alphonsus; for it will be permissible to call his doctrine that a Confessor breaks the seal who says that a grave sin was committed in this or that monastery stricter than the opinion of Escobar or Aversa, who deny this; but it is by no means permissible to call it strict. In like manner, we shall most truly call the common opinion concerning the absolution of recidivists laxer than the opinion of St. Alphonsus, as we saw elsewhere; but someone would badly conclude thence that the common opinion is condemned by us as lax. That the opinion of Concina, adopted by St. Alphonsus, is called laxer in the Note in a comparative sense of this kind is also manifest from the fact that other Authors are there presented admitting that in this matter they held a laxer course than others. For someone would argue entirely badly that those Authors therefore admit that they held lax doctrine. Thus the VV. impose this most grave charge with less consideration, that there the opinion of St. Alphonsus is rashly branded with a censure contrary to the declaration of the Apostolic See to the Theologians: Nothing is worthy of censure.

Now the VV. stuff seventeen columns (pp. 631-640) with the texts of authors in order to show that it is falsely affirmed that the doctrine of theologians is contrary to the opinion of Concina adopted by St. Alphonsus, namely, that if a Confessor says that he heard in confession a sin of a Religious of a certain Order, the seal is not broken.

For the sake of clarity and brevity, let us divide this great crowd of Authors into various classes. First, therefore, let seven come forward: Mendo, Mazzotta, Billuart, Leonard Jansen, Gotti, Reuter, and Cuniliati. Their texts, brought forward by the VV., merely say with St. Alphonsus that the seal is violated if the Confessor says that a Religious from such a Convent confessed a grave sin to him. Let the reply be brief: I concede the antecedent; I deny the consequence. For the VV. wish to argue thus: These Authors condemn it if the sin of a Religious from such a convent is revealed; therefore, they do not condemn it if the sin of a Religious from such an Order is revealed. Wrongly indeed. The one true conclusion could at most be this: Therefore, they do not touch upon the other question. But not even this is altogether true. For the reasons which are brought forward for the former case, namely, the burden of the penitent, the odium of confession, the consequent infamy, and scandal, have place also in the latter case. Therefore, tacitly but implicitly, they comprehend the other case also.

Let thirteen others follow: Coninck, Bonacina, Laymann, Palaus, Trullench, Tamburini, Sporer, the Salmanticenses, Gotti, Reuter, Struggl, Cuniliati, and Henricus a S. Ignatio. Their texts, transcribed by the VV., hold that a Confessor who says that grave sins are committed in such a place is to be condemned if the place is not very extensive; otherwise, if the place is extensive, for example, a large city. Reply. I concede the antecedent; I deny the consequence and the parity. For, as is evident, the reason of burden, scandal, and infamy consequent upon a revelation of this kind is not equal in both cases. For can Religious of a certain Order bear this revelation with as tranquil a mind as the citizens of a certain large City? Indeed, the VV. themselves (p. 645) imagine (as we shall see) that St. Alphonsus excuses a Confessor speaking thus concerning a large civil community, but does not excuse one speaking thus concerning a Religious Order, however large, because, namely (they say), a religious Community is more easily defamed and suffers harm.

There follow eight, namely, Valentia, Herincx, Lopez, Jansen, Henricus a S. Ignatio, Antonius Fernandez, Ioannes Corradus, and Aversa, whose texts, as the VV. allege them, merely hold that the sacramental seal is not violated if the person is in no way indicated, although a sin heard in confession is revealed. This assertion proves too much in itself. St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 654) says: More truly, the Confessor who says that a Religious from such a convent confessed a grave sin to him breaks the seal. Do you see the seal violated although the person is not revealed? And again (ibid.), to the question, Does a Confessor violate the seal if he asserts that grave crimes are perpetrated in some place, which he himself heard in confession? the same holy Doctor replies: The most common and by far more probable opinion teaches that if the town is small (suppose it consists of about fewer than three thousand people), then the seal is violated. The reason is that, ALTHOUGH THE PERSON IS NOT THEN REVEALED, nevertheless, since the revelation issues in the infamy of the whole community, it also redounds to the burden of the penitent, who is a member of that community; and therefore from such a revelation confession would be rendered odious to him. It is otherwise, however, if the town is large and the crimes are public. Therefore the aforesaid assertion is true if taken positively, by saying: A Confessor who reveals even the person violates the seal; but by no means if taken negatively, by saying: The seal is never broken if the person also is not revealed. Let the reply, therefore, be: I distinguish the antecedent. If no other cause is added on account of which the seal is broken, let it pass; otherwise, I deny it. But in our case, although the person is not then revealed (as St. Alphonsus teaches), nevertheless, since the revelation issues in the infamy of the whole community, it also redounds to the burden of the penitent, who is a member of that community; and therefore from such a revelation confession would be rendered odious to him. Therefore, I deny the consequence.

Four remain, namely, Candidus, Escobar, Stoz, and Roncaglia. But enough has already been said above concerning Candidus and Escobar. Stoz is brought forward because (Tribunal of Penance, part 2, no. 227), unless the offenses are public and notorious, or unless the community is such and so large that all can prudently judge it not to lack weeds of this kind, he does not excuse from the crime of unjustly defaming the community, nor from a sin against charity, indeed not even from violation of the seal on account of the danger lest the persons also become known, especially if the place or body of Regulars... is not extensive and numerous. Hence the VV. seem to wish to conclude that all these inconveniences are absent if the body of Regulars is extensive and numerous. Reply. I distinguish. That Stoz also intermingles a body of Regulars which is not extensive can be admitted as regards the danger of revealing the person: let it pass. That it can also be understood as regards the injury of defaming and, in addition, as regards rendering confession odious: I deny it. For the same Stoz adds with Dicastillo that this is also contrary to the seal for this reason, that it plainly renders confession odious. Nor will the VV. deny that confession would become odious even to Regulars, indeed much more to Regulars than to others, if they knew or suspected that from their sacramental confession the Confessor would take occasion to defame their entire Order. Finally, concerning Roncaglia, whose assertion appears to be joined with the assertion of Daniel Concina, there is no need to add anything to those things which were said concerning this opinion in the Note.

Let us conclude, therefore, that that entire jumble of texts of so many Authors, which the VV. gathered with immense labor, contributes absolutely nothing to their purpose, namely, that they confirm the assertion of Concina by the authority of the schools.

Now to the third Article (pp. 640-643), whose title is: Against the arguments brought forward in the Note, the doctrine of St. Alphonsus is clearly expounded. To which it is surely easy to reply: Could the doctrine of St. Alphonsus have been expounded more clearly than by citing his words with the greatest exactness? Yet in the Note the opinion of the holy Doctor was expounded integrally, to the letter. Nevertheless, the exposition added by the VV. was not useless, inasmuch as it makes sufficiently evident that there was, in the end, no cause for them to attack our Note with so much heat.

Thus, after transcribing one or another text of Concina, they observe first (p. 641): The sole question treated here is whether the Confessor breaks the seal, but not whether he speaks licitly. Reply. The special question here concerns the revelation of a sin which turns to the burden of the penitent, to the odium of confession, and to the infamy of a religious community. But according to St. Alphonsus the seal is broken by this revelation, as is evident from his doctrine brought forward above. Therefore, a discussion of some other illicit speech, such as, for example, a lie, is not to be intermingled here.

They add secondly: St. Alphonsus, no differently from Concina, supposes a large Religious Order. Reply 1. The words of the holy Doctor Alphonsus, which are exactly transcribed in the Note, present no distinction between a large and a non-large Religious Order. 2. It was already observed in the Note that, in the concrete, the case of a Religious Order scarcely differs from the case of one monastery; for when the Confessor says that he heard this in confession, the matter is certainly circumscribed to a few monasteries (at most) from which some Religious could have come to him, unless the extraordinary hypothesis is imagined of a Confessor who has traveled through the most remote lands. But the cited text does not restrict the assertion of St. Alphonsus to this extraordinary hypothesis. 3. Even in this extraordinary hypothesis, the burden of the penitent and the odium of his confession are not absent, from which he may suspect that, on account of it, his confreres must be affected with confusion, shame, and sorrow because of the infamy of the Order.

And indeed, the VV. themselves finally confirm our reply when they write (pp. 641-642, no. 30): If in some diocese or province there exist one or more Monasteries, the Confessor will not be able, with the seal preserved, to name this Religious Order, because certainly some would suspect one or another Monastery of the same Religious Order. The same is to be said if Monasteries do not exist there, but Religious from other Convents are present in this province or diocese, at least while passing through. Concerning these things let it be permissible to observe two points. The first is that St. Alphonsus does not exclude these cases from his general affirmation. Therefore, the VV. expound their own opinion, not the opinion of St. Alphonsus. The second is that the cause of the violated seal is reduced by them solely to the inconvenience of suspicion concerning some Monastery or some Religious passing through. But even according to the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, it is not necessary that such suspicion arise from the revelation of the Confessor, since for this the infamy of the community, the odium of confession, and the burden of the penitent suffice, as has already been said more than once.

And again, the things which in the Note are objected to the opinion of Concina, admitted by St. Alphonsus, are confirmed by the VV. when they themselves (p. 642, no. 4) admit that, in naming the Religious Order, the Confessor will rarely avoid breaking the seal unless it is established that he exercised the office of Confessor in various lands and dioceses, and he himself expresses this circumstance. Nevertheless, they urge this upon us less suitably, both because the assertion of St. Alphonsus embraces all Confessors, whether they exercised the office of Confessor in various lands or in one land or diocese, and because here again the VV. derive violation of the seal merely from the danger of revealing the penitent. But this supposition, as we have said more than once, is false.

The VV. add (ibid., no. 5) that the holy Doctor excepts: Unless that Religious Order were of stricter observance. Therefore (the VV. say), with the seal preserved, a Confessor can name only such a Religious Order in which observance is notoriously relaxed. Reply. The words of the holy Doctor do not present this sense, but he says: Nor does it redound to the burden of the penitent, since in every Order there are some bad men; whence neither does scandal arise nor is the Religious Order defamed, unless that Religious Order were of stricter observance. Therefore, according to the holy Doctor, the reason why the seal is not violated is this: because in every Order there are some bad men. To this assertion, nevertheless, he places this limit: Unless that Religious Order were of stricter observance; which exception in that context has force thus: Unless the observance is such that in that Order it is not readily supposed that there are some bad men. Moreover, as was already observed in the Note, it is false that even in that hypothesis both the burden of the penitent and the other inconveniences on account of which St. Alphonsus himself affirms that the seal is broken are absent. And surely, does not the holy Doctor himself (book 6, no. 654, doubt 1), in order that violation of the seal be avoided in the case, require in addition that the crimes be public?

Finally, the VV. (ibid., no. 6) observe that neither Concina nor St. Alphonsus speaks of poisonings, adulteries, or other grave crimes, but simply of a sin. First, Concina, whose words the VV. also bring forward, has thus there: Nor is the Order in any way defamed from the fact that it is known... that someone (a Religious) IS CRIMINAL. Therefore, if the sense of St. Alphonsus there is indeed to be measured from the words of Concina, we shall also interpret the holy Doctor thus, that he speaks of crimes or of a criminal Religious. Second, the words of St. Alphonsus, If (the Confessor) were only to say that he heard the sin of a Religious of a certain Order, are most general and embrace sins of every genus and species.

And let these things suffice to make it evident that through these expositions of the VV. nothing is detracted from the force of the difficulties which in the Note were objected to the opinion of the holy Doctor.

It will be useful here to note certain things concerning those which the VV. (p. 645) have in the Conclusion of the Question.

Thus they write: Although (St. Alphonsus) excuses a Confessor speaking concerning a large civil Community, nevertheless he does not excuse one speaking concerning a Religious Order, however large, because he has a just and prudent reason for the distinction between the two Communities, insofar as a religious Community is more easily defamed and suffers harm. Reply. May the Most Illustrious and Most Religious VV. pardon us; but these things are shown to be evidently false from the words of St. Alphonsus, who plainly has the opposite.

For, giving the reason why a Confessor of this kind does not violate the seal, he writes: Because this is neither a revelation of the seal nor DOES IT REDOUND TO THE BURDEN OF THE PENITENT, since in every Order there are some bad men; whence NEITHER DOES SCANDAL ARISE NOR IS THE RELIGIOUS ORDER DEFAMED. How, therefore, do the VV. write that St. Alphonsus does not excuse this Confessor because the Religious Order is defamed, while St. Alphonsus says in explicit words that this Confessor is excused because the Religious Order is not defamed?

The VV. add (ibid.): Nevertheless (St. Alphonsus) deservedly admits the opinion of Concina, that a Confessor who speaks concerning the sin of only one Religious, naming the Religious Order, does not break the seal, provided that the Religious Order is large and notoriously relaxed, and that the sins are such as customarily occur among the relaxed and have notoriously occurred in this (Religious Order), and likewise that every danger of suspicion concerning some monastery in particular is absent. Reply. These things indeed are most opportune to be appended in a Note to this passage of the holy Doctor when the new Edition of the Work which the VV. are preparing comes forth; for the VV. themselves now admit that without these supports the bare and simple assertion of the holy Doctor of itself conduces to breaking the seal. But it is one thing that it is necessary to fortify the assertion of the holy Doctor with these supports, and another that the assertion can be admitted of itself, as it stands.

Finally, the VV. (ibid.) conclude that the doctrine of St. Alphonsus in this matter, and particularly the opinion just expounded, which the holy Doctor judges reasonable and Father Ballerini most sharply attacks, is not only not lax, but rather more rigorous than that which very many Doctors, even the most rigorous, such as Alexander Natalis and Henricus a S. Ignatio, hold. Reply.

Let it pass that here also, in passing, the VV. renew the accusation, indeed less justly, as we have already seen, as though in the Note the opinion of the holy Doctor were marked as lax. As regards what is now at issue, it certainly does not appear why either the opinion of Alexander Natalis or that of Henricus a S. Ignatio concerning the present question is said by them to be laxer than the opinion of Concina and St. Alphonsus, if indeed this opinion of the holy Doctor is considered as it is expressed by him and inspected in itself, and not clothed with those appendages with which the VV. have adorned it from every side. Whatever may be the case concerning this, since the VV. ascribe to these two Authors, whom they themselves here call the most rigorous, that they hold doctrine laxer than the opinion of St. Alphonsus, which someone might call exceedingly benign, and almost more benign than is right, considering, namely, so many supports and appendages with which they themselves judged it necessary to adorn, sustain, and fortify it; truly, they now have an example of that which elsewhere (p. 659, in the Note) they ask of us, namely, of Authors who are commonly held to be more rigorous and who, otherwise, not rarely inclined to those laxities which no one among the most benign ever admitted. And, for the rest, the VV. will indeed be able to see very many examples of this kind among the Authors where they dissolve the calumny cast upon the benign opinion, as St. Alphonsus himself calls it, concerning the use of a probable opinion, as though this were a wellspring of laxities. For there they place before the eyes of their more rigorous adversaries laxities found among those writers who are customarily vaunted as followers of the more rigorous opinion. But it is not part of the present purpose to linger over these things.

9. He who, after confession, looks upon the penitent with a stern eye, does not address him as he was accustomed to do before, and shows by harsher words, gestures, or his whole manner of acting that he remembers his sins, is thinking about them at that moment, and esteems him less than before.

667. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can a Confessor deny Holy Communion to a penitent to whom he previously denied absolution, if the latter approaches the sacred table?

Reply. No, even if he asks secretly, because the Confessor cannot use knowledge from confession to act externally against the penitent [7]. - St. Ligorius, no. 658, and others, against some.

[7] De Lugo adds an exception (disputation 23, no. 126) if he is a public sinner. The Confessor could nevertheless (he says) repel a prostitute or a public usurer from the Eucharist in public by reason of knowledge which he has outside confession concerning that public sin. But if he says, "Yet I confessed to you," he can reply, "Nevertheless, your amendment must be evident to the Church through public satisfaction, which is not yet evident."

QUESTION 2. Does he break the seal who says that such a vice reigns in a city or town, or that grave crimes are committed there?

Reply. I distinguish. Yes, if the place is sufficiently small, for example, if it consists of approximately fewer than three thousand persons. Otherwise, if the town is large and public crimes are frequently perpetrated there. - St. Ligorius, no. 654, and others most commonly.

668. ◦ QUESTION 3. Can preachers use knowledge from confession to speak concerning those things of which they would not have thought unless they had heard confessions?

Reply. Yes, provided danger of revelation and burden to the penitents are excluded. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 654. - Elbel, no. 525.

The reason is: first, because it can be a burden to no one that priests sometimes direct themselves in sermons from knowledge of confession, provided that burden is not present here and now. Therefore, they can inveigh generally against vices which secretly prevail. Second, because this would be an excessively grave burden for the Confessor; for he would always fear lest in preaching he use knowledge from confession. Nevertheless, let the Confessor beware lest he speak publicly concerning the altogether particular sins of one or another penitent, especially if he gives a sermon before some small community, for example, in a monastery of Nuns, etc.; because then a burden could easily be introduced. - Elbel, ibid.

669. ◦ QUESTION 4. Can a Priest who knows from confession that ambushes are being prepared for him flee, or in some other manner forestall the harm?

Reply 1. Yes, if by such precaution the sin accused is in no way manifested to others, nor is any burden brought upon the penitent. - Thus St. Ligorius, no. 659. - De Lugo, disputation 23, no. 108, etc.

Reply 2. No, if he cannot flee without in some manner manifesting that some sin was accused by the penitent. The reason is that that flight would be an indirect revelation of the confessed sin; and although the Confessor were to feign flight under some pretext, he would nevertheless always furnish a reasonable suspicion of the sin declared. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others. De Lugo, disputation 23, no. 110, nevertheless warns that experience shows that even an indirect revelation is never necessary for escaping those dangers, since they can be met either with the permission of the penitent or by other means without breaking the seal.

670. ◦ QUESTION 5. Can Superiors use knowledge from confession for external government, if it in no way appears that they direct themselves from that knowledge?

Reply. ALTOGETHER no, with St. Ligorius, no. 656, and others commonly, against some older Theologians who defended the affirmative opinion. - The reason is that this would evidently turn to the burden of penitents; and those who knew that such a doctrine was commonly taught could be withdrawn from confession.

This is also established from various Decrees of the Supreme Pontiffs, especially the Decree of Clement VIII of May 26, 1594, for Regulars, in which it is said: Both the Superiors existing at the time and the Confessors who afterward shall have been promoted to the rank of superiority are to take THE GREATEST CARE lest they use for external government that knowledge which they had in confession concerning the sins of others. In St. Ligorius, no. 656. Although this Decree was issued for Regulars, it must be extended to all Superiors, since the same reason which urges for Regulars also has force for seculars.

This is also established from a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition issued by the authority of Innocent XI in the year 1682, by which the following proposition was proscribed: It is licit to use knowledge acquired from confession, provided that this be done without direct or indirect revelation and burden to the penitent, unless something else much graver should follow from not using it, in comparison with which the former is deservedly held of no account. The Pontiff adds that Confessors can in no way use such a doctrine, even with any revelation whatsoever excluded.

671. ◦ QUESTION 6. Can a Confessor at least sometimes use knowledge from confession, or when can he do so? Reply. According to all Theologians, he can do so in > the following cases: first, to pray for the penitent, or to act more benignly toward him; second, to consult books or wise men, prudently, nevertheless, with danger of revelation excluded; third, to direct himself through experience acquired from confessions, for example, to temper rigor, and to direct himself from the confession of one in prudently questioning or instructing others, giving no suspicion of the prior confession; fourth, to reform his own morals, to correct his own defects, or to discharge his office better, for example, to cast off sloth, to watch over subjects more vigilantly, with suspicion of revelation excluded, etc.; because everyone is bound to correct his defects as soon as he adverts to them; nor can any penitent reasonably be offended that the Confessor changes his life for the better on account of things heard in confession. - St. Ligorius, no. 637.

Conclusion. In a matter so grave and so dangerous, the Confessor must be exceedingly cautious lest he utter any word, or do or intimate anything, whence there can follow even the least odium of the Sacrament, burden of the penitent, offense or scandal of any others whatsoever. Let him therefore be prudent and discreet not only in speech but in his whole manner of acting. Let him pray frequently with the Psalmist (Psalm 140, verse 3): Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and a door round about my lips; or with the Wise Man (Wisdom 9:4): Give me wisdom, that sitteth by thy throne.

End of the Treatise on Penance.

Treatise on Extreme Unction

Chapter I. On the Nature and Effects of Extreme Unction

672. ○ I. Extreme Unction is defined as a Sacrament of the new law instituted by Christ for conferring salvation of soul, or even of body, upon a sick person in danger of death, through the anointing with blessed Oil and the prayer of the Priest.

Extreme Unction is a true Sacrament of the new law. This is established, first, because it is a sensible sign, conferring grace, and instituted by the Lord Jesus Christ. For the nature of a sign is sufficiently evident through the anointing and the prayer of the Priest. That it confers grace is established from its effects. But its divine institution is demonstrated by apostolic tradition. It was promulgated especially by St. James in the Catholic Epistle, 5:14-15, where it is said: Is any man sick among you? Let him bring in the Priests of the Church; and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil...; and the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him.

This is established, second, from the definition of the Council of Trent, session 14, On Extreme Unction, where it is thus said: If anyone says that Extreme Unction is not truly and properly a Sacrament instituted by Christ our Lord and promulgated by the blessed Apostle James, but only a rite received from the Fathers or a human invention, let him be anathema.

673. ○ II. The effects of the Sacrament of Extreme Unction are: first, sanctifying grace together with the actual graces proper to the Sacrament, which wonderfully assist in reviving the sick person and strengthening him against the temptations of the devil.

Second, remission of all sins not yet remitted, even mortal sins. This is established from the text of St. James cited above: And if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him. Hence the Sacrament of Extreme Unction is indeed primarily a Sacrament of the living, but secondarily a Sacrament of the dead, namely, in the hypothesis of the state of sin. It certainly remits venial sins primarily and per se; but more probably it remits mortal sins also in the same manner. - St. Ligorius, no. 731.

Third, the cleansing away of the remnants of sin, which are not only the punishments due to sins but also anxieties of mind, weaknesses, languor toward the good, torpor, fear, and other similar things which are contracted from sins.

But these effects are greater in proportion as the sick person is better disposed in soul. Fourth, restoration of bodily health at times, if it is expedient for the salvation of the soul. This is established from the cited text of St. James and from the Council of Trent, session 14, On Extreme Unction, chapter 2. Hence it is evident how shamefully those err who do not receive this Sacrament unless the disease has become so strong that they can no longer be healed without a miracle. - St. Ligorius, no. 731.

Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of Extreme Unction

Article I. On the Matter of This Sacrament

674. Principles. - I. The remote matter is Oil blessed by the Bishop. This is established from the Council of Trent, session 14, On Extreme Unction, chapter 1, where it is thus said: The Church understood the matter (of this Sacrament) to be Oil blessed by the Bishop; for the anointing most aptly represents the grace of the Holy Spirit, by which the soul of the sick person is invisibly anointed.

II. The Oil of Extreme Unction, or of the sick, is to be blessed by the diocesan Bishop, or, when the See is vacant, by another neighboring Bishop, on the Supper of the Lord, just as Chrism is, and is to be renewed every year, though not for the validity of the Sacrament. Thus from the precept of Clement VIII in St. Ligorius, no. 708; and the Salmanticenses, chapter 2, no. 10. This is also established from the perpetual practice of the Church and from the Roman Ritual, On Extreme Unction, where it is said: The holy Oil is to be renewed every year on the Supper of the Lord, the old having been burned.

675. ◦ III. The proximate matter is the anointing of certain parts of the body, which are at least the five senses. For the anointing is to be made: first, on the eyes, or on the eyelids; second, on the ears; third, on the nostrils; fourth, on the mouth, or on the lower lip; fifth, on the hands, on the outside for Priests and on the inside for laymen; sixth, on the feet, or on the tops of the feet; seventh, on the loins; but this last is omitted for women, and also in men if it cannot easily be done, namely, if the sick person cannot be moved. Indeed, today, says Scavini, it is omitted in every case and for everyone.

676. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does the precept of renewing the oil bind under grave sin?

Reply. Yes, as it seems, because the matter appears sufficiently grave. Nevertheless, if new oil cannot be obtained, it is licit to use the old. - St. Ligorius, no. 708.

But if perhaps the blessed Oil is going to run short within the year, and no other can be obtained, other unblessed oil, in a smaller quantity, nevertheless, can be poured into the blessed Oil. - Roman Ritual. And this can be done repeatedly, although little by little a quantity even much greater than that consecrated by the Bishop at the beginning is added, provided, nevertheless, that in each admixture it is smaller than the other part into which it is poured. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 2. Must the oil necessarily be from olives?

Reply. Yes. The reason is: first, because by the name oil, properly speaking and according to common usage, olive oil is understood. Second, this is established elsewhere from the Decree of Eugene IV for the Armenians, in which it is read concerning Extreme Unction: Its matter is olive oil. Third, it is also evident from the whole of tradition and the unanimous consent of the Doctors. - See St. Ligorius, no. 708.

677. ◦ QUESTION 3. Must this oil necessarily be blessed by the Bishop?

Reply. Yes. This is established from various Declarations of Paul V and, most recently, of Gregory XVI on September 4, 1842.

QUESTION 4. Must the oil be blessed in relation to Extreme Unction?

Reply. It is disputed. There is a twofold probable opinion, as St. Ligorius says, no. 709. Some deny it, because the Church requires nothing other than that the oil be blessed by the Bishop. Hence (they say) the Oil of the sick and Chrism can validly be employed for making the anointings. Others, however, affirm it, because just as Chrism is deputed by its proper blessing for Confirmation, so also the Oil of the sick for the Sacrament of Extreme Unction. In practice the safer course must altogether be followed, except in a case of necessity, in which this Sacrament is to be administered conditionally with another blessed Oil, and afterward, if the Oil of the sick can be obtained, it is to be repeated. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

I said with another blessed oil, for a threefold holy Oil is distinguished, which is blessed by the Bishop in the same ceremony on Thursday of the Supper of the Lord, namely, the Oil of the sick, the Oil of catechumens, and holy Chrism, or Oil with balsam mixed into it. First, the Oil of the sick serves only for anointing the sick in danger of death and for the consecration of bells in the external Anointing, for Chrism is employed for the internal one. Second, the Oil of catechumens is deputed for anointing catechumens on the breast and between the shoulder blades before Baptism, for consecrating the hands of newly ordained priests, and likewise for certain other consecrations, for example, of kings, etc. Third, Chrism is employed in the Sacrament of Confirmation, in the ceremonies of Baptism after the Sacrament has already been conferred, and for other consecrations, for example, of a chalice, paten, ciborium, altar, bell (on the inside), etc. - See the Roman Pontifical, especially where it treats of the ceremonies of Thursday of the Supper of the Lord.

678. ○ QUESTION 5. Is the anointing of the five senses of the necessity of the Sacrament?

Reply. It appears more probable that it must be affirmed, with the more common opinion of the Theologians, to which the practice of the Church agrees; and this practice is always to be observed, except in a case of necessity. Nevertheless, the negative opinion is called speculatively probable by St. Ligorius, no. 710.

679. ○ QUESTION 6. Is a double anointing on paired parts required by the necessity of the Sacrament, for example, on both eyes, both ears, etc.?

Reply. No, because the whole sense is present in one part. Nevertheless, outside a case of necessity the double anointing is to be observed by force of precept. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 7. How must the anointings be made?

Reply. The anointings must be made with the right thumb of the Priest, who must utter the form at the same time and anoints the sick person in the manner of a cross. Thus from the Roman Ritual. But these things pertain to liceity, not to validity. On paired members, however, one begins with the right, for example, with the right eye, etc. - Roman Ritual.

680. ○ QUESTION 8. Must an order among the anointings of the various senses be observed by the necessity of the Sacrament?

Reply. No. The reason is that an inversion of this kind in no way impedes the signification of the Sacrament. Nevertheless, they commonly say that such an inversion is gravely illicit because it is contrary to the usage of the Church in a notable matter. - St. Ligorius, no. 710, at the end, etc.

QUESTION 9. Can Extreme Unction be conferred upon those who are mute, deaf, or blind from birth?

Reply. Yes; for they can be anointed near the organs which they lack; for although they did not sin externally through them, nevertheless, through the interior powers of the soul to which they correspond they could have sinned [1].

[1] It does not appear necessary to have recourse to this reason. For the Sacraments by their own power effect the infusion of sanctifying grace; and this grace, if a suitable disposition is not lacking in the subject, expels all sins whatsoever, whether they were perpetrated by the external senses or by the internal powers alone.

681. ○ QUESTION 10. How is a sick person deprived of a hand or foot, etc., to be anointed?

Reply. The anointing is to be made on the part nearest to the mutilated member; for thus the Roman Ritual speaks: If anyone is mutilated in some member, let the part nearest to that place be anointed with the same form of words.

QUESTION 11. Does one drop of oil alone suffice for making the anointings?

Reply. More probably, yes. The reason is that he who anoints with one drop of oil truly anoints; for oil is diffused more than other liquids. - Thus St. Ligorius as more probable, Lacroix, no. 2094, and others more commonly. - But some deny it, because to anoint is to diffuse oil over various parts, which is not done by a single drop of oil. But it is replied that the oil is diffused over various parts when the five senses are anointed, even if the same drop is employed. In practice it is safer, and certainly suffices for the validity of the Sacrament, to dip the extremity of the finger into the oil for each of the particular anointings which are made under the repeated form.

QUESTION 12. In time of plague or of some contagious disease, is it licit to perform the sacred anointings by means of a brush?

Reply. Yes, at least more probably, from Benedict XIV, who brings forward many authors for this opinion. (On the Synod, book 13, chapter 19.)

Article II. On the Form of Extreme Unction

682. ○ The form of Extreme Unction is this: Through this holy anointing and His most tender mercy, may the Lord forgive you whatever you have sinned through sight (the eye having been anointed, and so concerning the others). This is established from the Council of Trent, session 14, chapter On Extreme Unction, and from the Roman Ritual. The form is to be repeated integrally for each part to be anointed, expressing the member which is then anointed, namely, through sight when anointing the eyes, through hearing in the anointing of the ears, etc.

683. Questions. - QUESTION 1. For the validity of the Sacrament, is the expression of each sense required, namely, THROUGH SIGHT, THROUGH HEARING, etc.?

Reply. It is disputed. Some deny it because it is not found in the form of the Greeks, which nevertheless is admitted by the Church as valid. Others affirm it because through one anointing and the form corresponding to it there are remitted not the remnants of sins of every kind, but only of those which were committed through that sense. Since, therefore, the matter is doubtful, the expression of the sense must be employed under grave sin. - Billuart.

QUESTION 2. Which words are essential to the form?

Reply. They are the following: Through this anointing, may the Lord forgive you whatever you have sinned, with the word expressing the sense, that is, through sight, etc.

QUESTION 3. Does one form suffice for all the senses for validity, if the individual senses are distinctly expressed and anointed?

Reply. It is disputed. Some affirm it because this form is virtually multiple and is equivalent to several particular forms, and thus specially signifies the effect of each particular form. Others, however, deny it, because, since the partial matters, namely, the anointings, are distinct, particular forms must also correspond to each.

Nevertheless, when necessity urges, this general form is to be recommended: Through this holy anointing and His most tender mercy, may the Lord forgive you whatever you have sinned through the senses: sight, hearing, taste, smell, and touch. But the senses are to be anointed while they are being expressed. If time remains, however, the anointings are to be repeated conditionally with the form proper to each, and the other omitted prayers are to be added, as prescribed in the Ritual. - St. Ligorius, no. 710.

Chapter III. On the Minister of Extreme Unction

684. ◦ I. The Priest alone is the minister of this Sacrament. This is established: first, from the words of St. James already cited: Is any man sick among you? Let him bring in the Priests of the Church, etc.; second, from the definition of the Church. For thus the Council of Trent, session 14, On Extreme Unction, canon 4: If anyone says that the Priests of the Church, whom blessed James exhorts to be brought in for anointing the sick person, are not Priests ordained by a Bishop but elders in age in any community whatsoever, and that for this reason the proper minister of Extreme Unction is not the Priest alone, let him be anathema.

II. Every Priest can validly minister that Sacrament, because the power of validly conferring it belongs to the Priest by reason of Order itself. Nevertheless, no one can licitly minister it except the Pastor of souls alone, because it pertains to the pastor to feed his sheep. But Religious who presume to minister this Sacrament without the permission of the Pastor incur ipso facto an excommunication reserved to the Pope. - Thus from the Clementine On Privileges and the Constitution of Pius IX, Apostolicae Sedis.

685. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can any Priest minister this Sacrament by the probably presumed consent of the Pastor?

Reply. More probably, yes, because it does not appear that one must proceed with so much rigor where there is question of delegation for mere liceity, and there is no question at all of the validity of the Sacrament itself. Nevertheless, such delegation is not easily to be presumed. - St. Ligorius, no. 722. - The Salmanticenses and others, against others.

Nevertheless, if the Priest to whom administration of this Sacrament belongs is absent, or is bound by excommunication or suspension, any Priest can administer this Sacrament in a case of necessity, and indeed must do so from charity. - Scavini.

QUESTION 2. Is it a mortal sin to omit the prayers prescribed in the Ritual, or to minister without sacred vestments?

Reply to the first. Yes, because the matter is very grave. Except a case of necessity. - St. Ligorius, no. 727, and others commonly.

Reply to the second. Yes, likewise, outside necessity; but in necessity, more probably no. - Thus more commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 726, against some.

686. ◦ QUESTION 3. Is there an obligation to minister Extreme Unction, or what is it?

Reply. Unless he is excused by some grave cause, the Pastor is bound by reason of his office, under mortal sin, to minister it to subjects dangerously sick who ask for it. - St. Ligorius, no. 729, etc. Recall what was said concerning the Sacraments in general, no. 213.

QUESTION 4. Is it a sin to minister Extreme Unction without a light, or what kind of sin is it?

Reply. It is not to be excused from venial sin unless necessity urges, both on account of the custom of the Church and on account of the reverence due to the Sacrament. - Nevertheless, it does not exceed venial sin, because a grave injury does not appear to be inflicted upon the Sacrament [1]. - St. Ligorius, no. 728, etc.

[1] Concerning this matter, only the following is contained in the Roman Ritual: The Priest... is to take care that there be prepared... likewise a wax candle, which, afterward lighted, may furnish light to him while anointing.

687. ○ QUESTION 5. When a sick person receives both Viaticum and Extreme Unction, which Sacrament must be administered first?

Reply. Extreme Unction must be administered after the Eucharist. Thus the Rubric of the Roman Ritual expressly establishes. - In that case the Confiteor must be recited twice. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 5, 1841.

QUESTION 6. What kind of sin is it to omit the sign of the cross in the anointings?

Reply. It is only venial according to the common opinion, because grave matter is not apprehended there; but in necessity there is no sin. - St. Ligorius, no. 728.

688. ○ QUESTION 7. Is it a sin to confer this Sacrament without a server assisting, or what kind of sin is it; and can a woman be employed in necessity?

Reply to the first. It is not a mortal sin to employ no server, and in necessity there is no sin. - Thus the Theologians most commonly. - Indeed, according to several, there is probably no sin even outside a case of necessity. But St. Ligorius, no. 824, calls the opposite more probable.

Reply to the second. A woman is never to be employed for the office of server; and if a Cleric or layman cannot easily be found, let the Priest alone perform all the ceremonies and himself make the responses to the prayers. - Thus St. Ligorius, ibid., and others most commonly.

QUESTION 8. Can the article of death be awaited before conferring this Sacrament?

Reply. No. Indeed, the Theologians commonly teach that Pastors sin gravely who defer it until the sick person is deprived of the use of the senses and of reason: because thus the sick person lacks the more abundant fruit which he would have received if he had received the Sacrament while in possession of reason; moreover, because he is deprived of spiritual strength for resisting the demon and enduring the hardships of the disease; and also because, if the sick person were in mortal sin and had received the Sacrament while still in possession of reason, by the help of attrition he would have obtained grace, of which he is otherwise deprived; finally, because by the power of this Sacrament he could have obtained bodily health if it had been conferred upon him at a suitable time. Hence the Roman Catechism: They sin most gravely who are accustomed to await that time for anointing the sick person when, all hope of health having already been lost, he begins to be deprived of life and the senses. On Extreme Unction, no. 18.

The Pastor must remember above all that the care of the sick is not among the last parts of his office. Thus the Roman Ritual, title On the Visitation and Care of the Sick. - Wherefore Catalanus rightly says: that the Pastor is bound in justice to assist the sick of his parish, especially in the commendation of the soul, is a certain opinion approved by the unanimous consent of Theologians. And several Declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, reported in the Analecta Iuris Pontificii (July 1861), agree.

Chapter IV. On the Subject of Extreme Unction

689. ◦ The subjects of this Sacrament are all and only sinners who are sick and in danger of death. This is established: first, from the words of St. James: Is any man sick among you? Let him bring in the Priests of the Church, etc.; but the Greek word is sick signifies a dangerous illness. Second, from the definition of the Church. For thus in the Decree of Union: This Sacrament ought not to be given except to a sick person concerning whose death there is fear. The Council of Trent, session 14, chapter 3, agrees.

Hence children before the use of reason and the perpetually insane are not capable of this Sacrament, because they have committed no actual sins.

690. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must Extreme Unction be conferred upon delirious sick persons?

Reply. Yes, if they previously asked for the Sacrament, or would have asked for it if they had thought of this, or showed a sign of sorrow for sins. Indeed, also upon sick persons deprived of the senses, as is established from the Roman Ritual. - Recall what was said concerning the Sacraments in general, no. 230.

QUESTION 2. Can this Sacrament licitly be conferred upon a sick person in doubtful, or probable, danger of death?

Reply. Yes, with the common and true opinion, because for administering this Sacrament validly and licitly, it suffices that the sick person labor under a disease so grave that he is prudently judged to be in danger of death. This is confirmed from the Roman Ritual, where it is thus established: This Sacrament must be furnished to the sick who labor so gravely that the danger of death appears imminent. - St. Ligorius, no. 714, etc.

QUESTION 3. Can Extreme Unction be conferred upon children?

Reply. Yes, provided they are possessed of reason and are judged capable of malice and fault. Thus Benedict XIV (On the Synod, book 8, chapter 6), who sharply condemns certain synodal Constitutions by which a determinate age was fixed before which children could not be anointed.

691. ◦ QUESTION 4. Can this Sacrament be repeated, or when can it be repeated?

Reply 1. It can certainly be repeated whenever a sick person anointed in a dangerous illness recovers and again falls into a dangerous disease. This is established from the Council of Trent, session 14, On Extreme Unction, chapter 3, where it is said: But if the sick, after receiving this anointing, recover, they can again be assisted by the aid of this Sacrament when they fall into another similar danger of life.

Reply 2. It can also be repeated in the same illness if it has been prolonged and the sick person has notably recovered, so that he appeared to have been rescued from the danger of death, and falls into the same danger again. The reason is that then there is truly a new danger of death. This is established from the Roman Ritual, where it is said: In the same illness this Sacrament ought not to be repeated unless it is prolonged, as when the sick person, after having recovered, falls again into danger of death.

QUESTION 5. Can it be repeated in the same prolonged disease if it is doubted whether the state of the disease has truly changed?

Reply. More probably, yes, if the doubt is truly positive, namely, when it is truly probable that the sick person has passed out of the danger of death; for this repetition in these cases is more conformable to the ancient custom of the Church. - St. Ligorius, no. 715.

692. ○ QUESTION 6. Is there a grave obligation to receive this Sacrament?

Reply. There is a twofold probable opinion.

The first OPINION affirms it. First, it is evident (they say) from the words of the Apostle James himself: Is any man sick among you? Let him bring in the Priests of the Church, etc. But the word let him bring in contains a precept. Therefore, etc. Second, there is added the practice of the Church, which has always taken the greatest care that it be received by all the sick. It also appears to be established from the custom and sense of the faithful. Third, in addition, it is grave and contrary to the charity which each owes to himself to omit a means so efficacious and a most firm protection, as the Council of Trent says, against the attempts of the demon in the final agony. - Thus Roncaglia with others.

The second OPINION denies it. The reason is that neither from Tradition nor from the Decrees of Councils is a precept of receiving this Sacrament established. But what St. James says, let him bring in the Priests..., is understood and explained as counsel. Therefore, a grave obligation of receiving Extreme Unction cannot be imposed. - Thus Billuart, article 7, after St. Thomas, part 5, question 65, article 4; Sporer, no. 106, etc.; and St. Ligorius, no. 733, where he calls this opinion common, although he thinks the first altogether to be recommended, chiefly by reason of the charity which each owes to himself: For in so great a danger, he says, he appears to expose himself to succumbing to temptations who neglects to fortify himself with this Sacrament instituted by Christ the Lord as a most firm protection in so great a conflict.

693. ○ QUESTION 7. What disposition is required for the reception of this Sacrament?

Reply 1. Confession of sins, if the sick person is in mortal sin; for this Sacrament is the complement of Penance, and therefore Penance must precede it. - Billuart, article 7, at the end.

Reply 2. But if the sick person cannot confess his sins, it is necessary that at least contrition precede; for this Sacrament of Extreme Unction is primarily a Sacrament of the living and was instituted chiefly for removing the remnants of sins. - Billuart, ibid. But in such a case attrition itself seems able to suffice; for it is at the same time a Sacrament of the dead and can remit mortal sins with attrition. - The Salmanticenses, no. 13, and others.

Treatise on Order

We must treat: first, of the nature and division of Order; second, of its matter and form; third, of its Minister; fourth, of the subject of Order.

Chapter I. On the Nature and Division of Order

694. ○ By the name Order here is understood a rank of Clerics consecrated for special ecclesiastical Offices. But how great the dignity and excellence of this Sacrament is can scarcely be expressed by a human voice. Concerning this matter the Catechism of the Council of Trent, among many other things, speaks thus: The power conferred upon it both of consecrating and offering the Body and Blood of our Lord and of remitting sins surpasses human reason and understanding, much less can anything equal and similar to it be found on earth.

Order is commonly defined as a certain seal of the Church by which spiritual power is bestowed upon the one ordained. - St. Ligorius, no. 735, after St. Thomas, etc. According to others, it is also rightly defined as: A Sacrament of the new law by which spiritual power is handed over and grace is conferred for duly performing ecclesiastical duties.

695. Matters to Be Established. - I. Order is a true and properly so-called Sacrament of the new law.

This is established because all things required for the nature of a Sacrament are found in it, namely: first, a sensible sign, since it is conferred with an exterior sign. Second, divine institution, since Christ instituted the Apostles as Ministers of Order and gave them the power of consecrating, remitting sins, dispensing the sacred Mysteries, governing the Church, and instituting other Ministers. Acts 22. - 1 Corinthians 12. - Galatians 2. - Matthew 28. Third, the conferral of grace, as is established from 1 Timothy 4:24. Neglect not, says the Apostle, the grace that is in thee, which was given thee by prophecy, with imposition of the hands of the priesthood. And 2 Timothy 1:6: I admonish thee that thou stir up the grace of God which is in thee by the imposition of my hands.

It is also gathered from the definition of the Council of Trent, session 23, canon 3, where it is thus read: If anyone says that Order is not truly and properly a Sacrament instituted by Christ the Lord, let him be anathema.

696. ○ II. Seven Orders are enumerated, namely, the Priesthood, the Diaconate, Subdiaconate, Acolytate, Exorcistate, Lectorate, and Ostiariate. The first three are called major Orders, the others minor.

This is deduced from several Councils, especially from the Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 2; for after it had said explicitly that Priests and Deacons are spoken of in the sacred Scriptures, it adds: From the very beginning of the Church, the names of the following Orders and the ministries proper to each of them, namely, Subdeacon, Acolyte, Exorcist, Lector, and Porter, are known to have been in use. Likewise, canon 2 says: If anyone says that besides the Priesthood there are not in the Catholic Church other Orders, both major and minor, through which, as though by certain steps, one tends toward the Priesthood, let him be anathema.

697. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What is the nature and property of these Orders?

Reply 1. The Ostiariate is the Order by which there is conferred a special power of opening or closing the door of the Church, admitting the worthy, and excluding the unworthy.

2. The Lectorate is the Order by which there is handed over a special power of reading psalms and lessons from the pulpit in the Church, and of catechizing the people, or instructing them in matters of Faith.

3. The Exorcistate is the Order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of casting out demons through exorcisms instituted by the Church.

Nevertheless, today the faculty of exorcizing is reserved to Priests alone, who can use it only with the permission of the Ordinary. - Recall what was said, volume 1, no. 317.

4. The Acolytate is the Order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of serving the Subdeacon during solemn Mass, lighting candles, and preparing and presenting the cruets of wine and water.

5. The Subdiaconate is the Order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of serving the Deacon at solemn Mass and chanting the Epistle with solemn rite.

6. The Diaconate is the Order by which there is conferred the special power of immediately assisting the Priest at solemn Mass, chanting the Gospel during the solemn rites, preaching, and solemnly baptizing, provided, nevertheless, that a just cause intervenes. Whether a Deacon, in order to preach at some time, needs the special permission of the Bishop, or whether the permission of the Pastor or Rector of the Church suffices, appears to be determined from particular statutes or custom.

7. The Priesthood is the Order by which there is conferred the special power of consecrating the Body and Blood of Christ in the celebration of Mass, absolving from sins, and feeding subjects by deed and doctrine.

To these add the Episcopate and first tonsure, of which the former is the complement of the Priesthood itself, while the latter is not an Order but a disposition toward Orders by which someone is declared a Cleric.

698. ◦ QUESTION 2. Is the Diaconate a Sacrament?

Reply. Yes, according to the common and certain opinion, because all things required for a Sacrament are found in it, namely: first, a sensible sign, through the imposition of hands; second, a sign of grace, in the words of the form: Receive the Holy Spirit, etc.; third, a sign instituted by God, because God alone can institute signs conferring grace. This is also established from the Council of Trent, session 23, canon 6, where it is thus defined: If anyone says that in the Catholic Church there is not a hierarchy instituted by divine ordination, which consists of Bishops, Priests, and Ministers (namely, Deacons), let him be anathema. - See St. Ligorius, no. 737.

699. ◦ QUESTION 3. Is the Subdiaconate also a Sacrament?

Reply. It is disputed. The first probable OPINION affirms it. The reason is that the Subdiaconate, just as the Diaconate, possesses all the signs constitutive of a Sacrament; for it is: first, a sensible sign, as is evident; second, a sign of grace, since it is a sacred Order; third, a sign instituted by God, for the Council of Trent defined that in the Church there is a hierarchy instituted by divine ordination, which consists of Bishops, Priests, and Ministers; but Subdeacons, no differently from Deacons themselves, are to be numbered among the Ministers. - Thus Billuart, with many others after St. Thomas, Supplement, question 37, article 2.

The second OPINION, likewise probable, indeed perhaps more probable, denies it. For there is doubt both concerning divine institution and consequently concerning the promise of grace. Nor does the Subdiaconate appear to be numbered among the major Orders by divine institution, but only by ecclesiastical institution, since among the Greeks it is not regarded as a sacred Order. - St. Ligorius, no. 737.

But the minor Orders, according to the common opinion, are by no means to be numbered among the Sacraments. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of Order

700. ○ The matter and form vary for the various Orders.

I. As regards the minor Orders, with respect to the matter, the Porter is ordained by the handing over of the keys of the Church; the Lector by the handing over of the book of lessons; the Exorcist by the handing over of the book of exorcisms; the Acolyte by the handing over of empty cruets, or at least one, and of a candlestick with an extinguished candle, because it is his office to prepare the light, wine, and water for Mass. The form proper to these Orders is contained in the words which the Bishop uses while handing over the instruments themselves.

II. As regards the Subdiaconate, the imposition of hands is considered the matter among the Greeks. Among the Latins it is disputed. According to some, the handing over of an empty chalice with an empty paten is its sole proximate matter. Others, however, contend that the handing over of the book of Epistles is likewise essential matter of this Order. The form, moreover, is contained in these words: See whose ministry is handed over to you; and I admonish you so to conduct yourselves that you may be able to please God.

701. ○ III. As regards the Diaconate, a twofold matter is established, namely, the imposition of the Bishop's right hand and the handing over of the book of the Gospels. It is disputed whether both of these, or only one, are necessary. Some Theologians think that the imposition of hands alone is necessary, others the handing over of the book alone, and still others both. As regards practice, however, this last opinion, as the safer, is to be held. Consequently, there is also a twofold form. That which is added to the former matter is this: Receive the Holy Spirit for strength and for resisting the devil and his temptations, in the name of the Lord. That which accompanies the latter matter is of this kind: Receive the power of reading the Gospel in the Church of God, both for the living and for the dead, in the name of the Lord.

IV. As regards the Priesthood, among the Greeks its matter is placed in the imposition of hands alone; but among the Latins it is twofold, at least by precept, namely, the imposition of the Bishop's hands and the handing over of the chalice with wine and of the paten with the host placed upon it. It is disputed among Theologians what the essential matter is. More probably it consists in the second imposition of hands alone, which is made by the Bishop with the assisting Priests. - St. Ligorius, no. 749.

The form likewise varies according to the diversity of the matter; therefore it is likewise disputed. Hence the form which corresponds to the handing over of the instruments is this: Receive the power of offering Sacrifice to God and of celebrating Masses both for the living and for the dead, in the name of the Lord. But the form proper to the imposition of hands is the prayer itself which the Bishop recites while he imposes hands upon those to be ordained. - See St. Ligorius, no. 739 and following.

702. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is physical contact with the instruments required?

Reply. St. Ligorius, no. 743, says that there are two probable opinions and consequently that the safer one is to be followed in practice. Nevertheless, the negative opinion is to be called safe from the Decisions of the Sacred Congregation of Rites. For when a certain French Religious named Ephrem Chasteau had touched neither the chalice nor the paten by physical contact in his ordination to the Priesthood, being moved by a scruple he proposed the case to the Sacred Congregation of Rites. But the Sacred Congregation replied to this scruple of Brother Ephrem: He can continue the celebration of the Most Holy Sacrifice without any scruple and with an altogether safe conscience (December 3, 1661, in a case from France). And the Sacred Congregation again confirmed this Declaration in a Roman case on January 21, 1863 [1].

[1] The Decision of the Sacred Congregation of December 3, 1661, has thus: To the scruple of Brother Ephrem Chasteau, pro-agent of the Recollects of France, namely, that he did not touch the Chalice by physical contact in his Ordination to the Priesthood, the Sacred Congregation replied: He can continue the celebration of the Most Holy Sacrifice without any scruple and with an altogether safe conscience. The VV. therefore rightly observe (p. 389) that in this Decision no mention is made of the paten.

The VV. add (ibid.) that Father Ballerini subscribed to the opinion of Father Gury, since he added no annotation or correction. Reply. I deny the consequence, because silence of this kind merely indicates that the questions, in the state in which they were left, are permitted to the judgment of the reader.

The VV. add another reason (ibid.), because Father Ballerini inserted more briefly into the text another Decision of the Sacred Congregation which Gury had reported in the Note in these words: The aforesaid Decision was more recently confirmed by the same Congregation (of Sacred Rites). For when a similar case had occurred at Rome for a newly ordained Priest of the Roman College of the Society of Jesus, Father Perrone, very well known for his theological works, questioned the Sacred Congregation of Rites concerning it; and it gave precisely the same response from the authentic Declaration already made previously, on the occasion of the scruple of Brother Ephrem, on January 21, 1863. Reply. The reason for inserting even this annotation of Father Gury into the text was clearly stated in the Notice to the Reader in these words: It seemed good to remove a certain confusion introduced by the twofold series of Notes, of which some had Father Gury as author, while others had first been added in the Roman edition of the year 1866. As regards the former, we took care that all of them, each in its own place, be inserted into the text. Again, therefore, I deny the consequence.

Finally, after the VV. filled sixteen columns with texts of Authors, they also conclude this (p. 398): If, therefore, the Sacred Congregation of Rites in the year 1661 had defined that the Ordination, as certainly valid, was not to be repeated, the same Sacred Congregation would not only have rejected the most common opinion of the Doctors but would have declared it to be despised as a mere scruple; which is repugnant to all probability. Moreover, it is not probable that all the Doctors who treated this matter after the year 1661 were ignorant of the aforesaid decision; whence it must be said that at least several held it as a response in a particular case, but not as a general definition.

Let it be permissible to observe briefly a few things concerning these matters. And first, it was to be wished that while the VV. wrote these things, they had kept in memory what was done concerning the sixteen Decrees of the Holy Inquisition concerning the denunciation of soliciting Confessors, issued in the same year 1661 and indeed solemnly confirmed by Benedict XIV in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae. For in order to excuse St. Alphonsus, who holds conclusions rejected by these Decrees, they themselves strove to show that Decrees of this kind could have been altogether unknown to Authors. Why, therefore, do they now contend that it is not probable that all the Doctors who treated this matter after the year 1661 were ignorant of the aforesaid Decision?

Likewise, what they add, that at least several held it (the Decision) as a response in a particular case but not as a general definition, could be called probable if these several in any manner either reported or at least mentioned that Decision. Yet the VV. themselves (p. 397) allege only Scavini, who made mention of it.

Finally (p. 398), they conclude that the proposed question has not yet been defined. But if here they think it lawful to assert, after the Decision of the Sacred Congregation in the year 1661, and indeed one confirmed by the same Sacred Congregation in the year 1863, that the question has not yet been defined, why, then, on account of a Response of the Sacred Congregation, likewise private to a private person, do they elsewhere in some manner sing a triumph and proclaim the question defined, although against the unanimous opinion of Theologians and Canonists, when elsewhere St. Alphonsus, through responses of this kind, so little judged a question defined that, as we saw elsewhere (see above, Note

(a) to no. 589, p. 542, and p. 486, in the Note), he did not hesitate to hold and teach the opposite? Do not the VV. here also recall to the reader's mind that saying: Weight and weight, measure and measure?

Moreover, no reasonable and well-founded scruple can be present in anyone ordained. For in practice Bishops are accustomed so to proceed that in a matter of such importance they always hold the safer way. Moreover, so many Ministers and Officials have the duty of watching over the rite to be observed in Ordination that moral certainty is had that all things were done rightly and validly.

QUESTION 2. Is the handing over of both species necessarily required?

Reply. More probably, yes, because through the handing over of one species the power over the whole Sacrifice is not handed over. - St. Ligorius as more probable, no. 750. - The Salmanticenses, chapter 3, no. 45.

703. ○ QUESTION 3. Is he validly ordained who touches the host but not the paten; and he who touches the chalice and paten but not the host?

Reply to the first. Yes, with the common opinion, which appears most probable. The reason is that the host and wine are the substantial matter of Order, by which the power over the Body of Christ is principally signified, while the chalice and paten are employed from the precept of the Church for the sake of fittingness alone. Nevertheless, in practice the safer part is to be followed. - St. Ligorius, no. 751.

Reply to the second. Likewise yes, with the common and truer opinion, says St. Ligorius. The reason is: first, because then the host is touched through the mediation of the paten; but immediate contact with the host is not prescribed by the Church, but only with the paten, as is evident from the Pontifical. Second, because the wine in the chalice is never touched immediately; therefore, neither is it required that the host be touched immediately. Nevertheless, care is to be taken that the one to be ordained touch the chalice, the paten, and the host at the same time, and thus he will free himself from every scruple. - St. Ligorius, no. 752.

Chapter III. On the Minister of the Sacrament of Order

704. Principles. - I. The Bishop alone is the ordinary Minister of the Sacrament of Order. This is established: first, from Scripture, which attributes the right of conferring Orders to none other than the Apostles and the Bishops, their successors. - Acts of the Apostles 6:6 and 14:22. - 2 Timothy 1:6.

Second, from perpetual tradition, which innumerable Councils demonstrate, but especially those of Florence and Trent. For thus the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union: The ordinary Minister of this Sacrament (of Order) is the Bishop. And the Council of Trent, session 23, canon 7: If anyone says that Bishops are not superior to Priests, or do not have the power of confirming and ordaining, or that the power which they have is common to them with Priests..., let him be anathema.

II. A simple Priest, by commission of the Supreme Pontiff, can be the extraordinary Minister of tonsure and the four minor Orders.

This is proved from the Councils, especially from the Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 10, On Reformation, where it is said: It is not lawful hereafter for Abbots or any others whatsoever, however exempt and privileged, to confer tonsure or minor Orders upon anyone who is not a Regular subject to them. Therefore, the Council of Trent supposes that they can confer Orders upon their own Religious. - Thus most commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 762.

705. ○ III. A Bishop can licitly ordain only his own subjects, but cannot licitly ordain others without the faculty of their Bishop.

This is gathered from the Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 8, On Reformation: Let each one be ordained by his own Bishop; but if anyone asks to be promoted by another, let this in no way be permitted to him unless his probity and morals are commended by the testimony of his own Ordinary.... If it is done otherwise, let the one ordaining be suspended from the conferral of Orders for a year, and the one ordained from the exercise of the Orders received for as long as shall appear expedient to his own Ordinary [1].

[1] The Constitution of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX, Apostolicae Sedis, October 12, 1869, reserves this latae sententiae suspension to the Supreme Pontiff in these words: Those ordaining the subject of another, even under the pretext of a Benefice to be conferred immediately or already conferred but by no means sufficient, without dimissorial letters of his Bishop, or even their own subject who has remained elsewhere for so long a time that he could have contracted a canonical impediment there, without testimonial letters of the Ordinary of that place, incur by the law itself suspension for a year from the administration of Orders.

The following suspension is likewise reserved to the Apostolic See: Secular Clerics from outside, residing in the City for more than four months, ordained by someone other than their own Ordinary without the permission of the Cardinal Vicar of the City, or without a previous examination conducted before him, or even by their own Ordinary after they have been rejected in the aforesaid examination; likewise Clerics belonging to any of the six suburbicarian Episcopal sees, if they are ordained outside their own diocese with the dimissorial letters of their Ordinary directed to someone other than the Cardinal Vicar of the City... incur by the law itself suspension from the Orders thus received at the good pleasure of the Holy See; but the Bishops ordaining them incur suspension from the use of Pontificals for a year.

706. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Who is considered the proper Bishop of the one to be ordained?

Reply. A Bishop can be proper by a threefold title, namely: first, by title of the nativity of the one to be ordained, or when the one to be ordained was born in his diocese, though not by chance; second, by title of domicile, or when the one to be ordained has a true and proper domicile in that diocese, and not merely a quasi-domicile; third, by title of benefice, or when the one to be ordained possesses a benefice in the Bishop's diocese. - Thus Boniface VIII, chapter Cum nullus ordinandorum.

To the threefold title which we have mentioned, a fourth is added, namely, the title of familiarity, by force of which a Bishop can ordain his familiar who is not his subject if he has had him with himself for three years and, with all fraud removed, immediately confers a benefice upon him. - Thus the Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 9, On Reformation. - St. Ligorius, no. 780.

In France, by general practice, the Bishop of origin alone is accustomed to ordain; nevertheless, such a custom is not considered to have the force of law. Therefore, a Bishop ordaining someone by reason of domicile would not sin. - Bouvier, chapter 4, article 3. - Gousset, no. 648.

707. ○ QUESTION 2. Who can grant dimissorial letters?

Reply 1. When the see is not vacant, the Bishop of the one to be ordained alone can give dimissorial letters, either by himself or through his Vicars General, upon whom Bishops ordinarily confer this faculty. For it belongs to the Bishop alone to govern the diocese and by ordinary right to confer Orders. Reply 2. When the See is vacant, the Chapter indeed has the faculty of granting dimissorial letters, but not within one year from the day of the vacancy. - Thus from the Council of Trent, session 7, chapter 10, On Reformation.

708. ○ QUESTION 3. By which Bishop are Regulars to be ordained?

Reply. Regulars are to be ordained by the Bishop in whose diocese is the monastery where they then reside. - Thus from the chapter Cum nullus.

If, however, the Bishop is absent or cannot hold an ordination, the Superior, after delivering dimissorial letters, can send his subjects to any Bishop to be ordained, provided that they show this Bishop the testimony of the Vicar General, chancellor, or secretary of their own Bishop. - See St. Ligorius, no. 788.

In the ordination of Regulars, however, the provision of the Roman Pontifical is to be observed as regards the formula: Do you promise obedience to your Ordinary?, etc. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Rites, July 22, 1848, in a case from Ghent.

QUESTION 4. What Mass is to be said by the Bishop in a general conferral of Orders when some feast occurs on an Ember Saturday or on the Saturday before Passion Sunday, namely, the Mass of the feria or of the feast?

Reply. He must celebrate the Mass of the feria. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Rites has declared many times. - See Cases, no. 821 and following.

Chapter IV. On the Subject of the Sacrament of Order

709. Principles. - I. The subject of Order is a baptized male alone.

The reason for the first is that women by divine institution are altogether incapable of any Order. This is established from the sacred Scriptures. The Apostle says in 1 Corinthians 14:34: Let women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted them to speak, but to be subject, as the law also says. And 1 Timothy 2:11-12: Let the woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to use authority over the man, but to be in silence. It is also proved from the perpetual practice of the Church and the unanimous consent of the Fathers and all Doctors.

The reason for the second is evident. For no one before receiving Baptism can receive any other Sacrament.

But a baptized little boy not yet possessed of reason would indeed be validly, but illicitly, ordained.

710. ○ II. That someone may rightly receive Orders, the following conditions are required: first, that he be bound by no irregularity, suspension, or excommunication; second, that he have attained the age required by the sacred Canons; third, that he manifest suitable knowledge proved by examination; fourth, that he present dimissorial letters if he is from another diocese; fifth, that he be ordained at the proper time and with the proper intervals interposed; sixth, that probity of life also have divine vocation as its companion.

For ordination to the Subdiaconate, there is required in addition a title of honorable support, whether of patrimony, of benefice, or even of religious poverty. If the title should perish after the Subdiaconate has been received, another title is required for receiving a higher Order. - Council of Trent, session 21, chapter 2, On Reformation.

711. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What knowledge is required in candidates to be promoted to Orders?

Reply. First, from those to be initiated into minor Orders it is required that they at least understand the Latin language. Second, from those to be initiated into the Subdiaconate and Diaconate it is required that they be instructed in letters and in those things which pertain to exercising the Order. Third, finally, from those to be initiated into the Priesthood it is required that they be found fit to teach the people those things which are necessary to all for salvation and to minister the Sacraments. - Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 4 and following.

QUESTION 2. What age is required for receiving Orders?

Reply. First, for receiving first tonsure it is required that the one to be initiated possess the use of reason, namely, that he be at least seven years old. - Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 4. Second, as regards minor Orders, no age is assigned in Canon law. Third, from Subdeacons the twenty-second year of age begun is required. Fourth, from Deacons the twenty-third. Fifth, from Priests the twenty-fifth. Sixth, for the Episcopate, however, the thirtieth year is required. This is gathered from the Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 12, On Reformation. It suffices, however, that the indicated year have begun, except, nevertheless, for the Episcopate. - St. Ligorius, no. 799. But dispensation as regards age is reserved to the Supreme Pontiff. - St. Ligorius, nos. 799-800.

712. ○ QUESTION 3. At what time can Orders be conferred?

Reply 1. First tonsure can be conferred on any day, at any hour and place. - Thus from the Roman Pontifical.

Reply 2. Minor Orders can also be conferred anywhere on each Sunday or double feast of precept, provided they are conferred in the morning. - See the Roman Pontifical. But this is to be understood of an ordination which is not general, since a general ordination must take place on those days on which major Orders can be conferred, unless custom permits this on the Wednesday or Friday before the general ordination. - Scavini.

Reply 3. Major Orders by law are conferred during the celebration of Mass: first, on the Saturday of each of the four Ember seasons; second, on the Saturday before Passion Sunday; third, on Holy Saturday. But by dispensation obtained from the Pope, they can also be conferred outside these times, namely, on other Sundays or feasts of precept (that is, of the rite of a double of the second class) [1]. - Decretals, book 1, title 11, chapter 3, etc. - Moreover, suppressed feasts are regarded as feasts of precept as regards Orders. Sacred Congregation of Rites, November 12, 1831, and March 13, 1833.

[1] Why the Author regards a feast of precept and a feast with the rite of a double of the second class as one and the same I have not yet discovered. If indeed by feasts of precept he understands those which are observed both in choir (as they say) and in the external forum, there will certainly occur double feasts of the second class which are not observed in the external forum; but if by feasts of precept he understands those which are not celebrated ad libitum in choir, we shall then have many feasts of this kind which nevertheless are not doubles of the second class.

Nevertheless, it was indeed the opinion of a certain few that the feast days on which, by Apostolic Indult, an ordination can be held outside the times could be understood as any days whatsoever on which a feast of double rite occurs in the ecclesiastical offices, and, in addition, that this has force not only for doubles of precept but also for doubles ad libitum. La Croix (book 6, part 2, no. 2293) considered this opinion probable and thought it confirmed by the fact that (he says) we see it done thus by the best Bishops.

But that opinion appears now to be called obsolete, especially after so many Declarations of the Sacred Congregations. For I now pass over the fact that when some, as De Lugo relates (Moral Responses, book 1, doubt 34), took occasion obstinately to defend that opinion from the words of the Roman Pontifical, where in the title On Conferring Orders it was said in the rubric: But minor Orders can be given on each Sunday and on double feast days, etc.; for this reason, by command of Urban VIII, in the new revision and correction of the Roman Pontifical, it was expressly added under that title that minor Orders could be conferred on all Sundays and feast days of precept, so that no one (De Lugo adds) could any longer claim that those days which are called feasts in the Breviary were also comprehended there. But the controversy was more clearly defined by Responses of the Sacred Congregation. For, as Fagnanus reports (On the Chapter De eo, title On the Times of Ordinations, no. 42), these doubts having been proposed:

Presupposing that minor Orders can be conferred on Sundays or other feast days, it is doubted whether under the appellation of a feast day there is comprehended a feast on which an office is celebrated by the Church, or whether it must be a feast observed by the people.

Second: There is the same doubt as regards those to be promoted by force of dispensations for promotion outside the times on feast days.

To the first, the Sacred Congregation of the Council judged that feast days observed by the people are comprehended: throughout the title On Ferias. - On Consecration, distinction 3, chapter 1. - Chapter 12, session 25, On Regulars.

To the second, it replied the same.

That this Declaration, nevertheless, was unknown to most is evident from the fact that neither La Croix (l.c.), nor Schmalzgrueber (book 1, title 11, no. 11), nor Pichler (same title, no. 28), where they touch upon this question, make any mention of it; although Pirhing mentioned it (under this title, no. 78), where he notes that it suffices if the day is a feast in that particular Church.

In addition, we have two more recent Declarations of the Sacred Congregation of Rites. The first was in a case from Clermont, on March 16, 1833, to the following doubt: Since diverse opinions are circulated in the Council of Clermont concerning these words of the Roman Pontifical: Minor Orders can be conferred on Sundays and double feasts; in order that a certain law be established in the matter, most humble prayers were presented to the Sacred Congregation of Rites that it might deign to declare its opinion. And the Sacred Congregation replied: Minor Orders can be conferred on feasts of precept, or on double feasts which were of precept before the reduction.

The other was in a case from Quebec, on May 23, 1836, to the following doubt: Since in the Roman Pontifical, in the title On Ordinations, it is stated: Minor Orders can be given on each Sunday and on double feast days; it is asked whether the words double feast days are to be understood of feasts of precept strictly to be observed. The Sacred Congregation replied: Affirmatively.

713. ○ QUESTION 4. What intervals are to be observed between the individual Orders?

Reply 1. Certain intervals are to be observed between the minor Orders unless something else appears more expedient to the Bishop. - Thus from the Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 11, On Reformation. - The time, however, is not determined. In many places, by custom, the four Orders are conferred on the same day.

Reply 2. As regards major Orders, it was thus established by the Council of Trent, session 23, chapters 11 and 12: one year must intervene between the last of the minor Orders received and the Subdiaconate. Say the same between the Subdiaconate and the Diaconate. The same is also to be said between the Diaconate and the Priesthood, unless the Bishop decrees otherwise. Hence the Bishop has the power of dispensing from the intervals if it appears expedient to him, provided that he confers the Orders at the proper times.

But he would sin gravely who on the same day, in addition to the four minor Orders, also received the Subdiaconate, unless a contrary custom, which must be proved by the Bishop, excuses him. - Ferraris, Library, entry Order. - St. Ligorius, no. 797.

714. ○ QUESTION 5. Does a Cleric who, having been initiated into the minor Orders, takes a wife sin?

Reply. Speaking per se, it is certain that he does not sin gravely, indeed not even lightly, if he does this for a just cause, for example, to calm enmities or temptations of the flesh, to assist a poor woman, etc.; otherwise, he will not be excused from venial sin. - St. Ligorius, no. 785. - I said speaking per se; for, St. Ligorius says, it is greatly to be feared that one who, being certain of his vocation to the ecclesiastical state, withdraws from it in order to enjoy the world is in a bad state.

QUESTION 6. Is it required that the one to be ordained be confirmed?

Reply. The Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 4, has these words: Let those who have not received the Sacrament of Confirmation not be initiated with first tonsure. But it is disputed whether these words are of precept or of counsel only. Commonly, says St. Ligorius, no. 786, they say that Confirmation is not required in the one to be ordained under grave obligation, but is indeed required under light obligation; because although the words of the Council of Trent indicate fittingness rather than precept, nevertheless, to act contrary to this is not excused from at least a light disorder.

715. ○ QUESTION 7. Does he sin who receives some Order without the intention of ascending to higher Orders?

Reply 1. He does not sin gravely, even if he receives major Orders and does not intend to receive the Priesthood. - Thus St. Ligorius, no. 785, where he says that this is certain and common.

Reply 2. Nor, probably, does he per se sin venially, because it is prescribed by no law that anyone ascend to higher Orders, unless someone accepts a benefice requiring the Priesthood or a sacred Order. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 8. Does an ordained man who omits the recitation of the prayers imposed by the Bishop after ordination by way of penance sin, or in what manner does he sin? Reply. The Theologians do not agree concerning this. For some say that he sins gravely because the matter of the precept is grave. Others hold that he does not sin at all because the Bishop does not impose a precept. Finally, others judge that an omission of this kind is indeed not free from fault, but does not exceed venial sin. This opinion appears more probable. - See St. Ligorius, no. 829.

As regards these prayers, the following Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of Rites was given in a case from Granada on August 11, 1860: Understand the words of the Roman Pontifical, the Nocturn of such a day, of the one Nocturn in the ferial office, or of the first Nocturn of Sunday, as in the Psalter, that is, of twelve Psalms with their antiphons of the season, which the ordaining Bishop can designate, either of the very day on which he holds the ordination or of another according to his judgment. But when the Bishop expresses nothing other than what the words of the Pontifical state, it must be understood as the Nocturn of the feria corresponding to that day on which the ordination took place.

716. ○ QUESTION 9. Are newly ordained Priests bound to say the three Masses prescribed by the Bishop, or in what manner?

Reply 1. They are not bound to apply them for the intention of the Bishop and therefore can receive a stipend for them. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

Reply 2. Nor does there appear to be a grave obligation of celebrating those Masses; neither must they be said before days free from impediment arrive, since they must be votive Masses. - See St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 10. To what are Priests bound by force of the obedience which they promised to the Bishop in ordination?

Reply. Benedict XIV thus explains it (in the Letter Ex quo dilectus): We acknowledge that, by force of a promise of this kind, a Priest is held bound by this law among others: that he cannot depart from the service of the Church to which he shall have been assigned without the permission of the Bishop. - St. Ligorius, no. 828.

717. ○ QUESTION 11. Can Priests, or even Pastors, embrace the religious state when the Bishop is unwilling?

Reply. Yes. This is established from Canon law, chapter Duae sunt, cause 19, question 2, where it is established by Urban II that Priests or Pastors wishing to pass over to some monastery can freely depart, even when the Bishop opposes it. - See St. Ligorius, no. 828, and the cited Letter of Benedict XIV in the preceding Question.

718. ○ QUESTION 12. Is absolution to be granted to a Cleric habituated to a secret shameful vice who wishes to ascend to sacred Orders without a prior trial of continence?

Reply. St. Ligorius replies negatively in On the Sacraments in General, no. 64, although he has sincerely been converted to the Lord and therefore can immediately be absolved. According to his opinion, therefore, he will not be able to receive sacred Order unless for some time he has devoted effort to uprooting the evil habit. But if he persists in receiving sacred Order, St. Ligorius does not consider him disposed for absolution, because he violates the law of the Church in a grave matter. He excepts only the case in which God gives the penitent an extraordinary grace of compunction which renders him so proved that he can immediately receive sacred Order without being proved by an experience of time. Others, however, think otherwise on this entire question in the same St. Ligorius. - See Cases, no. 826 [2].

[2] Concerning a controversy of this kind, it will be useful to have read those things which Cardinal De Lugo (Moral Responses, book 1, doubt 28) discusses concerning a Novice who, having entered an observant Religious Order, suffered frequent voluntary lapses of the flesh, which he manifested to the Confessor in confession, and afterward relapsed more frequently. For the Confessor, judging that he was not fit for the Religious Order, frequently advised him to return to the world or to disclose his frailty to the Superior outside confession; indeed, he finally attempted to oblige the penitent to this, indicating that thereafter he would deny him absolution unless he obeyed. It was asked (De Lugo says) whether the Confessor could do this by right, or whether he had transgressed the limits of his power. There is no room here to bring forward those things which the learned Author disputes there. This one thing must not be passed over: according to his opinion, all the reasons which the Confessor is said to have advanced for defending his opinion do not prove the matter.

Appendix. On Clerical Vocation

719. ○ I. The necessity of a divine vocation is demonstrated chiefly from sacred Scripture: Neither doth any man take the honor to himself, but he that is called by God, as Aaron was, Hebrews 5:4. - Hence the Apostles, in order that they might substitute another Apostle in the place of Judas the traitor, prayed to God thus: Thou, Lord, show whom thou hast chosen. Christ himself said, John 10:1: He that entereth not by the door into the sheepfold is a thief and a robber; but he that entereth in by the door is the shepherd of the sheep. - Again, John 15:16: You have not chosen me, but I have chosen you. - Again, Luke 10:2: Pray ye the Lord of the harvest, that he send laborers into his harvest. Therefore, those who are not called by God intrude themselves, and they are those concerning whom the Lord says through Jeremiah (23:21): I did not send prophets, yet they ran. - St. Ligorius, no. 802.

720. ○ II. The principal signs of divine vocation to the ecclesiastical state are the following: suitable knowledge, probity of life, right intention, or the desire of devoting oneself to the divine glory and the salvation of souls. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

He who, without a vocation ascertained from such signs, intrudes himself into the sacred ministry cannot be excused from great presumption, and perhaps from grave fault, since he exposes himself to great danger of damnation. But Bishops who promote to sacred Orders those who are not called commit themselves to a greater danger, from the saying of the Apostle, 1 Timothy 5:22: Impose not hands lightly upon any man, neither be partaker of other men's sins. Hence in Canon law, chapter Nullus, it is prescribed that no one be ordained unless he has been proved.

721. ○ QUESTION. What must a Bishop do that he may sufficiently prove candidates for sacred Orders?

Reply. Thus St. Ligorius, ibid.: For this proof to be sought by the Bishop, it does not suffice that he himself knows nothing evil concerning the one to be ordained; but he must be made certain of his positive probity according to the sublimity of the rank to which the latter desires to ascend.... In seeking this proof, Bishops therefore ought not to be content with the simple attestation of Pastors, who, led by human considerations in granting attestations of this kind, easily indulge Clerics lest they draw upon themselves the hatred of them and of their relatives; but in addition, secret information having been obtained from other trustworthy persons, they must be made certain not only that the one to be initiated is not evil... but also that he is positively good, namely, that he leads a spiritual life, is assiduous in Churches, frequents the Sacraments and prayer, lives separated from secular persons, associates with well-behaved companions, devotes himself to study, uses modest clothing, etc.

See many other things concerning the obligations of Clerics in the Treatise on States, namely, concerning celibacy, no. 40; concerning the wearing of the habit and tonsure, no. 45; concerning the recitation of the Divine Office, no. 49 and following; etc., etc.

End of the Treatise on Order.

Treatise on Matrimony

Matrimony is so called from the office of the mother, as the Theologians commonly hold with St. Thomas, because in this society the principal parts appear to pertain to the mother. Matrimony is also called conjugium from the common yoke to which the man and woman are subjected. Likewise, it is called nuptiae or connubium from the verb nubere, because brides were formerly veiled when they were handed over to their husbands. Likewise, it is called a partnership because the man and woman have a common lot.

It is greatly useful to instruct the faithful concerning the excellence and sanctity of matrimony, while nevertheless extolling much more, as is fitting, the virtue of continence.

We must treat: first, of betrothals; second, of the proclamation of banns; third, of the nature and properties of matrimony; fourth, of its matter and form; fifth, of its minister and subject; sixth, of the impediments of matrimony; seventh, of the revalidation of an invalid marriage; eighth, of the conjugal debt.

Chapter I. On Betrothals

First, on the nature of betrothals; second, on their effects; third, on their dissolution.

Article I. On the Nature of Betrothals

722. Definition. - Betrothals are a deliberate promise (namely, with deliberation sufficient for mortal sin) [1], mutual [2], and expressed by a sensible sign [3], of future matrimony between capable persons.

[1] Some affirm, and others deny, in Bonacina (On Matrimony, question 1, point 4, no. 4) and Sanchez (book 1, disputation 16, no. 15), that deliberation which suffices for sinning mortally is sufficient; and among the latter is St. Thomas (Supplement, question 43, article 2, reply to objection 2; or On the Fourth Book of the Sentences, distinction 27, question 2, article 2, reply to objection 2). You will reconcile both opinions without difficulty by the same reasoning by which the Doctors, who disagree only in appearance, are reconciled concerning whether deliberation which suffices for mortal sin is sufficient for the validity of a vow. Concerning this, see volume 1, no. 320, with the note.

[2] If the promise is not mutual but belongs only to one party, there will not be a contract of betrothal, which is onerous and binds each side in justice, but a contract of simple promise, which is gratuitous and binds from mere fidelity if the other party accepts the promise. St. Antoninus (part 3, title 1, chapter 18, section 3) gives an example in one who says: I give my pledge... and I shall wait one or two months or years or for all time, prepared to marry you if you wish. But the other party can accept the promise and remain free in the meantime, so that, after taking counsel, the betrothal offered to him or her may either be admitted or rejected. I said the betrothal offered, for this is a certain promise of contracting betrothal. As Schmalzgrueber observes (book 4, title 1, no. 49), although it obliges one to contract betrothal and appears to be a promise of matrimony, at least mediately, nevertheless it does not merit the name of betrothal and therefore produces neither public decency nor the other effects proper to betrothal, just as a promise of sale is not a sale and does not transfer title to another. - See Sanchez, On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 5, no. 7 and following.

[3] It is said, by a sensible sign, that is, by any exterior sign by which there is expressed that to which each of the contracting parties consents and what is accepted, and by which the mutual acceptance is made known to the other, so that the contract becomes absolute. Words, therefore, are not necessary, for they could neither be uttered by a mute person nor heard by a deaf person, between whom, nevertheless, both betrothal and matrimony can be contracted, as is established from chapter Cum apud 23 and chapter Tuae 25, On Betrothals. The contrary is to be said, as Sanchez notes (On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 8, no. 13), concerning one who is both deaf and blind from birth; for he can neither hear words, since he is deaf, nor perceive other signs, since he is blind, and therefore cannot be taught what matrimony is unless perhaps he can be instructed and taught by some new art.

It is not necessary, however, that consent be signified by the contracting party himself or in his presence, but a contract can be made between absent persons either through an intermediary, or by letter (law In sponsalibus 18, Digest, On Betrothals), or through a Procurator (chapter Procurator 9, On Procurators, in the Sixth Book). The Procurator, nevertheless: first, must have a special mandate for contracting betrothal, and indeed with a determinate person; second, must execute the mandate personally unless he has expressly received the faculty of substituting another for himself; third, at the time when the Procurator executes the mandate, it must not have been revoked by the Mandator, for otherwise (which is a prerogative proper to matrimonial contracts) he contracts invalidly, although neither he nor the other party is aware of the revocation.

Moreover, the expression of consent through some sign is so necessary that silence in the face of nuptials offered to oneself in no way suffices. For although matrimony is numbered among favorable causes, in which (rule of law 43, in the Sixth Book) he who is silent appears to consent, contracting with a certain person can be harmful. See Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 58) and Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 23, no. 7). - Except betrothals which parents contract for their children, whether the children are present or absent; for if, when the matter has become known, they do not contradict it, they are presumed by law to consent tacitly by their very silence. Thus expressly in the sole chapter, section 2, On the Betrothal of Minors, in the Sixth Book: From betrothals which parents very often contract for children who have reached puberty or are minors, the children themselves, if they have consented expressly or tacitly, as if they were present and did not contradict, are bound; from them arises the justice of public decency. And it is the same if the children were absent and even ignorant at the time of the betrothal, and afterward, having learned of it, ratified the same betrothal tacitly or expressly. Otherwise, from betrothals contracted by parents for their children, neither are the children themselves bound nor does the justice of public decency arise therefrom. Concerning these things, several observations are to be made.

First, according to the most common opinion (see Sanchez, book 1, disputation 23, no. 7, and St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 839), under the name of parents come only the father and mother, not a tutor or curator or any other relative by blood or affinity. Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 67) rightly gives the reason, because by natural and divine law the contract of matrimony and betrothal is so personal that no one, not even a father, can stand for a son by that law unless he has a special mandate from him. And therefore, if the consent of the parents joined with the silence of the son makes a presumed betrothal, this is had from the provision and presumption of positive law alone. Moreover, since this provision of positive law restricts natural law, it ought not to be extended beyond the case expressed in the law; but it would be extended if this proceeded also in tutors, curators, brothers, relatives, etc. See also Diana, volume 2, treatise 6, resolution 32.

Second, it does not matter whether the children are legitimate or illegitimate or even emancipated. For a distinction of this kind is not made in the cited text; and although by civil law those who are born from condemned intercourse are not called children, nevertheless, in this matter consideration of nature is more powerful than civil law. But the reason drawn from nature has no less force for illegitimate and emancipated children, since great parental love is presumed even toward them.

Third, what is said in the text, that betrothals contracted by parents for children even when absent are valid if the latter afterward, knowing of them, ratify them expressly or tacitly (which tacit consent or ratification is sufficiently inferred if they did not contradict, as the same text previously says), is to be understood if they did not contradict when the parents themselves, either personally in their presence or through a messenger or letter, made the children more certain concerning the matter. For if others, apart from a mandate of the parents, report it to the children, there is no reason why, if perhaps they wish to object, they must express their dissent; for they are not bound to disclose their mind to everyone, and therefore silence then in no way indicates consent.

Fourth, finally, St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 838) rightly warns that the silence of children in the aforesaid circumstances is equivalent to consent only as regards the external forum, since consent of this kind is merely presumed; but for betrothal there is required consent not merely presumed, but true and natural. Hence, if it in fact happens that the child is then silent either because of reverential fear or for some other cause, but inwardly dissents or even merely holds himself negatively, in the internal forum, in which one speaking both against himself and for himself is believed, the exterior presumption has no effect. Therefore the betrothal is null, and the Confessor can tell a penitent of this kind that he is in no way bound by that betrothal. Indeed, neither will it have force in the external forum if, for example, a girl proves her dissent; this can be done by other conjectures or presumptions or, in their absence, by an oath. See Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 63).

Division

Betrothals are distinguished:

1. As ecclesiastical or solemn, and private, according as they are celebrated in the presence of the Church, that is, before the Pastor [4] and witnesses, or are completed privately by the consent alone of the contracting parties, or before the parents in the midst of the family.

[4] The Pastor is indeed accustomed, before proceeding to the proclamations, to investigate the will or consent of the contracting parties concerning the future matrimony. But he is accustomed prudently to take care that he question each of them separately, and he does not then customarily employ witnesses. The reason for this prudent precaution is lest, if the betrothed stand together before the Pastor, even with witnesses, what would otherwise be a betrothal concerning future matrimony should instead become a betrothal in the present.

2. As absolute and conditional, according as they are made without any condition or with some condition attached.

723. Principles. - I. For the validity of betrothals, all the conditions contained in the definition are required, so that if one of them is lacking, the betrothal contract is to be regarded as null [5]. The reason is evident from what was said concerning the nature of a contract, volume 1, nos. 754 and 772.

[5] Since the Author adds nothing concerning the last condition, which requires capable persons, it is useful to append some things concerning it.

Thus those persons are capable by law of betrothal who can contract matrimony both validly and licitly; and therefore, on the contrary, those will be called incapable who cannot contract either validly or at least licitly. This can be the case in two ways: either because they are generally incapable of a human act, or because they are incapable of this particular promise. The latter occurs when there intervenes either a diriment impediment or even a merely impeding one; these will be treated below in their place. But incapacity for a human act in general can arise either from defect of age or from want of judgment. Concerning these, some things are now to be said.

Since, therefore, for the validity of a contract it is necessary that each contracting party be master of himself and have the use of reason, if either is insane, the betrothal will be null. This is confirmed from chapter Dilectus 24, On Betrothals. Under the name of insane persons, however, there do not here come certain more stupid persons, nor certain half-witted persons in whom the right use of reason is lacking only as regards certain things but by no means as regards others. Namely, the general rule is to be applied: those are capable of this contract who have as much use of reason as suffices for sinning mortally. Compare Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 8, no. 15 and following), who in addition supplies a suitable reason for judging concerning those demented persons who have lucid intervals. What has been said concerning the insane has equal force concerning one who contracts while intoxicated, for an intoxicated person lacks free consent and due deliberation. Nor does it suffice that the intoxicated person previously had the will of contracting betrothal or matrimony while he was of sound mind. For the contract itself must be a human act; in addition, since the contracting parties are the ministers of the Sacrament of Matrimony, this requires the present use of reason.

As regards capacity by reason of age, the common opinion of the Theologians and Canonists is that, regularly and speaking per se, seven completed years are required and suffice for betrothal. For that perfect deliberation which an onerous contract of this kind requires is not ordinarily and regularly present before this time, but is usually present when seven years have been completed. This is confirmed from Canon law, chapter Litteras 4, chapter Accessit 5, chapter Ad dissolvendum 13, On the Betrothal of Minors, and the sole chapter under the same title in the Sixth Book.

It was said regularly and speaking per se, for according to the common opinion of the Theologians and Canonists (see Ferraris, Library, entry Betrothals, no. 15), betrothal will be contracted validly even before the age of seven if malice and prudence supply for age, namely, if a sufficient use of reason for deliberating is evident and at the same time the contracting parties sufficiently understand what is being done. See Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 16, no. 9 and following). On the contrary, even when the age of seven is completed, the betrothal will be invalid if due use of reason is not yet present. Hence St. Thomas (Supplement, question 43, article 2, reply to objection 7): It is better that it be determined according to the condition of the contracting parties, because in some the use of reason is accelerated more than in another. Therefore, the age of seven years is prescribed by the laws merely for prudently presuming from those things which commonly happen, so that, unless the contrary appears, betrothals contracted before the age of seven are not considered valid, nor those celebrated after the completion of seven years invalid. Therefore, betrothals before seven years are not to be held valid unless the contracting parties are proved capable of malice; but after seven years have been completed, they are to be held valid unless it is proved that they were not yet capable of malice. Accordingly, in doubt one must stand by what the law prescribes.

Nevertheless, although betrothals of children who have attained the perfect use of reason are held valid by the sacred Canons and therefore induce the impediment which is called the justice of public decency, nevertheless, in order that provision be made for the weakness of age, the Church specially decreed certain things concerning them (see chapter De illis 7, On the Betrothal of Minors), namely: first, if each contracting party is indeed older than seven but is a minor, neither can withdraw before puberty, but can object or dissent only after attaining puberty. This was most wisely provided. For, as Covarruvias observes (Epitome, book 3, Decretals, chapter 5, section 1, no. 1), minors, because of the fragile constancy of their age, would frequently contract and frequently dissent from contracts.... But from that inconstancy... the impediment of public decency would be multiplied without end according to the number of betrothals. Second, even if the contract was between one who had reached puberty and a minor, the latter, when he comes to puberty, can withdraw. Third, nevertheless, he who was already of puberty cannot withdraw. (This opinion of the Canonical text is rendered backwards by the one who inscribed the rubric upon the cited Chapter in these words: He who first reaches puberty shall await the other. This is false, for according to the common opinion, whichever contracting party first reaches puberty can object immediately and is not bound to await the puberty of the other. See Covarruvias, l.c.) Fourth, if the one who first reaches puberty does not object but awaits the other, the latter nevertheless, when he also reaches puberty, can object and dissent.

These provisions of Law have equal force whether they expressly wished to contract betrothal alone or contracted betrothal only virtually. Namely, by provision of Law (see chapter Tuae nobis, at the end, On the Betrothal of Minors, and the sole chapter, section 1, under the same title in the Sixth Book), when either two minors in whom malice does not supply for age, or a minor with one who has reached puberty, contract a betrothal not concerning the future but concerning the present, this contract has force not as matrimony, for which they are incapable, but, by interpretation of law, only as betrothal concerning the future (unless perhaps they expressly intended only to bind themselves by the bond of matrimony, as Sanchez observes, book 1, disputation 21, no. 3). Whatever things have been said concerning the right of withdrawing from express betrothals when puberty is reached have precisely the same force in this latter mode of betrothal also. And here take special notice that this ancient law concerning clandestine matrimony contracted by minors, according to which it passes over into betrothal, was not corrected or abrogated by the Tridentine decree concerning clandestine marriages. Concerning this, Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 21, no. 5) mentions a Declaration of the Cardinals from the report of Peter De Ledesma. Pignatelli (Consultations, volume 9, consultation 133, no. 46) reports it thus (unless perhaps it is another): It was asked whether a matrimony contracted clandestinely by words concerning the present between one who had reached puberty and a minor, the form handed down by the Council not having been observed, is resolved into betrothal; this pleased some Doctors consulted concerning the matter from the Response of Boniface VIII in the sole chapter, section 1, On the Betrothal of Minors, in the Sixth Book. The Sacred Congregation declared this opinion true, so that clandestinity does not prevent the matrimony contracted by words concerning the present between one who has reached puberty and a minor from having force. But because the law is interpretative, such matrimony contracted by words concerning the present is only betrothal by words concerning the future (the aforesaid section 1). Therefore, just as clandestinity would not harm the validity of betrothals contracted by persons who had reached puberty, as the Sacred Congregation has already declared, and there is no doubt concerning this, so neither will it prevent the validity of these betrothals contracted between one who has reached puberty and a minor.

II. Betrothals have force in the same manner whether they are solemn or ecclesiastical, or private or clandestine, because the consent of two persons suffices for a true contract; nor has the Church ever invalidated private betrothals. Indeed, now in most places solemn betrothals have fallen into desuetude.

III. Betrothals entered into under a condition concerning the present are valid here and now if the condition is verified; but if they are contracted under a condition concerning the future, they will have force as soon as the condition is fulfilled, without new consent of the contracting parties, provided neither has revoked the consent previously given. In the meantime, however, the contracting parties are bound to await the fulfillment of the condition if it is honorable.

IV. When words or signs are doubtful, in the forum of conscience one must stand by the intention of the contracting parties if it is established; but in the external forum, by the common understanding and sense of the words. - St. Ligorius, book 6, no. 840 [6].

[6] You have rules for determining the sense of words in Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 50). Moreover, when the words or signs still remain doubtful and equivocal, according to the common opinion of the Theologians even the betrothal must be held doubtful. In this case St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 840), having cited the opinion of those who think one must incline in favor of matrimony, more probably judges with Viva that one must incline in favor of liberty. But in reality the Doctors here disagree only in appearance, for some speak of betrothal concerning the present, while others speak of betrothal concerning the future. Hence Diana (volume 2, treatise 6, resolution 135, no. 4) thus composes the matter according to the sense of each side: I would think that a distinction must be made between betrothal and matrimony, so that when in equal doubt they doubt whether matrimony was contracted, the contracting parties should be compelled in both forums, lest perhaps injury be done to the Sacrament through the dissolution of matrimony; but when it is doubted whether the betrothal is valid, they should be judged free in both forums, because if someone were then compelled against his will, injury would be done to him through the despoiling of the liberty which he possesses.

724. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Are betrothals contracted from grave fear valid?

Reply. More probably, no. The reason is that matrimony contracted from grave fear is null, as is established from Canon law and will be explained below, no. 747. Therefore, by that very fact, betrothals entered into from such fear must also be null. - St. Ligorius, no. 844 [7].

[7] The question must be understood as asking whether these betrothals are valid by natural law. For the two opinions differ in this: one opinion (also certainly more probable to St. Alphonsus) says that the contract is invalid by natural law; but the other says that it is valid, though rescindable by him who suffered the fear. Therefore, this latter opinion must also necessarily admit that the impediment of public decency arises therefrom, which the former consequently more probably denies is incurred.

QUESTION 2. Are betrothals entered into from light fear valid?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that one who instills light fear is not considered to inflict a grave injury upon another, since the latter can easily despise such fear and consequently is considered to have willed voluntarily to suffer the injury. Recall what was said concerning Human Acts, volume 1, no. 10. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - Lacroix, no. 105, etc. Some nevertheless deny it, because no one is bound to suffer an injury and therefore cannot be obligated through an injury [8].

[8] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 844, question 2) does not deny that this latter opinion also is probable; nor without merit will others hold it as more probable. For the matter always comes back to this: that the other is compelled through injury toward one of two alternatives, namely, either certainly to undergo some evil, whatever it may be, or to admit a contract which he otherwise would not wish to admit.

But this is repugnant to natural law, which requires both that the right of each person be preserved intact and that, if perhaps it has been injured, it be restored anew in its integrity. Nor is the reason of the opposite opinion firm; for it is false that an injury is voluntarily admitted when someone is unjustly compelled necessarily to undergo one or the other injury.

The reason by which St. Alphonsus (l.c., question 3), with the more common and more probable opinion of the Doctors, proves that even one who suffered light fear can rescind the contract supports the same opinion: namely, just as he (that is, the one instilling unjust fear) is bound to release the pledge unjustly extorted through such fear, so the one who suffered the fear can revoke the pledge given. And surely, unless we wish to abuse words, a contract which produces no obligation can never be called valid; but no obligation is in fact to be said to exist which someone, as in the present case, can cast off at will. Therefore, the contract is rightly to be called invalid by natural law itself.

Nor should it appear to anyone to be the same whether you call these betrothals invalid by the law itself or valid but rescindable at the judgment of the one who suffered the fear. For this distinction of the greatest importance intervenes: in the latter opinion the impediment of public decency arises from the contract, but in the former not at all. Since the latter cannot be denied its probability, it will therefore be altogether probable that no impediment arises from that contract and consequently that matrimony is validly and licitly contracted, according to the general rule which we shall see below to be handed down by the common opinion of the Doctors in a case of a doubtful impediment introduced by ecclesiastical law.

 The VV. object first against this Note (p. 792): Father Ballerini does not rightly assert that St. Alphonsus does not deny that this latter opinion is probable. Reply. Then let the VV. show, I ask, where the holy Doctor denies that it is probable.

The VV. reply (ibid.): St. Alphonsus reports authorities favoring this opinion without pronouncing any judgment concerning its probability. Reply 1. Let the antecedent pass; I deny the consequence. The reason is evident, because one who pronounces no judgment neither affirms nor denies. Therefore, it is most true that the holy Doctor does not deny it. But why the antecedent has been allowed to pass will be evident from the things to be said.

Second, against the argument of the Note that the other is compelled through injury toward one of two alternatives, the VV. (p. 791) object these things: Here you have a mere sophism. For where there is only light fear, there is not considered (as St. Alphonsus observes) to be a true injury. Reply. I certainly do not know how the VV. say that St. Alphonsus observed that there is no injury. For are not these the words of St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 844, question 3), cited by the VV. themselves (p. 789): Just as he is bound to release the pledge UNJUSTLY extorted through such fear, so the one who suffered the fear can revoke the pledge given? But is not a pledge unjustly extorted a true injury? Indeed, do not the VV. themselves (ibid.) write a little below: He who suffered light fear... since he suffered an injury, although not a grave one, etc.?

Third, the VV. add (ibid.): Nor is the one who suffered fear properly said to be compelled, since he can easily repel fear of this kind. Reply. I distinguish. If by repel the VV. understand avoid, I concede it; but this is apart from, indeed contrary to, the present hypothesis, in which it is established that someone must necessarily undergo one or the other inconvenience; therefore, I deny the supposition. But if by repel they understand tolerate, I deny that he is not compelled; for he is truly compelled upon whom, though unwilling, the necessity of tolerating or suffering one or the other is imposed, no differently than the unavoidable necessity of suffering the loss either of money or of life is imposed by a robber upon a traveler.

Fourth, the VV. insist (ibid.): Father Ballerini supposes as undoubted and admitted by all precisely that which is denied, namely, that in the case THERE IS TRUE COACTION. Reply. Do the VV. here wish (indeed less opportunely) to play with words for a while? We shall put an end to the play with St. Thomas (On the Fourth Book of the Sentences, distinction 29, question 1, article 1). St. Thomas therefore says: Coaction is twofold. One which causes absolute necessity, and such a violent thing is called simply violent by the Philosopher, as when someone bodily drives another to motion. The other causes conditional necessity; and this the Philosopher calls mixed violence.... And because this coaction arises from the fact that some imminent danger is feared, therefore THIS FORCE IS THE SAME AS FEAR, which in some manner COMPELS the will. Moreover, since fear is in question in the case, it is certainly easily understood in what sense the word coaction is employed in the Note.

Fifth, against the other argument of the Note, the VV. (ibid.) write: Father Ballerini abuses words not slightly. For by the very fact that a contract is rescindable it is not invalid, since no one rescinds that which does not exist. Certainly, a contract which produces no obligation can never be called valid; but it cannot be said of a rescindable contract that it produces no obligation; rather, as is established from the things said above, it produces a true and natural obligation in each contracting party.

Reply. I would think there to be neither a slight nor a non-slight abuse of words in these things which De Lugo writes (On Justice and Right, disputation 22, no. 75): I suppose the definition of an onerous contract... which, namely, produces a mutual obligation on each side; but if it obliges only the one party, it already falls short on that side of the true nature of a contract and is valid on one side alone. For it is valid insofar as it obliges; therefore, if it does not oblige on both sides, it is not valid on both sides. Moreover, in the present matter there is no question whether he who extorted the pledge from the other through fear is obligated; for the Doctors agree that he is obligated. Thus collapses the reason of those who therefore contended that contracts extorted by fear are valid, lest he who had instilled the fear or deceived the other be free from obligation. The question, therefore, concerns him whose consent to the contract was extorted through fear. Is he obligated to contract matrimony in the case?

An obligation is a bond of law by which we are bound by necessity to discharge something. Thus the Institutes, book 3, title 14. Therefore, is he bound by necessity to contract matrimony? And if even St. Alphonsus, as the VV. themselves allege him, denies this, how do they themselves say that a contract of this kind produces a true and natural obligation in each contracting party? The VV. write: as is established from the things said above. But from the things said above the opposite is rather established. Moreover, as De Lugo says, a contract is valid insofar as it obliges.

Sixth, they say, By the very fact that a contract is rescindable, it is not invalid, since no one rescinds that which does not exist. Reply. Rescission of the contract in the case does not mean removal of an obligation which exists. For how could someone in the forum of conscience rescind a contract with a safe conscience if there existed some obligation by which he was bound? Therefore, rescission of the contract in the forum of conscience merely means a declaration of the will rejecting an obligation by which the natural law does not bind him by force of that contract.

And thus Molina rightly replies to the argument which those who defend the validity of these contracts employed, because, namely, the law prescribes that they are to be rescinded (On Justice and Right, tract 2, disputation 326, no. 14), that it is not necessary for the laws to be understood as speaking of rescinding a contract valid in itself, but rather as declaring their invalidity. And surely, as the same Molina observes, ownership is so little considered to have been transferred through a contract of this kind that in the law (law 9, section 5, Digest, What Is Done Because of Fear) it is expressly said that an action in rem is granted to the injured party and that the thing itself is among his goods, so that an action is granted against any persons whatsoever to whom that thing has come. See also Voet, book 4, title 2, no. 4. And indeed, when judges decree that a contract is to be rescinded, do they remove any obligation imposed by natural law, or do they not rather declare that no obligation of this kind exists?

Moreover, the reason why the laws speak in this way concerning these contracts, as though they are to be rescinded, is easily apparent. Namely, by a fiction of law, as the same Molina notes, ownership of a thing handed over by force of fear is considered transferred; or, to speak better, a contract is always presumed valid. Therefore, the burden of proving the fear instilled is cast upon him who suffered the fear, and deservedly indeed, because fear is not presumed. But a presumption concludes nothing of itself and in the end always yields to truth.

Seventh, the reason must now be given why at the beginning the response to the first difficulty of the VV. was, Let the antecedent pass. For it has already been said that rescission of a contract supposes that no obligation in fact arose by force of that contract in the one who suffered fear; and from this it must be repeated that he can rescind the contract at his judgment. Therefore one must conclude with De Lugo: Therefore, the contract is not valid. For a contract is valid insofar as it obliges.

Moreover, St. Alphonsus, asking (book 3, no. 718) whether a contract entered into from light fear is rescindable at the judgment of the one who suffered fear, expressly says (which part of the response the VV. do not rightly cut short) that the first opinion probably affirms it. Indeed, although in that place he follows as more probable the negative opinion, nevertheless, with the Salmanticenses he excepts the contract of betrothal. In addition, in book 6, no. 844, question 3, asking, Can one who contracted betrothal from light fear which gave cause to the contract rescind it in conscience?, he says that the affirmative opinion appears more probable to him. Therefore, according to the opinion approved by the holy Doctor, no obligation is supposed to have arisen on the part of the one who suffered fear. But if no obligation arises, the contract cannot be called valid on that side, because the whole validity or force of a contract resides in this: that it imposes a necessary bond upon the contracting party, or produces an obligation. Therefore, the opinion of St. Alphonsus ultimately leads to this, that these betrothals can be called invalid on the part of the one who suffered fear. Therefore, that Antecedent, where it was said that St. Alphonsus pronounces no judgment concerning that opinion, ought rather to have been allowed to pass than conceded.

Eighth, for a certain greater clarity of the matter, it will be useful to inspect the reasons which the holy Doctor employs to prove the greater probability of each of his aforesaid opinions. Thus, in order to demonstrate that betrothals can more probably be rescinded in conscience if someone contracted them from fear, he reasons thus (book 6, no. 844, question 3): The reason is that, since fear gave cause to the contract, so that otherwise it would not have been entered into, the one instilling the fear is bound to rescind the contract. Hence, just as he is bound to release the pledge unjustly extorted through such fear, so the one who suffered the fear can revoke the pledge given. These things indeed manifestly argue that the one who suffered fear contracted no obligation, that the contract has no force as regards him, and consequently is invalid; for we call invalid that which lacks the force of obliging.

But where he wishes to demonstrate that contracts entered into from light fear generally cannot more probably be rescinded at the judgment of the one who suffered fear, a conclusion which can appear opposed to the preceding, he reasons thus (book 3, no. 718): The reason is that he who knew the fear to be light is not presumed to have consented from fear, but truly voluntarily. Moreover, here the holy Doctor does not so much prove his thesis as deny the hypothesis, which, namely, supposes that fear in the case gave cause to the contract. For in that hypothesis, as we have just seen, he establishes by a most solid reason that one who in fact consented because of fear is bound by no obligation and therefore that the contract has no force. Nor, again, does a presumption, which here is not indeed a presumption iuris et de iure, furnish sufficient foundation for asserting this other thesis of St. Alphonsus, namely, that a contract entered into from light fear cannot be rescinded either in the external or the internal forum. Let it now pass that presumptions are in no way attended to in the internal forum of conscience, but only the truth, of which each person is certainly conscious within himself. But even if there is question of the external forum, in a case of this kind an action will indeed generally be denied by provision of positive law, especially if it is established that the fear appeared to the contracting party only as light; although St. Alphonsus, with the Salmanticenses, excepts the contract of betrothal from this general rule. Nevertheless, it must finally be admitted that presumptions of this kind can of themselves produce only this one effect: that, as Cuiacius writes (rubric of the Digest, On Proofs and Presumptions), they transfer the entire burden of proof to him against whom they operate; for otherwise proof of the truth is rightly opposed to a presumption. Therefore, this latter thesis is not in fact opposed to the former, and consequently the argument brought forward by St. Alphonsus for the former, where betrothals are treated, has the same force in any contract whatsoever, provided that the consent of either party was truly extorted through fear, even light fear.

Ninth, after the VV. persuaded themselves that they had now shown the first of the arguments brought forward in the Note to be a mere sophism, but the other to confound two altogether diverse things, and therefore those arguments to be of no force, they conclude (pp. 791-792) that the consequence deduced in the Note also collapses, namely, that it is probable that no impediment arises from these betrothals.

Not every uncertain probability or one asserted only by some is sufficient (they say); but it is required that an opinion of this kind be universally received by the Authors, or at least received as probable. They take these last words from St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 901).

Reply 1. Unless the VV. bring forward something more solid, it is sufficiently evident from what has been said that nothing is detracted by their arguments from the most solid firmness of the reasons brought forward in the Note. Second, does not the holy Doctor Alphonsus regard as more probable the opinion which gives to the one who suffered fear the full faculty of rescinding betrothals of this kind in the forum of conscience? But this is the same, as we have seen, as declaring those betrothals invalid. Therefore, according to St. Alphonsus, it is more probable that those betrothals are not valid. Reply 3. For what the VV., after St. Alphonsus, require, namely, that the opinion for the absence of the impediment be universally received by the Authors, or at least as probable, the doctrine such as is exhibited by the Doctors cited there by St. Alphonsus can be sufficient for us. Suarez being omitted, therefore, who in part 3, On the Sacraments, question 67, article 8, final doubt (as St. Alphonsus cites him) has nothing which pertains to the matter, Sanchez (book 8, disputation 6, no. 18) writes thus: If the matter is altogether doubtful, whether an impediment intervenes or not, no dispensation is necessary.... When the matter is not truly doubtful, but there are opinions, some asserting that it is an impediment, while others deny it, if the negative opinion is truly probable, although the affirmative were more probable, one following the probable opinion could enter that matrimony without any dispensation.

And Palaus (treatise 28, point 4, section 9, no. 4): If you have an opinion or doubt that an impediment is present, and after diligence has been made for investigating the truth you cannot overcome the doubt, you are not impeded from contracting matrimony, because while it is not established for you that an impediment introduced by human law exists, you ought to regard yourself as free by reason of possession of innate liberty.

Likewise Viva (On Proposition 4 of Innocent XI, no. 20): If the probability concerns the law, that is, when on each side the Doctors probably judge that something is or is not an impediment,... the custom and practice of the Church is that a matrimony thus contracted is regarded as valid; and therefore the Church does not wish it to be dissolved by an impediment which probably is not an impediment.

Finally, La Croix (book 6, part 1, no. 117): Whenever there is a probable opinion for the absence of an impediment, the most common opinion is... that the Church then also dispenses, when she can, if perhaps the impediment is present. But that probability of this kind is not lacking in the present question has been shown sufficiently and more than sufficiently.

725. ○ QUESTION 3. Are betrothals under the condition, if the Pope shall dispense, valid between those who have a diriment impediment?

Reply. According to St. Ligorius, no. 859, and not a few others, although the betrothal does not have force before the condition is fulfilled, nevertheless, the condition having been verified, they have force without new consent. But the negative opinion is to be held from a Decision of the Sacred Roman Rota in Clericati, On Matrimony, decision 17, no. 41, where he testifies that this was the perpetual opinion of the Sacred Rota. This is also established from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council in a case from Genoa, December 12, 1733 [9].

[9] From this Declaration of the Sacred Congregation, nothing can in fact be concluded against the aforesaid doctrine of St. Alphonsus and of several very grave Theologians. For they contend that even without new consent these betrothals have force after the condition has already been fulfilled, that is, when the impediment has already been removed through dispensation. But in that Declaration, on the contrary, the Sacred Congregation defines that the betrothals do not subsist when, as is evident from the case proposed to the Sacred Congregation (Thesaurus of Resolutions, volume 6, p. 205), the condition had not yet been fulfilled and the impediment had not yet been removed through execution of the Apostolic Letters. In this case neither St. Alphonsus nor anyone else ever said that the betrothals have force or subsist. Since, therefore, an altogether diverse case is treated on each side, one opinion is wrongly objected against the other as though contrary. And precisely the same is to be said concerning the other Declarations of the Sacred Congregations which are brought forward with empty labor for the same purpose, as in the case from Brugneto, January 20, 1709; the case from Siponto, May 2, 1857; the case from Mileto, March 29, 1862; and the case from ..., February 22, 1862. (See Acta, etc., Rome, Press of the Propagation of the Faith, volume 1, pp. 79-81.) For these also certainly establish that betrothals contracted under the condition of seeking a dispensation from an impediment are not to be upheld; but they always pronounce judgment in favor of the one who withdrew from the contract before the condition was fulfilled. Hence whoever from a judgment of this kind contends to conclude also to the case of a condition already fulfilled, namely, that for valid betrothals to exist it is necessary that they be confirmed by the contracting parties even after the dispensation has been effectively obtained, by which the canonical impediment was actually removed, draws a conclusion by a logical fault which is broader than the premises.

Here we pass over certain little arguments which Jurists employ for the same conclusion, which indeed tend to this: that these persons are considered incapable even of contracting conditionally. For they are also commonly found dissolved among the Theologians (see also St. Alphonsus, book 3, no. 650), and, if pressed, they easily lead to absurd consequences repugnant to common sense. Nevertheless, I shall not pass over this one point, that some also urge this reason: that it appears ignominious to put into a pact that which depends upon the power of the Prince. In this you surely have an equivocation which I would almost call ignominious. Grant, indeed, that it is disgraceful to promise by pact that a dispensation is to be granted by the Prince. But do those who contract conditionally promise the condition itself (which now is the dispensation)? They promise, namely, the future matrimony and obligate themselves hypothetically to it, and so bind the obligation to the condition of dispensation that, if the latter fails, the obligation also fails. What ignominy is here? Unless perhaps, by parity, you think it ignominious also to promise by vow, under the same condition, your labor in caring for the spiritual salvation of the sick in hospitals, namely, if through dispensation it should fall to you to be initiated into sacred Orders.

Although they find ignominy in the case for another reason, namely, because a dispensation (as they say), as an alteration of law, always strikes at public law, by which society is governed. But where a condition cannot by law be fulfilled, the stipulation is of no moment, etc., as is contained in law 137, Digest, section 6, On Verbal Obligations. - But these things (besides the fact that they would prove, contrary to common sense, that every petition for dispensation is ignominious) savor of a complete forgetfulness of the purpose for which the power and use of dispensing flourishes in society. Let us recall, I ask, the first principle concerning this matter, which St. Thomas (I-II, question 96, article 6) thus declares: Because the legislator cannot consider all singular cases, he proposes a law according to those things which happen in the greater number of cases, directing his intention toward the common utility.... And if the legislator could (he continues there, reply to objection 3) consider all cases, it would not be necessary that he express all of them, in order to avoid confusion; but he ought to make the law according to those things which happen in the greater number of cases. But it happens (he adds there, question 97, article 4) that some precept which is advantageous to the multitude in the greater number of cases is not suitable to this person or in this case, because through this either a greater good would be impeded or some evil would even be introduced.... But it would be dangerous that this be committed to the judgment of anyone whatsoever, except perhaps because of an evident and sudden danger.... And therefore he who has the governance of the multitude has the power of dispensing in a human law which rests upon his authority, so that, namely, in persons or cases in which the law is deficient, he may grant permission that the precept of the law not be observed. From these things it is manifest that by the same natural law and order of things it is required both that society be governed by laws and that dispensation be made opportunely in laws; and consequently the use of dispensations, rather than striking public law, is indeed demanded by a certain higher law. But the cited law, which speaks concerning a stipulation under this condition: If Titius shall sell a sacred or religious thing, or a forum or basilica, and things of this kind which have been left perpetually for public uses, etc., as is evident, does not pertain to the matter.

QUESTION 4. Must promises which are customarily made concerning entering matrimony always be regarded as true betrothals?

Reply. It appears that it must be denied; for often those promises bear the appearance of a proposal rather than of a true promise. In practice, therefore, one must attend to the particular intention of those promising. - See Cases, no. 836 and following.

Article II. On the Obligation and Effects of Betrothals

726. Principles. - I. Betrothals bind in justice under grave sin to enter matrimony at the determinate time, if one has been determined; but if no time has been fixed, as soon as one party reasonably requires it. The reason is that where there are true betrothals, there is a true contract in a grave matter, and thence a grave obligation follows [1]. - St. Ligorius, no. 845.

[1] This obligation urges both in the forum of conscience and in the external forum. Therefore, one who withdraws can be compelled by the judge to matrimony, even through censures (chapter Ex litteris 10, On Betrothals); although exhortations and admonitions must first precede (chapter Requisivit 17, under the same title), and coercion must also be abstained from if at any time, after inspecting the circumstances, the judge prudently judges that grave evils and scandals are to be feared from unwilling nuptials, for example, perpetual quarrels, the departure of the husband from the wife, or even conjugal murder. For it is expedient that the lesser evil be permitted in order to guard against a graver one, and thus favor is also bestowed upon the Plaintiff by the judge. See Sanchez (book 1, disputation 23, no. 4) and Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, nos. 94-95).

II. Betrothals induce an impeding impediment to matrimony, or one prohibiting matrimony from being licitly contracted with another person unless the prior betrothals have been legitimately dissolved. The reason is that, from what has been said, betrothals produce an obligation of justice. - See what is to be said below, no. 778.

III. Betrothals also induce the impediment which in law is called public decency, by which, namely, one of the betrothed becomes incapable of contracting matrimony with blood relatives of the other in the first degree. - See what is to be said below, no. 815.

727. Questions. - QUESTION 1. If someone contracted betrothals with two women and sinned with the second, which one must he marry?

Reply 1. Matrimony is certainly to be contracted with the first if, when he was contracting with the second, she was aware of the prior betrothal. The reason is that then the second was not deceived but wished to be deceived.

Reply 2. More probably, matrimony is also to be contracted with the first even if the second was not aware of the promise made to the other. The reason is that the promise made to the second is always null, as being concerning an illicit matter, nor does an injury inflicted upon the other take away the right of the first; and this has force even if the second promise was confirmed by an oath. - St. Ligorius, no. 848.

QUESTION 2. Must the first betrothed woman then yield her right if the other would suffer grave harm from the loss of virginity?

Reply. Probably no. The reason is that the second betrothed woman must impute harm of this kind to her own weakness. - St. Ligorius, ibid. Nevertheless, the first should be persuaded to renounce her right voluntarily unless perhaps she also would incur notable harm therefrom. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

728. ◦ QUESTION 3. Are earnest pledges licit in betrothals?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that they are neither prohibited by Canon law nor opposed to natural law. - St. Ligorius, no. 852.

QUESTION 4. Must the bride return gifts [2] received from the bridegroom if matrimony does not follow?

[2] Betrothal gifts or donations differ from earnest pledges because the latter are given as a pledge or security for fulfilling the thing promised; and therefore he who has given them recovers them when that concerning which agreement had been made is fulfilled. On the contrary, whatever is given by way of betrothal largesse cannot be reclaimed once the nuptials have followed, but ownership of it passes fully to the person to whom it was given, or rather the donation is confirmed and becomes absolute.

Reply 1. No, if the betrothal is dissolved through the fault of the bridegroom, because he, by culpably withdrawing from the promise, is deservedly considered to accept the loss of these gifts. Thus common practice.

Reply 2. Yes, speaking per se, if the betrothal is dissolved without the fault of the bridegroom, and a fortiori if through the fault of the bride; for the bride cannot retain them without injustice, since they were bestowed only in view of matrimony. The same would have to be said if one of the betrothed who received gifts or earnest pledges from the other were overtaken by death before the matrimony was entered; for according to what has just been said, the parents of the deceased are bound to restore everything to the surviving betrothed.

I said speaking per se, because if, considering the condition of the bridegroom, the gifts are of small importance and he does not object, he is considered to remit them.

729. ○ QUESTION 5. Must one who promised matrimony to a girl on the condition that he sin with her marry her?

Reply. Yes, with the common opinion, according to what was said concerning Justice, volume 1, nos. 729 and 760 [3]. - See St. Ligorius, book 3, no. 642, where he says that this opinion must altogether be held.

[3] In the notes which you will find appended to these places, it was shown that the opposite opinion is strengthened merely by the deceptive coloring of fallacious citations.

730. ○ QUESTION 6. Can a merely civil marriage, as it is made in France before a magistrate, be regarded as equivalent to betrothal?

Reply 1. It appears that it must be affirmed if the contracting parties have the intention of afterward having recourse to the Church and contracting before the Pastor, and manifest this intention by an external sign [4]. The reason is that then they do not contract matrimony but only satisfy the prescription of civil law and at the same time bind themselves, at least implicitly, to contract true matrimony before the Church.

[4] This question ought to appear nearly useless. For it must not be thought that those who approach the magistrate for this reason had not previously agreed among themselves concerning the matrimony to be contracted or had not expressly given mutual pledges. It must therefore be supposed that true betrothals have already preceded. As regards the obligation of betrothal and the consequent impediment of public decency arising therefrom, it appears useless to inquire whether a ceremony of this kind before the civil magistrate contributes anything to these.

Reply 2. If they do not have such an intention, the civil contract cannot be regarded as a betrothal contract. The reason is that there is no promise of matrimony [5], but only a clandestine matrimony here and now, which in no way has the force of betrothal, as the Sacred Congregation of the Council of Trent declared [6]. - Carriere, no. 565. - See Cases, no. 847.

[5] Where the intention of celebrating matrimony before the Church is absent, not only in this civil contract (if it merits the name of contract), but not even in the preceding pledge concerning future nuptials, which must be supposed to have been mutually given, will there be any true promise of matrimony or any nature of true betrothal. The reason is evident, because if that intention is absent, matrimony, which does not exist among Christians apart from the Sacrament of Matrimony, is no longer promised; but under the name of matrimony a merely concubinous union is promised.

[6] That a clandestine matrimony, even with intercourse subsequently occurring, is not resolved into betrothal concerning the future is reported in a twofold declaration by Benedict XIV (Canonical Questions 291, near the end), and you also have it in the Thesaurus of Resolutions of the Congregation of the Council (volume 2, pp. 239-244). Therefore, Cabassutius (Theory of Canon Law, etc., book 3, chapter 24), Coninck (On the Sacraments, disputation 32, no. 78), De Rhodes (Scholastic Theology, Treatise on the Last Five Sacraments, section 5, section 7), Schram (Institutions of Theology, On Matrimony, no. 1230), and any others who, for precisely this reason, taught that the impediment of public decency arises therefrom only to the first degree, are not to be heard. Nevertheless, an exception must be made with Sanchez (book 2, disputation 20, no. 6) unless those contracting the clandestine matrimony had the intention of binding themselves in the manner in which they could; for since they could bind themselves through betrothal, they will remain thus bound, not indeed by force of the contract concerning the present, which is null, but from betrothals contained implicitly in the same contract according to their intention.

A graver question is debated whether that impediment of public decency arises from a clandestine matrimony, not insofar as it passes over into betrothal, but insofar as, according to the ancient Law (which St. Pius V, in the Constitution Ad Romanum, July 1, 1568, declared to be in no way changed as regards this), an impediment of this kind, and indeed to the fourth degree, arises from any ratified matrimony, even invalid, provided it was not invalid because of defect of consent. This question can indeed also regard those who perhaps had the intention of contracting betrothal concerning the present before a civil magistrate.

Moreover, several, and indeed grave Authors, taught that the impediment is incurred, such as Gonzalez, Pontius, Wiestner, Guttierez, Laurenius, Fagnanus, etc. They appear to have been led chiefly to this opinion by certain Declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Council which were circulated, the principal and better known of which can be seen in this same place in the preceding edition of this work. Nevertheless, others, neither fewer in number nor less venerable in authority, such as Navarrus, Sanchez, Lessius, Tanner, Pirhing, Engel, Barbosa, Cardinal De Laurea, Emmanuel Sa, etc., went over to the opposite opinion and therefore deny that any impediment follows from a matrimony invalid because of the defect of clandestinity. They dispose without difficulty of the Declarations which the patrons of the first opinion allege, and show that some are apocryphal and others do not pertain to the matter. In this diversity of opinions, therefore, there remains place for that general canon which will be stated below for cases of a doubtful ecclesiastical impediment.

Article III. On the Dissolution of Betrothals

According to the opinion of all, betrothals can be dissolved for just causes. The principal causes are: mutual consent; a supervening impediment [1]; the choice of a more perfect state, for example, religious profession, etc.; a grave crime of the other party, for example, fornication; a notable change of status, namely, a circumstance which, had it been known or foreseen, would, in the judgment of prudent persons, have deterred one from the betrothal; [2]. Betrothals can also be dissolved through an excessive delay of matrimony, especially if a time for contracting matrimony had been determined.

[1] Understand a diriment impediment, and indeed one by natural law. For if the impediment is diriment only by ecclesiastical law, although the obligation ceases on the part of the innocent party, it does not likewise cease on the part of the one who by his own fault placed the cause of the impediment, but is only suspended; so that the latter (unless he would thereby incur harm much graver than the injured party would incur from omission of the nuptials) is bound to seek a dispensation from the impediment and, when it has been removed, if the injured party still wishes, to fulfill the pledge given to that party. Nor do the Doctors in fact disagree concerning this matter. For the discrepancy which someone might suspect from those things which St. Alphonsus (book 6, nos. 857-858) reports is owed entirely to the drowsiness and negligence of the Salmanticenses (On Matrimony, chapter 2, from no. 70) in describing the opinions of the Doctors.

 The VV. turn the excuse of St. Alphonsus which the final words of this brief Note present into a reproach against me, and therefore do not hesitate to write these things (p. 794): The reproach of inexcusable drowsiness and negligence redounds upon Father Ballerini rather than upon the Salmanticenses; in reviewing the cited texts he appears not only to have dozed but to have slept. Since, therefore, as is evident, no texts are cited in the Note except those of St. Alphonsus and the Salmanticenses, let us inquire concerning these.

St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 857) has these things: It is doubtful whether the betrothals are then dissolved on the part of the guilty party. Dicastillus affirms it, and the Salmanticenses think it probable, because, such an impediment being supposed, matrimony has now been rendered impossible. But Sanchez and Palaus, with Coninck and Guttierez, more commonly and more probably deny it; they say that the obligation of the betrothal is then suspended until the impediment is removed, because it is not equitable that the delinquent should derive advantage from his crime. In these words, as is manifest, the more common opinion of Sanchez with others is opposed by St. Alphonsus to the assertion of Dicastillus. Let us therefore inquire whether the assertion of Dicastillus truly disagrees with the more common opinion of the others there expounded, or whether, as is said in the Note, they can be reconciled; and thence it will be evident whether a discrepancy of this kind must be derived from elsewhere than from opinions of the Doctors not rightly described.

The text of Dicastillus (On the Sacraments, treatise 10, disputation 1, no. 554), cited by the Salmanticenses, has thus: It can be proved by a general reason that neither of them (namely, the contracting parties), once an impediment has been introduced either culpably or inculpably, remains obligated IMMEDIATELY AND PROXIMATELY to matrimony; for no one can be obligated to that which cannot be done. Thus the VV. also report the text of Dicastillus (p. 794).

And here indeed it could be asked how it can be called merely probable that, after a diriment impediment has been introduced, the contracting parties are not proximately and immediately obligated to matrimony, when to contract it is then unlawful for them and, in addition, matrimony entered into with a diriment impediment would now be invalid. Is not a matter of this kind rather evident and clear in itself? Nevertheless, St. Alphonsus, as is evident from his words cited above, writes: Dicastillus affirms it, and the Salmanticenses think it PROBABLE, and adds the same reason as Dicastillus: because, such an impediment being supposed, matrimony has now been rendered impossible. And in fact the Salmanticenses also have it thus, adding the same reason (On Matrimony, chapter 2, no. 70): Dicastillus PROBABLY adds.... And the reason is that no one is bound to that which he cannot do, and, such an impediment being supposed, matrimony has now been rendered impossible on the part of each!

But this being omitted, let us now ask whether anyone rightly opposes Sanchez, Palaus, etc., and the more common opinion to the cited assertion of Dicastillus. For there is reason to doubt, because Sanchez also (book 1, disputation 56, no. 1), to the Question, Are betrothals dissolved because of a supervening impediment of law?, replies no differently from Dicastillus: When the impediment is diriment, ALL ADMIT that the betrothals are dissolved..., because matrimony can no longer subsist between them. Since, therefore, according to Sanchez, all Theologians unanimously profess this doctrine, and indeed for the same reason, that matrimony is then impossible, why is it that St. Alphonsus presents Sanchez, Palaus..., and the more common opinion as opposed to Dicastillus and at the same time to Sanchez and the unanimous opinion of the Doctors? Whence this, unless from the opinion of Dicastillus having been wrongly described or proposed by the Salmanticenses?

But again, Sanchez, although with Dicastillus, indeed with all Theologians, he established that in the case betrothals are dissolved because matrimony has now been rendered impossible, nevertheless (l.c., no. 4) adds the question: Is he through whose fault the diriment impediment is contracted bound to obtain a dispensation in order that he may fulfill the betrothal? And then he resolves this question, establishing when he is to be said to be bound to this and when not. Therefore, unless someone wishes gratuitously to contend that Sanchez speaks contradictory things, it must be concluded that that suspension of the betrothals for which St. Alphonsus, as we saw above, cites Sanchez is in no way repugnant to the general doctrine both of Sanchez, Dicastillus, and all Theologians, namely, that because of the induced diriment impediment the betrothals are dissolved, or, as Dicastillus says, neither contracting party remains immediately and proximately obligated to matrimony. It must therefore be said again that the discrepancy which is imagined between the two doctrines is due solely to an inexact exposition of the opinions.

But neither is this enough. For Dicastillus himself (l.c., no. 555), in support of his opinion which we presented above, cites Sanchez, Guttierez, and, besides others, even Coninck, namely, those whom St. Alphonsus, as we have seen, opposes to him as adversaries. Whence is this, unless from the opinions of the Doctors having been proposed less exactly? For we have already seen that Sanchez agrees with Dicastillus in that general assertion.

But again, Dicastillus (l.c., no. 556) adds: I said that he does not remain immediately and proximately obligated; for, as regards the obligation of asking for or procuring a dispensation from the impediment, there is controversy among the Authors whether at least he who gave cause to the impediment is bound to ask for and procure the dispensation. He himself also resolves this question by determining when the man is bound to this and when not. Therefore Dicastillus, no differently from Sanchez, so holds that the obligation of betrothal is dissolved by the introduced impediment that, nevertheless, the obligation of procuring a dispensation remains for him who placed the cause of the impediment. But this is what St. Alphonsus, citing Sanchez, calls the obligation of betrothal being suspended. What, then, causes the Holy Doctor to oppose to Dicastillus Sanchez, Palaus, and Coninck, who with the more common opinion say that the obligation of betrothal is suspended, unless the opinions of the Doctors are not presented exactly?

The VV. object (p. 795): Dicastillus derives the obligation of sometimes asking for a dispensation, not from the betrothals, whose obligation he considers entirely extinguished on both sides, but solely from the harm inflicted.

Reply. The VV. do not report the opinion of Dicastillus here with sufficient exactness, or certainly not with sufficient clarity. The words of Dicastillus (l.c., no. 559) are these: He is not bound FORMALLY from the betrothal promise, but from the harm inflicted, or arising from the impediment freely placed. Attention, therefore, must be given to that word, FORMALLY; but Dicastillus himself had already sufficiently explained what a betrothal promise formally imports according to him when he said (ibid., no. 554) that neither remains obligated IMMEDIATELY AND PROXIMATELY to matrimony. And since the terms mediately and remotely correspond on the opposite side to the terms immediately and proximately, by that very fact they do not exclude that someone may remain obligated to matrimony mediately and remotely by force of the promise, that is, to remove (unless something prevents it) the impediment which he freely placed against the matrimony. Therefore, this obligation of asking for a dispensation indeed arises proximately from the harm unjustly inflicted; but why is the harm held to have been inflicted unjustly? Because the harm arises, namely, from the violation of a right acquired by the other through the former promise. Therefore, that promise is ultimately the root of why he is bound to repair the harm and, consequently, unless something prevents it, to procure the dispensation.

Otherwise, do others give a reason for this obligation different from that of Dicastillus? Behold Sanchez giving the same reason (l.c., no. 4) thus: The bridegroom who has unjustly created the impediment is bound in justice to remove the impediment in a manner possible to him. And Palaus (treatise 28, disputation 1, point 26, no. 4): He who voluntarily places an impediment against contracting matrimony violates the right of the other party; therefore he is bound to repair it. But no other mode of reparation is more apt than that he remove the impediment; therefore he is bound to remove it if he can. Indeed, see in Palaus (ibid., no. 5) the opinion of Dicastillus repeated nearly word for word. I reply (he says) that by the law of betrothals no one is obligated to procure a dispensation from a diriment impediment; nevertheless, he is so obligated from the unjust and inequitable placement of the impediment against the other party, for whom a dispensation is not an extraordinary means, but one ordinary and required per se. Therefore, since even those Authors whom St. Alphonsus opposes to Dicastillus give the same reason for the obligation as he does, the VV. here too seek in vain a discrepancy between the opinions of those whom the Holy Doctor presents as disagreeing.

Again the VV. object (p. 795) that Dicastillus, if the harm can be sufficiently compensated in another way, exempts the bridegroom from asking for a dispensation; by this they wish to confirm that Dicastillus derives the obligation of asking for a dispensation solely from the harm inflicted.

Reply. Herincx explains the opinion of Dicastillus better; the VV. themselves (l.c.) report his words thus: It can nevertheless happen that one who deliberately placed an impediment of this kind is obligated to ask for a dispensation or otherwise to repair the harm inflicted upon the bride. See Dicastillus.

Moreover, in order that the reason for this doctrine may be understood, it must be carefully observed that those Authors whom St. Alphonsus adduces for his opinion also do not always and in every case obligate the bridegroom to ask for a dispensation from an impediment introduced by him. Hence, in the texts just cited Sanchez and Palaus add a limitation: the former, in a manner possible to him; the latter, if he can. Hence Sanchez (l.c.) exempts him from an obligation of this kind if (in the absence of some graver reason) the dispensation requires great expense and a long delay; for a promise is understood while things remain in the same state. Indeed, St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 858) writes: Others say more probably that he is indeed bound (to ask for a dispensation), even apart from harm inflicted, if the dispensation could easily be obtained; otherwise, if great expenses and a long delay were required for it, because the obligation arising from the betrothals urges the bridegroom to employ only ordinary and easy means, not difficult and extraordinary ones. Sporer, however, with Tamburini, excepts the case in which harm from the loss of virginity or of reputation must be repaired, as above; because then he would be bound even to expend a great sum, but not so great that he would be compelled to fall from his state.

Again, it must be observed that St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 857), with all Theologians, writes thus concerning the innocent party: If the impediment is diriment, it is certain among all that (the betrothals) are dissolved on the part of the innocent party, so that the latter is not bound to admit the dispensation.

From this, however, another question arises: whether in such a case the injured bride is given the choice that, if she does not wish to use or admit the dispensation, she may choose to be compensated in another way. This question also has its place in the preceding hypothesis, namely, when either the dispensation can in no way be obtained, or at least its procurement would impose upon the bridegroom an inconvenience or harm much graver than that which the bride would suffer from the want of the nuptials. Therefore, there was a proper and grave reason why Dicastillus should treat this further question, concerning which he writes (l.c., no. 561): I do not remember having read anything in the Authors. And since he determines that the bridegroom does not remain exempt from every obligation, both when the dispensation cannot be obtained, when its procurement would impose a graver burden upon him, and when the bride is unwilling to admit the offered dispensation, he consequently concludes with reason (l.c., no. 559) that the aforesaid bridegroom is bound either to ask for a dispensation or otherwise to compensate for the harm.

Dicastillus himself applies this conclusion to a twofold hypothesis, namely: 1. when the harm inflicted is nothing other than the harm of the impediment culpably introduced, and consequently of the promise not faithfully kept, by which he was obligated to fulfill it and therefore not to place an impediment; 2. when the bride suffers some other grave harm in addition.

And concerning the first hypothesis he writes (l.c., no. 561): He will then be bound to compensate or satisfy the bride only to the extent to which, in the judgment of a prudent person, it was in her interest that the betrothals should have continued in their rigor and should have been fulfilled at the proper time; if this compensation CAN BE MADE APART FROM MATRIMONY, the bridegroom cannot be compelled to matrimony. This conclusion discloses the meaning of the words which thus precede it: Nor is the bridegroom himself bound by the obligation of betrothal..., and therefore he cannot be compelled by it PRECISELY because of that obligation, but he will only be bound to repair the harm inflicted. For the condition is then added, IF the compensation CAN BE MADE APART FROM MATRIMONY. Therefore, the matter is not left to the free choice of the bridegroom, but the question remains to be decided from the general principles commonly handed down concerning restitution for harm inflicted.

Concerning the other hypothesis, however, Dicastillus holds (l.c., no. 562): If the bride suffers grave harm which can be repaired in two ways, namely, either by marrying her or by satisfying her in another way, the bridegroom must satisfy her in another way if she so wishes.... Wherefore, if the harm which she would suffer to her own reputation or in contracting another SIMILAR matrimony can be repaired by the bridegroom through the establishment of a fitting dowry, AND SHE HAS CHOSEN THIS, it appears that she can compel the bridegroom to this and reject those nuptials; for it is not equitable that, in order to repair the harm received, she should be compelled to unite herself to and marry the man from whom she received so great a harm of disgrace and infamy, if not now inflicted upon herself (for this is compensated through matrimony), at least upon her sister and family, and by participation also upon herself in her sister.

Therefore the doctrine of Dicastillus is by no means singular or repugnant to the common doctrine of the others. But if other authors in this place scarcely, or scarcely at all, touch upon this latter question, namely, concerning satisfaction or reparation of harm to be made otherwise when the dispensation from the impediment appears to be set aside, either because a burden graver than is equitable would thus be imposed upon the bridegroom, or because the bride has just cause for refusing the dispensation and the nuptials, and they leave the solution of this question to be sought from the general principles handed down in the Treatise on Restitution, this by no means brings about a discrepancy or disagreement among the Doctors.

Moreover, the merely apparent discrepancy among the Doctors, concerning which the Note speaks, does not concern merely the opinion of Dicastillus. But since the VV. raised difficulties concerning this one point alone, we too refrain from speaking of the others.

[2] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 865) explains this rule, thus divided into two parts: For supervening causes, that one suffices which, if it had been foreseen, would have prevented the betrothals from being contracted.... But for prior yet unknown causes, that one suffices which, if it supervened, would already suffice for rescinding the betrothals, or even one which would have deterred from contracting if it had previously been known. And indeed, according to Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 62, no. 6), Pirhing (book 4, title 1, no. 63), and Schmalzgrueber (same title, no. 188), one who asserts that he would not have contracted betrothals if such a circumstance had existed from the beginning or had been known must be believed not only in the forum of conscience but also in the external forum, if, in the judgment of prudent persons and after the circumstances have been considered, it appears likely that he would by no means have made the promise had he forethought that cause. The reason is that things which consist in the mind, such as ignorance, knowledge, intention, etc., since they cannot become known to men, cannot be proved by witnesses, and therefore one must stand by each person's oath if nothing to the contrary can be proved from elsewhere.

731. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is the arrival of a rich inheritance to the bridegroom a sufficient cause for dissolving betrothals?

Reply. It is disputed [3]. Some deny it, because absolutely nothing on the part of the bride has changed. Others, however, affirm it, because between the two betrothed persons there no longer exists the same condition of things; and if the bridegroom had foreseen this change of fortune, he would in no way have wished to contract with such a person. This opinion St. Ligorius, no. 876, appears sufficiently to approve.

[3] Since this opinion is sufficiently probable, as even those who prefer the opposite opinion concede, the Confessor therefore cannot obligate the man to matrimony. It seems that it must be attributed to a typographical error that in St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 876) the first opinion is called the most common, since several can be adduced also for the second.

 These four lines furnished the VV. an argument for writing eight columns (pp. 798-800)! Behold their first objection (pp. 799-800): Even if the affirmative opinion, that the betrothals can be dissolved, is truly probable, nevertheless, if a cause of this kind were treated in the external forum, could the judge pronounce in favor of the bridegroom, who has a doubtful right? The Holy Doctor, book 1, no. 47, writes: The judge is bound to judge according to the more probable opinion.... Therefore, if the judge cannot pronounce judgment in favor of the bridegroom, how could the Confessor do so in the internal forum? Is he not himself also a judge?

Reply. St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 604) had already replied to this difficulty. For he writes thus: You will say: A judge of the external forum ought to judge according to the more probable opinion of one party, although the other party has a probable opinion in his favor; therefore the Confessor cannot absolve a penitent who wishes to follow a probable opinion against his own more probable opinion. Is this not the objection of the VV.? The Holy Doctor then continues: Reply. The reasoning of the external and sacramental forum is far different; for in the external forum, since the truth of the matter is treated, namely, whether the field belongs to one party or the other, the judge, who is bound to render to each his right, ought indeed to adjudge the thing to the one who has the more probable right, and certainly cannot adjudge it to the other, who has the less probable opinion in his favor; for the probability of the latter cannot make the thing not more probably belong to him who has the more probable right, and consequently the judge would act unjustly if he did not adjudge the thing to him. But the Confessor, WHENEVER HIS OPINION IS NOT EVIDENTLY CERTAIN, cannot obligate the penitent to follow it; hence he then not only can, but is bound to absolve him, PERMITTING HIM TO FOLLOW HIS OWN OPINION. Therefore, if the Confessor must permit the penitent to follow a probable opinion, even according to St. Alphonsus in the present case he cannot (as is said in the Note) obligate him to matrimony.

The VV. press the point by asking: Is not he (the Confessor) also a judge? Behold the reply of St. Alphonsus (l.c.) to a question of this kind: Reply. The Confessor is not the judge of the opinions which the penitent is bound to follow, but only of the disposition of his penitent.... As regards other opinions which concern the obligation of the penitent, namely, those things which the penitent must do or avoid, the Confessor is not a judge, nor can he obligate a penitent who wishes to follow the contrary opinion to follow his own.... Hence, when... the Confessor does not have evident certainty of the falsity of that (opinion), he can, indeed is bound, to permit the penitent to follow his own opinion..., because the Confessor is not the judge of controversies. Therefore, since the Confessor is bound to permit the penitent to follow a probable opinion in things to be done or avoided, and since it is probable that in the present case the bridegroom can withdraw from the betrothals, it is manifest, also from the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, that the Confessor cannot obligate the penitent to matrimony.

2. The VV. object (p. 800): From a special Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, all Confessors in the practice of the sacred tribunal of Penance can safely follow all the opinions of St. Alphonsus without having to weigh the grounds and reasons upon which the various opinions rest. Therefore, this opinion (namely, what is said in the Note, that the Confessor cannot in the case obligate the man to matrimony) must be altogether rejected; for by force of the cited Declaration the Confessor can follow the opposite opinion of St. Alphonsus, who holds that the bridegroom cannot in the case withdraw from the betrothals and therefore can be obligated to matrimony.

Reply. St. Alphonsus, as is evident from the words cited above, expressly affirms that the Confessor is bound to permit the penitent to follow his own opinion. Therefore, according to St. Alphonsus, in the present case the Confessor cannot obligate the man to matrimony. How, then, because of the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, will the Confessor be able with St. Alphonsus to obligate him to matrimony, if according to St. Alphonsus himself he is bound not to obligate him?

Again, the Sacred Penitentiary adds in the Declaration itself: Without, however, those being considered reprehensible who follow opinions handed down by other approved Authors. Therefore, from the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, one may follow approved Authors who teach that in the present case the bridegroom is not obligated to matrimony. And if this is permitted by the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, how do the VV. contend that this opinion must be altogether rejected by force of this Declaration? Moreover, when the Confessor knows that the penitent may licitly use an opinion which exempts him from an obligation, according to the opinion of all, including St. Alphonsus, he cannot impose the obligation. Therefore, even according to the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, the Confessor cannot in the present case obligate the man to matrimony. Again, therefore, one may ask: how, by force of the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, as the VV. contend, can the Confessor in the present case obligate the man to matrimony with St. Alphonsus?

Therefore, in order to avoid consequences of this kind which conflict with one another, one must keep wholly before one's eyes those things which are learnedly noted concerning these judgments of the Apostolic Penitentiary in the Acts Extracted from Those Things Which Are Done at the Holy See, etc., volume 1, appendix 17, pp. 497-501. Some appear to attribute to this judgment of the Holy See (thus there, p. 498) much more than the judgment itself bears. For they appear to think that the Holy See judged all the opinions of St. Alphonsus to be true, or they even appear to infer from the judgment of the Holy See that anyone acts prudently if he accommodates himself to any opinion of St. Alphonsus whatsoever, even if he knows, whether from his own knowledge or from competent authority, that the opinion which he follows is evidently false.

The learned Author of the Appendix then speaks thus concerning these things (p. 500): This judgment in no way concerns opinions which enjoy some probability and which are disputed, or can be disputed, among the Doctors. Hence he infers: What can be inferred from this judgment of the Holy See is this, namely, that every Catholic WHO IS UNABLE TO INQUIRE FURTHER INTO THE TRUTH OF THE OPINIONS can prudently follow that master and doctor who wrote nothing worthy of that censure which would have stood in the way of the Acts of Canonization. And below (p. 501): From the response by which St. Alphonsus was declared to be one of the approved Authors, whose opinions one who follows acts SAFELY, one would not rightly infer from the particle SAFELY expressed in the proposed doubt that all the opinions and judgments of the Holy Prelate were declared true; this is recognized from the other part of the Response, according to which those who follow opinions handed down by other approved Authors are not to be reprehended. For no one is ignorant that Authors approved in the Church and received by usage sometimes hand down diverse and contrary opinions, which, since they enjoy probability, no one who follows them is worthy of reproach.

And below: The Response of the Sacred Penitentiary does not rest upon a principle of knowledge, as though whatever St. Alphonsus taught were true; but it rests upon other extrinsic prudential reasons, because of which one who follows his opinions acts prudently, and therefore safely. These reasons are those which we indicated shortly above and which are substituted in the absence of knowledge; namely, anyone acts prudently, and therefore safely, if he makes his own a doctrine received by usage in the Church which a learned and prudent man, especially if he is recent and resplendent in sanctity, has taught. But since this principle of prudence is substituted for the absence of knowledge, it must be said to admit an exception whenever it is evidently established for us that some opinion of the author whom we follow is false and enjoys no probability.

Therefore, to conclude: since it is a common principle, and one also handed down as certain by the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, that a Confessor cannot impose an obligation upon a penitent when, according to the opinion of approved Doctors, it is probable that such an obligation does not exist; and since in the present case it is probable that the bridegroom is not obligated to matrimony; it plainly follows that the opinion of St. Alphonsus, where he denies that the bridegroom can withdraw in the present case, is indeed among those opinions which one who follows in the absence of knowledge and relying merely upon the aforesaid judgment of prudence cannot be reproached for following; but by no means can it be inferred from the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary that this opinion can safely be employed in practice by a Confessor endowed with some knowledge who sufficiently recognizes those two premises, namely, both that it is probable that the bridegroom can in the case withdraw from the betrothals, and that the Confessor cannot licitly impose an obligation when it is probable that the obligation does not exist.

3. But the VV. (p. 799) appear also to have wished to cast doubt upon whether it is truly probable that the bridegroom can withdraw in the present case. For they write: From the foregoing it is evident that this probability rests upon only a weaker foundation.

Reply. If by this obscure phrase the VV. wish merely to signify that, in their judgment, this opinion possesses less probability than the opposite, which they consider more probable, someone will reply: Let the Antecedent pass; and I deny the Consequent. For even lesser probability (as St. Alphonsus says) serves to show... that the law in that case, since it is doubtful, does not bind. (See several texts of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus on this matter in volume 1, pp. 60 and 65.) It therefore remains that in the present case the Confessor cannot obligate the bridegroom to matrimony.

But if by that phrase they wish to infer that the probability of this opinion is doubtful, I indeed do not see what they have brought forward in the foregoing (as they say) from which this is evident. And first, among the foregoing things I find no reason adduced by them for the thesis of St. Alphonsus, just as the Holy Doctor (book 6, no. 876) had adduced no reason. Did they themselves perhaps perceive that the reasons which patrons of that opinion are accustomed to advance are such that it is especially useful for their cause to suppress them altogether in silence? They indeed employed in what followed those two reasons related above, the one drawn from the office of the Confessor as judge, the other from the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary. But we have already sufficiently seen whether these have any force.

4. Therefore, in the foregoing the VV. merely heap up many names of Authors; by this heap they endeavor at the same time to prove that St. Alphonsus rightly called his opinion the most common. Nevertheless, let that now have force which they themselves observe (p. 798), that Authors are to be weighed rather than counted; and we shall add that weighing must also, and indeed especially, be employed concerning the arguments which perhaps are adduced by them for the thesis.

This opinion (says Diana, volume 2, treatise 6, resolution 18, no. 3) previously had Sanchez alone as its author. But I ask: what reason did Sanchez (book 1, disputation 39, no. 7) adduce? Because, he says, the other has not been rendered of a worse condition, just as if I promised to sell a horse at a price which was then just, the greatly increased value at the time of delivery will cause no difficulty. But this reasoning is neither always firm, nor does the alleged parity have any force. First, the reasoning is not generally firm, because if, for example, the bridegroom should afterward lose his office or for some other cause become unequal to bearing the burdens of matrimony, he can withdraw from the betrothals even though the condition of the bride has not been made worse. A promise of matrimony, says Palaus (On Betrothals, disputation 1, point 28, no. 3), is implicitly made under that state of riches; hence, if he falls from it, the obligation ceases. Second, the alleged parity has no force and, moreover, labors under an equivocation. For those words of Sanchez, If I promised to sell, signify either a mere promise to sell or a completed sale. If it was a mere promise to sell, even at some fixed price, it is denied that the promisor is bound to that price if the prior state of things is changed into another far different one; for, as the same Sanchez says (ibid., no. 4), a promise is understood while things remain in the same state. Accordingly, if that promise, for example, concerned grapes to be sold at a fixed price at a time when the vineyards promised a most abundant vintage, and hail afterward dreadfully devastated all the vineyards of the province, surely the promisor would not be bound to sell the grapes at that price. But if the discussion concerns a sale and not merely a promise to sell, the parity, as is evident, must altogether be denied; for the conditions inherent in a contract of promise cannot be transferred to a contract of sale. Do the other Authors, then, adduce any arguments besides these petty reasons of Sanchez, which are truly of no weight?

5. But let us consider further what can be concluded from the heap of names which the VV., as we have said, collected.

Sporer, as the VV. (p. 799) acknowledge, repeats in as many words (On Matrimony, no. 282) what Tamburini (book 8, chapter 5, section 8, no. 15) had copied literally from Gobat (treatise 10, no. 340), namely: Concerning these opinions, let one wiser than I interpose his judgment. Therefore, if the judgment of these three is considered, the Confessor cannot obligate the man to matrimony, for they leave the obligation uncertain. But an uncertain obligation is not an obligation and cannot be prescribed by the Confessor as a true obligation. Therefore. And here one is moved to ask: why do the VV. (p. 798) reckon Sporer among those who with St. Alphonsus deny that the bridegroom can withdraw?

6. The VV. mention (p. 799) how Sporer (l.c.) reports, while Ferraris (entry Betrothals, no. 117) praises, the distinction of Martin Perez, who says (Ferraris says) that one can withdraw if, in entering the betrothals, he had regard to the equality of riches or goods (read better, honors); and, on the contrary, that he cannot withdraw if he contracted without regard to the aforesaid because of another cause which persists, for example, because of special beauty. Therefore Ferraris, however less exactly he may report the opinion of Perez, nevertheless denies that the bridegroom is bound to matrimony unless perhaps he contracted the betrothals merely because of the beauty of the bride. Moreover, by this very thing he overthrows both the thesis and the petty reasons of Sanchez. Why, therefore, do the VV. (p. 798) number him also among those who defend the doctrine of Sanchez and St. Alphonsus?

I said that Ferraris reports the opinion of Perez less exactly. For the latter (On Betrothals, disputation 9, section 11, nos. 10-11) has it thus: Sanchez... and others hold that a very rich man is bound to stand by the betrothals, because he himself has not been rendered of a worse condition, nor is he said to have been deceived concerning the condition of the bride or to have erred concerning the condition of the bride, but concerning his own condition, toward which consent is not directed. Thus Perez, who in these words actually proposes all the petty reasons of this opinion. He then continues thus: I prove the opposite more with Hurtado, because that change thus made is notably graver, so that if it had been foreseen at the time of the betrothals by him who became richer, he would not have contracted them; this is the principal and efficacious reason for which betrothals can be dissolved in the other aforesaid cases. Since Perez therefore manifestly departs from the opinion of Sanchez, why do the VV. (p. 798) sell this man also as a patron of that same opinion of Sanchez?

Perez then resolves the petty reasons of the opposite opinion thus (ibid., no. 11): To the opposite argument I say that the other has been rendered of a worse condition as related to the present state of this one, just as if the latter had ascended to a higher grade of dignity, that of Count, Marquis, or Duke. Oberrauch (treatise 20, no. 2373) expresses this reply more clearly thus: I judge that it pertains here (namely, that the betrothals can be dissolved) if the condition of one party is greatly increased by nobility or wealth; for the other party is rendered much worse, not indeed in herself, but with respect to the fortunate bridegroom, and the matter is brought to that case in which the betrothals would never have been entered. Does not that petty reason, that the bride was not rendered of an inferior condition, fall by these words?

Behold, finally, the words of Perez (l.c.) from which Ferraris and Sporer argued that Perez speaks with a distinction: I understand the aforesaid doctrine morally and regularly speaking; for if someone had contracted betrothals ON ACCOUNT OF NOBILITY OR BEAUTY ALONE, a vast abundance of riches would not make their fulfillment notably graver for him after he had become richer, nor would it, had it existed from the beginning, have deterred him from the betrothals in that event. Perez therefore merely excepts the case in which a foreseen increase of fortune would not have deterred one from contracting those betrothals. But this exception of a singular case can in no way be drawn into a general rule.

7. But let us return to the names heaped up by the VV. in favor of the opinion of St. Alphonsus. Therefore, besides Sporer, Ferraris, and Perez, vainly cited by them, there occur there the names of Struggl, Leonardelli, Schmalzgrueber, and the Salmanticenses. Moreover, the VV. themselves (p. 799) acknowledge that these authors, either in express words or equivalently, also admit the opposite opinion as probable. But if this is so, these authors can certainly be cited effectively for denying the obligation, but by no means for urging the obligation in practice. And the reason is manifest, because, from the principle so greatly inculcated by the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, the probability of the negative opinion suffices for denying the obligation, while the probability of the affirmative opinion does not suffice for producing an obligation, which is none if it is uncertain. Therefore these too must be said to stand rather against the conclusion of St. Alphonsus. Why, then, do the VV. thrust in those authors also, from whom the opposite is concluded, in order to increase the number of names?

8. The VV. add (l.c.) that the opinion rejected by the Holy Doctor is also held probable by Concina. Therefore, even according to Concina, otherwise a rigorist, the bridegroom cannot be obligated to matrimony by the Confessor, although St. Alphonsus cites him on his own behalf.

And the VV. would surely have deserved more abundant praise for fidelity if they had added that Escobar also, whom the Holy Doctor adduces for himself, called the opposite opinion probable. Therefore, he too could deservedly have seemed fit to be deleted from that catalogue of names, since he already overthrows the conclusion of the Holy Doctor.

But, further, the same fidelity demanded of the VV. that, since they were expounding the state of the question solely by the support of authority, they should not have suppressed in silence that Leander also (treatise 9, disputation 2, question 47), in the Salmanticenses (treatise 9, chapter 2, no. 77), called the negative opinion probable. With Leander could be associated Giribaldi (treatise 10, chapter 2, no. 78), Voit (volume 2, no. 1166), Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 173), and Maschat (book 4, title 1, no. 29), who report the same opinion in such a way that they at least by no means reject it.

To these must be added Baumgartner, who writes (book 4, title 1, conclusion 14): Whether one party can withdraw if, for example, he has become notably richer from an unexpected inheritance, the Authors dispute probably on both sides.

Likewise Scarpazza (Decisions of Cases of Conscience, Betrothals, case 14, volume 9, p. 50): Between the two opposite opinions, the one affirmative and the other negative, it appears to me that, speaking generally, the negative should be preferred as more probable. By these words he surely admits both to be probable.

9. Therefore we now have eighteen Authors from whose suffrage the Confessor cannot obligate the bridegroom to matrimony. But others must be added to these; for, as Voit says (l.c.), many hold that a party who has become notably richer or more noble can licitly withdraw from the other party, who is now unequal.

Therefore, to indicate some who have come to our attention, besides Ochagavia and Trullench, whom all, and even St. Alphonsus, cite for this opinion, and besides Oberrauch, related above, already in Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 192) Schmier and Wes hold this opinion.

Likewise Anthony of St. Joseph (treatise 34, no. 42) teaches that betrothals can be dissolved if one of the betrothed, together with riches, should unexpectedly be elevated to a higher state or rank.

To this pertains what Wagemann has thus (part 3, treatise 3, no. 123): Between the two opinions I use a distinction: if the riches and nobility should introduce an enormous disparity between the betrothed persons, they dissolve the betrothals; otherwise not. Hence all the petty reasons are exploded which, after Sanchez, are customarily brought forward to the contrary.

And Viva (On Matrimony, question 2, article 6, no. 2): If very great riches should come to one party after the betrothals, I also judge with Hurtado, against Sanchez and Bonacina, that he can likewise withdraw; since this is a notable change, which, had it been foreseen, would have prevented him from consenting, even though it be true that he was not deceived concerning the condition of the other party. These last words set forth the petty reason employed by most of the adversaries.

And in fact Hurtado speaks thus (disputation 2, On Matrimony, disputation 14, no. 25): We consider the opinion of Sanchez and Coninck difficult, because the aforesaid change is so notable that of itself it renders fulfillment notably burdensome after the bridegroom has become richer, and, had it existed from the beginning, it would also have deterred a prudent man from the betrothals.

To these must be added Babenstuber, who writes thus concerning this controversy (treatise 8, part 7, disputation 1, article 4, no. 37): The affirmative opinion (that the bridegroom can withdraw from the betrothals) pleases me, which Illsung and the great Schmier hold.... The reason is that, in the judgment of prudent persons, the bridegroom not only could but also would have provided for himself a far more excellent matrimony if he had foreseen this change of his state. Although the bride... is not made worse, nevertheless she is rendered of a notably inferior condition, and consequently worse; by which the argument for the opposite is resolved.

And on the same matter Illsung, cited by Babenstuber, reasons well thus (treatise 6, disputation 9, question 1, no. 29): A contract so difficult, namely, of entering a matrimony which can never again be dissolved, according to the common rule reported in Palaus, by its nature excepts all notably prejudicial changes upon knowledge of which the betrothals would not have been contracted. Hence Amicus, disputation 32, from no. 66, also infers that not only is a right of renouncing the betrothals given from a supervening... deterioration of the other contracting party, but by equal reasoning he can withdraw to whom, from supervening nobility or great riches, for example, a rich inheritance, a notably better state has come, so that, in the judgment of prudent persons, he would be considered able and willing to enter a far more excellent matrimony if he had foreseen that state; and thus the other contracting party, through the elevation of the one, is rendered notably inferior and comparatively worse.

Dicastillus also touches this question excellently thus (treatise 10, disputation 1, no. 599): This doctrine (of Sanchez, Reginald, etc.) appears to me not a little difficult. For that change on the part of him who has become rich appears sufficient to render the contract of matrimony far more difficult on his part; because by the very fact that he has greatly increased in riches, the considerable proportion between the two contracting parties, who previously contracted with each other after account had been taken of the goods and condition of each, is removed. But by the very fact that there is so great an excess on the part of one, the proportion which was previously considered is removed; and therefore, although no change has been made on the part of the other, the alteration of the goods on the part of one suffices for that notable excess to introduce a change of proportion; if he who became rich had known this, he would not at the beginning have contracted with a woman whose dowry is not proportionate to him. From this doctrine the foundation of the opposite opinion collapses, and she is of a worse condition, not by a change of herself, but of the other. Hurtado also approves this, and Perez after him.

No less clear are the things by which Francis Amicus (On Matrimony, disputation 32, section 11, nos. 66-67) confirms the same doctrine. When things have been notably changed, the betrothed persons are not bound to fulfill the betrothals; nor understand this only of a change of the other betrothed person for the worse, but also of one's own change to a notably better condition: both because the Doctors pronounce it without limitation, and although they give examples concerning a change of the other to a worse state, they do so because this is regular and examples are customarily given only concerning cases which regularly occur; and because that same notable change for the better on the part of one places the other in a state of notably worse condition with respect to the former, for the more the state of one is elevated, the more the state of the other is comparatively lowered in relation to him; for these things are correlative, one of which is varied without a change of itself through the change of the other alone; and from that common rule: Whenever some new cause emerges after betrothals have been contracted which, if it had been present from the beginning, would have prevented the betrothals from being contracted, it furnishes a just occasion for dissolving the betrothals. But who will deny that if from the beginning there had been so great an abundance of riches that through it his state would have been elevated so notably that he could have entered another far more noble marriage, he would not have contracted these betrothals which he in fact contracted? Finally, if the bridegroom or bride were asked what he or she would have done in that case, who will deny that the answer would be that he or she would have contracted other betrothals than those in fact contracted, by which his or her state would have been elevated? But Sanchez says, disputation 62, no. 6, that a bridegroom or bride asserting that he or she would by no means have promised if such a cause had been present from the beginning must be believed in both forums if, in the judgment of a prudent person and after the circumstances have been weighed, it is likely that the person would not have promised. The reason: since in this contract, which is special above the rest, regard is had not so much to the utility of the contracting parties as to the indissoluble union of their minds, any cause whatsoever which can notably change the minds of the contracting parties in regard to contracting matrimony suffices for dissolving the betrothals, lest the matrimony have an unhappy outcome.

10. Let the conclusion therefore be this: even if the matter is to be decided by considering only the weight of authority, nevertheless, since we have nearly thirty Authors from whose suffrage the obligation of standing by the betrothals must be called uncertain, and since it is a certain principle to be held by all that an obligation cannot be imposed by a Confessor where it is uncertain, it is manifest that in the present case the Confessor cannot obligate the man to matrimony.

But this is much more evident if the intrinsic reasons are weighed. For Amicus spoke most truly in the text cited, that IT IS A COMMON RULE: whenever some new cause emerges which, if it had been present from the beginning, would have prevented the betrothals from being contracted, it furnishes a just occasion for dissolving the betrothals.

Let Laymann be heard in place of all (book 5, treatise 10, part 1, chapter 2, no. 18): Betrothals are dissolved if a notable change occurs, or if some grave thing supervenes which, had it existed from the beginning, would deservedly have deterred one from the contract of betrothal, as Abbas, Angelus, Sylvester, Navarrus, etc., commonly teach, and as is gathered from chapter Quemadmodum, On Oaths. The reason is that the intention of the one promising is not presumed to have extended itself to such a very difficult case, which would have deterred any prudent man from a promise of matrimony. Moreover, to know whether the intention of the one promising, at least virtually, extended itself to such a case or not, the bridegroom must be examined, for example, whether, if at the time when he had promised the bride someone had proposed to him: But what if such a thing should afterward happen? he would have replied that it was not his mind to extend his obligation to this case. His assertion must be believed even in the external forum, especially if sworn, if, after the circumstances and the principal nature of the thing promised have been considered, probable credibility can be given to him, as Navarrus, Sanchez, etc., teach. What force, then, can the petty reasons of the opposite opinion now have against this principle received by all, which are ultimately reduced to these: 1. that the bride has not been rendered of a worse condition; 2. that the bridegroom was not deceived concerning the condition of the bride in giving consent?

11. Finally, I shall not omit that it is by no means certain concerning the opinion of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus whether in fact he fully adhered to that opinion which denies that the betrothals can be dissolved in the present case. Indeed, he calls this opinion the most common; in what sense this can be accepted may be gathered from the foregoing; nevertheless, he in fact interposes no judgment of his own.

Moreover, he himself also adopts the common rule which we have stated thus (Apostolic Man, treatise 18, chapter 1, no. 19): In order to judge what cause avails to dissolve betrothals, these two rules must be considered. The first is that, for causes supervening upon the betrothals, that one suffices which, if it had been foreseen, would certainly have prevented them from being contracted; hence the party immune from such a defect then remains free, who is presumed always to have contracted under the condition that there should not be such a change of things which, had it been foreseen, would have removed that party from contracting. The second rule is this, etc.

On the other hand, the Holy Doctor does not appear to have attributed very much to the reasons customarily brought forward for that opinion which he called the most common. He himself (l.c.) sets forth the question thus: It is asked whether, when a rich inheritance supervenes to either of the betrothed persons, that person can withdraw from the betrothals. Hurtado, Trullench, Leander, etc., affirm it, saying that then the condition of the betrothed persons is notably changed. But others most commonly... deny it, because that person is then not deceived concerning the condition of the other party, in which no change has occurred.

What he himself thinks concerning this argument is gathered without difficulty from the special question which he adds. For he writes (both l.c. and book 3, no. 876): According to this opinion Croix says that if someone contracted with one woman and afterward a marriage with another richer woman is offered to him, he cannot leave the first, because no change has then been made in her. But what does the Holy Doctor say to these things? Behold his judgment: If the quality of the second bride were exceedingly better, I would not dare altogether to condemn the bridegroom if he wished to contract with her. But (I say) this man was not deceived concerning the condition of the first bride, nor did any change occur in her; and this is the very argument which the Holy Doctor himself reports for the most common opinion, as he says. Therefore the Holy Doctor manifestly sets little value upon this argument.

And the things which the Holy Doctor soon adds thus confirm this: For although in this case the state of the bride, or of the betrothals, is not changed, nevertheless, as the Doctors commonly say, betrothals do not bind unless things remain in the same state; hence, just as the bridegroom would not be bound to fulfill them with great harm to himself, so it could appear to someone that he is not bound with the loss of great gain; for such a loss is equated with grave harm from the sole law, Code, On a Judgment Rendered for Him, etc., according to what was said in book 3, no. 301. In these words you may see that argument rejected for the same reason used by the Authors whom we have seen not acquiescing in that opinion.

But it is also plainly worthy of notice that by this judgment the Holy Doctor shows not only that the reason upon which the opinion of Sanchez rests appeared plainly weak to him, but he also overthrows another argument by which others endeavored to confirm the same opinion. There were some, namely, who, in order to prove that someone cannot withdraw from betrothals even if a notable change of status has supervened for him, draw an argument from the fact that someone cannot do so in the hypothesis of a far richer marriage offered to him. And indeed Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 192), against those asserting that betrothals can be dissolved if unexpected riches, nobility, dignity, etc., should supervene to one party, urges this reason also: because otherwise, whenever richer betrothals were offered, less rich betrothals could be dissolved, which must not be said. Likewise Catalani (part 3, question 10, chapter 7, no. 14): Otherwise, when richer betrothals were obtained, a broad faculty of withdrawing from less rich ones already celebrated would be given, which is absurd. And, to omit others, Reiffenstuel also (Canon Law, book 4, title 1, no. 262) reasons in the same manner thus: Nor is a suddenly supervening fortune an obstacle; both because otherwise someone could also dissolve betrothals because another far more beautiful or richer woman wished to marry him, which is against the most common opinion of the Doctors. Therefore St. Alphonsus, when he says concerning this hypothesis, I would not dare to condemn the bridegroom, etc., already destroys this argument of theirs also. Moreover, since an argument of this kind appears to be drawn a fortiori rather than from parity, because he who does not yet have a better state and seeks it by breaking the betrothals appears altogether to have less cause for withdrawing from the prior betrothals than one who, through an unexpected fortune acquired, has already attained a far better state and therefore seeks, as by a certain right of his own, betrothals more fitting to himself and his new state, it is now sufficiently evident that the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, who does not dare to condemn a bridegroom because he withdraws from the betrothals if marriage with a richer woman is offered to him, a fortiori does not condemn him who, since he has already changed his state, seeks another matrimony fitting for himself.

And indeed the Holy Doctor (book 6, no. 876) concludes: And thus I find in the Life of St. John of Capistrano that several Theologians thought in a case of this kind (namely, of a richer marriage offered), although St. John himself was of the contrary opinion, from which I truly would not dare to depart nor ever to counsel departure. But here the matter concerns mere counsel; and the Holy Doctor omits these words in his other work (Apostolic Man, l.c.) and merely writes: And thus I find that many Theologians said in the Life of St. John of Capistrano. And let these things suffice concerning this special question; from them the VV. could also gather why Father Gury wrote: St. Alphonsus appears sufficiently to approve this opinion, namely, that betrothals can be dissolved if an unexpected inheritance comes to the bridegroom.

QUESTION 2. Are betrothals dissolved by a vow of chastity or a vow of receiving sacred Orders?

Reply 1. If the vow precedes the betrothals, it is certain that they are invalid. The reason is that the promise of matrimony concerns an illicit thing and therefore does not bind. - Thus commonly.

Reply 2. If the vow follows the betrothals, the betrothals are likewise more probably dissolved. The reason is that the promise of betrothal is always considered to have been made under the tacit condition, unless a better state is chosen. - St. Ligorius, no. 873 [4].

[4] A judge is accustomed to compel one who withdraws from betrothals because of a vow of chastity made either to keep faith with the betrothal or to enter some Religion. For since the internal will of the one vowing is not known to the judge, while the obligation of the betrothal is otherwise certainly known, he does not unjustly require this sign of a more perfect choice, all the more because it can deservedly appear necessary for preventing the frauds of those who, in order to exempt themselves from an inconvenient obligation of betrothal, could easily feign these vows.

732. ○ QUESTION 3. Is the dissent of parents a sufficient cause for withdrawing from betrothals [5]?

[5] Take care not to confuse this question, with some persons (see the Salmanticenses, On Matrimony, chapter 6, no. 19 and following, and St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 849), with the other question whether children who contract without the knowledge of their parents sin. For although children may thus offend their parents more or less gravely according to varying circumstances and according to the varying manner of conducting the matter, nevertheless this of itself does not necessarily infer that the contract is also of such a kind in its substance that the parents can rightly oppose it, and consequently that the promise is invalid. And indeed, in general it must be determined with the common opinion that for the validity of betrothals not only the consent, but not even the knowledge, of the parents is necessary per se.

Reply. No, if the parents dissent unjustly, because the right of the children would be injured [6]. But it is otherwise if the dissent of the parents is just, for example, if the other party is not fitting for the family by reason of condition, honor, etc. - St. Ligorius, no. 877.

[6] Sometimes, however, even the unjust dissent of the parents can furnish a sufficient cause for withdrawing from the betrothals, not because the child then sins by not obeying the unjust will of the parents, but because this dissent for many causes can carry with it such grave consequences, inconveniences, and troubles that they deservedly excuse from fulfilling the obligation.

QUESTION 4. Is a party laboring under a hidden defect bound to disclose it before the betrothals, or, after they have been contracted, before matrimony?

Reply 1. Yes, if that defect would be pernicious or injurious to the other party; for example, if the girl is pregnant, if the bridegroom labors under venereal disease, or is burdened by debt, etc. The reason is that, just as one sins against justice who sells harmful goods to one who believes that he is buying good goods, so a fortiori does one who wishes to contract matrimony with a pernicious defect. Therefore, if he is unwilling to disclose the defect, he must abstain from contracting. - St. Ligorius, no. 864.

Reply 2. No, however, if the defect does not render the nuptials harmful but only less desirable; for example, if a girl who is believed to be a virgin has been corrupted. The reason is that it has been received by custom that no one is bound to manifest defects of this kind to the other party. Furthermore, no one is bound to manifest his own defect with his own infamy when the defect does not injure a grave right of the other. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others commonly.

733. ○ QUESTION 5. Are betrothals dissolved by a subsequent matrimony, so that when the matrimony has been dissolved they do not revive?

Reply. No, with the more common opinion. - St. Ligorius, no. 875. The reason is that it is proved by no law that betrothals are altogether dissolved by a subsequent matrimony; hence only the obligation of the betrothals appears to be suspended during such matrimony, as happens in one who contracts matrimony with a vow of chastity. Several nevertheless contradict this, relying upon reasons not to be despised [7]. Moreover, in practice the bridegroom unjustly deserted will rarely seek such an unfaithful person, nor could a happy outcome of a matrimony of this kind be expected.

[7] In this question both Theologians and Canonists, even of great name, both older and more recent, disagree; and each party, as is easily understood, holds its own opinion and calls it more probable, while many also concede that the opposite is probable. See Sanchez (book 1, disputation 48, no. 2) and the Salmanticenses (On Matrimony, chapter 2, no. 38). Therefore, the Confessor can neither compel the widower to fulfill that former promise nor prevent the other party from pursuing and urging his or her right before a judge, whose judgment each will be bound to accept.

As regards the force of the reasons, it is easily evident that the example of one contracting with a vow of chastity is not to the point; and, on the contrary, there can be urged the example of one vowing religion or chastity, whom the Doctors so release from the obligation of preceding betrothals that they deny it revives even if the one who vowed afterward obtains a dispensation from the vow, as may be seen in St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 873, at the end). This resolution is altogether consonant with the general principle which Cujacius, with others, derives from law Si stipulantem 83, section 5, Digest, On Verbal Obligations (commentary on this law), namely, that when a thing previously subject to servitude or obligation passes into another state which does not have an excuse from accidental impossibility but by its own nature is repugnant to that obligation or servitude, the latter is not suspended but altogether extinguished. It must be denied (says Cujacius) that the obligation (for example, a usufruct) is extinguished when a ship is taken apart with the intention that it be repaired; it ceases rather than is extinguished, because the same ship can be restored with the same timbers and does not appear to have altogether perished.... If, however, the ship is taken apart with the intention that it be converted to other uses, it appears to have been extinguished; and therefore, even if it is afterward put together from the same timbers, it appears to be another ship, and an obligation once extinguished is not restored.... The obligation from a promise is extinguished in perpetuity when a slave has been manumitted, because he is manumitted with the intention that he be free perpetually.... This is the sum: the obligation is extinguished when the thing is consecrated or made public, or the slave manumitted, or the ship taken apart, provided it was taken apart with the intention that it be converted to other uses. Moreover, the reasoning of matrimony is altogether the same; for the contract is indissoluble by its nature, and through it a spouse hands himself or herself over in perpetuity to the power of the other. Therefore, just as a slave who has obtained liberty is not subjected to an obligation which bound him in servitude (because, for example, he had been promised by his master to someone), even if he falls back into servitude, nor is a ship bound by its former obligation, for example, of usufruct, if it was destroyed with the intention that it not be repaired, even if afterward it happens to be restored per accidens; so too must it be determined concerning the accidental liberty which a spouse acquires through the death of the other spouse.

 The VV. object to two things here (p. 946, note 3). First, against the former part of the Note they write: From the diversity of opinions Father Ballerini infers that there is no obligation by which a widower must return to the prior betrothals. But from the rules of probabilism the contrary conclusion should rather be drawn. For here an obligation was certainly contracted which was only doubtfully extinguished. Therefore it always urges.

Reply. I deny the Minor and the proof added to it. The reason is that, as St. Alphonsus says (book 3, no. 112), here we are not dealing with a doubt but with a probable opinion. Cardinal De Lugo writes aptly concerning that maxim, IN DOUBT THE CONDITION OF THE POSSESSOR IS BETTER (On Justice and Right, disputation 23, no. 110): The Doctors rightly observe that this proceeds when there is a merely negative doubt; for if there were a positive doubt and probable reasons for each side, then the rules which are commonly given concerning a probable conscience would have to be observed, and regularly the debtor can embrace the probable judgment. St. Alphonsus on the same matter (l.c.): When it is probable that... the law has been abrogated, then the presumption in favor of the law ceases and liberty possesses. Therefore, the Consequent also is denied, namely, that the obligation still urges in the present case; for an uncertain obligation, which it is probable does not exist, cannot urge.

The VV. then attack the argument which in the Note is drawn both from the example of vows, either of religion or of chastity, by which betrothals are dissolved in perpetuity, and from the nature of matrimony, which is a contract indissoluble by its nature and through which a spouse hands himself or herself over in perpetuity to the power of the other; and they rejoin: These things do not pertain to the matter. For matrimony is not a bond of itself perpetual, as is a vow of religion or of perpetual chastity, but it is essentially temporal according to that saying of the Apostle: A woman is bound to the law as long as her husband lives.

Reply. The force of the argument does not reside in this, that the bond of matrimony is so perpetual that it cannot cease per accidens, namely, by the death of the other spouse; but in this, that since through a contract indissoluble by its own nature a spouse hands himself or herself over, so far as concerns the spouse, perpetually to the power of the other, from which it is not in the spouse's power to exempt himself or herself, by that very fact the spouse passes into a state which is repugnant, not from accidental impossibility but by its nature, to that obligation and servitude to which the spouse was previously subject. But the Note concludes through the citation of the law, to which the VV. reply nothing, that then the obligation is not merely suspended but altogether extinguished.

For the law cited in the Note speaks thus: I stipulate uselessly for a sacred or religious thing, or a thing left IN PERPETUITY for public uses, such as a forum or basilica, or a free man, although a sacred thing can be made profane, and things left for public uses can revert to private uses, and from a free man a slave can be made. Behold, then, first, in what sense a certain thing is said to be obligated in perpetuity, namely, from the nature of its state, although per accidens it can pass into another state. But from the fact that someone stipulates for it uselessly, this consequence is there deduced: For even when someone has promised to give a profane thing or Stichus, HE IS FREED if, without his act, the thing begins to be sacred or Stichus attains liberty. What force the word is freed has is manifest from the things which follow: Nor are they recalled into obligation if by some law the sacred thing again begins to be profane and Stichus, from being free, is made a slave. But why are they not recalled into obligation unless because the obligation contracted by the former promise had not merely been suspended but altogether extinguished? But why had it been extinguished unless because the thing had passed into that state to which the former servitude or obligation is repugnant, not from accidental impossibility but from its nature? And again, why is this state by its nature repugnant to servitude or an obligation of this kind, unless because, as is premised there, I stipulate uselessly for a thing existing in that state? Cujacius (l.c. in the Note) therefore rightly refers to this that rule: Those things which stood at the beginning are afterward extinguished if they fall into that case from which they could not have begun.

And indeed, the same law most clearly excludes from this the hypothesis of accidental impossibility, because of which an obligation remains suspended but is not extinguished and consequently revives and urges when the ability returns; it rejects this as absurd, namely, as though one and the same cause both freed and obligated, namely, that a thing either cannot be given or can be given.

And from these things a reason is aptly given why a vow either of chastity or of Religion, made after betrothals, so extinguishes the obligation of those betrothals that, although the obligation of the vow afterward ceases through dispensation, the obligation of those betrothals nevertheless does not revive. The reason is that through a vow of this kind the one vowing transfers himself into a state which by its own nature is repugnant to the obligation and servitude of the betrothals. And again, a reason is given why matrimony contracted after a vow of chastity has been made suspends the obligation of that same vow but does not altogether extinguish it. The reason is that the state of matrimony is not so repugnant to the obligation of preserving chastity that it altogether destroys it, although it impedes it to some extent.

From the things said thus far it is also gathered what must be replied to the following words of St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 875, at the end), which the VV. object: Only the condition of the subsequent bond must be considered (says the Holy Doctor): if it is perpetual, the first obligation is certainly extinguished; but if it is temporal, the first obligation is suspended until it can be fulfilled when the bond ceases, just as if someone sold a horse to one person and afterward sold and delivered it to another, in the event that the horse returned into his ownership, he would certainly be bound to deliver it to the first buyer, as is gathered from law 15, Code, On Vindication of a Thing. We shall add this one thing here: from the cited law of the Code it is indeed gathered that the horse remains the property of him who through delivery possesses the horse; but it is by no means gathered that the horse must be delivered to the first buyer if it falls back into the ownership of the seller, for not even a word concerning this is found in that text. Behold the words of the cited law (Code, book 3, title 32, law 15): Whenever an estate is lawfully sold in its entirety to two persons, it is manifest law that he to whom it was first delivered is stronger in retaining ownership. Therefore, if you prove before the Governor of the Province that at an earlier time you bought the possession and paid the price, he will not permit you to be expelled from the possession on the pretext that the instruments were not given. It will indeed be within your choice to recover the price which you gave, with interest, yet so that account be taken of fruits received and expenses; since even if each of you claims ownership of the thing by reason of donation, it is fitting that he to whom sole possession was first delivered be held the stronger.

QUESTION 6. Can the bridegroom withdraw if the bride was forcibly violated after the betrothals?

Reply. Yes, with the common opinion. The reason is that the bride, through such oppression, although without her fault, is rendered notably less worthy; hence the condition of things is notably changed [8]. - St. Ligorius, no. 861, etc. - The same must be said even if she was deflowered by force before the betrothals and only afterward was that defect discovered. - Thus commonly. - See Cases, no. 859.

[8] A fortiori, this must be said concerning the fornication of the bride, whether it preceded the betrothals or followed them; in the latter case the bride sins doubly, namely, by the added injustice by which she so corrupts a thing promised to another that she unjustly compels the bridegroom either to omit the matrimony promised to him or to receive a notably corrupted thing. But, from the common opinion, it must be determined otherwise concerning the fornication of the bridegroom. For although this, if it follows the betrothals, furnishes a just cause for the bride to withdraw, it does not do so if it preceded them. The reason is that through this the bridegroom is not rendered notably less worthy in the common estimation, nor is the bride affected by any grave stain because she marries him. Except, with the Doctors (see St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 861): 1. if the fornication was frequent, so that the bride deservedly doubts the inclination of the bridegroom toward other women and his future inconstancy in preserving the fidelity of the marriage bed; 2. if the bridegroom has begotten offspring from the preceding fornication, for this also is deservedly accustomed to be both a disgrace and a grief to the bride; 3. some also except the case in which the bride, who is a virgin of great honor, would never have consented if she had known the bridegroom to be a fornicator. In this case the Confessor appears unable to obligate her, if she refuses, to the nuptials. See Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 176).

Chapter II. On the Proclamation of Banns

Bannum is a German word which signifies the same thing as a public proclamation. Banns, therefore, are public notifications by which the faithful are admonished concerning matrimony to be contracted between certain persons.

We must treat: first, of the necessity of banns; second, of their circumstances; third, of dispensation from them; fourth, of the revelation of impediments.

Article I. On the Necessity of Banns

734. Principles. - I. From the precept of the Church there is a grave obligation of proclaiming the banns. The existence of the precept is established: first, from the Fourth Lateran Council, and from the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 1. The existence of a grave obligation is established, secondly, because a general discipline prescribed by two General Councils and resting upon grave motives produces a grave obligation [1].

[1] The gravity of the precept is also argued from the gravity of the penalties. For the Tridentine Synod (session 24, chapter 5, On the Reformation of Matrimony) decrees that, if an impediment is afterward discovered, the spouses are to be separated with every hope of obtaining a dispensation removed; whence you conclude that those who by privilege can grant dispensations, for example, by a rescript of the Sacred Penitentiary, cannot dispense with these persons. Furthermore (chapter Cum inhibitio 3, section 1, On Clandestine Betrothals), if any offspring has been conceived, it is held illegitimate, even if the spouses were so ignorant of the impediment that they could be considered in good faith. See Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 3, nos. 73-74).

II. The proclamation of the banns is not required by necessity of the Sacrament. The reason is that neither the Council of Trent nor the Lateran Council, which had previously prescribed the same thing, adds any invalidating clause. Nor can any other law be cited from which it is established that the proclamation is required for the validity of matrimony.

735. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Are all who are to contract subject to the law of proclamation?

Reply. Yes, because the law is altogether general. Nevertheless, Princes are excepted by usage because their family is sufficiently known and their marriages are ordinarily sufficiently public. Except also a case of necessity; for example, if one near death wished to marry his concubine in order to legitimate offspring and there were danger in delay. - See Ferraris, Library, under the entry Denunciations of Matrimony.

QUESTION 2. Does a Pastor sin gravely by omitting the denunciation if he knows that no impediment is present?

Reply. Yes. The reason is: first, because the Pastor can with difficulty be altogether certain that no impediment to matrimony is present; second, because even if no impediment appears before the proclamation of the banns, it can happen that some impediment supervenes after they have been proclaimed. - St. Ligorius, no. 990 [2].

[2] Apply the principle that a law obliges even if its reason ceases in a particular case, especially since a most grave danger would be imminent if this matter were left to the judgment of Pastors, as is evident from the things said in the preceding note. Therefore, when the matter is urgent and, after diligent inquiry, it is established that no impediment is present, a dispensation must be sought; the denunciation must not be omitted at the discretion of the Pastor.

QUESTION 3. Does a Pastor sin gravely if, without a dispensation, he omits only one proclamation?

Reply. It is disputed. Some affirm it because one proclamation out of three must be regarded as a grave part of the whole precept. Others, however, deny it; St. Ligorius, no. 991, calls their opinion probable. It is more probable, however, that the omission of two denunciations is a mortal sin. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - See Cases, no. 873.

Article II. On the Circumstances of the Banns

A threefold circumstance is to be considered here, namely: first, of time; second, of place; third, of persons.

I. Circumstance of Time

736. ○ The proclamations must be made on consecutive feast days of precept during the solemnities of Mass. - Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 1, On Reformation.

It is said: first, on feast days, that is, on feast days of precept [1], at least in the place of the proclamations; second, consecutive, that is, with no feast day omitted from the first proclamation to the last [2]. Whether the proclamations can be made on feast days immediately succeeding one another, if these occur, is disputed; there are two probable opinions [3]. Third, during the solemnities of Mass, that is, in the parochial or conventual Mass, from a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council. - St. Ligorius, no. 991 [4]. The proclamations cannot be made at private Masses or at Vespers. - Roman Ritual.

[1] Several teach with Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 24) and St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 992) that the denunciation can be made even on a weekday if, for some cause, a great concourse of people comes to the church, because in this way also the end of the Council is sufficiently attained.

[2] St. Alphonsus (no. 992) considers it probable, and several others hold (in Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 1, no. 23), that there is no grave sin if the feast days are not consecutive, one or another intervening, especially if feast days other than Sunday are in question. The reason is that there is slight danger that the people will forget, and the transgression is considered light matter.

[3] In order that the affirmative opinion be probable, it appears necessary that every suspicion of an impediment truly be absent, because in so brief an interval neither can a report easily be spread sufficiently nor can doubts be dispelled.

[4] The Doctors probably add, as St. Alphonsus says (no. 991), that the proclamations can be made at a sermon or on the occasion of a procession when the people are assembled.

If, however, the Pastor has forgotten to make the final proclamation at Mass, and the nuptials are urgent, he can supply it at Vespers. This is permitted by a Decision of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, October 25, 1586. - Ferraris.

If, after the proclamations have been made, the matrimony is not celebrated within two months, the proclamations must more probably be repeated, unless it seems otherwise to the Bishop [5].

[5] From the Council of Ravenna it was approved and decreed in the Congregation that if any persons do not contract within four months after the denunciations have been completed, they cannot contract unless the denunciations have again been completed. Gallemart (note 3 on chapter 1, On the Reformation of Matrimony, session 24, Council of Trent). The same Declaration is reported by Rebellus (at the end of book 4, part 2, section 8, no. 8) and Busembaum (book 6, treatise 6, chapter 3, doubt 1, resolution 1). But what the Author says concerning the elapse of two months agrees with the Roman Ritual.

Although the form of the Tridentine precept does not appear to be violated if matrimony is contracted on the same day immediately after the final proclamation, nevertheless, if there should perhaps be insufficient time for reporting impediments, the law appears to be evaded. Hence Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 480) records that the Council of Cologne requires an interval of at least one day, so that, namely, if some impediment is present, it can be reported before the matrimony.

II. Circumstance of Place

737. ○ From the Council of Trent, the proclamations of the banns must be made in a church, that is, in the parochial church of the contracting parties; but not in chapels, whether public or private [6], unless they hold the place of a parish and the parochial Mass is celebrated there. By parish, however, there is not to be understood the parish in which someone was born, or the parish of origin, but the parish of actual domicile, if the one to be proclaimed has remained there for a notable time.

[6] Denunciations in chapels would not attain, as is evident, the end of the Council. Moreover, if the Pastor makes the denunciations in another church of the same parish in which perhaps solemnities are celebrated, the law of the Council appears to have been sufficiently fulfilled. Indeed, several Doctors in St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 991) say that they can be made outside the church in a place of great concourse because thus the end of the Council is attained.

Hence: first, if the betrothed persons live in different parishes, the proclamation must be made in each. Second, if one or both have a roughly equal domicile in two places, the banns must also be proclaimed in each. But if one of the two domiciles is the principal or properly so called, a double proclamation is not thereby required. If someone, however, besides a domicile has a quasi-domicile elsewhere, the proclamations must also be made in the quasi-domicile. Third, if the contracting parties have recently fixed their domicile in the present parish, the banns must also be published in the parish where they previously lived; six months, however, is a sufficient time, says St. Ligorius, no. 991 [7].

[7] St. Alphonsus by no means determines a period of six months in the cited place, but writes thus: A doubt arises concerning where the denunciations must be made if one of the betrothed persons stays for a short time in some place. Pontius thinks it sufficient if they are made in the place where that person actually resides. But Sanchez, etc., far more probably say from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation that they must altogether be made in the parish from which the person departed; because the denunciations are therefore made that impediments may be manifested, and consequently they must be made where the betrothed persons have remained for a longer time.

Moreover, Father Gury perhaps indicates a period of six months as a sufficient cause why the denunciations must also be made in the present parish. For otherwise, as Schmalzgrueber has it (book 4, title 3, no. 14), it is not necessary that they be made in the place where the matrimony is contracted if, for example, after the denunciations have been made in the city, with permission for a just cause they wish to celebrate in the country, or migrate to another place. For, in general, the Tridentine Decree is satisfied if marriages are announced where those who are to contract matrimony are parishioners at the time of the denunciations.

But what Gury adds after St. Alphonsus, that the banns must also be published in the parish where they previously lived, must be understood unless they departed from there a long time previously, for example, ten, eight, or even five years, as is sufficiently gathered from Declarations of the Sacred Congregation. See Thesaurus of Resolutions of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, volume 6, pp. 272, 274. For in this case it would have been sufficient to seek testimony concerning free status.

III. Circumstance of Persons, Namely, Minors, Soldiers, Wanderers, and Servants

738. ○ 1. Minors. The banns of minors must not be proclaimed except with the express consent of their parents or tutors [8]. The proclamation must be made both in the domicile of fact and in the domicile of law, that is, both in the place where the minors live here and now and in the place where their parents or tutors reside. Males are held to be minors until the age of twenty-five years, and females until the twenty-first year. A male deprived of ascendants, however, becomes a major as soon as he has completed his twenty-first year.

[8] No ecclesiastical law requires this consent of parents or tutors as regards minors, but the Author admonishes these things according to the prescriptions of the civil laws in France.

2. Soldiers. The banns of soldiers must be proclaimed: first, in the place where they are in garrison; second, in addition, in the domicile of their parents if they are minors [9]; but if they are majors, in the place where they resided before entering military service, because they have not acquired another domicile of law. - Thus commonly.

[9] See the preceding note.

3. Wanderers and foreigners. According to the common opinion, their banns must be published in their domicile of fact and in their place of origin if they have not obtained a true domicile elsewhere, or at least in the place in which they remained for a longer time. Furthermore, an authentic testimony concerning their free status must be obtained, and they must not be joined in matrimony without the permission of the Ordinary, as the Council of Trent has it, session 24, chapter 7, On the Reformation of Matrimony.

Article III. On Dispensation from the Banns

739. Principles. - I. For a just cause, dispensation can be made from the law of the banns. - Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 1, On the Reformation of Matrimony. Dispensation is more easily made from one or another proclamation than from all.

II. Dispensation from the banns pertains to the Ordinary, or to the Bishop. This is likewise derived from the Council of Trent (l.c.), where the faculty of dispensing is said to be left to the prudence and judgment of the Ordinary.

III. The legitimate causes [1] of dispensation are: first, lest a matrimony be maliciously impeded; second, grave harm, infamy, or scandal imminent from the delay of matrimony; third, fear lest the man abandon the girl whom he has violated; fourth, if, after matrimony has already been contracted civilly, the bridegroom is unwilling to consent to the three proclamations; and other similar causes. - St. Ligorius, no. 1005.

[1] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 1006) rightly distinguishes causes because of which a dispensation not only can but also must be given, and causes because of which dispensation can be made although the Superior is not bound to dispense. To the first class of causes are referred the heads enumerated by the Author; to these add the case in which an impediment is discovered after the matrimony has already been celebrated and therefore the matrimony itself must be convalidated through a renewal of consent. Some add the case in which the betrothed persons would be exposed through the denunciations to the shame and mockery of men; this generally occurs when they are very old, or when an old man is to be joined with a young woman, or a noble with a commoner, etc.; for a certain irreverence is done to the Sacrament when the contracting parties are mocked. See Sanchez (book 3, disputation 9) and Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 3, from no. 33). But dispensation can be made from mere favor when the marriages of princes or magnates are treated, and generally when, with no suspicion of an impediment, all the inconveniences for avoiding which the denunciations are made are absent. See Schmalzgrueber (l.c., no. 35), who observes (ibid., no. 40) that extrajudicial knowledge suffices for dispensing, with the order of law omitted; the reason is that the Synod leaves the whole matter to the judgment and conscience of the Ordinary.

740. Questions. - QUESTION 1. When the betrothed persons are from different dioceses, must a dispensation be obtained from each Bishop?

Reply. Yes, as it appears. The reason is that there is no connection between the dispensation of the one and the dispensation of the other. Moreover, only the Ordinary of the place can know the cause of dispensation; for there can be reasons for dispensing for one party without their being present for the other, and if impediments are not detected on one side, it does not follow that they cannot be detected on the other.

QUESTION 2. Is a dispensation from the banns required for joining concubinarians already civilly united if one of them is at the point of death?

Reply. No, if there is a grave cause for joining them, for example, for the sake of legitimating offspring or for greater security of conscience, because that case appears altogether to be excepted from the law. - Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 3, no. 74.

QUESTION 3. Can the Vicar General dispense from the proclamations of the banns?

Reply. More probably, yes, provided the Bishop has not reserved this to himself or does not contradict it. The reason is that the Synod grants this faculty to the Ordinary; and under the name of the Ordinary, if the matter belongs to his office and he is not expressly excluded, there also comes the Vicar General, since he constitutes one tribunal with the Bishop [2]. - St. Ligorius, no. 1007.

[2] The contrary Declaration of the Sacred Congregation which is customarily brought forward is regarded as suspect by most, since, although sought, it could never be found; and granting that it existed, the Vicar could still do this by force of custom, which the Synod of Trent did not revoke, for declarations of the Congregation do not abolish custom.

Further, take care to observe three things here:

1. Both the Bishop and the Vicar General can subdelegate to others the faculty of dispensing from the denunciations. See St. Alphonsus (On Privileges, no. 58), Sanchez (book 3, disputation 7, no. 21), and Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 3, nos. 30-32).

2. If at any time, because of some urgent necessity, the celebration of matrimony precedes the denunciations to be made afterward, the matrimony, as the Synod of Trent observes (session 24, chapter 1, On the Reformation of Matrimony), must not be consummated before the denunciations have been made. Although Sanchez (book 3, disputation 11, no. 3) holds this precept to be grave, nevertheless, according to others with Diana (volume 2, treatise 6, resolution 63, no. 3), it binds lightly if there is no suspicion of an impediment; in this case the Holy Synod itself (l.c.) adds that the denunciations can be remitted by the Ordinary.

3. What several dispute on each side (see St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1007, doubt 2), namely, whether even the Pastor can dispense from the denunciations (which, if the words are accepted in their proper sense, must be denied, because the Pastor does not have jurisdiction in the external forum), is easily reconciled if the question is more properly made whether a Pastor can sometimes assist at a matrimony, the denunciations having been omitted, without a dispensation obtained from the Ordinary. It must be denied both when the matrimony can be deferred while the Bishop or his Vicar is approached, and when the dispensation is not owed but is granted from mere favor; in these cases neither is it permitted to use epikeia, which has place only in necessity. Sanchez (book 3, disputation 10, no. 30); Reiffenstuel (book 4, title 3, no.

40); Schmalzgrueber (ibid., no. 45). But it must be affirmed when there is danger in delay and the Ordinary cannot be approached. St. Alphonsus (l.c.); Sanchez (l.c., no. 27); Schmalzgrueber (l.c., no. 42). Or even when, with that danger pressing, the Ordinary unjustly denies a dispensation which he is bound to grant and the Superior of the Ordinary himself cannot be approached. St. Alphonsus (l.c.); Sanchez (l.c., no. 29). Although Reiffenstuel (book 4, title 3, no. 46) rightly observes that this is scarcely to be advised, because not the Pastor but the Ordinary is the judge in the external forum, and it is committed to the judgment of the Ordinary, not of the Pastor, whether the alleged cause is of such a kind that dispensation is owed. Hence, as Schmalzgrueber warns (book 4, title 3, no. 44), the Pastor can be punished even though perhaps he did not sin in the internal forum.

Article IV. On the Revelation of Impediments

741. Principles. - I. There is per se a grave obligation to reveal impediments to matrimony, however occult. The reason is derived from the motive of Religion and charity, and also from the precept of the banns itself.

II. The obligation generally pertains to all the faithful of whatever sex, age, parish, or diocese, etc., and also to blood relatives and friends. The reason is that this law is enacted in the name of the Church, to which all Christians are subject, and rests upon the natural precept of Religion and charity, which pertains to all. Indeed, although after the matrimony has been celebrated the positive law of denunciation ceases, nevertheless the law of charity can, according to the circumstances, require the aforesaid revelation. - Scavini.

III. That obligation must be fulfilled as soon as morally possible, because if the betrothed persons should perhaps obtain a dispensation from one or another proclamation and contract sooner, time will not remain for making the revelation, etc.

742. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must impediments learned even under an entrusted secret be revealed?

Reply. Yes, even if an oath not to reveal them was added. The reason is that a natural secret, even one entrusted and sworn, does not bind when grave harm threatens the community or a third person. - St. Ligorius, no. 994.

Except, more probably, a secret of counsel, or a secret entrusted for the sake of seeking counsel to a man exercising a public office, for example, a physician, advocate, Pastor, etc., provided this is done by reason of their profession. For the common good thus appears to require it. - Collet, chapter 5. - Bouvier, chapter 3, article 4. - Carriere, no. 409, and others against others. But those who know an impediment under a secret of this kind must at least warn the betrothed persons to desist from matrimony.

QUESTION 2. Are you bound to reveal an impediment with grave inconvenience or detriment to yourself?

Reply. No, speaking generally, because the law of the Church and charity do not bind with so great an inconvenience [1]. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 995.

[1] The Doctors commonly excuse also in these other cases, namely: 1. when someone has merely heard of the impediment but does not know from whom; 2. if he prudently believes that he will accomplish nothing by revealing it, or even much more if he judges that the revelation will harm those contracting in good faith; 3. if he probably thinks that the revelation will produce grave scandal among others; 4. if he knows that the contracting parties have obtained an occult dispensation for the forum of conscience. St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 994) excepts the case in which the report of the impediment is public; but in a notorious matter there can scarcely be need of a denunciation unless perhaps someone thinks that proofs of the impediment are known to him alone.

743. ◦ QUESTION 3. Are you bound to reveal an impediment if you alone know it and cannot prove it?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that in the present matter the testimony of one can suffice. - Thus the most common and truer opinion, says St. Ligorius, no. 995.

QUESTION 4. Are the contracting parties themselves bound to reveal the impediment?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that here there is no question of inflicting a penalty, but of avoiding sin; therefore they must either abstain from matrimony or disclose the impediments. - See Cases, no. 848.

Chapter III. On the Nature and Properties of Matrimony

Article I. On the Nature of Matrimony

744. Definition. - Matrimony can be considered in two ways, namely, as a contract and as a Sacrament.

1. Matrimony as a contract is an agreement by which a man and a woman legitimately hand over to each other dominion over their bodies in relation to acts of themselves apt for the generation of offspring, and they obligate themselves to an undivided partnership of life.

2. Matrimony as a Sacrament is defined as a Sacrament of the New Law conferring grace for sanctifying the legitimate union of a man and a woman and for piously receiving and holily educating offspring.

745. Division. - Matrimony can be considered both as regards the union of man and woman and as regards the bond which arises from it; hence it is called:

1. In fieri or in facto esse. Matrimony in fieri is called the actual contract itself which is perfected by the mutual consent of the man and woman. Matrimony in facto esse is called the marriage persevering in the bond which proceeds from the matrimonial contract.

2. Legitimate, ratified, and consummated. A legitimate matrimony is said to be that which is contracted according to the norm of natural and civil law but does not have the ratification of the Church or the nature of a Sacrament, such as was formerly entered under the law of nature and the Mosaic law and is now also entered among Jews and gentiles. A ratified matrimony is one contracted between Christians bound by no impediment, between whom, however, conjugal intercourse has not yet occurred after the contract. It is called ratified because not only nature and civil law but also the Church approves and ratifies it. A consummated matrimony is said to be that which has been completed by the intercourse of the spouses; this must be understood not only of a ratified but also of a merely legitimate matrimony [1].

[1] This distinction of matrimony into legitimate, ratified, and consummated must be carefully retained as being of the greatest importance, as will appear below.

Meanwhile, observe that two things are required in order that a matrimony can be called consummated: 1. that the carnal union be perfect and sufficient for generation, so that (as is contained in chapter Verum 2, On the Conversion of Married Persons) the spouses have together been made one flesh. Therefore, that union would not suffice by which, although the integrity of bodily virginity had been taken from the woman, nevertheless generation could not follow because a suitable emission of male seed was lacking; 2. that a legitimate consent or ratified matrimony preceded a union of this kind. Therefore, intercourse had before the matrimonial contract does not cause the matrimony afterward contracted to be considered consummated, and consequently will produce neither indissolubility nor the other effects of a consummated matrimony. Whence you conclude that one who, bound by a vow of religion, has violated a woman can marry her and afterward (unless another cause prevents it) enter the religion vowed, if after he married her he did not know her again. - See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 1, nos. 227-228.

Of no small importance for the use of Theologians is another distinction of matrimony into true, presumed, and putative.

That is called true which was in fact and validly contracted and is proved as such by any of those arguments by which other matters are customarily proved, such as the testimony of the Pastor or others, the register of marriages, the confession of the spouses, the prolonged cohabitation of an honorable woman, etc. Concerning these, see Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, no. 233), with whom observe that lighter proofs suffice when there is question of sustaining a matrimony than when the matter concerns dissolving it.

That is called presumed which is presumed by law; this legal presumption has place especially in three cases. First, when, in places where the Tridentine decree concerning the form of matrimony does not have force, after betrothals entered absolutely between two capable persons, carnal intercourse followed between them; for then consent concerning the future is presumed to have passed into consent concerning the present, and the intercourse is presumed to have been admitted with a conjugal affection. Concerning this most grave question, see Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, from no. 115), Pirhing (same title, no. 27), and especially Barbosa (on chapter Is qui, same title, no. 3 and following). Second, when, after betrothals entered under a condition and before the occurrence of the condition, carnal intercourse intervened between the betrothed persons; for the Church (we speak while abstracting from the aforesaid Tridentine Decree concerning form, etc.) then presumes that the betrothed persons withdrew from the condition and therefore wished to contract matrimony purely and absolutely. This is evident from chapter Per tuas 6, On Conditions Apposed. Third, when, after a betrothal concerning the present invalidly contracted by minors before puberty (in whom malice does not supply for age), signs of ratified consent intervene between the same persons when they have attained puberty; signs of this kind are not only carnal intercourse but also kisses, embraces, cohabitation, etc. This is evident from the sole chapter, section Idem quoque, On the Betrothal of Minors, in the Sixth Book. This case, however, also can have place only where the aforesaid Tridentine Decree does not have force. - See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 1, no. 234.

Finally, a matrimony is called putative which is considered legitimately contracted although, in reality, it is null because of some latent impediment. The Doctors therefore inquire concerning it in order that it may be established when it has the force of legitimating offspring conceived therefrom and the other effects of law. Two things are required for this: first, that it was contracted in good faith by at least one of the spouses, who was ignorant of the impediment. Thus in chapter Ex tenore 14, title Who Are Legitimate Children. Neither an error of law nor a doubt concerning the validity of the matrimony excludes this good faith, as Covarruvias proves (On Betrothals, part 2, chapter 8, section 1, no. 9); but in doubt this good faith is presumed. Second, that the matrimony was contracted publicly and in the face of the Church, that is, before the Pastor and witnesses, with the denunciations having been premised or at least dispensed from. See the final chapter, On Clandestine Betrothals, section 1.

Another distinction of matrimony into canonical, political or civil, and of conscience must also be remembered.

They call that canonical in which all things concur which are prescribed for matrimony by the sacred Canons.

They call that political or civil in which those things also concur which are required by civil law, namely, certain solemnities, dotal agreements, etc.; without these, a matrimony is indeed canonically valid but is regarded as illegitimate civilly and therefore lacks civil effects.

Finally, a matrimony of conscience, or morganatic matrimony, is called a legitimate union of a man with a woman of inferior condition entered with this agreement: that the wife and children born therefrom are content with the nuptial gift or another fixed portion appointed at the time of the betrothals and abstain from the other ancestral and paternal goods, together with titles, dignities, and insignia. Concerning this, Jurists must be consulted. - See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 1, from no. 236.

746. Principles. - I. Matrimony of Christians celebrated by the legitimate rite is a true and properly so-called Sacrament of the New Law. This is proved: first, from the Epistle of St. Paul to the Ephesians, chapter 5, verse 32, where he says: This is a great Sacrament, but I speak in Christ and in the Church. Second, from the Council of Trent, session 24, canon 1: If anyone shall say that matrimony is not truly and properly one of the seven Sacraments of the evangelical law instituted by Christ the Lord, but was invented by men in the Church, and that it does not confer grace, let him be anathema. From St. Augustine (On the Good of Marriage, chapter 18): In the nuptials of Christians, the sanctity of the Sacrament has more force than the fecundity of the womb.

II. True consent on the part of each contracting party is required for the validity of matrimony, because matrimony, as a contract, is an agreement between a man and a woman; but consent constitutes the essence of an agreement.

747. ◦ III. Consent, however, must be:

1. Mutual, for it consists in a contract which is essentially the consent of two persons, or mutual consent. Hence, if it is lacking on one side, the matrimony will be null.

2. Concerning the present, because by a promise concerning the future only betrothals, not matrimony, are made. This is also deduced from chapter Si inter 31, On Betrothals and Matrimony.

3. Deliberate and voluntary, because it is a contract concerning a grave matter and therefore induces a grave obligation; but no one is considered to impose a grave obligation upon himself unless he consents freely and fully. This is established from Canon law, which invalidates marriages contracted from grave fear, as will be said below concerning impediments.

4. Manifested by external signs, because every agreement among men must be made known by some external sign; for an agreement necessarily supposes mutual acceptance among the contracting parties.

748. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must consent be expressed in words?

Reply 1. No, as regards validity, because by natural law it suffices in a contract that consent be expressed by some certain sign. - St. Ligorius, no. 887.

Reply 2. Yes, as regards liceity, because otherwise the rubric and the custom of the Church would be acted against. Nevertheless, it does not appear to exceed a venial sin if words are not employed; indeed, modesty or another reasonable cause would excuse from all fault [2]. - St. Ligorius, no. 888.

[2] Certainly, if there is question of mute or deaf persons, it is manifest that signs other than words must be used.

749. ◦ QUESTION 2. Does consent through a procurator suffice?

Reply 1. As regards validity, yes, provided the required conditions are present, because matrimony has the whole nature of a natural contract. But any contract can be made through a procurator.

The conditions for contracting matrimony in that manner are: first, that the procurator execute the mandate personally; second, that the mandator has not revoked the mandate; third, that the procurator appear with the other party before the Pastor and two witnesses [3].

[3] Compare what we said above (note on no. 722) concerning betrothals contracted through a procurator.

Reply 2. As regards liceity, no, unless a very grave cause urges. The reason is that this manner of contracting is contrary to the ordinary practice of the Church, and marriages are scarcely made in this way among any others than Princes and Magnates. Hence the Pastor must not bless marriages of this kind by his own authority, as is established from the practice of the Church and the Rituals. - St. Ligorius, no. 888.

750. ◦ QUESTION 3. Is a matrimony entered UNDER A CONDITION valid?

Reply 1. It is certain that it is valid if the condition concerns the past or the present and is verified. The reason is that this conditioned consent immediately passes into absolute consent, and therefore nothing is lacking to the validity of the Sacrament [4]. - See St. Ligorius, no. 890.

[4] This has force even if the contracting parties are ignorant that the condition is fulfilled. The reason is that they bound their consent not to knowledge of the condition but to its existence; nevertheless, they cannot use the matrimony before receiving notice that the condition exists, since otherwise they would place themselves in danger of fornication. Concerning this, see the history narrated by Fagnanus (on the final chapter, On Conditions Apposed, no. 13) and Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 5, no. 40).

Reply 2. If an honorable and possible condition concerning the future is added, I say, first: the matrimony is not perfected until the condition is fulfilled, because the contract must transfer a mutual right over the bodies concerning the present, as was said above. I say, second: when the condition has been fulfilled, the matrimony is valid; for a conditioned contract, when the condition has been fulfilled, passes into an absolute contract and by that very fact is valid by reason of the Sacrament, because among Christians the contract of matrimony cannot be separated from the Sacrament [5].

[5] That a conditional matrimony immediately becomes perfect without new consent when the condition is fulfilled is the most received opinion of the Canonists. Thus Fagnanus (on chapter Super eo, On Conditions Apposed, no. 3), who adds that this opinion of the Canonists is observed in the Curia even after the Council of Trent and therefore must in no way be departed from in counseling and judging.

751. ○ QUESTION 4. Is it licit to contract with conditioned consent?

Reply. No. Such a manner of contracting is illicit, especially if the condition concerns the future, unless perhaps, as St. Ligorius has it, no. 892, a most urgent cause is present. The reason is that many and grave inconveniences can easily follow from such a manner of contracting, namely, scandal, quarrels, perplexities, difficulties, etc. - Thus the Theologians commonly.

752. ○ QUESTION 5. Is a matrimony entered under a base condition valid?

Reply 1. No, if this condition is repugnant to the substance or essence of matrimony, namely, to its threefold good, that is: first, the good of the Sacrament; second, the good of Fidelity; third, the good of offspring. This would happen if the betrothed persons, in contracting matrimony, excluded the generation of offspring [6], fidelity in the marriage, or perpetuity in matrimony. But for this it is required that a condition of this kind be expressly apposed and that the betrothed persons intend in mind to obligate themselves in no other way. The matrimony will be valid, however, if this condition is concomitant and therefore is not the motive why the matrimony is contracted, and there is otherwise some general will of contracting validly [7].

[6] The question has been raised whether a condition which indeed excludes the good of offspring but is not base, rather honorable, is an obstacle to the validity of matrimony; for example, when someone adds to the contract the condition: if you live with me in chastity or perpetual continence.

And there were some who denied that matrimony is thus valid. See Gonzalez on chapter Si conditiones 7, On Conditions Apposed, no. 8 and following. They were led especially by this reason: that the contract of matrimony essentially denotes consent to the handing over of the body for conjugal use; but since this handing over imports the obligation of rendering the debt, that is, of furnishing the use of one's own body to the other, with whom by force of the contract the power over that same body remains, surely either there will be no contract, or certainly the one contracting must consent to conjugal use.

But a purpose of continence plainly excludes consent of this kind; and a fortiori this must be said of one who contracts with a firm will of keeping a vow of chastity which perhaps he made, since he does not have that consent otherwise essential to the matrimonial contract, nor can he have it without sin if he wishes to use the period of two months granted for deliberating. Finally, a fortiori, there will be no contract of matrimony if this very thing is reduced to an agreement or condition. And from this arises a difficulty also concerning the matrimony of the Virgin Mother of God with St. Joseph, and of others concerning whom ecclesiastical history speaks; for example, St. Pulcheria, who chose Marcian Augustus as her spouse with the virginity which she had vowed to God preserved.

But it is shown without difficulty that the apposition of that condition is no obstacle to matrimony being validly contracted, and therefore to a right over one's own body being truly handed over to the other and at the same time the obligation proper to matrimony concerning the rendering of the debt being undertaken.

And indeed it is certain that the purpose of not consummating matrimony is no obstacle to the validity of matrimony as regards one who has the intention either of passing over to Religion and professing in it or at least of suspending the execution of the conjugal obligation if he wishes to use the period of two months granted for deliberating concerning that matter. And now it does not pertain to the matter to dispute when this is licit or illicit; meanwhile, it must be held certain that a matrimony of this kind is valid and therefore that the handing over and power over one's own body which constitute the substance of matrimony are given to the other.

You will perhaps say that in this case the substance of matrimony is preserved, and the right granted is therefore by no means injured, because the nature of the contract itself bears this, which implicitly has this condition inserted; but no one is considered to obligate himself beyond what the nature of the contract bears, and consequently no further right is acquired by the other party.

But I say that this is not the sole reason for which, with the right of the other preserved, the obligation of rendering the debt can be suspended. I now omit that the bond of matrimony, with that obligation remaining suspended, endures not only through the two months granted for deliberating but throughout the whole period of religious novitiate. But to touch the matter more closely, can that which the laws of the Church grant not equally be furnished by the voluntary concession of him to whom the right over the body of the other belongs? What prevents the contracting parties themselves from agreeing by common consent upon not only two months but years in which they may deliberate? Why could they not suspend by agreement the execution of their own right also for another cause, for example, until the husband has obtained an office sufficient for supporting offspring? Why could they not agree upon a matrimony not to be consummated except after the fortieth or fiftieth year? And if this, why not also throughout the whole of life?

In a matrimony which is made with an agreement of continence, namely, a twofold contract manifestly intervenes: the one proper to matrimony, by which power over one's own body is mutually handed over to the other; the other, by which the spouses mutually yield the use or exercise of this right. Nor does it matter that they agree concerning the exercise or use of their own right before rather than after the matrimony has been entered. For there is no reason why that cannot first be promised which I can afterward licitly furnish. But, as we all acknowledge, after matrimony has been entered the spouses can licitly yield the use of matrimony; therefore they can also promise this beforehand.

I said promise, because in reality before the contract of matrimony they do not renounce the right over the body of the other; for renunciation or abdication of use has place only after the power of using has been acquired. Therefore, they promise only that they will renounce it, or, if you prefer, they promise that they will so contract matrimony that at the same time they abdicate its use. But these things do not conflict with each other, since, if an abdication of this kind can be made after the contract, it can also be made in the contract itself. Thus one who buys a house can indeed in the very act of contracting yield the use of that house to the seller.

Nor can it be said that a contract of this kind so lacks every effect that it is in some way deprived of the nature and force of a contract. For: first, one who contracts in this way remains incapable, by force of the matrimonial bond, of contracting with another person; second, if the spouses themselves afterward change their purpose and wish to be united, they will not be fornicators; third, likewise, if the husband who, for example, by agreement permitted his wife the condition of chastity, inflicts force upon her, he will indeed sin against justice because he violates the agreement, or at least will violate the virtue of fidelity because he broke his promise, but he cannot be called a fornicator; fourth, if each spouse not only grants continence to the other but both also vow it to God and afterward do not keep the vow, they will sin against the virtue of religion but not against the virtue of chastity; fifth, if either makes his or her body available to an outsider, that spouse is guilty of violated matrimonial fidelity and consequently is held to be an adulterer; sixth, finally (which it is strange is little observed by those who treat this question), when someone consents in contracting to a condition of chastity, does that person not use the matrimonial right especially? Just as one who buys a house exercises his right over it no less if he uses it by inhabiting it himself than if, unwilling to use it himself, he grants its use to another either for a time or in perpetuity; so surely, when someone voluntarily yields the use of his right over the body of the other, by this very fact he must be considered to have the right and power and to exercise it. For no one legitimately yields anything except that which he has in his power, and by yielding its use he evidently exercises that power. Therefore, it is false that through a condition of preserving chastity apposed to and accepted in matrimony, a contract is entered which has no force and no effect and therefore casts off the nature of a contract.

You have both older and more recent Doctors cited for this doctrine in Rebellus (part 2, book 2, question 10, section 3, no. 19), Clericatus (On Matrimony, decision 3, no. 21, and decision 20, no. 21), Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 5, no. 119), and Benedict XIV (On the Diocesan Synod, book 13, chapter 22, no. 11), who nevertheless adds that it is altogether necessary for the patrons of this doctrine to inquire diligently concerning the strength and subsistence of this opinion, as though a Herculean labor were required to defend it, or as though no one had yet brought forward anything solid for it! He himself merely opposes the citation of Schmalzgrueber, who otherwise concedes that the same opinion is probable. Moreover, the whole armory which Schmalzgrueber himself opposes (l.c., no. 121) consists in this: that through the apposition of such a condition, the contracting parties exclude the right of the other over their own bodies and the implicit consent to rendering conjugal acts, since by force of it they are obligated neither to demand nor render intercourse. The whole force of this argument, as is evident, is situated in the fallacy by which a right is confused with the exercise of the right, and therefore the renunciation of use with the nonexistence of the right. Are not spouses equally obligated neither to demand nor render the debt if both bind themselves to a religious Order by solemn vow? And if this obligation excluded the right over the body of the other, why is either of them who has intercourse with an outside person an adulterer and why does that person sin against justice? Again, if the obligation neither to demand nor render intercourse excludes the right over the body of the other, how will a matrimony be valid when two persons bound by a simple vow of chastity contract? Let us conclude: a contracting party indeed cannot agree concerning those things which by the order of nature cannot be absent from the contract and by force of the contract are inalienable, such as the right over the body of the other; but in those things whose use is indeed licit but neither commanded nor inalienable, it is false that the contracting parties cannot agree upon abdication.

[7] That saying of Horace has surely happened to the Author in this place: While I labor to be brief, I become obscure. Therefore, a distinction must be made between an express condition apposed to the contract and a merely internal intention.

When an intention or condition contrary to the substance of matrimony is expressly apposed or reduced to an agreement, it is certain from the final chapter, On Conditions Apposed, that the matrimony is invalid in both forums; and the Apostolic See has declared this several times, as will appear below. Nor is that which the Author adds then required, namely, that the betrothed persons intend to obligate themselves in no other manner. For, as Lugo observes (On the Sacraments, disputation 8, no. 128), a matrimony cannot be valid unless someone sufficiently expresses internal consent externally by words or other signs. But in the aforesaid case (namely, an express condition contrary to the essential goods of matrimony), consent in no way appears to be expressed externally when rather the opposite is signified. Therefore, a valid matrimony cannot be had. Except, however, from the common opinion, the case in which that condition is added by only one of the betrothed persons while the other contradicts it, because if the former proceeds to the contract notwithstanding the contradiction of the latter, the former is presumed, in favor of matrimony, to have withdrawn from that condition. Indeed, there are some who think the same must be said when the other is silent at the apposition of a condition of this kind. For in this case also the silent party is presumed, in favor of matrimony, to contradict. - Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 5, no. 116.

But if there is question of a merely internal bad intention, this can be understood in two ways: either the contracting party is so disposed in mind that he is altogether unwilling to undertake one of those obligations which pertain to the substance of matrimony; or he indeed has the intention of truly contracting matrimony and therefore of undertaking all the obligations proper to matrimony, although he is not prepared to fulfill them, for example, by breaking off an impure friendship with another woman.

If it is accepted in this latter sense, the matrimony is valid according to the opinion of all, and that for both forums. Although one will easily observe that the obligation which concerns the good of the Sacrament, that is, the indissolubility of matrimony, is scarcely, or scarcely at all, capable of the aforesaid distinction, so that it can be undertaken together with an intention of not observing it, unless perhaps we think that the case pertains here of one who intends to leave his wife after some time and secretly to marry another elsewhere while conscious and certain that the prior bond remains.

But if the matter is understood in the former sense, then even if the bad intention is not reduced to an agreement, nevertheless it per se invalidates the contract as regards the forum of conscience. The reason is evident, because the contract of matrimony from its essence requires consent to those obligations. Therefore, whoever has an intention excluding any one of those obligations by that very fact excludes the essence of matrimony, and consequently the matrimony is null. See Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 2, disputation 29, no. 12), who after St. Thomas clearly explains this doctrine, afterward received by all.

I said per se, for another distinction also has place here which the Author also indicates somewhat obscurely: whether this intention is concomitant with or antecedent to the contract. This distinction must be considered diligently because of consequences of the gravest importance as regards practice. And indeed, since, for example, the indissolubility of the bond pertains to the essence of matrimony, what must be said of those who contract with the intention of establishing a divorce not only as regards bed but also as regards the bond, or of giving the wife a bill of repudiation, as the Jews are accustomed to do according to the Mosaic law? A case of this kind is certainly so far from being imaginary that there is a most frequent occasion of this question, because the opinion of the dissolubility of matrimony also flourishes among the schismatic Greeks because of adultery, and the same custom has prevailed among several Protestant heretics; and finally, the same faculty is given to spouses in many places by civil law, to say nothing now of infidels, whether Jews, Mohammedans, or idolaters. Therefore, it ought not to be surprising if those who contract matrimony in these circumstances at the same time have the intention of dissolving the matrimony because of the aforesaid causes and circumstances.

Cardinal De Lugo proposes the resolution of the question according to the twofold case of the distinction from the common doctrine thus (On the Sacraments, disputation 8, nos. 131-132): If the spouses know that repudiation is permitted in their republic, but at the time of the contract have not added this limitation, that they obligate themselves only under this respect, then, if that knowledge which they had concerning the use of repudiation was antecedent, that is, if they therefore contracted because they knew repudiation to be permitted and otherwise would not have contracted, they now appear to have been unwilling to obligate themselves simply to perpetuity. And therefore judgment must incline to the nullity of the matrimony.... But if the contracting parties were altogether ignorant whether the bond would be perpetual, or if they believed it even to be dissoluble but did not limit their intention at the time of the contract to that estimation, but had a general will of contracting a valid matrimony so that that ignorance or estimation was concomitant, since they would equally contract even without it, then the matrimony appears valid and is to be observed. And the things which the same Author discusses at length (l.c., from no. 120 to no. 130) are plainly worthy of being read, so that he may explain how a twofold contrary will can concur and which, as the more efficacious, must be said to prevail. There he also explains what that will is which is more general than the other (which the Author also indicates) and which is therefore more efficacious. You have the counterparts of these things also in Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 1, nos. 302-304), where he asks whether the matrimony of a baptized person who wishes to celebrate it under the nature of a contract but not under the nature of a Sacrament, and therefore contracts with an intention excluding the Sacrament, must be called valid; and much more extensively (book 4, title 19, nos. 164-176), where he inquires into the case of Lugo itself.

These things, however, as was premised, have force for the forum of conscience; for in the external forum it is always presumed that that more general will of contracting legitimate matrimony was present, and therefore that any error adverse to the substance of matrimony was merely concomitant, until the contrary is proved. Benedict XIV reports from the consensus of the Doctors the general doctrine upon which this practice of the external forum rests thus (On the Diocesan Synod, book 13, chapter 22, no. 7): If that express condition concerning matrimony to be dissolved because of adultery was by no means apposed, however much the contracting parties were in this error, that the bond of matrimony could be dissolved through adultery, nevertheless there is place for the presumption that, when they wished to enter matrimony as it was instituted by Christ, they wished to contract it altogether perpetual and indissoluble even upon the intervention of adultery; namely, the general will which we have stated, concerning entering matrimony according to the institution of Christ, prevails and in some way absorbs that private error. Hence it happens that the matrimony so contracted remains valid and firm. But where the contracting parties in the matrimonial contract itself apposed an express condition concerning dissolving the matrimony as regards the bond in the case of adultery, it can no longer happen that the particular error remains absorbed by the general will of contracting matrimony as it was instituted by Christ the Lord; but rather a general will of this kind is extinguished and suffocated by the particular error which manifestly prevails and dominates. And hence arises the nullity of the matrimony in contracting which there was apposed a condition contrary to its very substance. He soon confirms this doctrine in each sense by cited Declarations of the Sacred Congregations.

We find it proposed no less clearly in the Letters which Pius VI gave to the Archbishop of Prague on July 11, 1789: If a legal condition (he says) of dissolving the conjugal bond for the cited causes is apposed to matrimony through an express agreement, the matrimony must be called null and invalid from the beginning, nor could a conjugal bond have arisen therefrom; but an altogether illicit union was agreed upon, which each party, especially the Catholic party, is altogether bound to abandon by the law of Christ. But if no express condition of this kind repugnant to the substance of matrimony was apposed, although the contracting parties generally intend to contract according to the decrees of a sect or law granting the dissolution of the conjugal bond, nevertheless the matrimony must be considered validly contracted, and therefore a perpetual conjugal bond arose which can be dissolved by no civil law and no authority of non-Catholic consistories; and consequently the faculty of passing to other nuptials can be granted neither to the parties and much less to the Catholic party.

Pius VI gives the reason for the resolution, no differently from Benedict XIV, thus: Nor is there lacking an intrinsic reason why the intention of contracting according to the decrees of a sect asserting, or of a law permitting, the dissolution of matrimony does not impede its validity, provided it is not reduced to an agreement. For from this very fact that non-Catholics, deceived by a vain error, judge that the dissolution of matrimony for those causes is by no means repugnant to the law of Christ, it comes about that in their mind, because of that false estimation, the intention of contracting according to laws of this kind or the decrees of a sect by no means excludes the primary intention of contracting according to the divine law confirmed by Christ. Therefore this will remains in the act of contracting, and from it flows and is determined the nature of the consent which is actually furnished. Moreover, consent furnished according to the law of Christ is apt and sufficient for the validity of matrimony unless another canonical impediment stands in the way.

These things, however (as Benedict XIV has it in the text cited above), must always be referred to the presumption by which the practice of the external forum is governed. For by these things the Pontiff did not intend to define that true consent cannot be lacking even when that condition is not reduced to an agreement, just as, namely, the case of feigned consent is not excluded when the indissolubility of a marriage contracted between Catholics is determined generally. Therefore, as regards the forum of conscience, it always remains to be examined whether that bad intention is antecedent to the contract or only concomitant. For if the contracting parties so enter matrimony that they bind their intention to the error concerning the dissolubility of marriage alone and are altogether unwilling to contract except under the condition of dissolubility, the matrimony is null even if the condition is not reduced to an agreement, because they are unwilling to contract otherwise than dissolubly. Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 19, no. 70) shows that this doctrine is common to the Theologians and Canonists. Indeed, if it were established from the confession of both spouses that they did not have the intention of contracting in another manner, this would suffice for the matrimony to be declared null even in the external forum, unless there were a presumption of collusion. And if this intention was present in only one of the spouses, it will suffice for that spouse in the external forum; indeed, it will also suffice for the other party if reasons of such a kind concur which prudently persuade that the former is not lying. See Sanchez (book 2, disputation 45, nos. 4-12, and book 5, disputation 12, no. 5) and Lugo (On the Sacraments, disputation 8, no. 130).

But in doubt whether someone had that general and efficacious will of making the matrimony altogether valid, judgment must be made in favor of the contract, that it be valid.

The reason is that everyone is presumed to wish to execute a valid contract unless the contrary is proved, according to the common doctrine of the Jurists; and this will have place a fortiori in the case of matrimony, which is more favorable. Thus Lugo (On the Sacraments, disputation 8, no. 136).

Reply 2. But if the base condition is not repugnant to the substance of matrimony, distinguish: first, it is considered valid in the external forum because there the condition is held as not added; second, it is disputed as regards the forum of conscience, as in other contracts. Ordinarily, however, it is not considered a condition sine qua non, but a mere purpose or promise independent of the matrimonial contract, and therefore the consent is not judged suspended under a base condition unless this is altogether established, as was said in the first reply. - St. Ligorius, no. 891 [8].

[8] The base condition of which the Author now speaks, like an impossible condition, is in reality held as not added only when it is doubtful whether the contracting parties added it seriously or in jest. For since in doubt judgment must be made, according to the norm of law, in favor of the validity of the matrimony, deservedly in this doubt also the Church presumes in favor of matrimony that the condition was not seriously added; deservedly, I say, lest perhaps those who are legitimately united be separated and be joined to others through illegitimate marriages. Nevertheless, since this presumption is only one of law, and not also de iure, it can therefore be overcome by reasons brought forward to the contrary. - Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 5, no. 64.

It is not held as not added, however: first, if the contracting parties regard it as honorable; second, if it is otherwise established that the condition was seriously added by the contracting parties, and therefore that consent was not furnished except under its occurrence; for the presumption then yields to the truth, and therefore, if the condition does not occur, there will be no matrimony because of the defect of consent, which the Church certainly cannot supply; third, if both contracting parties, or at least one of them, were ignorant of the Constitution which holds conditions of this kind as not added; for it cannot then be said that, because they knew this condition to be rejected by the Church, they therefore contracted absolutely, since they wished to receive the Sacraments according to the intention of the Church. This has force only when the contracting parties know both that the condition is base and that it is not admitted by the Church.

But insofar as the Author adds that, as regards the forum of conscience, it is disputed whether the matrimony, once the base condition is fulfilled, must be held valid, just as in other contracts concerning base matter, see what we said at no. 760 of volume I, where we showed that the opinion denying the validity of these contracts is supported only by the coloring of false citations.

753. ○ QUESTION 6. What must be done if someone says that he consented fictitiously?

Reply 1. As regards the external forum, credence is not given to him unless it is evident from the circumstances that he was either deceived by fraud or induced to contract by grave fear; for it cannot be supposed that one who freely entered matrimony consented fictitiously.

Reply 2. As regards the internal forum, one who asserts that he consented fictitiously must be obliged: first, to abstain from demanding and rendering the debt until he has truly consented; second, ordinarily also to furnish true consent, so that he may thus repair the injury inflicted upon the other party. I say ordinarily, because if the other party consents to separation, or if he himself was compelled to contract, he is not bound to supply consent [9]. - Decretals, book 4, title On Conditions, final chapter.

[9] The deceiver is not bound to marry the deceived woman also in the following cases. First, if the deceiver has already entered matrimony with another; for although he cannot prove to the judge the fiction as regards the other matrimony, and therefore the judge compels him, even under threatened excommunication, to cohabit with the woman believed to be his spouse, he must rather endure this censure, which would not bind the soul, than mingle carnally with the first betrothed woman, as is evident from chapter Inquisitioni tuae 44, On the Sentence of Excommunication. Second, if fraud intervened also on the other side, for example, if she falsely boasted that she was a virgin; for the deception is then compensated by deception. Yet La Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 258), and after him St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 887), without reason refers the declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council to this case. See Thesaurus Resolutionum S. Congregationis Concilii, volume 3, pages 161-165. Third, if no harm came to the deceived party; or if the deceived party, once the deception is known, admits another compensation; or even if the harm inflicted can be compensated in another manner. Fourth, if the contracting party gave manifest indications of fictitious consent; for then the other party ought to attribute the deception rather to himself than to the other. The Doctors refer here the case in which the deceiver is of a much higher condition and state; for from this an indication of deception can become evident to the other party, although this is admitted with difficulty where the contract is celebrated before the Pastor. But an immense disparity can also excuse the deceiver for another reason, namely, because of the unhappy outcome, scandals, and other inconveniences which are rightly feared from such a marriage.

Moreover, the most grave obligation of entering matrimony with true consent easily manifests itself, not only because otherwise there is grave sin against the reverence due to the Sacrament, but because through the injury most grave harm is inflicted upon the other party. For since the fiction can be proved only with the greatest difficulty in the external forum, other nuptials are not permitted to the deceived party, and therefore this alone remains to her: either to enter Religion or to remain unmarried in the world.

Moreover, the spouse who furnished true assent is not bound to believe the other asserting that he consented fictitiously, unless he confirmed it by oath; and therefore the spouse could licitly demand the debt until the defect of consent were evidently proved. - Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 24, 1720.

754. ○ QUESTION 7. Is the consent of parents required for the validity or liceity of the matrimonial contract?

Reply 1. As regards validity, altogether no, because the consent of parents is required neither by natural nor by positive law. First, not by natural law, because the contracting parties have power over their own bodies, while parents do not have power over the bodies of their children in relation to matrimony; otherwise they could invalidate their marriages, whether justly or unjustly, which is altogether repugnant and opposed to the common sense of men. Second, neither by positive law; for the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 1, struck with anathema those who falsely affirm that marriages contracted by children of a family without the consent of their parents are invalid and that parents can make them ratified or invalid. But if civil law requires the consent of parents for the validity of matrimony, its force extends only to merely civil effects. - Thus commonly all Catholic Theologians.

Reply 2. As regards liceity, yes, speaking generally. This is established: first, from natural law, because children owe honor, reverence, and obedience to their parents, especially in those things which concern the whole family, such as matrimony, upon which the honor and peace of families very often depend, etc.; second, from the Council of Trent (ibid.), where it is said: The holy Church of God has always detested and prohibited those marriages (entered without parental consent) [10].

[10] These words of the Council of Trent refer rather to clandestine marriages, in which there is never lacking a reason why they should be prohibited.

755. ○ QUESTION 8. Can children ever contract matrimony against the will of their parents?

Reply. Yes, if the parents unjustly refuse consent. But since in this matter children of a family easily deceive themselves, before celebrating the nuptials they ought to consult prudent men and especially Confessors, lest in so grave a matter, full of such great dangers, they act imprudently while trusting their own judgment.

756. ○ QUESTION 9. What must a Confessor or Pastor do when children of a family wish to enter matrimony against the will of their parents?

Reply 1. As regards the Confessor, speaking generally, he ought to defend the part of the parents to the best of his ability; for generally the presumption is considered to favor them. Nevertheless, if the children, moved by a grave reason and with the legal conditions observed, persist in entering matrimony, they do not appear to be disturbed. - Thus commonly with Gousset.

Reply 2. As regards the Pastor, he ought not to assist at the matrimony unless the conditions prescribed by civil law have been fulfilled, because they are not opposed to the Church. - Gousset, no. 839.

Article II. On the Properties of Matrimony, Namely, its Unity and Firmness

I. On the Unity of Matrimony

757. ◦ The unity of matrimony is situated in this: that matrimony is the union of one man with one woman.

1. It is certain that polyandry is opposed to the natural law, because it is opposed to the principal ends of matrimony, namely, the generation of offspring and their good education. - Thus all.

2. It is certain that simultaneous polygamy is prohibited in every case, at least by the divine positive law of the New Law, as is evident from Luke 16:18: Everyone who dismisses his wife and marries another commits adultery. It is likewise established from the Council of Trent, session 24, canon 2.

3. It is certain that second and further marriages are licit both for a man and for a woman, even under the evangelical law. This is established from the authority and practice of the Church, as well as from Sacred Scripture, 1 Corinthians 7:39: A woman is bound by the law as long as her husband lives; but if her husband has fallen asleep, she is free: let her marry whom she wishes, only in the Lord.

II. On the Firmness of Matrimony

A twofold firmness of matrimony is distinguished: the one regards the bond, the other the bed.

Point I. On the Firmness of Matrimony Insofar as It Regards the Bond

758. ◦ Matrimony is indissoluble, that is, once matrimony has been contracted, divorce as regards the bond cannot take place, at least by divine positive law. This is de fide. It is proved: first, from the words of Christ, Matthew 19:6: Therefore they are now not two, but one flesh. What therefore God has joined together, let no man separate. Second, from the words of St. Paul, 1 Corinthians 7:10-11: But to those who are joined in matrimony I command, not I, but the Lord, that the wife not depart from her husband; but if she has departed, that she remain unmarried or be reconciled to her husband. And let not the husband dismiss his wife. Third, from the Council of Trent, session 24, canon 7.

759. ◦ Nevertheless, three cases must be excepted, for:

1. A ratified and non-consummated matrimony of Christians [1] can be dissolved for a grave cause through a dispensation of the Pope [2], from a power divinely granted to him. This is evident from the fact that the Supreme Pontiffs have already used this power many times, as St. Gregory VII, Paul III, etc.

[1] Above (note to no. 745) we said that matrimony cannot be called consummated unless the act is of itself apt for the effect of generation. Indeed, St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 1036), after St. Thomas (In IV Sentences, distinction 41, question 1, article 1, question 4, reply to objection 2), further requires an act perfect on the part of each spouse, which doctrine can contribute to the solution of grave questions.

Moreover, observe two things. The first is that this has force not only as regards the first matrimony which anyone contracts, but also as regards the second, third, etc. Hence, if widowed persons marry, even persons who have offspring from a preceding marriage, the law has force also with them; and therefore, if either makes profession in Religion before the present matrimony is consummated, the bond will be dissolved. The second is that a wife who, within two months while deliberating about embracing Religion, has been known by her husband through force can nevertheless, according to the more common and more probable opinion of Theologians and Canonists, enter Religion even against the will of her husband; and he ought therefore to impute it to himself that, since profession in the case does not dissolve the bond, he must remain without hope of marriage until the death of his wife. The Doctors except the case in which the wife has conceived offspring who could not easily be educated without the mother. See Sanchez, book 2, disputation 22, no. 7, and Pirhing, book 3, title 32, no. 56.

[2] There is no dispute in the forum and in practice concerning the power of the Supreme Pontiff to dispense in a ratified and non-consummated matrimony, and the sole controversy is accustomed to be reduced to the cause, namely, whether a cause sufficient for granting such a dispensation is present. Thus Benedict XIV (Canonical Question 24). See also his Canonical Questions 108 and 479, in which he says that this doctrine is notoriously common among Theologians and Canonists. Therefore what St. Alphonsus says (book 6, no. 959), that there are two probable opinions concerning this question, must be held among obsolete opinions. You have several examples of these dispensations in Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 19, no. 46) and Pignatelli (volume 1, consultation 148, no. 5), and later examples down to Pius VII, Gregory XVI, and Pius IX in Perrone (On Matrimony, volume 3, pages 509-510, Roman edition).

This faculty must also be extended to marriages consummated in infidelity if, after baptism, by which the marriage becomes ratified, the spouses have not yet consummated it again. And this is most clearly confirmed from the Letters of Gregory XIII of January 25, 1585, which you have in Clericatus (On Matrimony, decision 11, no. 28), in which he first establishes this faculty in these words: Therefore, considering that marriages of this kind contracted among infidels are indeed true, yet are not considered so ratified that, when necessity urges, they cannot be dissolved, etc. Hence he concludes that by force of the dispensation those marriages are valid which spouses converted to the faith contracted with others, even though the prior spouse also then already existed as converted to the faith. These marriages, even if it afterward became known that the former infidel spouses, being justly impeded, could not declare their will, and that they also had been converted to the faith at the time the second matrimony was contracted, nevertheless must never be rescinded but are valid and firm. Nor did Gregory XIII alone, but also Urban VIII, in Letters given October 20, 1624, and again September 17, 1627, declare this very thing, namely, that for a grave cause the Apostolic See can sometimes dissolve marriages of infidels, as Cardinal de Lugo testifies in the supplicatory libellus which he offered to Urban VIII and which you have in Cardenas (Theological Crisis, part 4, dissertation 2, no. 552). But as for the attempt of Pontius (book 7, chapter 48, no. 22, and book 9, chapter 2, no. 17), and after him Lambertinius (On the Synod, book 13, chapter 21, nos. 4-6), to twist the Letters of Gregory into a mere dispensation from interpellating the spouse, it must all but be rejected among absurdities, as plainly repugnant to the text brought forward.

Concerning the aforesaid text of Benedict XIV, the VV. object (page 805) that the words, There is no dispute in the forum and in practice, indicate that a speculative controversy still subsists in the schools and among theologians.

Reply. The VV. show (ibid.) that they surely are not ignorant of what is read thus in Canonical Question 479 of the same Benedict XIV: The second point is that no question can any longer be raised concerning the power of the Supreme Pontiff in that which pertains to dispensing in a ratified and non-consummated matrimony, since today the affirmative opinion is common among Theologians and Canonists and is received in practice, as is notorious. How, then, do the VV. assert that the words of Benedict XIV indicate that a controversy STILL subsists in the schools and among theologians, when the same Benedict establishes as a principle that no controversy can any longer be raised concerning this power of the Supreme Pontiff, because TODAY the affirmative opinion is common among Theologians and Canonists? Do these two things not mutually conflict: the controversy still subsists, and no controversy can any longer be raised?

The VV. reply (ibid.) that in question 479 Benedict speaks of a more recent time.

Reply 1. When the VV. say that according to Benedict XIV the controversy STILL subsists, do they affirm this concerning theologians who had written two centuries before, and not rather concerning the age of Benedict himself? Reply 2. Does not the same Benedict, in question 108, which is also cited in the Note, report from letter 180 of Cardinal d'Ossat that even under Clement VIII there was no controversy in the Sacred Congregation concerning this power of the Pontiff, although fourteen men had been summoned by the Supreme Pontiff for consultation, namely, eight Cardinals, four Auditors of the Rota, and two Penitentiaries of the Vatican Basilica? Reply 3. And if in the Roman Congregation there was already no controversy from the age of Clement VIII, and Benedict XIV in question 479, namely, a century and a half before us (for that cause was treated in January 1726), wrote that no question could any longer be raised concerning this power of the Supreme Pontiff, while from that age down to us ever greater light has shone upon this controversy, why finally will it be held unlawful to say that the opinion which denied this power to the Roman Pontiffs is now obsolete?

The VV. add (ibid.) that Benedict XIV (On Beatification and Canonization, book 4, chapter 42, no. 13) has the following: Concessions of this kind are sometimes made, yet from them it is not deduced that it is certain de fide that Pontiffs can release men from a ratified but non-consummated matrimony and from a vow of continence annexed to monastic profession.

Reply. Let it pass; for it is not contended in the Note that it must be held de fide that the Roman Pontiffs possess this power, so that whoever contradicts it must be considered a heretic. Moreover, who does not know that the Church has not been accustomed to arrive at definitions of this kind, namely, that something must be held de fide, unless a grave cause demanded it? Benedict brings forward those examples to show how the Apostolic See permits the cult of the Blessed, and yet that it must not therefore be held de fide that they are participants in heavenly glory. But he had premised (ibid., no. 9) that although it appears probable that the judgment of the Supreme Pontiff in equipollent Beatification is not infallible and does not pertain to the faith, nevertheless it is also certain (he says) that he will not be free from the note of temerity who contends that he erred and who reproves the cult which the Pontiff himself approved.

And indeed James Pignatelli judged no differently concerning the opinion which denies to the Roman Pontiffs the faculty of dispensing in a merely ratified matrimony (Canonical Consultations, book 1, consultation 148, no. 6), writing: Therefore, by the judgment of all Canonists and very many Theologians, and by the examples of the Supreme Pontiffs down to our times, this has been so confirmed that it would be temerarious to assert the contrary. Nor did George Gobat judge otherwise (tract 10, no. 691): Nor do I think that the opinion of Pontius can now be defended without insult to the Apostolic See, since Diana named seven Pontiffs who easily dispensed in thirty such cases, and most recently Innocent X, after such long and sharp disputes among the Theologians concerning this power, used it toward a common laborer, supported by no favor at all, and indeed without a cause concerning the public good, as I most faithfully related above (no. 678). Hence also Elbel (On Matrimony, conference 15, no. 360): It cannot be said without the note of temerity that the Pontiffs erred in dispensing.

Moreover, whatever anyone judges must be thought concerning these judgments, not even the VV. will be able to call into doubt that the affirmation of the Holy Doctor concerning this question, There are two probable opinions, leads to very grave inconveniences, even with their own principles considered. And indeed it now follows that the Roman Pontiffs therefore acted in this matter relying upon an opinion which can be false, indeed which is probably false. Yet, first, the right of a third party is also at issue here, for it is known that dispensations of this kind were also granted against the will of the other party. And if the dispensation must be called merely probably valid, did not the VV. elsewhere contend (page 799) that probability avails nothing against a right certainly existing beforehand? But is it not otherwise certain that a right had already been acquired by the other party through the contract of matrimony? Would it not therefore have to be said that the Roman Pontiffs acted unjustly toward the other party? Does not Pontius (book 9, chapter 3, no. 8) bring forward this argument for denying this power to the Pontiff, because it appears difficult for the Pontiff to make a law against a right of justice acquired by a third party, or to dissolve a matrimony, which we see clearly in lesser contracts?

Furthermore, no one calls into doubt that through the rescission of matrimony a most grave injury is inflicted upon the Sacrament itself unless the matrimony was legitimately dissolved. But according to the principles of the VV. and of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, is it licit to act with a merely probable opinion and at the same time with a probable and grave irreverence toward the Sacrament? Is it not evident that there is danger of this grave irreverence if a marriage is said to have been dissolved by pontifical dispensation only probably?

Moreover, since through a pontifical dispensation of this kind the faculty of passing to other nuptials is given to each spouse, could the spouses licitly proceed to these other, probably adulterous, nuptials? Could the Church consent that one be admitted to the Sacrament of matrimony who is still probably bound by the bond of a prior marriage and would probably remain in an adulterous union?

Deservedly, therefore, the Salmanticenses (tract 9, chapter 4, no. 59) say: Very often the Supreme Pontiffs have dispensed so that a ratified matrimony might be dissolved; but it must not be believed that the Pontiffs erred in a matter so grave and one which pertains especially to morals, because in matters pertaining to morals IT APPEARS IMPIOUS TO ASSERT that the Supreme Pontiffs err. And yet, if the affirmation of St. Alphonsus is admitted, would it not probably have to be said that the Supreme Pontiffs probably erred in a grave matter pertaining to morals?

Nor does Diana, whom the VV. otherwise sometimes exhibit as too benign, judge differently (volume 3, tract 1, resolution 94, no. 4): It is in no way likely that the Pontiffs err in a matter of such importance, since their error would gravely harm the Churches. For it would not only be in fact but would redound into doctrine pernicious to the Church, because by their deed they implicitly teach, etc. And a little later (no. 5): Their error would concern one of the principal heads of our Religion, which would indeed be intolerable. And, meeting an evasion, he adds: You will say that the error is only speculative, in which they are excused because they follow a probable opinion of various Doctors. The reply is that this does not satisfy, since even a speculative error in moral doctrine, or in a deed from which error in moral doctrine would follow, and especially in the Sacraments, would be most pernicious to the Church. Then he admirably adds (no. 12): And certainly it ought to suffice for any Christian, however learned, that the Roman Pontiffs, and especially Pius V, otherwise a most holy man and an eminent theologian, frequently dispensed in the aforesaid marriages.... It ought also to suffice that the same Roman Pontiffs declared that it was not in the mind of Christ in Matthew 5 and 19 to include the aforesaid matrimony, to which interpretation the greatest faith must be given, chapter Haec est fides, cause 24, question 1.

In support of the affirmation of St. Alphonsus, the VV. cite (pages 802-803) certain Authors whom they say were contemporaries of the Holy Doctor. Two things can be displeasing in this. The first is that from Cardinal Gotti, as though he denied this power to the Pontiff, they bring forth the general thesis concerning the indissolubility of matrimony and concerning its dissolubility on the occasion of conversion from infidelity or of Religious Profession; but they then suppress in silence the fact that he plainly proves the power of the Pontiff concerning dispensing in a ratified matrimony (question 8, doubt 3, section 1, no. 15). The second is that they likewise report from Antoine (chapter 2, question 8) what he states generally thus (reply 1): Every matrimony contracted absolutely is and always has been indissoluble without a special permission of God; and then suppress what is read thus (ibid., reply 4): A ratified but non-consummated matrimony of baptized persons is dissolved in two cases: first, through solemn Profession in an approved Religion; second, according to very many Canonists and Theologians, it is dissolved by the authority of the Pope. He then defends this thesis with several arguments.

Whatever may be the truth concerning this (as also concerning the fact that the VV. add on page 802 that Arriaga, S.J., was cited by the Salmanticenses, although these certainly mention Aragon but nowhere Arriaga), no one is ignorant that several others, especially somewhat more ancient Authors, could have been cited for the opinion which either denies or calls into doubt that power of the Roman Pontiff of which we speak. But this cannot or ought not move anything. We discern in this controversy what we have known to have occurred also concerning others: when they began to be debated in the Schools, there existed the greatest and afterward the sharpest disagreement of the Doctors; but in the course of time, both by the aid of maturer discussion and especially by that light which manifests itself from the Roman Apostolic See, even apart from any definition, through deeds or other reasons, the disagreement gradually diminished and finally vanished altogether.

In this matter the most prudent economy and long-suffering patience of the Apostolic See indeed showed itself admirable: while, at the time when by deeds or another reason it sufficiently indicated toward which side it inclined and where its sense tended, nevertheless, where no grave danger threatened, it did not prevent its children, otherwise prepared to obey, from meanwhile disputing among themselves, and sometimes in disputing from arriving at the point where they perhaps appeared to fall short of the reverence and honor due to so great a Mother.

In a not dissimilar manner, the same Apostolic See, while vindicating to itself by the deeds themselves the right of dispensing in a ratified matrimony, nevertheless patiently endured that, for example, Soto (In IV Sentences, distinction 27, question 1, article 4, section His tamen nihil obstantibus) should write concerning this doctrine: Nevertheless, to confess the weakness of my intellect, always saving the censure of the Church, it represents to me no appearance of probability. The Apostolic See further patiently endured that someone should say it to be free from sin while it dispenses concerning solemn vows and a ratified matrimony only because invincible ignorance excuses it. Thus Martin Wigandt (Tribunal of Confession, tract 2, proem, examination 3, no. 7): If, however, an opinion less probable in itself appears more probable to someone, he does not sin by following it in practice, because invincible ignorance excuses; and thus it can happen in dispensations of the Pope concerning solemn vows and a ratified matrimony. Therefore, according to this opinion, lest we ascribe to the depravity of the Roman Pontiffs acts of the Apostolic See of this kind, which we see frequently repeated through several centuries down to our days, we must evidently impute them to their ignorance! And hence Charmes, as the VV. themselves report (page 804), excused the Roman Pontiffs because THEY HAD BEEN DECEIVED! What wonder, then, that an opinion which necessarily leads to consequences of this kind became obsolete in the course of time?

The VV. observe (page 801) that St. Alphonsus, when he calls probable the opinion which denies that the Pope can dispense in a ratified matrimony, speaks only of speculative probability, as do the other Doctors.

Reply. What those mean who use a phrase of this kind in this controversy (for St. Alphonsus does not have it thus) can scarcely be understood, and one would rightly say that they labor under an equivocation. The controversy is whether the Pontiff has the power of dissolving a merely ratified matrimony, and therefore whether the dissolution of a matrimony through pontifical dispensation is valid or not. Does their opinion, then, reduce to this: speculatively, the Pontiff probably does not have this power, but practically he has this power absolutely? And again: the dissolution of a matrimony of this kind is probably not valid speculatively, but in practice it is absolutely valid? Such an opinion plainly savors of something most absurd.

But, as I said, these appear to labor under an equivocation. For when they ask whether the Pontiff can dispense in a ratified matrimony and reply that, speculatively speaking, he probably cannot, they understand that can concerning power necessary for the validity of the act. But when they speak of practice, they understand that can, not likewise concerning power for the validity of the act, but concerning the liceity or honesty of the act, which they finally derive either implicitly or explicitly from the invincible and therefore inculpable ignorance of the agent. But if, once the equivocation is removed, the question is asked whether the Apostolic See can licitly dispense in a ratified matrimony, will they dare to reply: speculatively speaking, it is probably illicit, but practically it is altogether licit? For if you set aside the excuse of invincible ignorance, do any circumstances arise in practice which dissolve the reasons for which the action is speculatively probably illicit?

In brief: if the power of the Pontiff necessary for the validity of the act must really be called doubtful, in practice there can by no means be avoided those inconveniences which we touched upon above, and especially this one: that those who are probably still bound by the bond of a preceding matrimony are admitted to other nuptials.

And indeed whatever may finally be added concerning invincible ignorance which excuses the dispensing Pontiff from sin must deservedly be called most empty. For all the Doctors now agree on what is deduced from the propositions condemned by the Apostolic See: that in conferring Sacraments it is illicit to follow a probable opinion concerning the validity of the Sacrament. And therefore it manifestly follows that in the present case it is illicit to admit to the Sacrament of matrimony where the consent of the contracting parties is probably invalid. Moreover, if this is illicit in practice, it must also be called illicit speculatively. Cardinal de Lugo writes excellently to the point (On Justice and Right, disputation 10, no. 189): If these inconveniences follow of themselves from that opinion, it certainly will not be probable even speculatively; for even for the speculative probability of a moral matter, the matter must be such that in human circumstances it does not bring inconveniences which render it illicit; but if of itself it brings inconveniences of this kind, by that very fact it is intrinsically illicit even speculatively speaking. Since, therefore, to conclude at last, this reason for excusing acts of the Apostolic See, repeated so often through several centuries down to us, as though through mere ignorance the Roman Pontiffs had used so doubtful a power as to give occasion to those gravest inconveniences on account of which they themselves condemned the use of probability in the subject matter, must be called most empty and altogether unworthy of a Theologian, it ought not appear surprising that Theologians finally judged empty the arguments which cast doubt upon this power of the Apostolic See, and that in the course of time the matter was brought to the point that the opinion became obsolete and must be called outmoded.

2. A ratified and non-consummated matrimony can be dissolved through the solemn religious profession of one of the spouses, and this by a special privilege granted by Christ and declared by the Church. For thus the Council of Trent, session 24, canon 6: If anyone shall say that a matrimony ratified but not consummated is not dissolved through the solemn religious profession of one of the spouses, let him be anathema [3]. But in order that the spouses may deliberate about the use of this privilege, they have two months after the nuptials granted to them by the law itself [4], during which time they are not bound to render the debt. - St. Ligorius, nos. 870, 958. Indeed, even after that period of two months, if the matrimony has not been consummated, even through an illicit refusal of the debt, this privilege remains. Ferraris [5]. Nor is it impeded by fornication had between the betrothed persons before the celebration of the matrimony [6]. - Scavini.

[3] It must be added here, which the Author omits, that before the convert to the faith binds himself in a second marriage, it is necessary to interpellate the spouse who is still an infidel, so that it may be established whether that spouse is willing to cohabit peacefully with the convert, etc., or, according to the different circumstances, whether that spouse is also willing to embrace the faith, etc. The reason is evident, because just as, in doubt concerning the death of a prior spouse, it is necessary before entering a second marriage to inquire whether the former is in fact dead, so in this case it is necessary to inquire whether the infidel spouse, according to the Pauline phrase, in fact departs.

Cardinal Brancatius, whom Clericatus afterward copied (On Matrimony, decision 11, no. 21), indeed judged (In IV Sentences, disputation 16, no. 198) that this interpellation is so necessary that a matrimony contracted without the will of the prior infidel spouse having been ascertained must be held invalid. He brings forward this reason (ibid., no. 199): that the Privilege does not have its force unless the conditions required by the legislator are observed. But the chief condition, he says, is that the infidel depart. Yet for the argument to conclude, the minor would have to be this: But the condition necessary for the validity of the matrimony is that the faithful party first investigate and know that the infidel wishes to depart. He himself does not prove this, nor, I think, will anyone easily prove it. And it is equally certain that a second marriage is not valid before the death of the prior spouse. But anyone who, confusing the occurrence of the condition with knowledge of that occurrence, reasoned thus would argue badly: Therefore, in doubt concerning the death of a spouse, another matrimony contracted without the doubt whether the spouse is in fact dead having been removed is invalid. The correct conclusion is that one sins who contracts another matrimony without certain knowledge of the death of the prior spouse, but that matrimony is valid or invalid according as the prior spouse was living or dead at the time when the new marriage was contracted. By parity you will conclude in our case that the faithful party indeed sins who, without consulting the infidel spouse and therefore in ignorance whether that spouse wishes to depart, contracts new nuptials; nevertheless, these nuptials are valid or invalid according as the condition of that departure exists or does not exist. But the argument which some, especially Missionaries, thought could be taken in favor of the opinion of Brancatius from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith in 1816 fails for several reasons. For other reasons were available on account of which the second marriage of a certain Tullius with Martha was judged invalid, as is easily evident to one inspecting the genuine Acts of the Sacred Congregation. See Sanchez (book 7, disputation 74, nos. 13-18), where he discusses both the necessity and manner of interpellation and the delays to be granted to the infidel.

The greater difficulty is what must be done when the convert cannot interpellate the other. This can happen especially for two reasons: either because the infidel cannot be approached, or because it is not established which of several persons must be interpellated, for example, when it is unknown which of several women whom a man has or has had is his legitimate wife.

As regards the first case, let the question now be omitted concerning an infidel who has maliciously fled or lies hidden so as not to be interpellated.

For, as the Doctors observe (see Clericatus, On Matrimony, decision 11, no. 26), it is then sufficiently established that the infidel is unwilling to be converted or to cohabit, and therefore the faithful party will be able freely to enter another matrimony. The question is when the infidel cannot be interpellated because it is unknown where the infidel is, or because the infidel is so far away that an admonition is considered impossible.

Many, whom Benedict XIV acknowledges to have been the greater number (On the Synod, book 6, chapter 4, no. 3), taught that in this case there is no need of interpellation because it is then morally certain that the infidel is unwilling to be converted and to leave his own people in order to cohabit legitimately with the convert; and no admonition is needed when there is moral certainty concerning the infidel's obstinacy. See Sanchez (book 7, disputation 74, no. 14) and Clericatus (On Matrimony, decision 11, no. 26). But perhaps one will admit this with difficulty. For the reason of distance and ignorance of the place to which one's own spouse was carried, for example, if a husband were seized and carried away from Africa and transported to the Americas, will indeed perhaps remove from the wife left in central Africa the hope of recovering him; but whence is it certainly proved that she is also obstinately unwilling either to be converted or to cohabit with him if perhaps found? Indeed, experience not rarely shows the contrary, and sometimes it has been discovered that the spouse first left behind came to the Christian faith before the abducted spouse did.

Pontius (On Matrimony, book 7, chapter 48, no. 22), whom Benedict XIV afterward copied (On the Synod, book 6, chapter 4, no. 3), contends that the faithful party cannot marry unless a dispensation of the Pontiff intervenes by which that admonition is supplied, namely, as Benedict XIV explains (l.c.), so that a new matrimony can be entered with the interpellation of the other infidel spouse omitted, when it is established that the spouse cannot legitimately be interpellated. But if these things are understood so that the sole effect of the dispensation is to release the faithful party from the obligation of inquiring whether the spouse wishes to depart or not depart, this opinion can deservedly appear more intolerable than the preceding opinion of Sanchez. For the latter at least supposes there to be moral and therefore sufficient certainty of the departure of the infidel spouse, and consequently supposes that essential condition to be present which, from the doctrine of the Apostle Paul, is both necessary and sufficient for the faithful party to pass to other nuptials once the bond of the prior marriage has been dissolved. The later opinion of Pontius, on the contrary, taking no account of the existence or nonexistence of that necessary condition, thinks that sufficient provision is made for the matter if, by means of a dispensation, someone makes no further inquiry into the will of the infidel, whether the infidel wishes to depart or not; just as if, in doubt concerning the death of a prior spouse, someone should think it sufficient for validly contracting another matrimony that it be authoritatively declared by the magistrate that an inquiry concerning the life or death of the spouse is very difficult or even morally impossible! For to this they finally reduce the whole force of the pontifical dispensation in this question. In this matter they also reserve for pontifical power parts which I would almost call ridiculous, namely, that it dispense from the interpellation of a spouse whom it is established cannot legitimately be interpellated! Yet if the condition required by the Apostle is perhaps in reality lacking, and the spouse left, for example, in Africa has a firm intention of preserving fidelity to his or her spouse for all time rather than departing, how will the bond of this legitimate and consummated matrimony cease? What if this spouse left behind has already received the Christian faith and baptism when the spouse abducted into slavery comes to baptism, or at least when the abducted spouse thinks about new nuptials, so that the former marriage has now become ratified and the nature of a Sacrament has accrued to it? Whence, I ask, will we derive, in the opinion of Pontius, the dissolution of this bond which is certainly essentially required beforehand for entering a new matrimony?

Therefore this difficulty, which clear facts testified was not imaginary, had to be provided for in another manner. For what even now occurs in the markets of Egypt, that both men and women carried away into slavery from the Mediterranean regions of Africa are sold although they are joined in matrimony, we know was also commonly done in past centuries so that colonists might be obtained for the immense deserts of America. When the Christian charity of the Missionaries had led these persons to the faith, there pressed the grave difficulty of how provision might be made for those whom it was not easy either to keep continent or to assist with matrimony, since they were bound by former marriages. The use of the faculty which the Apostle grants to those converted to the faith was impeded not only because the spouses left in barbarous places could not be interpellated but also because it had been learned by experience that not rarely the spouses left in Africa also had already been converted to the faith by the aid of Missionaries and cleansed by baptism. Therefore a remedy was needed by whose aid those wretched persons, whether carried abroad into slavery or left in their homeland without a spouse, would not lack matrimony even when perhaps there was no longer any place for the faculty of marrying granted by the Apostle; and since a new matrimony cannot be contracted while the bond of the prior matrimony remains, a remedy was needed by which the bond of the prior matrimony would certainly be dissolved even when the departure of the former spouse furnished no access to this dissolution.

And this indeed is the remedy which Gregory XIII, and afterward Urban VIII, judged should be applied in the Letters which we mentioned in the preceding Note. For in them there appears most expressly even the case in which there can be no place for the faculty given by the Apostle on the occasion of the departing infidel spouse: namely, when this departure is not only unknown but is supposed to be lacking, because the other spouse is also presented in the same Letters as already converted to the faith at the time when the former contracted new nuptials. These marriages, says Gregory, even if it afterward became known that the former infidel spouses, being justly impeded, could not declare their will - namely, the will of adhering to their spouses, for otherwise a will of this kind would have been of no importance - and that they had also been converted to the faith at the time the second matrimony was contracted, nevertheless must never be rescinded but are valid and firm. But how can the second marriages be valid and firm unless the preceding bonds have been dissolved? These could not have been held dissolved by force of the Pauline concession, as is evident, because the necessary condition, namely, the departure of the prior infidel spouse, is lacking. Therefore, the removal of the prior bond must be ascribed to apostolic power, which, by force of that granted dispensation, possesses the authority of dissolving marriages of infidels not yet consummated after conversion to the faith but still merely ratified, and in fact dissolves them. And for precisely this reason Gregory XIII and afterward Urban VIII, when about to grant this dispensation, make express mention in the same Letters of this power, through these words: Therefore We, considering that marriages of this kind contracted among infidels are indeed true, yet are not considered so ratified that, when necessity urges, they cannot be dissolved, etc. This observation would have been inserted altogether without purpose in the same Letters unless the exercise or use of this apostolic power intervened in the dispensation granted there.

That Pontius, having these Letters before his eyes, could affirm (l.c.) that it is not gathered from them that the Pontiff dissolved those marriages, but only declared that the case in which the infidel does not wish to cohabit with the faithful party is then verified, since, he says, for so long a time the faithful party is not sought by the infidel - words altogether ridiculous, since in the hypothesis interpellation is supposed impossible, and the Pontiff, as is evident from his own words, supposes that the infidel, being justly impeded, could not declare his will - this, I say, can be explained only by one who knows that Pontius, carried away by a blind passion for contradicting Sanchez, for Sanchez had affirmed that the Pontiff wished through those Letters to dissolve the marriages where necessary, not only in this place but very often and everywhere throughout the course of his work turned aside into paradoxes and absurd opinions. And it must plainly be regretted that this paradox of Pontius also crept into Cardinal Lambertinius's work On the Diocesan Synod (book 6, chapter 4, no. 3, and book 13, chapter 21, nos. 3-4). Hence it happened that this question, otherwise sufficiently simple, rather than being flooded there with some new light, as often occurs with other questions, was wrapped in denser darkness and entangled in inextricable difficulties. This happened also as regards the other case proposed above, to which we now proceed.

Another difficulty, therefore, occurs when interpellation of the infidel spouse becomes nearly impossible because it is unknown which of several wives whom a man actually has or formerly had is to be interpellated as legitimate. For although after the promulgation of the evangelical law only the first wife is legitimate by law, it sometimes becomes uncertain among barbarians, who readily repudiate wives, which is truly the first wife. For it happens that someone's first wife had previously married another man and was repudiated by him; yet the doubt does not thereby cease, since it is uncertain whether she was the legitimate spouse of the prior man, who perhaps had previously repudiated another wife. And for the same reason it is again not established whether the first wife of that former man was legitimate, since she herself had previously been repudiated by another husband, concerning whom it is doubtful for the same reasons whether she was his legitimate wife. And thus one must proceed almost to infinity without it being possible to establish anything certain.

This condition of affairs had for a long time kept the Bishops, Pastors, Missionaries, etc., of those regions very anxious. For when those who were converted to the faith were commanded to choose for themselves only one wife from those whom they either had or had had, they generally desired one who herself would embrace the faith, although she was not the first. Hence a twofold rock. First, to find the first wife who could be interpellated sometimes appeared not merely difficult but nearly impossible; and even if she could have been found, it was hard for the neophytes to dismiss the one whom they preferred, and therefore many were deterred from embracing the faith. On the other hand, how could the bond of a prior matrimony, if one existed, be believed dissolved, since either the former wife, who was unknown, could not be interpellated, or even though interpellated and consenting to cohabitation, she was rejected by the man as hated? Therefore, in neither case did the permission given by Paul to pass to other nuptials, and thus the dissolution of the prior bond, have place: not in the latter case, because there plainly lacked a cause for dismissing the first and legitimate wife, who would rather have wished to remain with her spouse; not in the former, because the departure of the first wife could not be established, and therefore it was no more licit to deliberate about new nuptials than when nothing can be learned concerning the life or death of a prior spouse.

When these things had been reported to the Apostolic See, St. Pius V, applying by Letters given August 2, 1571, a remedy not unlike that which Gregory XIII afterward applied, decreed that the converts could remain with that wife among the several whom they had married who was baptized together with the husband, even if she had been neither the first nor legitimate. Since therefore, he says, as We have learned, several wives are permitted to Indians while they remain in their infidelity, whom they repudiate even for the lightest causes, hence it has happened that those receiving baptism have been permitted to remain with that wife who is baptized together with the husband; and because it very often happens that she is not the first, whence both the ministers and the Bishops are tormented by most grave scruples, judging that this is not a true matrimony; but because it would be most harsh to separate them from the wives with whom those Indians received baptism, especially because it would be most difficult to find the first wife, therefore We, wishing with paternal affection to provide for the condition of the aforesaid Indians and to free the Bishops and ministers themselves from scruples of this kind, by Our own motion and from Our certain knowledge and from the plenitude of apostolic power, declare by apostolic authority through the tenor of the present Letters that the Indians thus baptized, as premised, and to be baptized in the future, are to remain with the wife who was and is baptized with them as with a legitimate wife, the others having been dismissed, and that a matrimony of this kind legitimately subsists between them, etc. Moreover, since these marriages could not legitimately subsist unless the bond of the prior marriage had been dissolved, and since the dissolution of the bond in the case cannot be attributed to the faculty granted by the Apostle Paul on account of the departure of the prior infidel wife, it is manifest, unless someone should prefer to say that St. Pius V dispensed so that the Indians could have two legitimate wives at the same time, that the Roman Pontiff, from the plenitude of power, wished to dissolve and remove that first bond, if any existed.

But behold, here also Pontius, for whom discourse concerning the Roman Pontiff dissolving these marriages by extraordinary power was like a dreadful apparition, and after Pontius Lambertinius (On the Synod, book 13, chapter 21, no. 4), twist this Constitution of St. Pius also into a mere dispensation, so that extrajudicial knowledge of the impossibility of interpellating the infidel spouse might be substituted for juridical interpellation. Thus they again introduce a ridiculous scene of a Pontiff who by apostolic authority dispenses from interpellating a spouse who cannot be interpellated, and who substitutes ignorance of whether that spouse wishes to depart for the spouse's departure required by the Apostle, as though these were one and the same thing; just as though, in relation to celebrating new nuptials, it were one and the same thing that a prior spouse is dead and that it is unknown whether the spouse is dead or still lives! The same is repeated in Lambertinius's Canonical Question 546, no. 37, where it is held to be one and the same that it is most difficult to find the first wife and that, according to the words of the Apostle, she departs although she was not interpellated!

In the latter place Lambertinius also adds an argument of this kind: In order that a dispensation concerning the consummated matrimony of infidels might be argued from the Brief of St. Pius V, it would have to be shown that the same Supreme Pontiff supposed that the first wife had been found, and, notwithstanding this, that the same Pontiff declared the validity of the matrimony with the second or third wife converted to the faith. But others will very easily deny this, since it is shown to be false without any difficulty. For, in order that a dispensation as regards the bond in preceding marriages of infidels may be argued, it suffices that these two things were established: first, that St. Pius decreed that the matrimony afterward contracted with another should be held legitimate by all and always; second, that it could nevertheless sometimes happen that the dissolution of the preceding conjugal bond could not be ascribed to the departure of the prior spouse according to the phrase of the Apostle.

But the first point is manifestly clear from the words of the Supreme Pontiff. As regards the second, who, I ask, or for what reason, would say it impossible that the first wife, if she should perhaps be found - St. Pius says this is most difficult, not impossible - would wish to adhere to her legitimate spouse, especially if she herself had already been converted to the faith or was prepared to be converted? Since these things are sufficiently manifest, we shall refrain from adding the several other things which could be brought forward upon the same matter.

It is useful to add only this concerning the present matter: it is to be desired that the little work of the Most Reverend Father Camillus Tarquini, Professor of Canon Law in this Roman College, should come forth into public light. In it, solidly according to his custom and most learnedly, he treats the question whether the Pauline privilege of which we spoke also has force when someone receives himself through baptism from infidelity into a Christian Communion which is nevertheless separated from the Catholic Church. For I do not doubt that, after considering the reasons brought forward by him, everyone will concede to his opinion, which holds the affirmative part.

[4] This time, however, can be restricted or prolonged at the discretion of the judge, although one ought not readily to depart from that period. See Sanchez (book 2, disputation 24, no. 12) and Schmalzgrueber (book 3, title 32, no. 1). According to the truer and more common opinion, however, the two months must be computed not from the day of the nuptials but from the day on which the judge fixes the term. Sanchez (ibid., no. 21) and Schmalzgrueber (ibid., no. 3).

[5] A profession is called solemn when it is made in a Religion approved by the Apostolic See, as distinguished from Congregations in which only simple vows are emitted. These simple vows, far from having the force of dissolving a preceding matrimony, do not even render a subsequent one invalid, as will be said below where merely impeding impediments are treated. Therefore Pontius wrote erroneously (On Matrimony, book 9, chapter 6) that a ratified matrimony is dissolved through the profession of the simple vows which are emitted after two years of novitiate in the Society of Jesus; and Vincent de Justis also copied this error from Pontius (On Dispensations, book 2, chapter 14, no. 106). For indeed, by a singular Privilege granted to the Society of Jesus by Gregory XIII, those simple vows constitute a diriment impediment, and therefore certainly render those bound by them incapable of contracting matrimony validly; but that they also dissolve a matrimony already contracted, the Society of Jesus itself has never known or imagined. See Suarez (On Religion, tract 10, book 4, chapter 2), Vasquez (In I-II, disputation 165, chapter 10), Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 1, disputation 18, no. 6), Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 413), Schmalzgrueber (book 3, title 31, no. 210, and book 4, title 6, nos. 61-64), etc. There is added the Resolution of the Sacred Congregation which Barbosa reports (Collection of Apostolic Decisions, collection 465, under MATRIMONY, no. 30).

[6] Except when it is necessary to remain in the matrimony in order to legitimate offspring, repair scandal, or repair the honor of the bride. - St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 958.

Nevertheless, one sins who contracts matrimony with the intention of entering Religion without warning the other party. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

3. Even a consummated matrimony of infidels can be dissolved by divine concession when either spouse is converted to the Christian Faith [7], and the other refuses to cohabit peacefully with the converted spouse, or does not cohabit except with injury to the Creator and contempt of the Christian Religion, or attempts to pervert the faithful party [8]. This is deduced from the Declaration of Innocent III cited by St. Ligorius, no. 956, etc. This divine concession is drawn from the words of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:12, where he says: If any brother has an unbelieving wife and she consents to dwell with him, let him not dismiss her.... But if the unbeliever departs, let the unbeliever depart; for a brother or sister is not subject to servitude in such cases: but God has called us in peace. Innocent III explains the same more fully in chapter Quanto 7, On Divorce. - See more in case no. 903 and following [9].

[7] Understand conversion through the reception of baptism. Through baptism, however, the conjugal bond with the infidel is not yet dissolved, but only when the convert, upon the refusal of the other to cohabit peacefully and without insult to the Creator, contracts other nuptials. Benedict XIV (Canonical Question 546, no. 6) acknowledges this doctrine to be common, indeed most common, among Theologians and Canonists. Hence, unless we suppose a typographical error, it can scarcely be understood why elsewhere (On the Synod, book 6, chapter 4, no. 4), although he again acknowledges it to be almost commonly received and defined by the Sacred Congregation of the Council in 1679 and 1680, he nevertheless says that MOST of the Doctors hold the contrary.

Hence two consequences. First, if the spouse who remained an infidel afterward comes to the faith and baptism before the other has entered a new matrimony, the latter is bound to receive the former and can be compelled to cohabit. Thus chapter Gaudemus 8, On Divorce; and Benedict XIV reports that this was again confirmed by the Sacred Congregation with the approval of the Pontiff on July 1, 1679, and April 13, 1680 (cited Canonical Question, no. 6). The reason is that the marriage, not yet dissolved, becomes ratified through the baptism of the other; indeed, it fully assumes the nature of a Sacrament, which, as has now been defined, cannot in Christian marriages be separated from the nature of a contract, just as when marriages are sanated in the root. Second, if the former marriage has already been dissolved through the new nuptials of the convert, it will be open also to the other party, for the bond of matrimony is indivisible, to enter other nuptials not only validly but also licitly, both if that party is converted to the faith and, as the more common opinion holds, even if the party perseveres in infidelity. - See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 19, nos. 32-33.

Since the opinion of the Doctors agrees that the converted spouse, if the other infidel refuses to cohabit, etc., can either make profession in Religion or receive sacred Orders, the marriage is restored anew in neither hypothesis even if the other is afterward converted, unless perhaps the former is still a novice or received only minor Orders. The reason is that through religious profession, and likewise through sacred Orders, a state incompatible with matrimony is assumed. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 19, no. 37; Sanchez, book 7, disputation 76, no. 6; De Justis, book 2, chapter 15, no. 40. Sanchez (l.c.) thinks that the same must be held if the convert emitted a vow of absolute chastity. And in the hypothesis of religious profession having been emitted, St. Bonaventure, Sanchez, etc., more truly affirm, as Maschat says (Institutes of Canon Law, book 4, title 19, no. 9), that the matrimony is dissolved; and the common opinion of the Theologians, as Sanchez says (l.c., no. 9), deduces this by similarity as follows. For if such force was granted by Christ to profession in Religion that it dissolves the bond of a ratified matrimony between the faithful, much more will it dissolve a matrimony consummated during infidelity, which is not ratified, from chapter Quanto 7, On Divorce. But in the hypothesis of only sacred Order having been received, or of a vow of absolute chastity having been emitted, since the bond of matrimony is not dissolved according to the common opinion, and since otherwise the spouse bound by these bonds cannot be restored without dispensation to the other spouse who may have converted, then, if the spouse first converted would not willingly admit dispensations and the other could live in the state of continence only with difficulty, it would be expedient to have recourse to a dispensation by which the Pontiff, as was said above, would break the bond of the prior matrimony.

[8] If, however, the party who entered Religion delays profession beyond what is reasonable, wandering from one Religion to another within the period of novitiate, the judge can assign a peremptory time so that the party either remain in some Religion and, after completing the novitiate there, make profession, or return to the spouse and consummate the matrimony. - Sanchez, book 2, disputation 24, no. 9.

[9] The danger of perversion has caused it to be the case that, although the infidel party consents to dwell peacefully with the faithful party, the infidel party is nevertheless sometimes not admitted to cohabitation unless also converted to the faith. In this matter Benedict XIV (On the Synod, book 13, chapter 21, no. 1) praises the opinion of Cabassutius, who, after Sanchez, concludes (Practice of Canon Law, part 3, chapter 23, no. 11) that the question must be determined from the circumstances of the cases and the customs of the regions.

Moreover, practice bears that in regions of infidels, for example, among the Chinese, Indians, etc., converts are permitted to cohabit with an infidel and also to pass to other nuptials according to the doctrine of Paul if the infidel either refuses to cohabit or does not consent to cohabit except with injury to the Creator. To this pertains chapter Gaudemus of Innocent III and the Declaration cited by Benedict XIV (l.c.). Among Christian nations, however, the practice has prevailed that cohabitation is not permitted with a party who obstinately adheres to an infidel sect, for example, the Jewish, although that party protests a willingness to cohabit peacefully. See Sanchez (book 7, disputation 73, no. 12), who rightly observes that in this case also those circumstances have place on account of which the Apostle taught that the convert can dismiss the infidel party and pass to other nuptials and is not to be obliged to lead a celibate life; for this, since it could be a grave yoke, could remove the convert from embracing the faith, indeed, contrary to the mind of the Apostle, would subject the convert to servitude under a matrimony contracted in infidelity. Concerning this Cabassutius (l.c.) writes of Jews living under pontifical dominion: Liberty is granted both to the converted spouse and to the obstinate spouse to bind themselves in other nuptials, but to the obstinate spouse not before the converted spouse has contracted another marriage.

The diversity of practice according to the diversity of places and circumstances is seen in the Decree of the Council of Lima (act 2, chapter 10), which Sixtus V confirmed by apostolic authority (in Pignatelli, Canonical Consultations, volume 4, consultation 189, final proposition). It reads thus: Concerning those who, joined in matrimony, are converted to the faith while the spouse still remains an infidel, provision was prudently made in the preceding Council that if the infidel shows a ready hope of conversion, the Christian should in no way pass to other nuptials, as is defined in the sacred Canons, but should await the gain of the spouse in Christ. But if the infidel delays conversion, yet is not pernicious to the baptized spouse by turning that spouse away from the faith or drawing that spouse into mortal sin, then the infidel is still to be awaited for a period of six months, being assiduously admonished meanwhile concerning conversion. But since both the danger to the recent convert must be guarded against, lest, if the infidel remains long in the bed, the convert perhaps lose the faith of Christ, and provision must be made for the convert's liberty, lest the convert be compelled to live celibate, therefore we decree that, after the space of six months has elapsed, the matter be referred to the Bishop, who, after the cause has been well examined, is to declare to the faithful party that there is the faculty of entering another matrimony.... But if he sees that there is no danger in cohabitation, he is to command the faithful party to await the infidel, or even to counsel cohabitation if he understands it to be profitable, according to the counsel of the Apostle Paul. For the same law cannot be fixed for all converts, since various circumstances certainly occur and the condition of all infidels is not the same.

Point II. On the Firmness of Matrimony Insofar as It Regards the Bed, and on Divorce from the Bed

760. Principles. - I. Spouses, by reason of the matrimonial bond, are bound to cohabit together and lead a common life. The reason is drawn from the very definition of matrimony.

II. Divorce, however, or separation from bed or habitation can take place for just causes while the conjugal bond nevertheless remains, so that neither party can enter another matrimony before the death of the other. This is declared by the Council of Trent, session 24, canon 8: If anyone shall say that the Church errs when, on account of many causes, she decrees that separation between spouses as regards the bed or habitation can take place for a determinate or indeterminate time, let him be anathema.

761. ∘ III. The causes which render a divorce of this kind honorable are: mutual consent, grave danger to the soul or body, and the adultery of either party. You will understand these causes for practice thus.

1. Mutual consent: namely, each spouse together can renounce the right proper to each as regards the bed, either for a time or in perpetuity, provided danger of incontinence is absent [1]. Likewise, they can be separated also as regards habitation, either temporarily for reasons of business, or perpetually because of a desire for a more perfect life [2].

[1] Laymann speaks well concerning this matter: On account of the danger of incontinence, it is not advisable for spouses to vow continence unless mature deliberation and long experience that both can easily be continent have been premised; and after the vow they ought to be separated as regards the bed (book 5, tract 10, part 3, chapter 7, nos. 1-2).

[2] This can happen in two ways: first, through the entrance of either or both spouses into Religion; second, through the reception of sacred Order by one and either religious profession or at least a vow of continence by the other.

As regards the first, if either spouse, with the consent of the other, embraces Religion - and for this to be done licitly the consent of the Bishop is required from chapter Si vir 23, cause 27, question 2 - the spouse left behind, if young or suspected of incontinence, must also enter Religion; but if old and in no way suspected of incontinence, that spouse must at least emit a vow of continence in the world, and can be compelled by the Bishop in a suitable manner to live honestly if perhaps the promises voluntarily made are not observed. But if either spouse makes profession in Religion against the will or without the knowledge of the other, the profession is invalid, even if they had perhaps previously emitted a vow of continence by common consent, and the professed spouse will be restored to the spouse left behind (chapter Quidem 3 and chapter Placet 12, On the Conversion of Spouses). Furthermore, unless perhaps in making profession that spouse was unwilling to vow continence except dependently upon the validity of the profession, the spouse will be bound by that law, cited chapter Quidem, which holds the profession at least as a vow of continence; hence that spouse can neither demand the debt nor pass to other nuptials after the death of the other spouse. See Schmalzgrueber, book 3, title 32, nos. 24-28.

As regards the second, a wife by whose consent the husband receives sacred Orders is bound by the same laws as a spouse left behind when the other professes religious vows, namely, either she also must enter Religion or, if advanced in age, etc., at least emit a vow of continence. Nevertheless, she would have to assume a religious habit, even if she were an old woman and every danger or suspicion of incontinence were absent, if the husband initiated into sacred Orders were perhaps assumed to the Episcopate, as chapter Sane 6, On the Conversion of Spouses, expressly has it. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 6, no. 38.

Although the vow of continence which wives left in the world emit in the aforesaid case is simple, and insofar as it is simple appears by its nature not to be a diriment impediment of matrimony, nevertheless it is certain among the Doctors, and expressly sanctioned in Canon law, that these women cannot validly enter another matrimony even after the death of the spouse initiated into sacred Orders; indeed, they teach that the same must be held even if the woman had not vowed continence when she gave her husband permission to receive sacred Orders. See Sanchez (book 7, disputation 40) and Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 6, nos. 40-42). I said after the death of the spouse initiated into sacred Orders, because if the husband, without having received sacred Orders, had merely made profession in Religion, the wife, notwithstanding the vow of continence, would marry another after his death illicitly indeed, but not invalidly.

2. Grave danger to the soul, if danger of perversion is present in one spouse because of the other; and grave danger to the body, if danger of life or mutilation threatens, or if cohabitation on the part of one toward the other becomes so burdensome that it is rendered morally impossible. This would happen if a spouse were compelled to suffer enormous or frequent cruelties.

3. The adultery of either party, namely, such that it is: first, certain [3]; second, voluntary, and not perpetrated through inflicted violence; third, not condoned either expressly or implicitly, for example, through the conjugal act [4]; fourth, not mutual, because compensation would then exist. This is evident from the words of Christ, Matthew 5:32: Whoever shall dismiss his wife, except for the cause of fornication, makes her commit adultery, etc. But if this is licit for the husband, by the same reason it must also be licit for the wife [5].

[3] Only moral certainty is required, as St. Alphonsus holds from the common opinion of the Doctors (book 6, no. 961). For the Doctors commonly observe that since carnal offenses are difficult to prove, witnesses are therefore not to be required for proving adultery, but conjectures are to be employed, and presumptions which they call violent suffice, by which a certain moral certainty is induced, namely, by which it can prudently be believed that the crime was perpetrated. Alexander III enumerates these presumptions in chapter Litteris 12, On Presumptions. Concerning these see, among others, Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 19, nos. 116-117).

[4] Understand this if the spouse knowingly and willingly exhibited services and signs of conjugal affection to the other spouse. For where only suspicion of adultery was present, the use of matrimony does not prejudice the innocent party; likewise, if while the suit is pending the judge commands that meanwhile the wife render the debt, or if the guilty husband compels the wife by grave fear to the use of matrimony.

[5] Observe that, according to the common opinion of the Doctors, under the name of adultery here comes every division of the flesh, although it does not have the nature of adultery properly so called, such as sodomy and bestiality. I said according to the common opinion, for through a mere typographical error in St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 960), Sanchez and Filliucius are exhibited as holding the contrary; and Pontius himself (On Matrimony, book 9, chapter 16, no. 5), although for a display of ingenuity he brought forward in opposition a petty argument which everyone despised, concluded that in practice one must not depart from the prior opinion, which, he says, is common among the Doctors.

The VV. observe here (page 806) that the typographical error spoken of in the Note is found not in the text of St. Alphonsus but in that of Hermann Busembaum; and this is most true. And indeed this error is seen not only in St. Alphonsus, that is, in the text of Hermann copied by St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 960; in the preceding edition, by an erroneous transposition, no. 690), but also in Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 401) and in most editions of Hermann Busembaum, which commonly have: Bonacina against Filliucius, Sanchez, Perez, when it ought rather to have been written: Bonacina, Filliucius, Sanchez against Perez, who in fact allowed himself to be carried away by the inept petty argument of Pontius (On Matrimony, disputation 56, section 2, nos. 3-4). Moreover, if the VV. desire anything to be corrected also in the text of St. Alphonsus (l.c., no. 962), in most editions they have Sanchez, book 16, disputation 4, no. 2, cited, when book 10, etc., ought to be written. Again, since St. Alphonsus, for the opinion denying, cites also Abulensis after Sanchez, it would not be useless to add from the same Sanchez (ibid., no. 3) that Abulensis, previously contrary to himself, passed once and again to the affirmative opinion.

The VV. add (l.c.): Father Ballerini testifies that Pontius, for a display of ingenuity, brings forward a petty argument which everyone despised. But St. Alphonsus himself, who relates and approves the same petty argument, must be excepted from this everyone; and although Father Ballerini judges that opinion of the Holy Doctor to be altogether despised, perhaps it may have some weight with others.

Reply. I deny that St. Alphonsus relates or approves the petty argument of Pontius. The reason according to Pontius (book 9, chapter 16, no. 5) is that, since division of the flesh among several persons is said in law to be a cause of divorce, this must be understood of that division which is according to natural use; and this is established because by that division bigamy and irregularity are induced in law. But no base union outside natural use induces bigamy and the irregularity arising from bigamy. Perez (l.c.) indeed copied this petty argument, but St. Alphonsus does not have even a word concerning it; and therefore he too despised it. And deservedly the Holy Doctor despised that reasoning, as though the reason and nature of division of the flesh were generally to be sought from bigamy which induces irregularity. For if a spouse commits adultery, as Pontius acknowledges, the spouse divides the flesh, yet does not thereby become a bigamist and irregular. Say the same of one who sins with two or even several women, who certainly divided the flesh and is not thereby held a bigamist. On the contrary, if someone marries a widow, he does not thereby divide his flesh, and yet is considered a bigamist and irregular, just as also if he marries a woman who has been corrupted. Therefore the division of the flesh from which the irregularity of bigamy arises is neither the sole division of the flesh nor every division of the flesh, but a certain manner of division of the flesh; and therefore it is a foul sophism to deduce the absence of division of the flesh from the absence of bigamy.

Moreover, Pontius himself suggests that these things appear to have been brought forward by him for mere display, when he concludes: But although, speculatively speaking, what I said appears so to me, nevertheless in practice I judge that one must not depart from the prior opinion, which is common among the Doctors. Hence it happened that others numbered him among the defenders of the common opinion, for example, Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 19, no. 103).

762. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is a husband, upon learning of his wife's adultery, bound to dismiss her?

Reply 1. It is certain that he is not bound by reason of the adultery, because divorce was conceded in favor of the innocent party, not as a punishment of that party. - Thus commonly the Theologians. - St. Ligorius, no. 965.

Reply 2. Sometimes the husband can be bound to dismiss an adulterous wife by reason of fraternal correction or of avoiding scandal [6]; but this case is rare, both because other means can be employed to correct the wife or avoid scandal, and because grave scandal to be feared from the separation can excuse [7]. Moreover, the wife, if cast out, would be exposed to greater danger, at least for the most part. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

[6] Namely, lest the innocent spouse appear to consent, or at least connive, at the crime of the other. Nevertheless, other means are available also for avoiding this scandal.

[7] A grave inconvenience can also excuse, for example, if the family would thereby be deprived of support, or the offspring of care and education, etc. If these things have force concerning the husband, a fortiori they have force concerning the wife, as St. Alphonsus observes with others (book 6, no. 964).

763. ○ QUESTION 2. Once divorce has taken place, can the innocent spouse compel the other to return?

Reply 1. Yes, if there is question of a non-juridical separation, because this is not confirmed by a sentence of the judge.

Reply 2. More probably, yes, even in the case itself of juridical separation. The reason is that a sentence of juridical separation is rendered in favor of the innocent party and therefore does not remove the right of recalling the other; nor is a new sentence of the judge needed for this [8]. Nevertheless, an adulterous woman is not to be compelled to return whenever she can reasonably fear that she will be treated harshly, bitterly, or even cruelly. - St. Ligorius, ibid., etc.

[8] It must be observed that although, according to common doctrine, the innocent party after juridical divorce has taken place can enter Religion or receive sacred Orders even against the will of the adulterous party, nevertheless this is not conceded to the adulterer who has been dismissed. Therefore the latter can neither enter Religion nor be initiated into sacred Orders unless the innocent party consents either tacitly or expressly or has already undertaken an irrevocable state; and if the adulterer should enter Religion, the adulterer could be recalled by the innocent party even after profession. Sanchez, book 10, disputation 10, nos. 12-13. St. Alphonsus, however, observes with Sanchez (l.c., no. 14) that even tacit consent suffices for this, namely, if the innocent party knows this and does not contradict when able; yet in that case the innocent party is bound neither to enter Religion nor to bind himself or herself by a vow of chastity. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 19, nos. 124-126. St. Alphonsus (l.c.), after Sanchez (l.c., no. 16), concedes the same to the guilty party when the innocent party, having been asked, was unwilling to admit reconciliation, or even if the innocent party has not recalled the guilty party after two years have already elapsed.

QUESTION 3. After juridical separation because of adultery has taken place, is the innocent spouse bound to return to the other party recalling him if he himself afterward fell?

Reply. More probably, no. The reason is that the first adulterer was already altogether despoiled by the sentence of the judge of every right toward the innocent party. - St. Ligorius, no. 967 [9].

[9] Although St. Alphonsus calls this opinion much more probable, others, especially Canonists, such as Fagnanus, Reiffenstuel, Gonzalez, Schmalzgrueber, etc., and with them Barbosa, Koning, etc., hold the opposite opinion to be truer. Nor must it be omitted that St. Thomas (In IV Sentences, distinction 35, question 1, article 6, reply to objection 4), although he says that the man previously innocent ought not, according to the rigor of law, to be compelled to receive the adulterous woman, adds nevertheless that, according to the equity of law, the judge by virtue of his office ought to compel him so that he may guard against danger to his own soul and scandal to others.

764. ○ QUESTION 4. Can divorce take place by private authority?

Reply 1. Yes, as regards the bed, if a just cause is present, as was said above, and especially by reason of adultery, because the rights of matrimony can be denied perpetually to the unfaithful spouse [10].

[10] This has force although the crime is occult; and even if, because proofs were lacking, the innocent party were compelled by an ecclesiastical judge to render the debt, nevertheless that party would not be bound to obey a sentence of this kind, which rested upon a false hypothesis. See Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 10, disputation 12, no. 34).

Reply 2. As regards habitation: first, yes, by reason of adultery, even if the crime is occult, at least more probably, because Christ, in permitting divorce for this cause, did not distinguish between public and private adultery. But for this it is required that the crime be certain and that no scandal arise from the separation which cannot otherwise be repaired [11]. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 969. Several nevertheless say that divorce on account of occult adultery is not licit, because it is not licit to expose the reputation of the adulterer. Second, yes, also by reason of danger either to the soul or to the body, provided that danger is very grave. But in practice it is expedient that the counsel of a prudent man, especially a Confessor, be sought. The Confessor, however, must proceed very cautiously in this matter. Let him beware lest he too readily believe the complaints of wives against their husbands; and let him endeavor to restrain them and, insofar as it can be done, turn them away from divorce.

[11] But scandal of this kind can scarcely be absent unless the marriage itself is occult; and therefore, outside this case, on account of scandal he could not dismiss the spouse even in the forum of conscience. And if he dismisses the spouse while proofs are lacking, he would have to be compelled to receive the spouse, lest an occasion be given to the malice of men to vex a perhaps innocent spouse by a dismissal of this kind.

Chapter IV. On the Matter and Form of Matrimony

765. ○ I. The remote matter of the Sacrament of Matrimony is the bodies of the spouses to be mutually handed over in the matrimonial contract.

The proximate matter, however, is the handing over itself of the bodies, which is perfected through words or signs expressing consent. - Thus commonly the Theologians.

There are some who constituted the proximate matter in the imposition of the hands of the Priest; but this opinion is altogether without foundation and must be rejected as obsolete [1].

[1] This question has now been defined. For after it is established that there is no matrimony among Christians which is not a Sacrament, and that marriages which may be celebrated without a priest in places where the Tridentine Decree concerning the form of matrimony does not have force must be held valid, it is manifest that neither the imposition of hands nor anything else furnished by the priest pertains in any way to the matter of the Sacrament. Therefore that opinion also is altogether obsolete which placed the form of matrimony in words pronounced by the Priest. See below, no. 768.

766. ○ II. The form consists in the mutual acceptance of the contracting parties expressed in words or signs. - Thus likewise more commonly.

But in what manner does the consent, or contract, of the contracting parties expressed in words or signs constitute the form of the Sacrament, since it is also found in the matter? It must be said that the contract, or consent, of the spouses is found both in the matter and in the form of the Sacrament of Matrimony, but under a different respect. It is in the matter insofar as it expresses the mutual handing over of the power of one to the other; but it is in the form insofar as it signifies acceptance of this handing over. Or, as others explain, the words and signs of the spouses in contracting are at once matter and form: they are matter insofar as they express the handing over of the bodies; they are form insofar as they exhibit acceptance of the handing over. - Thus commonly.

Whatever may be the case, in practice no inconvenience is to be feared, provided that in celebrating the contract the form prescribed by the Church is observed. - See what is to be said in the following chapter concerning the minister of the Sacrament of Matrimony.

Chapter V. On the Minister and Subject of Matrimony

Article I. On the Minister

767. ○ I. It is certain that for the validity of matrimony the presence of the Pastor or his delegate is required wherever the Decree of the Council of Trent concerning clandestine marriages has been promulgated. - See what is to be said concerning the impediment of clandestinity, no. 836.

II. Even if this Tridentine Decree was not promulgated somewhere, nevertheless it is certain: first, that the Church always wished a Priest deputed for this to assist at the marriages of the faithful; second, that the Pastor cannot omit his assistance at the nuptials of the faithful and is bound to impart the blessing according to the rite received in the proper place; third, that the faithful who enter matrimony clandestinely sin gravely. This is proved from the Council of Trent, session 24, On the Reformation of Matrimony, chapter 1, etc.

768. ○ III. Today, whatever some previously said according to an obsolete opinion, it is also certain that the ministers of matrimony are the contracting parties themselves. The reasons upon which this doctrine rests are: first, because Eugene IV, wishing to hand down sound doctrine concerning the Sacraments in the Decree to the Armenians, established thus: The efficient cause of matrimony regularly is mutual consent expressed by words concerning the present. Nor must it be doubted that those words, the efficient cause of matrimony, regard Matrimony as a Sacrament, since the seven Sacraments are explained expressly in that Decree. Second, because the Council of Trent, session 24, On Reformation, chapter 1, declares that clandestine marriages were true and ratified, by which words Theologians and Canonists then expressed Sacraments in the strict sense. Third, because from the recent Declaration of Pius IX, to be reported at nos. 792 and 793, it is established that matrimony can never exist among the faithful without the Sacrament. Hence thus: clandestine marriages, according to the Council of Trent, are valid in places where the Decree by which they are invalidated was not promulgated; but otherwise they cannot be valid without the Sacrament; therefore the Sacrament of Matrimony is given even if it is not conferred by a Priest; therefore the Priest is not the minister of the Sacrament. - See St. Ligorius, no. 897.

769. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can the Pastor assist at the matrimony of those who are public sinners?

Reply 1. St. Ligorius, book 6, no. 54, with others, denies it. The reason is: first, because by natural law no one without a grave and proportionate cause can cooperate in the sin of another, even materially, although the other has already consummated the sin internally; second, because the publicly unworthy are not to be admitted to the Sacraments.

Others, however, affirm more correctly, although the Pastor ought to endeavor that they contract worthily. The reason is that the Pastor is not the minister of the Sacrament, nor does he confer it, but only assists as a witness or public notary, whose office is not to examine the merits of the contracting parties, but to make faith and testify to the things which he sees. - Lugo, On the Sacraments, disputation 8, no. 216 and following. - Thus commonly, as St. Ligorius himself acknowledges, no. 54.

Reply 2. Even according to the first opinion, he can sometimes assist at such a matrimony, namely, where a very grave reason urges which is in some way proportionate to the evil permitted in the profanation of the Sacrament, etc.; for example, if the Pastor were compelled by fear of death or of an almost equal evil [1], or if grave evils threatened the community, or if the spouses were already united civilly, as commonly happens in France, when civil matrimony must precede ecclesiastical matrimony. For a greater evil and greater scandal would follow from fornicatory cohabitation. - St. Ligorius, Bouvier, etc. - The difficulty would be less if one of the spouses were innocent or changed to a better life, because the Pastor could then assist at the matrimony in favor of the innocent party. Indeed, no difficulty would remain if the spouses were living in concubinage, for then both the scandal and the occasion of sin would be removed through the matrimony.

[1] The Authors of this opinion appear to require too much. For the obligation which could be conceived of preventing the sin of the contracting parties, since it is an obligation of charity, does not require so grave an inconvenience for someone to be excused from it. Lugo well observes (On the Sacraments, disputation 8, no. 219) that the cooperation is very material and inculpable for a Pastor who cannot deny his assistance, which he owes as a public minister; just as neither a public notary nor a judge can deny the authority of his office to any legitimate contract, although the contracting parties sin in the contract itself from a depraved intention; and just as a wife does not sin by rendering the conjugal debt to a husband seeking it contrary to the vow of chastity which he has, so neither does the Pastor sin by assisting, because he renders that which he owes from his office and which he cannot deny without grave inconvenience.

And these things are most validly confirmed from what the Doctors hand down where they ask: whether the spouse himself, insofar as minister of the Sacrament, sins mortally by contracting matrimony with a sinner. For, as the same Lugo says (ibid., no. 226): No one has yet cast such a scruple upon Catholic persons, that they cannot freely contract matrimony with sinners, nor does any Theologian oblige a woman to repel a suitor and deny matrimonial consent so long as he is in the state of sin; but each is bound to place himself in grace and leaves the other party to that party's own conscience, as is evident from the use of all the faithful. See other proofs in the same de Lugo (ibid., nos. 227-229), who nevertheless observes (ibid., no. 219) that if the Pastor could easily admonish the petitioner and remove him from that unworthy reception of the Sacrament, he ought indeed to do so by the law of charity; but he cannot withdraw the assistance owed from one who persists and wishes to contract matrimony.

The VV. observe (page 947 in the Notes) that St. Alphonsus does not acknowledge the affirmative opinion to be common, as is attributed to him in the text of Gury. For the Holy Doctor said this of those who were unworthy by reason of an occult sin or censure. Reply. This is true; nevertheless, it will not prevent that opinion from being called more common with Croix (book 6, part 1, no. 147), and from being admitted in practice not only because of the authority of the Doctors but also because the reasons brought forward in St. Alphonsus against it plainly do not establish the matter.

770. ○ QUESTION 2. Can the nuptial blessing be separated from the celebration of Mass?

Reply. It must be denied. For the Sacred Congregation of Rites was asked: Whether it is licit to retain the custom prevailing in several places of celebrating matrimony in the afternoon and at the same time thus giving the nuptial blessing outside Mass, even in a prohibited time with permission of the Ordinary, since there is scarcely any hope of compelling the faithful either to change the time of the celebration of matrimony or to supply the blessing? The reply was: Let the Roman Ritual be observed (September 7, 1850, in Rupellen., reply 6). Moreover, according to the Roman Ritual, the conjugal blessing cannot take place except during the celebration of Mass. This is confirmed by another Decision of the Sacred Congregation of Rites on June 23, 1853, in Limburg. Nevertheless, the Priest is not bound to apply the Mass for the spouses unless he receives an alms from them. Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, September 1, 1841. But the Mass assigned for nuptials is to be said even if it is not applied for the spouses.

Moreover, the nuptial Mass is to be said on all days except Sundays, feasts of precept, Doubles of the first or second class, and the Vigil of Pentecost, but without the Gloria and Credo. On the days, however, on which the Mass For the Bridegroom and Bride cannot be said, a Commemoration from that Mass is to be added. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, March 3, 1818, and April 20, 1822.

But when nuptials are celebrated in the season of Advent or Lent, no commemoration for the spouses is to be made in the Mass through the Collect, Secret, and Postcommunion; nor is it licit to recite the Prayers placed in the Missal after the Lord's Prayer and Ite, Missa est; nor are the same Prayers to be recited outside Mass after the prohibited time has elapsed. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, August 31, 1839.

Furthermore, if the woman is a widow, not only must the nuptial blessing be omitted but also the proper Mass for the bridegroom and bride. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, March 3, 1761.

Finally, the custom of extending a white veil over the spouses is prohibited and reproved. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, September 7, 1850, in Rupellen.

771. ◦ QUESTION 3. What must the Pastor do if the spouses are already in the Church to contract matrimony and he discovers from their confession that an impediment is present?

Reply 1. If the nuptials cannot be deferred without danger of infamy or other most grave inconveniences, and the penitent is in invincible ignorance of the impediment, the admonition must be omitted and the celebration of the matrimony permitted until a dispensation is obtained. - St. Ligorius, no. 613. Reply 2. If the penitent is in vincible ignorance, or if he openly knows the impediment, and the matrimony cannot be deferred without infamy or scandal, not even for obtaining a dispensation from the Bishop, then the difficulty is very great. According to St. Ligorius, ibid., and others, the Confessor or Pastor could declare that the law of the Church concerning impediments does not bind in such great straits and proceed to the celebration of the matrimony. Nevertheless, as soon as possible, at least as a precaution, he ought to seek a dispensation. According to others, a simulation of the matrimonial contract could be permitted, with the purpose of seeking a dispensation from the impediment as soon as possible. But the impediment cannot, they say, cease naturally; for an invalidating law never ceases because of a particular inconvenience, whatever it may be. Whenever the Bishop can be approached, however, he must be approached, because according to the common opinion he can dispense from ecclesiastical impediments in that case. - St. Ligorius, no. 613.

Every difficulty would cease in practice if the Bishop obtained from the Holy See the faculty of delegating Priests laboring in the care of souls, so that they might be able to dispense in extraordinary and urgent cases of this kind.

Article II. On the Subject of Matrimony

772. Principles. - I. The subject of the Sacrament of Matrimony is every baptized person laboring under no impediment, whether natural, divine, or canonical.

I said, first, every baptized person, for unbaptized persons are not capable of the Sacraments of the Church, as is evident. I said, second, laboring under no impediment, for although of himself every baptized person is a subject capable of the Sacrament of Matrimony, nevertheless, per accidens, many are prevented from contracting matrimony validly because of various impediments of natural, divine, or ecclesiastical law, as will be said below in its proper place, no. 794.

Hence, first, the matrimony of infidels, although it can be valid under the nature of a contract, nevertheless is not a Sacrament. Indeed, a faithful person contracting matrimony with an infidel, even with a dispensation of the Pope, according to the common opinion against a few [1], will not receive the Sacrament. For the sign of the union of Christ with the Church, which confers sacramental grace, consists neither in the union of the man nor in the union of the woman, but in the union of both.

[1] Let the studious reader choose the opinion more pleasing to him, since eminent Theologians and Doctors fight for each. Thus Clericatus (On Matrimony, decision 4, no. 25). For the affirmative opinion, that it becomes a Sacrament for the faithful party, among others are Andrew Vega, a Tridentine theologian, and Ferraris, who (Canonical Library, word Matrimony, article 1, no. 19) diligently defends it and cites others for it. But the reason added by the Author for the negative opinion is of little weight, both because the essence of a Sacrament is that it signify the grace which it confers, and because from the most frequent doctrine of the Fathers the signification of the union of Christ with the Church was found even in matrimony before the evangelical law. But these things contribute little to practice.

Second, heretics and schismatics who, in entering matrimony, accurately and completely observe the laws [2] of the Church contract validly and are fortified by the Sacrament, since there is nothing which can obstruct the validity of this Sacrament. The practice of the Church itself confirms this, for she in no way compels them either to renew consent or to receive the nuptial blessing if, returning to their senses, they return to the unity of the Catholic Church. - Thus all.

[2] Understand the laws which pertain to the substance of the matter, among which is not the nuptial blessing which the Author soon mentions.

773. ◦ II. Spouses contracting matrimony ought to be in the state of grace, because matrimony is a Sacrament of the living. Those who contract while defiled by mortal sin become guilty of sacrilege and do not receive the sacramental graces necessary to spouses. Probably, however, those graces are only suspended and, when the obstacle or mortal sin is removed, are applied to the soul, as we said when treating the Sacraments in general, no. 232. For practice, if no fruit is hoped from an admonition, it will almost be better not to admonish the unworthy person concerning the sacrilege of approaching unworthily, so that at least in this way he may sin less; and he should rather be induced at least to approach confession as soon as possible.

774. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Ought the Pastor to require that confession precede matrimony, or that a certificate of confession be exhibited by the spouses?

Reply 1. He cannot require this absolutely of himself unless a law or precept of the Bishop establishes it. The reason is that although the state of grace is required for receiving this Sacrament, confession is nevertheless not necessarily required, since contrition can absolutely suffice even for those who are in the state of mortal sin. Moreover, it is generally not known to the Pastor that the spouses are not in the state of grace.

Reply 2. Where a particular law exists, as in many places, the Pastor must require confession or at least testimony of it. Nevertheless, cases can sometimes occur in which this law appears to admit an exception, as if the matrimony has already been contracted civilly and one party exhibits the required testimony of confession, etc. Moreover, if the spouse is not a public sinner and his unworthiness is not established, even less grave reasons can suffice. But for circumstances of this kind, it is more advisable that the Pastor learn from the Bishop himself how he ought generally to conduct himself.

775. ◦ QUESTION 2. Is it licit to enter matrimony with a public sinner?

Reply. Yes, if the person cannot withdraw from the matrimony without inconvenience. - Thus more commonly. For although the contracting parties confect the Sacrament, they nevertheless are not ministers deputed to this.

For the same reason, a Catholic woman who has grave reasons, for example, because of the circumstances of families or other motives of great weight, for entering matrimony with a heretic does not sin by contracting it, although she in some way supplies matter of sin to the other; but a dispensation must first be sought, as will be said below.

See many other things concerning the subject of matrimony in the following chapter, where the impediments of matrimony are treated.

Chapter VI. On the Impediments of Matrimony

Laws establishing impediments of matrimony are of two kinds: some are only prohibiting, while others are invalidating. Impediments of the former kind merely render matrimony illicit; the latter also render it invalid. For these directly and primarily affect the matrimonial contract itself and render it null and invalid because of the absence of a condition absolutely required for valid contracting. - Hence there is a twofold article.

Article I. On Impediments Impeding Matrimony

776. ○ Formerly six impediments merely impeding matrimony were enumerated and contained in these verses:

> The prohibition of the Church, and also the time of holy days, And catechism, crime, betrothals, vow.

But the impediments of catechism and crime are now held as obsolete by the consensus of all Theologians and Canonists. The impediment of catechism was contracted by one who answered for an infant when the ceremonies were supplied after baptism conferred in necessity. For from the old law there arose from this a certain spiritual relationship, no differently than for a baptismal sponsor, which constituted an impeding impediment in the same degrees as with the sponsor of Baptism and Confirmation. But according to the common opinion - see Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 11, no. 67; Giraldi on chapter 5 of the same title; Barbosa, Collections on chapter Contracto 5, On Spiritual Relationship, no. 3, etc. - it passed into desuetude. Indeed, Gonzalez, on chapter Contracto 5, On Spiritual Relationship, brings forward two Declarations of the Sacred Congregation concerning this matter.

The impediment of crime, however, was a certain penalty imposed by the old law for certain graver crimes, by which the guilty party was prohibited from contracting any matrimony with any person, either altogether if celibate, or after the death of the spouse if married. Crimes of this kind were: first, incest [1]; second, the abduction of another's betrothed woman in order to disturb another's marriage, and also the consent of the betrothed woman to the same abduction; third, the killing of one's wife perpetrated unjustly and by private authority; fourth, presbytericide, that is, the unjust killing of a priest; fifth, the malicious receiving of one's own offspring from baptism, namely, in order to impede the rendering of the debt; sixth, public penance for as long as it continued; seventh, an attempted matrimony with a nun; > Incest, abduction of a betrothed woman, death of a woman [or: womanly death],

> The receiving of one's own offspring, priestly death, Or if one does solemn penance, or takes a nun, These prohibit a marriage from being joined.

[1] The other matters having been passed over, it will not be useless, indeed it will be altogether advantageous, to add some things concerning the impediment of incest, the forgetfulness of which appears to have poured no small darkness upon certain questions of grave importance among more recent writers.

First, the Doctors do not agree how far the signification of incest extends when there is question of the penalty inflicted upon incestuous persons by the sacred Canons, namely, the impediment to marrying. I now pass over that most, against others, establish that intercourse which occurred between persons joined only by legal or spiritual relationship is not comprehended by this law. But it is further disputed whether this penalty also affects incest committed with a person related by consanguinity, or only with a person related by affinity. Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 13, nos. 27-29), with St. Thomas, St. Antoninus, Turrecremata, Sanchez, Laymann, etc., maintains that the opinion which denies that the penalty extends to incest with one's own blood relative is to be preferred. The reason, he says, is that incestuous persons of this kind are nowhere expressly prevented from contracting marriages. For the texts alleged to the contrary speak only either of incest with a blood relative of one's wife or betrothed, or indeed of incest committed with one's own blood relative, but from whose company the delinquent, having been admonished to desist, did not obey ecclesiastical power. Hence, since those laws are penal, the incapacity for contracting matrimony with another established by those laws as a punishment for delinquents of this kind ought not be extended to incest committed with one's own blood relative without contumacy and contempt of ecclesiastical power. You will find the same defended by Pirhing (book 4, title 13, no. 7), Engel (book 4, title 13, no. 3), and Bonacina (On Matrimony, question 3, point 14, no. 10), who also cite several others.

It is likewise disputed among the Doctors what degree the incest must reach for the aforesaid penalty to be incurred. Thesaurus indeed (On Ecclesiastical Penalties, part 2, word Penalties of Incest, nos. 5-6), although he acknowledges that several Doctors held otherwise, nevertheless contends according to the more probable opinion that the penalty extends to every incestuous intercourse even without the appearance of matrimony. For this matter he does not hesitate to cite chapter 5, On the Reformation of Matrimony, session 24 of the Council of Trent, which in fact pertains nothing to this; just as he also invokes Sanchez with Gutierrez and Garcia, who have nothing of this kind in the places indicated by him. Indeed Garcia (On Benefices, part 8, chapter 3, no. 34) openly hands down the opposite. Moreover, Schmalzgrueber (l.c., nos. 8-9), bringing forward a lengthy catalogue of Canonists, establishes to the contrary that the penalty is incurred no further than the first or second degree. Indeed, Pichler (book 4, title 1, no. 92) attributes this effect only to incest in the first degree, so that thereafter no matrimony can be contracted licitly.

But what is especially important to observe here is that from this the true origin and reason are disclosed to us for the practice which prescribes that the circumstance of incest must not be left unmentioned whenever a dispensation is sought for contracting matrimony between persons related by affinity or consanguinity. From this it will also manifestly be evident why this dispensation was held subreptitious if that circumstance had been suppressed in silence.

Let us now omit certain few more recent writers who, appearing altogether ignorant of the reason for this controversy, seek the reason why incest must necessarily be expressed in the fact that this circumstance renders the Pontiff more difficult in dispensing and brings with it a greater composition. Vincent de Justis excellently replies to them (On Dispensations, book 1, chapter 4, no. 322) that so far is the Pontiff from being rendered more difficult in dispensing by the expression of intercourse of this kind, when it was had not from fraud but from human frailty, that it should rather be said that by the aforesaid expression he is more easily moved, in view of the probable and almost certain consequence of scandals which, because of the aforesaid preceding intercourse, could probably arise from denial of the dispensation, as Pontius, Cevallos, Escobar, Rodriguez, Diana, etc., well observe. And thus we see that in the nearer degrees, namely, within the second, in which the causes of narrowness of place, defect of dowry, and other similar causes are regularly not admitted, nevertheless in those nearer degrees - although in them the Council of Trent prohibits dispensation except among great princes and for a public cause - if intercourse is expressed together with the defamation of the woman and the consequent danger that she will remain unmarried and that grave scandals can probably arise unless matrimony is contracted between the petitioners themselves, the Pope dispenses not only with illustrious persons and princes, but also with others of the lowest condition. Indeed, it is singular that when intercourse is expressed every other cause ceases, as Pyrrhus Corradus observes (book 8, chapter 5, no. 58), where he testifies that this is observed according to the style of the Curia.

Others think the reason is found in the fact that where the circumstance of incest is expressed, a greater composition is imposed. Hence Father de Carboneano writes truly childishly (Appendix I to chapter 3, On Matrimony, Antoine): The Pope never intends to dispense with prejudice to a third party; but if the intercourse is not expressed, prejudice is done to a third party, namely, to officials of the Curia, who by its suppression are defrauded of the fee to which they have a right. The same de Justis had already replied to this absurd reason (l.c., no. 326): Although the expression of intercourse is the cause why a greater composition is required, nevertheless this does not pertain to the motive cause, but is imposed as a punishment for the incestuous intercourse, the absolution of which is accustomed to be committed to the delegate together with the dispensation concerning the impediment. For although incest is not an impediment reserved to the Pontiff, nevertheless, because the petitioners state that they committed it and seek absolution from him, the Pope as a punishment of the incest afflicts the petitioners with greater expense and penances, because incest is truly a most grave crime and worthy of a grave punishment.

Nor do certain others explain the reason for this practice more aptly, who sing this one thing in unison, that the expression of that circumstance is demanded by the style of the Curia. For even if it be granted, which several deny, that this is in fact required by the style of the Curia in such a way as to produce an obligation, nevertheless no one is ignorant that the style of the Curia and the forms to be observed both in petitioning for and granting dispensations were introduced by some law which governs either the special subject matter or the general nature of dispensations. Therefore, in reality, these men say nothing; for the reason why a practice of this kind was introduced into the style of the Curia still remains to be sought.

Nor is it difficult to find this reason, if it is sought among Theologians and Canonists rather than in compendia of doctrine or of daily practice, especially the more recent. You will find that the truest, manifest reason founded in law for the necessity of expressing intercourse is taken from the fact that incest is an impediment of matrimony, although not diriment but merely impeding. But the defect of subreption which renders invalid a dispensation concerning an impediment of affinity or consanguinity arises from that general principle that, where several impediments intervene, a dispensation is held subreptitious if one of them is suppressed in silence in the petition. Therefore, the dispensation is invalid if the circumstance of incest is kept silent.

Thus, therefore, to touch upon those who are cited by Barbosa for this doctrine (Canonical Votes, book 2, volume 17, no. 57), Friar Sarmiento gives the reason in Barbosa:

Because an incestuous person is prohibited from contracting matrimony. Peter Ochagavia (On Matrimony, tract 4, question 11, no. 4): The survivor, namely, the incestuous person, cannot pass to another matrimony. Peter de Ledesma (On Matrimony, question 56, article 4, doubt 2, difficulty 2): Because there are two impediments. John Gutierrez (Canonical Questions, book 1, chapter 15, no. 5): There appear to be two impediments, the one of consanguinity, the other of incest. Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 8, disputation 23, no. 7): I said that it is necessary for each impediment to be declared. Nicholas Garcias (On Benefices, part 8, chapter 3, no. 54): The unmentioned impediment increases the expressed one; it is necessary to make mention of each. Paul Comitulus (Moral Responses, book 1, question 104, no. 2): A double impediment is much greater than one which is simple. Reginaldus (Practice of the Forum of Penance, book 31, no. 200): If there are several impediments, all must be narrated; and thence he concludes that they ought to express their incest. Filliucius (tract 10, no. 337) denies that several acts of intercourse must be expressed in the case, because from all incestuous acts only one impediment arises. And Bonacina says to the same matter (On Law, disputation 1, question 2, point 5, no. 4): Because a new impediment, namely, besides the same one already expressed, is not induced through subsequent intercourse. Anthony Sanctarellus (Various Resolutions, question 52, no. 2): It is prohibited in law that incestuous persons contract matrimony; therefore it was introduced with the best right into the style of the Curia that those wishing to contract ought to make mention of the intercourse. Rodriguez (Summa, chapter 238, conclusion 7): Mention must be made in the supplication of both impediments, namely, consanguinity or affinity, and incest. The Salmanticenses Compendium (tract 34, no. 299): The intercourse must be disclosed, like the other occult offenses which induce some impediment. Verani (Canon Law, book 4, title 1, part 5, section 16, no. 89): Because incest is an impediment, it must therefore be expressed. He had premised, however (ibid., no. 4), that a dispensation is subreptitious even when one impediment is diriment and the other only impeding; for the dispensation is also subreptitious unless each impediment is expressed. To these let Marcus Paulus Leo be added, who published a work at Rome in 1644 with the title Practice Concerning the Letters of the Major Penitentiary and the Office of the Sacred Apostolic Penitentiary. For he writes (part 2, page 310): The reason appears to be that when two impediments coincide, the unmentioned impediment increases the expressed one concerning which dispensation is granted, and therefore it is necessary to make mention of each; otherwise the dispensation is null.

Finally, lest by empty labor we gather other witnesses here, it will suffice to heap upon the testimonies cited a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council which nearly all either transcribe from Rebellus or certainly cite, and which is read thus in Garcia (Canonical Questions, part 8, chapter 3, no. 66) and Pyrrhus Corradus (Apostolic Dispensations, book 8, chapter 1, no. 38): The Congregation of Cardinals judged a dispensation subreptitious if carnal intercourse had preceded between blood relatives or relatives by affinity, of which they made no mention in the supplication, because such blood relatives or relatives by affinity were rendered incapable of contracting matrimony through this carnal intercourse, from the fact that they are said to have committed incest, which impedes incestuous persons from contracting matrimony; therefore, for the validity of the dispensation concerning a prohibited degree, the expression of carnal intercourse is necessary by law, as the style of the Curia observes. From this declaration, as is evident, three things are clearly confirmed for our matter: first, that the expression of the intercourse was held necessary for this reason, that since incest was an impediment of matrimony, a dispensation was needed to contract it licitly; second, that for this reason the dispensation was held subreptitious and therefore null, when mention of the committed incest was not made in its petition, eighth, finally, the killing of one's own offspring. We read that these impediments were expressed in the following verses: because, when two impediments to contracting matrimony intervened, only one was expressed while the other was left unmentioned; third, that the style of the Curia, when it requires the expression of incest and holds a dispensation subreptitious if mention of it was omitted, rests altogether upon these principles and laws.

But if the matter stands thus, how could it have happened that very many and most weighty Authors, a list of whom can be seen in de Justis (On Matrimonial Dispensations, book 1, chapter 4, no. 279), and to whom others can easily be added, denied the necessity of expressing this circumstance and therefore defended the dispensation as valid even if the same circumstance had been omitted in silence from the petition? Again, how could it happen that although the opinion handed down above is supported by such certain and manifest law, it is nevertheless proposed even by its patrons almost only as more probable, truer, or safer?

The solution of this doubt is not difficult, first if those things are observed which Navarrus has in his Manual, chapter 22, no. 74: Because, he says, there was a great dispute in the sacred tribunal of the Penitentiary concerning the impediment of incest, when the most illustrious Cardinal Alciatus presided over it as Supreme Penitentiary with the greatest prudence and marvelous dexterity, and was most renowned for his encyclopedic knowledge of all disciplines, whether every incest produced this impediment, I substitute for the things which I said elsewhere here: First, nearly all experts of divine and human law strictly and properly call only intercourse with a blood relative or relative by affinity in a prohibited degree incest.... Second, all agree that from every incest there arises an impeding and diriment impediment of affinity. Third, all also agree that from incest committed with a relative by affinity during matrimony there arises an impediment impeding the contracting of matrimony with any other person.... Fourth, nearly all theologians hold that from incest with a blood relative there indeed arises an impediment of affinity, but no other impediment, whether it is committed before or after matrimony has been contracted; among these are St. Thomas, Soto, St. Antoninus, Sylvester, whom Covarruvias also follows. Therefore, if nearly all Theologians taught that this impeding impediment of incest did not arise except from incest with a relative by affinity during matrimony, what wonder if in other cases of incest they denied that a dispensation had to be sought, and therefore denied that the circumstance of incest had to be expressed in seeking a dispensation concerning an impediment of consanguinity?

But there is added a point of greater importance, which Navarrus himself also has (Consultations, IX, On Consanguinity and Affinity, no. 5), namely, that an impediment of this kind, according to Paludanus, whom St. Antoninus follows, appears to have been abrogated by custom, whom we believe. For if the impediment of incest can in fact be held as abrogated by custom, while the reason for expressing the circumstance of incest in the petition for dispensation flowed solely, as we showed, from the fact that incest induced another impediment, it is manifest that by that very fact the necessity of expressing this circumstance also altogether ceases. And again, when this impediment has been abrogated, there no longer stand two impediments - namely, consanguinity or affinity, and incest - against a matrimony to be contracted between incestuous blood relatives or relatives by affinity, but only the first of these. By that very fact, therefore, the reason collapses on account of which, as we have

Therefore the whole controversy is finally reduced to whether this impediment must in fact be considered abrogated. Moreover, no one can deny that in this matter there is now a unanimous and certain opinion of Theologians and Canonists that those two among the merely impeding impediments, namely, catechism and crime, have altogether ceased through custom. To take account only of more recent Authors, thus Babenstuber (tract 8, part 7, disputation 3, article 1, no. 5): All these impediments of crime have been abrogated through non-use, as the Authors most commonly teach and the practice of the Churches proves.

Billuart (On Matrimony, dissertation 6, article 1): Several impeding impediments formerly arose from crime, but these, like Catechism, have been abrogated by desuetude.

Cardinal Gotti (On Matrimony, question 8, doubt 1, no. 11): Several of the aforesaid impediments no longer have force, but have been removed by contrary custom.

Roncaglia (tract 21, chapter 2, question 1): From long-standing custom, very many crimes concerning which one reads everywhere among the Theologians are no longer considered as impeding matrimony.

Wigandt (tract 16, examination 5, no. 53): These impediments, according to the more common opinion, are no longer in use.

Marcus Struggl (tract 12, question 3, article 1, no. 6): These impediments of crime, like the impediment of Catechism, were long ago abrogated by non-use and the contrary practice of the Church.

Viva (On Matrimony, question 5, article 11, no. 2): Sanchez, Laymann, Ledesma, etc., teach that the impediment of crime has already been removed through non-use.

The Salmanticenses (tract 9, chapter 15, no. 15): Excepting interdict, vow, and betrothals, the remaining impediments are no longer in use but have been removed by custom.

Ferraris (word Impediment, no. 10): Of the six assigned impediments, since two no longer have force, namely, the impediment of crime having already been abrogated by long desuetude, hence there are four, etc.

Sporer (Sacramental Theology, part 4, chapter 1, no. 146): But all these impediments of crime have been removed by long desuetude according to the most common opinion of the Doctors and the practice of all the Churches.

Giribaldi (tract 10, chapter 17, no. 18): The Doctors commonly testify that these impediments which arise from crime no longer bind but have passed into desuetude; and Navarrus, in the Manual which he dedicated to Gregory XIII when already ninety years old, says that he had never heard that a dispensation concerning such an impediment of crime had been sought.

Holzmann (On Matrimony, no. 499): Crime, or altogether all impeding impediments of crime, have been abrogated by universal custom.

Mansi (Moral Theology, book 5, tract 10, part 4, chapter 15): Soto, Corduba, Navarrus, and Coninck testify that these impediments of crimes have been altogether removed by long custom.

Catalanus (part 3, On Matrimony, question 15, chapter 2, no. 15): In fact, through custom, all other impeding impediments except these four have been removed.

Ysambert (On Matrimony, disputation 9, article 2): A custom has prevailed that new marriages are entered without a dispensation from these impediments.

Mazzotta (tract 7, disputation 1, question 2, chapter 15): Formerly twelve impeding impediments were enumerated, but now partly by the Council of Trent and partly by custom they have been reduced to five (he adds, namely, the defect of proclamations).

Tamburini (book 8, On Matrimony, tract 1, chapter 16): These were formerly twelve.... Now, partly by the Council of Trent and partly by custom legitimately received, they have been reduced to four.

Potestas (volume 1, part 4, no. 3982): The common opinion is that they have been removed through non-use and therefore do not need a dispensation.

Elbel (On Matrimony, conference 3, no. 64): Formerly, indeed, under the old law various impeding impediments were enumerated. Under the new law, in fact, only four are commonly enumerated.

Bouvier (On Matrimony, chapter 4, article 3): Eight others are found in Canon law; but since they have altogether ceased, concerning the four still remaining, etc.

Concina (On Matrimony, book 2, dissertation 3, chapter 3, no. 15): The Authors observe that, except for interdict, vow, and betrothals, the other impediments have become obsolete.

Edmund Voit (volume 2, no. 1234), after enumerating the impediments arising from crime as they were set forth above, adds: The Authors everywhere testify that these have now been removed through non-use.

Indeed, all who now enumerate only four, or five (with the omission of the proclamations added), impeding impediments implicitly say the same thing. Thus Cuniliati (tract 14, section 14, no. 2): The impeding impediments at the present time are contained in this hexameter, etc. And Amort (tract 15, section 3, question 2): After the Council of Trent only four impediments, etc. And Antoine (On Matrimony, chapter 3, question 1): There are four which now certainly have force, contained in this verse, etc. And Reuter (part 4, no. 526): Those which now have force are four, etc. And Wagemann (part 3, tract 3, chapter 9, no. 135): Today the impediments are four, contained in this verse, etc. Tournely (On Matrimony, question 8, article 2): Formerly, under the old law, twelve were enumerated, which have been recalled and restricted to five. And Friar Antonius of Goritia (table 187): The impediments are four, etc. And Oberrauch (tract 20, chapter 5, section 2386): In antiquity the merely impeding impediments were more numerous; in the modern age only five obtain. Thus also Antonius of St. Joseph (Compendium of the Salmanticenses, tract 34, chapter 3, part 1, no. 165), Segna (On Matrimony, chapter 5, no. 390), Piselli (On Matrimony, part 2, chapter 4), Scavini, etc.

From the Canonists, however, it will suffice to bring forward what Giraldi, Engel, Reiffenstuel, Maschat, Schmalzgrueber, Pirhing, Pichler, and Krimer have.

Giraldi (Exposition of Pontifical Law, book 2, title 23, chapter 12, section 269): This Decretal, establishing that the crime of incest induces an impediment impeding matrimony to be contracted with any person, has been abrogated by contrary custom. For today there are only four impeding impediments, namely, etc.

Engel (book 4, title 13, no. 2): But this penalty of incest, like the other impediments, appears to have passed into desuetude.

Reiffenstuel (book 4, title 1, no. 352): The impeding impediments of crimes, however, are so held to have been abrogated that they are no longer in use.

Maschat (book 4, title 13, no. 4): The other impediment, lest the accomplices in incest be able to enter matrimony with any other person, has been abrogated by contrary custom.

Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 13, no. 7): The impediment by which an incestuous person and his accomplice are prohibited from contracting matrimony with any other person has more probably been removed through non-use or contrary custom, as Navarrus, Perez, Wiestner, etc., rightly observe.

Pirhing (book 4, title 16, no. 12): All these impediments introduced by ecclesiastical law (except betrothals and a vow, and except a special interdict of a Superior) have today been altogether removed by long-standing custom, according to which those thus impeded everywhere enter marriages without seeking any dispensation.

Pichler (book 4, title 1, no. 92): With Navarrus, Sanchez, Henriquez, and Coninck, Laymann, Pontius, Lessius, Illsung, and other Doctors everywhere observe that all the impeding impediments of crime, or those arising from an offense, have been removed by universal custom.

Krimer (book 4, title 13, no. 1174), to this objection: Incest furnishes a perpetual impediment to matrimony; therefore it is manifest that the incest must be disclosed, replies: This impediment long ago receded from use; hence by general custom it now happens that there is no fault in contracting matrimony with this impediment; and therefore no dispensation is sought from the Pope or Bishop on account of any incest.

What perhaps may appear surprising is that even the Holy Doctor Alphonsus judged that the same thing as the Doctors cited above must be defined concerning the cessation of this impediment as obsolete. Nor did he assert it in only one place, but several times plainly confirmed it by his vote. Indeed, from the first edition of his Moral Work in the year 1748, to these words of Busembaum (book 6, tract 6, chapter 3, doubt 1), But these impediments (namely, incest, the abduction of a betrothed woman, etc.) have been removed through non-use, the Holy Doctor had added his approval, adding (note f): as the Salmanticenses say with Sanchez and the common opinion. Elsewhere more explicitly (The Apostolic Man, tract 18, no. 53), where he enumerates the impeding impediments, he judges the same thing concerning incest, although perhaps he less aptly substitutes incest with one's own mother for incest with the blood relatives of one's spouse, that is, committed with a person related by affinity, as the text of the Decretal Constitution which imposed this penalty actually requires. Whatever may be said of this, behold the explicit words of the Holy Doctor: Under this name (CRIME) were formerly comprehended certain offenses, namely, incest with one's own mother, the abduction of another's betrothed woman, etc.; but this impediment also BECAME OBSOLETE BY DESUETUDE. And again, in the place to which he there refers the reader (book 6, no. 905), at the words of Busembaum reported above, namely, that the impediments of incest and of other crimes have been removed through non-use, the Holy Doctor adds: Thus also Concina and the Salmanticenses with Sanchez and the common opinion. And he repeats this even more explicitly (book 6, no. 857), where he further adds that this impediment has been so removed that it needs no dispensation. Thus the Holy Doctor, to the question whether betrothals are dissolved through a supervening impediment: If the impediment is impeding, Sanchez, Palaus, Escobar, etc., most commonly and more probably deny that the betrothals are dissolved, unless it arises from a vow of Religion, and very probably also from a vow of chastity. The reason is that the other impediments HAVE NO FORCE TODAY, NOR DO THEY NEED A DISPENSATION. Thus St. Alphonsus; whence also the abbreviators of the Holy Doctor, Neyraguet (On Matrimony, chapter 3, article 1, no. 4) and Galani (book 6, tract 6, no. 65), after enumerating the impeding impediments of crime, repeat: But these have been removed through non-use.

I said that this perhaps might appear surprising. And indeed it is known that St. Alphonsus elsewhere, against the most common opinion of the Doctors, as we shall see in its place, contended as though indubitable that the crime of incest necessarily had to be disclosed whenever a dispensation for contracting matrimony was sought from the Apostolic See on account of another impediment. But, as we have already seen above, not only from the authority of the Doctors, and especially from the testimony of Marcus Paulus Leo, who wrote expressly concerning the practice of the Sacred Penitentiary, but also from the explicit Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, the true reason why the crime of incest had to be expressed in seeking a dispensation for some other impediment, if perhaps it had intervened, rested in this: that the crime of incest of itself induced an impediment impeding matrimony, so that unless both impediments were expressed, the dispensation would labor under the defect of subreption. Therefore, can it not appear surprising that St. Alphonsus on the one hand contends as certain that in the case the crime of incest must necessarily be expressed, but on the other contends that the impediment of the crime of incest has no force today, but has been removed through non-use and in no way needs a dispensation? How will a dispensation necessarily have to be sought for an impediment which, by the admission of the Holy Doctor himself, needs no dispensation?

But, you will say, does not the same style of the Curia persist in this entire business of dispensations, which otherwise ought to be as a law? The reply to this question appears not difficult. For it must be conceded that the style of the Curia, whenever it is certainly established and the law by which that style itself was introduced and upon which it rests still has force, possesses the force of law. But at the same time it must not be denied that the force of custom, which itself assumes the nature of law, is such that it can abrogate both all human laws and also the laws upon which the style of the Curia rests, and consequently remove from that style every force of obliging. This remains true even though, just as Synodal and Pontifical Constitutions otherwise already abrogated by contrary usage remain unmoved in the Corpus of Law, so also the forms of style remain unmoved in the Curia, although their force has been abrogated by contrary custom and the laws upon which they rested have otherwise altogether perished. Nor are examples lacking which make this plain. Thus, in Marcus Paulus Leo, who describes the practice of the Office of the Sacred Penitentiary, you will find the form (Practice, etc., part 2, page 329) of absolution from incest with a dispensation, not indeed for contracting with the accomplice in that incest, but that, notwithstanding the said incest, you may mercifully dispense in the forum of conscience so that he may contract matrimony, with the form of the Council of Trent observed, with SOME OTHER WOMAN otherwise prohibited to him by no law, etc. Nevertheless, behold Martin Navarrus, already from that age solemnly testifying (Manual, chapter 22, no. 75, and Consultations, 9, no. 5) that in his whole life he had never read or heard that a dispensation concerning this sole impediment had been obtained, or that any incestuous person sought a dispensation from the Pope or Bishop. Concerning this matter Sanchez also says (On Matrimony, book 7, disputation 17, no. 8): That custom long ago prevailed whereby one affected by any of these impediments - and he expressly treats also of incest - enters matrimony without seeking any dispensation. This is established from the fact that ancient and more recent Doctors, and indeed eminent ones, who wrote and were occupied in diverse parts of the world, testify that this custom has been legitimately prescribed..., and especially Navarrus, who traveled through various regions and completed the hundredth year of his life, always being most intensely occupied with studies and consulted from every quarter concerning questions of conscience, and finally remaining a long time at Rome, to which these questions to be resolved are brought from all parts of the world, and nevertheless, speaking of incest, affirms... that at so great an age he had neither seen nor heard of a dispensation being sought; and thus that custom prescribed that a dispensation should not be necessary. But neither do we need the testimonies of others. For even now it certainly enters no one's mind that the incest of which someone is guilty induces a necessity of either seeking a dispensation if he wishes to contract with a woman otherwise prohibited to him by no law, or of expressing this circumstance in a supplication if a dispensation is necessary for marrying a woman prohibited for another cause of consanguinity or affinity; although in the latter case the same reason of nullity from the style of the Curia ought to have force, because, when two impediments concur, one of them would be suppressed. This can also be confirmed from the Acts of the Sacred Penitentiary. For it is not established that even after the age of Navarrus and Sanchez any dispensation was ever sought in the aforesaid circumstances, although the crime of which we speak certainly has not been absent from this world throughout those centuries. But from this also what we said above is confirmed: that forms of style are preserved in the Curia even if contrary custom possessing the force of law has taken all force from them.

Hence Cajetan Giraldi (Exposition of Pontifical Law, on book 4, title 13, chapter 1, section 714), when treating the interdict by which an incestuous spouse is thereafter prohibited from contracting matrimony with anyone - namely, the impediment of which we are speaking here - certainly recalls the style of the Penitentiary which enjoins this penalty in a dispensation for seeking the debt; he also recalls the style of the Dataria, which imposes the same penalty in a dispensation concerning consanguinity up to the fourth degree. Nevertheless, he does not hesitate to observe that this impediment appears to have been removed by custom, so that it is not necessary to seek a dispensation. And in fact we now perceive that the Sacred Penitentiary itself has at last begun to remove this style of the Curia, which rested upon an altogether antiquated impediment. For in dispensations which are granted to an incestuous spouse for seeking the debt, that aforesaid formula hitherto added according to the style of the Curia, If he survives his wife, let him remain without hope of marriage, has now begun to be omitted. To this may also be referred what we read in canonical question 183 of Benedict XIV. For he proposes to himself this objection from the style of the Curia: The distinguished Officials of the Dataria, after examining the Registers from the time of St. Pius V to the present,... endeavored to prove that marriages contracted between persons joined in the third and fourth degree, with a prior dispensation concerning the fourth but without declaratory letters obtained concerning the third, had always been held null and invalid. To these he replies: Just as it pertains to the distinguished Officials of the Dataria to defend the OPINIONS and rights of the Dataria, so it pertains to my littleness to defend the judgments of this Sacred Congregation, of which I am secretary. And in fact he defended his position against the alleged style of the Dataria in such a way that the Sacred Congregation of the Council rendered a definitive judgment for the validity of those marriages. From these things we are also taught that the style of the Curia must be judged in one way when there is question of a controversy already defined by certain laws, but in another when the judgment of the Curia follows an OPINION concerning which there is free disputation on either side in the Catholic schools. For in the latter case Benedict XIV, and indeed also the judgment of the Sacred Congregation rendered at the same time, manifestly establish that no force for defining theoretical questions is to be attributed to the style and judgment of the Curia, even if the validity or invalidity of matrimony is at issue. See also what we shall say in the note to no. 867.

Now, therefore, only four impeding impediments are enumerated, namely: first, a prohibition made by the Church for various causes; second, likewise a prohibition of the Church that at a certain determined time the solemnities of matrimony not be celebrated; third, a contract of betrothals already entered with another person and not legitimately dissolved.

seen, the dispensation was considered subreptitious, namely, as though, when two impediments concurred, only one had been expressed while the other was left unmentioned. Fourth, a vow which by its nature cannot be observed in the matrimonial contract or society.

These four are comprehended in the following little verse:

The prohibition of the Church, time, betrothals, vow.

It will suffice to add a few things concerning each.

I. The Prohibition of the Church

777. ○ It is a prohibition, either particular or general, made by the Church or by some ecclesiastical Superior, lest a certain matrimony be celebrated.

1. A general prohibition exists especially in three cases, namely: first, that matrimony not be contracted between a heretic and a Catholic woman, and conversely; second, that it not be contracted without the proclamation of the banns; third, that it not be contracted without the duly required consent of the parents. The banns were already treated above, no. 734 and following; likewise the consent of parents, no. 754. But we shall speak below concerning disparity of worship, no. 824 and following.

2. A particular prohibition exists when, for a just and special cause, matrimony is forbidden to someone either by the Pastor or by the Bishop; for example, because a suspicion of a diriment impediment has arisen [2].

[2] Three principal just causes for which, according to the common opinion of the Doctors, matrimony can be forbidden are enumerated: first, a complaint concerning betrothals by which one of the betrothed parties had previously bound himself to another person; second, a not groundless suspicion of a latent impediment between them, either diriment or even merely impeding; third, a not groundless fear that grave quarrels, enmities, scandals, or other inconveniences may follow from that matrimony. See Pirhing (book 4, title 16, no. 1).

II. Time

778. ○ It is a certain determined time during the course of the year which is called a holy season and during which the Church forbids the solemnities of nuptials. Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 10. Such a time now [3] is that which runs from the first Sunday of Advent through Epiphany inclusively, and from Ash Wednesday through the Octave of Easter likewise inclusively.

[3] It is said now, for before the Council of Trent the holy season was: first, from the first Sunday of Advent through Epiphany; second, from Septuagesima Sunday to the Octave of Easter; third, from the second day of the Rogations through the Octave of Pentecost; fourth, for two or three weeks before the Nativity of St. John the Baptist. - See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 16, no. 27.

Moreover, the Council of Trent prohibits only the solemnities of nuptials during the aforesaid time, namely, blessing the spouses, leading the bride home with festivity, and arranging more solemn nuptial banquets. It does not, however, prohibit the Pastor from privately joining the spouses, although in various places this also is prohibited because of custom [4]. - Thus commonly.

[4] Namely, the custom of certain places has it, not indeed that the proclamations not be made, or that the contract of matrimony not be celebrated, or that it not be consummated during holy seasons, but that nuptials not be celebrated unless either some necessity urges or permission of the Ordinary has been obtained, even in a case of necessity if this can be done; and it is fitting that Pastors accommodate themselves to this custom. Thus Reiffenstuel (book 4, title 16, no. 12), Schmalzgrueber (same title, no. 34), Wiestner (same title, no. 34), Konig (same title, no. 3), Schambogen (same title, no. 2), Schmier (part 3, On Matrimony, chapter 1, no. 105), Marchant, Gobat, Laymann, Sanchez, etc. Therefore it was not necessary for Lambertini (instruction 80, no. 14) to present this very thing to the Pastors of his Diocese of Bologna as a new and foreign piece of wisdom from the condemned Van Espen.

In the same instruction 80, no. 20, Lambertini again brings forward Van Espen also reproaching the Canonists as though they, too devoted to the rigorous expressions of the ancient Canons, had reduced abstinence from the consummation of matrimony during the holy season to a precept, when it was rather a matter of mere counsel, as St. Alphonsus also relates from Lambertini (book 6, no. 984). But even this reply to the ancient canons objected is false. The true reply is - see Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 16, nos. 31-41 - that those canons speak only of the solemn leading of the bride, not of the consummation of matrimony; and thus it is not necessary to explain them as concerning mere counsel and not a precept, for that solemn leading is in fact forbidden by precept. But if the canons add that spouses who have solemnly celebrated nuptials contrary to the precept of the Church are to be separated, this would be a penalty to be undergone not for a counsel but for a precept. From these things we are certainly taught that the hope of those who, thinking that treasures of wisdom lie hidden in condemned works, strive to fish out foreign things from these putrid fountains rather than draw doctrine from the storehouses of the sincere Catholic school, is vain.

III. Betrothals

779. ○ All betrothals, whether ecclesiastical or private, seriously contracted, unless they have been legitimately dissolved either by the mutual consent of the contracting parties or for another just cause, are an impediment impeding matrimony. This is evident from natural law, for there exists a grave obligation of justice to observe a pact arising from an onerous contract. But if someone, notwithstanding that impediment, contracts nuptials, the matrimony will indeed be valid, since this impediment is only impeding, but not licit.

IV. Vow

A fourfold vow impeding matrimony is distinguished, namely: first, a vow of chastity; second, a vow not to marry; third, a vow of entering Religion; fourth, a vow of receiving sacred Orders.

780. I. A Vow of Chastity. - 1. One who has emitted such a vow sins gravely by entering matrimony with the intention of consummating it, because he breaks the vow.

2. Even apart from this intention, he sins gravely because he exposes himself to the danger of violating either the vow or the right of the other spouse.

3. Once matrimony has been contracted, during the first two months he can neither seek nor render the debt, because by a divine privilege the spouses are exempt during this time from the obligation of the conjugal debt, according to what was said above, no. 759. But after this time has elapsed, he can indeed render the debt and satisfy the right of the other, but he cannot seek it without a dispensation from the vow, or without a suspension or indirect invalidation of the vow effected by the other spouse.

4. He must altogether abstain if the other consents or has lost the right of seeking, for example, because of adultery or incest. But if he can abstain only with difficulty, he must seek a dispensation as soon as possible or seek the aforesaid invalidation from the other spouse.

5. If the other spouse dies, he cannot pass to new nuptials unless he has obtained a dispensation from his vow also for this effect. - Lacroix, book 3, no. 564.

781. II. A Vow Not to Marry, or a Vow of Virginity. - 1. One who contracts matrimony after emitting this vow sins gravely, as is manifest.

2. Once matrimony has been contracted, he can render and also seek the debt, because observance of the vow has already become impossible.

3. For the same reason, after the spouse has died he can at least probably contract a new matrimony.

In practice it is sometimes doubtful whether someone vowed virginity or celibacy, or rather chastity. The penitent must be asked whether he was led by the intention of freeing himself from the burdens of matrimony and serving God more holily, or solely by the love and affection of purity. In the first case he must be judged to have vowed celibacy and virginity, but in the second true chastity. - Lacroix, no. 357.

782. III. A Vow of Entering Religion. - 1. One who has emitted such a vow sins gravely by entering matrimony, both because he deceives the other and because he exposes himself to the danger of violating the vow.

2. Before the consummation of the matrimony he is bound to enter Religion; and therefore he sins mortally when, whether by seeking or rendering the debt for the first time, he consummates the matrimony, because he must fulfill the vow when he can. But he can fulfill it by not consummating the matrimony in the first two months, since then by a divine privilege either party can enter Religion, and, when the spouse solemnly professes, the other party is freed from the bond of matrimony, according to what was said above, no. 759.

3. After the matrimony has been consummated, he can seek and render the debt, because execution of the vow has become impossible, and the seeking of the conjugal act is not contrary to his vow, since he vowed not chastity but Religion.

4. Even after the matrimony has been consummated, he is of himself bound to enter Religion whenever he can do so without injury to the right of the other party; for example, if the other consents, or loses the right of seeking the debt perpetually, or if the matrimony is dissolved by death, because the obligation of the vow always remains. In practice, however, in these cases it is more expedient to have recourse to a dispensation [5].

[5] In practice the circumstances may have been so changed by reason of age, offspring perhaps born of the matrimony, the state of fortunes, and also fitness for religious duties that, because of the change of matter, the obligation of the vow almost ceases of itself and there is no need of a dispensation.

783. IV. A Vow of Receiving Orders. - 1. One who has emitted that vow sins gravely by entering matrimony, as is evident.

2. He is bound to receive Orders if he can, for example, if he obtains the consent of the other. According to many, he is bound to enter Religion before the consummation of the matrimony, even against the will of the other, so that he may be able to fulfill the vow. But others more probably deny this.

3. Once matrimony has been entered, he can consummate it if he can no longer fulfill the vow.

784. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Who can dispense in impeding impediments?

Reply 1. No one, not even the Supreme Pontiff, can dispense from an impediment arising from valid betrothals, since in this matter there is question of a strict debt of justice. The same must be said of the necessity of parental consent, which is derived from natural law; this, however, naturally ceases if the parents dissent unjustly.

Reply 2. Bishops, or Ordinaries who are Pastors of souls and enjoy full jurisdiction in the external forum, can dispense: first, in the obligation of the banns; second, as regards contracting during a holy season where custom also forbids this; third, in a vow of temporary chastity and of virginity or not marrying.

But they cannot dispense: first, as regards a vow of perpetual chastity [6]; second, as regards a vow of entering Religion; third, as regards the impediment of disparity of worship between Catholics and heretics. For this threefold impediment is reserved to the Pope.

[6] Understand this before matrimony has been contracted; for after matrimony has been contracted, the Bishop can dispense for seeking the debt. See St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 987. Say the same of a vow of continence by which either spouse bound himself after matrimony had been contracted. For since by force of this vow he is indeed prohibited from demanding the debt, but can and indeed must render it, it is not a vow of perfect chastity and therefore is not reserved to the Supreme Pontiff. The opposite must be said if each spouse, by common consent, had vowed perpetual continence. See St. Alphonsus, ibid., no. 986.

Reply 3. By their privileges Regulars can dispense, merely for the internal forum, in a vow of virginity or of not marrying [7]. - Recall what was said concerning the privileges of Regulars in the Treatise on States, no. 175.

[7] From the general principle that by force of their privileges mendicant Regulars can dispense in all those vows in which Bishops can dispense by ordinary law, St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 987) rightly infers that the same Regulars can dispense not only in a vow of not marrying, as the Author has it, but also in a vow of temporary chastity or in one not perfect for any other cause, for demanding the debt after matrimony has been entered. Indeed, since there is a sufficiently probable opinion, as the Author intimates a little later in question 2, that it pertains to the ordinary right of a Bishop, even in a vow of perfect chastity, to grant a dispensation for contracting matrimony if necessity urges, by force of the aforesaid principle this also belongs to mendicants, as several Doctors in fact concede. See St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1128.

QUESTION 2. Can a Bishop, when necessity urges, namely, when there is danger in delay, dispense from a vow of chastity for contracting matrimony?

Reply. Yes, provided that the danger is truly present and access to the Pontiff is not readily available. - St. Ligorius, no. 987. - Suarez, Sanchez, Navarrus, etc.

Article II. On Diriment Impediments

We must treat: first, diriment impediments in general; second, diriment impediments in species; third, dispensation from these impediments.

§ I. On Diriment Impediments in General

Proposition I

The Church has the power to constitute impediments not only impeding but also diriment of matrimony. It is of faith.

785. ◦ It is clear, first, from the definition of the Council of Trent, session 24, canon 4: If anyone shall say that the Church could not constitute impediments diriment of matrimony, or that she erred in constituting them, let him be anathema.

It is confirmed, second, from theological reason. For the Church received from Christ every power necessary or even useful for rightly governing the Christian commonwealth; but the power of constituting impediments of matrimony is very useful, indeed even necessary, so that matrimony may be treated by the faithful with the honor and decency owed to the Sacraments; therefore, etc.

Proposition II

The Church alone can constitute diriment impediments of matrimony, and consequently SECULAR Princes with respect to Christian subjects cannot CONSTITUTE IMPEDIMENTS except for merely civil effects.

786. ◦ 1. It is proved from the Council of Tours in the year 1583, specially approved by Gregory XIII, chapter 19, On Jurisdiction, section 6, where it is said thus: Since it is most certain law that matrimonial causes belong to the ecclesiastical forum, and therefore that the knowledge and decision of them have been altogether forbidden to lay judges by the sacred Canons, under penalty of anathema we prohibit all except Bishops and their Officials from taking cognizance of and deciding concerning them and their appendages and circumstances, as, for example, if there is a question of conjugal adherence. - Collection of Councils (Labbe).

2. It is evident from the Council of Trent itself, session 24, chapter 12, where it defined that matrimonial causes pertain to ecclesiastical judges.

3. It is established from the letter of Pius VI to the Bishop of Motula, September 17, 1788, in which he expressly declares that such is the sense of canon 12 of the Council of Trent.

4. Theological reason confirms this. For since matrimony was elevated by Christ to the dignity of a Sacrament, it is necessarily subject to the spiritual power alone. And although the nature of a contract and the nature of a Sacrament are distinguished in matrimony, nevertheless the whole matrimony pertains to the Sacrament, since the contract is its matter and cannot be separated among Christians from the nature of a Sacrament. Otherwise, the greatest inconveniences would follow from a conflict of power if two powers independent of each other could constitute impediments of matrimony; for what one built up, the other could destroy.

787. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does an impediment invincibly unknown invalidate a matrimony contracted with it?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that the law constituting such an impediment has as its object the invalidation of the contract itself, and therefore it always invalidates the contract independently of the knowledge and will of the contracting party. Moreover, invalidating laws must obtain their effect in every case unless the general good absolutely stands in the way, as will be said concerning the impediment of clandestinity, which ceases only when, while persecution rages, suitable Priests [1] cannot be had to assist at marriages. - Lacroix, no. 626, and others most commonly.

[1] Namely, even a Priest, unless he has a delegated faculty from him who by ordinary right ought to assist at the contract of matrimony, is altogether incapable of conferring any validity upon the contract by his presence.

Hence if, after matrimony has been contracted, a woman certainly discovers a diriment impediment by force of which the matrimony was null, she can neither seek nor render the debt, even if she were compelled to it by a threat of death, because the union would be fornicatory, which is licit in no case. Some except the case in which the woman would conduct herself merely passively, so that she would cooperate in such an act altogether materially; but not even this must be conceded, since there is question of a thing intrinsically evil, unless, according to a probable opinion, the woman is compelled to it by fear of death, provided nevertheless that the danger of consent is absent. - Recall what was said in volume 1, On Human Acts, no. 21, and On the Fifth Precept, no. 390.

788. ○ QUESTION 2. Are those impediments which appear to have the nature of a penalty, such as the impediment of crime, also incurred even when unknown?

Reply. Yes. Thus more commonly with Lacroix, book 6, part 3, no. 641 [2]. The reason is that those impediments have primarily the nature of a bond and only secondarily the nature of a penalty; and consequently they are always incurred, although ignorance excuses from a penalty according to the common opinion when there is question of a merely prohibiting law.

[2] Ferdinand Krimer should be consulted concerning this question, for he treats it expressly (On the Decretals, book 4, nos. 1011-1029), and, having weighed the reasons of each side, concludes thus (no. 1024): Of these opinions opposed to each other, the affirmative... is without doubt very probable; nevertheless, the negative is not only probable absolutely, but also retains its probability in relation to its opposite. For the greater probability of the affirmative opinion neither proceeds from certain or evident principles nor concludes certainly or evidently, but only probably, and perhaps with some excess from authority; consequently it does not remove from the negative its probability even when compared with the affirmative. For it still remains within the limits of pure probability and has very probable solutions to its reasons, or solutions supported by a prudent foundation.

That Krimer truly affirms that the affirmative opinion is deduced neither from certain principles nor by a certain conclusion is easily evident. Take, for example, Suarez, who, while he otherwise teaches that ignorance does not excuse from incurring this impediment, nevertheless establishes (On Laws, book 5, chapter 19, no. 6) that this impediment is penal. Thus he says:

Among the impediments of matrimony, those which arise by reason of an offense are penal, as are the killing of one's wife with a promise, adultery with someone while a spouse is living together with a promise of future matrimony, etc. And he gives the reason (ibid.) because the invalidation of an act is a great burden and can cause harm; therefore, of itself it can be a sufficient penalty, and sometimes it is very well accommodated to the offense. Palaus agrees with him (tract 3, disputation 2, point 2, no. 2), where he writes: Sometimes the annulment of an act is introduced as a punishment for a committed offense, as IN THE OPINION OF ALL it is introduced... if a married person, after giving a pledge of matrimony, committed adultery with someone, etc. Cardinal de Lugo speaks no differently (On Penance, disputation 16, no. 337): In these cases matrimony is not prohibited because of a motive of special uprightness, but as punishment for the offense committed and to provide... for the safety of the spouse, whose life would be endangered if adulteries, promises, or plots to kill the spouse were made with the hope of a future matrimony.

But if this, as Palaus said, must be held according to the opinion of all, then the question whether ignorance of the invalidation... prevents the invalidation of the act - to use the words of Suarez himself, l.c., chapter 22, no. 4 - depends upon the question whether ignorance of the penalty alone excuses from it, even if there was sin against the law. And he himself adheres thus to the negative opinion (ibid.): In this question we judged the negative side to be truer. Therefore, regarding the special question of the penalty of invalidation he argues thus: Hence it must consequently be said in the present matter that when a human law prohibits an act by adding invalidation by way of penalty, if the law is not unknown as prohibiting, although it is unknown as invalidating, the act done against the law is invalid; because such ignorance does not excuse the sin against the law and consequently does not excuse from the penalty, although it is unknown; therefore neither does it excuse from the invalidation. Thus Suarez.

But is this foundation solid? For Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 9, disputation 32, no. 17), with respect to that general principle, thinks the opposite opinion truer. Thus he says: Nevertheless, I believe it truer that all these penalties are not incurred where the aforesaid ignorance of the law - namely, of the penal law - is present. Therefore, concerning invalidation itself he thus concludes to the contrary (ibid., no. 18): Add that the annulment of an act, when it is not from a defect of solemnity but as a punishment of the delinquent, is not incurred by those ignorant of the law, as Antonius de Butrio well observes on chapter 2, On Constitutions, no. 19. That this must also be referred to the invalidation of matrimony is evident from what he has elsewhere (book 7, disputation 5, no. 7), saying that matrimony is forbidden between certain persons as a punishment for an offense committed.

From this you will understand why, supposing that principle of Suarez which Palaus rightly added to be in the opinion of all, namely, that matrimony in the case is invalidated as a punishment for crime, Leander of Murcia (Disputations on I-II of St. Thomas, book 2, disputation 4) concluded that all those stand for this opinion - namely, that the penalty of the invalidation of matrimony is not incurred - who assert that irregularity AND OTHER PENALTIES imposed by ecclesiastical laws are not incurred by one who is ignorant of them, even by vincible ignorance..., provided it is not crass and supine.

Moreover, that this opinion, which requires knowledge not only of the prohibiting law but also of the punishing law for penalties to be incurred, pleased many can be learned very easily from the Doctors cited by Sanchez (l.c., no. 17). And besides the fact that the Author also acknowledges this to be the common opinion, for the present it can suffice that Schmalzgrueber (on book 5, title 37, no. 109) writes likewise from the common opinion: It is as a rule, he says, that one committing some offense is indeed subject to penalties proportioned to that offense, but not to other extraordinary penalties which are imposed to avoid the frequent practice of the offense or for another cause, unless the delinquent knew that the offense was prohibited under that penalty. After Suarez himself (On Censures, disputation 4, section 9, no. 21) reported this very principle from Navarrus in these words: Navarrus adds that whenever a penalty is exorbitant and extraordinary, OF WHATEVER KIND IT MAY BE, if it is unknown, even if the offense is committed, it is not incurred, he sincerely admits (ibid., no. 22) that the reasoning of Navarrus is probable, except that it must not be extended to the penalties which God inflicts upon sins in eternity; for otherwise, as he says, those who are ignorant of the eternity of the penalties would not incur them. But no one doubts that the invalidation of matrimony in the case is an extraordinary penalty; therefore Navarrus most rightly applies that principle thus to the impediment of crime (Manual, chapter 22, no. 46): If each party probably is ignorant of the impediment, they can contract matrimony as soon as the one who impeded it shall have died. From these things it is evident that the principles admitted by Suarez himself lead rather to a conclusion contrary to the one he wishes.

Thus, in order to furnish support to that wavering conclusion, they take refuge in what the Author also intimates and Sporer expresses thus (On Matrimony, no. 44): This impediment was introduced by the Church not precisely as a punishment for the offense, but principally to deter men lest they commit crimes in the hope of matrimony, as all the Doctors unanimously suppose. Hence Suarez (On Laws, book 5, chapter 19, no. 10) holds that this impediment has rather the nature of a remedy. Thus he says: Here there is considered not only the common utility which is found in a penalty insofar as it is a penalty, which is to avenge the offense...; but further there is considered the utility of a REMEDY, so to speak, by taking away occasions for perpetrating similar offenses. This utility is not common to every penalty, nor does it belong to its nature insofar as it regards vindication. Therefore, in this way we say that through that invalidation of matrimony in the aforesaid cases occasions for perpetrating similar offenses are taken away, and that this cause was sufficient for imposing such impediments even without vindication of the offense, which could have been effected through another penalty.

You will find a lengthy and complete direct reply to these things in the praised Krimer (on book 5, title 7, nos. 729-743), who most diligently pursues all the objections of the opposing side. For at present it will suffice us to show that these things too, according to the opinion of those very men who bring them forward, altogether waver and indeed destroy one another.

And first, while these men, to defend their cause, contend that the impediment of crime was introduced rather by reason of a remedy than as a punishment for an offense, behold Haunoldus (tract 1, On Laws, no. 109 and following), who, when about to refute John Salas and Pallavicino, who contend with us in this matter that invalidating laws imposed precisely as a punishment for some offense do not bind those who are ignorant because inculpable ignorance excuses from penalty, thinks it necessary, lest he betray his cause, to contend to the contrary that the invalidation of matrimony in the case is a pure penalty. Thus he says (l.c., no. 110): That this invalidation - namely, of matrimony contracted by a murderer or adulterer with an accomplice from an intention or promise of matrimony, etc. - is a pure penalty appears certain to me. Then Haunoldus thus rejects the support which Suarez sought in the utility of a remedy (ibid.): For although by consequence it is favorable to spouses, nevertheless, if this stood in the way, no invalidating law would finally be a pure penalty, since each can finally be resolved into some favor. Therefore he finally takes refuge in denying, contrary to the common opinion, that ignorance of a penalty excuses from incurring that penalty. But since all make an exception whenever the penalty is extraordinary, this one thing was finally left to him: to contend (ibid.), against the understanding of all, that the invalidation of matrimony because of the killing of one's wife or adultery, etc., is not an extraordinary penalty. And thus one of the patrons of that doctrine is compelled to destroy what another builds up; which certainly is not accustomed to happen when solid, certain, and firm principles are employed.

But what fear impelled Haunoldus to contend that the invalidation of matrimony in the case is a pure penalty? He was indeed compelled by another principle which the patrons of the same cause, altogether forgetful of themselves, establish elsewhere. For consult, for example, St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 351), and you will see that the same Doctors, in order to prove that ignorance of the penalty, namely, of the irregularity itself, does not excuse from incurring irregularity from an offense, employ this very reason: that irregularity is not a medicinal penalty for preventing crimes in the future, but is an incapacity or punitive penalty on account of the stain of guilt. And thus Suarez also has it altogether thus (On Censures, disputation 40, no. 9): Here that special reason ceases because of which we said that invincible ignorance of excommunication or of a censure properly so called excuses from incurring it, because it is a medicinal penalty which is formally imposed for contumacy and so that one may recede from it; but irregularity, when it is a penalty, is imposed not as medicinal but in vindication of the offense...; and therefore this ignorance alone does not excuse from irregularity. Nor does Schmalzgrueber speak otherwise, as though from the common opinion (book 4, title, no. 40): The common doctrine with Covarruvias affirms that an ignorant person incurs the penalty alone, namely, irregularity, because these are not medicinal, etc. Likewise La Croix (book 7, no. 482) gives as the reason why irregularity from an offense is incurred by one ignorant of it that irregularity is not... a medicinal penalty requiring knowledge or contumacy, etc.

These things having been established, and this question concerning irregularity now being omitted - for, as we shall see in its place with St. Alphonsus, it is equally probable that irregularity is not incurred in the aforesaid case - what remains to be said concerning the argument brought forward above by Sporer and Suarez, namely, that the impediment of crime is therefore incurred even by one ignorant of it because it has rather the nature of a remedy than of a penalty? What, I ask, is this: that the quality of a medicinal penalty, which previously, when the impediment of crime is treated, is brought forward as the reason why a penalty ought to be incurred even by one ignorant of it, is afterward, as we have seen with our own eyes, urged by the same authors as the reason why ignorance ought to exempt from incurring the penalty? Shall we hold firm that argument of theirs which they afterward employ to establish the opposite? Nor do they alone use it, but, what must certainly appear surprising, even those who defend that the impediment of crime is not incurred by one ignorant of it use the same argument taken from the nature of a medicinal penalty. For Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 7, no. 58) presents their opinion thus: They give the reason that the impediment of crime, from the disposition of ecclesiastical law, has the nature of a penalty for the crime perpetrated and of a remedy conducive to preserving the fidelity of marriages and the safety of spouses and to preventing various evils; but according to common doctrine, penalties, especially medicinal ones, established by ecclesiastical law are not incurred by those who invincibly are ignorant that they were established; therefore, etc. This argument certainly ought to press the adversaries all the more validly because they not only concede each premise but assume it as most true and urge it for themselves against others. And perhaps someone will think it must be attributed to the perceived weakness of the reasons for the affirmative opinion that Sporer (l.c.), after also mentioning without censure those who defended the opposite negative opinion, concludes: Therefore I, with Father Gobat, would not fear to leave in good faith those who in good faith contracted while bound by the impediment of crime.

What Wiestner objects (On Conjugal Impediments, part 2, no. 21) is of still less weight: that there is no parity with censures, irregularity, and deprivation of the conjugal debt, because censures require special contumacy, which ceases in one ignorant that a censure is attached to his offense. Krimer replies well (l.c., no. 1026): Although censures require contumacy, nevertheless this does not essentially suppose an admonition or threat of punishment made by a man; for this fails in censures latae sententiae imposed generally by law, for incurring which the admonition and threat of the law itself, imposing the censure upon the delinquent by the fact itself, suffices. But this admonition and threat of the law also precedes the offense to which the impediment of crime is attached. Therefore here too that contumacy is present. If, therefore, a censure imposed by the law itself is incurred by one ignorant of it without another contumacy, the same must be said of this impediment. Therefore, by reason of contumacy there is no disparity in this respect between censures and this impediment.

Others - see Diana, volume 2, tract 6, resolution 170, no. 3 at the end - employ this argument for the affirmative opinion: that the impediment of crime is not a penalty but an incapacity, or, if it must be called a penalty, nevertheless it is at the same time and principally an incapacity for contracting. But this reason proves little, because the incapacity itself was established by law as a punishment for the crime; and therefore what is required to incur the penalty is also required to incur the incapacity, and what exempts from the penalty will also exempt from that incapacity.

They further argue - see La Croix, book 6, part 3, no. 642 - from the practice and style of the Curia, because those guilty of this crime are never permitted to contract without a dispensation, as Pyrrhus Corradus testifies in Practice of Apostolic Dispensations, book 8, chapter 9, no. 17; therefore Diana (l.c.) holds the negative opinion as very prejudicial to the sacred tribunals of the Penitentiary and the Roman Dataria. To this objection it can be replied with Benedict XIV (Canonical Question 185, nos. 26-27) that the grant or denial of any dispensation or faculty by the Sacred Congregations in no way changes either the state of controversies or the condition of laws. Therefore, just as, according to the same Benedict XIV there, a dispensation granted or denied concerning irregularities or censures does not establish that the irregularity or censure was incurred, and the grant or denial of a faculty sought, for example, by a mendicant Regular who already possessed it by force of his privileges detracts nothing from the privileges of that Regular or of other Regulars, so neither does a dispensation granted for convalidating matrimony establish the preceding nullity of that matrimony, nor does a dispensation granted for contracting matrimony establish the certain existence of the impediment. And indeed, is it the practice of the tribunals of the Sacred Penitentiary or Dataria to command marriages to be celebrated without a dispensation when the petitioners have recourse to them for a dispensation even in a case of a doubtful impediment? And yet who is ignorant - see St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 901 - that matrimony can be celebrated both validly and licitly without a dispensation with mere probability of the absence of an ecclesiastical impediment? But to what is added from Diana, Krimer replies well (cited book 4, no. 1023) that no prejudice or injury is done to those tribunals by this opinion; otherwise all opinions of the Theologians which sometimes deny the necessity of seeking a dispensation would have to be abolished. But no one contends that through the use of such opinions anything owed by right to those tribunals is withdrawn or denied.

Finally, others argue ad hominem from an absurdity: if a penal impediment necessarily requires knowledge of the penalty in the delinquent, the same would also have force regarding the impediment of affinity from illicit intercourse. For the solution of this difficulty someone perhaps would refer the objectors to what Engel has concerning this question (book 4, title 14, no. 11), for he cites Doctors who favored the opinion exempting the ignorant also from this impediment. But a reply of this kind is neither necessary nor opportune. For Krimer observes much better with others (l.c., no. 1018) that the incapacity from affinity does not of itself necessarily suppose any offense, but only the nearness of persons which flows from the commingling of blood; therefore affinity induces this incapacity equally whether it arises from licit or illicit commingling, although by the benignity of the Council of Trent the extension of the incapacity arising from a condemned union was, for just causes, restricted to narrower limits.

And let these things suffice both so that it may be established that Krimer did not say idly that the affirmative opinion concludes neither from certain or evident principles nor certainly and evidently, and also that the scandal of certain fainthearted men may be tempered, who are astonished and in some manner recoil when they hear that the opposite negative opinion not only has long been accustomed to be handed down as truly probable in the schools of the Roman Seminary under the presidency of its emeritus Professor, now Bishop of Loreto, the Most Illustrious and Most Reverend Joseph Cardoni, but is also spontaneously admitted as such in the assembly of the Examiners of the Roman Clergy. You have a consequence of this opinion in the things which we brought forward a little above from St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 901), and you have it indicated below (no. 789). Besides those cited here, you have in the praised Krimer, l.c., nos. 1014-1015, those among both the ancient and the recent writers who held this opinion. Compare also Pichler, who establishes and excellently vindicates this thesis (book 4, title 7, no. 6): It is probable that the impediment of crime is not incurred by those who are ignorant that it was attached by law to their offense. Reinhard Baumgartner also proposes and vindicates this thesis (Conclusions from the Five Books of the Decretals, book 4, title 7, conclusion 4); he published his work at Rome in the year 1759.

QUESTION 3. Do the laws of the Church constituting diriment impediments bind even in a case of the gravest inconvenience, for example, danger of death, etc.?

Reply. Yes, because from what has been said, ignorance, even complete, cannot render capable of that matrimony one who is rendered incapable by law; therefore much less can fear of harm, etc. Hence, if someone has contracted an impediment, for example, of affinity with his future bride through fornication with her sister, and the Superiors are unwilling to dispense from this impediment, he cannot marry her for any cause or fear [3].

[3] See, however, what the Author himself observed above, after St. Alphonsus, concerning a certain case of necessity, no. 771.

789. ○ QUESTION 4. Is it licit to contract matrimony with a doubtful or probable impediment?

Reply 1. More probably, yes, in a doubt, or probability, of ecclesiastical law concerning the absence of an impediment; because if perhaps the impediment is truly present, the Church is judged to supply the defect of the contract invalid according to Canon law, just as she supplies a defect of jurisdiction whenever the Doctors commonly hold that she supplies jurisdiction in the Sacrament of Penance where common error intervenes. Moreover, the opinion teaching that the Church also supplies in the present case of a doubtful impediment is generally received as probable by innumerable Doctors who favor it. - Thus Lacroix, no. 534. - St. Ligorius, no. 901, and others commonly [4].

[4]  At this place the VV. admonish Father Gury (page 947, no. 158) that St. Alphonsus requires that the opinion concerning the absence of an impediment be universally, or at least certainly, received by Authors as probable. And they refer the reader to page 792.

Gury certainly does not speak of a doubtful probability. Moreover, what the opinion of the Doctors is concerning this matter may be seen above in the note to no. 724.

Reply 2. No, if there is question of probability of divine or natural law, for example, in the impediment of bond or of impotence, because then the Church cannot supply the probable defect, since that impediment does not depend upon the Church. Therefore the matrimony thus contracted would remain doubtful; and consequently it is never licit to receive a Sacrament with such a doubt [5]. Therefore, etc.

[5] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 902) judged that when a most grave cause urges, matrimony can be contracted with mere probability that an impediment does not exist, even if it is of divine or natural law, provided that there is also a declaration of the Supreme Pontiff as interpreter of divine law; and that this is established from the declaration of Urban VIII. In a doubt whether the marriages of certain infidel Indians were valid, and therefore whether those converted to the faith were bound to take the first of the several wives whom they had, or could choose whichever of them they wished, he replied that where the opinions of the Doctors on each side were probable, the Missionaries should follow the opinions more favorable to the barbarians according to the condition of the places and persons. You have the supplication presented to Urban VIII by Father de Lugo, afterward Cardinal, concerning this matter, and the reply of the Pontiff, in Cardenas (Theological Crisis, part 4, dissertation 2, no. 552).

Nevertheless, it must be observed that Gregory XIII and the same Urban VIII had already given those Missionaries in addition the faculty of dispensing with respect to the bond itself of a matrimony contracted in infidelity and not yet consummated again after the conversion of both spouses, as we already saw in the note to no. 759. Therefore, the doubt, if any remained, concerning a bond perhaps existing with the first wife was provided for, or certainly could be provided for, by a dispensation at least as a precaution. Benedict XIV also recalls (On the Diocesan Synod, book 6, chapter 21, no. 6) that this faculty of dispensing was customarily granted to Bishops, Vicars Apostolic, and Prefects of Missions, expressed in these words: Of dispensing with Gentiles and infidels having several wives, so that after conversion and baptism they may retain whichever of them they prefer, if she too becomes faithful, unless the first wishes to be converted. These final words certainly do not indicate a spouse who was unwilling to cohabit without injury to the Creator, etc., and therefore one who could be said, according to the phrase of Paul, to depart; for thus no dispensation would have been necessary. And from the Acts of the Council of Lima - see the note to no. 759 above - it is established that a faithful person was permitted to cohabit with a spouse still infidel, at least for a time. Therefore the dispensation is referred to the case in which, not by force of the Pauline privilege, but by force of a Pontifical dispensation, the matrimonial bond, if any existed with the first spouse, was dissolved. But that Lambertini (l.c.), after bringing forward this faculty of dispensing, somewhat wonderingly observes that no mention is made in it of the infidel spouse having to be juridically questioned must be attributed to the prejudice which he had imbibed from Pontius, as it was possible to observe already in the note cited above.

Reply 3. No, also if there is question of probability of fact. The reason is that in probability of this kind the Church is not presumed to dispense. Moreover, the contrary opinion is not commonly received as probable, and otherwise excessive inconveniences would follow if, after the matrimony had been contracted, the error were discovered. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 902.

790. ◦ QUESTION 5. Is it licit for spouses to use matrimony if, after the nuptials have been entered, a doubt concerning some impediment arises?

Reply 1. No, until a sufficient inquiry concerning the truth has been made. If, however, only one doubts, although that party cannot seek the debt, the party must nevertheless render it to the other seeking it in good faith. - St. Ligorius, no. 903.

Reply 2. Yes, if, after serious diligence has been employed to discover the truth, the doubt still remains, because in a doubt one must stand for the validity of the act. Thus commonly against a few. - St. Ligorius, no. 904, etc.

791. ◦ QUESTION 6. Is a matrimony contracted with an impediment believed to exist, but not existing, valid?

Reply 1. If the contracting party is not altogether certain of the impediment but in some way doubts concerning it, the matrimony is valid. - Thus commonly with Lacroix, no. 525. - The reason is that the party contracts at least conditionally, namely, insofar as I can, although he does not advert to that condition; therefore, since the impediment does not exist, the consent is already absolute.

Reply 2. If the party contracts with certainty of the impediment, which he regards as of little importance, so that he determines to live in concubinage, it is certain that the matrimony is invalid.

The reason is that then the will to contract matrimony is not predominant. Reply 3. If the party contracts with certainty of the impediment, but grieving over the impediment and not daring to disclose it lest the matrimony be prevented or the party be defamed, or because of some inadvertence, the matter is disputed. More probably, the matrimony is valid because of the predominant will to contract it. - Thus Lacroix, ibid. - Nevertheless, in practice, as a precaution the party should be induced to renew consent.

Errors Condemned by Pius IX — Concerning Matrimony and its Impediments

792. ○ Among the acts of Pius IX many things concerning matrimony are found, of which it is useful to report the principal ones.

I. In the condemnation and prohibition of the works of Nuytz, he speaks thus concerning this impious author in the Brief of the Apostolic See, August 22, 1851:

Many false things are also asserted concerning matrimony:

That in no way could it happen that Christ elevated matrimony to the dignity of a Sacrament;

That the Sacrament of Matrimony is nothing but something accessory to the contract and separable from it, and that the Sacrament itself consists in the nuptial blessing alone;

That by natural law the bond of matrimony is not indissoluble;

That the Church does not have the power to introduce impediments diriment of matrimony, but that this belongs to the civil power, by which existing impediments are to be removed;

That matrimonial causes and betrothals by their own nature pertain to the civil forum;

That in later centuries the Church began to introduce diriment impediments, not by her own right, but using that right which she had borrowed from the civil power;

That the Tridentine Canons (session 24, canon 4, On Matrimony), which inflict the censure of anathema upon those who dare to deny to the Church the faculty of introducing diriment impediments, either are not dogmatic or must be understood of this borrowed power;

That the Tridentine form does not bind under penalty of invalidity where the civil law prescribes another form beforehand and wills matrimony to be valid when this new form intervenes;

That Boniface VIII was the first to assert that a vow of chastity emitted in ordination renders nuptials null.

793. ○ II. In the Allocution of September 27, 1853, concerning the affairs of the Republic of New Granada (Nouvelle-Grenade), the Supreme Pontiff spoke thus:

> ... Since no Catholic is ignorant, or can be ignorant, that matrimony is > truly and properly one of the seven Sacraments of the evangelical law, instituted by Christ the Lord, and that therefore among the faithful matrimony cannot exist WITHOUT BEING AT ONE AND THE SAME TIME A SACRAMENT; and that for this reason any other union between a Christian man and woman, made by force of any civil law whatever, APART FROM THE SACRAMENT, is nothing other than a shameful and deadly concubinage, condemned for so long a time by the Church; and consequently that THE SACRAMENT CAN NEVER BE SEPARATED FROM THE CONJUGAL COVENANT, and that it belongs altogether to the power of the Church to decree all those things which in any way can pertain to that same matrimony, etc.

§ II. On the Impediments in Species

794. ○ Fifteen impediments diriment of matrimony are enumerated, expressed in these verses:

> Error, condition, vow, relationship, crime, Disparity of worship, force, Order, bond, propriety, Age, affinity, if clandestine, and impotence, Or if the woman has been abducted and not restored to a safe party: These forbid marriages to be joined and retract those already made.

We shall treat each separately.

Point I. On the Impediment of Error and Condition

A twofold error concerning matrimony is distinguished, namely: first, a substantial error, which concerns the person; second, an accidental error, which affects the qualities of the person. By condition, however, is understood a servile condition unknown to the other party.

795. Principles. - I. Every error concerning the person renders matrimony null by natural law, even if the error is altogether invincible. The reason is that on the part of the contracting party it removes voluntariness concerning the object of the contract, and therefore, consent being absent, the contract is invalid.

II. Error concerning the qualities of a person, whatever it may be, does not of itself invalidate matrimony. The reason is that error concerning qualities does not fall upon the object of the contract [1]; for that object is the person himself or herself with whom the contract is entered, as was just said, and not that person's qualities. Except the case in which a quality is explicitly intended as a condition sine qua non, as they say [2].

[1] You have a solid reason why the contract of matrimony ought to remain valid even if error concerning qualities is antecedent and gives cause to the contract in Molina (On Justice and Law, tract 2, disputation 259, no. 8, and disputation 252, no. 5) and Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 10, disputation 9, no. 20); but more clearly in Lugo (On Justice and Law, disputation 22, no. 88), who argues thus: First, concerning the contract of matrimony and also concerning religious profession, or vows constituting the religious state, such as the simple vows of our Society, I think it must be said that if the error or fraud does not concern the substance, even if it gives cause to the contract, it does not render it invalid or to be invalidated.... The reason is that in those things which constitute a state firm and irrevocable by its nature, such as profession and matrimony, the will accommodates itself according to the nature of the thing at issue and consents without restriction or condition, but altogether absolutely and independently of conditions other than those which belong to the substance of the same contract. For from those conditions marriages and professions, and therefore the state itself, would remain uncertain, which is not according to the nature of the thing at issue. Therefore, whatever may be said of other contracts, concerning these it must altogether be said that they are not invalidated by fraud, even one giving cause to the contract, provided that it does not concern the substance. The inconveniences of an uncertain matrimony, as Lugo calls it, Schmalzgrueber indicates thus (book 4, title 1, no. 447): If such an error vitiated matrimony, very many marriages would be dissolved, to the great harm of offspring, the greatest harm of the commonwealth, and public scandal, since error concerning a quality very frequently intervenes in this contract. See also St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1012.

[2] Error concerning a quality renders matrimony invalid not only in this case, but also in another which the Author omits, although each case can be contained in that general, though somewhat obscure, rule that matrimony is invalidated because of error concerning a quality when an error of this kind concerning a quality passes into the substance. Therefore the first case, which the Author also intimates, is when the quality is a condition under which consent is given; for it is manifest that when the condition fails, the conditioned thing, that is, consent, also fails. The other case is when the quality determines the person with whom someone intends to contract; or when one neither knows nor determines the person with whom one contracts except from the indication and mark of that quality. Concerning this Pirhing says (book 4, title 1, no. 163): If through the quality concerning which there is error a certain individual person is designated and conceived in the mind, who was previously unknown by sight, then the error redounds into an error of person. Likewise Sanchez says sufficiently clearly (book 7, disputation 18, no. 38): To explain when error concerning a quality redounds into an error of person diriment of matrimony, I say briefly that this occurs when there is error concerning a quality which designates a certain person, who was not previously known to the contracting party apart from that quality - namely, except from that quality - and it is not established that the mind of the contracting party was to consent to the person present to him, whoever that person might be.

III. Error concerning the servile condition of the other party dirimently invalidates matrimony by ecclesiastical law, as is established from book 4 of the Decretals, title 9. This impediment no longer has a place in Europe, where servitude has been altogether extinguished [3].

[3] This impediment has no place in Europe, not because the law ceases, but because occasion is commonly lacking, unless perhaps in parts of the Turkish Empire, or if any persons still reduced to servitude should come from elsewhere into other parts of Europe. According to the common opinion of the Doctors, error in this matter invalidates matrimony even if it was crass. See St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1019, and Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 9, nos. 29-31. But if the contracting party knows the servile condition of the other, or if a union contracted in ignorance is afterward ratified once the error is known, it is certain according to the opinion of all that the matrimony is valid. By the disposition of Canon law, however, one knowingly contracting with a female slave becomes irregular (canon Si viduam 15, distinction 34; St. Alphonsus, l.c., no. 1018, and Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 15-18); and in the second case consent would have to be renewed before the Pastor and witnesses, unless perhaps the nullity of the preceding contract were so altogether occult that it could not be proved; for then consent emitted anew by the free party would suffice. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 3, no. 121, and title 9, no. 18.

Moreover, this impediment, as is evident, has force only with respect to the matrimony of a free person with a slave; for - and this must be carefully noted for places in which servitude still has force - marriages between slaves are to be held valid beyond controversy (Schmalzgrueber, l.c., no. 7; see canon 2, question 2, cause 29, and St. Thomas, II-II, question 104, article 5), even if they are contracted without the consent of the master (canon Dignum 1, On the Marriage of Slaves; Schmalzgrueber, l.c., no. 10). Therefore, just as a slave licitly contracts matrimony even against the will of his master, so the master sins gravely against justice if he either positively impedes the slave from matrimony or, after he has contracted it, treats him more harshly for this cause. Nevertheless, the master is not bound positively to consent and to undergo the prejudice consequently arising, according to the opinion of several Doctors, so that the slave could and should then prefer a spouse seeking the debt to a master seeking service; although Sanchez (book 7, disputation 21, no. 15) judges that this has place even if the matrimony is made without the master's consent. See Schmalzgrueber, l.c., no. 13.

But since the master has the right of selling slaves, the Doctors resolve the difficulty arising from this if matrimony was contracted without his consent as follows. First, if matrimony has not yet been begun by betrothals concerning the future on the part of the slave, the master can sell the slave, because he thus does not impede matrimony and otherwise uses his own right. Second, if matrimony has already been begun by betrothals concerning the future, it is not licit for the master to use that means, because the betrothed woman already has an acquired right that the slave stand by his promises and contract matrimony, which the master would impede by sending the slave elsewhere. Third, finally, if matrimony has already been contracted, some have thought that the slave can be sold because thus not the matrimony but only its use is impeded; others, however, more consistently deny this unless the wife can conveniently follow her husband. Schmalzgrueber, l.c., no. 14.

796. Resolutions. - 1. If someone thinks that he is contracting nuptials with Anna and marries Agatha, the matrimony is invalid. It is otherwise if, thinking that he had married a noble, wealthy, virginal, and peaceable maiden, he finds her on the contrary common, poor, corrupted, and quarrelsome.

2. A matrimony is valid if someone marries a widow while thinking that he is marrying an unmarried woman, even if he was induced into this error through fraud; for fraud indeed induces an obligation of repairing the injury, but it does not bring it about that consent does not concern the substance of the thing at issue. Indeed, this has force even if he certainly would not have wished to contract had he previously known her to be a widow; for attention must be given not to what someone perhaps or even certainly would have done, but to what he actually did.

3. A noble maiden validly contracts with a wandering man who falsely boasts that he is noble and the possessor of many goods, and proves this by false testimonies. But that woman is not bound to cohabit with him and can immediately obtain perpetual divorce as regards bed and habitation. - St. Ligorius and all the others.

Point II. On the Impediment of Vow and Order

797. ○ I. A vow diriment of matrimony is only a solemn vow of chastity [1], emitted through profession in an approved Religion. For a simple vow of chastity, even perfect and perpetual, does not invalidate matrimony [2], but only impedes it, according to what was said above, no. 779.

[1] It is called a vow of chastity, not a religious vow, because religious profession invalidates matrimony precisely and only insofar as it includes a solemn vow of chastity. Therefore the vows, even solemn ones, of certain Equestrian Orders which profess only conjugal chastity do not invalidate matrimony. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 6, no. 45.

[2] The simple vows which, by a special privilege of Gregory XIII, are emitted in the Society of Jesus after two years of novitiate must be excepted, as we said elsewhere in the note to no. 759 above.

II. The Order diriment of matrimony, however, is sacred Order, namely, the Presbyterate, Diaconate, and Subdiaconate.

The First and Second Lateran Councils speak concerning each of these impediments, and the Council of Trent, session 24, canon 9, says: If anyone shall say that Clerics constituted in sacred Orders, or Regulars who have solemnly professed chastity, can contract matrimony, and that the matrimony contracted is valid notwithstanding ecclesiastical law or the vow, let him be anathema [3].

[3]  In the sole Clementine Constitution On Consanguinity and Affinity, a latae sententiae excommunication is imposed both against those who knowingly do not fear to contract matrimony with a nun and against nuns, Religious, and Clerics constituted in sacred Orders who contract matrimony. Moreover, this excommunication was not absolutely reserved, although the guilty could not be absolved before separation; but after separation they could be absolved by any confessor, unless perhaps the excommunicated persons had been denounced, for then the Bishop alone could absolve them. But under the new law this excommunication is altogether reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries. For in the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis issued by Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX in the year 1869, among the latae sententiae excommunications reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries, this is read in the first place: Against Clerics constituted in sacred Orders, or Regulars and nuns after a solemn vow of chastity, presuming to contract matrimony, and also all those presuming to contract matrimony with any of the aforesaid persons.

798. Questions. - QUESTION 1. By what law do the aforesaid impediments invalidate matrimony?

Reply 1. According to the common opinion, the impediment of Order invalidates only by ecclesiastical law [4]. The reason is that, on the one hand, Order of itself is not repugnant to the conjugal state; nor, on the other hand, is there any divine prohibition found in Scripture or tradition. - St. Ligorius, no. 1059.

[4] See the note above to no. 41.

Reply 2. Since the solemnity of a vow belongs to ecclesiastical law, by that very fact the Pope can dispense, provided that a sufficient cause is present, that is, one proportioned to the gravity of the matter [5].

[5] That the Pontiff can dispense from this impediment is the most received opinion of Theologians and Canonists, a long series of whom Sanchez cites (On Matrimony, book 8, disputation 8, no. 7); and indeed examples of this dispensation having been granted are everywhere available, as can be seen in Schmalzgrueber, book 3, title 35, no. 48.

QUESTION 2. What conditions are required for a solemn vow and Order to invalidate matrimony?

Reply 1. As regards a vow, it must have been emitted: first, voluntarily and deliberately; second, with the true intention of binding oneself; otherwise the vow would not be valid.

Reply 2. As regards Order, it is required: first, that it was received validly; second, that it was received voluntarily. - Thus all.

Point III. On the Impediment of Relationship

A threefold kind of relationship is distinguished, namely: first, natural; second, spiritual; third, legal. Concerning each separately.

Section I — On Natural Relationship

799. ◦ Natural relationship, or consanguinity, is the bond of persons descending from the same proximate stock through carnal generation, which arises from unity and participation in the same blood.

In consanguinity three things must be distinguished, namely: first, the stock, or the person from whom others derive their origin; second, the degree, or the measure of distance of one person from another; third, the line, or a series of persons descending from the same stock.

The line is twofold: one direct and the other collateral or transverse. The former is a series of persons of whom some descend from others, either immediately, as children from parents, or mediately, as grandchildren from grandparents or great-grandparents, etc. The latter, however, is a series of persons who, although they have a common stock, nevertheless do not descend from one another, as brothers, first cousins, etc.

A collateral line is equal or unequal according as the blood relatives are equally distant from the common stock.

800. Statements. - I. Consanguinity in the direct line, at least by positive law, invalidates matrimony indefinitely in any degree whatever. This is evident from Canon law in the Response of Nicholas I to the Bulgarians, chapter 37.

II. Consanguinity in the collateral line invalidates matrimony through the fourth degree inclusively, and not beyond. This is established from the Fourth Lateran Council and several places of Canon law.

III. Consanguinity invalidates matrimony also between those who were born only of the same father or only of the same mother; likewise between blood relatives born of illegitimate unions. The reason is that diversity of father or mother, or illegitimacy, does not prevent carnal consanguinity from existing between them.

Rules for Computing Degrees of Consanguinity

801. ○ I. Rule. In the direct line, as many degrees are counted as there are persons, with the stock omitted; or there are as many degrees as there are generations. Hence between father and son there is one degree, because there is one generation, or one person of the son, with the father excluded as the stock. Between a grandson and grandfather two degrees are counted, because there are two generations, although three persons intervene, namely, the grandfather, the father, and his son, or the grandson with respect to the grandfather. Likewise posit a great-grandfather or great-great-grandfather, and you will have three or four degrees.

II. Rule. In an EQUAL collateral line, there are as many degrees as there are persons on one side, with the stock omitted. Hence a brother and sister are in the first degree, because if the common stock or father is set aside, one person remains on each side; and since each is distant by one degree from the stock, they also are distant from each other by one degree. Likewise paternal first cousins, or the children of two brothers, are each distant by two degrees from the common stock or grandfather, and therefore are blood relatives to each other in the second degree. The same must be said of others.

III. Rule. In an UNEQUAL collateral line, there are as many degrees as there are persons on the more remote side, always with the stock omitted. Hence if one is distant from the common stock by two degrees and his blood relative by three, they will be blood relatives to each other in the third degree, according to the saying: The more remote degree draws the nearer to itself. Therefore Berta will be related in the second degree to her paternal uncle, or her father's brother, because she is distant by two degrees from the common stock, namely, her grandfather, although the paternal uncle himself is separated by one degree from the same stock, since he is the son of the stock, or the brother of Berta's father. The same must be established concerning all others.

For computing degrees according to civil law, the number, or sum, of all the persons in each line is taken, with the stock omitted. Therefore in the direct line they are computed in the same manner as canonical degrees; in an equal collateral line, the canonical degrees are doubled; in an unequal collateral line, the lesser line is doubled and the excess of the greater is added.

802. Questions. - QUESTION 1. By what law does consanguinity in the aforesaid degrees invalidate matrimony?

Reply 1. It is certain that consanguinity in the direct line invalidates matrimony in the first degree by natural law and, more probably according to the opinion of certain Theologians [1], indefinitely also in the other degrees. But the case, as is evident, is most remote from practice.

[1] Others, however, think differently; and omitting for now the various opinions - in Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 14, no. 30 - which extend the force of this impediment to more or fewer degrees, there are those who, with St. Thomas, think that only the first degree renders nuptials invalid by natural law. St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 470) holds this opinion equally probable with the one which the Author reports, and several others with Schmalzgrueber (ibid., no. 31) judge it preferable to the others. But, as the Author well observes, these things contribute nothing to practice.

Reply 2. As regards the collateral line, in the first degree it more probably [2] invalidates by natural law, or at least by positive divine law, since the Church never dispenses so that brothers and sisters may be joined, and infidels themselves detest nuptials of this kind; in the other degrees, according to all, it invalidates by ecclesiastical law [3], as is deduced from the practice of the Church, which dispenses from them.

[2] The Doctors disagree whether matrimony between brother and sister is invalid by natural law, and some call the affirmative opinion more probable, others the negative. Some contend that the Roman Pontiffs never dispensed as regards this degree, others that they sometimes dispensed. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 14, nos. 45-46. And, as St. Alphonsus also observes (book 6, no. 470), St. Thomas also stands for the opinion which judges this union valid by natural law. It would indeed be useless to review the arguments of each side and the replies to the contrary reasons, which can be seen everywhere among the Doctors. See St. Alphonsus, l.c., and Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 45-48. Meanwhile observe how much prejudice spontaneously flows from this against the opinion which, while denying to princes the power of establishing diriment impediments for infidel subjects, contends that natural law alone has force for them. For if this is presupposed, a matrimony contracted in infidelity between a brother and sister could not be held certainly invalid, however much it might be condemned by their laws; and since in a doubt, according to the general principle, one must stand for the validity of the matrimony, if both of them were converted to the faith they consequently could not be separated, even if that union were a scandal at once to infidels and to the faithful.

[3] Hence follows a consequence of the greatest importance. For since the laws of the Church do not bind those who are not baptized, marriages contracted between infidels who are joined in these degrees of consanguinity must therefore be held valid, considering natural law; and consequently, if they are converted to the faith, they are neither to be separated nor do they need a dispensation in order to remain in the union contracted. What is said concerning the impediment of consanguinity must also be said concerning the other impediments of merely ecclesiastical law.

The Doctors disagree whether marriages which heretics enter with an impediment of merely ecclesiastical law are to be held valid. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 1, nos. 378-380, who, after bringing forward the reasons of each opinion, appears to incline toward the affirmative side.

QUESTION 2. How can degrees of consanguinity be found easily?

Reply 1. If the common stock is known, write that person's name on a sheet, and below it set down the generations and names of the persons descending on this side and that until you arrive at the persons to be joined in matrimony; from this you will easily compute the degrees.

Reply 2. If the stock is unknown, proceed thus: Write in the lower part of the sheet or table the name of the bridegroom on one side and the name of the bride on the other. Then above the name of the bridegroom note the names of those blood relatives who perhaps can be the cause why some relationship exists with the bride; do the same with respect to the bride. When this notation has been made, ascend on one side and see whether they meet in a common origin or stock from which the bridegroom and bride were mediately generated. Hence, after you have found it and at the same time observed whether the spouses are in an equal or unequal line, finally apply the rules to be proposed below, and the resolution of the doubt will be evident. Let the following be an example of these things:

Great-great-grandfather: Didacus Noel

Degree	Line of the bridegroom	Line of the bride
I	Great-grandmother: Julia Noel, wife of Titius Pascal	Great-grandfather: Arthur Noel
II	Grandfather: Maevius Pascal	Grandfather: Maurus Noel
III	Father: Paulus Pascal	Father: Hector Noel
IV	Bridegroom: Petrus Pascal	Bride: Maria Noel

In this example Petrus Pascal and Maria Noel are blood relatives in the equal fourth degree. But if Maria Noel descended immediately from Maurus Noel, Arthur Noel would be her grandfather and Didacus Noel her great-grandfather, and therefore they would be blood relatives in the fourth degree, but touching the third.

803. ○ Another method is also indicated for recognizing degrees of relationship, namely, with a genealogical table or tree of consanguinity. Inspect the table and see in what line and in what cells you find the persons concerning whose relationship inquiry is made, and attend to how many degrees they are distant from the common stock. Example: You ask, for example, in what degree Titius the bridegroom is related by blood to Berta the bride, since you already know that the grandfather of the former was the brother of the great-grandfather of the latter. Place Titius in the middle cell N. Ascend to his grandfather; the latter's brother on the right side, in the cell where paternal uncle is marked, will be Berta's great-grandfather. Descend through his direct line by counting the grandfather, the father, and the bride herself; hence the common stock will be the one who is found in the third cell above the middle line. Thus you will count three degrees on the bridegroom's side and four on the bride's side; hence you will conclude that they are blood relatives in the fourth degree touching the third.

Imagine any other similar examples, placing either of the spouses in any cell, whether the middle one or one at the side, and ascending to the common stock so that from there you may descend to the other spouse; but pay no attention to the names which you find in the various cells encountered, because all of them will vary according to the cell selected, as is evident.

Consanguinity between the same persons can arise from a double or even multiple source, and then there is a double or multiple relationship, or an impediment to be disclosed in the petition for a dispensation. Thus, for example, if two brothers marry two women related by blood to each other, the children proceeding from each matrimony will be doubly related by blood to one another [4], and this circumstance must necessarily be declared.

[4] See several examples both of doubled and of tripled consanguinity in de Justis (On Matrimonial Dispensations, book 2, chapter 6, no. 61 and following).

Note. First, persons joined by a drawn line are among themselves in the direct line and with the others in the collateral line. Second, where the lines are joined, there the stock is found.

804. ○ QUESTION 3. Who are collateral blood relatives?

Reply. They are the following:

1. On the Father's Side

- PROPATRUUS, or the brother of one's great-grandfather (great-uncle).
- PROAMITA, or the sister of one's great-grandfather (great-aunt).
- PATRUUS MAGNUS, the brother of one's grandfather (grand-uncle).
- PROAMITA, the sister of one's grandfather (grand-aunt).
- PATRUUS, the brother of one's father (paternal uncle).
- AMITA, the sister of one's father (paternal aunt).
- PATRUELES, the children of brothers on the father's side (paternal first cousins).

2. On the Mother's Side

- PROAVUNCULUS, the brother of one's great-grandmother (great-uncle).
- PROMATERTERA, the sister of one's great-grandmother (great-aunt).
- AVUNCULUS MAGNUS, the brother of one's grandmother (maternal grand-uncle).
- MATERTERA MAGNA, the sister of one's grandmother (maternal grand-aunt).
- AVUNCULUS, the brother of one's mother (maternal uncle).
- MATERTERA, the sister of one's mother (maternal aunt).
- CONSOBRINI, the children of brothers on the mother's side (maternal first cousins).
- AMITINI, the children of brothers (first cousins).
- SOBRINI, their children (children of first cousins).
- NEPOTES, the children of brothers (nephews).
- PRONEPOTES, their children (great-nephews).

Degrees of Consanguinity

The consanguinity tree exhibits the following persons and canonical degrees from the person marked N:

Degree	Direct ancestors	Direct descendants
1	Father and mother	Son and daughter
2	Grandfather and grandmother	Grandson and granddaughter
3	Great-grandfather and great-grandmother	Great-grandson and great-granddaughter
4	Great-great-grandfather and great-great-grandmother	Great-great-grandson and great-great-granddaughter

Degree	Ascending paternal collaterals	Ascending maternal collaterals
2	Father's brother and sister (PATRUUS, AMITA)	Mother's brother and sister (AVUNCULUS, MATERTERA)
3	Grandfather's brother and sister (PATRUUS MAGNUS, AMITA MAGNA), and their children	Grandmother's brother and sister (AVUNCULUS MAGNUS, MATERTERA MAGNA), and their children
4	Great-grandfather's brother and sister (PROPATRUUS, PROAMITA), their children and grandchildren	Great-grandmother's brother and sister (PROAVUNCULUS, PROMATERTERA), their children and grandchildren

Degree	Collaterals in and below the generation of N
1	Brother (FRATER); sister (SOROR)
2	Paternal and maternal first cousins (PATRUELES, CONSOBRINI, AMITINI); brother's children (FRATRIS FILII); sister's children (SORORIS FILII)
3	Grandchildren or nephews (NEPOTES); children of first cousins (SOBRINI); brother's grandchildren (FRATRIS NEPOTES); sister's grandchildren (SORORIS NEPOTES)
4	Great-grandchildren or great-nephews (PRONEPOTES); their children (HORUM FILII); brother's great-grandchildren (FRATRIS PRONEPOTES); sister's great-grandchildren (SORORIS PRONEPOTES)

Section II — On Spiritual Relationship

Spiritual relationship is a certain proximity which, from the statute of the Church, arises from the administration and reception of Baptism and Confirmation between certain persons determined in Canon law.

805. Principles. - I. Spiritual relationship invalidates matrimony by ecclesiastical law: first, between the minister of the Sacrament and the subject and the latter's parents; second, between the godfather or godmother and the goddaughter or godson and their parents. Thus from the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 2, On Reformation.

II. Several conditions are required for sponsors to contract spiritual relationship, namely: first, that they are baptized [5], for otherwise they are not subject to the Church; second, that they have the use of reason, because otherwise they are not capable of the office of sponsor; third, that they were designated by the parents, or even by the Pastor in their place or in their absence [6]; fourth, that the Baptism was valid [7].

[5] For contracting the relationship, Baptism is a necessary condition as regards all. Therefore, if either the one baptizing or the parents of the baptized child are infidels, even catechumens, the relationship is not contracted by them. Consequently, both a faithful person who baptized the child of an infidel and one who received that child from the sacred font could contract matrimony, not indeed with the baptized child, but with the child's parents after they had been converted to the faith. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 11, nos. 62-65.

It is certain, however, that this relationship is contracted even by a heretic, whether the heretic baptizes, or holds the child at the sacred font, or another baptized person, whether heretic or Catholic, either baptizes or holds the heretic's child. The reason is that whoever has the baptismal character is capable of this relationship and is subject to the laws of the Church. Sanchez, book 7, disputation 60, no. 2; Pirhing, book 4, title 11, no. 40. Moreover, the decrees of the Sacred Congregations are already known by which it is forbidden either that a Catholic lift the children of heretics in Baptism or that a heretic be admitted to this office in the Baptism of a Catholic.

[6] It is not actually necessary that someone be designated by the parents or by the Pastor; rather, it suffices that one who presents himself be admitted. See St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 154, and the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation in Gallemart's note to chapter 2, session 24 of the Council of Trent, no. 7, or in Rebellus at the end of book 4, part 2, section 4, no. 95. It is generally necessary, however, that someone not merely assist materially and hold the infant, but have the intention or purpose of receiving the child or exercising the office of sponsor. Nevertheless, it is not further required that the sponsor have the intention of contracting spiritual relationship, because this is a consequence in no way dependent upon the sponsor's will, but upon the statute of the Church, and therefore it is contracted even by one ignorant of it. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 11, no. 66.

[7] Namely, if Baptism, which is the principal thing, does not subsist, neither can the accessory, namely, the relationship, subsist. Hence argue that if Baptism is conferred again conditionally and it is afterward discovered that the infant had previously been validly baptized, no relationship will be present. But so long as this is not established, the Church presumes the relationship. Understand this, however, when a true doubt is present, which St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 151) calls a negative doubt, namely, when no solid reason favors the validity of the prior Baptism; for if the doubt is positive, namely, if probability is present on either side, anyone can resolve the doubt as he pleases, and, as St. Alphonsus has it, l.c., matrimony can be contracted as though no impediment existed, because no certain impediment is present.

The same must be said in two other cases, namely: first, if someone through error holds one infant for another; second, if someone holds an infant in private Baptism. For since in each case the Doctors disagree - see St. Alphonsus, book 6, nos. 149 and 151 - it must finally be admitted that the matter is doubtful. But if the relationship is doubtful, the impediment also will be doubtful; and a doubtful impediment, as St. Alphonsus himself observes, no. 151, is not an impediment of matrimony.

806. Resolutions. - 1. A godfather and godmother can enter matrimony with each other, but not with the father or mother of the baptized person.

2. Those who exercise the office of godfather and godmother when the solemnities of Baptism are supplied do not contract spiritual relationship, nor do those who receive the baptized person from the sacred font merely in the name of another [8].

[8] The latter point is confirmed by decrees of the Sacred Congregation, one of which Barbosa reports (Collection of Apostolic Decisions 177, no. 9), and two others Benedict XIV reports (Canonical Question 227). From another declaration of the Sacred Congregation, which Gallemart reports in the note to chapter 2, session 24 of the Council of Trent, no. 4, a man can exercise the office of proxy for a woman and conversely; in this case it is not forbidden that two men or two women actually lift the child from the sacred font.

3. Sponsors designated by the parents and unjustly rejected by the Pastor contract true spiritual relationship if they actually hold the infant; it is otherwise if they are justly rejected by the Pastor [9]. - St. Ligorius, no. 154.

[9] Although the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 2, On the Reformation of Matrimony, decreed that only one person, either a man or a woman, or at most one man and one woman, should receive the baptized person from Baptism, nevertheless, it is established from the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation in the case of Aix, March 10, 1631 - Barbosa reports it in Collection of Apostolic Decisions 177, no. 10 - that this decree is not invalidating, provided that the third or fourth person was also designated, who will therefore contract the relationship.

4. A man who baptized a girl privately in a case of necessity can marry neither her nor her mother [10]. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, On Baptism, no. 149.

[10] The same must evidently be said of a woman who privately baptized a little boy.

5. More probably, however, sponsors employed in private Baptism do not appear to contract this relationship. The reason is that in the Council of Trent there is question only of those sponsors who are employed in solemn Baptism, since none are required for private Baptism. - Thus more commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 149.

6. Sponsors do not appear to contract spiritual relationship unless they physically touch the baptized person, because otherwise they are not judged properly to receive that person from the sacred font [11]; for all the texts of Canon law by which spiritual relationship is established are expressed by these words: one who receives, holds, lifts, touches, etc. - St. Ligorius, no. 148, and others commonly.

[11] It is required that while the person is baptized, the sponsor so touch the baptized person that it can be said that the sponsor received, accepted, held, lifted, etc., that person in or from the sacred font. Or, if the custom is that the Priest holds the infant while the child is baptized, the sponsor must either present the infant to be baptized to the Priest or immediately receive the infant from the Priest's hand. Hence it would not suffice that the godmother mediately receive the child from the godfather, or conversely; nor would even a momentary touch of a finger or hand suffice, because this would not be to lift or hold, etc. It is not necessary, however, that the sponsor also answer for the infant, because this answering pertains to the sponsor of catechism, concerning whom something was said above in the note to no. 776. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 11, nos. 38-39.

7. Parents baptizing their children in necessity or in good faith contract no spiritual relationship by which they would be prohibited from the use of matrimony; for this prohibition has the nature of a penalty, which is not incurred without fault. - St. Ligorius, no. 150. - Indeed, more probably they do not appear to contract the relationship even if deliberately, apart from necessity, they baptized their child [12]. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

[12] Since the matter is at least doubtful, the principle prevails that in a doubtful matter a certain right cannot be taken away from a spouse. Therefore it must be denied that through this an impediment is placed upon the use of matrimony. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 11, nos. 46-49.

Section III — On Legal Relationship

807. ◦ Legal relationship is the proximity of persons which arises from legal adoption. A twofold adoption is distinguished:

1. Perfect adoption, by which a person sui iuris, through legal form [13], passes into the power and family of the adopter and acquires all the rights of a legitimate child.

[13] Perfect adoption, which is also called arrogation, requires a rescript of the Prince; but for imperfect adoption, which is called simple, the authority of any competent judge suffices. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 12, no. 3.

2. Imperfect adoption, by which an outside person who is not sui iuris is assumed as a child or grandchild, but does not pass into the family and power of the adopter and therefore does not become the latter's necessary heir by testament, although the person succeeds to the adopter intestate [14].

[14] On the contrary, through perfect adoption or arrogation, the adopted person becomes a necessary heir by testament to a fourth part of the goods. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 12, no. 3.

Principles

I. Legal relationship or adoption constitutes a diriment impediment by ecclesiastical law, although it was previously established in Roman law [15]. This is gathered from the Response of Nicholas I to the Bulgarians, etc.

[15] This relationship invalidates matrimony by ecclesiastical law insofar as Roman civil laws, through which this impediment was first introduced, were approved by ecclesiastical law.

II. Legal relationship, after the likeness of natural relationship, invalidates matrimony by Roman law between the following persons:

1. As though in the direct line, between the adopter and the adopted person and the latter's children while they are constituted under paternal power; second, between the adopted person and the children of the adopter, as though in the collateral line, while the latter's children remain under paternal power; third, between the adopter and the wife of the adopted person, and conversely between the adopted person and the wife of the adopter, as though in the direct line by way of affinity, as is established from the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation in Hortana, September 26, 1734 [16].

[16] These relationships, and consequently also the impediment arising from them, differ among themselves in that the first and the last are perpetual. Therefore the adopter, for example, cannot marry an adopted daughter or granddaughter even if the adoption has been dissolved by emancipation; nor can a stepson or daughter-in-law - understand, adoptive - be joined in matrimony with a stepmother or father-in-law, although the adoption has ceased either by emancipation or by the death of the adopter. A dispensation of the Apostolic See would therefore be required, which, however, is granted with the greatest difficulty even in the latter case. The second relationship in the collateral line endures only so long as the adoption endures. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 12, no. 26 and following, and St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1027, note 2. Adoption is dissolved in six ways according to Roman law: first, by the natural death of the adopter; second, by the civil death of the same; third, because of incestuous nuptials; fourth, because of a dignity, for example, the episcopal dignity; fifth, by sentence; sixth, by emancipation. Schmalzgrueber, ibid., no. 10.

808. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does legal relationship invalidate matrimony through the fourth degree between the adopter and the descendants of the adopted person, or conversely?

Reply 1. It is certainly restricted to the first degree as regards the adopted person and the descendants of the adopter. This is established from Canon law.

Reply 2. It is disputed as regards the adopter and the descendants of the adopted person. Probably the relationship does not extend beyond the first degree, or beyond the adopted person, unless the adopted person has descendants constituted under his power [17], for nothing opposed to this decision is found in law. - St. Ligorius, no. 1027.

[17] You have a sufficiently clear rule if, with the more common opinion of Sanchez (book 7, disputation 63, no. 34), you establish that according to Roman law the impediment extends to those who, together with the adopted head of a family, pass into the power of the adopter.

The persons between whom matrimony can exist while the adoption remains can be indicated more easily. Thus, while the adoption endures, matrimony can exist: first, between the adopter and the mother of the adopted person. St. Thomas, In IV Sentences, distinction 42, question 1, article 2, reply to objection 5. Second, between the adopter and the daughter of an adopted woman, because the latter is not under the power of her mother and therefore does not pass into the power of the adopter. Third, between the adopter and an illegitimate daughter of the adopted person, because illegitimate children are not under the power of the father and therefore in the case the adopted person's daughter does not pass into the power of the adopter. Fourth, for the same cause, matrimony can exist between an illegitimate son of the adopter and the latter's adopted daughter. Fifth, between the son and daughter of two adoptive brothers, because these are bound to one another by no bond of relationship. Sixth, finally, between two adopted persons of one adopter, for this is forbidden by no law. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 12, no. 31 and following.

809. ◦ QUESTION 2. Does imperfect adoption invalidate matrimony?

Reply. More probably, no, with St. Ligorius, no. 1027, and others more commonly. The reason is that perfect adoption alone must be considered adoption properly so called [18].

[18] See in Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 12, nos. 18-22, the reasons on account of which the Doctors commonly establish that the impediment arises from perfect adoption alone. He further observes with the common opinion of the Doctors that from simple or imperfect adoption there arises not only no diriment impediment, but not even an impeding impediment. Moreover, since Canon law introduced this impediment only through approval of Roman law concerning this matter, the Apostolic See alone can define with certain judgment the question whether this canonical impediment is incurred when in the civil code of various nations the nature of legal relationship differs more or less from arrogation or perfect adoption in Roman law. For until a definition of this kind is awaited, private Doctors, adhering to the general principles that matrimony is a thing very favorable and that therefore laws prohibiting and invalidating matrimony, whenever their sense is ambiguous, ought rather to be restricted, according to the fifteenth Rule of Law in the Sixth, than extended, will establish that more recent civil laws concerning legal relationship and the resulting obstacle to marriage are more readily to be interpreted of that simple adoption according to Roman law which produces no canonical impediment.

In France, moreover, perfect adoption does not appear to have force, since according to article 348 of the Civil Code the adopted person remains under his own right. For it is thus established: The adopted person shall remain in his natural family and shall retain all his rights there. Hence it is disputed whether this adoption constitutes a diriment impediment. Carriere, Bouvier, etc., affirm it. But not a few others deny it, more probably as it appears.

And the opinion of the latter appears to be confirmed by this Decision of the Holy Office: In the province of Bulgaria it is the custom that heads of families sometimes adopt for themselves as children, but without any solemnity of law, certain boys and girls. Persons adopted in this manner are commonly regarded among Catholics living there as legitimate children, so that they even succeed to the inheritance. The Reverend Lord Joseph Roveramus, missionary,... humbly petitioned the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith that it deign to declare whether such an adoption produced an impediment of legal relationship. The same Sacred Congregation remitted the petition to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office. Then, in the General Congregation held before Our Most Holy Lord on Thursday, April 16, 1761, His Holiness... declared that in the aforesaid case no impediment existed. Ferraris, For Matrimony, article 2, addition from the most recent Roman edition.

But the case of France appears altogether similar to the aforesaid case.

Several, in order to establish a diriment impediment, rely upon the reply of the Sacred Penitentiary to Lord Lasserre, Vicar General of Perigueux. But that reply by no means decides the matter. For the petitioner had asked thus: Since in the same kingdom of France the law of adoption is now legally received, it is asked whether the canonical diriment impediment of adoption ought also to have place. Reply: Affirmatively, if there is question of an adoption legitimately entered. But the petitioner did not propose what kind of adoption was at issue. Moreover, imperfect adoption, as it has place in law, is not called adoption simply, but arrogation [19].

[19] This reason, if it could of itself have any weight, would rather support the opposite opinion, since arrogation indicates perfect adoption, which induces an impediment.

Point IV. On the Impediment of Affinity

810. ◦ Affinity is the relationship which one contracts with the blood relatives of a person with whom one has carnal intercourse; or, it is the relationship arising from carnal intercourse between one person and the blood relatives of the other. Hence affinity arises between the man and the blood relatives of the woman, and conversely.

Hence:

1. Affinity arises both from licit intercourse, that is, conjugal intercourse, and from illicit intercourse, namely, from fornication, adultery, incest, etc.

2. Affinity can also be contracted between the spouses themselves if either has intercourse with one of the other's blood relatives.

811. Principles. - I. Affinity from licit intercourse invalidates matrimony through the fourth degree inclusively [1]; but that from illicit intercourse only through the second degree inclusively. This is established from the Fourth Lateran Council and from the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 4.

[1] The Doctors observe that this decree is to be understood of the collateral line, but is not restricted to the fourth degree if there is question of the direct line. This observation, however, contributes nothing to practice, because matrimony between persons related by affinity in the fifth or sixth degree in the direct line is scarcely probable, when the highest prosperity presented in Sacred Scripture is that of one who sees the fourth generation.

II. Affinity is not contracted except through perfect and consummated intercourse, or such that generation can follow from it of itself; because otherwise the man and woman do not strictly become one flesh [2]. - St. Ligorius, no. 1075.

[2] The Doctors agree unanimously in denying affinity if the woman alone has emitted seed; they do not agree if the man alone has done so. Concerning this controversy St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 1075) concludes that each opposed opinion is probable; and it is certain that St. Thomas stands with those who require an act perfect on both sides. Therefore, since there is question of an impediment, according to the general principle it would have to be decided that the matter is doubtful, and consequently that the impediment is not present.

As regards practice, however, the rules which St. Alphonsus also has (l.c.) ought to prevail, namely: 1. when the intercourse is established, in the external forum there is always a presumption in favor of the impediment having been contracted; 2. the same is presumed even in the internal forum when the contrary is not established, because judgment is prudently made from things that commonly occur, especially if the woman admits that she experienced a great sensation of pleasure, even though she did not notice a seminal emission; 3. if it is certainly established that in fact emission did not occur on either side, in the forum of conscience a judgment in favor of the impediment cannot be rendered. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 14, nos. 71-73.

III. Affinity contracted between spouses cannot invalidate their matrimony, since it supervenes upon that matrimony already indissolubly contracted; nevertheless, it impedes its use as a punishment of the adulterous or incestuous spouse. This is established from several passages of Canon law, especially from the chapter Si quis, On One Who Has Known, etc. But this affinity, inasmuch as it is from illicit intercourse, by force of the decree of the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 4, On the Reformation of Matrimony, is not contracted except from intercourse with the blood relatives of the other spouse in the first and second degrees. This is confirmed from an express Declaration of Gregory XIII reported by St. Ligorius, no. 1070.

812. Rules. - 1. Persons who are carnally joined are not properly related by affinity to each other, but are the source of affinity and occupy, as it were, the place of the stock.

2. Affinity cannot exist between two persons neither of whom has had intercourse with a blood relative of the other; therefore the blood relatives of one spouse have no affinity with the blood relatives of the other.

3. Two brothers can marry two sisters; a father and son can marry a mother and daughter; indeed, the son can marry the mother and the father her daughter. Hence the axiom: Affinity does not beget affinity [3].

[3] Formerly affinity begot affinity; hence a threefold kind of affinity prevailed and indeed invalidated matrimony. Innocent III abolished affinities of the second and third kinds in the Lateran Council. See canon Non debet 8, On Consanguinity and Affinity. What these affinities were and how they arose, see Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 14, nos. 74-75.

4. The degrees of affinity are computed in the same manner as the degrees of consanguinity; indeed, affinity has no degrees of itself, but only by reason of consanguinity. Therefore, whatever the degree of consanguinity is with one person, such is the degree of affinity with the other.

5. One who has sinned with two sisters, or with first cousins, or with a mother and daughter, can marry none of them.

6. A man who has sinned with the sister, first cousin, or paternal aunt of his spouse is bound to render the debt when his spouse asks, although he himself cannot ask it. The reason is that, since there is question of a merely prohibiting law, the innocent person ought not to suffer from the fault of the guilty person.

7. One who sins with his own blood relatives is not deprived of the right to ask the debt, because he thereby contracts no affinity with his wife.

8. If each spouse has contracted affinity with the other through incest, neither can ask the debt, because each has lost his or her right; and therefore neither is bound, indeed neither can render the debt to the other. - St. Ligorius, no. 1069 and following.

813. Questions. - QUESTION 1. By what law does affinity invalidate matrimony?

Reply 1. According to the certain opinion of all, it invalidates by the law of the Church alone in the collateral line, and much more probably also in the direct line, if perhaps you except the first degree.

Reply 2. It is disputed as regards the first degree of the direct line [4]. Nevertheless, although repeatedly and earnestly petitioned, the Church has never wished to dispense if the affinity arises from legitimate matrimony, as Benedict XIV also [4] Several theologians and canonists of great name who universally denied that matrimony with one related by affinity in the first degree of the direct line is invalid by the law of nature are cited by Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 14, no. 103), who calls this opinion the more probable.

2. The lines drawn from one center to the opposite degrees exhibit the affinity of one spouse with the blood relatives of the other, and conversely.

Degrees of Affinity

The printed diagram places the man (VIR) and woman (MULIER) at its center. From each, direct lines ascend through degrees 1, 2, 3, and 4 to the other's blood relatives in the ascending line, and descend through degrees 1, 2, 3, and 4 to the other's blood relatives in the descending line. The crossed lines exhibit the man's affinity with the woman's blood relatives and the woman's affinity with the man's blood relatives.

NOTE. 1. This table presents the blood relatives of the man and woman in the direct line through the fourth degree. You will easily add the collateral lines, for example, brothers, first cousins, etc. testifies (On the Diocesan Synod, book 1, chapter 9), although it has not rarely dispensed in an affinity of this kind arising from illicit intercourse [5], for example, if someone should marry a wife after he has fornicated with her daughter or mother [6].

[5] The reason for this difference of practice is manifest; for affinity from fornicarious intercourse is not as perfect as that proceeding from legitimate and consummated matrimony, as Lugo observes with others (Moral Responses, book 1, doubt 40, no. 29), since in the former there is only a union of bodies, while in the latter there is also a partnership in a common life, as St. Thomas notes (In IV Sentences, distinction 41, question 1, article 1, minor question 3); but matrimony, as St. Thomas adds (l.c., minor question 4, reply to objection 2), causes affinity not only by reason of carnal intercourse, but also by reason of conjugal partnership, according to which matrimony is also natural.

Nevertheless, since very grave Doctors, as was said in the preceding note, deny that matrimony with a person so related by affinity is invalid by the law of nature, therefore, if two unbelievers who had contracted such a matrimony came to the faith, it would not be safe to separate them without a dispensation of the Pontiff, unless perhaps such marriages are invalidated among unbelievers by positive law. This is readily admitted, because, as the Doctors acknowledge, marriages of this kind were held to be shameful and abominable even among the Gentiles. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 14, nos. 101-105.

Nevertheless, as Lugo observes (l.c.), since affinity from matrimony, whether or not it is a diriment impediment by the law of nature, is most certainly natural affinity, a person after Baptism could not therefore contract with the daughter or mother of the wife whom he had legitimately had during the time of his unbelief. Indeed, from the final chapter On Divorces, the Doctors extend this even to persons related by affinity in the fourth degree. The reason is that, since affinity from legitimate matrimony is, according to what has been said, a natural bond - see also St. Thomas, In IV Sentences, distinction 41, question 1, article 1, minor question 1 - it arises even among unbelievers and remains even after Baptism; but after Baptism they are now subject to the law of the Church invalidating marriages through the fourth degree. See Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 86-89.

Indeed, according to those Doctors who teach with St. Thomas (l.c., minor questions 3 and 4) that this natural bond of affinity also arises from illicit intercourse, since according to Paul they then also become one flesh, it would further have to be said that if someone during the time of unbelief carnally knew a woman through fornication, after Baptism he could not marry her mother, daughter, or sister, because he contracted affinity with them. Although this affinity did not obstruct his matrimony while he was an unbeliever and was not bound by the laws of the Church, nevertheless, since it perseveres after Baptism, it also assumes the character of an impediment. Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 86-89. But since Sanchez (book 7, disputation 65, no. 9), and with him Cardinal de Lugo (l.c.), Gonzalez, Navarrus, and others deny this natural affinity from illicit intercourse, this would be a doubtful impediment.

[6] When there is question of one who wishes to marry a daughter after he has fornicated with her mother, the condition is usually added in the dispensation, provided that intercourse with the mother did not precede the birth of the daughter, namely, so that the danger that someone might marry his own daughter may be guarded against. But the condition can be considered sufficiently fulfilled if intercourse with the mother preceded at such a time that this danger is entirely absent.

814. ○ QUESTION 2. Who are the various relatives by affinity?

Reply. They are the following:

- SOCER, a father by reason of affinity, whether of the married man or of the married woman (beau-pere).
- SOCRUS, a mother by affinity, as above (belle-mere).
- PROSOCER, a grandfather by affinity (aieul par affinite).
- PROSOCRUS, a grandmother by affinity (aieule par affinite). - GENER, the husband of a daughter (gendre).
- NURUS, the wife of a son (bru, belle-fille).
- PROGENER, the husband of a granddaughter (mari de la petite-fille).
- PRONURUS, the wife of a grandson (femme du petit-fils).
- LEVIR, the brother of a husband or wife (beau-frere).
- GLOS, the sister of a husband (belle-soeur).
- FRATRIA, the wife of a brother (belle-soeur).
- SORORUS, the husband of a sister (beau-frere).
- VITRICUS, the husband of one's mother (beau-pere).
- PRIVIGNUS, a son from the first matrimony of one's father or mother (beau-fils).
- NOVERCA, the wife of one's father (belle-mere, maratre).

815. ○ QUESTION 3. Does affinity from a consummated but invalid matrimony invalidate matrimony through the fourth degree, or only through the second?

Reply 1. By reason of affinity it invalidates only through the second degree, because there is no affinity from legitimate matrimony.

Reply 2. By reason of public propriety, however, it appears to invalidate through the fourth degree, because matrimony, even when invalid, invalidates through the fourth degree by force of public propriety. - See what is soon to be said, no. 818.

QUESTION 4. Has a wife who has been carnally known by a blood relative of her husband through force or fear lost the right to ask the debt?

Reply 1. No, if the force was absolute; for that impediment to asking the debt in the case of incestuous spouses has only the character of a penalty, but no penalty can exist where there is no fault. - Thus all.

Reply 2. No, even when the wife who suffered force or fear did not sin gravely, because a grave penalty bears no proportion to a light fault.

Reply 3. Indeed, more probably it appears that the answer must also be no if that wife sinned gravely, because grave fear excuses from human laws, even though it cannot excuse from the natural law. Therefore, since in our case it excuses from the law insofar as the law is ecclesiastical, it ought also to excuse from the penalty inflicted by that law [7]. - Thus more commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 1071, against some.

[7] Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 79) gives the reason more suitably when he says that one who has violated an ecclesiastical law because of grave fear is excused partly because one who sins thus cannot be regarded as contumacious and a despiser of ecclesiastical power, since he sins from the infirmity of nature rather than from the malice of an obstinate will; and partly because fear of this kind generally excuses from the observance of ecclesiastical law. From these things it is apparent that the reason adduced by the Author after St. Alphonsus and others does not always hold, and therefore another must be adopted, namely, the absence of contumacy; so that, even as regards ecclesiastical law, it must be established that it sometimes happens that one is excused from the penalty by reason of fear, although he is not totally free from fault.

Point V. On the Impediment of Public Propriety

816. ○ Public propriety is a relationship or a certain quasi-affinity which arises through a union, not of bodies, but of minds, both from betrothals between one betrothed person and the blood relatives of the other, and from ratified matrimony between one spouse and the blood relatives of the other spouse. By ecclesiastical law it invalidates matrimony.

Rules

1. Public propriety arising from valid betrothals, according to the new law of the Council of Trent, session 24, On the Reformation of Matrimony, chapter 3, invalidates matrimony only through the first degree [1].

[1] Namely, under the more ancient law, betrothals both de futuro and de praesenti invalidated matrimony through the fourth degree, and this even if they were invalid, provided that they were not invalid from a defect of consent. But the Council of Trent decreed thus (l.c.): The Holy Synod wholly abolishes the impediment of public propriety where the betrothals will not be valid for any reason whatsoever; but where they will be valid, let them not exceed the first degree.

2. Public propriety arising from ratified matrimony invalidates matrimony through the fourth degree inclusively. This is proved from several passages of Canon law [2].

[2] In fact, no text of Canon law is adduced to establish that the impediment of public propriety arises from ratified matrimony; and therefore the Doctors conclude that this is gathered by an argument a fortiori. For, as they say, the bond arising from ratified matrimony is stronger than that which arises from betrothals de futuro. Therefore it was equitable that, if an impediment is introduced by the latter, it should also be introduced by the former. But true affinity is not introduced by ratified matrimony, as is evident both from canon Lex 18, cause 27, question 2; from the Declaration of St. Pius V in the constitution Ad Romanum, July 1, 1568; and from the resolution of the Sacred Congregation in Valentina, 1607, reported by Benedict XIV (Canonical Question 291). Therefore it introduces at least the impediment of public propriety.

817. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does public propriety arise from conditional betrothals, or from betrothals dissolved by mutual consent or for any just cause?

Reply to the first. No, unless the condition has been fulfilled, because when the condition has not been fulfilled true betrothals do not exist [3]. - St. Ligorius, no. 1061.

[3] You have this defined in the sole chapter, section 1, On Betrothals, in the Sixth: Since no public propriety arises from conditional betrothals before the condition exists, just as none arises from betrothals lacking consent and from uncertain betrothals, etc. That the impediment arises by that very fact after fulfillment of the condition, even without a renewal of consent, is gathered by an argument from the contrary. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 1, no. 108.

Reply to the second. Yes. The reason is that the impediment is contracted immediately after valid betrothals have been entered, and an impediment once introduced cannot be removed by the will of the betrothed persons or by another cause supervening upon them. Thus from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation reported by St. Ligorius, no. 1063 [4].

[4] See Fagnanus on chapter Ad audientiam, no. 29, and Benedict XIV, Canonical Question 291.

818. ◦ QUESTION 2. Does public propriety arise from private betrothals?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that the Church admits no distinction between private and public betrothals.

QUESTION 3. Does public propriety arise from an invalid matrimony?

Reply. Yes, because before the Council of Trent propriety arose from a matrimony of this kind. But the Council changed nothing concerning this, although it restricted the ancient law concerning betrothals de futuro [5].

[5] Thus St. Pius V declared in the constitution Ad Romanum, July 1, 1568, in these words: We, therefore... attending to the fact that under the designation of betrothals, which the said Council of Trent uses, matrimony contracted by words of the present is contained only improperly,... therefore... declare and define that the Decree of the Council of this kind is to be understood altogether and to proceed only in betrothals de futuro, but not in matrimony contracted as aforesaid; rather, in it the impediment still endures in all those cases and degrees in which it had been introduced by the ancient law before the aforesaid Decree of the Council.

Except, first, if the invalidity arises from a defect of consent. Thus from Canon law. Hence the impediment of public propriety is not present if the matrimony was contracted either through error, or through fear, or with fictitious consent. - See St. Ligorius, no. 1062.

Except, second, if the invalidity comes from a prior impediment of public propriety arising from validly contracted betrothals [6]; for in this case an impediment is not introduced to the prejudice of the prior betrothals. - St. Ligorius, no. 1064. - Hence if Titius, for example, after entering betrothals with Berta and abandoning her, marries her sister, he can, indeed must, return to the first woman; nor does he need a dispensation unless he consummated the matrimony.

[6] This is what is commonly meant when it is said that this impediment is not retroactive. Concerning this matter you have the express definition of Boniface VIII in the sole chapter On Betrothals, in the Sixth.

819. ○ QUESTION 4. Does public propriety arise from civil matrimony?

Reply. It appears that it must be affirmed, whether the contracting parties intend afterward to contract before the Church or not; for in the first case it is considered a betrothal contract, and in the second it is considered a clandestine matrimony, which, although invalid, according to what has been said invalidates matrimony through the fourth degree [7]. - See St. Ligorius, no. 1064.

[7] Elsewhere we have already observed, above in the note to no. 730, that it can scarcely happen that those who approach the magistrate to contract civil matrimony did not first agree concerning it. If indeed they agreed with each other to contract matrimony before the Church, betrothals had therefore already preceded from that time. But if this intention was lacking, not only had no betrothals preceded, which are a promise of matrimony and not of a concubinary union, but neither, according to the more solid opinion, do you have in the acts performed before the magistrate an invalid matrimony of this kind which would introduce the impediment of public propriety. See Appendix III at the end of this volume after page 1078.

Point VI. On the Impediment of Crime

The crime invalidating matrimony [1] is threefold, namely: 1. adultery; 2. homicide of a spouse; 3. both together, provided that certain conditions concur, which we set forth below.

[1] This is an impediment of ecclesiastical law; whether ignorance excuses from it was said above in the note to no. 788, question 2.

I. Adultery Alone

820. ○ For the impediment under this title to be incurred, it is required:

1. That the adultery be true, formal, and consummated. First, true, that is, that at least one of the fornicators be joined in a matrimony that is not merely putative but legitimate and valid, even if perhaps not consummated. Next, formal, and indeed on both sides, that is, that each know that one of them is married [2]. Finally, consummated, namely, with perfect carnal intercourse intervening [3]. I said formal on both sides, because odious things are to be restricted. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 1036.

[2] It therefore suffices that someone knowingly approach a married woman, nor is it necessary that the married woman know that the man with whom she commits adultery is also married.

Add with St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 1036, V) that adultery must not be called formal if, even only from culpable and crass ignorance, the accomplice did not know that the other was married. For every ignorance of fact excuses from penalties unless it is affected ignorance; and, moreover, malice is required for formal adultery, and this is absent where ignorance is present.

[3] In the external forum this is always presumed. These statements therefore apply only to the forum of conscience; in which, if the Confessor truly discovers that the act was not consummated even on the woman's part - see what was said above in the note to no. 811, II - he ought not to raise a scruple concerning the impediment, whether there is question of a matrimony already contracted or one to be contracted. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 7, no. 50.

2. That there be a promise of matrimony made by one adulterer and accepted by the other at least through some sign [4], whether this promise precedes, accompanies, or follows the adultery; but if it precedes, it is required that it not have been retracted before the adultery. More probably, however, a renewed promise is not required [5].

[4] Both the promise and its acceptance must be true, and therefore a fictitious one does not suffice. See St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1039, and Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 7, nos. 22-24, who confirms this from canon Significasti 6, On One Who Has Married, etc. Moreover, a conditional promise or acceptance does not suffice so long as the condition has not been fulfilled. It must be said otherwise if the added condition is fulfilled before the death of the spouse, and much more if before the adultery is perpetrated; for what certain authors say - cited by St. Alphonsus, l.c., no. 1040 at the end - namely, that even after the fulfillment of the condition the promise cannot be called pure, is entirely futile. See Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 25-28. And precisely the same must be held concerning the opinion of Pontius (On Matrimony, book 7, chapter 45, no. 2), that the silence of one party suffices for the promise of the other. For the acceptance of the promise here takes the place of an offense upon which a penalty is to be imposed; and it is very well known that offenses are not presumed. But in the case an offense would be presumed, because in silence we have merely presumed consent. Therefore the opinion does not stand. What is indeed astonishing is that Pontius, as we shall soon see, is the leader of those who deny that the impediment is incurred by one plotting the death of a spouse unless he outwardly signifies the intention of contracting matrimony; and he principally uses the reason that a merely internal act cannot be punished. But now, forgetful of himself, he contends that a merely internal and even merely presumed acceptance suffices for incurring the penalty! We have already observed elsewhere, however, that a blind fury for contradicting Sanchez has everywhere carried the man into absurdities and contradictions. Moreover, even if it existed, the probability of that opinion would be invoked here in vain. For mere opinion cannot be sufficient to establish a certain impediment. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 7, no. 21.

[5] Some strength can also accrue to this opinion from canon Significasti 6, On One Who Has Married, etc. Nevertheless, since probability is also not lacking to the opposite opinion - see Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 7, no. 30 - in a doubt whether a renewed promise occurred, according to the general canon the impediment can be considered merely probable and thus uncertain, which amounts to the same as none.

3. That both the promise of matrimony and the adultery occur while the prior spouse is living, or while the same matrimony endures [6]. - Thus from several passages of Canon law, for example, from canon Si quis vivente 5, cause 31, question 1; likewise from canon Propositum 1, On One Who Has Married, etc. - St. Ligorius, no. 1037 and following [7].

[6] Namely, both the adultery and the promise of matrimony must tend to the injury of one and the same spouse. This would not occur if Berta, for example, while her first husband was living, promised matrimony to Titius, but committed adultery with Titius when, after the death of the first husband, she had married Caius.

[7] Adultery invalidates matrimony by law not only when a promise of future matrimony is added, namely, of matrimony to be contracted after the death of the spouse - for if matrimony to be contracted while the other spouse was still living were promised, the reason for the impediment would cease, as Schmalzgrueber observes with the Doctors, book 4, title 7, no. 9 - but also if the adulterer, while the spouse is still living, contracts or rather attempts matrimony de praesenti with the adulteress. This is evident from canon Cum haberet 5, On One Who Has Married, etc. Nor does it matter whether he attempts to contract matrimony before the pastor and witnesses or clandestinely. For in establishing this impediment, regard is paid not to the validity of the matrimony or of the betrothals, if only a promise intervenes, which are contracted invalidly, as is evident, but to the reason of the crime. But if the accomplice was ignorant of the other's legitimate marriage when entering matrimony with that person, distinguish two hypotheses. Either, upon learning of the other's marriage, the accomplice commits adultery without retracting the matrimony, and thus the impediment will be introduced; for if the accomplice perseveres in the matrimony after acquiring knowledge, it is deservedly regarded as knowingly contracted, and, when joined with adultery, no less provokes the seeking of the other's death than if it had been knowingly contracted from the beginning. Or the accomplice retracts the matrimony before the adultery, or even ceases from the adultery, which previously had been material and not formal, immediately upon learning of the other's marriage, and thus the reason for the impediment is absent. Compare Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 12 and 15.

II. Homicide Alone

821. ○ Three conditions are required for an impediment to arise from this:

1. Mutual conspiracy. Hence it does not suffice that a spouse kill his or her own spouse if the person with whom the killer intends to enter matrimony is ignorant of or opposes this action. - Thus more commonly from canon Laudabilem 4, On the Conversion of Unbelievers. - St. Ligorius, no. 1033 [8].

[8] It is likewise the common doctrine that it does not suffice that someone, hearing of the killing of the spouse, approve and ratify it. Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 7, nos. 56-57.

2. The intention of matrimony. - Thus commonly, although it is not expressed in the law. The reason is that the end of the law is that no one should kill his own or another's spouse in the hope of matrimony. Some with Pontius require that this intention have been manifested in some manner to the other party. St. Ligorius, no. 1034, says that it suffices that certain indications of this intention preceded, for example, familiar relations, love letters, etc. [9].

[9] As Schmalzgrueber says after Sanchez and others (book 4, title 7, no. 55; Sanchez, book 7, disputation 78, no. 19), this appears to be of little importance in practice. For in the external forum it is always presumed that the plotting of another's death was done with the intention of entering matrimony with another, if a woman and a man not her husband concur by common action toward the death of the innocent spouse, or when adultery preceded.

Observe further that these authors require this external manifestation of the intention only because, as they say, the Church does not punish merely internal acts. For this end, it certainly makes no difference whether this intention is manifested to the accomplice or to another person, and likewise whether it is signified in some manner before or after the crime. Moreover, while St. Alphonsus, no. 1034, merely requires that familiar relations, gifts, or love letters have intervened, it is plainly evident that it suffices that one signify that an intention of contracting matrimony is present to him, but it is not required that he signify that precisely for this reason he plots or has plotted the death. But if the matter is so, when can this manifestation of the intention ever be absent? For can matrimony be celebrated if one who is to contract it does not at some time disclose this will of his?

3. Death actually following from the physical or moral action of either accomplice. This is evident from Canon law. - Thus commonly.

III. Both Together

822. ○ When the crimes of adultery and killing a spouse are found joined together, mutual conspiracy for killing the spouse is not required, nor a promise of matrimony, but these three things suffice:

1. Adultery, such as was explained above. Hence it must precede the killing of the spouse [10]; it is not necessary, however, that it precede the plotting of the death.

[10] The reason is easily understood; for if the death of the spouse precedes, adultery, which consists in intercourse with the spouse of another, who is certainly living, can no longer have place.

2. A plotting of the death by one of the adulterers from the intention of matrimony; it suffices, however, that this intention be held by one of them. - Thus Gousset, no. 824; Carriere, no. 739; Collet, etc. - St. Ligorius further requires, as more probable, that this intention be manifested to the other party [11].

[11] What we said above in the note to no. 821, that this is not to be understood of the manifestation of the end which someone proposes to himself in killing, is confirmed from the fact that the matter proceeds equally even if the killing occurs without the knowledge of the accomplice in adultery. Finally, observe that, in favor of the opinion which requires the signification of the intention, not only the Salmanticenses and Sanchez but also Vasquez, who has nothing at all concerning this special question, are falsely cited in St. Alphonsus, no. 1036, VI; just as Pontius (book 7, chapter 45, no. 5) wrongly cites St. Thomas for the same point (Supplement, question 60, article 2). For the Holy Doctor indeed speaks of the intention, but he has not even a word concerning the external manifestation of the intention.

The VV. observe here (page 806, in the note) that the Salmanticenses alone are cited by the Holy Doctor directly and most correctly, as they say.... Therefore there is no need for us to inquire whether the authors brought forward by the Salmanticenses in favor of this opinion are rightly cited, nor indeed....

Reply 1. Even this observation of the VV. takes its origin from their preconceived opinion, namely, that when it is indicated in these Notes that certain citations are less pertinent to the matter, this must be attributed to a desire to censure the Holy Doctor Alphonsus and not to a concern to place faithfully before the eyes of the reader the genuine state of the controversy. Is it not intimated in this very little Note that St. Thomas is gratuitously cited by Pontius, concerning which otherwise the Holy Doctor Alphonsus says nothing?

Reply 2. What the VV. say, that the Salmanticenses are most correctly cited by the Holy Doctor, is not altogether true. For the Holy Doctor (l.c.) writes: It is required, VI, that the killing have been done with the intention of marrying the adulteress, at least on the part of the killer, provided that he externally manifested such an intention TO THE OTHER PARTY, that is, to the adulteress. But the Salmanticenses by no means speak of a manifestation of the intention made to the adulteress, but generally of some external sign of the internal intention, as was said in the note to no. 821. Thus they write (Treatise 9, chapter 12, no. 53): It is required, however, that such an intention be manifested externally, because the Church cannot punish except what it can know.

Reply 3. What the VV. then wish to cast back upon the Salmanticenses as an error in the citations, which even in St. Alphonsus do not pertain to the matter, must likewise not altogether be admitted. For St. Alphonsus here also cites Sanchez and Dicastillus, and he had also cited Sanchez in The Apostolic Man, treatise 18, no. 63. But the Salmanticenses cite neither Sanchez nor Dicastillus there. Therefore neither is what the VV. say true, that the Salmanticenses alone are cited directly by the Holy Doctor. For he brings forward these two on his own account and has not borrowed them from the Salmanticenses. But what the VV. add (l.c.), that Sanchez is expressly cited by St. Alphonsus in the preceding no. 1034 in favor of the opposite opinion, merely shows that the things contained in no. 1036 do not cohere with what we see written in no. 1034.

The VV. conclude in these words (l.c.): But whether the doctrine of St. Alphonsus with the Salmanticenses is TO BE SPURNED, namely, that it is more probably required that there be an external signification of the intention, because the Church is not accustomed to punish merely internal acts, let others judge according to their wisdom.

Reply. The question is not about doctrines TO BE SPURNED, because contempt contributes nothing to resolving controversies, but about assigning to reasons their proper weight. Now, of the authors cited by the Holy Doctor, apart from the Salmanticenses, only Pontius and Perez remain after Vasquez, Sanchez, and Dicastillus are removed. But Pontius, as we saw above in the note to no. 820, casts himself by this into open contradiction; and Perez casts himself into precisely the same contradiction, This impediment, which is called both together because of the double crime united, as Perez (disputation 33, section 2, no. 8, and section 5, no. 4), who freely copied from Pontius. Nor perhaps is the argument employed by St. Alphonsus altogether free from an inconvenience of this kind, namely, that the Church is not accustomed to punish merely internal acts. And indeed, where he asks (book 6, no. 1134) whether, when a dispensation is petitioned for matrimony to be contracted between relatives, the incestuous intercourse which indeed occurred between them with the intention of obtaining the dispensation more easily must be expressed, although this evil intention was conceived only in the mind, he contends that it must be expressed in the petition, and indeed under pain of nullity. And certainly, in order that the Holy Doctor may be consistent with himself, he replies to the opposing argument, that the merely internal crime of that depraved intention is not subject to the power of the Church, that there is question here not of a penalty but of a dispensation, which is denied in the case. But is the denial of a dispensation not a penalty? Did he not himself premise that the Pontiff punishes this crime when he imposes both a greater penance and a monetary compensation?

Moreover, the argument which Pontius, afterward copied by the Salmanticenses, Perez, and St. Alphonsus, derives for the present matter from the fact that the Church cannot punish merely internal acts because it cannot know them is founded upon an equivocation. Indeed, theologians who hold, with whatever degree of probability, that only acts external in some manner are the object of human law do not assert this concerning just any manifestation of an interior act. Let a merely mental or internal heresy be an example. For we all agree that this is not subject to the penalty of excommunication, just as a merely internal sin is not. But I ask: does this sin become external so that it is subject to excommunication because someone manifests that he committed this merely internal sin? Certainly an act of sin is not called exterior because it becomes manifest in any manner whatsoever, but because in the moral order it is one and the same with the interior act, so that it constitutes one total act with it. Now, in the present case, the interior act consists in someone's plotting a killing from the intention of matrimony with the adulteress. It is therefore the mere will, or rather the intention of the end, insofar as in his mind he chooses and directs the killing of his spouse as a means to this end. But what, finally, will be the exterior act in the case by which that interior intention so discloses itself that it constitutes one moral act, and thus can in some manner be called the exterior act of the intention? Not the killing of the spouse, because that spouse could have been killed for another end. Not the contract of matrimony itself with the adulteress, because it has no necessary connection with the will of the chosen means, nor is it of itself the exterior act of that intention. It remains, therefore, that this intention be indicated by some other sign. But whatever sign you devise, it will never be such that it constitutes one total act in the moral order with the interior intention. It will be a signification or confession of the intention extrinsic to the act of intention, but by no means the exterior act of the intention. Therefore, once the equivocation or confusion is removed between the interior and exterior act insofar as these two constitute one and the same moral act, and a manifestation wholly extraneous to the internal act, which consequently contributes nothing to constituting that same act, that argument of Pontius plainly collapses. For when it is said that the Church punishes, for example, an exterior act with censures, what is understood is not the confession or expression of an internal sin, but the exterior act of sin itself, constituting one and the same sin with the interior act.

From these things it can rather be concluded that a new argument arises here against that opinion which denies to the Church power concerning merely internal acts, concerning which see volume I, no. 89. For it is the unanimous opinion of all the Doctors that the impediment of crime is incurred according to the foregoing when it is established that the spouse was killed from the intention of matrimony with the adulteress or accomplice in the killing. But that intention, which assumes the killing as a means for attaining the end of obtaining that matrimony, can indeed be narrated or manifested, but does not of itself have an external act which can be called an external sin corresponding to the depraved act of the internal will. Therefore by the fact itself all unanimously admit and profess the power of the Church over merely internal acts.

3. The death following from the plotting of one of the adulterers, in the same manner as was said above concerning homicide alone. Thus from the same law. - See St. Ligorius, no. 1036. constitutes a single impediment. But if both adultery and homicide separately have their own conditions, as set forth in no. 821 or 822, they introduce a double impediment.

823. ◦ Hold all these things in memory in these fewer words:

1. Adultery with a promise of matrimony accepted by the other party.

2. Homicide from common conspiracy and with the intention of contracting matrimony, held by at least one party and manifested.

3. Both together with a view to matrimony, but without conspiracy and a promise of matrimony [12].

[12] Since this impediment of crime is of ecclesiastical law, it has no place among unbelievers, as St. Alphonsus also touches upon from the common doctrine (book 6, no. 1037), even if they afterward come to the faith. The same must be said if, as regards the first of the received causes of this impediment, either one of the two, namely, either the adultery or only the promise, was made after Baptism. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 7, no. 3. Likewise, as regards the third cause, if the believer was not a participant in the killing which the unbeliever perpetrated. Schmalzgrueber, ibid., no. 46. But if a believer, after matrimony has been promised, commits adultery with an unbeliever, and likewise if a believer, as regards the third cause, perpetrated the killing, or, as regards the second cause, was a participant in the plotting or killing, the believer incurs the impediment, by which consequently, although indirectly, the unbeliever also is bound, just as happens in the impediment of disparity of worship. Indeed, this has place even if a believing wife did this so that her unbelieving husband, after afterward entering matrimony with her, might be converted to the faith, as is expressly contained in canon Laudabilem 1, On the Conversion of Unbelievers, where the Pontiff gives this reason: that the Church does not wish to compensate such a loss with such a gain. See Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 46-48.

Point VII. On the Impediment of Disparity of Worship

Disparity of worship is understood in general as a diversity of religion between the contracting parties. But here it is properly understood as the disparity which intervenes between a baptized and a non-baptized person. Nevertheless, we shall also speak here of disparity of worship between baptized persons contracting matrimony, or of mixed marriages.

824. Principles. - I. Disparity of worship which exists between a baptized person and an unbeliever or non-baptized person renders matrimony invalid. Thus from unwritten law, that is, from custom having the force of law [1]. - See St. Ligorius, no. 1044. - This is established from the common doctrine of the Holy Fathers and theologians [2], and Benedict XIV asserts that it is well established in the letter to the Cardinal of York, section 10.

[1] Since this impediment seemed to rest upon custom, but custom has no force in places in which, far from having become prevalent, it has not even begun, this gave rise to the fact which Diana (volume 6, treatise 1, resolution 15, no. 2), Verricelli (On Matrimony, question 175, no. 6), Clericatus (On Matrimony, decision 26, no. 23), and, after them, Benedict XIV (constitution Singulari Nobis, February 9, 1749, section 19) relate: that certain grave theologians, among whom was Lessius, in a consultation held at Rome, judged that disparity of worship among the Chinese and Japanese in those beginnings of conversion was not a diriment impediment, and that in these circumstances the bishops there could suspend the promulgation of the law. But, as Benedict XIV adds (ibid.), an end was placed upon the question by decreeing that the custom's not having been received could bring it about that, when the Chinese and Japanese began to embrace the Catholic faith, the Holy See could give the Apostolic Vicars a faculty by which they might dispense them from the impediment of disparity of worship. Benedict XIV further relates from documents printed at Paris in the years 1627 and 1676 that this faculty was granted; and several grants of this kind may be seen in Father Perrone (On Matrimony, book 2, section 1, chapter 7, article 2).

Moreover, since the Holy See under Clement XIII, through an instruction sent to missionaries from the Congregation of the Holy Office, prescribed that if marriages between Catholics and unbelievers happened to have been contracted without a dispensation, the consent would afterward have to be renewed, it is clear from this that there too this impediment was thereafter held to be diriment.

[2] Namely, the theologians establish not only from the doctrine of the Fathers but also from Sacred Scripture that marriages of this kind are prohibited by both the natural law, the positive divine law, and also the canons of the Church, and thus are illicit. Concerning this matter see Sanchez, book 7, disputation 71, and Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 6, nos. 121-124. But at the same time they admit that from none of these sources can it be gathered that those marriages are also invalid; and, as Benedict XIV says in the constitution cited by the Author, since that impediment was not established by Canon law, it remains that it be found to have been received and confirmed by the common custom of the Catholic Church.

II. A diversity of religion between baptized persons does not constitute a diriment impediment. This is proved from the fact that marriages between Catholics and heretics are declared invalid by no law or custom. - Thus the unanimous consent of the theologians.

III. A diversity of religion between Catholics and heretics or apostates constitutes an impeding impediment. This is gathered both from the practice of the Church, which has always turned the faithful away from these marriages with the greatest solicitude, and from the express Declaration of Benedict XIV, who calls these unions detestable, which Holy Mother Church has perpetually condemned and forbidden. Bull Matrimonia, concerning the marriages of Holland, November 4, 1741.

825. Questions. - QUESTION 1. By what law is matrimony between baptized and non-baptized persons invalidated?

Reply. It is certain that it is invalidated by ecclesiastical law alone [3]. For in the first centuries of the Church this impediment did not exist, and several marriages of this kind are read of as approved in ecclesiastical history, such as the matrimony of St. Monica with Patricius [4]. - This is also confirmed from the Declaration of Pius VI in the letter to Cardinal de Frankenberg, Exequendo, July 23, 1782 [5].

[3] Catharinus with a few others cited by Sanchez (book 7, disputation 71, no. 6) preferred to hold that these unions are invalid by divine law; Schmalzgrueber reports and refutes their reasons (book 4, title 6, no. 126 and following). For the Doctors who support the opposite common and true opinion, see Sanchez, l.c., no. 7.

[4] See several examples of this kind, and testimonies of the Holy Fathers concerning the same matter, in Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 6, nos. 120-125.

[5] The Declaration of Pius VI does not concern the impediment invalidating marriages between believers and unbelievers, but the impeding impediment between Catholics and non-Catholics.

826. ○ QUESTION 2. To whom belongs the faculty of dispensing from such an impediment?

Reply. To the Roman Pontiff alone, with bishops altogether excluded unless they have obtained this faculty from the Supreme Pontiff. Yet it was never granted to them by the Holy See, although they petitioned for it most urgently, as Pius VII testifies in the letter Vix nova of February 17, 1809, to the bishops of France [6].

[6] The reply of the Author, as is evident, concerns only marriages of Catholics with non-Catholics; for we already said in the note to the preceding number that, among barbarous nations, the faculty of dispensing in marriages of Christians with unbelievers had several times been given to bishops, Prefects of Missions, and missionaries among those peoples. See Perrone, On Matrimony, book 2, section 1, chapter 7, article 2.

827. ○ QUESTION 3. Under what conditions is the aforesaid dispensation granted?

Reply. Three things must be present: 1. that the danger of seduction be absent for the Catholic party; 2. that the children of both sexes to be born of the matrimony are to be educated in the Catholic religion; 3. that there be a grave reason. These are established from the practice of the Church. See the letter of Gregory XVI to the Archbishop of Freiburg, May 23, 1846. Hence the error is evident of those who believe that they satisfy God and the Church if they instruct sons in the religion of the father and daughters in the religion of the mother [7].

[7] These things likewise concern only a dispensation for marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics. But from several Instructions, which you also have in Father Perrone (On Matrimony, book 2, section 1, chapter 7, article 2), the following conditions are found prescribed as to be observed in dispensations concerning marriages between Christians and unbelievers: 1. that cohabitation with the unbeliever would bring neither insult to the Creator nor danger of perversion; 2. that the offspring would be instructed in the Christian religion; 3. that a dispensation would be granted only in places - understand a Province, Vicariate, etc., but not a village in which there might happen to be more Christians - where there were more unbelievers than Christians; 4. that the dispensation would be granted only for grave causes, so that a dispensation would rather be given from impediments of consanguinity or affinity if marriages with unbelievers were avoided by this means; 5. it is sometimes added that there be a probable hope of the conversion of the unbelieving contracting party.

828. ○ QUESTION 4. Is a matrimony entered between Catholics and heretics valid if, after a dispensation has been obtained, the heretical party is unwilling to acquiesce in the condition imposed by the Church, namely, that the children OF BOTH SEXES be educated in the Catholic religion?

Reply. Yes. For there is question of a merely impeding impediment, and consequently this condition does not affect the validity of the matrimony.

QUESTION 5. Can the Pastor assist at a mixed marriage if a dispensation has intervened?

Reply. Yes. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition replied on December 20, 1838: If the other party is Catholic, a dispensation having been obtained from the impediment of mixed religion and the customary clauses and conditions having been observed, it is lawful.

829. ○ QUESTION 6. How ought the Pastor to conduct himself in these circumstances?

Reply. The celebration of the matrimony ought to take place before the Pastor and two witnesses according to the prescriptions of the Holy Council of Trent, but outside the church, under which the sacristy is included, and without the blessing of the Pastor. These are the very words of the instrument of dispensation composed concerning the impediment of mixed religion according to the instruction of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition. It is also established from the Decision of the Holy Office of November 25, 1838. Hence it is evident that the Priest cannot then wear the stole and surplice [8].

[8] Nevertheless, in the Instruction of November 15, 1858, given by order of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX to all archbishops, bishops, and local ordinaries concerning mixed marriages, the following is contained concerning the present matter: But if in some places the sacred Prelates recognize that the same conditions cannot be fulfilled without graver losses and evils arising from them, in this case alone His Holiness, for avoiding greater losses and evils of this kind, commits to the prudent judgment of the same sacred Prelates that they themselves, while the cautions concerning removing the danger of perversion from the Catholic spouse, concerning the conversion of the non-Catholic spouse being sought as far as possible by the Catholic spouse, and concerning all the offspring of both sexes being educated altogether in the holiness of the Catholic religion always remain firm and are most diligently observed, judge when the aforesaid conditions of contracting these mixed nuptials outside the church and without the blessing of the Pastor cannot be fulfilled, and when in entering these mixed marriages the custom of employing the rite legitimately prescribed in the Diocesan Ritual for marriages to be contracted can be tolerated, the celebration of Mass, however, always being excluded.

QUESTION 7. Can the banns be proclaimed?

Reply. No. This is established from the same instrument, in which one reads: the proclamations being omitted. It is also confirmed from the letter of Pius VI cited above to Cardinal de Frankenberg.

830. ○ QUESTION 8. Can the Pastor assist at the matrimony if both parties are unwilling to consent to the Catholic education of the offspring, but the heretical party altogether demands that the offspring of his or her sex follow his or her religion?

Reply. No; rather, he ought to abstain from every intervention. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, June 17, 1829 [9].

[9] But in the instruction added to the Letters of Gregory XVI given to the Primate and Bishops of Hungary on April 20, 1841, the following is contained: His Holiness declared that it can be tolerated that, whenever, from the condition of times, places, and persons, a matrimony of a non-Catholic man with a Catholic woman, and conversely, although the necessary cautions have been omitted, cannot be impeded without graver danger, and moreover it appears expedient for the utility of the Church and the common good that it, although forbidden and illicit, be contracted before a Catholic pastor rather than before a non-Catholic minister, to whom the parties would easily have recourse, the same Catholic pastor, or another priest acting in his place, may be present at the matrimony with material presence only, no ecclesiastical rite being employed, just as if he acted only as what they call a qualified or authorized witness, namely, so that after hearing the consent of each spouse he may thereafter, by reason of his office, enter the validly performed act in the register of marriages. Reported by Roskovany, volume 2, page 818.

QUESTION 9. If a dispensation from the impediment of mixed religion has not been obtained, can the Pastor assist if the law prescribes his assistance?

Reply. This regularly cannot be done unless the Pastor intervenes as a civil magistrate. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, December 20, 1838. Nevertheless, the Supreme Pontiffs are accustomed to permit assistance of this kind where necessity requires it, provided that the promise of each party concerning the education of the offspring in Catholicism has first been altogether required. Thus Pius VII granted to Pastors who were living in Russia and Germany the faculty of assisting, if they were compelled, at mixed marriages entered without a dispensation having been obtained. Nevertheless, the presence of the Pastor does not prevent the spouses contracting in this manner from sinning gravely. Gregory XVI confirmed this.

QUESTION 10. Can a Catholic who contracts these nuptials without a dispensation afterward be admitted to the Sacraments when he wishes to partake of them?

Reply. Yes. This is established from the cited letter of Pius VI to Cardinal de Frankenberg, in which the following is contained: To this we say that, when he demonstrates that he repents of his sinful union, this can be granted to him, provided that before confession he sincerely declares that he will procure the conversion of his heretical spouse, renew his promise concerning the education of the offspring in the orthodox Religion, and repair the scandal given to the other faithful. If such conditions concur, We do not oppose the Catholic party becoming a participant in the Sacraments.

QUESTION 11. Can a Catholic Priest, with a safe conscience, assist at the matrimony if the spouses also contract matrimony in a Protestant church according to the Protestant rite, either before or afterward?

Reply. No. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, April 21, 1847 [10].

[10] Concerning those who in these circumstances celebrate matrimony without the presence of the Pastor in places where the form prescribed by the Council of Trent is in force, Pius VIII decreed thus in letters given to the Archbishop of Cologne on March 26, 1830: But now by these Our Letters We will and command that mixed marriages which hereafter happen to be contracted in your Dioceses without the form prescribed by the Council of Trent being observed, if no other canonical impediment obstructs them, be held as ratified and true marriages; as We by Our apostolic authority declare and decree that those marriages are true and ratified.

831. ○ QUESTION 12. Are Calvinists and Lutherans living in places where Baptism is doubtful and suspect to be regarded as unbelievers, so that the diriment impediment of disparity of worship is considered to exist between Catholics and them?

Reply. The Congregation of the Holy Office itself replied thus to this question on November 17, 1830:

1. As regards heretics whose sectarian Rituals prescribe the conferral of Baptism without the necessary use of the essential matter and form, the particular case must be examined.

2. As regards others who baptize validly according to their Rituals, Baptism must be considered valid. But if doubt persists even in the first case, Baptism must be considered valid in relation to the validity of the matrimony.

3. But if it is certainly known that there is no Baptism according to the present custom of that sect, the matrimony is null.

On the same day and feria, Our Most Holy Lord Gregory XVI, Pope by Divine Providence, in the customary audience granted to the Reverend Father Assessor of the Holy Office, approved the aforesaid resolution rendered by the Most Eminent Fathers.

The aforesaid Decision was renewed by the same Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition on July 20, 1840.

Hence it appears that the following must be established:

1. In a doubt concerning the validity of Baptism, the validity of the matrimony is generally to be presumed [11].

[11] Indeed, validity must be retained according to the decree cited above. For the Church is then considered to dispense if perhaps the Baptism was in fact not valid.

2. If there is question of a matrimony to be celebrated between Catholics and one party certainly lacks Baptism, it is evident that this Sacrament must be conferred upon that party before the matrimony. But if the matrimony has already been celebrated with this defect, it must be revalidated after Baptism has been conferred.

3. Finally, if there is question of an invalidly baptized heretic in relation to a mixed marriage, recourse must be had to the Holy See [12].

[12] Since this matrimony is certainly invalid, if the spouses cannot be separated and the other party is unwilling to receive Baptism, it remains that a dispensation be sought.

Point VIII. On the Impediment of Force or Fear

These few things must be established:

832. ○ I. Grave fear certainly invalidates matrimony by ecclesiastical law, and more probably also by the natural law [1], as follows a fortiori from what was said concerning Contracts, volume 1, no. 780.

[1] Whichever law you say invalidates it, this impediment admits no dispensation; rather, it is necessary that the cause of fear be removed. Thus Alexander III, canon Cum locum 1, On Betrothals and Matrimony: Since consent has no place where fear or coercion intervenes, it is necessary that, where the assent of each is required, the material of coercion be removed.

Therefore, while the cause of fear perseveres, the invalid matrimony is revalidated neither through intercourse nor through cohabitation, for these things are otherwise presumed to have been extorted by fear. For while fear endures, just as matrimony cannot be validly contracted, so neither can an invalidly contracted matrimony be revalidated. It must be said otherwise if intercourse is admitted entirely freely and with marital affection, as the Doctors commonly hold after St. Thomas (In IV Sentences, distinction 29, question 1, article 3, minor question 2, reply to objection 2), or even if cohabitation is voluntary, which, according to canon Ad id 21, On Betrothals and Matrimony, is accepted as a ratification of consent. In this case, if the impediment was occult, it certainly will not be necessary to renew consent again before the Pastor, according to the general doctrine which Benedict XIV confirms from decrees of the Sacred Penitentiary issued by the authority of St. Pius V, Declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, and the practice of the Sacred Roman Rota (Instruction 87, no. 62).

Nevertheless, it is not necessary also to admit what he himself adds, as though relying upon the authority of Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 2, disputation 36, no. 4), whom he highly praises, namely, that it is necessary for the other spouse also, who did not know the impediment, to be informed of it when the matrimony must be revalidated by new consent. For although Sanchez teaches this (l.c.) as more probable when the consent of each contracting party is invalid because of an impediment by which each is rendered incapable of contracting by the law itself, he nevertheless teaches the opposite concerning the present case, when there is question of a defect of consent alone, as also happens when either contracting party consents fictitiously. Thus he writes (On Matrimony, book 4, disputation 18, no. 2): Second, it must be supposed that if, after a matrimony extorted by fear, intercourse voluntarily had with conjugal affection follows, the prior matrimony is ratified and begins from that time to be valid, if the other party, who consented without fear, perseveres in the original consent. And the reason is that, since it is not necessary that the consents be simultaneous, and the consent of the one who did not suffer fear was legitimate, only the voluntary consent of the one who had consented through fear was wanting for the matrimony, as I said in book 4, disputation 15, no. 2. But this consent is sufficiently expressed through intercourse, etc., from chapter 15, question 30, On Betrothals. Therefore, when it follows, the prior matrimony is ratified. And in the same manner, a little later (ibid., no. 3), he reasons concerning consent expressed through lengthy mutual and voluntary cohabitation, confirming it from the explicit definition of the law in canon Ad id 21, On Betrothals and Matrimony. Therefore that opinion of Lambertini must be set aside, since it is not only destitute of foundation but also opposed to the dispositions of Canon law cited by Sanchez.

The following conditions, however, are required, namely, that the fear be instilled: 1. by an external and free cause; 2. unjustly; 3. for the end of contracting matrimony.

II. Light fear, even if unjust, does not invalidate matrimony [2]. The reason is: 1. because light fear is not considered to influence consent gravely and efficaciously; 2. because by positive law grave fear alone renders matrimony invalid; 3. because otherwise innumerable marriages would be invalid to the greatest detriment of society.

[2] In a doubt whether fear is to be considered grave, the common doctrine is that judgment must be made in favor of the validity of the matrimony, both because the cause of matrimony is favorable and because of reverence for the Sacrament, as Laymann says (book 5, treatise 10, part 2, chapter 5, no. 4). To this pertains the statement of Innocent III, canon Licet 47, On Witnesses and Attestations: It is more tolerable to leave some persons joined contrary to the statutes of men than to separate persons legitimately joined contrary to the statutes of the Lord. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 1, no. 432.

The disagreement of the Doctors concerning the sufficiency of reverential fear is easily reconciled if you consider that this fear also, according to the variety of circumstances, is deservedly regarded sometimes as light and sometimes as grave, as was said in the Treatise On Human Acts. Thus Laymann with others, l.c., no. 3, who judges by a similar reason concerning importunate entreaties, which, according to the differing circumstances of persons, may be contradicted easily or only with great difficulty, as Sanchez, book 4, disputation 7, no. 7, Koninck, Lessius, etc., also note.

Point IX. On the Impediment of Prior Bond

833. ○ By prior bond is understood the bond of matrimony by which spouses are so bound to one another that, while both are living, neither can enter a valid matrimony with any other person.

The impediment of prior bond is founded upon two attributes of matrimony, which are indissolubility and unity. Hence it is deduced that the impediment of prior bond is of divine law.

834. Resolutions. - 1. One who in good faith believes that a spouse is dead when in fact the spouse is living, and proceeds to other nuptials, does not indeed sin, but contracts invalidly and is bound to return to the prior spouse when that spouse appears.

2. Therefore, for entering a new matrimony, the absence alone of the spouse, however great it may be, does not suffice; rather, certain and authentic proofs of death are required [1]. - Thus from Canon law, canon In praesentia 19, On Betrothals.

[1] Concerning these indications or proofs, see Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 21, nos. 10-11.

3. The moral certitude required by law is not obtained through even a public rumor unless it is supported by some positive proof, nor through a single witness unless other indications are present, concerning which it belongs to the Bishop alone to judge. Hence in doubt recourse must always be had to the Bishop [2]. But while the doubt remains, he cannot permit the celebration of the matrimony. Nevertheless, the matrimony which would be celebrated in such doubt would be valid, although gravely illicit, if the spouse concerning whose death doubt existed were in fact dead.

[2] Giraldi, on chapter In praesentia 19, On Betrothals, perhaps too harshly requires that recourse be had to the Ordinary if there is legitimate proof only through witnesses, as though that moral certitude which, according to the opinion of all, suffices could not be had in this manner.

Point X. On the Impediment of Age

835. ◦ The impediment of age consists in a defect of age sufficient for fulfilling the duties of matrimony. It invalidates the matrimony of the prepubescent by ecclesiastical law [1], as is gathered from chapters 7, 10, and 14, On the Betrothals of the Prepubescent, etc.

[1] That puberty is required only by ecclesiastical law is the common doctrine with St. Thomas (In IV Sentences, distinction 36, question 1, article 5). The reason is that, by the law of nature, beyond consent nothing more is required for the contract of matrimony than bodies capable of it, even if they are not proximately capable. Hence it follows that the marriages of prepubescent persons who have the use of reason are valid among unbelievers, who are not subject to the laws of the Church, unless they are prohibited and invalidated among them by a special law. See Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 2, nos. 48-49.

It likewise follows from this that the Pontiff, for the good of peace or another just cause, can dispense even with the faithful so that they may contract matrimony below the years of puberty. This is also established by the authority of Nicholas I, chapter Ubi non est 2, On the Betrothals of the Prepubescent, and is confirmed by examples of dispensations of this kind which St. Pius V, Clement VIII, and Gregory XV granted. See Schmalzgrueber, l.c., nos. 50-52, who nevertheless skillfully gives the reason why cohabitation must not be permitted before puberty. Indeed, Reiffenstuel (book 4, title 2, no. 11), with Barbosa, Gonzalez, Suarez, and others, teaches as sufficiently probable that even a Bishop can dispense for a most urgent, especially public, cause, for example, for the good of peace, especially if the contracting parties are near the years of puberty and it is doubtful whether bodily maturity supplies for age, concerning which you have various opinions of the Doctors in St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1065.

Puberty, moreover, is attained according to Canon law for females when the twelfth year has been completed, and for males when the fourteenth year has been completed [2].

[2] The reason for the differing age for females and males is taken from the fact that the power of generation is accustomed both to begin and to cease earlier in females than in males, as Gonzalez, on chapter 3, On the Betrothals of the Prepubescent, Reiffenstuel, same title, no. 3, and Schmalzgrueber, same title, nos. 45-47, note.

Nevertheless, this is excepted in the law: provided that bodily maturity does not supply for age. This is understood of those prepubescent by age who are already mature in bodily powers, or capable of generation, and who otherwise can sufficiently understand the burden of the conjugal bond [3].

[3] Since matrimony is valid by the natural law even though the contracting parties are not yet proximately capable of the conjugal act, as was said above, and ecclesiastical law requires nothing except the completion of that established age, there is no reason why a matrimony could be considered invalid if the legitimate age is indeed present, but the man cannot yet carnally unite with the woman or beget. What is to be done in this case, see St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1066.

Point XI. On the Impediment of Clandestinity

836. ○ A clandestine matrimony is called one which is contracted without the solemnity required by the Church, namely, without the assistance of the Pastor and of at least two witnesses. This impediment is of ecclesiastical law alone, since it was established by the Council of Trent, as is evident from session 24, chapter 1.

For the validity of matrimony any witnesses whatsoever suffice, whether they are men or women, adults or minors, provided that they have the use of reason and can testify to the contracted matrimony [1].

[1] St. Alphonsus rightly observes after Sanchez and others (book 6, no. 1085) that even unbelievers can exercise the office of witnesses; nor is it necessary that they be called for this purpose, but they suffice even if they are passing by chance or are present there, provided that they have perceived what was done. Indeed, they suffice even if they were called deceitfully and for another purpose, and even if they are present unwillingly and detained by force. See Barbosa, On the Office of the Pastor, part 2, chapter 21, nos. 46 and 80.

Two matters must be treated: 1. the force of the Decree of the Council of Trent; 2. the assistance of the Pastor.

Section I — On the Force of the Decree of the Council of Trent

837. ○ The Council establishes thus: Those who attempt to contract matrimony otherwise than in the presence of the Pastor, or of another priest with the permission of that Pastor or the Ordinary, and of two or three witnesses, the Holy Synod renders altogether incapable of contracting in this manner, and decrees that contracts of this kind are invalid and null.... It declares further that a Decree of this kind shall begin to have its force in each parish after thirty days, to be counted from the day of its first publication made in the same parish.

838. Resolutions. - 1. Clandestine marriages are altogether invalid in all places where the Decree of the Council was promulgated. This is manifest from the Decree itself.

2. But they are not invalid in places where this promulgation was omitted either culpably or inculpably; for in those places they were valid before the Council, and there they must be held in the same condition in which they were held previously, as is evident from the Decree of the Council itself, which strikes with anathema those who deny their validity so long as the Church has not invalidated them.

3. Clandestine marriages are illicit everywhere and prohibited under grave sin [2]. For the Church has always detested them, as the Council of Trent declares and Benedict XIV plainly shows in On the Diocesan Synod, book 8, chapter 12, no. 4.

[2] The Council of Trent adds this sanction (ibid.): Moreover, it commands that the Pastor or another priest who was present at a contract of this kind with a smaller number of witnesses, and the witnesses who were present without a Pastor or priest, as well as the contracting parties themselves, be gravely punished at the judgment of the Ordinary. Hence, as Schmalzgrueber notes (book 4, title 3, no. 131), some complain undeservedly about Bishops who have inflicted a penalty of excommunication incurred by the fact itself where increasing malice requires this remedy. Moreover, as regards places where the Tridentine decree is not in force, the Doctors except certain cases in which matrimony can even be contracted clandestinely licitly, namely, for avoiding grave danger or harm. See Tanner, volume 4, disputation 8, On Matrimony, question 3, doubt 6, no. 111.

The Decree of Trent is recognized as received in Italy, Spain, Portugal, France, Holland, Belgium, Ireland, and in parts of Germany that were then Catholic. But it was not received in England, Sweden, Saxony, Denmark, and several places of Germany and Switzerland [3].

[3] In a doubt whether this Decree was promulgated somewhere, promulgation is presumed where the Decree was observed for some time in the parish as a decree of the Council. Thus a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation reported by Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 12, chapter 5, no. 6. Cardinal Petra reports another declaration, Commentary on the Apostolic Constitutions, volume 4, folio 81, no. 35.

Moreover, Benedict XIV issued a Declaration in the year 1741 in which he establishes that clandestine marriages entered or to be entered in Holland and the Federated Provinces of Belgium between heretics, or between one heretical party and the other Catholic party, are valid. But he establishes nothing concerning marriages between Catholics themselves [4].

[4] Indeed, Benedict XIV expressly declared that this disposition in no way concerns Catholics. Let them know, he says, that unless they celebrate the nuptials before a Catholic minister and two witnesses, they will never be true and legitimate spouses either before God or before the Church. Thus in the Letter of September 17, 1746, to Simon, Missionary in Holland, section 3, Bullarium, volume 3, supplement no. III. See also On the Diocesan Synod, book 6, chapter 7. Nor ought it move us that the opposite seems to be intimated in the Reply of the Congregation for the Affairs of the Church of France, April 22, 1795 - see Complete Course of Theology, volume 25, page 689 - where it is said that marriages before an intruded Pastor are null and that the Declaration of Benedict XIV for Holland does not assist them because the Apostolic See had not extended that Declaration to France, as though it would have applied to marriages between Catholics even if it had been extended to France! For that reason appears to have been added there no less superabundantly than irrelevantly.

But a list of the places to which the Benedictine Declaration was extended by the Apostolic See may be seen in Father Perrone (On Matrimony, book 2, section 1, chapter 6, article 4), concerning which, however, observe two things. First, the decrees reported there (page 270, Roman edition) which pertain to Ireland in 1785, to the whole Russian Empire and the Kingdom of Poland in 1844, likewise to the Rhenish Provinces under Prussian rule in 1830, and those (ibid., page 271) which concern Bavaria in 1834, Hungary in 1841, and Georgia in 1845, are not in fact extensions of the Benedictine Declaration. For besides the fact that this Declaration takes its origin from altogether different principles, it refers primarily to marriages of heretics and was afterward extended by a certain quasi-extension to mixed marriages, as Benedict XIV himself indicates (On the Diocesan Synod, book 6, chapter 6, no. 12); but the Decrees which pertain to the regions listed above contain a derogation from the Tridentine decree, or a certain dispensation, and refer only to mixed marriages. Second, with the decrees collected there by Father Perrone, two are intermingled: one for Japan, July 2, 1625, and the other for Curacao in 1851. Since each refers only to marriages of Catholics among themselves, it plainly has nothing in common with the Benedictine Declaration.

It would be superfluous to enumerate here the places to which this Declaration was in fact extended, for each person will easily learn this concerning his own domicile.

839. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is the matrimony valid of those who, departing from a place where the Decree of the Council of Trent has been received, contract in a place where it has not been received?

Reply 1. They contract invalidly if they proceed to another place in fraud of the law, that is, with the intention of contracting clandestinely. This is established from the Decree of Urban VIII of the year 1627, etc., etc.

Reply 2. Nevertheless, they contract validly if they have or acquire a quasi-domicile there [5], because by force of this domicile they enjoy all the privileges of the inhabitants. And this holds even if they transferred their domicile from their homeland to that place for the purpose of contracting clandestinely there, because there is no fraud there, since the privilege of the place favors them just as it favors other inhabitants. This is established from the same Decree of Urban VIII [6]. - St. Ligorius, no. 1080, etc.

[5] There are some who think that, in order for someone to acquire a quasi-domicile and be considered not merely a guest but an inhabitant and resident, it is necessary that he intend to remain there for the greater part of a year. Nevertheless, those who hold that for this it suffices to have the intention of residing for several months, especially if a house, room, etc., has been rented, appear to think more conformably to the law. Thus Suarez, Navarrus, Laymann, etc., cited by Schmalzgrueber, book 2, title 2, no. 19. Moreover, as soon as someone actually has the intention of remaining there for as long as is required for an effect of this kind, the common opinion of all is that the matrimony is valid even if he contracted it immediately upon arriving there. The reason is that, just as domicile, so also quasi-domicile is acquired immediately when someone approaches a place of this kind with the intention of remaining there for the legitimate period. See Barbosa, On the Office of the Pastor, part 2, chapter 21, no. 36.

[6] Benedict XIV discusses the threefold case to which the decree of Urban VIII refers in this manner (Instruction 33, no. 9): Therefore the matrimony set forth in the first and second place is decreed invalid, since fraud had intervened; the matrimony adduced in the third place is declared valid even with fraud, because a new domicile also had been acquired. You have these cases proposed by the Archbishop of Cologne, with the reply of the Sacred Congregation and the decree of Urban VIII, in Benedict XIV's Letters to Anthony, Archbishop of Goa, March 15, 1758, in the appendix to the Bullarium of the Propagation of the Faith, or in the other appendix to volume IV of the Bullarium of Benedict XIV.

Moreover, a certain third case pertains to the question proposed by the Author, one which he touches upon neither in the first nor in the second reply: namely, the case of one who proceeds to the aforesaid place not, however, with fraud, that is, with the intention of contracting clandestinely, but at the same time without the intention of establishing a domicile or quasi-domicile there. And indeed there is no question of a matrimony which that person contracts with a person who already has a domicile or quasi-domicile there, for then, as the Author soon teaches, according to the opinion of all, the other spouse enjoys the privilege of his or her consort. Rather, the question arises when in the aforesaid circumstances each contracting party is a stranger there.

The more common opinion, with Sanchez (book 3, disputation 18, no. 28), Pontius (On Matrimony, book 5, chapter 9, no. 2), Reiffenstuel (book 4, title 3, no. 123), Engel (same title, no. 20, conclusion 3), etc., holds that they contract validly even if they employ neither a Pastor nor witnesses for that contract. The reason is that strangers are not bound by the laws of their homeland when they travel outside it, and especially in regard to contracts, of which kind matrimony is, since in these they are subject to the laws and obtain the forum of the places in which they are staying, as is declared in the final chapter On the Competent Forum and law Si fundus 6, Digest, On Evictions. Nor does it obstruct this that the Council of Trent rendered persons incapable of contracting without the prescribed solemnity, while incapacity, as is said, follows the person as a shadow follows the body. For this proceeds only when the person was rendered incapable absolutely and simply, and individually by a sentence of a judge; but it is otherwise if the incapacity is general from a law. For then it follows the nature of the law, and consequently, where the law does not bind, there neither does the incapacity bind, nor does annulment of the act follow. Thus, besides those cited, Barbosa, On the Office of the Bishop, part 2, allegation 32, no. 153, and Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 3, no. 110.

It is useful here to append concerning this matter what is read in the Acts of the Holy See, etc. (volume 7, page 557), where, on the occasion of a Declaration by which the Sacred Congregation pronounced a certain matrimony invalid, an Appendix is added so that it may be established that the Sacred Congregation arrived at that judgment for other causes:

> "It must not be thought that by this Declaration of the Sacred Congregation anything was taken away from the opinion both of theologians and of canonists when they establish that those who proceed to a place in which the Decree of Trent either was never promulgated or ceased to bind contract validly without observing the form prescribed by the Council, even if they do not have the intention of establishing a domicile or quasi-domicile there, provided, however, that they did not proceed there in fraud of the law, namely, with the intention of contracting clandestinely."

The most illustrious Father Anthony Ballerini, Professor of Moral Theology in the Roman College, summarized this doctrine of the Schools in a few words in the note to Gury, volume 2, section 839: The more common opinion with Sanchez, etc., as above.

And indeed the illustrious Ballerini spoke very moderately in calling this doctrine merely more common, since Reiffenstuel (book 4, title 3, no. 123), Pichler (book 4, title 3, no. 123), Marcus Struggl (On Matrimony, book 3, no. 180), and Ferraris (Impediment, article 2, no. 110) handed it down as absolutely common; indeed George Gobat (treatise IX, no. 484) professed it to be most common. Add that Ferraris (l.c.), Pichler (l.c.), and La Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 712) adduce Declarations of the Sacred Congregation in confirmation of this doctrine. Otherwise, you will find altogether very few who taught the contrary; among these the Defender of Alberti altogether undeservedly numbered the Holy Doctor Alphonsus. You will say more correctly that the Holy Doctor left this question aside. Indeed, you will see (book 6, no. 1081) that on this point of doctrine he opposes La Croix and the Salmanticenses to Sanchez. But both the Salmanticenses (treatise 9, chapter 8, no. 21) and La Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 712) certainly depart from Sanchez if there is question of those who arrive in those places with fraud, that is, with the intention of contracting matrimony; but if that intention and thus that fraud is absent, both the Salmanticenses (ibid., no. 19) and La Croix (l.c.) plainly agree with Sanchez that the matrimony is undoubtedly valid. Therefore St. Alphonsus was discussing those who departed in fraud, not others. This is brilliantly confirmed by the fact that the Holy Doctor attacks only that doctrine which has against it the Declaration confirmed by Urban VIII. But that Declaration strikes only those who depart in fraud of the law or with fraud. Therefore it does not strike the others.

The Defender of Alberti indeed contends that fraud of this kind is found even in the bare fact, although those departing had no intention at all of celebrating a clandestine matrimony there. But the unanimous consensus of all theologians and canonists rejects this interpretation of the Decree, entirely unheard of down to our times; not even one of them will be found who suspected that this sense of fraud pertained here. Since the Defender appeals to Benedict XIV in this matter, it will be helpful to present that Pontiff's genuine and most lucid opinion against this novel theory. After proposing the common doctrine that one who lives outside the territory of the legislator is not bound by the statutes of the place (On the Diocesan Synod, book 12, chapter 4, no. 9), he immediately excepts (ibid., no. 10) the case if someone departs from a place in fraud of the law, namely, with the sole intention of avoiding the obligation of the statute. By what examples does he explain the nature of this fraud? First, by those who departed from a place where the Tridentine decree was promulgated solely with the intention of contracting matrimony clandestinely and proceeded to a place where it was not promulgated. From the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation sanctioned by Urban VIII, he pronounces this matrimony invalid. Next, by the example of those who, having sins reserved in their own dioceses, migrate in fraud of the reservation to another diocese in order to obtain absolution from Regulars. He concludes: From this it is manifest that deceit and fraud avail no one for escaping the bond of the law, and that this fraud is truly committed by one who, WITH THE SOLE INTENTION OF ELUDING THE LAW, rushes from the place where it is in force. Therefore, according to Benedict XIV, the Defender of Alberti wrongly requires fraud in the bare fact if the intention of eluding the law is absent. This is also confirmed by the unanimous opinion of all who hold that absolution from reserved sins is valid whenever the intention of eluding the reservation is absent in the one migrating.

But what the Defender adds, that according to Benedict XIV (Instruction 33) fraud is committed against the Pastor, certainly applies when the matrimony is celebrated in another Diocese or Parish in which the Tridentine Decree is in force. For then the matrimony is invalid both if the nuptials are contracted without the assistance of a Pastor and if they are contracted with the assistance of a Pastor who is not their own, since by force of the Tridentine law the office of assisting as the legitimate witness so that the matrimony is valid belongs only to the contracting parties' own Pastor; and Benedict XIV (l.c.) is indeed speaking of this latter hypothesis. But when the nuptials are celebrated in a place where the Tridentine Decree is not in force, and therefore no Pastor is required by law to assist as witness for the validity of the contract, it is utterly vain to imagine that injury or fraud is present against a Pastor whose office would not be necessary even if the proper Pastor of the contracting parties happened to be in the same place.

From all these things it is now certainly permissible to conclude that the Sacred Congregation declared the matrimony of Albertus with Armanda invalid by reason of altogether different grounds.

Moreover, neither the doctrine handed down by the Author nor the things supplied here are obstructed by what Benedict XIV has in the cited Letter to the Archbishop of Goa, when he replies that for the validity of matrimony in the case it appears sufficient that, before the matrimony is contracted, the one contracting has lived for the space of at least one month in the place where the matrimony is celebrated. For the Pontiff did not intend there to establish that either a stay of one month suffices in the case of one who does not have the intention of acquiring a domicile or quasi-domicile, or that one who has this intention cannot validly contract before the month elapses, or finally that the space of one month suffices for acquiring a domicile or quasi-domicile. He intended merely to provide an indication by which it could be sufficiently presumed that the contracting party had the intention of acquiring at least a quasi-domicile, and therefore, unless something counsels otherwise, judgment must be made in favor of the validity of the matrimony.

QUESTION 2. Is the matrimony valid of those who, departing from a place where the Decree of Trent is not in force, contract clandestinely in a place where it is in force?

Reply. No, even if they contract while merely passing through, because here there is question of a general law of the Church. According to the general principle, however, an exemption from the common law is local, not personal. Therefore those who have a domicile there can use the exemption only so long as they are in that place; if they migrate to another place where the common law is in force, they become subject to the common law.

840. ○ QUESTION 3. Do spouses contract validly and clandestinely when one has a domicile in a place where the Decree of the Council of Trent has been received and the other in a place where it has not been received?

Reply 1. Yes, if they contract in the place where the Tridentine Decree has not been received. The reason is that the spouse belonging to the place where the Council of Trent has not been received is not bound by the law of the Council and communicates his privilege to the other because of the indivisibility of the contract. Thus Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 6, chapter 6, no. 12, and Clement XIII in the year 1767, in a reply to the Archbishop of Mechlin.

Reply 2. No, if they contract in the place where the Decree of Trent is in force. The reason is the same as in the second question.

QUESTION 4. Does inability to have recourse to one's own Pastor or Bishop excuse from the impediment of clandestinity?

Reply 1. Yes, if that inability is common in some province, for example, during some political and religious disturbance. The reason is that, if the law bound in such a case, it would be harmful to the common good and would tend to the detriment of society. Moreover, this is established from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation reported by Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 12, chapter 3, no. 5, and also from various Decisions of Pius VI [7].

[7] Thus Pius VI concerning this matter, in a Letter to the Bishop of Lucon on the occasion of the French disturbance in the year 1793: Since several of these faithful are altogether unable to have a legitimate Pastor, their marriages contracted before witnesses and without the presence of the Pastor, if nothing else obstructs them, will assuredly be both valid and licit, as has more frequently been declared by the Sacred Congregation for the Interpretation of the Council of Trent.

Recently, moreover, a decree was issued by the Supreme Congregation of the Inquisition, by which it is declared that the faculty of celebrating matrimony validly and licitly with two witnesses and without the presence of the Pastor is present when access to him is not safe for the space of a month. Hence it follows that when it can prudently be judged that within a month there will not be a faculty of safe access to the Pastor, from that time, without another delay intervening, matrimony can be contracted validly and licitly in that form.

Reply 2. No, if the inability concerns a particular case, because an invalidating law does not cease on account of a private inconvenience. - Recall what was said at no. 787 [8].

[8] No decree has been issued up to the present by which this controversy is defined; nor does section 787, to which the Author refers, contain anything suitable for resolving this question.

St. Alphonsus, who otherwise denies validity in the case according to the stricter opinion (book 6, no. 1079), nevertheless writes elsewhere (On Privileges, no. 57): Indeed, Pignatelli asserts, AND PROVES in volume 3, consultation 66, no. 5, that in such a case, namely, of urgent necessity, not only the reservation, namely, of the dispensation, but even THE LAW OF THE IMPEDIMENT ceases, since it has now become harmful; for it is altogether certain that a harmful law does not bind, as all teach with St. Thomas. And from this Roncaglia and the Instructor of New Confessors, namely, Giordanini, praised elsewhere by us, infer that, when the case arises in which the spouses have already arrived at the Church and one of them manifests to the Confessor an occult impediment already contracted as a sin, and the matrimony cannot be deferred without scandal or infamy, the Confessor can then declare that in that case the law of the impediment does not bind and that the matrimony can be licitly contracted. Other examples of this necessity are brought forth both by Francis Amicus (Course of Theology, volume 9, disputation 7, section 43, no. 139) and by James de Graffiis (Golden Decisions, book 2, chapter 86), which can also be seen in Diana (volume 2, treatise 6, resolution 72, no. 4, and resolution 73 at the end, where in favor of the same opinion he cites the Tridentine theologian Dominic Soto, In IV Sentences, distinction 22, question 1, article 2); and also by the above-praised Pignatelli, who discusses celebrating matrimony when death is imminent.

Moreover, all the reasons which are customarily brought forward for the negative opinion - see Schmalzgrueber, book 4, title 3, no. 106, and St. Alphonsus, cited no. 1079 - are finally contained in this single reason proposed in various manners: that the Tridentine Decree is invalidating and nullifying.

But was not the impediment concerning which the same St. Alphonsus, with Pignatelli and others cited there, treated above likewise invalidating and nullifying and rendering persons incapable of contracting? And, what is principal, whence comes the reason for the distinction between the case of common inability and that of particular inability? Would not that reason, that there is question of an invalidating law, apply equally? For, as Francis Amicus acutely argues (l.c.), a difference would certainly exist if the Declarations, of which there are several concerning cases of common inability in some village or town, for example, had the force of a Dispensation from the law, which dispensation would not extend itself to cases of particular inability. But those Declarations do not present even the slightest appearance of a Dispensation. In declaring the validity of marriages which in those circumstances are celebrated apart from the form prescribed by the Tridentine Synod, they give the reason which applies equally to each case, namely, the necessity of the faithful, for whom it would be absurd that matrimony be taken away, and the physical or moral impossibility of observing the form established by the Holy Synod. Hence it is that Marchant (Sacred Tribunal, volume 3, treatise 1, title 7, question 8, conclusion 3), after establishing this thesis, There is epikeia and interpretation in that law concerning the presence of the Pastor in matrimony when from real causes that presence is impossible, etc., confirms this very thesis from a Reply of the Sacred Congregation to the Bishop of Tricarico, reported by Gallemart on session 24, chapter 4, On the Reformation of Matrimony, no. 11, because, namely, the reason adduced has the same force in both circumstances. Therefore it is not surprising that the affirmative opinion also appeared sufficiently probable to others cited by Sanchez, book 3, disputation 17, no. 3, and Diana, cited resolution 7. These things have been said so that the genuine state of the controversy may not be hidden from the reader.

Of the eighteen columns in which the VV. attack this Note (pages 807-815), we shall touch upon those things which have some appearance of an objection, omitting the empty taunts which you would say were substituted for reasons.

First, they object (page 809) that it is wrongly asserted in the Note that all the reasons for the negative opinion are finally contained in this one, that the Tridentine Decree is invalidating and nullifying. For, they say, the principal reason for that opinion is that the Council of Trent prescribed a substantial form, upon omission of which the contract becomes invalid and null, and those attempting to contract are rendered altogether incapable of contracting.

Reply. From what, I ask, is it inferred that this solemnity is substantial except from the fact that the Council of Trent renders those contracting otherwise altogether incapable of contracting in this manner? These are the words of the Decree, session 24, On the Reformation of Matrimony, chapter 1: Those who attempt to contract matrimony otherwise than in the presence of the Pastor, or of another priest with the permission of that Pastor or the Ordinary, and of two or three witnesses, the Holy Synod renders altogether incapable of contracting in this manner, and decrees that contracts of this kind are invalid and null, as by the present Decree it renders them invalid and annuls them. But we do not call the solemnity of the preceding Proclamations, which the Holy Synod prescribes in the same Decree, substantial but extrinsic, because the Holy Synod indeed condemns but does not render incapable of contracting those persons who attempted to contract in this manner, nor did it render contracts of this kind invalid or annul them. Therefore, since the reason why the circumstance of the presence of the Pastor and witnesses is called substantial is that the Tridentine Decree is not merely prohibiting but also invalidating, it is sufficiently evident why the Authors finally and in fact reduce the arguments for the negative opinion to this and only this.

Hence, as regards the present matter, the things which the VV. discuss (page 810) concerning the difference between this and other diriment impediments are altogether slight and even empty. In the contract of matrimony, whatever it may finally be, that is substantial or essential, and is so called, by reason of whose absence the contract is invalid, so that it is not apt matter for the Sacrament. Hence Schmalzgrueber, in the very place which the VV. cite (book 4, title 3, no. 106), reasons thus: The Tridentine Decree renders contracting parties altogether incapable of contracting without a Pastor and witnesses. But no case of necessity can supply the incapacity of the matter of a Sacrament...; for because of a defect of natural water it is not lawful to baptize in wine, nor because of a defect of wine can Mass be celebrated with water...; just as in no necessity can blood relatives be joined without a dispensation, since by the law of the Church they have been rendered incapable of contracting with one another. Therefore the conclusion is always drawn from the fact that the contracting parties are incapable of contracting either by the natural law or by the positive law of the Church, whatever may be the cause of the incapacity and thus whatever may be the reason why the contract is rendered invalid.

Second, the VV. object (pages 810-811) that the doctrine which Suarez defends (On Laws, book 5, chapter 28), that epikeia has no place in a law invalidating an act by the fact itself and before any sentence, applies here. And they especially note these words of Suarez: Therefore in no case can the invalidation which arises from a defect of such a form, namely, a substantial form, cease.

Reply 1. The jurisconsult Albertus Brunus (On Form and Solemnity According to Jurists), cited by Barbosa (On the Office and Power of the Pastor, part 2, chapter 21, no. 81), places forty exceptions or limitations upon the aforesaid principle, That an act is null if the substantial form is not observed (the cited work, article 15, from folio 44 verso to folio 65). Of these limitations, the thirty-third (folio 63) is this: Thirty-third: the aforesaid Rule, that when the form is not observed the act is null, fails when a necessity of law or fact is imminent. But the thirty-fourth is of this kind (folio 63 verso): Thirty-fourth: the aforesaid Rule, that when the form is not observed the act is null, is limited so that it does not proceed against one prevented from fulfilling the form and employing the solemnities, which happens in many ways. Brunus confirms these exceptions or limitations by many examples. Concerning the latter, Barbosa himself (l.c.) relates that, although chapter Quia propter 42, On Elections, establishes as substantial form that an election must be made through three scrutiners, nevertheless, if there are not three in the College who can be chosen as scrutiners, an election made by a smaller number or without them is valid. Those things which can be read in St. Alphonsus concerning contracts celebrated without the due solemnities (book 3, no. 711), and concerning a testament made for non-pious causes without the solemnities required by law (book 3, no. 927), could also be referred here not altogether inappropriately.

Reply 2. But we do not need these things. For the VV. themselves (l.c.) adduce the aforesaid doctrine of Suarez not only as regards the impediment of clandestinity but also as regards other diriment impediments. Nor can it be conceived, says Suarez in the passage cited by the VV., that the incapacity ceases of itself, or that it was introduced under this condition, that it be removed or, as it were, suspended in a case of necessity;... as is evident of the incapacity to contract with a blood relative in a prohibited degree, which in no case can cease without a dispensation. Therefore, if they oppose the doctrine of Suarez as unshaken concerning the impediment of clandestinity, they must likewise hold it as unshaken concerning the impediment of consanguinity. For the same principle applies in each case.

But if this principle is unshaken, how then does the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, whose words are read in the Note, approve the opinion of Pignatelli that in a case of necessity even the law of the impediment ceases, since it has now become harmful? How does he approve what Roncaglia and Giordanini infer from it: that, when the case arises in which the spouses have already arrived at the Church and one of them manifests to the Confessor an occult impediment already contracted as a sin, and the matrimony cannot be deferred without scandal or infamy, the Confessor can then declare that in that case the law does not bind

3. Because this is gathered from the Declaration of Benedict XIV concerning the marriages of the impediment and that the matrimony can be LICITLY contracted? How do the words of Suarez which the VV. object to us - IN NO CASE CAN THE INCAPACITY CEASE - cohere with the proposition approved by St. Alphonsus - IN A CASE OF NECESSITY THE LAW OF

THE IMPEDIMENT CEASES; HE CAN DECLARE THAT IN THAT CASE THE LAW OF THE IMPEDIMENT DOES NOT BIND AND THAT MATRIMONY CAN BE LICITLY CONTRACTED?

I said that these things are approved by St. Alphonsus. For he adds (On Privileges, no. 57): But it must be observed that this applies when the Bishop is absent; for when recourse can be had to him, it must necessarily be had. Therefore the Holy Doctor Alphonsus was so far from holding that principle of Suarez as unshaken that he embraces an opinion diametrically opposed to that principle. Therefore the VV., unless they wish to condemn the doctrine of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, ought not to press the aforesaid doctrine of Suarez. And since, as was observed in the Note, no Decree has been issued up to the present by which this controversy is defined, and the sole reason adduced for the negative opinion does not otherwise appear peremptory or convincing, it certainly does not seem fitting that the VV. should prevent someone, according to the reply of the Sacred Penitentiary which the VV. themselves so often repeat, both opportunely and inopportunely, from being able with a safe conscience either to follow in the tribunal of Penance or to profess in the schools the opinions of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus. And if the Sacred Penitentiary replies that these are not to be disturbed, neither ought the VV. themselves disturb them nor proclaim that those persons are to be disturbed.

Third, the VV. object (pages 814-815) that St. Alphonsus, as is also indicated in the Note (book 6, no. 1079), denies that a clandestine matrimony is valid even in a case of necessity. Therefore, rather than suppose the Holy Doctor to be less consistent with himself, we ought to seek a reconciliation of the two passages. And this appears easy according to the VV. if it is observed that in one passage (On Privileges, no. 57) there is question of an impediment from which the Supreme Pontiff can and is accustomed to dispense. But from the impediment of clandestinity in particular cases the Supreme Pontiff never dispenses. Moreover, in the former passage St. Alphonsus speaks of an occult impediment, but this in no way pertains to the impediment of clandestinity. Thus indeed the VV.

Reply. Anyone who proposes a fitting mode of reconciliation is certainly to be received most willingly; but the one which is proposed by the VV. does not appear to be of this kind. The difficulty is in this: where St. Alphonsus denies that the impediment of clandestinity is removed in a case of necessity, he gives the reason thus with the Salmanticenses: Because necessity cannot render capable those whom the Council of Trent declared altogether incapable. Elsewhere, however (On Privileges, no. 57), the Holy Doctor admits that in such a case, namely, of so great a necessity, the law of the impediment ceases, the law of the impediment does not bind, and matrimony can be contracted licitly and thus validly. But the law of the impediment is that which renders persons altogether incapable; therefore, when the law of the impediment ceases, the contracting parties are no longer incapable. But necessity, as the Holy Doctor admits, is that which brings it about that the law of the impediment ceases, does not bind, and that matrimony can be contracted validly and licitly. Therefore necessity can render capable those whom the law otherwise renders altogether incapable.

And indeed the difficulty is further increased from the fact that where the Holy Doctor speaks of that necessity on account of which the law of the impediment ceases, a certain general principle is established. For it is said (On Privileges, no. 57) that in a case of so great a necessity the law of the impediment ceases, since it has now become harmful; for it is certain that a harmful law does not bind, as all teach with St. Thomas. Hence the many things which the VV. bring forward on pages 811-812 against what is said in the Note now fall away, namely, that the same reason applies to each case, that is, both the common and the particular inability to observe the solemnities: namely, the necessity of the faithful, etc. For according to the foregoing, in that case of necessity the law becomes harmful and injurious. Now, to the question whether a law ceases when its adequate end ceases IN A PARTICULAR CASE, the Holy Doctor Alphonsus (book 1, no. 199) replies most clearly: If it ceases contrarily, namely, when the matter of the law would become HARMFUL IN THAT CASE or very difficult, THEN ALL ASSERT THAT THE LAW DOES NOT BIND. Therefore, according to the general principles admitted by St. Alphonsus, even in a particular case necessity renders capable of contracting those whom the law otherwise renders incapable in general.

But what is added by the VV., that the Pontiff can and is accustomed to dispense from the impediment of consanguinity but never dispenses from the impediment of clandestinity in a particular case, is nothing. For, first, the foregoing principles of St. Alphonsus are general and apply to any law of an impediment whatsoever, just as the principle by which he resolves the question proposed concerning some occult impediment is general. The VV., on their own authority, suppose that impediment to be consanguinity. But the general principle employed there is this (On Privileges, no. 57): Where matrimony cannot be deferred without scandal and infamy, the Confessor can declare that in the case the law of the impediment does not bind and that matrimony can be licitly contracted. Therefore recourse is made here in vain to a distinction between one impediment and another. Second, what is said, that the Supreme Pontiff does not dispense from the impediment of clandestinity, is likewise empty. For to what purpose is there talk of seeking a dispensation from the Supreme Pontiff when there is question of a case of necessity in which access to Superiors is supposed impossible? And if recourse to the Superior were available, would not another remedy be ready at hand, since the Superior can substitute another priest for the Pastor? Third, to what purpose is talk of dispensation intermingled here when, as St. Alphonsus says, in that necessity the law of the impediment ceases? Does any theologian or canonist teach that a dispensation must be sought in those cases in which the law ceases and does not bind? A dispensation is certainly defined as a relaxation of a law or obligation; but it is absurd to seek relaxation of a law or obligation when the law or obligation does not exist. Hence also is evident the reply to those many things which the VV. discuss in order to transform the Declarations of the Sacred Congregation concerning the validity of clandestine matrimony in a case of necessity into so many Dispensations, as Jansen, cited by them on page 811, absurdly asserted.

To this also pertain those things which the theologians commonly hold when they ask: Whether, in order to revalidate a matrimony null because of an occult impediment but already celebrated in the face of the Church, it must be revalidated again before the Pastor and witnesses. Those who stood for the affirmative opinion employed a reason which could by no means appear futile. For the first matrimony had been invalid because of an occult impediment; but the second, unless the form prescribed by the Council of Trent is observed, must be called invalid because of the defect of substantial form, which can be supplied by nothing, just as, to use the words of Schmalzgrueber cited above, water in Baptism cannot be supplied by wine, nor can wine be supplied by water in the celebration of Mass. But do those who hold the negative opinion, now confirmed also from Declarations of the Sacred Congregation, have recourse to obtaining a dispensation? In no way; and behold the reason which St. Alphonsus also adduces after others (book 6, no. 1110): The reason is that the Council, in prescribing the presence of the Pastor and witnesses for the validity of matrimony, is deservedly presumed not to have wished to comprehend this case. But one who reasons thus uses not the remedy of dispensation but epikeia. For epikeia - see Schmalzgrueber, book 1, title 2, no. 44 - is called a restrictive interpretation or restriction of the law according to equity and goodness, when, namely, we interpret some particular case not to be contained under a law enacted universally because of its circumstances. Nor does St. Alphonsus say otherwise (book 1, no. 201): Epikeia is the exception of a case on account of circumstances from which it is judged certainly, or at least probably, that the legislator did not wish that case to be comprehended under the law. Therefore St. Alphonsus finally admits epikeia even in that Tridentine law in which the VV. contend with so great an apparatus (page 810) that epikeia can have no place.

Fourth, the VV. object (page 812): If, as Suarez says, license were given to feign and invent cases, the widest door would be opened to innumerable errors and abuses eluding the disposition of the Council of Trent.

Reply. This argument proves too much. Even when a law ceases not contrarily but merely privatively, St. Alphonsus (book 1, no. 199) indeed says that the opinion permitting the use of epikeia is less pleasing to him, because, as he says, commonly speaking, the danger of error almost never ceases altogether in a particular case. Nevertheless, he adds: But if at some time a case should occur in which someone was altogether certain and secure that every danger of error was absent, I would then not dare to reject the second opinion, which permits the use of epikeia. But if the Holy Doctor affirms this where there is question of a law ceasing only privatively, a fortiori it applies where there is question of a law ceasing contrarily, an example of which he himself had proposed in On Privileges, no. 57.

These things have been said thus far so that the state of this controversy may be understood more fully. For the VV. (page 813) censure these words of the Note: These things have been said so that the genuine state of the controversy may not be hidden from the reader. And they add: Father B. would indeed be deserving of praise if he had truly accomplished this and had not rather proposed a spurious state of the controversy to the reader by either passing over in silence or reporting less correctly the true and most grave reasons which the patrons of the negative opinion adduce. Now, therefore, the reader will have the condition of the controversy even more clearly understood when he has before his eyes all the reasons for the other opinion proposed by the VV. and can judge what they are worth, even with the authority of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus being employed.

841. ○ QUESTION 5. Are clandestine marriages of heretics considered valid where the Tridentine law is in force?

Reply. It is disputed. Several affirm it because, as they say, the Church is not considered to will that so many marriages be invalid. But it appears that this must altogether be denied for the following reasons:

1. Because where the Tridentine law was published, it binds all indiscriminately; therefore it binds heretics just as Catholics, since they too are subject to the jurisdiction of the Church.

2. Because if heretics were exempted from that general law of the Church, they would obtain an advantage from their rebellion, which is certainly absurd. of heretics, or mixed marriages, in Holland. For the Pontiff declared that these marriages are valid although clandestine. Therefore without that Declaration they would have been invalid, as has more frequently been declared by the Sacred Congregation. But the exception confirms the law.

4. Because this is established from several Decisions of the Sacred Congregation, as may be seen in Father Perrone, On Christian Matrimony, volume 2, book 2, section 1, chapter 6 [9].

[9] In order that it may be evident where this controversy also stands, these few things will now suffice from the many which could be said.

Therefore let the judgment which Pius VII generally rendered concerning this question in the Letters to Charles Dalberg, Archbishop of Mainz, be examined and carefully retained. It is reported by Roskovany, On Mixed Matrimony, volume 2, page 86, and Catholic Monuments, volume 2, page 94, and is as follows: The opinion of those teaching that the marriages of heretics entered before a non-Catholic minister are null, and that therefore second nuptials will be valid provided that they are contracted before a Catholic Pastor, is neither universally true nor sufficiently safe, and therefore is not to be followed indiscriminately in practice in every case.... Hence it has happened that the aforesaid opinion, which maintains that marriages contracted among heretics before a non-Catholic minister are generally null and invalid, has always had adversaries both more numerous and of the highest authority, so that it has scarcely retained any degree of probability, especially after the publication by Benedict XIV in the year 1741 of the most celebrated Declaration concerning the marriages of Holland. Beware therefore, Venerable Brother, and teach your suffragan Bishops by your example and admonitions lest in examining and judging the aforesaid matrimonial cases they be deceived by these depraved doctrines and fallacious reasons, etc.

It is certainly remarkable that Pius VII attributes especially to the Benedictine Declaration the fact that scarcely any probability now remains to the opinion asserting the nullity of these marriages; but the Author, on the contrary, has recourse to the same Declaration in order to seek support for that opinion! Nor will anyone hesitate greatly about which is more to be believed.

Indeed, while the Author asserts that the nullity of those marriages is established from Decisions of the Sacred Congregation reported by Father Perrone, Benedict XIV, on the contrary, affirms that nothing had yet been defined generally by the Apostolic See through any decree, but that the replies of the Sacred Congregations referred only to certain particular circumstances and for that reason had not always been uniform. Thus the Pontiff in the constitution Matrimonia, section 2: Although His Holiness is not unaware that at other times, in certain particular cases and with attention to the circumstances then set forth, the Sacred Congregation of the Council replied in favor of their invalidity, nevertheless having it equally established that nothing had yet been defined generally and universally by the Apostolic See concerning marriages of this kind, etc. And again, concerning the same matter in On the Diocesan Synod, book 6, chapter 6, no. 4: We indeed, during the space of many years before We ascended to higher dignities, exercised the offices of Secretary of the Congregation of the Interpreters of the Council of Trent, Doctor of Decrees in the Office of the Apostolic Penitentiary, and Consultor of the Supreme Inquisition, and were present at the discussion of the aforesaid cases; but We were never able to acquiesce in that opinion by which the aforesaid marriages are judged null. Therefore it was continually in Our desires that some opportunity offer itself in which a general rule and law might be established concerning either the nullity or validity of the same marriages, for in the preceding time only particular decrees had been made in this or that case, which had not even always been conformable to one another because of the variety of circumstances which were present in one kind of fact but absent in another. From these things it is apparent that the Decisions of the Sacred Congregation were so far from establishing a general law that the Congregation itself sometimes defined the opposite, and Benedict XIV therefore professes that in a matter still altogether uncertain he had always stood for the contrary. And if the replies of the Sacred Congregation then left the matter uncertain, this must be said a fortiori of the replies rendered after the Benedictine Declaration down to our age. Therefore nothing concerning any general principle can be concluded from Decisions of the Sacred Congregation.

The Author then argues from the general doctrine that heretics are subject to ecclesiastical laws and consequently to this law of the Tridentine Synod. But Benedict XIV most expressly signifies, on the contrary, that the marriages of heretics in Holland were declared valid because those marriages are not comprehended by the Tridentine law. Thus he says in the constitution Singulari Nobis of February 9, 1749, to Henry, Cardinal of York, section 17: For it has been proved by the truest arguments and conjectures that the Council of Trent, when it established that new diriment impediment, did not extend its decree to those marriages which gave occasion to the dispute resolved by Us in the year 1741, as can conveniently be gathered from the opinions of the theologians and canonists who wrote concerning this matter, etc. He urges the same thing again in the Letters to Anthony, Archbishop of Goa, speaking of the Fathers of Trent: That consideration raised a scruple in others, namely, lest by the abolition of clandestine marriages, that is, those which are celebrated without the Pastor of the man or woman, the minds of the heretics could thereby be gravely exasperated, whose marriages would have been null, and consequently their offspring illegitimate, since they had never been celebrated before a Catholic Pastor and two witnesses. But since the Fathers of the Council wisely established in this manner: It decrees further that a decree of this kind shall begin to have its force in each parish after thirty days, to be counted from the day of its first publication made in the same parish; since it was not credible that a decree of this kind was to be promulgated by them, it followed that their marriages made without the presence of a Pastor and two witnesses could never have been called invalid, as Cardinal Pallavicini continues, etc.

Nor is what the Author adds firm: that from the fact that the Pontiff declared those marriages in Holland to be valid although clandestine, it follows that without that Declaration they would have been invalid. For the Declaration did not give those marriages intrinsic firmness or validity, but merely extrinsic firmness, that is, it authentically declared what they already were and what was to be judged concerning them; it did not bring it about that they were intrinsically such, that is, valid. Conversely, the absence of the Declaration does not bring it about that they are invalid, but only that their validity is not authentically established for us.

842. ○ QUESTION 6. Is the Tridentine Decree considered to be in force in a Church recently formed among heretics or unbelievers?

Reply. Yes, if the Tridentine decree was published in those parishes. Although by ordinary law this Decree must be promulgated, nevertheless, where it has not been published, the founders of a new Church could sometimes defer promulgation of this Decree by reason of a special difficulty, namely, when Priests are so rare in a large province that from time to time they cannot assist at marriages. But in a similar case it would be more prudent to have recourse to the Apostolic See, to which it belongs to judge what is more expedient in so grave a matter.

843. ○ QUESTION 7. When the faithful cannot have recourse to their own Pastor, ought they to contract before another Priest if they easily can?

Reply 1. They ought to seek permission from the Pastor or Bishop by letter, if this can easily be done, so that some Priest may be delegated to assist at the matrimony.

Reply 2. If they cannot request or obtain this faculty, they can contract validly before two witnesses even without any assistance of a Priest. - Thus commonly. - The reason is that a simple Priest, and likewise another Pastor who is not the proper Pastor of at least one of the contracting parties, can contribute nothing to the validity of the act. This is also established from the reply of the Sacred Congregation of April 22, 1795, approved by Pius VI. For it replied that in these circumstances only a blessing should be received from some Catholic Priest. - See the collection of Decisions of the Roman Curia concerning matrimonial matters at the end of the little work On the Impediments of Matrimony, published at Louvain in the year 1827.

844. ○ QUESTION 8. Are spouses who, in the absence of a Pastor, contracted clandestinely bound to receive the blessing when an opportunity is given?

Reply. They are not indeed bound, but they are to be exhorted to this. Priests, however, ought to declare to the spouses that a blessing of this kind in no way pertains to the validity of the matrimony. This is evident from the reply of the Congregation mentioned in the preceding question, given on the same day and approved by the same Pontiff. - See the little work just cited, page 175.

Section II — On the Assistance of the Pastor

Two matters must be treated: 1. what kind of Pastor ought to assist; 2. how he ought to assist.

I. What Kind of Pastor Ought to Assist

845. ○ I. Only that Pastor can validly assist at a matrimony who is the proper Pastor of either contracting party, and therefore one who has jurisdiction over them or at least over either one. For it is established from the Council of Trent that only the Pastor can validly assist at matrimony. From several Declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Council of Trent, we have it established that Pastor is to be understood in this manner.

II. The jurisdiction of the Pastor is constituted through the habitual domicile or quasi-domicile of the contracting parties, or of either of them, in his parish, but not through domicile of origin or through mere habitation for a brief time. This is gathered from Declarations of the Sacred Congregation and from Benedict XIV, etc. - Thus by the unanimous consent of the theologians.

846. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What period is required so that a stranger can contract matrimony in a place not his own?

Reply. Residence for one month suffices. This is deduced from the Declaration of Benedict XIV in the Letter to the Archbishop of Goa, A Few Weeks Ago, March 19, 1758 [10], which is as follows:

[10] Compare what was said above in the notes to no. 839, question 1.

After these things We judge it necessary to add something so that it may be manifest what is required for acquiring a quasi-domicile. But in this matter no other reply can be given than that, before the matrimony is contracted, the one contracting must have resided for the space of at least one month in the place where the matrimony is celebrated. The definitions of the Congregation of the Council concerning this matter can be observed in Fagnanus..., where, after considering their context, he has the following: A man and woman of Utrecht, fearing an impediment from their parents, proceeded to the neighboring city of Aachen and, after remaining there for some time, contracted matrimony. When the Sacred Congregation was consulted concerning its validity, it judged that the time for which the contracting parties remained at Aachen must be expressed; and if it was at least one month, a decision in favor of validity was to be given....

It could be doubted, however, whether, for acquiring a quasi-domicile for the sake of matrimony, not only preceding residence but also subsequent residence for some space of time is required. But since We have observed that subsequent residence is regarded by those authors who have treated this matter as an aid of great importance for saying that a new domicile was sought, while nothing concerning it was prescribed by the Congregation of the Council in the definition adduced a little above, We are unwilling to decree anything new concerning this matter [11].

[11] These things manifestly confirm what was said above in the note to no. 839, namely, that the space of one month was not established by Benedict XIV as though a stay of one month without the intention of remaining there for as much time as suffices for acquiring a quasi-domicile were sufficient, or as though, when this intention is present, it were necessary for a month to elapse before the nuptials are celebrated. For it is expressly said that a stay of one month is considered in the case as an aid by whose assistance the intention of establishing at least a quasi-domicile in that place can be presumed. Otherwise, that monthly stay would not be a mere aid for presuming or proving something, but would itself be the manifest establishment of a quasi-domicile. The same thing is evidently gathered from the fact that the Pontiff immediately adds that he is unwilling to resolve the question whether, beyond the preceding residence of a month, some subsequent stay in the same place is further required after the nuptials have been contracted. For if he had defined that the space of a month sufficed for constituting that quasi-domicile which was already adequate for validly contracting matrimony there, by that very fact he would also have defined that this subsequent stay was in no way necessary. Thus, with no one dissenting, the matrimony would in fact be considered valid of one who, coming from France to London with the intention of establishing a quasi-domicile there - suppose, for example, a man attached to the French Ambassador to the King of England - contracted nuptials on the day after his arrival and on the same day, according to the example proposed, was recalled to Paris by an entirely unforeseen command of the Prince. For by the right of quasi-domicile he could validly contract; but for one who already legitimately possesses this right, it is indifferent whether some unforeseen cause leads him elsewhere contrary to what he had determined.

But that mention of subsequent residence there is made by Benedict XIV as another aid for presuming whether there was an intention of establishing a domicile in that place is also evident from the same Benedict's Instruction XXXIII, no. 9, where, speaking of the same Decisions of the Congregation of the Council mentioned by Fagnanus, which he also calls Decisions here, he has the following: It must nevertheless be observed that those entering matrimony in this manner had acquired a domicile or quasi-domicile in that place before they completed the matter. For they had remained there for a long time before the matrimony, nor did they afterward depart from there in order to return to their first residence and domicile. Here you see both the preceding residence and the things which followed it invoked as mere aids by which both the acquisition of domicile or quasi-domicile and consequently the validity of the contracted matrimony were established.

Moreover, observe that all the things which the Author adduces from the Letters of Benedict XIV to the Archbishop of Goa have no relevance unless you suppose, what the Author otherwise does not indicate, that there is question of a stranger who, without abandoning his own domicile, proceeds purposely to another place in order to celebrate matrimony there. See what we said in the note to no. 839, question 1.

847. ○ This doctrine of Benedict XIV is confirmed by a recent Decision of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition of December 6, 1843. For to this petition: John and Mary, having domiciles at Mechlin, come to London and, without the authority or permission of their Pastors, after only one month has elapsed, contract matrimony in London. It is asked whether this matrimony is invalid because of the aforesaid Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 1, On the Reformation, or not. The Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition replied to the proposed doubt on December 6, 1843: Let the Letter of Benedict XIV to the Bishop of Goa stand.

But residence for one month in some place does not suffice to confer jurisdiction upon the Pastor of that place so that he can validly assist at matrimony if it is made for the sake of recreation or a stay in the country, or for rural business; because then neither a domicile nor a true quasi-domicile is present [12], as is established from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation reported by Benedict XIV, Instruction 33, no. 7. See Analecta of Pontifical Law, volume 2, section 1886, and St. Ligorius, no. 1086.

[12] When the intention of establishing a domicile or quasi-domicile somewhere is absent, it makes no difference whether a brief or long stay is prolonged there. Thus, for example, if as a traveler you remain in some city awaiting an opportunity to buy merchandise, a companion for a journey or voyage, the outcome of some lawsuit, the cessation of difficulties which delay your return to your homeland, or something of this kind, even if you remain there for five or even ten years, prolonging a stay precarious from day to day, you will never acquire that right of domicile which suffices for validly contracting matrimony before the Pastor as though he were your own.

848. ○ QUESTION 2. Can persons without domicile contract before any Pastor?

Reply 1. Yes, if both contracting parties are persons without domicile. The reason is that they have no proper Pastor.

Reply 2. If only one is without domicile, they can still contract before any Pastor, because the spouse having a fixed domicile can use the privilege of the other. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 1089 [13].

[13] Benedict XIV defines a person without domicile in Instruction 33, no. 10, as one who, having abandoned his domicile, seeks a residence in foreign lands. This must be understood both if he has determined where he will establish his residence and if he has not yet determined it; for in each case he still equally lacks a domicile, as Sanchez notes (On Matrimony, book 3, disputation 25, no. 3). Add that it is not necessary for him to seek a residence; for one who nowhere has or wishes to have a certain and constant residence is equally, indeed a fortiori, called a person without domicile, as the same Sanchez observes, l.c., no. 1. Moreover, for the present matter, in order for someone to be called without domicile in relation to a parish, it is not even necessary that he seek a domicile in some remote or foreign region. Rather, it is generally sufficient that, after abandoning his prior parish, he has not yet established a residence in another, because he is then truly without a parish, since he has lost the prior parish and has not yet acquired another. Therefore: 1. one who, after abandoning a parish, has not yet found a house in which to live and meanwhile lodges in some place is without domicile; 2. even if he has found the house in which he will live, but lodges elsewhere while the found house is being vacated by its former inhabitant, he is likewise without domicile as regards the parish; 3. thus also if he has arrived in a city and has not yet determined in what part he will live, he is numbered among persons without domicile or without a parish. Sanchez, l.c., no. 4.

The Holy Council of Trent, moreover, commands Pastors two things regarding persons without domicile, session 24, chapter 7, On the Reformation of Matrimony: 1. that they not be present at their marriages unless they have first made a diligent inquiry; 2. that, after the matter has been reported to the Ordinary, they obtain from him permission to do this. You have the manner of the inquiry in the Instruction which the Holy Inquisition, with Clement X approving, added; Giraldi (Exposition of Pontifical Law, section 656), Ferraris (Instruction of Pastors, nos. 36-53), and in part St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1089, report it in full with other encyclicals of the same Inquisition.

QUESTION 3. Can a suspended, irregular, excommunicated, or schismatic Pastor assist VALIDLY at matrimony?

Reply. Yes, provided that he has not renounced the title or been canonically deposed from it. - Thus commonly. - But generally he would assist illicitly [14]. - St. Ligorius, nos. 1085, 1084.

[14] The Pastor in the case is not a minister of the Sacrament, but a mere witness; and the Doctors do not agree among themselves whether he sins when he assists after being requested by the contracting parties. But St. Alphonsus appears to require too much when he requires in the contracting parties a most grave cause for requesting him, since otherwise he does not require so grave a cause in order that Sacraments may licitly be sought from an unworthy minister.

Add here that a Pastor validly assists at a matrimony even if he is not yet a Priest, and although the Bishop has prohibited this to him. The same must be said of the Vicar General if, contrary to the prohibition of the Bishop, either he himself assists at a matrimony or gives some Priest the faculty of assisting. See St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 1081, and Benedict XIV, Canonical Question 98.

Both Cardinals in their respective Titles and in churches subject to them, and Pontifical Legates in provinces entrusted to them, have the faculty of assisting at marriages. See Ferraris, Matrimony, article 3, nos. 12, 20, 45.

The VV. observe here (page 816, in the Note) that the things said in the first part of this Note do not cohere with the Note to no. 960, where it is said that a Pastor who is to be avoided assists at matrimony validly but illicitly.

Reply. That in the one place it is merely affirmed that the Doctors do not agree among themselves concerning the proposed question, as is seen in the present Note, while in the other one of several opinions is admitted, as is contained in the Note to no. 960, involves no conflict, all the more because in the latter place the principal question, namely, whether the Pastor sins gravely or lightly, is not resolved by the word ILLICITLY, but at most the opinion of those who exempt the Pastor from every sin is set aside. For St. Alphonsus in fact reports three opinions thus (book 6, no. 1083): Whether a Pastor excommunicated as one to be avoided sins gravely by assisting, Coninck and Pontius... affirm. But Sanchez, Bossius, Hurtadus, Diana,

Villalobos, Leander, etc., deny it; some of these hold that he does not even sin lightly. Indeed, the question is not altogether resolved against the third opinion either, because there is no inquiry there concerning whether the Pastor did or did not first take care to substitute another Priest for himself in that office.

But against what is said in the Note, namely, that St. Alphonsus appears to require too much in the case when he requires in the contracting parties a MOST GRAVE cause for requesting the Pastor, they object (page 817) that a most grave cause is required, because otherwise, without necessity, there would be communication in a sacred and grave matter with a person to be avoided.

Reply. For some necessity to exist in a matter of this kind, a most grave cause is not required, but even a necessity or merely grave, or non-light, cause can suffice. Hence, although Suarez treats of a graver matter, namely, seeking Sacraments from one to be avoided, he does not require a most grave cause but some just necessity (On Censures, disputation 16, no. 27); the Doctors generally call a cause just which is considered sufficient to excuse from the ecclesiastical precept in question. In this matter it must also be kept before one's eyes that, when the Church excommunicates someone by name, it certainly imposes a precept both upon the excommunicated person not to mingle with the faithful, especially in a sacred matter, and upon the faithful to avoid communication with him. Nevertheless, it is sufficiently clear that by this the Church intends to inflict a grave penalty upon the contumacious guilty person, not to punish the faithful, as it were, by imposing a most grave burden. Hence the Doctors cited by the Salmanticenses (treatise 9, chapter 8, no. 48) find a sufficient necessity which excuses the person to be avoided from sin, at least grave sin, in assisting at marriages when when he executes his office for the utility of others. Therefore their utility suffices for excusing the others. For it is well known - see Suarez, l.c. - that a cause which excuses the one conferring also excuses the recipients, and conversely. Nevertheless, the Pastor will not be excused from sin if, when he can easily and without burden to others, he does not commit the office of assisting at the matrimony to another.

849. ○ QUESTION 4. Does a Priest who is falsely considered the Pastor assist validly?

Reply. Yes, if he has a colorable title and is regarded as the Pastor from common error. The reason is that the Church then supplies jurisdiction for the common good. - Thus all. It also appears more probable that the same must be said if common error alone is present without a colorable title, for the same reason, as was said concerning jurisdiction in the internal forum in the Treatise On Penance, no. 548.

QUESTION 5. Does any Priest validly assist at matrimony with the presumed permission of the Pastor?

Reply. No, because it is not true permission; tacit permission, however, or even permission extorted by fear or deceit, suffices. - St. Ligorius, no. 1088, and others commonly.

850. ○ QUESTION 6. Can a Vicar validly assist at matrimony apart from the delegation of the Pastor?

Reply 1. Yes, if the Vicar supplies the place of a deceased or absent Pastor; for then he is certainly delegated for the universality of causes. Indeed, then he can also subdelegate another, for by law one delegated for the universality of causes can subdelegate another for a particular case. - Recall what was said in the Treatise On Laws, no. 116, and On Penance, no. 545.

Reply 2. But if the Vicar is the cooperator of a present Pastor, there is greater difficulty, nor can the matter be defined by a general and absolute rule. Therefore attend to the statutes or custom of the dioceses. For a Bishop constituting Vicars as assistants of the Pastor can either confer upon them immediately the right of assisting at marriages or leave that right to be committed to them by delegation of the Pastor. But according to the custom more commonly received in France and in other places, it appears that the following can be established:

1. The Vicar can assist at the matrimony of parishioners celebrated in the parish itself, because he exercises the office of the Pastor himself.

2. The Vicar can also appoint another Priest to assist at matrimony in a particular case. The reason is that, while the aforesaid custom is in force, he is delegated for the universality of causes and consequently can subdelegate another. - Bouvier, chapter 7, article 6. - Carriere, no. 1344.

II. How the Pastor Ought to Assist

851. Principles. - I. It is required and sufficient for the validity of matrimony that the Pastor be morally present, like a witness who must give testimony concerning a completed matter. The reason is that the Pastor is employed here as the principal witness deputed by the Church, as is established from Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 13, chapter 23.

II. It is required that the Pastor be addressed and advised concerning what the contracting parties wish to do, or that he be employed by them. The reason is that otherwise the Pastor is not considered to attend to what is being done, nor can he judge that those who act wish to act seriously [15]. It is not required, however, that he was expressly called for this purpose. For it would suffice if he were present there by chance, or had been summoned under another pretext. This is evident from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation. - Carriere, Compendium, no. 309. - Bouvier.

[15] It suffices that while the contracting parties express consent they give some sign, for example, with the eyes, modulation of the voice, a nod, etc., by which they indicate to the Pastor that they wish to have him as a witness, even though he was not previously informed or called, and by chance, thinking nothing of it, hears them after he has been called to it, etc. These are the words of a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation reported by Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 13, chapter 23, no. 1.

Hence:

1. The merely physical presence of the Pastor does not suffice, since he must attend to what is being done. Hence one who is drunk, sleeping, or insane cannot assist at matrimony.

2. It is not necessary that he see the contracting parties, provided that he hears them clearly expressing their consent. Therefore a blind man can assist at matrimony, but not one both blind and deaf.

852. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does a Pastor coerced by force and fear assist validly?

Reply. Yes, because according to law it suffices that he be present and know what is being done, whether willing or unwilling. This is manifest from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation. - See St. Ligorius, no. 1092 [16].

[16] The case must not be omitted in which the Pastor, wishing to resist lest he be regarded as a witness, closes his eyes, blocks his ears, or shouts and attempts to flee, so that he may render the act invalid because he can afterward affirm that he saw or heard nothing. But the Sacred Congregation has already replied a hundred times with what is also contained in the reply to the Bishop of Jaen in the year 1581, reported by Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 13, chapter 23, no. 1:

namely, that the matrimony is invalid if the Pastor neither saw nor heard the things being done, UNLESS, HOWEVER, HE AFFECTED NOT TO UNDERSTAND.

Weighing this clause, Benedict XIV (l.c., no. 11) teaches that it must be understood of the case in which the Pastor, unwillingly employed for the contract of matrimony, therefore neither sees nor perceives because he deliberately wished neither to see nor to perceive, although he naturally could have both seen and perceived in the same manner as the witnesses employed for that same contract admit that they saw and perceived. He then treats of a case argued in the year 1753: Celebrated in the preceding year 1753 was the Carthaginian matrimonial case, argued and judged in the Congregation of the Council, in which there was question of a certain matrimony contracted before a Pastor unexpectedly found in his own house, who had indeed seen the man and perceived his words, but had neither seen nor heard the woman. After recalling the studies of theologians and opinions of the Doctors, he concludes: But when the fact itself concerning which there was question had been accurately weighed and all its circumstances diligently examined, it was manifestly established that, if the Pastor did not see the woman and did not understand her words, this happened because he himself, with a fixed mind, was unwilling to see and hear her, although he could easily have seen and heard her, just as the witnesses employed for that act had seen well and heard correctly. Therefore judgment was rendered, and with Our assent a sentence proceeded in favor of the validity of the matrimony.

QUESTION 2. In what place can the Pastor or a Priest deputed by him assist at matrimony?

Reply 1. He can assist validly everywhere, even outside the parish. Reply 2. Apart from a grave cause, he cannot assist licitly except: 1. in his own parish church; 2. in another parish church with the consent of the Pastor of that place; 3. in private chapels or oratories with the permission of the Bishop in whose territory the place is situated.

853. ○ QUESTION 3. Can or ought a blessing be given to the spouses in every case?

Reply 1. If by the name blessing are understood the words, I join you together, etc., it must always be given under grave obligation [17] in a matrimony of Catholics, because it is prescribed by the Council of Trent.

[17] This resolution is opposed to the canon received by all, that nothing is to be condemned as mortal unless it is certainly established. See volume 1, no. 152, in the note. Only a few, against many others cited by St. Alphonsus, no. 1094, have said, merely as an opinion, that this omission can be regarded as grave.

The VV. here oppose the opinion of St. Alphonsus (page 947, no. 159), who writes in book 6, no. 1094: Pontius, Sanchez, Palaus, and the Salmanticenses with Gutierrez and Bonacina teach probably that it is not mortal if the Pastor omits, "I join you together," etc. Add Coninck, Villalobos, and Diana, cited by Busembaum in that place. But Bossius with Rebellus, Barbosa, Veracruz, and Salsedus still probably, and perhaps more probably, say that it is mortal, because it appears to be a transgression in a matter of great moment.

Reply. The Note recalls the Canon received by all, that nothing is to be condemned as mortal unless it is certainly established; and St. Alphonsus himself most earnestly inculcates this Canon both in the Moral System, final proposition, and in the Treatise On Penance, book 6, no. 604.

Moreover, in the present question St. Alphonsus admits that each opinion is probable and, merely with some doubt, says that PERHAPS the latter is more probable. Therefore, since the Holy Doctor himself defines the matter to be plainly uncertain, this doubtful greater probability can now serve for mere erudition, but not for the use of confessors or as a rule of consciences. Indeed, it is especially suited for confirming that this omission cannot be condemned as a grave fault.

Reply 2. But the blessing which is called solemn and is given at Mass must always be given unless the bride is a widow [18]. - Recall what was said at nos. 770, 829, and following.

[18] The Doctors disagree wonderfully concerning this. Some generally will that any nuptials whatsoever be blessed, provided that they are just; others contend that they are not to be blessed when each spouse, or at least either spouse, has received the blessing; others with St. Thomas say that they are to be blessed when a widower marries a virgin, but otherwise if she is a widow. Schmalzgrueber rightly concludes (book 4, title 21, nos. 41-42) that one who conforms himself to the Ritual of his own Church will act best, for in this the custom of his own Church will appear.

Point XII. On the Impediment of Impotence

854. ○ Impotence for performing the matrimonial offices, or incapacity for carnal intercourse of itself apt for generation, is distinguished in several ways, namely:

1. Certain or doubtful, according as it is or is not manifest.

2. Antecedent or consequent, according as it precedes the matrimony or follows it.

3. Temporary or perpetual, according as it can or cannot be removed by the passage of time or by art.

4. Natural or accidental, according as it arises from an intrinsic defect or from an extrinsic cause, for example, sorcery.

5. Absolute or relative, according as it exists between a man and all women, or between a man and some determinate woman; or conversely.

855. Principles. - I. Antecedent and perpetual impotence, whether absolute or relative, renders matrimony invalid by the natural law. The reason is that the object of the matrimonial contract does not exist, since intercourse is impossible. This is also established from Canon law. - St. Ligorius, no. 1095.

II. Consequent impotence and temporary antecedent impotence do not invalidate matrimony. The reason is that the actual use of matrimony does not pertain to its essence, and it suffices that consummation either was possible at the time of the contract or will be possible in the future.

III. Impotence certainly known renders the use of matrimony illicit, even if only attempted, because where intercourse cannot be completed [1], the end which renders the union licit is absent.

[1] Where there is question of impotence consequent upon matrimony, according to the principles now commonly received in the schools of physicians or physiologists, the case will be very rare in which conjugal intercourse ought to be forbidden to spouses as though illicit by reason of impotence. For conjugal intercourse must then be called altogether illicit only when, considering its nature in itself, its natural effect, namely, conception or generation, can in no manner whatsoever follow from it. On the contrary, it must be considered licit when generation cannot easily be hoped for but is nevertheless not impossible, and otherwise nothing more can be accomplished by the spouses in those circumstances. But as often as the man still retains the power of emitting seminal substance in some manner, intercourse of this kind, from which generation, although with difficulty, can nevertheless absolutely follow, will scarcely ever be impossible for spouses. For it is now commonly received among physiologists and physicians, as experience has taught, that for conception and the effect of generation it is by no means necessary that the man emit seminal fluid and inject it even into the more interior parts of the female organ; rather, it suffices that fluid of this kind be poured and applied to the external surface of the same organ, or to the mouth or entrance of the vagina, as they say. Thus Vallisnieri, History of the Generation of Man, part 1, chapter 8, no. 7, and part 2, chapter 13; so also the more recent medical dictionaries compiled from the studies of men more celebrated in medical science, one of which appeared at Venice in the year 1834 under the title Classical Dictionary of Internal and External Medicine, and the other likewise at Venice in 1840 under the title Dictionary of Practical Medicine, Surgery, and Pharmacy. The former, under the entry Impotence, volume XVII, page 89, says: Many facts tend to demonstrate that it suffices that the seminal fluid be deposited at the entrance of the woman's sexual parts in order that fertilization occur. Therefore it concludes, ibid., page 101: It would not be lawful to affirm that an individual capable of emitting semen upon the more external genital parts of the woman is absolutely incapable of reproduction. But the latter, likewise says under the entry Impotence, volume 3, page 691: Since several facts tend to demonstrate that it sometimes suffices for semen to be deposited at the entrance of the genital parts in order to fertilize, absolute impotence will not be decided except when, etc. Finally, more recently Louis Fleury says the same in the work entitled Therapeutic and

Clinical Treatise on Hydrotherapy, Paris, 1866, page 1025: Fertilization can occur in the absence of all penile intromission, by the mere presence of semen at the orifice of the vagina.

I said, however, where there is question of impotence consequent upon matrimony, namely, when there can be question only of the morality of the act between spouses certainly legitimate. For if there were question of antecedent impotence, the question would already concern the validity of the matrimony, and this must be left to the ecclesiastical judge to resolve.

I said further, if otherwise nothing more can be accomplished by the spouses in those circumstances. For it must not be thought that, because generation remains possible in some manner from that mode of uniting and thus, since the end of the seminal substance is not altogether frustrated, the act cannot be called repugnant to nature, it is therefore lawful for spouses to use matrimonial rights in that most imperfect manner whenever they can unite in a more suitable manner. For although generally they are not bound to employ the greatest diligence so that the effect intended by nature in the conjugal work may follow more certainly, they are nevertheless bound to avoid, insofar as it lies in their power, that mode of the act by reason of which generation not only can be impeded but can be attained only with the greatest difficulty.

Meanwhile, the Confessor will diligently observe that the occasion for employing the foregoing principles of physiological science is not restricted only to those circumstances in which the man is unable to fulfill his part more perfectly than was said there. For it happens perhaps more frequently that, while the man could fulfill his office perfectly, nevertheless the female organs serving this work, or even the present condition of health and constitution, are affected by such discomforts and diseases that they in no way permit intercourse more perfect than the aforesaid. But since these diseases or this condition do not altogether impede the effect intended by nature but still leave generation possible of itself, conjugal intercourse in those circumstances, although less perfect, cannot therefore be forbidden as illicit. The same must also be observed concerning the elderly, to whom theologians permit the use of marriage - see below, no. 908, resolution 4 - provided that they can sufficiently complete the act or do not have an empty hope of completing it. For they can be considered sufficiently capable of the act so long as at least they can fulfill their part in the aforesaid manner.

856. Resolutions. - 1. Eunuchs or castrated men deprived of both testicles are regarded as impotent, but not if they lack only one.

2. In a doubt concerning antecedent impotence, judgment must be made in favor of the validity of the matrimony, and the spouses must be permitted to attempt intercourse. Indeed, three years are granted to them for this by Canon law, notwithstanding a greater probability in favor of perpetual impotence. - St. Ligorius, no. 1103.

3. In a doubt concerning consequent impotence, the spouses are likewise permitted to attempt intercourse until they are certain that it can in no manner be completed. - St. Ligorius, no. 1101. The Confessor, however, ought to proceed cautiously; and if he discovers that impotent spouses are in good faith, it will more frequently be better to abstain from admonition, lest they fall from material sin into formal sin.

4. Impotence must not be confused with sterility; for sterile persons are not impotent for the conjugal act. Hence elderly persons who are able to consummate matrimony contract validly; likewise women who can receive semen even if they do not retain it. - St. Ligorius, no. 1095. - Gousset, no. 791.

5. The Confessor must take the greatest care not to proceed rashly in a matter of such great moment and subject to so many difficulties, or to decide anything by his own authority. Rather, after duly examining the case with all its circumstances, he must refer it to the Ordinary, to whom it will then belong to establish and determine what ought to be done in a matter of this kind. Indeed, as it appears to us, a prudent and discreet Confessor will not question spouses concerning impotence, nor admonish even those whom he believes impotent; nor will he give a final answer to those consulting him concerning this matter unless he has first consulted the Bishop. - Gousset, no. 791.

Point XIII. On the Impediment of Abduction

857. ○ Abduction is the violent carrying away of a woman from a safe place to another place where she is detained under the power of the abductor [1], for the purpose of entering matrimony.

[1] It is the same whether the abductor carries out the abduction himself or through others, and likewise whether he retains the abducted person in his power by himself and in his own custody or through others and in their custody. This is gathered from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council of June 25, 1864, which can be seen in the Roman Acts, volume 1, pages 15-25. But one who abducts for himself incurs the impediment, not those who abduct for another, although the latter can otherwise incur penalties decreed against abductors both by civil and Canon law. See Schmalzgrueber, book 5, title 17, no. 20.

Abduction invalidates matrimony by ecclesiastical law between the abductor and the abducted woman. This is established from the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 6.

Three conditions are required for incurring that impediment, namely: 1. that the abducted woman be carried away from one place to another; 2. that the woman be abducted solely for the purpose of matrimony; 3. that the abduction occur while the woman resists [2], or is altogether unwilling. This is gathered from the text of the Council of Trent [3]. - St. Ligorius, no. 1107.

[2] It makes no difference whether the woman is carried away from her own home by force or, led about by deceit, unknowingly comes into the power of the one plotting the abduction; likewise, whether she is carried away from her own dwelling or, having been led from it through fraud, is thereafter prevented from being able to return to it freely. For free consent is equally absent both if through open force and if through fraud she is no longer permitted to be in her own power. See the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation cited in the preceding note.

[3] The text of the Council of Trent cited by the Author does not in fact add this condition, that the woman be carried away altogether resisting and unwilling. The Doctors, however, are commonly accustomed to infer it from the fact that the Council speaks of that abduction by which the liberty of matrimony is injured. See Schmalzgrueber, book 5, title 17, no. 35. But liberty of consent appears sufficiently present when the woman consents to her abduction.

Nevertheless, this doctrine can easily be reconciled with the opposite opinion if a suitable distinction is employed. For the abduction of a woman consenting to her own carrying away can occur in two ways: first, when negotiations concerning nuptials with the abductor preceded and the woman consents to her own carrying away so that the marriage which otherwise was impeded can be entered. Then no impediment arises, since it ought rather to be called flight with the man for freely contracting matrimony than abduction. Second, when no negotiation concerning nuptials had preceded; and then the woman's consent to her own carrying away is presumed to have been extorted through deceit. Since consent to matrimony cannot be inferred from consent to the abduction, the abduction of the woman, although willing, is included in the decree of the Council. See Riganti on Rule 49 of the Chancery, no. 79 and following.

These things are brilliantly confirmed from Declarations of the Sacred Congregation which you have collected in the Appendix inserted in the first volume of the Roman Acts, beginning at page 54. From these the Author of the Appendix draws the following conclusions: I. an abduction which falls under the decree of the Council is not present when negotiations concluding the matrimony to be entered precede the abduction. For in this case the man has a right to have the woman espoused to him, and the woman is bound to consent to the matrimony. II. Nor is this abduction verified if, without deceit, the man carries away the woman by agreement because negotiations concerning the matrimony could not be concluded on account of the opposition of the parents. III. Nor is abduction verified if not the man but the woman solicited the man to carry her away. In these two cases it must rather be called the flight of the woman with the man so that they may more freely contract matrimony than abduction. IV. On the contrary, abduction is verified if the woman is carried away through snares and deceitful solicitations by one planning abduction, so that afterward under the influence of the abductor she is compelled to consent to matrimony.

And the same Author deservedly concludes that whenever the woman appears to have consented to the abduction, the resolution must be taken from the circumstances considered. For if the woman consents to the carrying away so that she may contract matrimony more freely, and uses this means of carrying away to remove obstacles, it does not appear to be abduction but mere flight, although some injury is inflicted upon the dissenting parents. But if the man cannot obtain the woman's consent to matrimony by a direct way and, therefore meditating the seizure or theft of the girl, begins to circumvent the inexperienced woman by snares, deceitful solicitations, etc., so that by these arts he may extort some compliance from the fickle girl, and, having obtained it, carry her away in contempt of her parents, everyone sees that the man indeed intends to compel the girl into matrimony, while the girl, through the man's snares, in some manner adheres to the circumvention without herself seriously perceiving that she is being driven to enter a marriage which perhaps she would never have entered willingly and against the will of her parents.

And in these things there is contained that by which the following question of the Author concerning abduction by seduction may also be resolved.

858. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does ABDUCTION BY SEDUCTION, or when a woman is induced by gifts, flatteries, etc., to follow the abductor, introduce an impediment?

Reply. No. The reason is that through the impediment of abduction the Church intends only to provide for perfect liberty of matrimony, which is not injured when a consenting woman is carried away, even against the will of her parents. - Thus commonly, according to St. Ligorius, no. 1107. Sanchez, Bonacina, the Salmanticenses, Scavini, etc., agree.

And indeed not a few French theologians contend that, at least in France, abduction by seduction invalidates matrimony by prescribed custom. But this must not be admitted, for a custom which rests only upon a false interpretation of the law cannot bind. - Compare Gousset, no. 797.

But the Declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Council which are cited for that opinion cited in the Analecta of Pontifical Law, volume IV, page 1848 and following, concern altogether particular cases, and the circumstances are not sufficiently established, so that it can be asserted that a violent carrying away of the woman was absent. In France itself, Scavini says, the opinion teaching that abduction by seduction introduces a diriment impediment of matrimony, which had long been in force, is everywhere rejected.

859. ○ QUESTION 2. Are betrothals contracted while the abducted woman is under the power of the abductor valid?

Reply. A twofold probable opinion is given:

The first opinion denies it, because betrothals require liberty just as matrimony itself does; for a penal law is extended where the same reason applies. - Sanchez. - The Salmanticenses, etc.

The second opinion affirms it, and St. Ligorius with La Croix, etc., calls this the more probable. The reason for this opinion is that betrothals, since they are always rescindable, require less liberty than matrimony [4].

[4] Nevertheless, since this obligation is doubtful, the Confessor cannot urge it.

860. Resolutions. - 1. The impediment is not contracted if the woman is carried away only from one room to another room in the same house, because in this manner she is not properly placed under the power of the abductor; rather, she must be carried away from one house to another.

2. The impediment is not contracted if the woman is abducted for another cause besides the end of entering matrimony, for example, for the end of satisfying lust, etc.; because the Council intends nothing else through this impediment except to favor the liberty of matrimony.

3. The impediment is not incurred if the woman abducts the man, because the Council speaks only of a man as abductor.

4. The impediment is not incurred if matrimony is contracted between the abductor and the abducted woman after she has been freed from the power of the abductor. This is clearly evident from the text of the Council of Trent. - St. Ligorius, no. 1032. But St. Ligorius rightly notes, ibid., that this impediment endures so long as the abducted woman is in the power of the abductor, even if she consents freely [5].

[5] The Church renders the abducted woman incapable of contracting so long as she is in the power of the abductor; therefore her consent, however free it may be supposed, will always remain without effect.

§ III. On Dispensation from Diriment Impediments of Matrimony

Three matters must be treated: 1. the power of dispensing; 2. the causes of dispensation; 3. the manner of obtaining a dispensation.

Point I. On the Power of Dispensing

861. Principles. - I. The Pope can dispense from all impediments of ecclesiastical law: 1. validly in every case, because he is the primary Superior; 2. licitly if he does so for a just cause, as right governance requires.

II. A Bishop cannot ordinarily and by his own right dispense from diriment impediments. The reason is that a Bishop can do nothing against the common law of the Church except from the concession of a Council or of the Pope, or from legitimate custom. But Bishops can claim for themselves the right of dispensing from such impediments for none of these reasons, as is evident both from the practice of the Church and from various Declarations of the Sacred Congregation, and especially from the Rescript of Pius VII to the Bishops of France in the year 1809. In it the Pontiff complains that not all the Bishops of France had recourse to the Holy See for obtaining faculties to renew marriages invalidly contracted during the time of the disturbance in France [1].

[1] Formerly, several Bishops in France, from a privilege annexed to the See, were accustomed to dispense from diriment impediments. But these privileges were suppressed together with the sees themselves in the new circumscription of dioceses made by Pius VII in the year 1802 through the Bull Qui Christi Domini, in which the following is contained: We suppress, annul, and perpetually extinguish the title, lordship, and entire present state of the archiepiscopal and episcopal Churches, together with their respective chapters, rights, privileges, and prerogatives of every kind.

862. Questions. - QUESTION 1. If the spouses are from different dioceses, must a dispensation be obtained from each Bishop if each enjoys the faculty of dispensing by special Indult?

Reply. It is disputed, and there is a twofold probable opinion:

The first opinion denies it. The reason is that when a Bishop removes an impediment from his own subject, he renders that subject capable of contracting with another impeded person. For one cannot become capable of contracting with another unless the other also becomes capable of contracting with the first. Moreover, by delegating the Bishop the Pope gives him his whole right; therefore the dispensation of the Bishop is valid just as if it were granted by the Pope himself. St. Ligorius, no. 1142, calls this opinion probable [2].

[2] Since it is probable that there is no need of another dispensation, it is lawful to contract in this manner according to the general principle that the Church supplies where perhaps there is need.

The second opinion affirms it. The reason is that the Bishop of one party has no jurisdiction over the subject of another, while the faculty of dispensing is restricted to his own subjects.

863. ○ QUESTION 2. Can Bishops dispense from doubtful diriment impediments?

Reply. More probably, yes. The reason is that although dispensation from diriment impediments is reserved to the Pope, nevertheless, since reservation is odious, it must be interpreted strictly and restricted only to certain cases. But if there is question of a doubt or of probability of law, dispensation appears useless, according to what was said above concerning impediments in general, since in this case the Church is considered to supply [3].

[3] The resolution of the Author, as is evident, comes to this: that in the case neither a dispensation of the Pontiff nor of a Bishop is necessarily required.

QUESTION 3. Can a Metropolitan dispense his suffragans' subjects in a case of necessity or of an Indult?

Reply. No, because a dispensation is an act of voluntary and gracious jurisdiction and is granted from the indulgence and mercy of the one dispensing; but recourse to the Metropolitan cannot be had except in matters pertaining to the contentious forum. Therefore, etc. [4].

[4] If there is question of a faculty of dispensing granted by a Pontifical indult, it will be necessary to consider the form of words in which it is conceived and from this to judge whether it is restricted to subjects alone.

Point II. On the Causes of Dispensation

864. ○ The causes which are adduced for obtaining a dispensation are: 1. grave or light; 2. motive or final, or merely impulsive; 3. true or false. - See the Treatise On Laws, no. 117 and following.

If in a petition a truth which must necessarily be expressed is concealed, for example, some impediment or a circumstance to be declared, etc., it is called subreption in the dispensation, or a subreptitious dispensation. But if something false is asserted as true, it is obreption, or an obreptitious dispensation.

When dispensations are said to be without cause, this signifies that none of those causes customarily alleged as canonical is present.

865. Principles. - I. A cause is required for the liceity of a dispensation. This is established from the Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 5, On the Reformation of Matrimony: In marriages to be contracted, either let no dispensation at all be given, or let it be granted rarely, for a cause, and gratuitously.

II. For the validity of a dispensation it is required that in the petition there be no obreption or subreption falling upon the motive or final cause. The reason is that the Superior is not considered to dispense except under the tacit condition: if the prayers rest upon truth.

866. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What are the just causes for dispensing from diriment impediments?

Reply. They are the following:

1. The narrowness of the place, that is, if it is feared that because of the narrowness of the place the girl will not suitably marry another. Every place not having three hundred hearths is regarded as narrow; and this holds even if the bride will transfer her domicile elsewhere [1].

[1] Anyone easily sees that this cause for dispensing is that in that place it is difficult to find a man whom the girl can suitably marry. Nor is consideration given to whether perhaps this difficulty could cease by seeking a husband elsewhere, since that is infrequent and foreign to common customs.

2. The lack of a suitable dowry, which otherwise is offered to the girl by a relative, or by a stranger, but on the condition that she marry the relative. 3. The already advanced or over-mature age of the woman, namely, when she has already exceeded her twenty-fourth year and does not find another man of her condition whom she can marry [2]. 4. Carnal intercourse already had with a female relative or another person laboring under an impediment, when there is otherwise danger that infamy may follow, etc. 5. Excessive familiarity of the parties, from which scandal is feared unless they marry. 6. The legitimization of offspring born or conceived from fornication. 7. The allaying of grave enmities, or the ending of a lawsuit between the parents, relatives, or relatives by affinity of the petitioners. 8. Christian virtues which probably would not be found in another man. 9. Excellence of merits toward the Church. 10. The preservation of goods in an illustrious family. 11. A large alms to be expended upon pious works. 12. The poverty of a widow burdened with children, whom the man intends and promises to support.

[2] The same standard does not hold for all places in this matter. For in some places a girl who has attained her twentieth, or even her eighteenth, year is regarded as so over-mature that she finds with difficulty anyone whom she may marry.

It sometimes happens that one cause taken separately is not sufficient, but, joined with another, is regarded as grave and therefore suffices.

The causes now admitted as canonical for the second and third degree are: narrowness of the place, lawsuits to be avoided, intercourse already had, scandal to be removed, and the over-mature age of the woman. - Bouvier.

The suppression of the truth, or the expression of what is false, concerning those things which by law, custom, or the style of the Roman Curia must be disclosed, is always regarded as substantial.

867. ○ QUESTION 2. What things must necessarily be expressed by law, under pain of invalidity, in a petition for a dispensation?

Reply. They are the following: 1. The true and legitimate cause moving one to obtain the dispensation. 2. Even the lowest species of the impediments, for example, affinity from licit or illicit intercourse; public propriety from betrothals or from a ratified marriage. 3. The number of impediments, for example, if besides relationship there is also affinity, or if there is double or multiple consanguinity or affinity. 4. Filiation or co-parenthood in spiritual relationship. 5. The degree of consanguinity, affinity, or public propriety from a ratified marriage; indeed, if the petitioners are in an unequal line, the nearer degree must also be expressed. This, however, is not required for validity unless they are joined in the second degree touching the first. 6. Incestuous intercourse had between the petitioners, whether with the intention of obtaining the dispensation more easily or even apart from such an intention [3]. This is proved from the Bull Pastor bonus of Benedict XIV.... 7. The various circumstances of a marriage celebrated with an impediment, namely, whether clandestinely; whether with the required proclamations; whether with the good or bad faith of both parties, or of only one of them; whether with the hope of obtaining the dispensation more easily; and whether the marriage was consummated.

[3] 1. In this place the Author followed St. Alphonsus, who (book 6, no. 1135) judged that this controversy, which until that time the Doctors had customarily disputed on both sides, must now be called entirely settled; and therefore he hands it down as indubitable that, if the circumstance of incest is kept silent, although it was not committed for the purpose of obtaining the dispensation more easily, the Rescript is so vitiated that the dispensation is void, and consequently the marriage invalid.

Thus the Holy Doctor (book 6, no. 1135): But it must altogether be held (that the marriage is null).... And concerning this there is no longer any doubt today from the Bull Pastor bonus of Benedict XIV, where section 41 says: "But if the petitioners shall have obtained from Our Datary a dispensation upon a prohibited degree in the first and second, or in the second only, and also in the third or fourth, with the intercourse which followed between them kept silent, which they cannot disclose without detriment to honor; and by reason of such silence they seek a dispensation for contracting marriage, or a revalidation of one contracted; the same Major Penitentiary may, if the intercourse is still secret, grant a dispensation of this kind, or respectively a revalidation, in the forum of conscience only; a composition of fifty gold ducats of the Camera being made, when there is question of the first and second, or the second degree only, to be transmitted to the Datary for the purpose (as is the unshaken custom) of being expended in alms, etc." To these words St. Alphonsus adds: From these things observe that the Pope, by saying, "may grant a revalidation," does not hold as valid marriages contracted with such concealment.

And again (Homo Apostolicus, treatise 18, no. 85): Concerning this today (says the Holy Doctor) every doubt ceases, since it was declared by Benedict XIV in the Bull Pastor bonus (section 41), where a marriage from a dispensation obtained with INCEST kept silent is pronounced void.

2. But the opinion of Blessed Alphonsus (which some afterward copied), as well as the argument drawn from the Constitution of Benedict XIV, does not appear to be without its difficulties.

And indeed, to set aside for the moment the foregoing words of Benedict's Constitution, it must not be denied that the opinion which afterward pleased St. Alphonsus at one time also pleased Benedict XIV, or, to speak more precisely, Lambertini. For in Instruction 87, which he published for the Confessors of his diocese of Bologna so that they might know fully those matters for which recourse must necessarily be had to the Cardinal Penitentiary, he has the following (no. 13): Writers indeed contend among themselves whether these things must be openly set forth (namely, the intercourse which occurred, or the will and design that they might obtain the dispensation more easily) in order that the impediment of consanguinity or affinity may be dispensed by the Apostolic See; yet in reality no room for doubt remains, since the Supreme Pontiffs have most clearly declared their mind concerning this matter. For in their Letters, when they impart some dispensation, under pain of subreption or obreption they indicate that not only the intercourse, if it occurred previously, but also with what design and will it was entered into, must be explained. For this he cites Corradus, Practice of Dispensations, book 8, chapter 1, no. 36 and following, and Father Syrus on the Constitution of Innocent XII, faculty 32, section 26, and faculty 33, section 27.

3. But from these citations no slight difficulty now arises. For Corradus (loc. cit., no. 37) gives as the reason why the dispensation is null that incest is by law an impediment; and he tries to confirm this by a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation which we reported elsewhere (above, note to no. 776), in which it is read: For this reason, that such relatives by consanguinity and affinity, through this intercourse, were rendered incapable of contracting marriage, from the fact that they are said to have committed incest, which prevents incestuous persons from contracting marriage.

But according to St. Alphonsus this reason adduced by Corradus is altogether defective. For we have already shown elsewhere (note to no. 776) that according to St. Alphonsus both the impediment of incest and the others which were comprehended under the prohibitory impediment of Crime were so removed by force of custom that they no longer need dispensation. Thus the Holy Doctor (Homo Apostolicus, treatise 18, no. 53): Under this name (CRIME) certain offenses were formerly comprehended, namely INCEST with one's own mother (the Canon must be understood not of a mother but of a godmother), the abduction of another man's betrothed, etc.; but this impediment also became obsolete through desuetude. And again (book 6, no. 857): Other impediments (namely, INCEST, the abduction of another man's betrothed, etc.) TODAY ARE NOT IN FORCE, NOR DO THEY NEED A DISPENSATION. Nor, as we have already seen (note to no. 776), must this be called a singular opinion of St. Alphonsus; for it was shown there that this is the most common opinion of all. Indeed, the same Holy Doctor (book 6, no. 905) calls it the common opinion that the impediments of incest and other crimes have been removed through non-use: Thus (he says) also Concina and the Salmanticenses with Sanchez and the COMMON opinion. Therefore, in the judgment of St. Alphonsus together with the most common opinion of all, this argument of Lambertini, if indeed he wished to rest upon the testimony and authority of Corradus, already plainly collapses.

4. Nor is the other citation of Father Syrus from a manuscript work for the use of the office of the Sacred Penitentiary, bearing the title On the Constitution of Innocent XII, etc., of any greater force. Lambertini cites from that manuscript faculty 32, section 26, and faculty 33, section 27. Nothing need be said at present about the latter citation, because there it treats of those who in committing incest proposed to themselves this end, that they might obtain the dispensation more easily. Therefore, a few words about the former, in which Father Syrus appears to have wished to avoid the difficulty which we noticed arising in Corradus's reason. Father Syrus therefore writes thus: It must be observed that although incestuous intercourse between relatives by consanguinity or affinity does not present any impediment to marriage, nevertheless a dispensation obtained from the Datary is subreptitious and invalid if, in obtaining it, mention is not made of the said intercourse previously had between them. Having excluded in this way the reason adduced by Corradus, Syrus substitutes the little reason employed by Sanchez, from whom he had also copied the foregoing. For he continues thus: For such is the style of the Curia which has prevailed, that this incest be declared for this purpose, that through fear of having to make this disclosure relatives by consanguinity and affinity may be deterred from incestuous intercourse, as Sanchez notes, book 8, disputation 25, no. 8.

5. But how wretched these things also are! Syrus premises that incestuous intercourse between relatives by consanguinity or affinity does not present any impediment to marriage.

Let pass for the moment what Syrus intermingles concerning incest between blood relatives. Since the laws merely make provision concerning incest between relatives by affinity, this addition is due to empty reasonings drawn from the fact that incest was mentioned generally in the verses denoting crimes which impede marriage; and indeed it is due to reasonings drawn contrary to the very well-known maxim of Law that odious things are to be restricted. Against this addition Giraldi (Notes to the Thesaurus, On Penalties, part 2, word Incest, chapter 1) suitably warns that the Canon If anyone with his mother, canon 17, cause 33, question 2, from which some inferred that incest between blood relatives also was comprehended by that law, treats of a godmother, and by no means of a mother who is a blood relative.

But what pertains more closely to the matter: does not Syrus himself show most plainly that his assertion is false when he reports the formulas of Dispensations? For (On the Formulas of Matrimonial Dispensations, part 2, chapter 2, formula 3) he thus reports the formula of a Dispensation For contracting, upon incest not expressed in the letters obtained from the Datary: Moreover, by Apostolic Authority specially delegated to me, I dispense you FROM THE IMPEDIMENT ARISING FROM INCESTUOUS INTERCOURSE which you had with your relative by consanguinity or affinity, so that, notwithstanding THE AFORESAID IMPEDIMENT, you may and can licitly contract marriage with her.... And again (ibid., formula IV), he himself thus reports the formula of a Dispensation Upon a marriage contracted, concerning incest concealed in the Datary: Moreover, by Apostolic Authority specially delegated to me, I dispense you FROM THE IMPEDIMENT ARISING FROM INCESTUOUS KNOWLEDGE not expressed in the letters of Dispensation by virtue of which you contracted, so that, notwithstanding it, you may licitly contract marriage anew with her, with consent renewed, and consummate it, and remain in it. What, then, is more wretched and monstrous than for someone to deny that incest presents any impediment to marriage, and not hesitate to appeal to the style of the Curia to prove this, and afterward himself to report the formulas of Dispensation in which incest is exhibited as an IMPEDIMENT OF MARRIAGE and then dispensed as an impediment? Can the style of the Curia, to which Father Syrus appeals, be known better from any other source than from the formulas of Dispensation?

It must therefore again be concluded that Lambertini rests upon the testimony of a man who shamefully contradicts himself in this matter. But here again it must be recalled that, in the judgment of St. Alphonsus together with the most common opinion of the Doctors, the argument drawn from this has no force, since the prohibitory impediments of incest or other crimes were removed by ancient custom and do not need a dispensation. Therefore, the argument which Lambertini draws from the citation of Syrus also has no force.

6. We called it a little reason, however, namely, the reason which, as we indicated above (no. 4), Syrus copied from Sanchez in order to substitute it for the argument which others used to establish the necessity of expressing the incest, and which Lambertini in turn appears to have copied from Syrus; for he himself also writes (loc. cit.): But the Supreme Pontiffs wisely established this, that they might keep the most grave crime of incest far from blood relatives. And to these words Lambertini indeed appends the aforesaid citation of Corradus and Syrus. That citation can further displease for a twofold reason: first, because he cites two men of whom one contradicts the other, while one denies that incest introduces an impediment to marriage, but the other affirms this very thing and indeed establishes it as the foundation of his thesis; and then because, while he substitutes blood relatives for relatives by affinity, he follows the opinion of certain persons founded upon an empty deduction rather than the prescriptions of Law. For that which we reported from Navarrus (note to no. 776) is sufficiently well known: almost all theologians hold that from incest with a blood relative there indeed arises the impediment of affinity, BUT NO OTHER, whether it is committed before or after the marriage has been contracted. Among these are St. Thomas, Sotus, St. Antoninus, and Sylvester, whom Covarruvias also follows, etc.; and Sanchez, as we shall presently see, confirms this.

Whatever may be the case concerning this, Sanchez certainly observes (book 8, disputation 25, no. 6) that the truer opinion holds that FROM INCEST WITH BLOOD RELATIVES NO IMPEDIMENT OF MARRIAGE ARISES; and also that incest with relatives by affinity, although it produces that impediment, has nevertheless been removed by contrary custom and NEEDS NO DISPENSATION. From this he concludes that there is no reason why a dispensation from the impediment of consanguinity or affinity, with that incest kept silent, should be subreptitious. Therefore, in order nevertheless to defend against the other opinion, which he calls probable, the necessity of disclosing incest not only with relatives by affinity but also with blood relatives, he has recourse to the aforesaid reason. The legitimate foundation of this opinion, he says (loc. cit., no. 8), is not that this incest presents some impediment to marriage. FOR THE CONTRARY IS TRUER. But the foundation is the style of the Curia..., and its reason is that through fear of having to make this disclosure relatives by consanguinity and affinity may be deterred from incestuous intercourse. Hence also are those words of Lambertini (loc. cit.): They wisely established this (the Pontiffs), that they might keep the most grave crime of incest far from blood relatives.

But perhaps others will with difficulty admire the marvelous wisdom of the Pontiffs in a law described in these colors. A remedy and restraint against the crime of incest was sought, namely, as they say. Now such a remedy and restraint can indeed be perceived in that law which was customarily deduced from the old Law expressed in title 13, book 4, On Him Who Has Known a Blood Relative of His Wife. For a penalty was inflicted upon incestuous persons of this kind, by force of which they were to be deprived perpetually of the hope of contracting marriage with any person, since the crime of adultery was also added to that incest. Therefore, everyone guilty of this crime was prohibited from marriage without a dispensation, to be obtained at least from the Bishop. But to what, finally, does a remedy of this kind come according to this new theory, which confines any penalty only to those few among all incestuous persons who might wish to contract marriage with one another? And indeed in such a way that the penalty no longer consists in a prohibition of marriage between them, which could be relaxed or not relaxed according to the just judgment of ecclesiastical authority, but resides in the mere disclosure of the crime, which disclosure, moreover, imposes no burden of itself whenever the matter is to be transacted with the Sacred Penitentiary under fictitious names? Does there shine forth in this new remedy for restraining incest that wisdom which could be found in the penalty imposed by the old law?

7. But another difficulty of no little weight also occurs in that paragraph of Lambertini's Instruction. No room for doubt remains (he says), since the Supreme Pontiffs have most clearly declared their mind concerning this matter. For in their letters, when they impart some dispensation, under pain of subreption or obreption they indicate that not only the intercourse, if it occurred previously, but also with what design and will it was entered into, must be explained.

Let the latter point pass, concerning which no one doubts. St. Alphonsus writes excellently after all the others (book 6, no. 1134): It is common among all that, if intercourse was had on the part of both for obtaining the dispensation more easily, and intercourse is alleged as the sole cause for obtaining the dispensation, then that evil intention must necessarily be expressed; otherwise the marriage will be null, because no one ought to profit from his own crime.

The difficulty remains in the other member, namely, when intercourse was had entirely without that depraved intention. Lambertini appeals to the letters by which a dispensation is imparted. But it does not sufficiently appear how he effectively derives his conclusion from letters of Dispensation of this kind. For this conclusion could be deduced by him from these Letters of Dispensation insofar as incest is spoken of in them as an impediment of marriage, which therefore must necessarily be mentioned by those who seek a dispensation from another impediment, for example, affinity, and the concealment of which impediment therefore renders the dispensation subreptitious. For in fact, in the formulas of dispensations which we transcribed above (no. 5) from Father Syrus, incest is exhibited as an impediment of marriage. And we discern this very same thing in the formulas of Letters which Father Paul Marcus Leo presents in his Practice Concerning Apostolic Letters and Those of the Sacred Penitentiary. Thus, for example, in the Dispensation given to those who, before the Ordinary executing the letters of Dispensation, falsely denied that intercourse had occurred, although in reality it had occurred between them, it is read (op. cit., part 2, page 309): Provided that THE IMPEDIMENT ARISING FROM THE AFORESAID INCESTUOUS KNOWLEDGE is occult, etc. And again:

(Ibid., page 316): But since the aforesaid Dispensation (from the third degree of consanguinity) is invalid because of the aforesaid carnal intercourse not expressed in the letters..., provided that THE IMPEDIMENT ARISING FROM THE AFORESAID INCESTUOUS KNOWLEDGE is occult..., mercifully dispense, etc. But if Lambertini is to be considered to have drawn his conclusion from this (and certainly he could not have drawn it from elsewhere), behold, on the contrary, Father Syrus, to whom he himself refers the reader in this matter, absolutely denies (above, no. 4) that incestuous intercourse between relatives by consanguinity or affinity presents any impediment to marriage! And to Father Syrus may be added both St. Alphonsus, who (above, no. 3) teaches absolutely that the impediment of incest is no longer in force and does not need a dispensation, and (see note to no. 776) the most common opinion of the Doctors, which professes that an impediment of this kind was entirely removed by long-standing and therefore legitimate custom. It remains, therefore, that the conclusion of Lambertini's Instruction rests upon the little reason which Father Syrus, cited there, had taken from Sanchez, and by which Sanchez (above, no. 6), having excluded the reason drawn from the antiquated impediment of incest, nevertheless endeavored probably to prove the necessity of expressing incestuous intercourse. But even if what we indicated above is now passed over, namely, that a reason of this kind appears plainly unhappy and less worthy of the wisdom of legislators, the context of the Apostolic Letters to which Lambertini there appeals stands entirely in the way besides. For in them the whole reason for subreption, as we have already seen, is established in this: that the petitioners, while seeking a dispensation from the impediment of affinity and keeping silent about the incestuous intercourse, conceal this other impediment of marriage, which no less than the first needs a dispensation, as Corradus, cited there together with Father Syrus, openly holds. Therefore, the little reason taken from Father Syrus and Sanchez is also overthrown by the appeal to the Apostolic Letters.

It is therefore already sufficiently clear that this part of Lambertini's instruction to his clergy of Bologna is burdened by most grave difficulties. It is therefore no wonder that his own clergy of Bologna deferred so little to this doctrine of their Archbishop that, during that very time, as we shall see, in a solemn Resolution of Cases of conscience they departed into the opposite opinion.

8. But enough now concerning the argument which someone might perhaps draw from that Instruction of Lambertini, all the more because below (no. 30) we shall see the same Lambertini excellently refuting the arguments which are drawn from Apostolic letters of Dispensations. Let us now return to the argument which the Holy Doctor Alphonsus (above, no. 1) draws from Benedict's Constitution Pastor bonus, and which he proposes as the sole and decisive argument.

It was said above (no. 2) that this opinion of the Holy Doctor is not without its difficulties. And indeed, in the first place, this occurs: the Holy Doctor himself freely concedes that before Benedict XIV this controversy was freely disputed on both sides in the schools. Indeed, in the Naples edition of his work of the year 1748, he himself did not hesitate to follow as truly probable the opinion opposed to Lambertini's (book 6, treatise 6, chapter 3, doubt 4, note C, question 3). And for other reasons also it is worthwhile to report the text of the Holy Doctor. To the question, namely, When a dispensation is sought for a marriage between relatives, must incestuous intercourse had between them be expressed? he replies: There is a twofold probable opinion. The first affirms that it must be expressed in the Sacred Penitentiary if the intercourse was occult, but in the Datary if it was public. Thus Palaus, Sanchez, Laymann, Coninck, etc., among the Salmanticenses. And they testify that the Sacred Congregation declared this to be the style of the Roman Curia. The second opinion, however, denies it, because incest of itself is not a diriment (understand prohibitory) impediment of that marriage, nor does it render the dispensation more difficult. Thus the Salmanticenses with Ledesma, Hurtado, Henriquez, Perez, Rodriguez, Basilius, Villalobos, Praepositus, and others. And Sanchez RIGHTLY calls it probable. From this they infer that, if a dispensation is committed to the Bishop and he asks about the intercourse, the contracting parties can deny it even with an oath, since the interrogation is probably not legitimate. And this, EVEN IF IN THE PONTIFICAL RESCRIPT IT IS SAID: PROVIDED THAT INTERCOURSE HAS NOT OCCURRED BETWEEN THEM. Because this is understood, etc.

9. Let these latter consequences now be set aside; they can certainly appear of great moment to those who judge that this opinion, which St. Alphonsus held as truly probable, should be preferred to the opinion toward which he afterward inclined (above, no. 1). Meanwhile, let these points be noted: 1. St. Alphonsus judged that nothing should be deferred here to the judgment of Sanchez, who (book 8, disputation 25, no. 8) had called that first opinion far truer; 2. he judged the little reason by which Sanchez defended his opinion (above, no. 6), which Father Syrus and Lambertini afterward copied, not even worthy of mention; 3. here also the Holy Doctor repeats that incest is not an impediment of marriage which needs a dispensation, and since he constantly retained this thesis even after he departed from the foregoing opinion, it does not easily appear by what intrinsic foundation the Holy Doctor could fortify his new doctrine (above, no. 1); 4. but it was to be desired that in this place, just as for the first opinion he indicated the Declaration that such is the style of the Curia, so for the second he had not kept silent about what, as Sanchez also reports (loc. cit., no. 6), Gutierrez has (Canonical Questions, book 1, question 15, no. 11), writing: With the same opinion agree two other distinguished theologians of this city; indeed, I was informed THAT ACCORDING TO IT JUDGMENT WAS GIVEN TWICE IN ONE CASE. And after the first edition of this work, Navarrus, one of the aforesaid, advised that a dispensation upon the impediment of consanguinity or affinity, without mention being made of intercourse previously had, is valid and that another dispensation of the Pope is not required.

10. But what is chief, while the Holy Doctor plainly professes both in words and in deeds that until his own time this question was freely disputed on both sides in the schools and within the bounds of probability, by that very fact someone will rightly conclude that almost all the force is cut away from the argument which he thought could be deduced for his new opinion from the aforesaid Constitution of Benedict XIV (above, no. 1).

And indeed, whatever may be drawn and urged from the Constitution Pastor bonus of Benedict XIV, these same things are read in the Constitution Romanus Pontifex (September 3, 1692), by which Innocent XII, no less than Benedict XIV in his own Constitution, enumerates and establishes the faculties of the Major Penitentiary and the Office of the Penitentiary, so that the words of Benedict XIV plainly appear to have been copied from the Constitution of Innocent. For Innocent XII thus says (cited Constitution, section 34): But if the petitioners who shall have obtained from Our Datary a dispensation upon a prohibited degree both in the first and second and in the second only, and also in the third or fourth, with the intercourse which followed between them kept silent, which they cannot disclose without detriment to honor, and by reason of this concealment seek a dispensation for contracting marriage or a revalidation of a marriage contracted, the same Major Penitentiary may, if the intercourse is still secret, grant it in the forum of conscience only; a composition of fifty gold ducats of the Camera being made, when there is question of the first and second, or the second degree only, to be transmitted to the Datary for the purpose, as is the unshaken custom, of being expended in alms, etc.

From this, however, someone will reason by an obvious argument in this way: Either it is contended that by these words of the Constitution of Innocent the necessity of expressing incest is defined and, consequently, that if the incest is kept silent the Rescript of dispensation is invalid; or it is contended that these things are in no way defined there. If it is contended that this question must be held as defined from the words of Innocent, then it is held and asserted with less consistency that the matter was freely disputed by both theologians and canonists in the schools, and could be disputed without censure, until Benedict XIV settled the contest by his Constitution; for the question ought then to be said to have been settled earlier by Innocent. But if it is contended that this controversy was not resolved by the Constitution of Innocent, it must be conceded, whether they wish it or not, that the controversy was in no way defined by the Constitution of Benedict either. And the reason for this conclusion is sufficiently manifest. For the sentence of each Constitution is wholly one and the same, and moreover their authority is at the same time one and the same. Indeed, does not St. Alphonsus himself hold the Constitution Pastor bonus as a mere confirmation of the Bull of Innocent XII? For the Holy Doctor writes thus (book 6, no. 1144): It is asked in what impediments the Sacred Penitentiary has the faculty of dispensing. For the explanation of this question, which can be of great profit for the practice of Pastors and Confessors, I have judged it worthwhile to note here those things which are contained in the Bull of the Supreme Pontiff Benedict XIV which begins Pastor bonus, issued on April 13 in the year 1744, where the Bull of Innocent XII, issued on April 3, 1692, beginning Romanus Pontifex, IS CONFIRMED AND INSERTED. Therefore, wherever you finally turn, that new assertion of the same St. Alphonsus, that TODAY AFTER BENEDICT XIV there is no longer any room for doubt concerning this controversy, can in no way be admitted.

11. Hence also that appears to collapse which the distinguished man Peter Giovine has in the very recent work On Matrimonial Dispensations, Naples, 1866, where (consultation 27, section 9, no. 8) he writes: Today the matter is settled, that the dispensation remains void... if incestuous intercourse is concealed...; and this... was definitively declared by Benedict XIV through the celebrated Constitution which begins "Pastor bonus." For we find nothing in the words of Benedict which declares those things more than was said in the Constitution of Innocent. And if you do not contend that the controversy is defined by the words of Innocent XII, then indeed, since Benedict XIV merely repeats the sentence of his Predecessor, no new declaration which defines the matter can be conceived there. Indeed, since Benedict knew very well that by the Constitution of Innocent the controversy had so little been held as defined that it was disputed most freely on both sides in the Catholic schools, as he himself testifies in his Instruction 87, as we have seen, certainly if he had wished to declare anything further, if he had wished to define anything, he ought to have added something to the sentence of his Predecessor and changed something in it, so that at last the theologians and canonists might understand the sense and force of the Constitution of Innocent. But he added nothing and changed absolutely nothing in it. Therefore, by the very fact that he added nothing further to the Constitution of Innocent but merely repeated Innocent's words and sentence, he showed sufficiently and more than sufficiently by the fact itself that he wished to define or declare nothing, and wished to preserve the whole matter in the status quo, as they say, that is, to permit it, no less than his Predecessors the Pontiffs, to the free disputation of theologians and canonists.

12. And this reason indeed draws a certain greater force from the fact that Benedict XIV himself, while still in a lower dignity, had shown himself persuaded that the Roman Pontiffs had openly declared, under pain of subreption, the necessity of expressing the intercourse. See what was said above concerning his Instruction 87. For the graver and grosser the common error of all the Doctors could appear to him, not one of whom until that day had suspected, as will appear below, that the Roman Pontiffs had interposed any judgment on this question, the more vehemently did reason urge him, once made Pontiff, to declare in at least some manner what sense underlay the words of Innocent XII. Yet he did nothing of this kind.

13. But this also must be added here: from that Instruction 87 it is sufficiently deduced that Benedict XIV himself found nothing in the Constitution of Innocent XII which effectively contributed to the resolution of this controversy. And indeed, why is it that, while in that Instruction he strains every nerve to prove the necessity of expressing incestuous intercourse, he nevertheless does not take an argument from the Constitution of Innocent, but has recourse to the Apostolic letters of Dispensations which are customarily given by the Offices of the Sacred Penitentiary and the Datary, and refers to Father Syrus and Corradus, who report these formulas and add to them whatever commentary they can? Shall we suspect that the Constitution of Innocent was unknown to Lambertini himself, when for several years he exercised the office of Doctor of the Sacred Canons in the very Office of the Sacred Penitentiary? Or shall we think that he regarded as more effective an argument drawn from formulas of dispensing of this kind rather than from that Pontifical Constitution, although elsewhere, as we shall see, he himself defends most keenly and invincibly that no effective argument can be deduced from them? Or, finally, was Benedict XIV so slow of mind that in the Constitution of Innocent, which in this very Instruction (loc. cit.) he cites merely in order to indicate the faculty of dispensing handed down by Innocent, he did not even from afar and dimly perceive anything of that argument which St. Alphonsus believed himself to have discovered most clearly and decisively in those words for ending the question? And if Benedict XIV found nothing in that Constitution suited to settling this controversy, so that in that Instruction he expressly testifies (above, no. 2) that after the Constitution of Innocent and down to his own days a question of this kind was customarily discussed on both sides, how can anyone suspect that Benedict XIV, by employing the same words which he knew had been employed by his Predecessor Innocent XII, wished to settle this controversy?

14. To this is added that, after that Instruction 87 had been issued, among the clergy of Bologna whom he himself then governed as Archbishop, the opinion defended and inculcated by him had so little prevailed that, when in the ecclesiastical meetings customarily held in the metropolitan Church for discussing moral questions, and at which he himself testifies that he was accustomed to be present (Instruction 87, no. 1), the case of which we now speak was proposed, an opinion contrary to his persuasion and encyclical Instruction was adopted, as we shall see a little below. I said, after that Instruction had been issued; for the meeting in which the case was resolved was held in September of the year 1740, while the Instructions had appeared first at Bologna, each separately at the time when it was proposed; then all collected together in the same city; and again in the year 1740 at Venice according to the model of the Bologna edition. Therefore, the more difficult he saw it to have his opinion received even by his own clergy, the more necessary some declaration must have appeared to him, by which an opinion which in his judgment contradicted Apostolic Rescripts of dispensations might at last be abolished. Yet no trace of such a Declaration appeared. Therefore, by this very fact Benedict's later intention discloses itself, namely, to define nothing concerning this matter.

15. And the force of this conclusion also appears to be increased from this: if Benedict XIV had really wished by his Constitution to define something and to correct the common opinion which, according to the opinion stated above, was erroneous, he certainly would have chosen a less suitable manner of executing his design. For not only would a mere repetition of the words of Innocent have been an inept mode of declaring Innocent's words, but besides, the condition of an error common among all the gravest Doctors would altogether have required that the Declaration or Definition be issued and promulgated in that manner by which the correction of the error could easily be obtained. But a promulgation suited to attaining this purpose will scarcely be found in Letters given to the Major Penitentiary in which his faculties are enumerated; and, on the hypothesis of such a Declaration, the facts confirm this, for, as will be openly evident below, no one in the City of Rome itself, so long as Benedict XIV held the Pontificate, had knowledge or even suspicion of this supposed Declaration or Definition.

16. But one could suspect such a Definition all the less because no one is ignorant that it was the most constant custom of the same Pontiff, if ever he determined to interpose his judgment in some grave controversy concerning which the Doctors had previously disagreed among themselves, never to omit to set forth, or at least to indicate, the state of the controversy, nor was he accustomed to pass over in silence the reasons persuading either side; but he always added some express indication of his mind and purpose by which it was openly established that by his own Authority he wished to put an end to the controversy. Yet not the least trace of all these things can be found in his words cited above.

17. Furthermore, that in reality nothing concerning this controversy was defined by the Constitution of Innocent can be gathered not obscurely from another source. For once it becomes known, first, that most Authors who afterward fought for the necessity of expressing incest nevertheless, no differently than others had generally done before Innocent, proposed their thesis within the bounds of probability; second, that there were others, and very many of them, who after the Bull of Innocent was issued contended, at least as more probable, that there was no need for the circumstance of incest to be expressed in petitions for dispensations; and third, finally, that whichever of the contrary opinions the Authors supported, none of them, either for or against, brought forward the Constitution of Innocent, which otherwise they did not ignore, or even made any mention of it; it must certainly appear sufficiently manifest that, according to the common understanding of the Doctors, the aforesaid Constitution contributed nothing toward resolving the present question. And a reading of the Authors who flourished from the time of Innocent XII easily shows that the matter stands thus with respect to each of those three points.

18. And to begin with the first, among those who, although they defended the necessity of expressing intercourse, nevertheless after Sanchez held it only as more probable, or inclined more to neither side, let there be, for example, Mazzotta, who writes thus (treatise 7, disputation 1, question 3, chapter 3, section 3, no. 3): But whether one seeking a dispensation from consanguinity or affinity with Bertha ought also to express the incestuous intercourse committed with her is a dispute among the Doctors. And after saying that Sanchez affirms it with many, while others contradict, he himself adds nothing further.

Thus Collet (Treatise on Dispensations in Particular, part 1, chapter 17, article 1), who, after adducing the opinion of Sanchez, adds: I think this opinion, as the safer and at least equally probable with the opposite, must be adhered to.

Thus La Croix (book 6, part 3, no. 922): If you have known your relative by consanguinity or affinity in a diriment degree, and afterward, wishing to contract with her, seek a dispensation but do not express that intercourse occurred, Navarrus, Gutierrez, Ledesma, Rebellus, Laymann..., Sanchez very probably say that the dispensation is void.... Others, however, hold the opposite with Henriquez, Salas, Vega, Rodriguez, Diana, Pontius, Hurtado, Krimer, Perez, and Aversa, who calls it safe in practice....

Thus Simonnet (treatise 18, disputation 5, section 23), while adhering to the opinion of Sanchez, nevertheless also reports without any censure the opposite opinion of the others.

Thus also Kugler (On Matrimony, no. 259) holds with Sanchez as more probable that the dispensation is surreptitious if the incest is concealed. But he observes that the betrothed are not to be questioned about this where the practice does not prevail.

Add to these also Louis Habert, who (On Laws, chapter 10) teaches that a dispensation is not surreptitious if through ignorance the circumstance of incest is not expressed.

19. But as regards the many more others who after the Constitution of Innocent maintained, at least as more probable, that there was no need for the circumstance of incest to be expressed, let Vincentius De Iustis lead their line. He was somewhat near to and almost contemporary with Innocent XII, and he treated this argument expressly and deliberately (On Matrimonial Dispensations, book 1, chapter 4, nos. 250-364); and after he had fundamentally, most fully, and at the same time most learnedly examined this matter on every side, he concludes thus: From all these things taken together it is sufficiently and more than sufficiently established that the expression of the intercourse is not necessary... if the petitioners have another cause which moves the Pontiff to grant the dispensation, since concealment of the intercourse itself does not intrinsically affect the dispensation... and it is not commanded to be expressed by any law, style, custom, Council, Canon, Decree, Rule, or Constitution. Moreover, he had premised (no. 317) that many Doctors... most openly taught this opinion in their treatises to be probable and safe in practice, AND DAY BY DAY CONTINUE TO TEACH IT.

Not long after Innocent XII and Vincentius De Iustis, Constantinus Roncaglia wrote his moral work. Having premised (treatise 21, question 4, chapter 3, question 10) that according to the more common opinion the intercourse must be expressed if it is public, although, as he says, not a few assert the contrary, he then adds: The foregoing holds if the intercourse is public, for it must not be expressed if it is occult. And although Sanchez wills that occult intercourse must be disclosed when a dispensation for an impediment is sought from the Sacred Penitentiary, nevertheless others affirm that this is not necessary; for just as the Datary or Chancery dispenses even for the internal forum although occult intercourse is not expressed, so the same must be said of the Penitentiary when, besides the intercourse, there is another legitimate cause for seeking the dispensation, all the more because incest with one's own blood relative does not need a dispensation.

Near the time of Innocent's Constitution was also Dominicus Viva. Yet to the proposed question whether a dispensation is valid if the intercourse is kept silent (On Matrimony, question 6, article 3, no. 8), he replies: Sanchez with others denies it... but Pontius... and others cited by Perez probably TEACH that the dispensation in the case adduced is valid, because neither does incest need a dispensation, nor is it commanded by any law that it be expressed; and besides, if the incest is expressed, the dispensation is rendered easier, not more difficult.

John Reuter was about their contemporary, and he writes thus concerning this matter (Moral Theology, part 4, treatise 8, no. 583): One who seeks a dispensation in order to marry a blood relative or relative by affinity whom he has known, and does not express the intercourse, has an invalid dispensation according to Sanchez and others; a valid one according to Krimer and others, because if he had expressed the intercourse the dispensation would have been easier. Nor does the contrary style of the Curia stand in the way when it is not confirmed by a Decree of the Pontiff, which does not exist.

Likewise John Clericatus, who (On Matrimony, decision 40, no. 11) discusses this question thus: If carnal intercourse has occurred between betrothed persons having the diriment impediment of consanguinity or affinity, must it be expressed to the Pope under pain of a subreptitious dispensation? There is a great dispute among the Doctors, whom the Salmanticenses report as asserting each opinion to be probable, but the negative to prevail; this is also embraced by Vincentius De Iustis (On Matrimonial Dispensations, chapter 4), where he calls this Question great and difficult; but at no. 259 he limits it to when in the Bull of dispensation there is the clause, "Provided that intercourse has not occurred," which, however, he says at no. 263 is not inserted today in Bulls of matrimonial dispensations; and Pyrrhus Corradus, book 8, chapter 8, no. 20, testifies to this, inveighing against Vicars who execute those dispensations and ask the petitioners whether they have had intercourse together, when they do not have this in their mandate. It is true, however, that concerning this question the Doctors suppose the dispensation to be sought and obtained from some other reasonable cause, namely, because of the narrowness of the place...; in view of these, or of any one of them, there is no need to express the intercourse which perhaps the betrothed blood relatives had with each other, as Vincentius De Iustis himself concludes after a long disputation.

Thus also Schmalzgrueber (book 4, title 16, no. 197): If the intercourse is occult, its expression is not necessary, as Sanchez teaches with others.... Nor in this case is there need to set forth the occult intercourse before the Sacred Penitentiary and petition that it supply the defect of the dispensation, both because incest with one's own blood relative does not need a dispensation, and because no solid foundation for this expression appears.

Reiffenstuel has nearly the same (appendix to book 4, section 4, nos. 191-192): It is said (he says) notably, If the intercourse is now public; for if it is occult, Sanchez rightly teaches with others that its expression is not necessary.... And although Sanchez wills that occult intercourse must at least be set forth before the Sacred Penitentiary, and it must be petitioned to supply the defect of the dispensation, nevertheless no solid foundation for this expression appears... especially since incest with one's own blood relative does not need a dispensation.

Thus also Maschat (at the end of book 4, treatise On Dispensations, section 3, no. 24): If intercourse is alleged as the cause, it must be expressed whether it was had in the hope of obtaining the dispensation more easily; and if another cause is alleged, nevertheless public intercourse must be expressed according to the style of the Curia, but not occult intercourse.

To this must be referred the fact that Cardinal Gotti (On Matrimony, question 7, doubt 2, section 3, no. 17) presents the expression of intercourse merely as something safer and fitted for removing scruples, even if the incest was committed for obtaining the dispensation more easily: Nevertheless, for removing (he says) all doubts and scruples, it is safer that those who seek a dispensation faithfully and sincerely set forth all things which can assist or delay the dispensation, namely, expressly and distinctly the degree of consanguinity or affinity, and the incest, if it was committed for the purpose of obtaining the dispensation more easily. A fortiori, however, as is evident, according to the distinguished Cardinal the expression of intercourse is not necessary if it was not had for that end, that the dispensation might be obtained more easily.

Vitus Pichler is no different (book 4, title 16, no. 37), where he writes: It must nevertheless be noted that mention of the intercourse, if it is occult while the impediment is public, ought not to be made in the petition to the Datary; but according to many it should be made if the intercourse also were notorious. Some think that recourse must be had to the Penitentiary so that the defect of the dispensation may be supplied because of occult intercourse not expressed in the Datary; but this does not appear necessary. Yet from the words cited no one should persuade himself that, according to Pichler, mention of the intercourse is necessary, at least if it was public. For a little afterward he adds:

If some legitimate cause is alleged, and the intercourse was not had under the said hope (namely, of a more easily obtained dispensation), there is an immense controversy whether intercourse which is not occult must be expressed in an impediment of consanguinity.

To these is added Giribaldi, who (Treatise X, On Matrimony, chapter 18, no. 9), after proposing the question, Must incestuous intercourse perhaps had between relatives by consanguinity and affinity necessarily be expressed when a dispensation is sought for contracting marriage?, replies (no. 58): The first opinion teaches that it must necessarily be expressed, lest the dispensation be subreptitious and lest the marriage afterward contracted be null.... But he adds (no. 59): The second, truer and more probable opinion teaches that intercourse had between relatives by consanguinity and affinity who wish to contract marriage need not necessarily be expressed, and that through this the dispensation is not rendered subreptitious, nor the marriage afterward contracted rendered null. The reason is that incest is not a diriment impediment which by reason of itself needs a dispensation, nor perhaps a prohibitory one, since it has already been abrogated by custom.

Finally, in the Resolutions of Cases of Conscience which on the title page of the volume are said to have been proposed and resolved by command of His Eminence Prosper Lambertini, then Archbishop of Bologna and afterward our Most Holy Lord Pope Benedict XIV, you will find the same doctrine. For after the necessity of expressing the depraved intention in committing incest, namely, to obtain the dispensation more easily, was established there (case 2, September 1740), these things are added: Yet I think this must be understood, first, when the aforesaid intention was manifested, since the Church does not judge internal things; second, when the same intention was reciprocal between those having intercourse, since it is not equitable that the offense of one harm the other; and third, finally, when another sufficient cause of dispensation was not related, since otherwise the obligation of manifesting either the fault or the intention had in the intercourse no longer appears to urge.

It is therefore sufficiently manifest that the theologians and canonists after Innocent XII not only did not hold as certain and established by Pontifical authority the necessity of expressing incest, or the nullity of a dispensation because the same circumstance was kept silent, but that most of them regarded as more probable, truer, and safe the doctrine which denies that necessity.

20. But as regards the third point, namely, that theologians and canonists who discussed this question after the Constitution of Innocent judged that no account was to be taken of it, this can be dispatched briefly. Let anyone who wishes to learn the matter with his own eyes read through the Doctors whom he has cited here. He will certainly see that neither those who teach that incest must be explained in the petition draw an argument for that opinion from the Constitution of Innocent, nor again do those who oppose that opinion have the authority of the Constitution of Innocent objected to them. And you will find altogether the same silence concerning the Constitution of Innocent among the few others who, without making any mention of the opposite opinion, teach that incest must be expressed; such are Billuart (On Laws, dissertation 5, article 3, section 4), Cuniliati (treatise 14, chapter 7, section 29, no. 6), and Catalani (part 3, question 14, chapter 19, no. 13). Moreover, the hypothesis is altogether incredible and manifestly repugnant which imagines, on the one hand, that the controversy was defined by Pontifical authority through a solemn Constitution, but, on the other, that all theologians and canonists, otherwise Catholic and most obedient toward the Apostolic See, took so little account of the Pontifical Constitution and Pontifical oracle that, in treating that controversy, they did not regard it even as worthy of mention, and indeed, while the Apostolic See looked on, some at most held the doctrine supposedly defined as probable, while others openly attacked it.

21. And to this certainly pertain the things which Vincentius De Iustis discusses concerning the same matter (loc. cit., no. 317): Although these Treatises (in which, namely, the necessity of expressing incest is denied) have been printed, circulated everywhere, publicly held and read in the hands of many, and are daily held, maintained, and publicly read, nevertheless this opinion has not until now been condemned by any Constitution publicly and authentically known; whereas, if it were false and erroneous, it must be presumed that it would have been condemned in some manner, so that such condemnation would be publicly and authentically known before Ecclesiastical Tribunals. For there is question of a most grave matter; because if the contrary opinion were certain, from the concealment of intercourse of this kind there would arise invalidity of the dispensation, nullity of the marriage, invalidation of the Sacrament, illegitimacy of the offspring, perpetual concubinage and incest, and consequently innumerable sins, crimes, and most grave scandals.... Therefore, it can and must be presumed that if this opinion were not probable, defensible, and safe, it would have been condemned in some manner by the Church, and in such a manner that its condemnation would everywhere be published legitimately and authentically.

22. Moreover, we said that if, from the unanimous suffrage of the Doctors, nothing concerning the proposed controversy was defined by force of the Constitution of Innocent, a judgment not dissimilar can be made concerning the Constitution of Benedict XIV. For, as is readily evident, it is not lawful to attribute more authority and weight to the Constitution of Benedict than to that of Innocent; and otherwise nothing is declared concerning the present matter in Benedict's Bull which was not declared, and perhaps more effectively, in Innocent's.

But this very thing can be confirmed by an argument not dissimilar to that which we used in drawing out the sense of the Constitution of Innocent, namely, by the testimonies of those who could more conveniently know the sense of Benedict's Bull and disclose it to us. It may indeed have belonged to Blessed Alphonsus, certainly a most learned man but far distant from Rome, to attribute by reasoning such a sense to the words of Benedict's Bull that he could consider the controversy already settled by Benedict. But certainly not so with those who, dwelling at Rome during the very age of Benedict XIV, could learn something better about this matter in the light of that City, and indeed, because of the offices they held, necessarily ought to have known it, and therefore can be more suitable witnesses concerning the sense of Benedict's Constitution. These men, namely, no less than those who wrote before Benedict XIV, we find either asserting the necessity of expressing incest as merely probable or even probably attacking it.

23. First there occurs to us Daniel Concina, who in the year 1751, namely, the ninth year after the Constitution Pastor bonus was issued, at Rome, in a volume whose title page is adorned with the coat of arms of Benedict XIV, proposed to himself this question (On Matrimony, book 2, dissertation 3, chapter 5, no. 17): When a dispensation is sought between relatives by consanguinity or affinity, must the incestuous intercourse had between them be expressed? He appeals neither to the names nor the Bulls of Innocent or Benedict, but replies thus: Authors dispute on both sides concerning this question. Pontius, Henriquez,... to whom Viva is added,... defend the negative opinion.... On the contrary, Sanchez, Diana,... defend that it must be manifested, and testify that the Congregation of Cardinals declared it so.... Others reply that the Congregation of Cardinals declared that the intercourse must be expressed as something safer and more secure, not as something more probable. But these are mere probabilistic inventions and therefore must be rejected; wherefore the latter opinion is MORE PROBABLE.

Father Philip of Carboneano follows, Professor in the College of the Propagation of the Faith, Consultor of the Sacred Congregation of the Index, and Qualificator of the Supreme and Universal Inquisition. And his testimony appears to be all the more weighty because he dedicated to Benedict XIV himself the work in which he professes his opinion concerning this controversy; and the Pontiff so approved the labors of the Friar Minor that he entrusted to him the task of adding also those things which could be useful to Missionaries. What, then, does Father Philip say concerning our question? Namely (appendix I to the treatise On Matrimony, article 1), he establishes first that intercourse must be set forth if it is notorious.

Then he continues thus: I said that the intercourse must be expressed if it is notorious, because if it remained occult, it cannot be presumed that the pious mother Church intends that this be divulged with enormous defamation of oneself...; and in this sense the arguments just adduced must be understood.... But must recourse then be had to the Penitentiary? Pichler and Reiffenstuel deny it, because, they say, incest does not need its own dispensation; and besides, the Penitentiary neither can nor is accustomed to demand any composition, since whatever it issues it issues gratuitously. Several theologians and canonists teach the same.... But Sanchez judges that in this case recourse must be had to the Penitentiary.... M. Paul Leo teaches the same. I think this opinion, as the safer and at least equally probable with the opposite, must be adhered to, and I have known Bishops who adhered to it. From these things it is evident that this writer also, distinguished at that time by reputation and by the offices which he held, however much he adhered more to the opinion establishing the obligation, nevertheless, no differently from Concina, attributed mere probability to it, and did not in the least suspect that this controversy had been defined by force of Benedict's Constitution.

Let Ubaldus Giraldi be the third witness. He was an Examiner of the Roman clergy and published at Rome, ten years after the death of that Pontiff, his celebrated Exposition of Pontifical Law, notably adorned especially with the doctrines of Benedict XIV. Concerning the present question, he judged it useful to bring forward nothing else (see part II, section 122) than what Rhemigius Maschat had written concerning it, whose Canonical Institutions he himself had enriched with his additions. But from the words of this writer adduced above, it is evident that he stood with those denying the obligation of expressing the intercourse if it had remained occult.

From these things someone will sum up the argument thus. It must appear altogether improbable that this was the mind of Benedict XIV; and again it can scarcely be believed that his Constitution Pastor bonus was understood at Rome in such a way as to define the obligation of expressing incest, and yet the aforesaid writers could, in the City itself, while the same Pontiff looked on, and even in writings published at Rome without objection from the Master of the Sacred Apostolic Palace or any other of the Revisers, indeed dedicated to the same Pontiff, and indeed so praised by him that by his command they were used in the schools, dispute in so uncertain a manner concerning a doctrine notoriously, as is supposed, defined by the Pontiff himself, that they either held and maintained it as merely probable or even adhered to the opposite as more probable; while they utterly disregarded, and judged not even worthy of mention, as if it did not exist, the Pontifical Constitution which by its own authority would have put an end to uncertain disputes concerning it. But, as can be gathered from the testimonies brought forward, the aforesaid Authors discussed the proposed argument altogether in this manner in books published at Rome; and the writings of Philip of Carboneano, dedicated by the Author to the Pontiff himself, were deemed worthy, by the will of the same Pontiff, to be taught in the schools of the College of the Propagation of the Faith, and indeed were adopted by command of the Bishops in several Seminaries of Italy. Therefore.

24. And the things which we read in the Lucan Resolutions of cases also impel us to judge thus concerning this Constitution. For when, in July of the year 1743, a question was proposed concerning Caius and Bertha, blood relatives, who had obtained a dispensation without the intercourse being expressed, the reply was: That dispensation is valid, as indeed is probable; for first, that the intercourse must be expressed is nowhere provided in law. Then, the intercourse is not the final cause of dispensing. Next, when a doubt arises, that interpretation must rather be made which sustains the act than that which destroys it.... Moreover, if anyone wishes to adhere to the contrary opinion, a dispensation must be sought from the Sacred Penitentiary (Solutions of the Lucan Conferences, volume 1, page 183, Lucca, 1762).

But perhaps the resolution (ibid., volume 3, page 366) whose Author was John Dominic Mansi in March of the year 1760 bears more upon our matter. For when the same case was proposed, he indeed set aside the opinion of Vincentius De Iustis and adhered to the opposite, citing Pyrrhus Corradus, M. Paul Leo, and also Instruction 87 of Lambertini, afterward Pope Benedict XIV. Nevertheless, he concludes the matter thus: The things hitherto adduced have no place when the dispensation has obtained its desired effect and the marriage has already been contracted. For this he again cites the aforesaid Instruction of Lambertini. Now it is most manifest that the case in which Mansi exempts one from the obligation of seeking a Dispensation again from the Sacred Penitentiary is precisely that in which, according to St. Alphonsus, the Constitution of Benedict XIV would have defined that recourse must be had to the Sacred Penitentiary for a dispensation. Otherwise, since the distinguished Mansi strives to fortify his whole resolution with the doctrines and authority of Benedict XIV, why, in order to strengthen, and indeed to resolve decisively, the first part of the question, does he not turn to the Constitution Pastor bonus, but appeal to Instruction 87 of Lambertini, which is so far from having the force to settle the question that it presents this doctrine fortified by such an array of arguments, as we saw above, that it appears to betray the cause? Indeed, why is it that in the other part of the resolution he goes over to an opinion which, according to St. Alphonsus, the same Lambertini, now Pontiff, had condemned? It must therefore be concluded that, apart from St. Alphonsus, no one had even the slightest suspicion of this definition of Benedict XIV.

And this may be confirmed by the testimony of another anonymous theologian of the Order of Preachers, who in the year 1797 published at Venice, in the Italian language, a work entitled: Decisions of Cases of Conscience and of Canonical Doctrine Made in the Diocese of Bologna by Order and According to the Mind of His Eminence Cardinal Lambertini, and Afterwards Supreme Pontiff. An Edition Corrected Again and Enlarged through the Work of a Dominican Religious, etc. For under the title Consanguinity, case III, he discusses the present question thus (volume 3, page 144): I said that the incest committed must be expressed in the petition if it is notorious; because if it has remained occult, it cannot and ought not to be presumed that the compassionate mother Church intends that such a shameful sin be divulged with most grave infamy of the persons.... But at least in such a case must recourse be had to the Sacred Penitentiary, and the impediment of consanguinity together with the occult incest be manifested to it under fictitious names, in order to seek from it a dispensation in the forum of conscience? Some theologians reply that it must not, because, they say, incest does not need its own dispensation.... But Sanchez is of the opinion that in this case recourse must be had to that Penitentiary.... M. Paul Leo is of the same opinion.... One ought to yield to a man of such experience in matters of this kind and in practice adhere to this opinion, which is safer and at least of equal probability with the contrary, all the more because the continuator of Tournely also testifies that he knew Bishops who adhered to this opinion. At which words it again occurs to ask: Would this theologian have remained hesitating in some uncertainty, and finally undertaken to resolve the question with the sole support of Sanchez and M. Paul Leo, who opined thus, if at least some report or suspicion had spread through the theological schools that a definition of the controversy had already been issued by the most celebrated Constitution of Benedict XIV?

To these must be added the distinguished theologian from the Order of the Servants of the Blessed Virgin Mary, namely, Marcus M. Struggl, all the more because on the very title page of his book he testifies that he hands down Theology according to the canonical and moral doctrine which shines forth in the excellent Works of Benedict XIV happily reigning; indeed, in the Notice to the Reader he expressly professes that he composed his work in all things according to the universal Constitutions of the Supreme Pontiff Benedict XIV which pertain, even reductively, to Moral Theology. And since elsewhere he cites Constitutions of the same Pontiff which are contained in the first volume of the Bullarium published in the year 1746, he certainly knew the Constitution Pastor bonus very well.

He therefore writes thus (treatise 12, question 4, article 2, no. 22): If the marriage has not yet been contracted and the petitioners are relatives by consanguinity or affinity..., then it must be expressed whether carnal intercourse, which, for example, is alleged in the Penitentiary as a cause of dispensation, did not occur under the hope of obtaining the dispensation more easily. But if, on account of a public impediment of consanguinity or affinity, a dispensation is sought from the Datary for other causes, mention must not be made of the carnal intercourse... unless this also was public; as Reiffenstuel teaches with the more common opinion of others (see his opinion above, no. 19). Struggl, therefore, no differently from Reiffenstuel, judged that the depraved intention in having intercourse must indeed be expressed when the intercourse is alleged as a cause of dispensing, and likewise that it must be expressed if it was public; but in other cases, nowhere. And again (ibid., article 4, no. 57), where he teaches that a dispensation is invalid when the petitioners deceitfully do not express some obstacle to the dispensation, he certainly mentions that the petitioners had intercourse under the hope of a future marriage; but concerning mere intercourse had apart from an intention of this kind, not even a word.

25. And this historical exposition of the sense which both theologians and canonists universally attributed to the Constitutions either of Innocent XII or Benedict XIV, for it makes no difference of which one there is question, can suffice for someone to conclude that it must be greatly doubted whether that new interpretation of them which Blessed Alphonsus introduced against the unanimous opinion of all Catholic schools can be regarded as legitimate. It therefore remains to inquire whether it rests upon some solid foundation.

But this in reality resides wholly in these words of his (book 6, no. 1135): Observe that the Pope, by saying, "may grant a revalidation," does not hold as valid marriages contracted with such concealment. This argument, which had never before been drawn from the words of Innocent, must rest upon this general principle: a superior can never delegate any power unless the cause of necessity is altogether certain, in which subjects seek to be aided through the exercise of such delegated power.

But a principle of this kind will easily appear fallacious, and even daily practice convicts it of falsity. For who does not know that recourse to Superiors lies open and is customarily had both when certain laws impose the necessity of this recourse and when the laws appear so uncertain that they leave that necessity also less certain? And since one delegated by a Superior for providing for the necessities of subjects ought to possess power in each hypothesis, what wonder is it if the Superior delegates to him faculties of absolving, dispensing, convalidating, condoning, remitting, relaxing, composing, derogating, revalidating, etc., even when the laws are not so certain as to render altogether necessary the absolution, dispensation, convalidation, condonation, remission, relaxation, composition, derogation, revalidation, etc., which the subjects nevertheless seek?

And to illustrate the matter by some example: some Doctors contend that, on account of incest, excommunication latae sententiae is incurred; others, only excommunication ferendae sententiae; and others that not even excommunication ferendae sententiae is established for this crime. Nevertheless, in the formula of absolution from incest with a dispensation (in M. Paul Leo, Practice of the Office of the Sacred Penitentiary, part 2, page 329), a faculty is given of absolving from censures on account of incest. Shall we therefore conclude that the Pontiff from whom this faculty of absolving comes has already declared or defined that censures are incurred on account of incest?

There are those who judge it probable or even most probable (see above, note to no. 65, question 5) that the Matins of the following day can licitly be recited at the second hour after noon and that the precept is thereby satisfied; others deny this. Suppose now that someone sought and obtained the faculty of reciting Matins at the second hour, which certainly is granted by an inferior only by force of a faculty delegated by the Pontiff. Will you therefore conclude that the Pontiff thereby defined or declared that Matins is recited invalidly if this faculty is absent? But elsewhere (above, page 47, in the note) we reported these words of Suarez: This argument is weak, because many things are granted in privileges, not because they are necessary, but because they are sought either because of fear or scruple, or in order to remove a doubt arising from various opinions. We also transcribed these words from Diana (ibid.): You will say: The Pontiffs grant privileges so that Matins can be recited two hours after noon. Therefore. I reply: those who seek this privilege are a sign that they hold the contrary opinion; and many things are sought from the Pontiff for greater caution and because of scruple; but from these things it does not follow that the cited opinion of the Doctors is not probable, nor that it cannot be followed.

26. Indeed, in this very matter of which there is question, and in the very Constitutions both of Innocent XII (Constitution Romanus Pontifex) and of Benedict XIV (Constitution Pastor bonus), a most luminous example concerning our matter presents itself to us.

And indeed, in the Constitution of Innocent (section 32) these words are contained: In marriages to be contracted, the same Major Penitentiary may, in the forum of conscience only, dispense, or command a dispensation to be granted, FROM OCCULT IMPEDIMENTS which do not render marriage null.

Likewise, in the Constitution Pastor bonus of Benedict XIV (section 39), it is read thus: In marriages to be contracted, the same Major Penitentiary may, in the forum of conscience only, dispense, or command a dispensation to be granted, FROM OCCULT IMPEDIMENTS which do not render marriage null; and likewise from the omission of proclamations, even for the purpose of contracting secretly, etc.

But what, finally, are these occult impediments of marriage, yet not diriment, for relaxing which the faculty is here granted to the Major Penitentiary? St. Alphonsus, who (book 6, no. 1144) in the foregoing section 39 incorrectly read concerning OCCURRING impediments, added: But merely prohibitory impediments of this kind today, as we said above, are reduced to three, namely, a vow, betrothals, and the prohibition of the Church. But that reading is manifestly erroneous, and it must be read, Concerning occult impediments. What, therefore, are these occult, non-diriment impediments? Certainly not a vow, for each Constitution treats below of dispensation from a vow. Not betrothals, because the Apostolic See does not dispense to the prejudice of a third party. Not time, because nuptials are prohibited at no time, but only the solemnities of nuptials are forbidden at certain times; moreover, this is not an occult impediment, just as neither the Catechism nor the prohibition of the Church are occult impediments, of which exclusively there is discussion in the cited texts of the Pontifical Constitutions. It remains, therefore, that in the cited texts the Major Penitentiary is given the faculty of dispensing from those merely prohibitory impediments which elsewhere we said (above, note to no. 776) were comprehended under the name Crime, and the first of which is incest, which Paul Marcus Leo in his Practice of the Sacred Penitentiary (part 2, page 205) designates with these most noteworthy words: Incest with a male or female blood relative of one's spouse or betrothed, from canon 1 and canon Transmissae 4, On Him Who Has Known a Blood Relative of His Wife.

And in fact the same Paul Marcus Leo (loc. cit., page 329) reports the formula of a dispensation from this impediment thus: Title: Absolution from incest with a dispensation for one who has known a mother and daughter and intends to contract marriage WITH AN UNRELATED WOMAN OTHERWISE PROHIBITED TO HIM BY NO LAW; the letters of absolution and dispensation are made as below. Friar Antonius Barberinus, etc. Insofar as it is so, after first hearing his sacramental Confession, absolve the said bearer on this occasion from whatever sentences, censures, and ecclesiastical penalties he has in any manner incurred on account of the foregoing matters, and from incest and excesses of this kind, etc., a salutary penance according to the measure of the fault, and other things, etc., to be imposed upon him on that account, etc.; and with the same bearer, so that, notwithstanding the said incest, he may, with SOME OTHER WOMAN OTHERWISE PROHIBITED TO HIM BY NO LAW, contract marriage in the forum of conscience, with the form of the Tridentine Council observed, mercifully dispense, etc. Leo himself then adds in a Note the reason why a dispensation of this kind is necessary: An incestuous person is prevented from contracting marriage with any person..., and therefore needs a dispensation.

With these things premised, let it now be asked: From the fact that, besides Innocent XII, Benedict XIV also in the Constitution Pastor bonus grants to the Major Penitentiary the faculty of dispensing concerning the aforesaid occult impediment of Incest, does an effective argument arise by which it may indubitably be concluded that an incestuous person is so prohibited from contracting marriage with any other person otherwise prohibited to him by no law that for this purpose a dispensation from an impediment of this kind by the Apostolic See is necessary for him? But was it not shown elsewhere (above, note to no. 776), according to the most common opinion of the Doctors, that the non-diriment impediments both of incest and of the other crimes were removed and became obsolete through desuetude? Did not St. Alphonsus himself, already from his own time (above, no. 4), proclaim: The impediments of incest, etc., TODAY ARE NOT IN FORCE, NOR DO THEY NEED A DISPENSATION? And if these impediments do not need a dispensation, to what purpose is the Major Penitentiary given the faculty of dispensing in the Constitution of Benedict XIV, as though this dispensation were necessary? And if a faculty of dispensing from these impediments is granted by the Pontiff, why do we not conclude by the same argument as St. Alphonsus that those impediments need a dispensation? How, I ask, does this reasoning differ from the foregoing reasoning of St. Alphonsus?

It must therefore be concluded that the principle upon which St. Alphonsus's argument rests is altogether fallacious: that no power is ever delegated by a Superior unless the cause of necessity is certain, in which subjects seek to be aided through the exercise of such power.

27. But the fallacy of this principle and argument can be known nowhere better than from those things which Benedict XIV himself discusses in the one hundred eighty-third of his Canonical Questions.

These matters are most opportune, not only because for knowing the force and sense of the Constitutions both of Innocent XII and of Benedict XIV himself we are permitted in a certain manner to employ him as interpreter, but also because, on account of the similarity of the cause and the arguments, they pertain especially to our matter.

There was question, namely, of those who, joined in the mixed third and fourth degree of consanguinity, had afterward obtained a dispensation upon the fourth, with the third concealed. But after a marriage had thus been contracted and consummated, dissensions arose between the spouses; the invalidity of the dispensation, and therefore the nullity of the marriage, began to be treated, as indeed grave Doctors held, and the controversy was brought before the Sacred Congregation of the Council. But what especially pertains to the present matter must be examined attentively: how and by what arguments the Officials of the Sacred Datary undertook to defend the nullity of the marriage. The distinguished Officials of the Datary (as it is said in the exposition of the Question), having read through the Registers from the time of St. Pius V to the present, drew up a discourse together with a justificatory Summary, and tried once and for all to prove that marriages, etc., had always been held null and invalid.

Of their arguments Benedict XIV, then Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, reports the last thus in the discourse which he appends (no. 8): The final argument is that whatever the Apostolic Datary does is said to be performed by the Pope himself. And since in the printed Discourse twenty-four examples are adduced by the distinguished Officials of the Datary, from which the nullity of a marriage is shown... when the nearer degree was concealed..., it appears that nothing clearer can be adduced concerning the matter at issue. For how could St. Pius V have granted in letters a declaration of equal validity in the terms of marriage..., how could other Pontiffs have commanded that Ordinaries publicly declare the nullity of the prior marriage and that the spouses contract anew, if the preceding marriage had been held valid? And again, how could the same Roman Pontiffs in other letters have declared equal validity in the terms of a marriage contracted and consummated..., that, with the form of the Council observed, the marriage be contracted anew; that the contracting parties be absolved from incest and from the excommunication imposed in the single Clementine decree On Consanguinity; that the offspring be declared illegitimate; and that, on account of the incest committed, the surviving spouse remain perpetually without hope of marriage, if the marriage contracted had been valid by law?

Who, moreover, does not see that arguments of this kind, which we see the Officials of the Sacred Datary using in this cause, are altogether similar to that argument by which St. Alphonsus afterward deduced the nullity of marriages from the faculty given to the Penitentiary to revalidate them? For it was certainly necessary that a faculty for this be granted to the Officials of the Sacred Datary by the Pontiff so that they could HEAL AND REVALIDATE marriages which in the case were considered void or at least doubtful, and in addition impose a repeated celebration of the marriage and the other things to be imposed according to the style of the Curia; no differently than in our case the Major Penitentiary is given the faculty of revalidating the marriages of which there is question.

28. What, then, did Benedict XIV say to these things? He roundly denied that an argument for the nullity of the marriage could be drawn from them. For (loc. cit., no. 21), after a preliminary protestation of the obedience owed to the style of the Datary, Benedict replies thus to the foregoing argument (no. 26): Finally, it is most clearly recognized that nothing is adduced which directly strikes the controversy now at issue. For in all the examples in which the Supreme Pontiffs

ABSOLVED FROM THE PENALTIES OF INCEST, DECLARED THE OFFSPRING LEGITIMATE, AND PRESCRIBED THE RENEWAL OF CONSENT with the form of the Council observed, the petitioners were supplicating for a dispensation and thus showed themselves ready to remain in the marriage, so that it is not surprising if the Supreme Pontiffs, GRANTING THE REQUESTS IN ABUNDANCE to the same persons supplicating for absolution from censures and for the legitimization of the offspring, both absolved them from censures, declared the offspring legitimate, AND PRESCRIBED THE RENEWAL OF CONSENT.

Benedict XIV therefore concedes that the Curia of the Datary conducted itself in all those things as though the marriages had been void. But he plainly denies the consequence; namely, against the Officials of the Datary, he denies that it follows from those Acts that the marriage was void. But from these things (he says) an argument cannot be drawn toward a declaration of the nullity of the marriage. Why? Because, namely, as he had premised, the Supreme Pontiffs, and therefore the Officials both of the Sacred Datary and of the Sacred Penitentiary, in accordance with the faculties granted to them, both dispense from incest and absolve from penalties and censures, and, with the tax imposed, prescribe the renewal of consent as though the marriage were void. But all these things have place also hypothetically when the petitioners supplicate for obtaining them; and, GRANTING THE REQUESTS IN ABUNDANCE, as Benedict XIV says, they are furnished to those asking, since all these things leave untouched the theoretical question whether they are altogether necessary.

29. Benedict XIV also confirms his intent, which likewise pertains to our matter, by other examples (ibid., no. 27): There can be an example in dispensations which are granted to petitioners as a precaution, or concerning irregularities, or concerning censures. For just as from these dispensations an argument is not valid for the incurrence of an irregularity or censure even in a similar case fortified by all the circumstances which were present in the cases in which the said dispensations were granted, when there is a formal dispute whether the irregularity or censure was incurred; so FROM WORDS OF THE SUPREME PONTIFFS SUPPOSING THE NULLITY OF THE MARRIAGE IN THE HYPOTHESIS in which the petitioners supplicate and are ready to remain in the marriage, AN INFERENCE TO THE POSITIVE NULLITY OF THE MARRIAGE IS NOT VALID.

Thus far Benedict XIV. His reply, as is evident, destroys all force of the argument by which St. Alphonsus wished, from the same premises proposed even in the Constitution of the same Benedict XIV, to infer against him the nullity of marriages. Nor is there perhaps any place here for objecting that Benedict XIV wrote these things before he was elevated to the summit of the Pontificate. For the authority of the writer is not to be weighed here, although, even if it were weighed, indeed it would have its own weight, and no slight one, and ought especially to have it with those who in the present controversy object to us Instruction 87 of the same Benedict XIV; rather, the outcome of the case which the Sacred Congregation decided must be examined. For to the Question: Whether the nullity of the marriage is established, the Sacred Congregation replied: Negatively. Therefore, since the Sacred Congregation finally rendered a judgment for the validity of the marriage, by that very fact it showed by its authority that the reply of Benedict XIV was of invincible force, and, on the contrary, that the argument adduced above, to which the one produced by St. Alphonsus is similar, was of no force, by which the Officials of the Sacred Datary, arguing from the style of the Curia, contended that those marriages must be held invalid.

30. And this Reply of Benedict XIV, plainly invincible from the suffrage of the Sacred Congregation, not only breaks all the force of that argument which St. Alphonsus used, but in the same manner also removes all force from the reason by which the same Benedict XIV in his Instruction 87 wished to prove as we saw above that a dispensation from the impediment of consanguinity is invalid if the preceding incest was concealed in the petition. For he himself sought the argument (above, no. 2) from Apostolic Letters of Dispensation. But can we imagine in these Apostolic Letters anything suited to expressing the invalidity either of the dispensation or of the marriage contracted which does not appear in the arguments alleged above (no. 27) for the same end by the Officials of the Sacred Datary? But Benedict XIV himself, as we have just seen with our own eyes, judged and proclaimed all those arguments altogether ineffective for inferring the nullity of the dispensation or marriage; and the Sacred Congregation plainly ratified his judgment. Therefore, from that Instruction 87 of Benedict no valid support for the conclusion of St. Alphonsus can be drawn, Benedict XIV himself and the Sacred Congregation being judges.

31. It will be useful, however, to append here also the reply which in the same Canonical Question 183 Benedict XIV made to those objecting to the style of the Curia. The other things (he says at no. 20) which were weighed to the contrary regard the style of the Datary; and by the said style some of the aforesaid Authors were induced to maintain the nullity of the marriage.... But speaking of this style, it is marvelous what and what kind of things have been said by other Authors who hold for the validity of the marriage.... Father Sisius, Apostolic Penitentiary in the Sacred Lateran Basilica, says in his manuscript Annotations on the Constitution of Innocent XII concerning the faculties of the Major Penitentiary: To the style of the Curia, however, it is replied that it indeed makes law, but not when it is contrary to the law itself. But the style in the subject matter, that the marriage is null unless the nearer degree is expressed in the dispensation, which style we saw observed in the Datary, does not make law and cannot be observed, because it would be opposed to the same Motu proprio of St. Pius V. Thus Father Sisius. Yet Benedict XIV prefers to his reply this other one (no. 21), namely, that nothing is adduced to the contrary which directly strikes the controversy, which we have already reported above from no. 28, and in reality comes to the same thing, since he denies that the style of the Curia rests upon law.

Nevertheless, could not the reported reply of Father Sisius also be given to those who, after Sanchez, especially urged the style of the Curia to defend the necessity of expressing incestuous intercourse, namely, of holding a dispensation as subreptitious if the preceding incest was concealed? Why could it not also be replied to these Authors that the style of the Curia indeed makes law, but not when it is contrary to the law itself? But if you ask what that law is, the answer is indeed easy. Let that new little reason which Sanchez contrived for proving the necessity of expressing incest, as we saw (no. 6), be banished, plainly as it deserves; and let the most true reason for this practice be recalled, the genuine and certain character of which is presented to us both by the testimony of the Doctors (note to no. 776), by the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council (ibid.), and by the very style of the Sacred Penitentiary, which appears most clearly in the formulas of Dispensations adduced above (nos. 5 and 26). From these it will manifestly appear that the necessity of expressing incest arose from and was founded upon the fact that incest by the old law presented a non-diriment impediment of marriage, on account of which an incestuous person was prohibited from contracting marriage with any woman otherwise prohibited to him by no law. From this, however, a dispensation was held subreptitious if an incestuous person sought a dispensation from another impediment and kept silent about the incest, because according to the style of the Curia there is the defect of subreption whenever one laboring under a twofold impediment sets forth only one while concealing the other. These things are altogether certain.

Moreover, the matter is confirmed by the unanimous testimony of the Doctors: through contrary custom the non-diriment impediments of crime, and therefore also the impediment of incest, were removed; and this, as we have seen, the Holy Doctor Alphonsus also affirms repeatedly. And if, in order to admit the existence of a custom as true, according to the judgment of St. Alphonsus (book 3, no. 1025), it suffices that some fewer recent Authors testify concerning it, since they can more suitably than the ancients testify concerning a matter which consists in some fact, then a fortiori it must be admitted when the Doctors agree unanimously in testifying to that very thing. But that the Doctors agree unanimously in this was clearly shown in the note to no. 776. Who, moreover, does not know that, according to the opinion of all theologians and canonists, a custom which has flourished through a long series of years and indeed centuries prescribes even against ecclesiastical laws? And if there is prescription by a custom of this kind, does not the custom itself now make law? It is therefore no wonder that St. Alphonsus expressly affirmed that both incest and the remaining non-diriment impediments of crime are no longer in force in such a manner that they do not need a dispensation. Behold, therefore, a sufficiently obvious reason why the reply of Father Sisius adduced by Benedict XIV for his own matter can also pertain to the present matter, and indeed a fortiori. For, as is evident from the exposition of the cause concerning which Benedict XIV treats in Canonical Question 183, there were some Doctors and there were also reasons upon which the style of the Datary rested, which held marriages invalid if, in seeking a dispensation concerning a mixed degree, the nearer degree had been concealed; but no one can now be cited who defends that incest has the character of an impediment to contracting marriage, so settled is the matter, as St. Alphonsus also testifies.

32. Concerning this conclusion, perhaps this one thing could move someone: how does it happen that the Apostolic See granted to the Major Penitentiary a certain special faculty of dispensing and even revalidating marriages where there is an uncertain and perhaps no necessity for a dispensation or revalidation?

To this difficulty it must first be replied that neither this nor any other difficulties can cause facts to be denied when the facts are certainly established. Moreover, did we not see above (nos. 26-27) that in the Constitution Pastor bonus the Major Penitentiary was also granted the faculty both of absolving from censures plainly obsolete and of dispensing from impediments which, even according to the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, do not need a dispensation? But otherwise there is a reason of its own, and a most grave one, why the Apostolic See wills the Office of the Sacred Penitentiary to be fortified with faculties of this kind also. For besides the general reason which can be seen indicated above (no. 26), namely, the necessity of providing for the tranquility of consciences in perhaps doubtful causes, there is another and twofold reason which required this faculty in the Major Penitentiary concerning the present matter.

33. The first is the extreme gravity of the anxiety by which the minds not only of the faithful but also of Confessors are tormented in doubts concerning the validity of marriages. For there is not question of the mere honesty of an act, when tranquility can easily be restored to consciences from that principle that an act must be considered honest whenever no certain law stands against it; but there is question of the validity of an act, namely, a matrimonial contract, which in no manner depends upon the dictate of conscience. But although, even when there is question of the validity of a marriage, if the cause of the doubts concerns impediments of merely ecclesiastical law, anxieties can be met through a doctrine sufficiently received in the schools (see above, no. 789), which exempts one from seeking a dispensation if that which appears to stand in the way of the validity of the marriage is something doubtful or merely probable. Yet no one is ignorant that there are those whose minds can scarcely enjoy any peace unless by means of a dispensation they cast aside every scruple. To this pertain those words of Cardinal Petra (Commentary on Constitution 8 of Gregory XI, no. 13): Setting aside the opinions of the Moral Doctors..., with our Canonists it must more safely be said that one wavering in a doubt of this kind is bound to inform himself and his conscience according to the disposition of the law before he attempts the prohibited act; then either to put aside the scruple altogether according to the judgment of a prudent man, or, if he cannot quiet his wounded conscience, to have recourse to the Holy Apostolic See for a dispensation at least as a precaution, which he will easily obtain, as Fagnanus advises.

34. The second reason resides in the singular condition of this cause or question. Namely, as we pursued at length above (see also the note to no. 776), the genuine origin and legitimate reason which introduced the necessity of expressing incest if one guilty of this crime wished to contract nuptials arose from this: incest, no differently from certain other grave crimes, was punished by the sacred canons with this penalty, that the guilty person was perpetually barred from any nuptials with any person unless he obtained the benefit of a dispensation from the Apostolic See or from the Bishop.

And let it now pass how it happened that, while all the graver theologians and interpreters of the Sacred Canons, as we also indicated elsewhere in the note just cited, clearly show that this penalty was inflicted by the Pontifical Constitutions only upon incest committed with a relative by affinity in the first or second degree, or indeed committed with a blood relative but only when the incestuous persons obstinately and with contempt for ecclesiastical authority persevered in that crime under the appearance of marriage or without such appearance, some persons nevertheless, contrary to the best-known principles of law which command that odious things be restricted and that penalties not be extended beyond the cases clearly expressed in the law, transferred it not only to every properly so-called incest, that is, with a relative by affinity or consanguinity, and even in the fourth degree, but further to less properly so-called incest, namely, with persons joined only by spiritual or legal relationship.

Whatever may be the case concerning this, the aforesaid laws prohibiting nuptials to incestuous persons caused them to need a dispensation for contracting with any person, but to need a twofold dispensation if they wished to contract with a blood relative or a relative by affinity. And from this, as we saw elsewhere in the cited note, arose the most true reason why a dispensation was held subreptitious when the incest was kept silent, namely, because, with two impediments concurring, one was concealed in the petition.

But when contrary custom gradually destroyed the force of the impediment by which an incestuous person was bound through those laws, behold the Doctors already disagreeing about the necessity of expressing incest, and at the same time behold this controversy covered with other darkness by those who inopportunely and unskillfully mixed elements altogether foreign with its foundations set forth above.

Meanwhile, however, what was the Apostolic See to do in a matter which enters daily practice, amid so great a disagreement of the Doctors and especially amid so great a confusion added to the dispute after Sanchez?

35. I said, after Sanchez, because in reality it is owing to Sanchez that this controversy was altogether disturbed and removed from its native condition and its own foundations. For he himself rightly and clearly set forth the genuine state of the controversy when (book 8, disputation 25, nos. 6-7) he reported two opinions, of which one denied and the other affirmed the necessity of expressing incest, but in such a way that the resolution of the controversy depended upon one and the same prior question, namely, whether that law and impediment by which an incestuous person was barred from nuptials without a dispensation was still in force.

But behold, afterward Sanchez, thoroughly disturbing the state of the question, most inopportunely undertook to bring forward a third opinion, which he called more probable (ibid., no. 8). And indeed, while he expressly admits that the aforesaid impediment of incest is no longer in force, you would now conclude that he adjudicates the cause to the authors of the first opinion, which for this reason denies the necessity of expressing that circumstance. Nevertheless, behold, he attributes the stronger position, at least as more probable, to the defenders of the second opinion, and for the reason which they sought from the aforesaid penalties imposed upon an incestuous person by the old law he substitutes the empty little reason above (no. 6), adding the style of the Curia, as though this style of the Curia did not rest upon that old law which he himself proclaims already obsolete by force of custom. And indeed from this we see an opportunity afterward given to writers to hunt out other empty little reasons (see note to no. 776), by which they might provide some foundation for the aforesaid style. Meanwhile, however, as we have already said, what policy did the Apostolic See observe in this confusion of affairs?

36. For even if only the true hinge of the controversy and its true and whole foundation is kept before the eyes - whether the impediment of incest, from which alone comes the true reason for expressing this crime in the petition, is in force, and universally whether those prohibitory impediments imposed upon certain crimes are still in force - Pichler (book 4, title 1, no. 92) will certainly reply that the Doctors commonly contend that all impediments of crime, or those arising from an offense, were removed by universal custom; Reiffenstuel (Moral Theology, treatise 14, distinction 14, question 2, no. 11), that they appear removed by contrary and long-standing custom and are no longer in use; Pirhing (book 4, title 16, no. 12), that today they are altogether removed by long-standing custom; John Dominic Mansi (Moral Theology, book 5, treatise 10, part 4, chapter 15), that the Doctors testify that these impediments of crimes were altogether removed by long-standing custom; Babenstuber (treatise 8, part 7, disputation 3, article 1, no. 5), that all these impediments of crime were abrogated through non-use, as the Authors most commonly teach and the practice of the Churches proves; Cardinal Gotti (On Matrimony, question 8, doubt 2, section 2, no. 11), that several of the aforesaid impediments are no longer in force but were abrogated by contrary custom; and, lest we add others fruitlessly, St. Alphonsus himself (book 6, no. 985) calls this opinion absolutely common. Nevertheless, Fortunatus Veneri in the last century (On Matrimony, question 7, article 1) discusses these impediments as though they were then in force at least in some manner. But Clericatus (On Matrimony, decision 38, no. 35) reports three opinions: the first holds that they are no longer in their force and therefore, as abrogated by use and custom with the Prelates of the Churches knowing and consenting, no longer impede; the second holds that they are even now in their force; but the third, which was Mastrius's, reconciles the two in such a way that the first is true when the impediments are occult, but the latter if they are brought into the contentious forum. The praised Peter Giovine also mentions these opinions (op. cit., section 376, no. 2), adding that the second pleased Cardinal Ursinus, Archbishop of Benevento, afterward Benedict XIII, while the third pleased Lambertini, afterward Benedict XIV.

Likewise, then, if, setting aside this hinge and foundation of the controversy, we seek the opinions of the Doctors concerning the controversy itself, not only, as we have already seen, do some affirm and others deny that this circumstance of incest must be expressed, but in addition it is found that, according to the diversity of opinions, a diverse practice also prevailed. Thus already from his own age Peter Ledesma (On Matrimony, question 56, article 4, conclusion 3) distinguishes where there is or is not a custom of seeking a dispensation even from incest.

John Praepositus (On Matrimony, question 7, doubt 24, no. 227) mentions the custom that this dispensation is not necessary. - And Pirhing (loc. cit.): Those thus impeded commonly enter marriage, without any dispensation sought, with the prelates knowing and seeing. And Giribaldi (On Matrimony, chapter 18, doubt 9, no. 59): It is not always expressed on the advice of learned men, although sometimes it is expressed on the advice of others. And, omitting others, Vincentius De Iustis (loc. cit., no. 343): For this intercourse, as Diana and Trullench weigh, is not always expressed on the advice of learned men, although sometimes it is expressed on the advice of others adhering to the contrary opinion.

37. It will be useful, however, to ask again here: What indeed was the Apostolic See to do amid so great an uncertainty and variety not only of opinions but also of practice? For the Curia, which, as Maschat says (Treatise on Dispensations, section 3, no. 34), does not so easily depart from its ancient formulas, preserves its style, as though, namely, the impediment and penalty of incest were in force, although, as Giraldi observes concerning this (section 714), the impediment appears removed by desuetude, unless in some place such a penalty has been received by use, as he adds with Thesaurus. But the Apostolic See, since it had not yet judged that it should be declared that those impediments had ceased through non-use and by force of contrary custom, nevertheless ought and wished to provide for those who, either on account of a custom perhaps still in force somewhere, or on account of persuasion introduced into them by those who held thus, sought from it a remedy for their conscience. Therefore, most wisely both Innocent XII and Benedict XIV, while defining nothing about this controversy either as to theory or as to practice, nevertheless grant the Major Penitentiary the faculty that, if some think they need a dispensation either for contracting marriage or for convalidating one contracted, he can grant what is sought. And it appears for this reason to have been done that, just as in the Constitution of Benedict XIV, section 43, it is said, if they have recourse to it, because recourse to the Datary also lay open, so in section 41 it is said, if they seek; because it certainly both could and can happen that others, following another opinion, abstain from seeking in the same circumstances.

38. Finally, this does not appear to be passed over concerning practice, namely, that the doctrine commonly handed down concerning impediments which appear to have the character of a penalty can be recalled here also. And if according to that doctrine (see above, note to no. 788, question 2) it can be considered probable that an impediment of crime, even a diriment one, is not incurred by those ignorant of it, then certainly with stronger reason this can be held concerning a merely prohibitory impediment of crime. And since this impediment consists in the penalty inflicted upon the crime of incest, namely, that without a dispensation one must be perpetually deprived of the hope of any marriage; but this penalty, also on account of the confusions introduced into this question, remains almost unknown through desuetude even to most students of Theology; a fortiori it must be considered unknown to the people of the faithful. Therefore, even if this impediment had to be said to be in force, which hypothesis otherwise has no place from the foregoing, scarcely any person could now be found who, on account of ignorance of this impediment, could not and therefore ought not to be held probably excused from it; and who, for this reason, since he would need no dispensation for contracting marriage because of this cause, would validly be dispensed perhaps from another impediment, even if in seeking the dispensation he made no mention of the incest.

39. And concerning these things let what has hitherto been said suffice to this extent, so that no one may be unaware of what the opinions of the Doctors, set forth and weighed in a most simple and historical manner, can contribute toward the resolution of the question proposed. For finally we wish to subject all things to the judgment of those to whom it belongs to pronounce a legitimate and definitive sentence both concerning all other things and concerning this controversy also, which can rightly appear merely disciplinary. And for the same reason we say that it must further be added that account must be taken in this matter also of the Responses of the Sacred Penitentiary, which at one time, as it was given to me to learn from the custodian of the Registry or secret Archive of the Sacred Penitentiary, replied to a certain Bishop who asked that expressing the disputed circumstance in petitions for dispensations was merely safer; but at another time it inclined to the opinion of St. Alphonsus. For whatever it finally judged, we all certainly know that, although even its private Responses to private persons do not have, as is admitted among all theologians and canonists, the force of a definitive sentence, nevertheless, from the consent of all the Doctors, they are, as St. Alphonsus says (book 1, no. 106), of great weight and rightly worthy of obedience. See the Response in appendix IV at the end of this volume.

There is no need to reply to anything in the ten columns which the VV. wrote (pages 817-822) concerning this Note, since they had nothing by which they might in any manner weaken the reasons adduced in the Note. It is permissible to ask this one thing of them: that before they clamor that an end has already been imposed upon this theoretical controversy, they not neglect to weigh attentively the things which the Holy Doctor Alphonsus has (book 6, no. 556), and which we reported above (note to no. 588, page 542).

868. ○ QUESTION 3. What must be done in a doubt whether a cause falsely alleged was final or impulsive, or whether it was true or false?

Reply. In all these and similar doubts, the dispensation must be regarded as valid. The reason is that in a doubt one must stand for the validity of the act. - St. Ligorius, no. 1133.

QUESTION 4. When the cause of a dispensation ceases, does the dispensation cease, for example, if the offspring to be legitimated by the marriage has died, etc.?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if the cause ceases before the dispensation is issued or granted by the Bishop or by another to whom it was committed by the Pontiff. - St. Ligorius, no. 1132.

Reply 2. Negatively, if the cause ceases when the dispensation has already been issued and communicated to the petitioners by the delegate, even if it ceases before the celebration of the marriage. The reason is that through the dispensation the impediment has already been removed. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - See volume 1, note to no. 120.

869. ○ QUESTION 5. What must specifically be set forth when there is question of a marriage to be contracted for the first time?

Reply 1. The impediment for which a dispensation is sought must be expressed in its own proper species, not one for another, not even a greater one for a lesser; for example, consanguinity for affinity. The reason is that in dispensations an argument from the greater to the lesser is not valid, nor does the Superior will to dispense in that of which he is ignorant.

Reply 2. If a dispensation from an impediment arising from illicit intercourse is sought, it must be set forth whether that intercourse was had by one or both under the hope of obtaining the dispensation more easily.

870. ○ QUESTION 6. What generally must be expressed in a petition for a dispensation concerning a marriage invalidly contracted? Reply. It must be set forth: 1. whether both parties, or only one or the other, entered the marriage in good or bad faith, namely, with knowledge of the impediment; 2. whether under the hope of obtaining the dispensation more easily; 3. whether they consummated the marriage; 4. whether they contracted clandestinely or in the face of the Church, whether after the proclamation of the banns or with these omitted. For a dispensation is customarily obtained more or less easily according to these various circumstances.

Hence, if some persons contracted before a civil magistrate so that a dispensation might thereby be granted to them more easily, this must be expressed, since bad faith was present, which renders a dispensation more difficult to obtain. If they contracted civilly with the intention of not contracting before the Church, this also must be expressed, because they attempted a clandestine marriage. But if they contracted in good faith and with the intention of seeking a dispensation from the Church, this circumstance does not appear absolutely required to be expressed, although it is better not to omit it. - Bouvier.

871. ○ QUESTION 7. If one who has obtained a dispensation from the impediment of AFFINITY arising from illicit intercourse, for example, with a blood relative of his betrothed, again sins with the same woman before marriage, does he need a new dispensation?

Reply 1. No, if the dispensation has not yet been put into execution by the delegate; because such dispensations take effect not from the day of issue but from the time of execution. - Thus all.

Reply 2. Indeed, no, even if the dispensation has been put into execution. The reason is that the impediment of affinity has already been removed by the dispensation as regards the effect of contracting marriage. - Thus commonly against some.

But if, after the marriage has been contracted, he sins again with the same blood relative of his wife, he is deprived of the right of seeking the debt, because the dispensation according to the style of the Curia was granted for the purpose of contracting marriage, not for sinning more freely.

But he would need a new dispensation if, before the marriage, he sinned with another blood relative of his betrothed, even after the dispensation had been issued, because a new affinity would be contracted.

872. ○ QUESTION 8. Is a new dispensation required if, after a dispensation has been obtained from the impediment of CONSANGUINITY, incestuous intercourse occurs between the betrothed?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if the intercourse was had before the execution of the dispensation. Thus from the common interpretation [4] and from the style of the Roman Curia requiring a declaration of incest of this kind; for when this is manifested, the Pontiff imposes a greater penance upon the petitioner. It is also confirmed from a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation in the month of May 1634. - St. Ligorius, no. 1141. [5]

[4] Concerning these things compare what was said in the preceding Note; from them you will also conclude that this is wrongly attributed to the common interpretation, as the Author says. For besides St. Alphonsus, and anyone else who copied these things from him, where are all those Authors, so that their interpretation can be called common?

But concerning what is said of the style of the Curia, besides those things which you already have noted in the preceding Note and at no. 776, observe what Vincentius De Iustis (On Matrimonial Dispensations, chapter 4, no. 344) skillfully warns with several others: the existence of this style, which requires the expression of incest, still must be proved; and otherwise this style would not induce necessity upon others unless it is written, proved, and confirmed by a special Decision and Declaration of the Pontiff, as the canonists cited by the same De Iustis teach (ibid., no. 345).

[5] Concerning these Declarations, Vincentius De Iustis writes thus after others (On Matrimonial Dispensations, chapter 4, no. 355): I say first that the asserted Declarations do not prove anything, nor must they be regarded, since they are not authentically established. And it is certainly worthwhile to add those things which he himself subjoins (ibid., no. 362), since he also touches upon that Garcia whom the Author cites a little later: From what has been said, it is inferred that, concerning Declarations of this kind, faith neither can nor ought to be given to Doctors who cite them in their treatises, as Garcia, Friar Leo, Bellarmine, Barbosa, Possevinus, and others commonly do; because unless they are presented authentically, they do not prove and are not to be regarded, especially since the same Sacred Congregation, through its particular Decrees, by the express mandate and command both of Gregory XV on June 6, 1621, and of Urban VIII on August 2, 1633, so disposes. At that time, when many Declarations were being circulated through the tribunals and were asserted to have been made by the Sacred Congregation, many of which were erroneous, mutilated, and altered, the Sacred Congregation, by the express order of the said Most Holy Lord Urban, commanded and expressly prescribed that no faith in judgment or outside it was to be given by anyone to Declarations of this kind, printed, to be printed, or manuscript. Vincentius De Iustis reports this command of the Sacred Congregation issued by order of Urban VIII (ibid., no. 363).

Jerome Nicolius had previously written thus concerning the same matter (Theory and Practice of Both Laws, etc., part 2, book 5, title 39, page 319): On April 27, 1721, the Most Illustrious Fathers of the Sacred Congregation of the Council decreed that all and every collection of declarations, decisions, or interpretations of the same Congregation of the Council of Trent, whether printed or to be printed, must be added to the Index of prohibited books; both because they are for the most part false, and because they are diverse and very much beneath the gravity of the style of the same Sacred Congregation, and therefore not worthy of this Sacred Tribunal. Gregory XV of holy memory approved this.

Nor let anyone ask us here why, then, in the note to no. 776, we also did not hesitate to employ one of these Declarations for our matter. We shall reply that it was not unknown to us that it also was taken from the catalogue of Declarations which Rebellus, in a most unfortunate work worthy of no price and no trust, collected up to no. 166 at the end of book IV, part II. But it could readily be admitted for a twofold reason. First, because at least in some part it presented the doctrine then unanimously received in the schools and founded upon certain laws. Then, because, since it was also adduced by Pyrrhus Corradus, it was most suited to removing those things which he had attempted altogether ineptly and most wretchedly concerning this question.

But the Declaration which the Author borrowed from St. Alphonsus was taken from Pittonius, namely, an Author who stands out singularly among writers who heap together and patch together Declarations of this kind with no selection and judgment, and whose collections therefore can be of no use.

Reply 2. Negatively, however, if the intercourse was had after the execution of the dispensation. The reason is that, once the dispensation has been granted and therefore the prohibition of marriage removed, the malice of incest also ceases. - This is also established from the same Sacred Congregation.

873. ○ QUESTION 9. Is a new dispensation required for blood relatives if, after a dispensation has been obtained, intercourse is repeated by them?

Reply. No, because the incest is morally the same, nor must the number of acts of intercourse be declared, as was just said. Hence a new act of intercourse does not invalidate the dispensation, whether it occurs before its issue or afterward, just as was resolved above concerning the similar case at no. 871; for there is parity of reason.

874. ○ QUESTION 10. If someone seeks a second dispensation in the same matter after another was previously obtained, ought he to express the first?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if the impediment contracted arose from some crime. The reason is that relapse into the same crime draws the Superior back from dispensing.

Reply 2. Negatively, if the impediment does not arise from some crime, or arises from a different crime. - Thus St. Ligorius, no. 1137, and others commonly.

875. Resolutions. - 1. A dispensation would be invalid if affinity were expressed in the petition instead of consanguinity, and conversely, etc., even if this were done from inculpable error. For the Superior grants the dispensation according to the things set forth in the petition, which, since they are false in fact, necessarily effect no dispensation. On the contrary, the dispensation would be valid if the error were found in the Pontifical Rescript, for example, through the fault of the copyist.

2. Likewise, the dispensation would be invalid if the third degree were expressed for the second, or the fourth for the third; the reason is that a dispensation is granted with much greater difficulty for a nearer degree than for a more remote one. But otherwise it would have to be said if through error the third degree were put for the fourth, because a dispensation in the greater contains a dispensation in the lesser of the same species. - Thus commonly against a few.

3. It is not necessary to say in the petition how many times intercourse was had with a blood relative of the wife, because from several acts of intercourse there arises one affinity. Nevertheless, intercourse had with several blood relatives of the wife must be expressed, because from these so many different affinities are contracted; and although these impediments are not diverse in species, they are nevertheless distinct in number. It is manifest from a Declaration of Benedict XIV. - St. Ligorius, no. 1138.

4. An error in the name or surname of the petitioners, or of the diocese or parish, more probably does not prejudice the validity of the dispensation, provided the substance is established, that is, the impediment and the cause. - Thus Sanchez, book 8, disputation 21, no. 37, and others commonly.

Point III. On the Manner of Seeking a Dispensation

876. ○ For granting dispensations of the Holy See, two tribunals, according to the diverse quality of the impediments, namely, the Datary and the Penitentiary, have been established at Rome.

I. The Datary. Recourse must be had to the Datary for all notorious impediments, or those which are foreseen as likely to come to the knowledge of others, or those which can be manifested without infamy, scandal, and other inconveniences.

II. The Penitentiary. Recourse must be had to the Sacred Penitentiary for dispensations and faculties which regard only the internal forum, namely, for occult impediments. In the petition, however, the proper names of the betrothed being kept silent, fictitious names are supplied [1].

[1] At present, however, it is permitted to approach the Penitentiary even for notorious impediments when a dispensation is sought in forma pauperum.

877. Questions. - QUESTION 1. How must a dispensation be sought if there are two impediments, of which one is public and the other occult?

Reply 1. If they are altogether disparate, recourse must be had to the Datary for the public impediment and to the Penitentiary for the occult one; nor is it necessary that mention be made before one tribunal of the dispensation sought or obtained from the other tribunal. Impediments are considered disparate when one is not increased by the other, as, for example, consanguinity and a vow, or consanguinity and machination.

Reply 2. But if they are not disparate, a dispensation from the public impediment must be sought from the Datary, with the other which must remain secret kept silent; and both must be expressed in the petition to the Penitentiary. The reason is that, from what has been said, they render the dispensation more difficult. But they must be held as not disparate when they are of such a nature that when joined they bring a greater repugnance to contracting marriage; for example, if someone wishes to marry a blood relative whose sister he shamefully knew. For then the dispensation is rendered more difficult. Hence in the aforesaid case the petitioner must seek from the Datary a dispensation from the impediment of consanguinity, and from the Penitentiary a dispensation from the impediment of affinity arising from an illicit cause, at the same time setting forth the other dispensation obtained from the Datary. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 1139.

878. ○ QUESTION 2. Must recourse be had to the Sacred PENITENTIARY so that the circumstance of intercourse had secretly between blood relatives may be manifested?

Reply 1. It is certain that there is no obligation to set forth occult intercourse in a petition to the Datary for the impediment of consanguinity. The reason is that no one is bound to defame himself, and otherwise this public revelation of occult incest is not prescribed.

Reply 2. But this circumstance must be manifested to the Sacred Penitentiary. The reason is that it is generally prescribed that intercourse had between blood relatives who wish to enter marriage be set forth. Now, since it is certain that there is no obligation to set forth occult intercourse in a petition to the Datary, because no one is bound to defame himself, and since it is not said in the precept that a public revelation of occult incest must be made, it follows that occult intercourse must at least be disclosed by a secret manifestation before the Penitentiary, lest the law become altogether useless and an exemption from a certain law be granted without any cause. Many formerly held the opposite; but today there is no longer any doubt concerning this, says St. Ligorius, no. 1135, after the Bull Pastor bonus of Benedict XIV [2].

[2] It has already been said above that this precept or law of setting forth the occult circumstance of incest in the present case is not proved, nor does any force accrue to this opinion from the Constitution of Benedict XIV, which the Author adduces again.

879. ○ QUESTION 3. Is a dispensation sought in the form for the poor valid if the petitioners are not poor?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that the obreption falls only upon the impulsive cause, but not upon the motive or final cause; for poverty is not the reason on account of which the dispensation is granted, but the reason on account of which it is granted gratuitously. Hence another motive cause must always be present. - Thus St. Ligorius in Homo Apostolicus, no. 87, where he says this is established from a decision of the Sacred Congregation of September 9, 1679. - Some nevertheless deny it, because, they say, the Pope does not intend to dispense except with those who are truly poor. - La Croix, no. 859. - Gousset, no. 866.

In practice, however, although those who obtain a dispensation in the form for the poor when they are not poor sin gravely, nevertheless, once the marriage has been contracted, it appears that one must stand for its validity, at least on account of the authority of St. Ligorius and the Sacred Congregation, unless this declaration is proved not to be authentic.

QUESTION 4. Who must be regarded as poor?

Reply. From Canon law they must be in some manner pitiable, since according to the style of the Curia the petition must be drawn up thus: The petitioners are poor and pitiable, and they live from their labor and industry. In practice the state of their fortune must be set forth, or one must stand by the rules given by the Bishop.

From a Declaration given by the Rectors of the Apostolic Datary in the year 1841, those whose fortune does not exceed the value of 5,000 francs are to be regarded as poor; but those whose fortune does not exceed the value of 10,000 francs are called nearly poor. - Bouvier, Dispensations from Impediments, sect. 3, section 3.

880. ○ QUESTION 5. How must a dispensation be executed?

Reply 1. As regards a dispensation of the Sacred Penitentiary, after absolution let it be made in these or similar words: By Apostolic authority I dispense you from the impediment N. which you incurred, so that you may enter marriage (or consummate one entered, or remain in it), and I render legitimate the offspring begotten (or to be begotten). In the name of the Father, etc.

But if the dispensation is from a vow of chastity, it is said: Moreover, by dispensing I commute for you the vow of chastity which you made, so that you may contract marriage and use it, into the works which I have prescribed for you. In the name, etc.

No formula is prescribed under pain of nullity, indeed not even under precept, for none is contained in the Roman Ritual. If the Confessor had omitted to legitimate the offspring, he could repair this omission; for then he would continue the cause committed to him and not yet completed. - Bouvier.

Reply 2. As regards a dispensation of the Datary: 1. The delegate for dispensing must inquire into the truth of the causes, as is contained in the Rescript; more probably, however, this inquiry is not required for validity. 2. He must declare before the parties and witnesses that the impediment of marriage is removed, and order that an attestation of this dispensation be written in the registers of the diocese. 3. He must transmit the Rescript of the Datary to the Pastor of either party with permission that he may assist at the marriage.

A dispensation from the Datary must always be sought through the Bishop. A dispensation from the Penitentiary, however, can be sought immediately by the petitioner or by another in his place. Nevertheless, it is safer and easier that this also be sought through the Bishop, with the name of the petitioner kept silent.

881. ○ QUESTION 6. How must a dispensation be obtained from Bishops when they can dispense by an Indult?

Reply. The same rules which are held as necessary in the Roman Curia must necessarily be observed in the case also, because it is the mind of the Supreme Pontiff that Bishops can use the apostolic concession in no other manner.

A Bishop dispensing by virtue of an Apostolic Indult must, under pain of nullity, express that he dispenses as a delegate of the Holy See from an Indult of delegation granted on such a day and year and to be valid for so many months or years; because the Indults commonly prescribe this, and Benedict XIV asserts in the Constitution Ad tuas manus, August 2, 1748, that this is then prescribed under pain of nullity.

882. ○ QUESTION 7. What are the clauses customarily appended in dispensations from the Sacred Penitentiary?

Reply. They are the following, namely: 1. If it is so. But faith must be given to the penitent unless the delegate certainly knows the opposite from knowledge received outside confession. 2. After first hearing sacramental confession. According to this clause, therefore, confession is necessary. 3. With the occasion of sin removed. It is understood if the occasion is voluntary, which must in fact be removed; but if it is necessary, let it at least be removed from the will by rendering it remote rather than proximate through the due means. 4. Provided that the impediment is occult. 5. A grave penance having been imposed upon him. It is understood according to the condition and strength of the penitent. 6. These presents being torn up, under pain of excommunication latae sententiae. This tearing up must be done immediately, but understand morally, namely, at least within three days after the dispensation has been executed. But if the clause of tearing up is not appended in the letters, as it is not appended when the marriage has not yet been contracted, then there is no obligation to tear them up; rather, a dispensation of this kind must be cautiously noted by the Pastor in a book which cannot be seen by anyone else, so that, namely, when there is need, he may be able to attest to the dispensation obtained. - St. Ligorius, no. 1143.

883. ○ QUESTION 8. How can the monetary tax imposed upon petitioners be reconciled with the Decree of the Council of Trent commanding that a dispensation be granted GRATUITOUSLY?

Reply. If money received on the occasion of dispensations were to accrue to the benefit of the one dispensing, the command of the Council of Trent would be violated and the dispensation would be simoniacal; but the matter does not stand thus. For the money is received only as an alms to be expended upon pious works [3].

[3] It is not necessary that the cause for dispensing precede the granting of the dispensation, but it suffices that through the dispensation itself and its manner the cause itself be completed. For when a dispensation is given without cause, some satisfaction or fine is imposed for a pious work or for another common utility of the Church; through that work the cause of the dispensation arises, which is then made by way of commutation, just as we also said was done in the granting of Indulgences. Thus Suarez (On Laws, book 6, chapter 18, no. 26).

884. ○ QUESTION 9. How is a dispensation of the Sacred Penitentiary to be executed if the impediment is known and common to both contracting parties?

Reply. In this case each must be dispensed by his or her respective Confessor. This is established from a response of the Sacred Penitentiary, November 15, 1748. The same Rescript, however, can serve for two Confessors, and it must be torn up by the one who executes it later with his penitent. But if the impediment is known to only one party, a single execution is required. - Collet, Treatise on Dispensations. - Bouvier, etc.

Forms — For Seeking Dispensations — I. from the Datary

Most Holy Father,

885. ○ John N. (the proper name is inserted) and Anna N., of the parish commonly called N., Diocese of N., blood relatives in the equal second degree, desire to enter marriage with each other, and therefore humbly implore from Your Holiness the dispensation necessary for them. The reasons are: 1. THE AGE OF THE MAIDEN, who, now twenty-five years old, would probably not find another man whom she could suitably marry; 2. THE CHRISTIAN VIRTUES existing in each petitioner; 3. THE SMALLNESS OF THE PLACE. (Let other causes be inserted, if there are any.)

At N., on the ... day, etc.

P., Pastor of the Parish.

If they are poor, after the reasons have been set forth it is said: They are poor and pitiable, and live only from their labor and industry.

The petition drawn up by the pastor of the petitioners must be sent to the Bishop. The Bishop, or the Vicar General in his place, sends it, furnished with testimony, the episcopal seal, and signature, to his agent at Rome, who solicits the dispensation and transmits it to the Bishop.

II. from the Penitentiary

Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord,

886. ○ Titus, aware (or ignorant) of the impediment, contracted marriage in the face of the Church with a woman whose mother, daughter, or sister he had previously known carnally; wherefore, since they cannot be separated without scandal and the impediment is occult, he most humbly petitions Your Eminence graciously to grant him a dispensation so that he may contract validly.

Deign, Your Eminence, to direct the response to me, the undersigned.

Here the name and surname of the person to whom the reply is to be sent must be expressed; likewise the name of the town or city to which or through which it is to be sent, and these indeed in the vernacular language. Above the closed and sealed petition is written: To the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord Cardinal Major Penitentiary.

887. ○ Another form, when there is a twofold impediment, one public and the other occult.

Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord,

Peter and Anna, blood relatives in the second degree, not in hope of obtaining a dispensation more easily [4], but overcome by mad lust, had intercourse together. John, however, Peter's brother, intends to marry Anna, a dowry having been established for her which she could not otherwise have according to the condition of her state. Both petition the Most Holy Lord that the Apostolic Datary deign to dispense with them concerning the said impediment of consanguinity. The petitioner Anna, however, humbly petitions Your Eminence that, by a special grace, you deign to dispense with her so that, notwithstanding the aforesaid entirely occult impediment of affinity arising from illicit intercourse, she may licitly and validly contract marriage with the said John.

[4] These words are not pertinent; for the circumstance of intercourse previously had, with or without the purpose of obtaining a dispensation more easily, enters into the case only when it is a question of a marriage to be contracted between the incestuous persons themselves. But if the incest was committed without the purpose and hope of obtaining a dispensation, and it is a question of marriage to be entered between the incestuous persons themselves, we have already said (above, in the Notes to nos. 867 and 872) that there is no pressing necessity to set forth this circumstance, unless perhaps it is the only cause available for obtaining the dispensation.

Another Form for a Vow of Perpetual Chastity

Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord,

888. ○ A certain maiden, approximately fifteen years old, knowingly and freely made a vow of preserving perpetual chastity; but now, in the judgment of the Confessor who has long heard her confessions, she would come into certain danger of salvation unless she marries. Wherefore she humbly and earnestly petitions that her vow be commuted for her to the effect of contracting marriage.

Deign, Your Eminence, etc.

Another Form concerning the Same Matter

889. ○ Titius, being bound by a vow of chastity and being in grave danger of incontinence, humbly petitions Your Eminence to deign to grant the petitioner a dispensation from the aforesaid vow, so that he may contract marriage, etc.

In addition, take care to observe these things concerning a petition:

1. Petitions to the Datary in which the canonical causes are not expressed, or which lack the testimony of the Bishop or another required condition, are torn up, and no response is made by the Officials of the Sacred Congregation.

2. In France a cause now occurs quite frequently which can be added in the petition, namely, a marriage civilly contracted, or the danger that it may be contracted. In that event, however, the dispensation is granted chiefly for the benefit of the bride, the offspring born or to be born, and the family, or to avoid scandal harmful to religion and morals.

3. The form of dispensations now received both in the Penitentiary and in the Datary is commissorial; that is, the power of dispensing is given, but the dispensation itself is not precisely given. Hence it follows that the causes alleged must be true both at the time when the Rescript is issued at Rome and at the time when the dispensation is committed to execution; for in the Rescript it is said, if the matter is so, or something equivalent, or it is at least understood [5].

[5] Others, however, with Garcia (On Benefices, part 6, chapter 2, no. 283) and Pyrrhus Corradus (Practice of Apostolic Dispensations, book 7, chapter 2, no. 32), think it sufficient that the cause exist at the time when the Delegate executes the Dispensation itself; because the words of the Rescript, If you shall find the matters to be true, etc., are in the future tense; and otherwise the Pontiff, saying in the Rescript, Not having certain knowledge of the foregoing, etc., appears to commit the business according to those circumstances which the Delegate will find. Suarez (On Laws, book 6, chapter 20, no. 14), with others (in De Iustis, On Matrimonial Dispensations, book 1, chapter 6, nos. 299-301), objects that the petition is subreptitious and that it must not be presumed that the Pontiff wishes to favor frauds. But the others will perhaps reply that a dispensation which is finally granted for a truly existing cause is not subreptitious; and the adversaries must readily agree that it will be valid if in the case the falsity was set forth not through deceit but in good faith. Wherefore they will derive the nullity of the dispensation not from the eventual defect of the cause, but from the crime of fraud, which the Pontiff wills to punish in this manner, even if otherwise the dispensation is granted for a truly existing cause. But this will be said less consistently by those who, according to the common opinion, hold that a dispensation obtained by one who, together with a true and sufficient cause, fraudulently adds in the petition other causes likewise sufficient in themselves but altogether false, is valid. Let the definition of this question, however, belong to wiser men.

4. A dispensation for the internal forum is customarily committed to a Doctor in Theology or in Canon law, or, if one cannot be had, to a Confessor approved by the Bishop, who cannot execute the dispensation unless he has first heard the confession. But because in most places Confessors who are Doctors in Theology can now rarely be found, the faculty of dispensing is ordinarily committed simply to a Confessor to be chosen by the penitent.

Chapter VII. On the Revalidation of Marriage

890. ○ A marriage can be invalid: 1. through defect of consent; 2. through defect of the prescribed form; 3. through incapacity of the parties.

Article I. On the Revalidation of a Marriage Invalid Through Defect of Consent

It is certain, 1. that a marriage invalid through defect of consent alone can be revalidated by the simple renewal of consent.

It is certain, 2. that renewal of the consent of each party is required if neither truly consented, and at least of the one who did not consent if there is only one. Concerning several matters, however, there is controversy; hence:

891. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must consent be renewed by both parties if only one consented fictitiously or under compulsion?

Reply. Negatively. The reason is that the consent of the other, having been truly placed, perseveres so long as it has not been positively retracted. Thus the Theologians commonly; and St. Ligorius, no. 1114, calls this opinion the truer one, that is, morally certain.

Some nevertheless affirm, although their opinion does not otherwise appear probable. But in practice it is preferable to choose the safer counsel and, insofar as it can be done without inconvenience or danger, care must be taken that consent be elicited from both.

QUESTION 2. Must consent be renewed before the Pastor and witnesses?

Reply. Negatively. This is apparent from the practice of the Church and the common opinion, namely, because of the inconveniences which would follow from that obligation.

Article II. On the Revalidation of a Marriage Invalid Through Defect of the Prescribed Form

892. ○ I. It is certain that a marriage invalid by reason of clandestinity must be entered before the Pastor and witnesses, unless a dispensation from the law of the Council of Trent is obtained from the Supreme Pontiff, which otherwise is rarely granted. For that law obliges until it has been fulfilled, since it is a condition sine qua non required in every case for the validity of marriage, unless recourse to the Pastor is impossible, as was said above where the impediment of clandestinity was treated.

II. If both spouses do not refuse to present themselves before the Pastor, the marriage must be revalidated before him either publicly or secretly, according as the nullity of the marriage was public or occult. The reason is that, in the former case, scandal must be removed; but in the latter it must be forestalled and the reputation of the spouses preserved.

This is further confirmed from the Declaration of Cardinal Caprara, legate a latere in France, in the Instruction on the revalidation of invalid marriages. For thus he says: 6. If the nullity of the marriage is occult, or commonly unknown, the marriage must be contracted secretly before the proper Pastor, with at least two trustworthy witnesses employed, in order to avoid scandals; the entry is then to be recorded in the book of secret marriages. 7. If the nullity of the marriage is public, the marriage must be celebrated publicly, with the form of the Council of Trent observed, in order to remove scandal. But if the Ordinary, on account of particular circumstances, shall judge it expedient that it instead be celebrated secretly before the proper Pastor and two witnesses, it can be celebrated secretly, provided, however, that the public scandal can be removed in another manner and is removed as soon as possible.

Various difficulties occur, however, if one party consents to contract before the Pastor and the other refuses, or if both are badly disposed. Hence:

893. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What must be done if one party or both consent to renew consent before the Pastor, but refuse to go to the church?

Reply. They must be joined in their own home or in another place chosen by them, provided grave witnesses are present, by whose aid the convalidation of this marriage can be made public if this is necessary for removing scandal, namely, if the invalidity of the former union is notorious.

QUESTION 2. What must be done if one party refuses to contract before the Pastor?

Reply. Cardinal Caprara responds thus in the cited Instruction: If the refusal arises from ignorance or some error contrary to the laws or doctrine of the Church concerning impediments which invalidate marriage, let the refusing party be instructed with due prudence and in charity. And insofar as the party still refuses to convalidate his marriage in the face of the Church, then pains must be taken that he appoint a special proxy who may contract the marriage in his name in the customary manner; or at least that, by consent de praesenti expressed through a Letter directed to the proper Pastor or to another Priest having the permission of the Ordinary or Pastor, the marriage be renewed.

894. ◦ QUESTION 3. What if the indisposed party is unwilling to contract even through a proxy, etc.?

Reply. The same Cardinal Caprara responds thus:

If the things prescribed thus far can by no means be obtained, and one party cannot be brought to carry out the celebration of the marriage according to the things handed down above ..., we judge that recourse can be had to a dispensation in the root of the marriage, or to the sanation of the marriage in the root, so that at least the salvation of the soul of the innocent party, the legitimacy of the offspring, and the tranquility of the families may be fully provided for, and the salvation of the soul of the refusing party also may be provided for as soon as possible.

QUESTION 4. What if neither party consents to contract marriage anew?

Reply. Nothing at all is to be done here and now, since no dispensation is granted by the Church in such a case. It remains, therefore, that the Pastor devote himself to fervent prayer, frequently commend the most wretched concubinaries to God, and strive with assiduous care to procure their conversion.

Article III. On the Revalidation of a Marriage Invalid Through the Incapacity of the Parties

To revalidate a marriage invalid through an ecclesiastical impediment, before all else a dispensation from the impediment must be obtained. It is given in a twofold kind, namely: 1. a simple dispensation, or one in the customary manner; 2. a dispensation in the root of the marriage.

§ I. On the Revalidation of Marriage in the Ordinary Manner

895. ○ I. Rule. If each spouse is aware of the impediment, each is bound to renew consent, after the dispensation has been obtained, in order to revalidate the marriage. The reason is that knowledge of the nullity of the marriage because of a known diriment impediment had necessarily excluded true consent in the preceding contract of marriage.

II. Rule. If only one party knew the impediment, that party is certainly bound to renew his or her consent, at least alone and separately. This follows from what has just been said.

III. Rule. The party ignorant of the impediment would not necessarily have to renew consent for the validity of the marriage if the impediment regarded only the other party. The reason is that the consent of the former was valid from the beginning and therefore perseveres; hence renewal of the consent of the incapable party would suffice. Thus, if a member of the faithful had married an unbaptized woman who was ignorant of the impediment, it would suffice, after the infidelity ceased or a dispensation was obtained, that the faithful spouse renew consent; because the consent of the unbeliever was valid, since the Church could not impress a personal incapacity upon her.

896. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must the party who is ignorant of the impediment necessarily renew consent for the valid restoration of the marriage?

Reply. There are two probable opinions:

I. OPINION. It commonly affirms. The reason is: 1. because the impediment removes the efficacy of consent from the beginning; therefore it remains inefficacious, and consequently can produce no effect, since it perseveres in the same manner in which it was given. A simple dispensation, however, does not heal the defect which preceded, but only renders the parties capable of consenting in the future. 2. Because this clause is customarily added in the Rescripts of the Sacred Penitentiary: The other party having been informed of the nullity of the prior marriage. Therefore, etc. - Sanchez, Sylvius, Navarrus, etc.

II. OPINION. It denies. The reason is that the prior consent, although it lacked its effect because of an impediment imposed by positive law, was nevertheless valid by natural law, since it was given to a person capable of contracting by natural law. Therefore, once the impediment is removed, the prior consent suffices, which virtually perseveres in its effect through conjugal intercourse, cohabitation, or other external signs. Therefore, when the internal consent of the spouse aware of the impediment is added, expressed at least through similar external signs, the consent of both is united and the marriage is convalidated. Nor does the clause of the Sacred Penitentiary stand in the way, for it is judged to be added not as a true condition but as a simple instruction; because otherwise this condition would often be frustrated. - The Salmanticenses, etc.

Nevertheless, in practice one must not depart from the first opinion unless a dispensation in the root is obtained, at least outside a case of urgent necessity. But if the case is urgent and a dispensation in the root cannot easily be obtained, it will be licit to use the second opinion; because in straits of this kind it is not forbidden to use a probable opinion even with the danger of frustration of the Sacrament [1]. An urgent necessity is present when, from manifesting the nullity of the marriage to the other party or from the separation of the spouses, danger of death or grave infamy or scandal can prudently be feared. Thus St. Ligorius, nos. 1114, 1115.

[1] Say rather that the Sacrament is not then frustrated; for it is a question of matter in which the Church can supply. And since in the case it is not permissible to have recourse to the same Church, while otherwise the contracting parties act according to a probable opinion, it must be held that the Church in fact supplies.

897. ○ QUESTION 2. Does the renewal of consent presuppose knowledge of the nullity of the marriage?

Reply. It appears that one must affirm with the more common opinion. The reason is that renewal of consent must necessarily proceed from the intention of effecting a marriage; but one who believes that the prior marriage was valid does not will to effect a marriage, but only renews and ratifies the marriage previously entered. And since that marriage was invalid, the marriage cannot be convalidated through consent of this kind. This must especially be affirmed if it is a question of a spouse who is presumed likely to dissolve the marriage if he knew of the nullity. For then he would be judged to say that he wills the marriage, but the one which existed from the beginning, and not another. - See St. Ligorius, ibid.

898. ○ QUESTION 3. Must consent be renewed before the Pastor and witnesses?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if the impediment is public. The reason is: 1. because the reason of removing or forestalling scandal then presses; 2. because the Briefs of the Datary always require it in this manner; 3. because otherwise the validity of the marriage could not be proved before the Church, since it is publicly established that the Pastor and witnesses were not present except at the celebration of an invalid marriage; and thus the end intended by the Council of Trent would not be obtained. For the spouses, after the marriage had been secretly revalidated, could separate and enter new marriages with others with impunity.

Reply 2. Negatively, if the impediment is occult. The reason is: 1. because the law of the Council of Trent then appears already to have been sufficiently fulfilled through the presence of the Pastor and witnesses at the first marriage; or because the Council of Trent, in prescribing the presence of the Pastor and witnesses, is rightly presumed not to have wished to include this case. For the Council wished only to meet the inconveniences which arose from marriages celebrated secretly; but in our case the marriage has already been publicly contracted, and therefore that danger is absent. It is sufficient, therefore, to place the new consent secretly. 2. Because an extension of the law to this case would be not only useless but also harmful, since it would furnish occasion for many scandals, expose the parties to defamation, and induce many other inconveniences; therefore, etc. 3. Because it is proved from the constant practice of the Sacred Penitentiary, the Sacred Congregation of Cardinals, and other tribunals. - St. Ligorius, no. 1110, and others commonly against a few.

899. ◦ QUESTION 4. Must at least a marriage null because of an occult impediment be revalidated before the Pastor and witnesses if they were aware of the impediment at the time of the marriage?

Reply. Negatively, more probably. The reason is that the assistance of the Pastor and witnesses was prescribed by the Council of Trent not so much for attesting to the validity of the marriage, which can be unknown to them in many ways, as for proving the external celebration of the marriage, so that the danger that the same spouses might enter other marriages may be forestalled.

Sanchez with La Croix and several others, however, probably affirm, says St. Ligorius; because the Pastor and witnesses, by assisting at a marriage known to them as invalid, were witnesses only of the nullity of the marriage.

In practice, apart from grave difficulty, the safer part should be followed. Otherwise this case is scarcely probable as regards practice.

900. ◦ QUESTION 5. In how many ways can consent be renewed or elicited from the party ignorant of the impediment after the dispensation has been obtained?

Reply. These are the principal ways assigned by various authors:

I. Way. If the spouse simply says: Our marriage is null because of some impediment; or: My Confessor told me that it is null ..., and therefore let us renew consent.

II. Way. If the spouse says: I did not have true consent when I contracted marriage; I now wish to give a new consent; do you also wish to give it? This way is commonly admitted by authors, and can rightly be employed without a lie, since null consent is not true consent; and otherwise the spouse ignorant of the impediment thus knows the nullity of the marriage sufficiently.

III. Way. If the spouse says: I am troubled by scruples concerning the validity of our marriage , and therefore let us renew our consent. This way can be admitted according to the more common opinion with St. Ligorius, no. 1117. For it is sufficient that the other party place consent independent of the prior consent; and for this it is sufficient if the party prudently doubts the validity of the first marriage.

Various other ways are also proposed by several Theologians; for example, if a spouse says to the other spouse: Tell me, please, if our marriage were null, would you not wish to contract again? Or: If you had not married me, would you not now wish to marry me? etc. But these ways are rightly rejected, because it is thus uncertain whether the other party intends to repeat consent for the preceding marriage or rather to consent to a new one. - See St. Ligorius, no. 1117.

§ II. On the Revalidation of Marriage with a Dispensation in the Root

901. ◦ A dispensation in the root is the abrogation, in a particular case, of the ecclesiastical law which introduced the impediment, joined with the invalidation of all the effects which previously followed from the law. - Benedict XIV, Institution 87, no. 80; On the Synod, book 13, chapter 21, no. 7.

This dispensation, therefore, produces its effect by removing the effects of the law which were produced on account of the nullity of the marriage before the dispensation was introduced, and also in the very act of contracting. Thus also the same Supreme Pontiff.

Hence a simple dispensation differs from a dispensation in the root in this: the former does not have its effect except from the time when it is granted, or ex nunc, and consequently cannot exempt from the renewal of consent. The latter, however, convalidates the marriage from the time of the marriage, or ex tunc; that is, through a fiction of law, it ascends to the root or origin of the marriage and places the matter in the same state as if the impediment had never existed. Hence it is called a dispensation in the root, because it destroys the effect of the impediment from the root or beginning of the marriage, namely: 1. by healing the defect of consent; 2. by bestowing validity upon the marriage; 3. by conferring legitimacy upon the children with respect to spiritual effects [1].

[1] Understand that the child is rendered fit for benefices, sacred Orders, and ecclesiastical offices; concerning this there has never been any disagreement of opinions.

The question is, as Sanchez says (On Matrimony, book 8, disputation 7, no. 3): Whether the Pontiff, by dispensing in the root of an invalid marriage, can legitimate children born from it before the dispensation of the marriage, in places not temporally subject to him, so that they are capable of offices and of succession to temporal goods? That is, whether he can effect that the dispensation be carried back to the time when that invalid marriage was contracted, so that it is judged as though it had been validly entered from the beginning by means of that dispensation, to this effect: that offspring had from it before the dispensation are also legitimate in all respects, no otherwise than if they had been born from a legitimate marriage. And the whole difficulty arises when the impediment on account of which that marriage was invalid was introduced by pontifical law. This controversy is indeed of the greatest moment, since from it there must be determined, for example, whether a son born of an illegitimate marriage, but who has obtained legitimation by aid of this dispensation in the root, must be preferred in succession to a Majorat or a Fideicommissum either to another younger brother who was, however, legitimately born after the dispensation had been obtained, or to another blood relative.

Sanchez, moreover (ibid.), after adducing the reasons for the negative opinion and some of its patrons, then explains his own opinion thus (ibid., no. 4): But the most frequent and truer opinion holds that the Pontiff can do this. It is derived from this: the root and origin from which it arises that offspring are illegitimate and consequently incur the disabilities of illegitimacy, whether ecclesiastical or secular, is the ecclesiastical law by which it was established that the impediment found in that contract of marriage would render it void; and if that law did not stand, the marriage would have been valid and the offspring legitimate and would not have incurred those disabilities. But the Pontiff can invalidate and revoke his law with respect to effects which have followed from it by human law, and not only with respect to those to be incurred in the future, by effecting that they are not incurred, but also with respect to those already incurred, by abolishing them as if the law promulgated had never existed, as is established from the sole Clementine On the Immunity of the Church, where Clement V revokes certain Constitutions of his Predecessors even with respect to effects previously produced, in these words: "Whatever has followed from them or on account of them, we entirely revoke, and we will that they be held as undone." There the Gloss, Cardinalis, Ancharranus, Imola, and the Abbot infer from this that the power of the Pontiff concerning those things which are of positive law is so great that he can revoke them as from the time when they were promulgated, and abolish all past effects as if they had never been promulgated. Therefore the Pontiff, thus dispensing in the root of the marriage, that is, at its beginning, by revoking the impediment which invalidated it as if it had never existed, will effect that the dispensation is carried back to the beginning of the marriage and consequently is judged as though that marriage had been valid from the beginning, with no invalidating impediment existing; in which case the offspring would be truly legitimate in all respects. And it is confirmed, because this is not to dispense in civil law and its effects, but indirectly and through a certain consequence; namely, because by civil law those disabilities are incurred by the offspring on the supposition of the firmness of the ecclesiastical law invalidating the aforesaid marriage, from which it followed that the marriage was invalid and consequently the offspring conceived from it illegitimate and subject to all the disabilities of illegitimacy established by civil law. Since, therefore, the Pontiff by his dispensation in the very root of the marriage directly removes the firmness of that ecclesiastical law and wholly abolishes it, just as if that law had never been promulgated, he will effect indirectly and through a certain consequence that all those disabilities cease, since they depended upon the firmness of the ecclesiastical law. And this reason, and the other matters which can be seen there, are explained still further; where, after illuminating the reasons with still fuller light, he adds very many Doctors who handed down the same opinion.

Nevertheless, it is entirely due to this paragraph, in which he so vigorously undertook to defend and vindicate the rights of the Apostolic See - to this paragraph, I say - that the name of Thomas Sanchez was entered into the Index of Prohibited Books, and that even in catalogues of books which are offered for sale in the City you may often see this mark of infamy branded upon the name of Sanchez and his work On Matrimony. How, you will say, could this happen? Receive the explanation briefly. When this work was published at Venice in the year 1612, this paragraph offended the eyes of the petty theologians who were serving the Venetian republic in the protracted war which it did not cease for many years, indeed for centuries, obstinately to wage against the Apostolic See and its rights. It was therefore commanded by the Magistrates that the work could not be brought forth into the light there unless the hated paragraph, as though opposed to the rights of the republic, were cut out and entirely removed. But that deed did not escape the eyes of Roman vigilance; for, perceiving from that malicious omission in a most celebrated work worn by the hands of all an offense against its rights and thence a scandal to many, it willed that the corrupted edition of Sanchez's work be taken from the hands of the faithful, and therefore ordered that the third volume be entered among condemned books. Wherefore the condemnation falls not upon the genuine work of Sanchez, but upon a particular edition of the work corrupted by wicked fraud. But the fact that, in catalogues of books for sale, that mark of infamy is very often appended to the name of Sanchez without any distinction made between the genuine work and the corrupted edition is due to the ignorance or inadvertence of those who undertake the care of these catalogues.

902. Principles. - I. The Church, or the Supreme Pontiff, can dispense in the root of marriage with respect to all impediments of ecclesiastical law. The reason is: 1. because to dispense in the root is nothing other than to remove the impediment not only for the future but also for the past, or to remove the effects which it produced, so that before the Church they are held as though they had never existed. In these things, however, there is nothing which exceeds the power of the Church. Therefore, etc. 2. Because this is established and confirmed from the practice of the Church, which for several centuries has been accustomed to grant such dispensations. Boniface VIII is read to have dispensed in this manner first, in the year 1301; but in more recent times Pius VI, Pius VII, Leo XII, etc., dispensed more frequently in the same manner.

903. ○ II. Three conditions are required so that a marriage can be convalidated by aid of a dispensation in the root, namely:

1. That the union of the spouses have had the external appearance of a just marriage and have not been manifestly fornicarious. Thus Benedict XIV. Cardinal Caprara requires the same. The reason is that otherwise true consent would not be present, and consequently marriage could in no way be present; or the root of marriage would not be present, as Benedict XIV says.

2. That the consent of both have persevered; for the Church cannot convalidate consent retracted even by only one party. Moreover, the Pontiff not rarely requires in the Rescript that the persevering consent of both parties be established. Some nevertheless contradict this.

3. That an urgent and most grave cause be present. Thus Benedict XIV. This can be present chiefly in three cases, namely: 1. when one party cannot be brought to the renewal of consent and nevertheless exhibits present consent to remain in the marriage; thus Cardinal Caprara; 2. when the impediment is known to only one party and cannot be manifested to the other without grave inconveniences; 3. when there is an urgent reason for not warning the spouses of the nullity of the marriage.

This third condition is not required for the validity of the dispensation if the dispensation is granted by the Supreme Pontiff; otherwise, if it is granted by the Bishop from a particular Indult. - Carriere, no. 1444.

904. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can a dispensation in the root be obtained and applied while both parties are ignorant of it?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that knowledge of the dispensation is in no way required for the Church to be able to remove the effect of the law, or the obstacle which stood in the way of the efficacy of consent; for the power of the Church is altogether independent of such knowledge. It is confirmed from the practice of the Church. For Clement XIII, as Collet relates, granted to a certain Procopius (who appears to have been a Bishop) the faculty of sanating in the root, without the parties being warned, many marriages invalidly entered because of an excessive extension of faculties received. Other examples of a similar revalidation of marriages are also related by others.

QUESTION 2. Can a dispensation IN THE ROOT be granted if both parties knew the impediment when they contracted?

Reply 1. Negatively, according to the more common opinion, if the spouses in contracting clearly knew the nullity of the marriage. The reason is that, once the invalidity of the marriage is known, true and properly so-called consent to it cannot be given, but there is only an intention of living in concubinage; and consequently the consent cannot be healed, since it was fictitious from the beginning.

Reply 2. Affirmatively, if the spouses, although they knew the impediment when contracting, nevertheless doubted whether the marriage was null, or did not attend to its invalidity. Thus Cardinal Caprara appears to be understood, who supposes that a dispensation in the root can be obtained to convalidate a clandestine marriage when one party refuses to renew consent before the Church. It appears that one must distinguish in the same manner concerning marriages contracted only civilly.

905. ◦ QUESTION 3. Can a Bishop dispense IN THE ROOT when he can dispense from diriment impediments by a particular Indult?

Reply. Negatively. The reason is that a dispensation in the root requires greater power, and therefore is not judged to be contained in other faculties. This is confirmed from the practice of the Church, which always gives a special faculty when it intends to grant the power of dispensing in the root.

QUESTION 4. How is a dispensation IN THE ROOT to be executed?

Reply. In the same manner as a simple dispensation, adding in the formula the words in the root. Thus, for example: I, by the apostolic authority granted to me, heal and consolidate in its root the marriage contracted by you with N., and declare the offspring received and to be received legitimate, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. But no formula is contained in the Roman Ritual.

Chapter VIII. On the Conjugal Debt

906. ○ Hear St. Ligorius as he approaches this question, On Matrimony, no. 900: It irks me to have a longer discourse on this matter, which bears such great foulness before it that it disturbs chaste minds by its very name alone. But would that this matter were not frequent in the hearing of confessions, so that it would not be altogether necessary for the Confessor to be instructed by a full treatment, but it would suffice for him to be instructed by a compendium! Let the chaste reader therefore pardon me if I speak of it at length here and descend to particular cases which exhibit a more repulsive baseness....

The conjugal debt is said to be that common action of spouses which is necessary for generation and which has been ordained by the supreme Provider of all things for the propagation of human society. This action consists in carnal intercourse, by which a man and a woman are made as though one body and one flesh.

An act of this kind is called a debt by the Apostle; for it is that which the spouses mutually owe to one another.

We must treat: 1. of the liceity of the conjugal act; 2. of the obligation of the same; 3. of the sins of spouses.

Article I. On the Liceity of the Conjugal Act: 1. in Itself; 2. with Respect to Circumstances

§ I. On the Liceity of the Conjugal Act Considered in Itself

907. Principles. - I. The conjugal act between legitimate spouses is of itself honorable and licit; for it is a means established and ordained by the Author of nature himself for the legitimate propagation of the human race.

II. The ends which render an act of this kind honorable are: 1. the generation of offspring, which is numbered among the principal ends of marriage; 2. the satisfaction of the obligation toward the other spouse; 3. the calming of concupiscence, and consequently the avoidance of incontinence both in oneself and in the other spouse; 4. the desire of fostering or conciliating honorable love, of manifesting or promoting conjugal affection, etc. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 881 and following, Sanchez, and others against some who do not admit the last two ends.

908. Resolutions. - 1. The use of marriage is illicit if it is made for pleasure alone, that is, by expressly excluding the other ends [1]. This is apparent from proposition 9 condemned by Innocent XI, which reads thus: The act of marriage exercised for pleasure alone is entirely free from all fault and venial defect. Nevertheless, of itself it would be only a venial sin, just as it is venial to take food for delight alone. But the use of marriage is free from this fault if it is a remedy for concupiscence; for its satisfaction is licit as a remedy for concupiscence, whether this is intended expressly or implicitly [2]. - St. Ligorius, no. 912.

[1] See the fuller explanation of this doctrine in the Note to no. 28, vol. I, which certainly must be kept diligently before the eyes, lest anyone importunately harass both himself and others with empty anxieties concerning the use of pleasures.

[2] By these words the Author wished to signify that even this slight disorder or fault of one acting for pleasure alone is scarcely ever actually present. And the reason is plain: because the disorder does not reside in desiring pleasure. For, as St. Thomas says (Against the Gentiles, book 3, chapter 26, no. 6), The pleasure which follows good and desirable operations is good and desirable; and this (as the Angelic Doctor adds, ibid., no. 7) accords with the order of nature.... For we see that nature has joined pleasure to those operations of animals which are manifestly ordained to necessary ends.... For unless pleasure were present, animals would abstain from the aforesaid necessary acts. Therefore the disorder of one acting for pleasure alone will be present when he so rests, as it were, in the pleasure that he positively excludes every other end. I said that he positively excludes it; for the common and certain doctrine concerning every action teaches (see the things which we adduced from St. Thomas, vol. I, nos. 31, 32) that, for an act to be good, it is sufficient that either the further ends or those intrinsic to the work not be excluded, although the agent otherwise bears himself negatively with respect to them; that is, he does not think of them at all while acting, but apprehends the act only under a certain general concept as licit for himself and therefore honorable. The same must also be said concerning the conjugal act, namely, that for its honorableness it is sufficient that the ends intrinsic to this work, which the Author also enumerates in the preceding number, not be positively excluded, while the agent apprehends the work as licit for himself, or (which is the same) as not illicit, although he thinks nothing of those ends while acting.

It can scarcely happen, moreover, that the ends intrinsic to the conjugal work are altogether positively excluded. And this indeed the Author wished to intimate when he introduces the use of marriage as a remedy for concupiscence.

And indeed the Apostle is the authority that this end also, and indeed as an intrinsic one, is present in marriage, so that it may be a remedy for concupiscence, when he says (1 Cor. 7:2): But because of fornication, let every man have his own wife, and let every woman have her own husband. And again (ibid., verse 5): Do not defraud one another, unless perhaps by consent for a time ... and return again to the same, lest Satan tempt you because of your incontinence. And again (ibid., verse 9): But if they do not contain themselves, let them marry; for it is better to marry than to burn.

Indeed, Chrysostom, explaining these words of the Apostle, contends that this end is the principal one in the present age. For thus he says (On Virginity, chapter 19): When marriage was delivered for the sake of procreating children, then MUCH MORE was it delivered for extinguishing the heat of nature. And Paul testifies to this, saying: But because of fornication, let each have his own wife, not because of the procreation of children. For there he commands them to come together, not that they may be parents of many children; but why? Lest Satan tempt you, he says. And proceeding he did not say: If they desire children; but what? Let those who do not contain themselves contract marriage. For in the beginning, as I said, it had this twofold occasion; but afterward, with land and sea and the world filled, only one pretext remains, the abolition of wickedness and lust. And again (Homily: What Sort of Wives Are to Be Taken, section 5): Before all else learn what the cause of marriage was and why it was introduced into common life, and seek nothing further. What, therefore, is the cause of marriage, and why was it given by God? Hear Paul saying: But to avoid fornications, let each have his own wife. He did not say, so that poverty may be avoided and riches acquired; but what? That we may avoid fornication, that we may moderate concupiscence, that we may live soberly, that we may please God, content with our own wife. Marriage brings us this; this is its fruit; this is the gain from it.... This, then, must be regarded in marriage especially: that we may flee sin and be free from fornications. Marriages are to be sought in this, that they may help us to lead life chastely.

Moreover, it will appear superfluous to explain in what manner marriage contributes to the aforesaid end, or by what reason it extinguishes the heat of nature, wards off the temptations of Satan, is the abolition of wickedness and lust, and conduces to moderating concupiscence and leading a sober and chaste life. Nevertheless, it will be useful to hear this from St. Thomas, who, upon the cited text of the Apostle (Lecture 1 on chapter 7 of the First Epistle to the Corinthians), has these things among others: The Apostle, considering the human race now multiplied ..., set aside that necessity for which marriage had been instituted as an office of nature, and proposed the second necessity, according to which it was instituted as a remedy for fault. For because carnal concupiscence still remains in the faithful after baptism ..., it especially incites men to venereal acts because of the vehemence of pleasure. And because it belongs to greater virtue to overcome this concupiscence entirely than can be suitable for men ..., it is necessary that concupiscence be yielded to in part and overcome in part; and this is done when the act of generation is ordered by reason.... But according to the same Holy Doctor, the act of generation is ordered by reason through two things, namely (ibid.): 1. that man use the act of generation according as it is fitting for the generation ... of children; 2. that in the human species there not be wandering and uncertain couplings, such as fornicarious couplings are, but that determinate men be joined to determinate women; and this determination is made through the law of marriage.

Therefore, according to the teaching of St. Thomas, the remedy for concupiscence divinely prepared for man through the institution of marriage resides in this: that through acts suitable for generation in legitimate marriage, concupiscence itself is satisfied; namely, that one yields to and satisfies that appetite for venereal things which the apprehended vehemence of pleasure excites. And since this satisfaction of concupiscence constitutes an end intrinsic to the work, it is manifest that one who is moved by the apprehension of pleasure to conjugal acts, which he otherwise knows to be entirely licit for him as one joined in legitimate wedlock, is so far from excluding a due end that instead, while he wills to satisfy this appetite, he pursues and fulfills the very end for which marriage was instituted by God. Wherefore that proscribed proposition which the Author recalls certainly had to be condemned; but it assuredly also had to be condemned for this reason: that it absurdly presents the act of marriage as though it were an indifferent work undertaken for pleasure alone, when in it there ought rather to have been discerned, from Apostolic doctrine, the work of calming concupiscence through the licit and honorable satisfaction of the venereal appetite, in which the intrinsic end of the work itself consists.

() 1. On the occasion of this Note the VV. wrote thirty-six columns (pages 822-840), in which they take up for censure the things which have some connection with the argument of this Note, both in this Note itself and also in other places throughout the course of the whole Work. They so divide the matter into three parts that they discuss: 1. the act of marriage exercised for pleasure; 2. pleasurable acts in general; 3. the interpretation of Propositions 8 and 9 among those condemned by Innocent XI.

Moreover, it seemed good to begin from this last head, for thence a plainer way will be laid out for resolving the difficulties also concerning the two former heads.

2. The VV. therefore contend (pages 836-840) that the condemnation of that proposition IX - The act of marriage exercised for pleasure alone is entirely free from every fault and venial defect - is not avoided through its interpretation handed down both in this Note and in the Note to no. 28, vol. I, in which these things are contained: It is one thing to act FOR PLEASURE; it is another to act FOR PLEASURE ALONE. The latter positively excludes a further end of the work.... But the former involves no disorder of this kind.... From this the reason clearly discloses itself why propositions VIII and IX concerning the act of marriage or the act of eating for PLEASURE ALONE were rightly proscribed by Innocent XI. For they labor under an intrinsic defect on account of the predicate ALONE, which positively excludes all other ends to which actions of this kind are ordained. For the fact that someone otherwise is enticed and moved to a work by the appetite for pleasure, just as to labor by the hope of a prize or wage, is consonant with the order of nature, as St. Thomas holds.

3. Moreover, do not authors whom St. Alphonsus holds as approved stand as sureties for this doctrine, some of whom everyone sees indicated there?

Cardenas, for example, distinguishes in entirely the same manner between a work exercised for pleasure and one exercised for pleasure alone; and he affirms that the one is free from fault, the other not free from it. For concerning the former he thus holds (Dissertation 6, chapter 2, article 2) in the titles of sections 53, 54, and 55: It is not illicit to engage in conjugal intercourse for pleasure as a subordinate end. Pleasure has been ordained by nature for the easier generation of offspring. By the very fact that it is had for pleasure as a subordinate end, it is not had for pleasure alone. But concerning the latter he says thus under the title of section 63: He who uses conjugal intercourse for pleasure alone inverts the order of nature. I ask: does Cardenas not clearly distinguish between one and another manner of acting for pleasure? Why, therefore, do the VV. allege Cardenas against the Note and, in addition, transcribe from Cardenas a long catalogue of Authors who condemn as illicit acting for PLEASURE ALONE? Is not this very thing also condemned as illicit in the Note?

4. Diego Duarte, formerly a Penitentiary in the Lateran Basilica, holds no differently from Cardenas (Brief Exposition of the Condemned Propositions, etc., Rome, 1712, no. 162), saying: It is asked whether it is licit to engage in conjugal intercourse for pleasure alone? Reply. The opinion which denies that carnal intercourse had for PLEASURE ALONE is not free from every fault, even venial, was condemned by Innocent XI with proposition 9.... But if one engages in the said intercourse for pleasure as a subordinate end ..., no fault at all will intervene; for one who so acts follows the order of nature, which appointed pleasure in intercourse for rendering easier the generation of offspring and the preservation of the species.

5. Felix Potestas expresses the same thing more briefly thus (vol. 1, part 2, no. 2280): The act of marriage was instituted by nature for two ends: for the procreation of offspring ... and for the calming of lust; for which reason he who exercises the act of marriage for delight commits no sin if he orders it ... to the principal end. He sins venially, however, who exercises it for delight alone.

6. Nevertheless, the VV. contend that it is the same whether you say that an act was placed for pleasure, or that an act was placed for pleasure alone; for they say that the condemnation of the aforesaid proposition is avoided in neither case. For thus they say (page 837): For verifying the condemned proposition, it is not necessary that one who seeks pleasure positively exclude every other end; it suffices that he exclude it negatively. For whether the other ends are excluded positively or negatively, it is always true that such an operator

The principal circumstances regard the person, the manner or position, and the time. acts for pleasure alone, or has no other end except pleasure itself. Hence the genuine sense of condemned proposition IX is: The act of marriage exercised for pleasure alone (that is, referred to no other end than pleasure) is entirely free from every fault and venial defect.

7. Reply. Indeed, you would rightly say that these things fell from the pen of the VV. altogether less cautiously. What it means to bear oneself negatively with respect to certain ends of a work is explained quite plainly in the Note by the words immediately following: that is, he does not think of them at all while acting. Only those who have never touched the scholastic doctors are ignorant that this meaning is assigned to that mode of speaking in the schools. It must be supposed, say the Salmanticenses (treatise 9, chapter 3, no. 24), that one who seeks precisely some accidental end in marriage can bear himself in two ways: either by positively excluding the other substantial end ..., or by bearing himself negatively concerning the proper end of marriage, either because he does not attend to it, does not remember it, or does not care about it, BUT WITHOUT EXCLUDING IT.

So far is it from being the same (as the VV. contend) either positively to exclude or negatively to bear oneself toward the ends of marriage, that the same Salmanticenses condemn the former as a grave fault, but call the latter a good and meritorious act. For concerning the former they say (ibid., no. 25): If anyone were to contract marriage POSITIVELY EXCLUDING its proper and substantial end, he would not only sin mortally, but would enter no marriage. But concerning the latter (ibid., no. 30): If anyone intends precisely other ends extrinsic to marriage, without excluding its proper substantial end, and thus tacitly and implicitly retaining it, such as riches, honor, PLEASURE, beauty, etc., he would commit no sin, but in contracting marriage WOULD EXERCISE A GOOD AND MERITORIOUS ACT.

8. But it was said in addition that the VV. wrote altogether less cautiously that it is the same whether other ends are positively excluded or one bears oneself negatively toward them, that is, thinks nothing of them while acting. For from this general principle it immediately and directly follows that, in every act, that end toward which the agent bears himself negatively, that is, of which he does not think while acting, must now be held as positively excluded. Moreover, it immediately follows from this that every action which is not elicited from charity and actually referred through charity to God, who by right is the ultimate end of all actions, is vicious. This doctrine indeed presents the condemned Quesnellian and Baian dogma that whatever does not proceed from the fountain of charity is sin, and that even good works performed merely with a view to eternal reward must be numbered among sins.

The reason for this consequence is plainly apparent. For as St. Thomas holds (book 3 of the Sentences, distinction 27, question 1, article 4, question 3), charity is compared to the other virtues both as mover, as end, and as form. He explains thus why charity is called the mover of all the other virtues: That charity is the mover of the other virtues is apparent from this: that the good itself which is the object of charity under the aspect of an end is the end of the virtues. In all ordered powers or arts, it so happens that the art or power which concerns the end orders the acts of the others to its proper end. Hence charity also moves all the other virtues to its own end, and according to this it is said to command their acts. Then he speaks thus of charity insofar as it is an end: If, therefore, charity is the mover of the other virtues, it is likewise their end, because this is common to all virtues: that their acts are their proximate ends.... But the end of an inferior power or habit is ordered to the end of the superior one ...; hence the acts of all the other virtues are ordered to the act of charity as to an end; and for this reason charity is called the end of the precept.

A fourfold circumstance, or impediment attached to the person, can stand in the way of seeking the debt, namely: 1. a vow of chastity;

And again (book 2 of the Sentences, distinction 38, question 1, article 1), where the Holy Doctor wishes to prove that both God and charity together are the end of all wills or virtues: As there is one end of all things, he says, namely God, so there is one ultimate end of all wills, namely God. Nevertheless, there are other proximate ends; and if according to those ends the due relation of the will to the ultimate end is preserved, the will will be right.... But the due relation of the will to the ultimate end is preserved according to that end by which the will is fitted to participate in the ultimate end ..., and this is charity ...; and therefore not only God but also charity is the end of all right wills.

With these things premised, suppose, please, that what the VV. assume is established: that the end toward which the agent bears himself negatively, that is, of which he thinks nothing while acting, must be judged positively excluded. Will not the ultimate end, namely God and charity, be held positively excluded if a man while acting does not think of God and charity?

And consequently, will not all actions which are not elicited from charity and are not actually referred to God be so many sins?

9. But the doctrine of St. Thomas recedes very far from these absurdities, precisely because it is wholly removed from that incautious principle of the VV. For thus the Holy Doctor says (ibid., reply to objection 4): It must be said that, in order that the end of some action be God or charity, it is not necessary that someone, while performing that action, think of God or charity.

And elsewhere (I-II, question 1, article 6, reply to objection 3): It must be said that it is not necessary that someone always think of the ultimate end whenever he desires or performs something; but the force of the first intention, which regards the ultimate end, remains in every desire of any thing, even if the ultimate end is not actually thought of.

And again (On Evil, question 2, article 5, objection 10, which he concedes): It is established that he who has charity has ordered himself and all his things to God, to whom he adheres as the ultimate end. Therefore, whatever he orders either to himself or to any other thing of his, he acts meritoriously, even if he does not actually think of God, unless he is impeded through some disorder of the act which is not referable to God. But this cannot be without being at least a venial sin.

And again (On Evil, question 9, article 2): It sometimes happens that a man does not actually order an act to God, although that act of itself contains no disorder by reason of which it is not referable to God; and nevertheless, because the mind of man is habitually related to God as to an end, that act not only is not a sin, but is also a meritorious act.

10. Hence Valentia holds thus (I-II, disputation 8, question 6, point 3): It must be noted that it is not necessary that the works of the just, in order to be meritorious de condigno, be referred to God by an explicit act either present or elicited a little before; but a virtual relation is sufficient for this, consisting in the fact that the just man AT SOME TIME referred himself and all his things to God through an act of charity.

And Montesinos is witness that this is the common doctrine in the schools, who expressly writes (on I-II, question 1, article 4, question 1, no. 13): It is the common doctrine of Theologians ... that the act of any moral virtue tends to its proper object by reason of its proper honorableness; nevertheless, implicitly and by its nature, without anything else, it tends to God; NOR IS IT NECESSARY THAT IT BE EXPRESSLY ORDERED TO HIM.

Let us therefore conclude that the principle which the VV. assume is altogether false, namely, that the end toward which the agent bears himself negatively, that is, of which he does not think while acting, is positively excluded; indeed, a principle of this kind leads directly to erroneous doctrines condemned by the Church.

11. What can appear more wonderful, however, the VV. do not sufficiently notice: through that principle of theirs even the Holy Doctor Alphonsus is involved in exactly the same condemnation. For these are the words of the Holy Doctor (On Human Acts, no. 44): Although someone approaching the table does not think of the preservation of life, but ONLY of the pleasure of food, as Gonet says, he does not sin on that account; because he wills such pleasure, at least virtually, for the preservation of life, and thus does not desire it inordinately. Now it is manifest that one who approaches the table thinking merely of the pleasure to be taken from food, but nothing of the preservation of life, bears himself negatively with respect to this intrinsic end of food. But, say the VV. (above, no. 6), whether the other ends are excluded positively or negatively, it is always true that such an operator acts for pleasure alone. Therefore even St. Alphonsus (according to the principles and reasonings of the VV.) teaches that it is licit to eat for pleasure alone, and consequently professes the condemned doctrine that eating and drinking to satiety for pleasure alone is not a sin, provided it does not harm health; which is proposition VIII proscribed by Innocent XI!

And for confirming (if it please the Superiors) a condemnation of this kind of the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, there also concur the things which the VV. (page 837) adduce from Martinet (Moral Theology, book 5, article 8, section 6) in confirmation of their aforesaid principle. This, they say, the distinguished Martinet rightly expresses in these words: He who in intercourse, neither excluding nor intending the ends of marriage, seeks pleasure alone, assuredly acts inordinately and cannot be excused from venial fault, from the proposition condemned by Innocent XI: The act of marriage, etc. And indeed, one who in an action neither excludes its proper ends nor expressly intends them assuredly bears himself negatively toward those ends. But this is precisely what the words of St. Alphonsus present concerning one who, seeking pleasure alone from food, neither excludes the end of preserving life nor intends it, since he does not think of it; yet according to Martinet, he who so acts cannot be excused from fault by reason of the proposition condemned by Innocent XI. Therefore St. Alphonsus, who teaches that this man does not sin, falls into condemned doctrine!

12. But again it ought to appear no less wonderful that the VV., after accusing those same Notes, as we have seen, of a condemned dogma, then say that they do not stand far from St. Alphonsus. For thus they write (page 834): Insofar as Father

B. says: "In order that someone may honorably take pleasure from play ..., it is by no means necessary that he think of the end of play, whether intrinsic or further," he would not stand far from St. Alphonsus if he were to add that some honorable end, at least virtually intended, is necessary. For the Holy Doctor says (On Human Acts, no. 44, at the end): For an actual relation of all words or works to an honorable good is not required, since this would be an unbearable burden and a matter entangled in six hundred scruples; but a virtual relation suffices, as we have said. Hence, although someone approaching the table does not think of the preservation of life, etc. (as above, in the preceding number).

13. Reply. In order that one may properly recognize how great and of what kind the distance is between the meaning of that Note and St. Alphonsus in so grave a question, it is preferable to have before the eyes the complete context of the Note, which is as follows (Note to no. 28, vol. I): The negative exclusion of an end does not vitiate an act; for it is not necessary for the honorableness of an action to think of a further end or even of the end intrinsic to the work. Therefore, in order that someone may honorably take pleasure from play, food, or rest, it is by no means necessary that he think of the end of play, food, or rest, whether intrinsic or further; but it is sufficient that he apprehend the action as consonant with right reason, or even that he find nothing in it contrary to the order of reason.

And altogether consonant with these are the things which are read thus also in the Note at this place: The common and certain doctrine teaches (see the things which we adduced from St. Thomas, vol. I, nos. 31, 32) that for a good act it is sufficient that the ends, either further or intrinsic to the work, not be excluded, although the agent otherwise bears himself negatively toward them, that is, does not think of them at all while acting, but apprehends the act only under a certain general concept as licit for himself and therefore honorable.

Now let us inquire whether that which the VV. say is lacking is absent in these words, namely, an honorable end at least virtually intended. But he must be blind who does not see here an honorable end, or, as St. Alphonsus says, an honorable good, intended not merely virtually but altogether actually.

And indeed in the former text it is expressly required that the agent apprehend the action as consonant with right reason. But St. Thomas finds the character of the honorable good in this, that it is ordered by reason. Thus the Holy Doctor (I-II, question 39, article 2): Every honorable good proceeds from these two things, namely, from the rectitude of reason and of the will. And again (II-II, question 145, article 2, reply to objection 3): Something is called honorable ... insofar as it has a certain comeliness from the ordering of reason. But that which is ordered according to reason is naturally fitting for man, etc. And in another manner the same Holy Doctor (II-II, question 145, article 1): The honorable, properly speaking, is referred to the same thing as virtue. Moreover, concerning virtue he speaks thus (II-II, question 23, article 3): Human virtue, which is the principle of all the good acts of man, consists in attaining the rule of human acts.... Hence moral virtue is defined by this: that it is according to right reason. This he afterward repeats elsewhere (II-II, question 145, article 2), saying: This pertains to the character of the honorable, which we said to be the same as virtue, which moderates all human things according to reason. Therefore, when in the Note it is said that an action is apprehended and consequently elicited as consonant with right reason, is it not openly said that the will actually tends toward the honorable good and virtue?

And in the other text, is it not most expressly said that the will tends toward that which it apprehends as licit for itself and therefore HONORABLE? But thus the will pursues the honorable good not merely virtually but altogether actually. Why, therefore, do the VV. accuse these Notes as though, according to them, an honorable end toward which the action tends is lacking?

14. Yet although it is false, according to the meaning of the Notes, that a relation to the honorable good is lacking from actions, nevertheless that which the VV. said must be conceded: the opinion of these Notes differs from the assertion of St. Alphonsus, at least if the latter is taken word for word; for the Holy Doctor, for the honorableness of an act, requires that the honorable good be intended virtually, while in the Notes it is required that the will actually tend toward the honorable good. But is this distance or difference of opinions of such a nature that the VV. rightly contend that the opinion of the Notes must be turned toward the opinion of St. Alphonsus? I would indeed judge that not a few will greatly doubt this, and for another reason.

And in truth, if the opinion of the Holy Doctor is taken word for word, it immediately occurs to ask whence that virtual relation to the honorable good arises, or how the honorable good is virtually intended there. For the example which the Holy Doctor supplies is pleasure taken from food. Someone will therefore ask: In what manner is this pleasure virtually referred to the honorable good, or how is the honorable good virtually intended in it? For this must proceed either from a preceding or actual intention of the agent, as happens when someone orders means to an end; or, apart from every added intention of the agent, it will arise from the nature of the pleasure itself, just as we saw with St. Thomas that all acts of all virtues are by their nature virtually referred to the end of charity, even if the one acting thinks nothing of charity. But in the case the former remains excluded, because, as St. Alphonsus says, one approaching the table thinks only of the pleasure of food. But if you say the latter, why, someone will ask, do we say that the spouse sins who, approaching the other spouse, does not think of the preservation of the human species (or another end of marriage), but ONLY of the pleasure of intercourse? Why could someone not contend that this person does not sin, with the reason of St. Alphonsus added (above, no. 11), because he wills such pleasure, at least virtually, for the preservation of the human species or as a remedy for concupiscence, and thus does not desire it inordinately? Otherwise, can these things please the VV., who meanwhile propose that the notion of a virtual relation is to be drawn from this passage of St. Alphonsus?

15. Otherwise, it will be judged much more congruous that this expression of the Holy Doctor is altogether elliptical, and that it is understood that one who approaches the table knows and apprehends the taking of food as an action licit of itself and consonant with reason.

And in this manner it is easily understood how the agent in the case virtually wills the preservation of life and, generally, those ends which render the action honorable. For while he wills the act as consonant with the order of reason, he certainly virtually wills those things on account of which the act is consonant with the order of reason, although he does not then think of them and indeed is altogether ignorant of them.

Indeed, no other norm assuredly appears consonant with the weak condition of men, by whose aid they may be directed to act honorably, than that they apprehend the action generally as licit. And in fact, who indeed would further require for the honorableness of an action that the agent also have before his eyes the reasons on account of which the action can be judged honorable? This investigation of reasons is left to philosophers and theologians, who otherwise often labor greatly in assigning them and are not rarely found disagreeing among themselves, as in the present matter also we perceive that they do not agree among themselves whether, for example, the remedy of marriage is licitly desired by reason of health or of avoiding in oneself the danger of incontinence. How, therefore, could this norm be proposed to the common condition of the faithful for acting honorably?

And to this must be said to pertain the things which the VV. also adduce from St. Alphonsus (On Human Acts, no. 44), where he writes: For an actual relation of all words or works to the HONORABLE GOOD is not required;

since this would be an unbearable burden and a matter entangled in six hundred scruples; but a virtual relation suffices. For it wholly abhors the truth that the Holy Doctor wished to signify that a consciousness of the honorableness of the action which someone is about to place is not necessary, and that a merely virtual consciousness suffices. Therefore, this meaning must be assigned to those words: that an actual relation or direction of the action to those intrinsic ends to which it is ordered by its nature is not necessary, but they are sufficiently intended virtually by the very fact that the action is generally known to be honorable, or even that nothing in that action is perceived as contrary to the order of reason.

Let us therefore conclude: 1. that the VV. demanded without any right that the opinion expressed in the Notes be turned toward the opinion of St. Alphonsus, if the latter is taken word for word; 2. but if the obscure meaning of his elliptical expression is aptly understood, as is fitting, the meaning of the Notes differs in nothing from the meaning of the Holy Doctor.

16. We shall now say some things concerning those matters which the VV. discuss through nine columns (pages 832-836) in the Article to which they inscribe the title: The Doctrine of Father Ballerini on Pleasurable Acts in General Is Weighed.

From the Note to no. 28, vol. I, where the distinction is touched upon between those acting for pleasure and those acting for PLEASURE ALONE, the VV. (page 833) adduce these words: But the former (namely, to act for pleasure) involves no disorder of this kind (namely, it does not positively exclude the further end of the work). For first, pleasure, as St. Thomas says (Against the Gentiles, book 3, chapter 26, no. 6), is good and desirable if it follows a good operation; and it is proper to the virtue of temperance that it moderate the use of pleasurable things and withdraw from those which are contrary to reason, but not from those which are fitting according to reason (see St. Thomas, II-II, question 141, article 1, reply to objection 1).

But the VV. oppose the things which follow from the same passage of St. Thomas: If pleasure were the ultimate end, it would be desirable according to itself. But this is false.... For the pleasure which follows good and desirable operations is good and desirable; but that which follows evil operations is evil and to be avoided. Therefore, it has from ANOTHER that it is good and desirable. And again (ibid.): In natural things pleasure is for the sake of operation, and not conversely; for we see that nature has joined pleasure to those operations of animals which are manifestly ordained to necessary ends.... For unless pleasure were present, animals would abstain from the aforesaid necessary acts. And chapter 27: For it has been shown that according to the order of nature pleasure is for the sake of operation, and not conversely.

17. Reply 1. In the Note it is not denied that pleasure is good or not good, and therefore desirable or to be avoided, according as the operation from which the pleasure is drawn is or is not good. Consequently neither is it denied that pleasure has from ANOTHER that it is good and desirable. Therefore one must reply: Let the antecedent pass, and I deny the consequence; that is, nothing is inferred from that former text against the Note.

I said, Let the antecedent pass, because, since otherwise according to the same St. Thomas pleasure, as pleasure, is some good, the objected text of the same Holy Doctor needs some explanation. Francis de Sylvestris, commonly called Ferrariensis, supplies this for us in his Commentary on this passage of St. Thomas, where he discusses thus: Something can be called good and desirable in two ways. In one way in the being of nature; in another way in the genus of morals. In the first way the goodness of a thing is considered absolutely according as it is in itself. In the second way it is considered in order to right reason; for it is called morally good that which is conformable and proportioned to right reason, and it is desirable according to right reason. Therefore this proposition, pleasure is not desirable according to itself but from the operations which it follows, must be understood in the genus of morals, but not according to the being of nature. For thus it is true that of itself it is not desirable, because of itself it does not express some good consonant with reason or discordant from it, but has from the operations that it is conformable or deformable to it. In the being of nature, however, IT IS GOOD AND DESIRABLE ACCORDING TO ITSELF; on account of which St. Thomas says in book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 49, question 3, article 4, that pleasure, insofar as it is pleasure, names some good.

And in fact, St. Thomas, in the place here cited, question 1, reply to objection 3, replies thus to an objection which is of this kind: Every being, insofar as it is such, is good. Therefore that also which is the ultimate perfection of a being is universally good. But pleasure is the ultimate perfection of a being, for it perfects operation, which is second act. Therefore every pleasure is good. To this objection, I say, he replies thus: To the third it must be said that this reasoning does not prove pleasure to be good except insofar as it is pleasure. And then, resolving the arguments of those who say that every pleasure is evil, he adds: It must be said that the virtuous man does not flee every pleasure, but rather embraces his proper pleasure, which is to take pleasure in works of virtue; but he flees inordinate pleasures. And again (ibid., question 3, reply to objection 4): It must be said that the end of any thing is its most perfect operation; therefore all desire the pleasure by which operation is perfected, just as they desire their own perfect operation. And just as error occurs in the appetite for operation, because some insist upon foreign operations while abandoning their proper operations, as all the wicked who follow bestial operations while abandoning human ones, so also some follow foreign pleasures in place of their proper pleasures. Thus the Holy Doctor.

Therefore, Reply 2: from the doctrine of St. Thomas, pleasure in the being of nature is good and desirable according to itself; but in the genus of morals it is good and desirable when it is consonant with the order of reason; and in this latter sense St. Thomas said that pleasure has from another that it is called both good and desirable. Therefore it is again permissible to conclude that that former text of St. Thomas objected against the Note is in no way pertinent. For in the Note the same thing is affirmed, since it treats of pleasure which is supposed consonant with the order of reason. But now to the other objected passage of St. Thomas.

18. The VV. thought great force to be present in this text, because in it St. Thomas affirms (above, no. 16) that according to the order of nature pleasure is for the sake of operation, and not conversely. Hence they construct the argument thus (page 833): Pleasure in one acting rightly is for the sake of operation, or a MEANS TO THE END, but by no means operation for the sake of pleasure.

Reply 1. I distinguish: that opinion of St. Thomas strikes one acting for PLEASURE ALONE, I concede; it also strikes one acting for pleasure, but not for it ALONE, I deny. For thus St. Thomas explains his mind in another place, which the VV. also allege (loc. cit.), namely, Against the Gentiles, book 4, chapter 83, where he says: In this life it is inordinate and vicious if someone uses food and venereal things FOR PLEASURE ALONE and not for the necessity of sustaining the body, etc. And again: Therefore the order is preposterous and unbecoming if operations are exercised for PLEASURES ALONE. But in the Note it is expressly said that the intrinsic ends of the operations, for example the sustenance of the body, are not excluded, even if someone eats for pleasure, however little he thinks while eating of that sustenance of the body. Otherwise, did not St. Alphonsus also write (above, no. 11): Although someone approaching the table does not think of the preservation of life, but only of the pleasure of food ..., he does not sin on that account? Therefore that opinion of St. Thomas does not strike the doctrine of the Note, just as it does not strike the doctrine of St. Alphonsus.

19. Reply 2. When the VV. wish to conclude from St. Thomas that pleasure in one acting rightly is for the sake of operation, or a means to an end, they do not appear sufficiently to have grasped the meaning of that opinion: that according to the order of nature pleasure is for the sake of operation, and not conversely.

Here that most faithful interpreter of St. Thomas, Ferrariensis (Commentary on chapter 83, book 4, Against the Gentiles), must be heard, who beautifully presents the force of that opinion thus: It must be observed, he says, that when it is said that the pleasures of food and venereal things are not for their own sake but for operations, it is one thing to say that pleasures are for the sake of operations and another to say that they are sought for the sake of operations. For that they are for the sake of operations expresses their order according to the INSTITUTION OF BOTH BY THE AUTHOR OF NATURE and according to the intention of nature. For God, who instituted nature, ordered the aforesaid operations to the preservation of the individual and the species; but he added pleasures to these operations so that animals would apply themselves to operations of this kind from the appetite for these pleasures, and thus he willed pleasures to be for the sake of operations. But that pleasures are sought for the sake of operations expresses their order according as THEY TERMINATE THE ACT OF APPETITE; and then, if they are compared ... to the sensitive appetite, pleasures are not thus sought for the sake of operations, BUT, ON THE CONTRARY, OPERATIONS FOR THE SAKE OF PLEASURES, as St. Thomas says, I-II, question 4, article 2, reply to objection 2.

Concerning this, elsewhere (Commentary on book 3, chapter 26) the same Ferrariensis says: Therefore in this place St. Thomas speaks of that order in comparison WITH THE INTENTION OF THE ONE INSTITUTING nature and the order; but in the place alleged he speaks of the order itself, comparing it WITH THE SENSITIVE APPETITE. And a little later: There is a twofold intention of the one instituting nature in an order of this kind (namely, the order between operations and pleasures); one is first and principal, the other secondary. The first and principal is that individuals and species be preserved through operations, and for this pleasure is joined to the operations. The secondary is that they seek the operations from the appetite for pleasure ..., just as if we were to say that a law proposing rewards for studious operations first and principally intends that a man devote himself to studious works and orders the reward to this; but secondarily and accessorily intends that a man, enticed by the reward, seek studious operations for the sake of obtaining the reward.

Therefore, according to the mind of St. Thomas, when it is said that pleasure is for the sake of operation and not conversely, this must indeed be understood of the intention of God instituting nature, because God joined pleasure to operations so that the operations would be sought from the appetite for pleasure. It is otherwise, however, if the order between pleasures and operations is considered according as they terminate the act of appetite. For thus pleasures are not sought for the sake of operations, but, on the contrary, operations are sought for obtaining pleasure. Therefore the VV. wrongly wrote that pleasure in the agent is for the sake of operation as a means to an end.

And the comparison adduced with a reward appointed, for example, for a more elegant elegy or painting shows this most clearly. For would it not be absurd to say that the poet or painter orders the reward to the work as a means to an end, and not conversely order his work to obtaining the sought reward?

20. But again, the assertion of the VV. that pleasure on the part of the agent is related to operation as a means to an end is shown in another manner to be foreign to the doctrine of St. Thomas. The Holy Doctor objects to himself (Against the Gentiles, book 3, chapter 26, objection 3): Pleasure appears to be desired for its own sake in such a way that it is never desired for another. For it is foolish to ask someone why he wishes to be pleased. But this is the condition of the ultimate end, namely, that it is sought for its own sake.

Now St. Thomas does not deny the antecedent of this argument, but, having conceded it, denies the consequence. But the fact, he says, that men will pleasure not for another but for itself is not a sufficient sign that pleasure is the ultimate end.... For pleasure, although it is not the ultimate end, nevertheless accompanies the ultimate end, since pleasure arises from attainment of the end.

But see these same things explained more clearly elsewhere by St. Thomas (book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 49, question 3, article 4, question 3, reply to objection 3). For he again objects to himself: That which is desired only for itself and never for another is the ultimate end; but pleasure is of this kind, for it is foolish to ask why someone wishes to be pleased. And the Holy Doctor replies: To the third it must be said that, concerning things ordered to an end which are not joined to the end, we are accustomed to ask for what end they are done. But concerning those things which are joined to the end, such a question is not asked, because it is immediately apparent that they are desirable; and because pleasure is joined to perfect operation, which is the end, therefore it is not customary to ask why someone wishes to be pleased. And, moreover, pleasure expresses the resting of the appetite in something; hence to ask why someone wishes to be pleased is the same as to ask why he wishes his appetite to be brought to rest, which is the same as if it were asked why someone WISHES TO ATTAIN THE END OF THE WILL.

Therefore, if according to St. Thomas pleasure is not sought for another, it is manifest that pleasure is not sought by the agent as a means to an end.

21. And plainly worthy of attention is the manner in which Ferrariensis (Commentary on the cited chapter 26) reconciles this doctrine of St. Thomas with another place where St. Thomas says that pleasure is sought for another.

Pleasure, says Ferrariensis, accompanies the ultimate end, and from this it has that it is not sought by men for another, although it is not the ultimate end. But he indicates the apparent conflict thus: It has been said that pleasure in comparison with operation is similar to a perfection which is ordered to the species of a thing, and that the thing is the end of such a perfection; from which it appears that pleasure is sought for another. But here it is said that men will pleasure not for another.

For resolving this difficulty, while we now omit other things, Ferrariensis premises these things: Pleasure and the operation which it follows are related not as two goods (book 4 of the Sentences, distinction 49, question 3, article 4), but as one good, insofar as PLEASURE IS THE PERFECTION OF OPERATION. For just as from perfection and the perfectible there is made one perfect thing, so from operation and pleasure there is made one perfect operation, which is happiness. Hence, just as the ultimate and most perfect operation of man is not ordered to any other intrinsic perfection of man, so neither is the pleasure which accompanies and perfects it; therefore it is not customary to ask why someone wishes to be pleased.... But although pleasure is not sought for anything else separated from it as something to be acquired through it, it is nevertheless ordered to the operation which it accompanies as to an end, JUST AS EVERY PERFECTION SUPERADDED TO A SPECIES, WHICH PERTAINS TO THE PRESERVATION OR COMELINESS OF THAT SPECIES, IS ORDERED TO THE SPECIES ITSELF AS TO AN END, since it perfects the operation, as comeliness perfects youth; and it is established that this comeliness is for the sake of him in whom youth exists, and not conversely.

Therefore the meaning in which St. Thomas says that pleasure is for the sake of operation and not conversely finally comes back to this: that pleasure is ordered to operation as every perfection is ordered to the thing which it perfects, just as comeliness perfects youth and (as St. Thomas says elsewhere) health perfects man; wherefore we say that health is for the sake of man, but not conversely. Thus the Holy Doctor (I-II, question 33, article 3): Pleasure perfects operation in two ways. In one way after the manner of an end, not indeed according as an end is called that for the sake of which something exists, but according as every good which supervenes completively can be called an end; and according to this the Philosopher says that pleasure perfects operation as a certain supervening end, insofar as upon this good which is operation there supervenes another good which is pleasure, which implies resting in a presupposed good. In a second way, on the part of the agent cause; not indeed directly, because the Philosopher says that pleasure perfects operation not as a physician perfects a healthy man, but as health does; but indirectly, insofar as the agent, because he takes pleasure in his action, attends to it more vehemently. And in the reply to objection 3: It happens that two things are mutually causes of each other, such that one is the efficient cause and the other the final cause of the other; and in this manner operation causes pleasure as an efficient cause, but pleasure perfects operation after the manner of an end. Now this meaning has nothing in common with the other meaning which the VV. attach to this opinion of the Angelic Doctor, namely, that pleasure is related to operation as a means to an end.

22. Otherwise, there is also another meaning in which, according to St. Thomas, pleasure is for the sake of another; this can be seen indicated in passing in the cited Note, where mention is made of play and of the doctrine of St. Thomas on the virtue of temperance.

St. Thomas proposes a certain necessity of some pleasure thus (II-II, question 168, article 2): Just as man needs bodily rest for the refreshment of the body, because he cannot labor continuously ..., so also it is on the part of the soul.... And therefore, when it extends itself beyond its measure into certain operations, it labors and is thereby fatigued, especially because in the operations of the soul the body also labors at the same time, insofar as the intellective soul uses powers operating through bodily organs.... But just as bodily fatigue is relieved through rest of the body, so also animal fatigue must be relieved through rest of the soul. But the rest of the soul is pleasure, as was held above; and therefore a remedy against animal fatigue is applied through some pleasure. And, after recalling the response which St. John the Evangelist is said to have made to those who were scandalized because they had found him playing with his disciples, namely, that the spirit of man would be broken if it were never relaxed from its application, he adds: Words or deeds of this kind, in which nothing except animal pleasure is sought, are called playful or jocose; and therefore it is necessary to use such things at times as a certain rest of the soul.... And therefore there can be a certain moral virtue concerning games ..., insofar as through this virtue man is restrained from immoderation in games.

23. But since every moral virtue consists in a mean, St. Thomas, after showing (loc. cit., article 3) that one can sin against this virtue by excess, further shows (ibid., article 4) that one can also sin by defect. For to the question whether some sin consists in a defect of play, he replies: It must be said that everything contrary to reason in human affairs is vicious. But it is contrary to reason that someone exhibit himself as burdensome to others, for example, when he offers nothing pleasurable and also impedes their pleasures.... But those who are deficient in play neither say anything ridiculous themselves, and are troublesome to those who do, because they do not receive the moderate games of others; therefore such persons are vicious and are called hard and boorish.

Indeed, he adds (article 3, reply to objection 3) that these games are not rejected by austerity: Austerity, he says, insofar as it is a virtue, does not exclude all pleasures, but those which are superfluous and inordinate.

He nevertheless adds (ibid., corpus): But because play is useful for rest and pleasure, while pleasure and rest are not sought for their own sake in human life but for the sake of operation ..., therefore deficiency in play is less vicious than excess in play. And to this pertain also the things which the Holy Doctor had said (loc. cit., article 2, reply to objection 3): The operations of play themselves according to their species are not ordered to some end; but the pleasure which is had in such acts is ordered to some recreation and rest of the soul.

How pleasure from games is ordered to operation the Holy Doctor explains thus (On chapter 3 of Isaiah, at the end), where he discusses choral games: Because it is impossible always to act in the active and contemplative life, therefore it is necessary at times to interpose joys among cares, lest the spirit be broken by excessive severity and so that man may more promptly devote himself to works of virtue.

24. From this doctrine of the Angelic Doctor something can now be deduced without difficulty which also contributes to the principal argument of this Note. For from the foregoing it is necessary at times to interpose joys among cares and to offer a remedy against animal fatigue through some pleasure. And indeed the moderate use of pleasure is so far from being evil of itself that it is rather an act of virtue; and, as the same St. Thomas adds (loc. cit., on chapter 3 of Isaiah), in one who is in the state of grace, even choral play is an act meritorious of eternal life (see Note to no. 32, vol. I, question 6).

Since these things are so, it is now permissible to ask: does it involve any disorder that, for those ends concerning which St. Thomas spoke a little before, a remedy is sought from some pleasure which is known also to have been ordered by God the Author of nature to another end? St. Thomas indeed writes (II-II, question 141, article 4): Because pleasure follows a natural operation, some pleasures are more vehement insofar as they follow operations which are more natural. But the most natural operations are those by which the nature of the individual is preserved through food and drink. It is therefore asked: does it present any disorder that the pleasure of food and drink, which God ordained to the preservation of nature, is also employed for another end?

Certainly, the same St. Thomas, who had said (loc. cit.) that temperance especially concerns pleasures of this kind and had added (loc. cit., article 6) that temperance accepts the NECESSITY of this life as the rule of pleasurable things, namely, that it uses them only insofar as the NECESSITY of this life requires, nevertheless approves (ibid., reply to objection 2) that the temperate man desires other pleasurable things which are not necessary for health or for a good condition, provided they are not impediments to these. And he adds (ibid., reply to objection 3) that temperance regards necessity according to the fittingness of life, which is considered not only according to the fittingness of the body but also according to the fittingness of external things. To this passage Cajetan adds (in his Commentary): Thus every right use of pleasurable things removes some need either of the body, of duty, or of simply more perfect honorableness.... For, as is apparent in the text, the temperate man uses both the things necessary for the preservation and good condition of the body, and the things fitting according to means, duties, social intercourse, and honorableness.... For one who held a banquet not consonant with his own rank and that of the guests, according to means and honorableness, would not have sufficiently met the necessity of the fittingness of the present life.... Therefore, the necessity of the fittingness of the present life is the rule of temperance, according to which it also commands other virtues, for example liberality, urbanity, and any others which are sometimes needed.

Therefore, the remedy and right use of the pleasure which is taken from food and drink extends much further than the institution of nature, which ordained that pleasure to the preservation of the individual, appears to demand. Therefore, just as according to St. Thomas, because it is impossible always to act in the active and contemplative life, and therefore it is necessary to interpose joys among cares, on an occasion of rejoicing, for example at weddings, the use of pleasure which is perceived from choral play is right; can and must not the same be said of the pleasure which is taken from a banquet for the sake of rejoicing? Certainly the evangelical Father, who said to his servants (Luke 15): Bring the fatted calf, kill it, and let us eat and feast, gave this reason: But it was fitting to feast and rejoice, because this your brother was dead and has come to life again. And to this also pertains the fact that the Lord, on the occasion of a wedding (John 2), so changed water into wine that the chief steward said to the bridegroom: Every man first sets forth good wine, and when they have become intoxicated, then that which is worse; but you have kept the good wine until now. Therefore, there is no disorder if pleasure which of itself and principally is ordained to sustaining life is employed for another honorable purpose extrinsic to this end.

What of the fact that, according to the common sense of the faithful, it also pertains to the joy of the more solemn feast days in the Church that one ought, according to the means and condition of each person, to be cheered by richer and more abundant feasts? And indeed we are plainly taught that this is most honorable and altogether consonant with the sense of the Church when we read that St. Gregory Nazianzen, in his letter to Helladius (in Migne, letter 120) and another to Theodore (ibid., letter 121), gave thanks for the little gifts which had been sent to him by them when the solemnity of Easter recurred. Indeed, St. Basil also, in his letter to Amphilochius, Bishop of Iconium (in Migne, letter 232), does not hesitate to call these little gifts tokens of the feast day. But when, he says, the tokens of the feast also arrive, what else must one call it except a feast of feasts, as the old law was accustomed to call the Sabbath of Sabbaths? Moreover, among the little gifts sent to him he recalls also sweetmeats (tragemata); concerning this gift, however, he adds: My age is not fit for gnawing, since my teeth have long since been worn away both by time and infirmity.

It is therefore manifest that nothing inordinate is found in the fact that pleasure instituted and ordained by God the Author of nature to some special end is assumed for another honorable end whenever this in no way obstructs the end instituted by God and primary, namely, according to that saying of St. Thomas: The temperate man desires other pleasurable things which are not necessary for health or for a good condition, provided they are not impediments to these.

25. Since these things are so, and since pleasure taken from a richer banquet according to the condition of each person is in no way opposed to the order of reason, whether the common occasion of joy requires this when certain feast days, both sacred and non-sacred, recur; and since the same reason of joy renders pleasures of this kind honorable also among private persons, if at some time the anniversary memory of a heavenly patron recurs, or the birthday of someone in the family is celebrated, or generally some cause of new joy has been brought either by health finally recovered after a most grave illness, or by a rich inheritance unexpectedly acquired, or by the unexpected return among one's own people from a most lengthy journey full of dangers, or from prolonged perils of war, or by accession to some new dignity or most noble office, etc., etc.; why, then, shall we say it is contrary to the order of reason if anyone in any way wearied by any cares, labors, business, studies, or anxieties seeks in moderation, in the aforesaid manner, some refreshment and rest of spirit, which according to St. Thomas is drawn from pleasure? And if even for this purpose alone he recreates himself by the enjoyment of this pleasure, as St. Thomas says (I-II, question 25, article 2), otherwise so observing the law of temperance that, as the same St. Thomas says, no impediment whatever is brought to the primary and natural end of the work, do we not now have that which the VV. otherwise denounce as condemned, namely, that someone can honorably use food and drink for pleasure or delight?

26. Moreover, since this has been said concerning the pleasure and delight of food and drink, why can it not also be said of the pleasure and delight which is sought from conjugal offices in the same circumstances as above? For how does this case differ from the preceding one when the pleasure sought from it for the necessary rest of a wearied spirit in no way impedes the end intended by nature according to the doctrine of St. Thomas? Indeed, if with St. Thomas you weigh, on the one hand, the necessity of some relief and rest from cares, studies, duties, business, and labors, which must be sought from some pleasure; and, on the other, the condition of very many to whom it is scarcely given to seek some honorable and easy pleasure elsewhere, it will readily appear how it can very commonly happen that the act of marriage, to which a certain desire for solace, pleasure, or delight leads, is also rendered wholly honorable by this end, namely, some necessary relief and rest.

This is not the end, you will say, for which God the Author of nature joined pleasure to a work of this kind. It is permissible to reply with the Salmanticenses (On Matrimony, chapter 3, no. 28) that no law commands that what is primary in a work be intended first, provided that what is intended is honorable and good, and especially if it is intrinsic to the work. But, as is apparent from the foregoing, it is honorable and good to seek the rest of a wearied spirit from pleasure, and it is intrinsic to the work to bring this rest through pleasure. Moreover, the Salmanticenses add this reason: that although from the intention of the agent an accidental end is intended primarily, nevertheless from the intention of the work the essential and primary end is always intended so long as it is not excluded.

And to the same matter Aegidius Coninck (disputation 25, no. 17): Although every thing is principally instituted by God, as the Author of nature, for some certain end, nevertheless at least secondarily it is also instituted for any honorable ends for obtaining which it has an aptitude. Eyes, for example, were chiefly given to us for seeing, but secondarily also so that we may signify something to another when honorable utility demands this. Wherefore, with their primary end entirely omitted, we can use them for all honorable ends of this kind; because from no ground can any reason be shown which obliges us always to use any thing for obtaining its principal end, or principally to intend this end, especially when we do not positively impede it from following. But pleasure which is sought from the act of marriage for the rest of a wearied spirit and for animal recreation neither impedes nor excludes the ends intended by nature and otherwise is found entirely consonant with reason and the laws of temperance, as was said. Therefore it is honorably and consequently licitly sought and is assumed as a means to operation, insofar as man afterward, as St. Thomas says (above, no. 23), may more promptly devote himself to works of virtue.

27. A few things must be added here lest anything be omitted of those things with which the VV. filled those thirty-six columns.

To those things, therefore, by which it is shown in the Note, according to the doctrine of the Apostle and, after the Apostle, of St. John Chrysostom and St. Thomas, that there is in marriage an intrinsic end that it be a remedy for concupiscence, and consequently that this end is so far from being excluded by one who acts enticed by pleasure that he rather pursues and fulfills that very end, the VV. object two things.

First, they urge these things (page 828): It is not licit, or it is not free from every fault, to use marriage merely for capturing pleasure, because pleasure is not an honorable end. And for this they adduce the words of Roncaglia (!).

Reply 1. It can rightly appear hardly tolerable that the VV. added the word MERELY by their own effort, by which they insinuate that acting for pleasure alone is taught as licit in the Note, when the context and purpose of the entire Note tends to excluding that condemned opinion. Reply 2. The VV., therefore, rather condemn St. Alphonsus, who wrote (see above, no. 11) that he does not sin who, approaching the table, does not think of the preservation of life, but ONLY of the pleasure of food; in which words you truly see the exclusive particle only. But if, on account of the reverence due to the Holy Doctor, those words must be drawn to a right meaning, why do the VV. draw the words of others into a perverse meaning, in which no exclusive particle appears, but gratuitously intrude it themselves against the force of the context?

28. Secondly, the VV. urge (page 829) that two things appear to be confused in the Note which must altogether be distinguished, namely, to act for pleasure and to act as a remedy for concupiscence. And they add that these two ends are all the less to be confused because they are rather opposed to one another. When someone, they say, intends NOTHING EXCEPT PLEASURE (behold again the perverse opinion concerning one acting for pleasure alone gratuitously fastened upon our Note!), the same thing happens to him as to a drinker who does not extinguish thirst by drinking but rather increases it. Thus, the more someone pursues pleasure, the more he desires to enjoy pleasure.

Reply 1. Raphael Aversa responds well to these things (On Matrimony, question 21, section 4): The act of carnal intercourse is licit for calming concupiscence. But concupiscence is an appetite for a pleasurable good, as St. Thomas says. Therefore concupiscence is calmed through the use of a pleasurable good, or through pleasure sought from a licit conjugal act. How, therefore, do the VV. contend that pleasure sought from the conjugal work and a remedy for concupiscence are mutually opposed?

Reply 2. Therefore let the VV. condemn St. Thomas, who (see the text in the Note), because concupiscence chiefly incites men to venereal acts on account of the vehemence of pleasure, said it is necessary that concupiscence be yielded to in part, by ordering the act of generation according to reason, that is, with a legitimate wife and with the order of nature observed. Indeed, let them condemn the Apostle, who wrote: Return again to the same, lest Satan tempt you because of your incontinence. Indeed, let them also condemn the order of Divine Providence, which (see above, no. 19) joined pleasures to these operations so that FROM THE APPETITE FOR THEM animals would apply themselves to operations of this kind. Otherwise, if the Author of nature placed in man that concupiscence which, as St. Thomas says (I-II, question 30, article 3), is the appetite for a pleasurable good, he nevertheless at the same time placed reason, by whose order man moderates that appetite through temperance, which, as St. Thomas says (II-II, question 141, article 5), concerns the principal pleasures which chiefly pertain to the preservation of human life either in the species or in the individual.

29. And it is preferable here to add what the Salmanticenses hold thus concerning spouses enticed by pleasure to their proper office (On Matrimony, chapter 3, no. 33): When the act is good of itself and its proper end is not excluded, a good end is already applied in it; and thus, although indifferent ends are applied as applications of the will to it, the act is not thereby vitiated or rendered evil through defect of an honorable end.... Wherefore an act is good if someone eats temperately, not attending to the end of eating but also not excluding it (according to Martinet and the VV., however, above, no. 11, this would have to be called condemned doctrine!), even if he is applied to such eating by taste and pleasure. And in our case, when someone is applied to marital intercourse by the pleasure to be taken in it, such an act is good, because it is an act of justice and a rendering of the debt, even if attention is not given to this but to taking pleasure, which happens more frequently, because the honorable end of that act is always retained and such pleasure is only an application of the will to it.

Likewise Raphael Aversa (On Matrimony, question 21, section 4): Nor is it persuaded that to have intercourse moderately for pleasure is a venial sin, because in human operations it is not culpable moderately to desire the pleasure instituted in them by nature when the operations themselves are licit and honorable of themselves.

30. But to that which the VV. note (page 829, note 2), that marriage is the lowest remedy for concupiscence, Aversa replies (loc. cit.): The act of carnal intercourse ... is licit for spouses for calming concupiscence. Nor are they bound to use other more perfect and difficult means for this other end; but it is sufficient if they use the means which is also licit and conceded to them. Otherwise it would be very harsh to oblige married persons to strive to subdue the flesh by abstinences, prayers, and other things of this kind rather than have intercourse with one another conceded to them through marriage.... And this must be extended so that conjugal intercourse is licit for someone not only when he probably fears that he may fall into the sin of incontinence; but even if, through the help of God, he hopes and trusts that he will abstain from sin, yet suffers or would suffer the stings of the flesh, he can use this remedy to extinguish them.

And Peter Catalani (Moral Theology, part 3, question 12, chapter 6): Among the other ends for which marriage was instituted are numbered the generation of children ... and the calming of concupiscence. For it was fitting not only to provide for the preservation of the human race, but also ... to institute an opportune remedy for calming dishonorable couplings and movements of the flesh, as Paul wisely says in 1 Corinthians 7. Each end is honorable and licit for spouses;

wherefore, if spouses have intercourse for any one of the aforesaid ends, they commit no sin, because to act for an end preordained by God cannot be illicit and dishonorable. And although spouses could use prayers, fasts, mortifications, and other suitable means for calming concupiscence, they nevertheless are not bound to use them, because it is a counsel to use them and not all receive this word. Therefore, for spouses to have intercourse for these ends will not be to depart from rectitude, since it is a means instituted by God and sufficiently commended by the Apostle Paul. Indeed, it will not be sound counsel to persuade spouses to abstain from intercourse unless they are of proven virtue and sanctity.

31. The VV. object (page 830) that, in the Note, the text of St. Thomas from lecture 1 on chapter 7 of 1 Corinthians is adduced in a mutilated form and that those things which contradict it are omitted. For the Holy Doctor proceeds: In another way indulgence can be taken insofar as it regards fault ...; and according to this indulgence is referred to the conjugal act according as it has venial fault attached to it.... Hence it must be considered that the conjugal act is sometimes meritorious and without mortal or venial fault, for example, when it is ordered to the good of offspring ..., or when it is done for the sake of rendering the debt.... But sometimes it is with venial fault, namely, when someone is excited to the matrimonial act from concupiscence which nevertheless remains within the limits of marriage.... Therefore, in the first manner the act of marriage does not require indulgence; in the second manner it has indulgence insofar as someone consenting to concupiscence toward his wife does not become guilty of mortal sin.

Moreover, elsewhere (Supplement, question 49, article 5, reply to objection 1), the Holy Doctor writes: When nature alone moves one to the act of marriage, he is not altogether excused from sin except insofar as the movement of nature is ordered actually or habitually further to offspring, according as it is a good of the sacrament. And in the reply to objection 2: If someone through the act of marriage ... intends to avoid fornication in himself, there is some superfluity there, and according to this it is a venial sin.

32. Reply. The difficulty concerning the meaning of the Apostle Paul must be resolved in one way, even according to St. Thomas, but the difficulty concerning the opinion of St. Thomas in another.

Therefore, if the meaning of the Apostle is asked, even from the interpretation of St. Thomas, the objection of the VV. is empty; and the reason is that the words objected have nothing to do with the interpretation of the Pauline opinion. And indeed this is the commentary of St. Thomas: "But this I say according to indulgence," that is, sparing your infirmity; "not according to command," as though it were necessary for you unto salvation. For some things must be conceded to subjects on account of their infirmity, and they must not be compelled by command to goods. But the Apostle appears to speak unfittingly. For indulgence concerns only sin. Therefore, by the fact that the Apostle appears to have conceded marriage according to indulgence, he appears to express that marriage is a sin. But to this one can reply in two ways. In one way, so that indulgence is taken here for permission. But permission is twofold. One is of a lesser evil.... Such permission is not made in the New Testament on account of its perfection.... The other is permission of a lesser good, when, namely, man is not compelled by a precept to a greater good; AND IN THIS MANNER THE APOSTLE HERE INDULGES, that is, permits marriage, which is a lesser good than virginity, which is not commanded and is a greater good." Therefore the indulgence of which the Apostle speaks, according to St. Thomas, is referred to permission of a lesser good, but not to indulgence concerning any fault. Hence in the objected words which are immediately subjoined there, St. Thomas assuredly proceeds to resolve the objection proposed to himself, explaining further how indulgence can be referred to the conjugal act; but there he in no way expresses the opinion of the Apostle. And this is confirmed by those things which the Holy Doctor has below, saying: Then when he says (the Apostle), "But let each one," etc., he assigns the reason why he permitted marriage according to indulgence, namely, because not everyone has received from God the gift of such great virtue that he can contain himself entirely.

Viva speaks well concerning this opinion of Paul (On Matrimony, question 7, article 1, no. 2): If it were a venial fault to use such a means for avoiding incontinence, the Apostle could not grant an indulgence that the spouses should return to it. And Coninck (Disputation 34, no. 7) in the same sense: You will say: the Apostle says this according to indulgence; therefore he supposes there is some fault, because where there is no fault, we grant no indulgence. Reply. By denying the consequent and its proof. For to indulge does not there signify to remit faults, but indulgently to permit something. For the Apostle does not indulge them something past, but future; which is done with regard to faults only perversely. That is, no otherwise than we heard St. Thomas saying above: Such permission (namely, of a lesser evil) is not made in the New Testament.

33. Reply 2. But neither do the texts of St. Thomas objected by the VV. (above, no. 31) in any way strike the doctrine for the confirmation and explanation of which the authority of St. Thomas is adduced in the Note.

And certainly there are two things for the explanation of which the authority of St. Thomas is invoked in the Note. The first is that matrimony was divinely instituted also as a remedy for concupiscence. But this is proved by the words of St. Thomas there adduced: He proposes (the Apostle) the second necessity, according to which (matrimony) was instituted as a remedy for fault. Nor indeed is there reason why anyone should perhaps stumble over those words, as a remedy for fault. Behold how St. Thomas speaks more clearly a little afterward: The second good (namely, matrimony) has insofar as it is a remedy for CONCUPISCENCE, which is confined to a determinate person, and this good is called fidelity.

The other thing which is undertaken to be proved by the authority of St. Thomas in the Note pertains to the manner in which matrimony is a remedy for concupiscence, namely, that this consists in yielding to concupiscence itself through acts apt for generation in legitimate marriage. And for this purpose these words of St. Thomas are adduced there: For because carnal concupiscence still remains after baptism, although it does not dominate, it incites men especially to venereal acts on account of the vehemence of pleasure; and because it is a matter of greater virtue entirely to overcome this concupiscence than can befit men, according to Matthew 19: "Not all receive this word"; it is necessary that concupiscence be yielded to in part and overcome in part; which indeed is done when the act of generation is ordered according to reason. Then in the same place it is added how, according to St. Thomas, the act of generation is so ordered by reason that concupiscence is yielded to in part and overcome in part. And this is shown to be obtained when two conditions are observed, which St. Thomas indicates thus: 1. That man use the act of generation according as it befits the generation and EDUCATION of children; 2. That in the human species there be not wandering and uncertain couplings, such as fornical couplings are, but that determinate men be joined to determinate women: which determination indeed is made through the law of matrimony. It is therefore manifest that the texts of St. Thomas objected by the VV. (above, no. 31) prove not even the least thing. For confirming the proposed doctrine, therefore, the authority of St. Thomas was employed in the Note with the fullest right.

Moreover, regarding the texts adduced in the Note, the VV. (page 830, note 3) objected only this: that in the second text the words AND EDUCATION had been omitted; whence St. Thomas concludes that matrimony ought to be of a determinate man to a determinate woman. But it is briefly replied to this that it can appear strange that the VV. dwell seriously upon these things. For are not the words of St. Thomas adduced in the Note where it is said that the order of reason requires that in the human species there be not wandering couplings, but couplings of determinate men to determinate women? Those words certainly suffice for the purpose. For otherwise we leave the labor of gathering even those things which pertain less to the matter to those whose principal care it is that causes be judged from the immense bulk of the volume.

34. Yet another reply should be given to the texts objected above (no. 31), insofar as they appear to intimate that the pleasure sought in the conjugal act is not free from every fault. And especially those words appear to require this (Lecture 1 on 1 Corinthians): But sometimes it is with venial fault, namely, when someone is excited to the matrimonial act from concupiscence which nevertheless remains within the limits of matrimony, as, namely, when he is content with his wife alone.

I said, especially those words; for what the VV. object from the Supplement, question 49, article 5, reply to objection 1, is nothing. For the words objected from this place are these: When nature alone moves one to the act of matrimony, he is not altogether excused from sin except insofar as the movement of nature is ordered ACTUALLY OR HABITUALLY further to offspring, according as it is a good of the sacrament. But suppose, I ask, that you read there the following words: Nor nevertheless does it follow that the movement of nature is evil, but that it is imperfect unless it be ordered further to some good of matrimony. The Holy Doctor, namely, replies to the objection that the act of matrimony can be excused even without the goods of matrimony. Indeed, the objected words tell against the VV. who object to them. For to remove this imperfection of the matrimonial act, it suffices (as is said there) that the act be ordered actually or habitually to the goods of matrimony. But for the act to be called HABITUALLY ordered, it suffices that those ends not be positively excluded. Hence the doctrine of the Note which the VV. attack is confirmed: for an honorable act it suffices that its ends not be positively excluded, that is, however little they may be thought of while acting.

But regarding the last text objected by the VV. (above, no. 31), they themselves (page 832) note that not even St. Alphonsus admits that opinion of the Angelic Doctor, as being too rigid, and they transcribe these words of St. Alphonsus himself (book 6, no. 882): But, with the pardon of the Holy Doctor (whose opinions I have striven universally to follow in other matters), the interpretation of St. John Chrysostom appears more proper, whose words I shall presently adduce and whom Estius, Salmeron, and Cornelius followed, namely, that the phrase "on account of fornication" is not understood of avoiding the fornication of one's spouse, but one's own. And since these things are so, an easy reply offers itself to this text of St. Thomas. For, on the one hand, it does not in any way weaken the doctrine which we constructed on the authority of the same St. Thomas; while, on the other hand, not much weight should be given to an opinion which even St. Alphonsus judged should not be admitted, as being (the VV. say) too rigid.

35. But the reverence due to the Angelic Doctor would be better consulted if a more apt interpretation and reason for the objected opinion were employed.

And in truth St. Thomas (Lecture 1 on chapter 7 of 1 Corinthians) does not explain that saying of the Apostle, On account of fornication, etc., in such a sense that it would be licit with

St. Alphonsus to oppose the interpretation of Chrysostom to the interpretation of the Angelic Doctor. Behold his words: It has been said that it is good for a man not to touch a woman; but because all men are not fit for this good, let each man, on account of fornication, namely, to be avoided, have his own wife, that is, one determined for him, so that wandering and uncertain couplings, which pertain to fornication, may be removed. Hence also Proverbs 5: "Rejoice with the wife of your youth"; and afterward it is added: "Why are you seduced, my son, by a strange woman?" Therefore the interpretation of that Pauline passage which St. Thomas presents agrees to a nicety with the interpretation of Chrysostom which you see in the Note, namely, he interprets Paul concerning the avoidance of one's own fornication, not that of another.

But this must also be held for another reason, namely, lest we make St. Thomas fight with himself, and indeed in the same context. For he had premised these things in the same place: He proposes (the Apostle) the second necessity, according to which (matrimony) was instituted as a remedy for fault (that is, concupiscence; above, no. 33). For because carnal concupiscence still remains after baptism, although it does not dominate, it incites men especially to venereal acts on account of the vehemence of pleasure; and because it is a matter of greater virtue entirely to overcome this concupiscence than can befit men ... it is necessary that concupiscence be yielded to in part and overcome in part, which indeed is done when the act of generation is ordered according to reason. But it is manifest that the Holy Doctor here speaks of the remedy for each person's own concupiscence; otherwise the use of this remedy could never occur without the sin of one or the other spouse.

But, you will say, how then do these things agree with the objected opinion of the same Holy Doctor, namely, that if someone through the act of matrimony intends to avoid fornication in himself, this is a venial sin?

36. I reply that this opinion can be reconciled without difficulty with the aforesaid doctrine of the Holy Doctor, if its reason is sought more diligently from the context; and from this inquiry it will also be apparent in what sense another objected text of the Holy Doctor (above, no. 34) is to be understood.

That these things may therefore be understood more clearly, observe how St. Thomas, after he had asked (Supplement, question 49, article 4) whether the act of matrimony is excused by the aforesaid goods, namely, the goods of matrimony, immediately in the following fifth article, from which the objected words were taken, asks whether the matrimonial act can be excused without the goods of matrimony. But what he means by a matrimonial act without the goods of matrimony is clear from the first objection of the following sixth article, where it is said: It appears that whenever someone knows his wife, not intending any good of matrimony but pleasure alone, he sins mortally. Therefore, with St. Thomas, a matrimonial act not excused by the goods of matrimony is the same as a matrimonial act had for pleasure alone.

And to this indeed pertains the second objection of the fifth article and therefore the reply of St. Thomas from which the objected words were taken. For the Holy Doctor thus objects to himself: He who uses his spouse to avoid fornication does not appear to intend any good of matrimony; but such a one does not sin, as it appears, because matrimony was conceded to human infirmity for this purpose, that fornication might be avoided, as is apparent in 1 Corinthians 7; therefore even WITHOUT THE GOODS OF MATRIMONY his act can be excused. The objection therefore supposes a matrimonial act without the goods of matrimony. But, this state of the question being supposed, it is easily understood why St. Thomas proposes two cases in his reply, namely, when a spouse wishes to avoid fornication in the other spouse, and when in himself. For in the first case he denies that every good of matrimony is absent, because there is the good of fidelity and the act of justice in rendering the debt; but not likewise in the second case; and since, with this good of matrimony also removed, by hypothesis no other good of this kind now remains, the hypothesis of a matrimonial act without the goods of matrimony returns, namely, an act which is had for pleasure alone, which St. Thomas for this reason (above, no. 18) had already said to be stained by venial fault. And the same St. Thomas clearly exhibits the character of this act when, in the following article, reply to objection 1, he writes: It must be said that a man seeks meretricious pleasures in his wife when he attends to nothing else in her than what he would attend to in a harlot; which things the Holy Doctor refers entirely to the present hypothesis, for thus the objection has it: whenever someone knows his wife, not intending any good of matrimony, but pleasure alone. And in reality the matter stands thus when one deals with harlots; for neither the good of offspring nor the good of fidelity is sought there or attended to by the fornicator. Nor nevertheless does the Holy Doctor concede what the objection held, that one sins mortally if pleasure alone is attended to in one's wife without some other good of matrimony. For in the same article 6, in the body, he writes: But if pleasure is sought within the limits of matrimony, so that, namely, such pleasure would not be sought in another than one's spouse, it is thus a venial sin.

And from these things it also follows that it is by no means necessary to attribute to the Angelic Doctor that opinion which the VV. called too rigid, as though, namely, the Holy Doctor generally condemns as some sin an approach to one's spouse by which one finds a remedy for calming concupiscence in oneself, whereas, on the contrary, he himself acknowledges and teaches that matrimony was divinely instituted also for this end. For the Holy Doctor establishes only this, and most rightly, when someone approaches his wife for pleasure alone in such a way that no good of matrimony is attended to, no otherwise than one who approaches a harlot. And indeed, as we saw above (no. 34), according to the Holy Doctor it suffices that the good of matrimony be attended to actually or habitually, namely, that at least virtually that end or good be intended which renders the act of matrimony honorable. For this purpose Seraphinus Capponi, in his elucidations on this passage, alleges these words of St. Thomas: If it is not then ordered, it has nevertheless been preordained by reason. Therefore, for that act to have been preordained by reason is for it to be ordered habitually (see also above, no. 9). Therefore, according to St. Thomas, there is no inordination if a spouse, enticed by pleasure, approaches the other spouse, even if he intends the goods of matrimony only habitually, that is, by not excluding them, as they are excluded in the access of a fornicator to a harlot.

37. Hence, as I said in the preceding number, an easy solution is apparent to the difficulty which another text of the Holy Doctor objected by the VV. appears to introduce, where it is said that the conjugal act has indulgence insofar as someone consenting to concupiscence toward his wife does not become guilty of mortal sin (but of venial sin). For after the foregoing it is easily understood that in this place also the Holy Doctor discusses the matrimonial act without the goods of matrimony, that is, one had for pleasure alone.

That this may readily be clear, observe that according to St. Thomas there is a threefold good of matrimony, namely, the good of offspring, the good of fidelity, and the good of the sacrament. But since the good of the sacrament, as the Holy Doctor says (Supplement, question 49, article 5, corpus), makes matrimony itself honorable, but not its act, it remains that the act of matrimony must be rendered honorable by the goods of offspring or of fidelity, as the same Holy Doctor concludes there. With these things premised, let the context from which the objected words are taken be consulted (Lecture on chapter 7 of 1 Corinthians): Indulgence, says the Holy Doctor, is referred to the conjugal act according as it has venial fault annexed to it.... Hence it must be considered that the conjugal act is sometimes meritorious and without every mortal or venial fault, as when it is ordered to the good of offspring to be procreated and educated for the worship of God, for thus it is an act of religion; or when it is done for the sake of rendering the debt, for thus it is an act of justice; but every act of virtue is meritorious if it is with charity. But sometimes it is with venial fault, namely, when someone is excited to the matrimonial act from concupiscence which nevertheless remains within the limits of matrimony, as, namely, when he is content with his wife alone. Therefore in this place also a twofold case is discerned: the former, in which a good of matrimony appears; the latter, in which those goods of matrimony are lacking; for otherwise the reason for distinguishing one case from the other would be absent. But where the goods of matrimony are in no way attended to in the matrimonial act, one now intends the act of matrimony for pleasure alone, as was said above. Therefore, this passage also of the Angelic Doctor is by no means to be taken as a general rule concerning an act exercised on account of pleasure, but is to be restricted to one acting for pleasure alone in such a way that the goods of matrimony are not even virtually intended.

And let these things suffice, so that it may be concluded that the VV. did not write after sufficiently examining the matter when they said (page 832): It can appear strange that Father Ballerini endeavors to present St. Thomas as favoring him; all the more because it certainly did not escape him that this last reply (where, namely, St. Thomas appears to condemn the conjugal act for avoiding fornication in oneself), as being too rigid, is not admitted even by St. Alphonsus himself. We voluntarily omit many things which could easily be added from the same St. Thomas concerning this argument, lest this Note grow beyond measure.

2. The use of marriage with an adulterous mind is gravely illicit, as if one approaching his own wife should represent another woman to himself. - St. Ligorius, no. 913, and others commonly.

3. The use of marriage is licit for the sterile, both because no law to the contrary can be shown and because the sterile are of themselves fit to perform the conjugal act. If no generation follows, this occurs altogether per accidens; and besides generation there are other honorable ends which render conjugal intercourse honorable.

4. The use of marriage is licit even for the aged, whose seed is no longer prolific, provided that they are able sufficiently to perform intercourse or have a hope, not empty, of performing it. For the same reasons which we adduced concerning the sterile favor the aged. It is further confirmed from the practice of the Church, which blesses the marriages of the aged. - See St. Ligorius, no. 954.

§ II. On the Liceity of the Conjugal Act with Respect to Circumstances

I. on the Circumstances of the Person

2. affinity from incest; 3. spiritual relationship; 4. bodily impotence.

909. Principles. - I. Any spouse bound by a vow of chastity, or impeded by affinity contracted through his or her own act, is forbidden under grave sin to seek the debt; nevertheless, he or she can, and indeed is bound to, render it to the other spouse who seeks it, since the other party cannot be deprived of his or her right. There are several who extend this same thing to the spouse who, outside necessity, baptized his or her own offspring. Nevertheless, the opinion which denies this is sufficiently probable, and several grave Doctors hold it, as St. Alphonsus says, book 6, no. 150.

II. Neither spouse can seek or render the debt if both are bound by a vow of chastity, or if both have contracted affinity or spiritual relationship through their own act; for each is impeded on account of the vow or sin. Some, however, as was said, deny that this latter impediment on account of spiritual relationship is incurred.

910. Resolutions. - 1. Not only can, but indeed is bound to, render the debt one who made a vow opposed to the right of the other after marriage had been entered; and even one who made it before marriage. For although he sinned gravely by contracting marriage, he nevertheless validly handed over to the spouse that which he had promised to God; otherwise the other spouse, ignorant of the vow, acquired a right to the thing by force of the valid contract.

2. One who, after marriage has been entered, vows to enter religion or to receive sacred Orders after the death of his wife can seek and render the debt, and does not need a dispensation; for vows of this kind do not oblige except after the dissolution of the marriage.

3. According to the more common and more probable opinion, a spouse bound by a vow or by the impediment of affinity (contracted after marriage had been entered) can seek the debt when he notices that the other spouse, not daring to seek it, is in danger of incontinence. He can also seek whenever the other seeks interpretatively; for example, when the woman is restrained by modesty and the man perceives, as St. Thomas says, her will to seek; because then it is rendering rather than seeking. - St. Ligorius, no. 931.

4. A spouse impeded by a bond, however, cannot seek the debt even to avoid incontinence; for the danger of incontinence is indeed a cause for obtaining a dispensation or suspension of the vow, but not for seeking the debt. - Thus Sanchez and others. - Nevertheless, it does not appear illicit to him to warn the other spouse of his own danger and to ask that spouse to seek on this account thereafter. Likewise, probably make an exception if it is a question of impediments imposed by the Church, a dispensation cannot be obtained quickly, and great danger of incontinence lies in delay. - St. Ligorius, no. 930. Compare what we have said both concerning the impedient impediment of a vow and concerning the diriment impediments of spiritual relationship and affinity.

II. on the Circumstances of Manner or Position

911. ○ I. Rule. That position is entirely licit which nature itself primarily teaches, namely, that the woman be beneath and the man above. - Thus St. Thomas and others commonly. The reason is that the other positions are somewhat opposed to the order of nature, and consequently introduce some violation of order.

II. Rule. No position, however unnatural, is gravely illicit of itself, provided the conjugal act can be sufficiently completed. The reason is that any inversion of position, provided union can be completed, does not impede generation. - St. Ligorius, no. 917.

III. Rule. Every unnatural position, when a just cause is present, is free from all fault; but sometimes an unnatural position is easier, or even the only one possible; and indeed some greater facility or necessity can remove an inordination of this kind, which of itself is slight. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

912. Resolutions. - 1. Spouses do not sin at all who invert the position on account of danger of miscarriage during pregnancy, on account of the corpulence or curvature of the man, on account of the excessive fatigue of the woman, or even on account of frigidity, when they are more aroused in an unnatural position, etc.

2. Whatever the position which alone is possible may be, it is in no way condemned, although a not inconsiderable loss of semen should follow; because this part of the semen is not necessary for generation and is lost accidentally, against the will of the spouses.

3. A prudent Confessor must take care not to ask questions about the various manners of intercourse, which are not only useless but also full of scandal. Hence, if the penitent raises a doubt about these matters, it will be sufficient for the Confessor to know whether complete pollution occurred outside the due vessel. I said, if he raises doubts, or if the penitent furnishes even an occasion for doubting; for no one fails to see that questions of this kind, in a matter so slippery, are never to be asked unless a manifest necessity is present [1]. - St. Ligorius, no. 917.

[1] It is the very common opinion of the Doctors that both the danger of scandal which the Confessor can occasion to himself and to the penitent, and even to others (for penitents not rarely speak with others about the statements and questions of Confessors), and also the reverence due to the Sacrament, ought to cause him to abstain from further inquiry by questions in a matter so shameful of itself, even if perhaps he fears that the confession will not be sufficiently integral on account of some unmentioned circumstance which perhaps even appears to change the species; but in necessary matters he should use those forms of words which are held to be as becoming as possible. Moreover, let the Confessor remember that an imprudent, importunate, and shameless manner of speaking about this matter has not rarely given just occasion not only for suspecting evil of him, but also for denouncing him before the Ordinaries as though, in the act of confession, as Gregory

XV says (in the Constitution Contra sollicitantes), he had uttered shameful discourse; and indeed the judges have been accustomed to proceed both against those who have so offended from malice and also against those who have so offended from mere imprudence. On this argument see Joseph Frassinetti in Dissertation X, entitled On the Integrity Necessary for Confession (Compendium of Moral Theology, vol. 2).

III. On the Circumstances of Time

These circumstances principally concern the time of pregnancy, nursing, menstruation, illness, feast days, and Holy Communion.

913. ○ 1. At no time is the conjugal act of itself forbidden under grave sin, because no law is found by which the work of marriage is ever prohibited by reason of time. I said of itself, because perhaps at times, by reason of circumstances, proximate danger of miscarriage or of health could be induced. But this is exceedingly rare and cannot easily be foreseen in certain cases.

2. Indeed, according to most Theologians, the conjugal act is never forbidden even under light sin by reason of time; the reason is that no law can be assigned by which it is ever prohibited even under light sin. Nevertheless, St. Ligorius, no. 924, is more pleased by the opinion [2] which does not excuse from venial fault if intercourse takes place during pregnancy, unless danger of incontinence or another honorable cause is present, which otherwise can scarcely ever be absent.

[2] These things and other things of this kind are recalled for mere erudition; for as regards practice, the common doctrine, which St. Alphonsus also most keenly defends, is that the uncertain opinion of certain persons is insufficient in a case for establishing either a grave or a light obligation. Therefore the Confessor neither ought nor can urge plainly uncertain obligations of this kind; all the more because in this question St. Alphonsus himself, no. 882 (to which place he refers), refutes the reason upon which this opinion rests; and moreover, in order that the Confessor might know whether occasion for this obligation is given by the circumstances, he would have to mingle lengthy discourses and questions concerning a matter which, according to the opinion of all, he must take the greatest care not to touch unless grave necessity is present.

3. The more common opinion teaches that intercourse had during menstruation is not excused from venial sin on account of the indecency which it appears to present, unless some cohonesting cause is present, namely, to avoid dissensions or to guard against incontinence, etc. - St. Ligorius, no. 925. But a prudent Confessor will abstain from every question in this matter, since there is nothing which must necessarily be declared by the penitent [3]. They commonly hold the same, by parity of reason, concerning intercourse had by spouses at the time of purgation, or in the days following childbirth.

[3] The question would concern a light fault; but light faults are not necessary matter of Confession, and this even when the light fault is certainly established. But here too there is question of a mere opinion, and there are those who think equally probable the opinion which denies that there is fault in this, especially after it has now been shown that the physiological reasons upon which the opinion of the ancients rested lack foundation, as the distinguished Lecompte makes evident (De l'ovulation spontanee, part 2, section 2). See, therefore, what was said in the preceding note.

914. ○ 4. The act of marriage during nursing is not illicit, because there is no prohibiting law, nor, according to the testimony of experience, is there any at least proximate danger of corrupting the milk. Hence there is no reason why spouses should be bound for so long a time to abstain from the use of matrimony with a continual danger of sinning. Thus most commonly says St. Ligorius, no. 911.

5. The conjugal act during illness, at least for the most part, is illicit neither under grave nor under light sin, because frequently no harm thereby befalls the spouses; but the exertion which accompanies the act, at least commonly speaking, cannot greatly influence the illness [4].

[4] This appears to have been said too generally, and in particular cases both the inconvenience or harm of the sick spouse and the danger of incontinence in the other spouse will have to be weighed. See below, no. 915, III, and no. 916, resolution 6.

6. According to the more common opinion, it is not illicit on Sundays and even on more solemn Feast days, both because no law opposes it and because marital intercourse does not remove spouses from observing the Feasts of the Church. Most of the Holy Fathers who are objected to the contrary appear to speak of counsel rather than of precept. Hence you will also deduce that there is no reason why use of this kind should be prohibited during Advent or Lent. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 933.

7. Finally, of itself it is not prohibited on the day of Holy Communion, although the spouses approach it from piety alone, provided that they act for an honorable end [5]. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 922, and book 6, no. 273. - Lugo. - Sanchez and others, who teach that abstaining from intercourse on the day of Communion, whether before or after Communion, pertains to mere counsel, provided it is not had immediately after Communion has been received nor for the sake of pleasure alone.

[5] You will scarcely understand what these words mean; for it is never licit to do anything without an honorable end, whether on the day of Communion or on other days. You plainly see scraps of singular opinions concerning the ends of matrimony. I say the same concerning the exception added below, for the sake of pleasure alone; concerning which see the observations at no. 908. And if you finally determine that the act is of itself free from fault, you will conclude that this also pertains to mere counsel and not to a precept, either grave or light.

 Regarding this little Note, the VV. (page 827) write: Thus, in Father B.'s judgment, THE CONJUGAL ACT EXERCISED FOR THE SAKE OF PLEASURE ALONE is sufficiently honorable; and to abstain from intercourse on the very day of Communion, when it would be had for the sake of pleasure alone, pertains not to any precept, whether grave or light, but to mere counsel. But what must be thought concerning this doctrine we shall see below. Now the things which the VV. add below concerning this same little Note are contained in these words (page 837): We scarcely understand how, given the condemnation of the aforesaid proposition, Father B.'s opinion can be sustained. For it could be asked what difference there is between these two propositions: To act FOR THE SAKE OF PLEASURE ALONE, and to act ON ACCOUNT OF PLEASURE ALONE. Father Ballerini says the former is licit in the Note to no. 914; but, this being posited, by what reason the latter ought to be called illicit and condemned, let others judge.

Reply. I deny the supposition; that is, I deny that acting for the sake of pleasure alone is said to be licit in the little Note; for only these words are read there: Concerning which see the observations at no. 908. But in the Note to no. 908 only this is said: The Author (Gury) wished through these words to signify that even this slight inordination or fault of one acting on account of pleasure alone is scarcely ever present in reality. Therefore, contrary to manifest truth, the VV. say that Father Ballerini hands down as licit that acting for the sake of pleasure alone, or on account of pleasure alone; for Father Ballerini openly supposes, indeed affirms, that fault is present in it.

But the reason why it is said in that Note to no. 908 that fault of this kind is scarcely ever present is this and no other: namely, Father Gury (no. 908) had written: The use of marriage is illicit if it is done for pleasure alone, that is, by expressly excluding other ends. But in the Note it is observed that it can scarcely happen that ends intrinsic to the conjugal work are positively and entirely excluded. Therefore, in the Note it is not denied, but rather supposed, that acting on account of pleasure alone is illicit; only this is added: that it scarcely ever happens that the other ends are positively excluded, and therefore it scarcely ever happens that the work of marriage is done on account of pleasure alone. But this is not to say that acting for the sake of pleasure alone, or acting for the sake of mere pleasure, is licit.

Therefore, also those things which the VV. add, namely, that in Father Ballerini's judgment the conjugal act exercised for the sake of mere pleasure is sufficiently honorable, and that to abstain from intercourse on the very day of Communion, when it would be had for the sake of mere pleasure, pertains not to any precept, whether grave or light, but to mere counsel: all these things, I say, the VV. fasten upon Father Ballerini's Notes contrary to manifest truth.

Article II. On the Obligation of the Conjugal Act

915. Principles. - I. There is an obligation of justice, grave of itself, to render the debt to the other spouse who seriously and reasonably seeks it. The reason is that, from the very nature of the matrimonial contract, spouses transfer to one another power over their bodies in order to conjugal use. It is also deduced from the words of the Apostle, 1 Corinthians 7:3: Let the husband render the debt to the wife, and the wife likewise to the husband; the woman does not have power over her own body, but the husband; and likewise the husband does not have power over his own body, but the woman.

II. Of itself no obligation to seek the conjugal debt urges. The reason is that neither spouse is bound to use his or her right, and each can remit it. Accidentally, however, there can be an obligation of seeking from charity or another virtue, especially in the man; for example, if he judges that the other party is placed in danger of incontinence on account of modesty in seeking, or if the request is necessary for fostering or restoring conjugal love, etc. - See St. Ligorius, nos. 928, 929.

III. The obligation to render the debt ceases when the right to demand it ceases; but the right is extinguished chiefly in the following cases, namely: 1. if one of the spouses has committed adultery; 2. if the one seeking lacks the use of reason, because that person's request is not human; 3. if the one rendering can reasonably fear harm or grave danger to health, because spouses are not judged to have obligated themselves to render the debt with so great an inconvenience; 4. if the one seeking, on account of incest committed with the blood relatives of the other in the first or second degree, or for another cause, has lost the right of seeking [1].

[1] Perhaps the loss of a right over the body of the other is here confused with an illicit use of the right on account of some circumstance. Therefore these things do not agree with those said above, no. 909, where it is established that the spouse who contracted affinity on account of incest can, indeed is bound to, render the debt to the other.

916. Resolutions. - 1. Spouses are bound to cohabitation, nor can one be absent for a long time without the consent of the other or without necessity; for this obligation follows from the obligation itself of rendering the debt. But just causes for being away for a long time are the public good, the support or protection of the family, and the avoidance of injury from enemies, etc. But a husband who must remain elsewhere for a long time ought to bring his wife there, if he conveniently can, so that she may cohabit with him. - St. Ligorius, no. 938.

2. A spouse sins gravely by denying the debt whenever there is danger of incontinence or of grave vexation in the other party. Likewise, if the spouse denies it to the other who seriously seeks it. It is otherwise, however, if the other party benevolently remits it or seeks it remissly.

3. One who denies does not sin when the other seeks immoderately, for example, after the third or fourth time in the same night; nor if the spouse delays for a short time, namely, until night, or if from night the spouse delays until the morning, always excluding, however, danger of incontinence. - St. Ligorius, no. 940.

4. Wives are to be reprehended who deny the debt to their husbands without sufficient cause, even if they seek it remissly; or who do not grant it unless compelled and harshly and contumeliously reproach the husband for his requests.

5. A wife is not excused from rendering the debt on account of the ordinary inconveniences of childbirth, pregnancy, or nursing, nor on account of pains which are indeed grave but brief in time, nor on account of prolonged but moderate pains, for example, of the head for several months after childbirth, nor on account of health somewhat weakened; because all these things are annexed to the matrimonial condition. It is otherwise, however, if danger of life or of a most grave illness would truly have to be feared according to the judgment of a prudent physician. - St. Ligorius, no. 952.

6. There is no obligation to render the debt to the other spouse laboring under a disease grave in itself and contagious, such as plague, venereal disease, or something similar. Likewise, those laboring under a strong fever or another grave illness are excused from rendering the debt on account of notable weakness of the body. - St. Ligorius, no. 950.

7. A spouse is not excused from rendering the debt on account of fear of more numerous offspring; for the procreation of offspring pertains to the principal end of matrimony, whence that inconvenience is intrinsic to matrimony itself. - St. Ligorius, no. 941.

Article III. On the Sins of Spouses

917. ◦ Sins can be committed between spouses by reason of the conjugal act, either by excess, that is, by performing acts useless for generation, or by defect, by not completing the essential act, or by staining the marriage bed with the crime of onanism.

Hence there are two sections.

§ I. On the Sins of Spouses by Excess

Three kinds of acts are distinguished which, besides intercourse but on its occasion or pretext, can be exercised by spouses. 1. Some are harmful to generation, such as sodomy and pollution, and are against nature.

2. Others are useful, such as touches exciting nature and fostering love. 3. Others are neither harmful nor useful, and are said to be besides nature.

918. Principles. - I. Whatever is necessary for completing the conjugal act, or useful for exercising it more easily, quickly, or perfectly, is entirely licit for spouses. The reason is that he who has a right to a thing also has a right to the necessary or useful means not otherwise prohibited; and for those to whom the principal is licit, the accessory and the means ordered to it are also licit.

II. Whatever in the conjugal act harms generation, or of itself induces an effusion of the generative substance outside natural union, is gravely illicit. The reason is that such voluntary effusion is not licit except in order to generation, and therefore matrimony gives the faculty only for an effusion of this kind which can of itself serve generation; but otherwise, if men could enjoy that pleasure without the consequent burden of supporting and educating offspring, the generation of children would easily be placed second, indeed would deliberately be avoided, and thus society itself would incline toward destruction.

III. Whatever does not indeed harm, but of itself is less necessary or less useful for the act of generating, cannot be imputed as more than a light fault; but other ends intrinsic to acts of this kind excuse from it, namely, that conjugal affection be preserved and fostered, or at least that concupiscence be calmed [1]. Yet there is no need expressly to intend these ends; rather, as was said above, it suffices that they not be positively excluded.

[1] Compare what was said above in the Note to no. 908, where, from the doctrine of Chrysostom and St. Thomas interpreting Paul the Apostle, it was shown that the gain and fruit of marriage especially consists in this: that the ardor of concupiscence be extinguished and thus a chaste life be led. Concupiscence is extinguished when marriage provides the means by which the appetite for pleasure can be satisfied honorably. A chaste life is led when satisfaction of that appetite is not sought outside the legitimate marriage bed.

919. Resolutions. - 1. All honorable kisses between spouses are free from fault, as are touches upon parts both honorable and even less honorable (provided they are done cautiously), for the sake of demonstrating conjugal affection or fostering love, even if involuntary pollution should sometimes accidentally follow; because all honorable signs of love, even tender ones, as means to an end, are licit to those who from the matrimonial bond ought to become one heart and one flesh. - St. Ligorius, no. 934, and others commonly.

2. Less honorable touches and looks are also free from fault of themselves if they are referred immediately to intercourse. Indeed, the same must be held even if they were simply dishonorable but necessary or useful for exciting nature; for then they are a certain preparation for and, as it were, beginning of intercourse. But if the acts by which a spouse disposes himself or herself for the conjugal act are such that of themselves they easily provoke pollution, they can be culpable if diligence to avoid it outside intercourse is lacking [2]; and the omission of diligence, where it is of such a kind that through it one is judged nearly to will pollution outside the vessel, can even be a grave fault; but if, due diligence having been employed, such pollution follows beyond the intention, there will be no fault [3].

[2] For this reason the Doctors warn that these things are especially to be avoided if spouses are in a place where they cannot have intercourse. Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 9, disputation 45, no. 35) indicates two examples of touches which of themselves easily provoke pollution, and St. Alphonsus also indicates one of them (book 6, no. 934).

[3] This doctrine must be kept before one's eyes also with regard to the case which the Author presently subjoins, namely, regarding imperfect acts which are exercised between spouses without the intention of intercourse. And the Author indeed indicates only the opinion which does not condemn these acts as gravely guilty. But another opinion, itself sufficiently common (see St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 934), must not be passed over in silence, which excuses these acts from every fault even in the one seeking, if pollution is not intended and there is no danger of consent to it, and provided that some grave cause is present, for example, to foster mutual love ... or to avert the jealousy of the other. And he adds (ibid.) that, probably, even immodest touches on the part of the one rendering (unless they are such that they appear to be an inchoate pollution) are licit, although danger of pollution is present in either spouse, because then the one rendering attends to a licit thing.

But according to the common opinion, which St. Alphonsus also follows (loc. cit., no. 933), these things hold even when intercourse would be entirely forbidden to the spouses, or even would be impossible on account of impotence. And regarding this latter case, when spouses are to be called truly and entirely impotent, we have already made observations above (in the Note to no. 855). But regarding the former, the cause why the use of marriage is forbidden must be considered. For the stated rule will be true if it is forbidden on account of affinity contracted through a crime with one's own wife; but it is otherwise if on account of the nullity of the marriage.

And regarding these imperfect acts, those things which Diana has (vol. 2, tract 6, resolution 205, no. 2) must be recalled: The Doctors commonly note, he says, that when the danger of pollution has ceased in both spouses, the husband does not sin mortally if he breaks off intercourse begun before seminal emission, lest offspring be generated, provided that he does this with the wife consenting or not reasonably unwilling. Indeed, if there is a just cause for impeding seminal emission, for example, on account of poverty and the multitude of offspring, and nevertheless a cause for lying together in order to calm concupiscence, every fault is absent if mutual consent is present.... Hence infirm spouses are not to be condemned even of venial fault who, in order to calm concupiscence, begin intercourse and voluntarily by no means complete it; and this case can frequently occur. And immediately afterward (resolution 207) he proposes this case: A certain man began intercourse with his wife, and afterward, on account of danger of illness, withdrew himself with her consent; but pollution sometimes followed from this. It was asked of me whether such contact was licit. I replied affirmatively, because it is not a sin to attend to a licit thing and an honorable action, although the pollution which will follow is foreseen, provided danger of consent is absent, as it was in the case concerning which I was questioned; because then the pollution is not willed in itself, as is supposed, nor can it be said to be willed in its cause, because I am not bound to omit that action lest pollution follow, when a just cause stands. You have the reason for this resolution more clearly proposed in the doctrine of St. Alphonsus which we reported elsewhere (vol. 1, Note to no. 412). See also Sporer (On Matrimony, no. 500), where concerning a similar case which he takes from Gobat (Experimental Theology, tract 10, nos. 668, 669), he thinks the same with Diana and others and observes that it is a very practical and frequently occurring case.

 The VV. here object (page 828, note 1) to these words of St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 918):

Nevertheless, I think that in no way can they (the spouses) be excused at least from venial sin, whatever Sanchez with others may say.
Reply. The Doctors, as even St. Alphonsus acknowledges, do not agree among themselves whether in the case some fault, even venial, intervenes. Therefore, it is not certainly established that there is some law which is thus violated, and consequently no convincing reason is present why the act in question should be condemned as venial fault. But according to the doctrine so strongly inculcated by St. Alphonsus, we neither can nor ought to call something illicit or instill a consciousness of sin when the sin is not established. Therefore, it is fitting that the VV. also not prohibit others from preferring in the case the opinion of other Doctors opposed to the opinion of St. Alphonsus.

Moreover, these words are read in the Note: You have the reason for this resolution more clearly proposed in the doctrine of St. Alphonsus which we reported elsewhere (vol. 1, Note to no. 412). Why, I ask, did the VV. think that no account should be taken of this citation? In that place the Holy Doctor Alphonsus discusses the guilt of those actions which are a cause of carnal movements, indeed even of pollution, and specifically a proximate cause or one gravely influencing; and concerning causes of this kind he writes these things: An exception is made, however, if the aforesaid actions are performed from a cause necessary, useful, or fitting for the soul or body; for then the pollutions arising from them, even foreseen, are not sins, provided consent or danger of it is absent. Thus COMMONLY Silvius, etc., from St. Thomas. But, as is apparent from the texts of Antoninus Diana adduced in the Note, a just cause is supposed to be present in the case. Therefore, the VV. ought to permit us to prefer St. Alphonsus thinking with the COMMON opinion of the Doctors to St. Alphonsus wherever perhaps he appears to depart from his own doctrine and from the common doctrine of others.

3. Spouses do not sin gravely, even if, from touches had without the intention of intercourse, there arises a commotion of the spirits or of the members which serve generation, or a distillation follows, although these things would be mortal sins in the unmarried; the reason is that, apart from the crime of voluntary pollution outside the vessel or of sodomy, nothing is done against the good of matrimony [4]. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 934. - Sanchez, etc. But the light fault which can be present in acts of this kind is easily excused on account of ends intrinsic to matrimony itself or other extrinsic ends, for example, because they are suitable for fostering affection or for calming concupiscence.

[4] Not without reason does the Author either establish or suppose this general principle: that apart from that inordination which is against nature, scarcely anything can intervene among spouses in this matter which can certainly be condemned as a grave fault. For indeed among these or those Authors you will find now these acts, now others, represented as gravely guilty; but in these you have merely certain particular opinions, and these deduced not from solid and certain principles but rather from fanciful apprehensions. Some, namely, have recourse to indecency and baseness, and, conducting the matter almost by exclamations and declamations, proclaim it a horrible, unspeakable, most shameful thing, etc.; as though either the character of sin in general or the gravity of fault were to be sought from the character of indecency in that kind of matter in which even those things which are most licit, indeed commanded, are by the guidance of nature itself to be committed in secrecy and darkness on account of indecency. Others have recourse to the character of unbridled lust; as though lust does not show itself most unbridled in that in which the end of marriage is consummated, or as though matrimony was not also instituted for this reason, that it might be a remedy for unbridled lust (see St. Thomas above in the Note to no. 908); or as though matrimony could be a remedy for lust otherwise than that the vehement appetite for pleasure be satisfied, with this law alone finally placed upon it, which St. Thomas also intimates (loc. cit.), that it neither run outside legitimate matrimony nor oppose the end of nature! And certainly, unless sin is committed against one or the other of these, a solid reason on account of which any other inordination can certainly be accused of grave sin nowhere clearly appears.

With this principle therefore established, as is fitting, a most expeditious method is supplied to the Confessor, both to provide for the sanctity of the Sacrament and for the salvation of penitents.

For the sanctity of the Sacrament requires that discourse concerning these things not be introduced unless necessity urges; whence it follows that the Confessor ought to be most averse to investigating these things and consequently to employ scarcely any question besides perhaps this general one: whether any scruple in any way keeps the mind anxious; yet even this ought not to be asked without cause. Nevertheless, it is necessary that he reply if he is questioned. But that the reply may be most expeditious and may so satisfy necessity that, out of reverence for the Sacrament, it does not touch what ought not to be touched, nothing will be more apt than the proposed norm.

The salvation of penitents then requires it; for they certainly can be distressed by scruples, and indeed concerning acts of this kind which the mind shrinks from expressing in words and concerning which the Confessor ought never to ask. But for removing all scruples and, together with them, the necessity of expressing those things which can neither be named by penitents nor ought to be by the Confessor, the proposed norm is most useful. For once it is signified to the penitent that, where nothing is positively opposed to the end of matrimony or generation, nothing is had among spouses in this matter which is a mortal sin, and therefore which is necessary matter of Confession, although light faults can intervene for various causes, it is apparent that all the aforesaid inconveniences are most effectively met.

The inconveniences regarding the past are met; for as soon as the penitent has confessed generally, as usually happens first, that he has offended in some respect in this matter, while the Confessor by means of a generic question has learned that, in the persuasion of the penitent, something grave intervened, then, cutting off at once every other investigation, he will easily settle the matter, being content, namely, with a general confession either of a sin against nature, if either of the aforesaid was present, or generally of grave guilt against conscience; and, having asked the number if there is need, he will judge that the necessity of confession has been satisfied.

The inconveniences regarding the future are met, both because, when that norm is employed, the danger of sinning gravely solely on account of an erroneous conscience is averted, and because an easy manner of confessing is handed down to penitents if they need it. And as regards light faults, there are three things concerning which the penitent can usefully be admonished: 1. that the spouse who cannot refuse certain things without offense to the other is excused from these faults when he or she conducts himself or herself in a somewhat passive manner, namely, not demanding them but merely consenting or permitting them; 2. where this excuse is not present and the penitent prefers to confess these light faults (for it is not necessary to confess venial sins), an entirely general formula of some light fault in performing the conjugal office is to be used in confession, nor is it ever to be specified what kind those acts were; for the sanctity of the Sacrament and the danger inherent in this matter altogether require that only what is sufficient be expressed and nothing superfluous; 3. if perhaps the penitent falls in with a Confessor so imprudent that he asks something further by investigating, the penitent can, indeed ought, modestly to reply that there is nothing which he adds concerning that matter.

Since discourse has now arisen concerning the necessary caution of the Confessor regarding this matter, it is well to subjoin here what the dignity and sanctity of the Sacrament dictates should be answered to a woman soon to marry and very solicitous to avoid every sin in conjugal offices, who questions the Confessor about this matter. Gobat, after others, replies to this question thus (Experimental Theology, tract 10, case 17, nos. 648, 649): If a girl of this kind has a mother surviving, she should be commanded in kindly words to question her mother rather than the Confessor (or also other women related in any degree, Burghaber adds).... If she lacks a mother, or out of modesty does not dare to ask her, let it be said to her that she should obey her husband as her head even in those matters. If he perhaps seeks something concerning which she doubts whether it is licit, let her modestly beg to be excused; if by begging she accomplishes nothing, because the husband asserts that he already knows what the laws of marriage permit, then let her obey, certain that she will not offend God while in doubt she obeys her husband as her superior; then, at the next opportunity, let her herself ask the Confessor whether that in which she obeyed is licit for spouses or not.

920. ○ 4. A wife who excites herself by touches to seminal emission immediately after intercourse in which the husband alone emitted semen does not sin gravely; indeed, according to the more common and more probable opinion, she does not sin even lightly: 1. because the seminal emission of the woman pertains to completing the conjugal act, so that the spouses may properly be one flesh; and just as the wife can prepare herself by touches for intercourse, so also can she complete it; 2. because if women after such irritation were bound to restrain their natural movements, they would be continually exposed to great danger of sinning. - St. Ligorius, no. 919.

5. Touches of oneself from venereal pleasure, while the other spouse is absent, according to the opinion of many cannot be excused from grave sin even when pollution or proximate danger of it is excluded. The reason is that a spouse does not have the right of using his or her own body in order to fulfill pleasure with oneself, but only in order to intercourse. - Lacroix, no. 339, etc.; St. Ligorius, no. 936. - Nevertheless not a few others cited by St. Alphonsus himself say that, when danger of pollution is excluded, this does not exceed venial fault. St. Alphonsus judges the first opinion more probable and to be counseled [5].

[5] When St. Alphonsus says that this opinion is to be counseled, he in no way signifies that the opinion concerning grave guilt in these acts is to be instilled into penitents by the Confessor; for he openly and vehemently rebukes and condemns (see Note to no. 152, vol. 1) those who instill a consciousness of mortal sin where they are not most certain of the matter. St. Alphonsus therefore intends this alone: that penitents are to be deterred with the greatest care from acts of this kind. Concerning this question Andreas Mendo is to be seen (Statera Opinionum, dissertation 5, question 19), where for the opinion denying grave guilt in these acts he reports ad hominem arguments (no. 152) to which it is certainly difficult to give a fitting reply.

6. Morose delight concerning intercourse which has been had or is to be had remotely, with danger of pollution excluded, according to the common opinion is only a venial sin. 1. It is some sin, because in this pleasure not referred to proximate intercourse an inordination is found, since an honorable end is lacking and the genital spirits are moved in vain, at least inchoatively. 2. It does not exceed venial sin, because, since intercourse is licit of itself for spouses, it cannot be gravely illicit to delight in it [6]. But a simple thought about these things to be had or already had is not illicit. - St. Ligorius, no. 937. - Voit, no. 110. - Indeed, neither desire for future intercourse nor approval of past intercourse is illicit of itself, because desire for a licit thing cannot be illicit. - See Cases, no. 1102.

[6] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 937) adduces for this matter that saying of St. Thomas (On Evil, question 15, article 2, reply to objection 17): Delights in goodness and malice follow the delightful operations; and therefore, just as carnal union is not a mortal sin for a married person but is a mortal sin for an unmarried person, so also there is a similar difference concerning delight and consent to delight. For consent to delight cannot be a graver sin than consent to the act, as is apparent through Augustine.

But this argument proves not only that consent to delight (for this is what morose delight means) is not mortal, but that it is not even a venial sin. And the reason adduced by the Author also leads directly to this, namely, that it cannot be gravely illicit to delight in a licit thing; for why will it be illicit in any degree to delight in a licit thing when, as St. Thomas says, the goodness or malice of delight is derived from the good or evil thing in which one delights? See the things adduced from St. Thomas concerning morose delight in the Note to no. 169, vol. 1.

 The VV. transcribe (page 827) the sixth Resolution of the Author, to which this Note is appended, and add: Yet these things, reported with sufficient fidelity from St. Alphonsus, do not please Father Ballerini; hence he attempts to demonstrate that the aforesaid opinion is entirely opposed to the doctrine of St. Thomas and consequently to the authority of St. Alphonsus himself invoking the Angelic Doctor. Then, having copied this Note of ours, the VV. subjoin (page 828): With these things set forth, it is fitting to examine what must be thought concerning the aforesaid doctrine of Father B. But afterward the VV. omitted to say what must be thought concerning the present Note.

It will therefore be useful to observe here that the Note is not referred to the doctrine of the Author or of St. Alphonsus, but to the reason or argument by which they wished to prove that delight of this kind is not a grave sin. For, as is manifestly shown in the Note, delight in an honorable act of itself can be illicit neither gravely nor lightly. Therefore some guilt must be derived from elsewhere. Hence Gury repeats the fault because an honorable end is lacking and the genital spirits are moved in vain, at least inchoatively. This reason brings the matter to this point: that if some honorable end or just cause of the delight perceived from a conjugal act thought about were present, even that venial guilt could now be absent, and consequently guilt would be absent from the carnal movements arising beyond the intention, since in the case (see above, Note to no. 919, resolution 2) they would be permitted for a just cause.

§ II. On Onanism in Particular

921. ◦ Onanism consists in this: that a man, after intercourse has begun, withdraws himself before seminal emission and sheds the semen outside, in order to impede generation. Everyone sees of himself that this is to indulge lust and at the same time to be unwilling to assume the burdens of matrimony.

It takes its name from Onan, the second son of the patriarch Judah, who, after the death of his brother Her, was compelled according to custom to marry his widow Tamar, that he might raise up seed for his brother; but going in to his brother's wife, he spilled his seed upon the ground, lest children should be born in his brother's name. And therefore the Lord struck him, because he did a detestable thing. Genesis 38:9, 10.

922. Statements. - I say I. Voluntary onanism is always a mortal sin, as being against nature, and therefore it can never be licit for spouses. The reason is: 1. because it plainly fights against the primary end of matrimony, and of itself tends toward the extinction of society, and therefore overturns the natural order; 2. because it was strictly prohibited by the Supreme Legislator and Author of nature, as is gathered from the text of Genesis just related; 3. it is moreover established from proposition 49 condemned by Innocent XI, which reads thus: Mollities is not prohibited by natural law.... Hence thus: Onanism is true and properly so-called mollities, or pollution outside the licit use of matrimony; therefore, etc. This is confirmed by several Decisions of the Sacred Penitentiary and the Holy Office, to be reported below under nos. 927, 928, and 929.

I say II. An onanistic husband can never be excused from grave sin, and therefore is never to be absolved unless he sincerely grieves for his sin and proposes to avoid it in the future. The reason is apparent from what has been said.

I say III. A wife can be excused from sin if, for a grave cause, she renders the debt to an onanistic husband, provided that she does not inwardly assent to his sin and outwardly shows her repugnance by serious admonitions or other signs of displeasure. The reason is: 1. because she attends to a licit thing and uses her right, of which she cannot be deprived on account of the malice of the husband; nor does she properly cooperate in the sin of another, since she conducts herself only passively, and the intrinsically evil action consists only in the act of the husband then withdrawing against the order of nature; 2. because she is not bound by charity to impede the sin of her husband with grave inconvenience to herself; 3. because it is apparent from the responses by which the Sacred Penitentiary declared that a woman of this kind is not to be disturbed. - See the decisions to be reported below under no. 931.

923. Resolutions. - 1. A woman sins gravely who induces a man to abuse matrimony even indirectly or tacitly, for example, by complaining about the number of children, the labors of childbirth, or the education of the children, or by repeatedly saying that she will die in the next childbirth, etc. A fortiori, she sins gravely if, against the will of her husband, she withdraws herself from intercourse begun before seminal emission.

2. Likewise, a woman sins gravely by inwardly consenting to the detestable action of her husband [1], even if outwardly she shows repugnance. For sin must always be held in hatred.

[1] Understand this if she approves the evil work itself and rejoices in it as such in itself. For an inefficacious complacency not concerning the evil work in itself, but only concerning an effect which follows from it, does not of itself contain guilt, as all the Doctors establish in the Treatise On Sins. See vol. 1, no. 173, resolution 4. And this must be carefully observed, lest a wife be vexed without cause who, while she efficaciously detests the crime of her husband (and the efficacy of this detestation is proved from the fact that, if the option were given her, she would never will this abuse), could otherwise rejoice in immunity from the inconveniences and dangers which accompany gestation, childbirth, etc.

3. A wife is bound, at least ordinarily, to admonish an onanistic husband concerning the obligation of acting rightly, and, insofar as lies in her, to turn him away from a perverse manner of acting. Nor is it sufficient that she has admonished him once, but she ought sometimes to repeat the admonitions, unless she is certain that a new admonition will profit nothing. Nevertheless, even then she ought in some manner to manifest her repugnance, lest she appear willingly to consent to the sin of her husband. - Thus commonly, and the Sacred Penitentiary, when consulted, replied in this manner.

4. It will also be the duty of the wife to move her husband by caresses, various signs of love, entreaties, and exhortations either to complete the act rightly or to abstain from it altogether [2]. Experience establishes that very many onanistic husbands, thus drawn by their wives, have returned to better conduct.

[2]  This abstinence will be all the less grave and troublesome to the husband, and therefore the wife will be able to obtain it from her husband all the more easily, when the spouses know that it is not necessary that abstinence of this kind be perpetual, and when, on the contrary, they have ascertained that not even prolonged abstinence is finally demanded of them. And certainly it is usually almost this cause which impels to this unspeakable abuse: that parents bear it ill if they must be burdened with more numerous offspring. But after more accurate studies of physiology, it is now established that there are fixed times in which the effect of generation can or cannot be hoped for from conjugal intercourse; and it is now held as ascertained that this effect cannot be hoped for from the fourteenth day after menstruation has begun until the end of the following period, that is, until the next recurrence of menstruation. Therefore, since it is clear that, in comparison with the most grave evil which is evident in continual abuse of matrimony against nature, and therefore in that perpetual state of sin in which the husband lies immersed, the inconvenience of that moderate abstinence which suffices for averting so great an evil and at the same time provides both for the infirmity of the flesh and for a just fear of more numerous offspring can and ought to appear lighter even to the husband himself, one certainly must not despair or doubt that the solicitous care of a pious wife will lead her husband to sounder counsels. Moreover, if it is licit for spouses by the common consent of both to observe perpetual continence; if it is licit for spouses to observe continence and defer the consummation of matrimony for twenty or thirty years, or even until that age at which no hope of offspring now remains; and again, if for another legitimate end of matrimony, although every hope of offspring is absent, it is nevertheless licit for a just cause and with the order of nature preserved to use conjugal rights, both when the wife labors under certain sterility and when on account of advanced age she has become altogether incapable of conceiving; what, finally, prevents spouses from observing continence for the end stated above according to the aforesaid norm and limits? Or by what law, finally, shall we say that they are bound to have intercourse at another time?

924. Questions. - QUESTION 1. How ought the Confessor to conduct himself with spouses who are entirely silent concerning the use of matrimony?

Reply. This difficulty of daily practice is not so easily resolved, especially in our times, in which the plague of onanism rages everywhere. Hence the manner of acting among Confessors varies. Some judge that spouses ought generally to be questioned concerning the use of matrimony, because the abuse of matrimony is most common, nor in a matter so opposed to the law of nature can good faith ordinarily be presumed. Others, on the contrary, think that all questions are entirely to be omitted, because spouses, although in reality guilty of onanism, are perhaps in good faith, and when this has been expelled they will nevertheless continue in the depraved habit of sinning; and therefore they will no longer be capable of absolution and will be excluded from receiving the Sacraments. We judge that one must recede from both these extremes and follow a middle way. For, on the one hand, in a matter so difficult and dangerous it is by no means fitting that the Confessor propose numerous and minute questions to married persons. Indeed, unless there is grave probability that the penitent is stained by a sin of this kind, he ought to preserve profound silence. On the other hand, the Confessor cannot always abstain from every question, since by reason of his office as judge he ought of himself to procure the integrity of the confession whenever he gravely suspects that the penitent is not satisfying his obligation [3]. Nor should you say that the Confessor is excused from the obligation of questioning by reason of the most grave inconvenience which occurs in the present case; for penitents can generally be questioned without so great an inconvenience if he proceeds cautiously and prudently, for example, by inquiring in a general manner whether anything stings the conscience concerning the sanctity of matrimony. But if they deny it, generally they are not to be pressed by further questioning. This doctrine is confirmed by a recent Decision of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition on May 21, 1851. For it had been asked what theological note the following proposition merited: It is never expedient to question spouses of either sex concerning this matter (onanism), even if it is prudently feared that the spouses, whether the husband or the wife, abuse matrimony. The reply was: The proposition, as it stands, is false, too lax, and dangerous in practice. - See below, no. 930.

[3] This reason is of little efficacy in this place. For either the Confessor supposes that the penitent is in good faith, and according to the things premised by the Author himself the reason of procuring the integrity of Confession does not require that the penitent be disturbed from good faith; or he doubts the good faith of the penitent, and then, since the question does not concern sins whose omission can be attributed to forgetfulness, the questioning will easily turn out either harmful, if the penitent was in good faith, or useless, if in bad faith the penitent preserves silence concerning that matter. On this argument see Frassinetti in Dissertation X, cited elsewhere, Dell'integrita della Confessione.

925. ○ QUESTION 2. Can a wife seek the debt from an onanistic husband?

Reply. More probably, affirmatively, for a grave cause, for example, if she herself is exposed to danger of incontinence; because she has a right to intercourse and is excused from the sin of cooperation. Thus St. Ligorius, no. 947 [4]. The Major Penitentiary, Cardinal de Gregorio, likewise declared this in an admonition concerning the aforesaid responses of the Sacred Penitentiary, although he adds that the Sacred Penitentiary refused to give a decision concerning this matter.

[4] Behold the opinion of St. Alphonsus: The wife will have a just cause for seeking if she herself were in danger of incontinence, or if she would otherwise have to be deprived of her right of seeking more than once or twice, with a perpetual scruple whether it is a sufficiently grave inconvenience for her to contain herself then or not. See the things said in a similar case, book 2, no. 53, at "But if." This other passage of St. Alphonsus explains his mind even more clearly. And the Confessor ought to observe these things well, so that he may know when there is occasion for declaring the obligation and when occasion is given him only for employing counsels and exhortations.

926. ○ QUESTION 3. Does a wife sin by furnishing internal consent to the pleasure when she can permit the conjugal act to an onanistic husband?

Reply. Negatively, provided that she does not furnish assent to the sin of her husband. The reason is that, since she does not sin at all by permitting an act of this kind, neither does she sin by admitting the pleasure arising from it, although she foreknows that the husband will not complete intercourse; for that act is honorable and licit in itself for the woman, and it is not owing to her that it is not completed in the due manner. - See Cases, no. 1104.

Decisions — Of the Sacred Congregations concerning Onanism

927. FIRST CONSULTATION. - The Bishop of N. most humbly petitions for the solution of this doubt:

1. Can a woman be absolved who indeed would suffer her husband if he acted rightly in conjugal intercourse, but vehemently desires that the husband withdraw himself because that woman fears having offspring?

2. Can a woman be absolved who, in conjugal intercourse, could by her caresses obtain from her husband that he not withdraw himself, and does not do so because that intercourse displeases her?

RESPONSE. - The Sacred Penitentiary, having weighed the doubts proposed by the Venerable Father in Christ, the Bishop of N., replied: Negatively. Given at Rome in the Sacred Penitentiary on May 27, 1847.

928. SECOND CONSULTATION. - It is asked of the Apostolic See what theological note the following three propositions merit, namely: 1. For honorable reasons it is licit for spouses to use matrimony in the manner in which Onan used it. 2. It is probable that this use of matrimony is not prohibited by natural law. 3. It is never expedient to question spouses of either sex concerning this matter, even if it is prudently feared that the spouses, whether the husband or the wife, abuse matrimony.

RESPONSE. - The Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, May 21, 1851. To the first: The proposition is scandalous, erroneous, and contrary to the natural law of matrimony. To the second:

The proposition is scandalous, erroneous, and otherwise implicitly condemned by Innocent XI in proposition 49 (see this proposition above, no. 922). To the third: The proposition, as it stands, is false, too lax, and dangerous in practice.

929. THIRD CONSULTATION. - The petition of the Most Illustrious Lord Bouvier, Bishop of Le Mans, concerning the manner of acting of Confessors with spouses in relation to onanism.

Most Blessed Father, the Bishop of Le Mans in France, prostrate at the feet of Your Holiness with the greatest reverence, humbly represents the things which follow.

Almost all younger married couples do not wish to have more numerous offspring, and nevertheless are morally unable to abstain from the conjugal act.

When questioned by the Confessor concerning the manner in which they use the rights of matrimony, they commonly tend to be gravely offended; and when admonished, they neither abstain from the conjugal act nor can they be determined to an excessive multiplication of offspring.

Then, murmuring against the Confessors, they abandon the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist, give bad example to their children, servants, and other faithful of Christ; hence a lamentable detriment to Religion arises.

The number of those who approach the sacred Tribunal of Penance in many places decreases from year to year, especially on account of this cause, as most parish priests more conspicuous for piety, learning, and experience acknowledge.

Therefore, many say: How, then, did Confessors act formerly? No more children than today were commonly born from individual marriages, spouses were not more chaste, and nevertheless they did not fail in the precepts of annual Confession and Paschal Communion.

All freely admit that infidelity toward the other spouse and an attempt at abortion are a very great sin. But they can scarcely, indeed scarcely at all, be persuaded that they are bound under mortal sin either to observe perfect chastity in matrimony [5] or to incur the danger of generating innumerable offspring.

[5] This is not to be understood as though there were not many things which certainly are not licit for those who are bound to observe perfect chastity and yet are licit for spouses, even if for some cause they abstain from perfect intercourse, as is apparent from the things said above (see article III, On the Sins of Spouses). Compare also St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 933).

The aforesaid Bishop of Le Mans, foreseeing that enormous evils will arise from this and disturbed by anxiety, solicitously asks of Your Blessedness:

1. Do spouses who so use matrimony as to prevent conception exercise an act morally evil of itself?

2. If the act is to be held as morally evil, can spouses who do not accuse themselves of it be considered as constituted in that good faith which excuses them from grave fault?

3. Is the manner of acting of Confessors to be approved who, lest they offend married persons, do not question them concerning the manner in which they use the rights of matrimony?

930. RESPONSE. - The Sacred Penitentiary, having maturely weighed the proposed questions, replies to the first: Since the whole inordination of the act proceeds from the malice of the husband, who, instead of consummating, withdraws himself and sheds outside the vessel, therefore, if the woman after due admonitions accomplishes nothing, while the husband insists by threatening blows or death, she will be able, as approved Theologians teach, simply to permit it without sin, and this for a grave cause which excuses her; because charity, by which she is bound to impede it, does not oblige with so great an inconvenience.

But to the second and third it replies: Let the aforesaid Confessor recall to mind that adage, holy things are to be treated holily; and let him also weigh the words of St. Alphonsus de Liguori, a man learned and most skilled in these matters, who in The Practice of Confessors, section 4, no. 41, says: But concerning the sins of spouses with respect to the conjugal debt, ordinarily speaking, the Confessor is not bound, nor is it fitting, to question anyone except wives, whether they have rendered it, in the most modest manner possible.... Concerning other matters let him be silent unless he has been questioned. Nor should he omit to consult other approved authors. Given at Rome by the Sacred Penitentiary on June 8, 1842.

931. FOURTH CONSULTATION. - Question. Bertha has a husband whom she knows by constant experience to be an onanist. In vain has she tried every means to withdraw him from so unspeakable a crime. Indeed, most grave or at least grave evils now probably threaten her, so that she must either incur these evils or flee from her husband's house unless she permits the abuse of matrimony at least sometimes, etc.

RESPONSE. - Since in the proposed case the woman indeed does nothing against nature on her own part and attends to a licit thing, while the whole inordination of the act proceeds from the malice of the husband, who, instead of consummating, withdraws himself and sheds outside the vessel; therefore, if the woman after due admonitions accomplishes nothing, while the husband insists, threatening blows or death or other most grave evils, she will be able (as approved Theologians teach) to conduct herself permissively without sin; since in these circumstances she simply permits the sin of her husband, and this for a grave cause which excuses her, because charity, by which she is bound to impede it, does not oblige with so great an inconvenience. Given at Rome in the Sacred Penitentiary on February 1, 1823.

There also exist other responses of the Sacred Penitentiary which are entirely consonant with the preceding; Gousset reports them in the work Justification de Saint Liguori, page 272.

End of the Treatise on Matrimony.

Treatise On Censures

Censures are to be considered both in general and in particular.

Chapter I. On Censures in General

We must treat: 1. of the nature and division of censures; 2. of the principle or author of censures; 3. of the subject of censures; 4. of absolution from censures.

Article I. On the Nature, Division, and Conditions of Censures

I. On the Nature of a Censure

932. ○ A censure is commonly defined thus: It is a spiritual and medicinal penalty by which a baptized man, delinquent and contumacious, is deprived through ecclesiastical power of the use of certain spiritual goods.

It is called: 1. a penalty, because it supposes fault; 2. spiritual, both because it is imposed by spiritual power for the spiritual utility of Christians and because it immediately takes away spiritual goods; 3. medicinal, because it is imposed for this end, that the soul may return to better conduct [1]; 4. upon a baptized man, because those who are not baptized are not subject to the power of the Church, while power is exercised over subjects; 5. delinquent and contumacious, because a penalty is inflicted only upon one who is delinquent, while medicine ought not to be offered except to those whose contumacy needs so great a remedy; 6. is deprived of the use of certain spiritual goods, namely, goods which are subject to the power of the Church, such as public prayers, the Sacraments, etc.

[1] Although the correction of the delinquent is despaired of, a censure can be imposed both in vindication of the offense and lest others be infected by communication with the wicked (Salmanticenses, On Censures, chapter 1, no. 10). Hence, when the end of correction ceases, the other ends do not thereby cease (Coninck, disputation 13, doubt 1, no. 9).

Hence a censure differs: 1. from deposition and degradation, which are not medicinal nor imposed for a time, but only as punishment and permanently; 2. from irregularity, which can be contracted even on account of a defect of mind or body alone, without any fault, and therefore of itself is not a penalty but only a canonical impediment, although, when inflicted on account of certain crimes, it can also have the character of a penalty.

Hence it is also apparent that a censure does not endure perpetually but reaches its end with the amendment of the delinquent; for then he ought to be loosed from the bond of the censure.

Suspension and interdict sometimes assume the nature of a censure and sometimes of a vindicative penalty. But you will recognize them to be a vindicative penalty both if they are imposed on account of a merely past offense and if they are inflicted perpetually or even for a determinate time, for example, for two or three months [2].

[2] Therefore, one who violates interdicts or suspensions of this kind does not incur irregularity.

II. Division of Censures

933. ○ Various censures are distinguished, namely:

1. Excommunication, suspension, and interdict, concerning which we shall speak specifically.

2. Censures latae sententiae or ferendae sententiae, according as the Superior establishes that they are to be incurred by the very fact by which someone violates the law, or are to be inflicted only after the sentence of an ecclesiastical judge.

3. Censures imposed a iure or ab homine, according as they are imposed after the manner of a judicial mandate or precept, whether upon one or upon several. If a censure affects determinate persons, it is particular; but if it is imposed generally and without determination of persons, it is general [3].

[3] These things are somewhat obscure. Suarez speaks more clearly (On Censures, disputation 3, section 1, no. 2): A man can impose a censure in two ways. In one way, by making a stable and permanent law which obliges under this penalty, which its transgressors incur by the very fact. In another way, a man can impose a censure by pronouncing a sentence or by commanding something in a singular action or business, in which no right or permanent statute is established, but a transitory mandate. Therefore, when a censure is imposed in the first manner, it is said to be a iure, because ... such a censure is now contained in the law itself. But when a censure is imposed in the latter manner, it retains, as it were, the common name and, almost by antonomasia or accommodation, is called a censure ab homine. And in this sense that division is common among all theologians and canonists.

But they differ from one another in two ways. For: 1. a censure imposed a iure, when the author who imposed it dies, persists after the manner of all laws. But one imposed ab homine, since it depends upon his jurisdiction and authority, ceases when these cease through his death or removal from office. Understand this to mean that it is no longer incurred; for if someone has incurred it, the bond is removed only by absolution. 2. A censure imposed a iure can never be imposed for past offenses; but a censure ab homine is imposed not only for future offenses but also for past ones, for their satisfaction and correction (Schmalzgrueber, book 5, title 39, no. 9).

Moreover, a twofold mode of censures ab homine is usually distinguished, namely: 1. by way of mandate, when a Prelate mandates or commands something; or prohibit something with the sanction of a censure annexed; and this mode regards future actions, as is apparent; 2. by way of sentence, when a judgment is instituted concerning some fact and a sentence is pronounced judicially, namely by imposing a censure, etc.; and this mode regards a past fact.

But either mode can be such that the censure is particular, namely, concerning some particular fact or certain persons, or general, which is imposed without determination of any singular fact or at least of a person.

St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 6) thinks that the censures which a Bishop imposes in a diocesan Synod are to be held as imposed by way of statute, and therefore, as imposed a iure, persist after the death of the Bishop; but those imposed outside the Synod are imposed ab homine and therefore cease through the death of the one imposing them.

4. Reserved or non-reserved censures, according as the Superior has reserved absolution from them to himself or has permitted ordinary Ministers to absolve from them. Some are reserved to the Pope, while others are reserved to Bishops. Censures ab homine are always judged reserved unless they have been imposed by a general sentence.

5. Notorious or occult censures, according as it is publicly established that someone has incurred them on account of a fact which is so known that it can no longer be concealed, or otherwise.

6. Just or unjust, valid or invalid censures, according as the Superior has or has not consulted justice, truth, and law in imposing the censure.

III. Conditions of Censures

934. ○ For the validity of a censure it is required that the sin upon which it is inflicted be mortal, external, consummated, not merely past, and joined with contumacy.

1. Mortal; for a censure, since it is a most grave penalty, requires mortal fault [4].

[4] It is the common opinion of the Doctors, as can be seen in St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 30) and Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 59), that some light censure, for example, minor excommunication, some light suspension, or some light personal interdict, can be imposed on account of light fault. St. Alphonsus adds, if the censure is imposed for a brief time; but then it will not properly be a censure, but a certain disqualification, as was said above, no. 932. Moreover, the Author speaks of major excommunication and of suspension and interdict as they are commonly imposed, namely, from every use; these, according to the common opinion of all, cannot be imposed on account of light fault. Nevertheless, a fault must be understood as light when it is such both in itself and by reason of the end; for the character or end gravely intended, or scandal or danger, can cause a thing light of itself nevertheless to be capable of a grave precept. See Suarez (On Censures, disputation 4, section 6, no. 12), Lugo (On Justice and Right, disputation 16, no. 61), Lessius (book 2, chapter 12, no. 54), Sanchez (On the Decalogue, book 7, chapter 21, nos. 28, 29).

2. External; for the Church judges in the external forum, to which censures pertain, and not concerning merely internal things [5].

[5] Not only must the sin be external, but also grave by reason of the external act.

3. Consummated in deed, in its own genus [6]; because penal laws are to be interpreted strictly according to the rule of Law: It is fitting that odious things be restricted and favors amplified. - Except where the legislator expresses the contrary. external sin on account of which the censure is to be contracted must be complete in its own genus according to the proper meaning of the words which are contained in the precept or law. To this pertains the rule that, for a censure to be incurred, that effect which the legislator intends to prohibit under censure must be complete. Therefore, if the words, carefully inspected, signify that the ultimate effect is prohibited, for example, homicide, the censure is not incurred unless that final effect follows, namely, death. But when the action itself or the attempt is principally prohibited under censure, then, when it has been posited, the censure is immediately incurred even if the effect does not follow. See Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 1, question 1, point 4, nos. 12, 13) and Croix (book 7, no. 59).

[6] Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 64) proposes this condition more clearly, so that it needs no exceptions: In order that a censure be incurred, the sin

But according to the more probable opinion, one who has revoked counsel or a mandate before execution does not incur the censure (Suarez, On Censures, disputation 44, section 5, no. 13; St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 40). But regarding one who, although he wished and attempted, was unable to signify the revocation of the counsel or mandate to the mandatary or executor, or who repents after the cause, for example of death, has been posited but before the effect which he could not impede has followed, according to the opinion of Cardinal de Lugo (On Penance, disputation 16, no. 453) and Suarez (On Sins, disputation 3, section 4, nos. 3, 7, 8), it is certain that he incurs the censure; nor does there appear to be any force in the reason which St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 40, and book 4, no. 149) brings to the contrary from the Salmanticenses.

 1. Against this Note the VV. write fourteen columns (pages 841-848), and they contend two things (pages 846, 847), namely: 1. that Suarez in no way holds the opposite opinion and is in no way opposed to St. Alphonsus; 2. that Lugo hands down an entirely singular doctrine.

2. And as regards the first point, the VV. restrict the question to those things which Suarez discusses (On I-II, tract 5, On Sins, disputation 3, section 4), where he asks at what time someone is judged to sin by a sin of omission; and the VV. transcribe almost that entire disputation throughout four columns (pages 844-846). But there are two things upon which they insist. First, when Suarez (no. 7) premises: You will ask whether it can happen that the will which is the cause of the omission as such is a fault, and yet the omission which afterward follows is in no way a sin; for example, if someone, before the omission follows, repents of the prior fault and of the cause given, but nevertheless cannot impede the effect; he replies to this question (no. 8) that each manner of speaking is probable. Hence the VV. (page 846) conclude, as it appears, that the opinion of St. Alphonsus was probable to Suarez. Second, the VV. observe (page 846) that although Suarez affirms that the guilty person, however penitent, can justly be punished, nevertheless this is said only concerning irregularity and not concerning excommunication. For thus Suarez says (loc. cit., no. 7): However much that man afterward repents, he is justly punished on account of that act and remains irregular; therefore that exterior act has the character of sin. But the VV. there give this reason for the distinction which they devise for the present matter between irregularity and censure: that irregularity is a vindicative penalty ..., but the penalty of excommunication is medicinal. And concerning this latter they subjoin: If (the penitent guilty person) did what he could and was unable to impede the execution, he does not incur excommunication, because contumacy, which is necessarily required for incurring every censure, is absent.

3. Reply to the first. That Suarez says each manner of speaking is probable concludes nothing at all for the case of the VV. For the question concerns a mere denomination; and, as the same Suarez (no. 3) had said, perhaps the disagreement concerns the name. But otherwise, as the VV. themselves acknowledge, whether that omission of which there is question is called a sin or is not called a sin, the opinion of Suarez is certain that the guilty person is justly punished for that omission. Therefore, the VV. insist in vain upon these probable manners of speaking when the penalty is inflicted not probably but certainly.

4. Reply to the second. That Suarez, when he says that the guilty person is nevertheless justly punished, ought to be understood concerning irregularity alone and not concerning the penalty of excommunication is manifestly false. For in the preceding things (no. 3) Suarez openly indicates that, in the case, if the omission had truly followed and if the penalty of excommunication or irregularity had been imposed upon such omission, the guilty person would incur it. Therefore, when he afterward (no. 7) names only irregularity, he does this merely by way of example and not to the exclusion of other penalties and consequently of censures, if any have been imposed upon an omission of this kind.

5. But the reason on account of which the VV. say that in the case the guilty person, if he repents of the cause posited, indeed incurs irregularity but not excommunication, finally rests only upon a preposterous notion of the contumacy necessary for incurring censures, which notion they then gratuitously fasten upon Suarez. For contumacy in the present question does not consist in this, that after violating a law commanding under censure someone perseveres in the same evil will, but entirely in this, that someone knowingly and willingly has contemned the law and the censure by disobeying. Reiffenstuel aptly says (book 5, title 39, no. 14): When it is said that contumacy is required for incurring a censure, it is not to be understood as though express and formal contumacy were required; for virtual contumacy and interpretative contempt of the Church suffice, CONSISTING IN THIS: THAT SOMEONE KNOWS THAT SOMETHING IS PROHIBITED UNDER CENSURE BY A LAW OR BY A LEGITIMATE ECCLESIASTICAL SUPERIOR, AND NEVERTHELESS PRESUMES TO DO IT. Nor does Suarez speak otherwise (On Censures, disputation 4, section 3, no. 10): If the law commands absolutely and imposes a censure against transgressors, then that voluntariness which suffices for sinning deliberately and in a human manner against that law and for contumacy toward the censure is sufficient for incurring such a penalty imposed by the law itself. This rule appears manifest from the terms; because just as that law absolutely prohibits such an offense, so it absolutely pronounces the censure; therefore by force of such a law no more, nor another mode, of voluntariness is required for incurring the censure than for sinning against the law itself. Therefore, just as it does not pertain to the character of sin that the sinner afterward persevere in the evil will, so neither is anything more required for incurring the censure than contumacious disobedience in transgressing the law itself.

6. But there is no need to dwell upon more things when we have the present question resolved by Suarez no less than by Lugo and others. For, discussing (On Censures, disputation 20, section 3, no. 16) one who has an obligation to pay a pension within a month, and is now at the beginning of the month able to pay but, caring nothing about payment of the pension, spends everything and thus becomes unable to pay, he establishes these things: I say, therefore, that this man is not excused from incurring excommunication if, after the prescribed term has elapsed, he does not pay the required pension. The reason a priori is that he truly acts against the precept and consequently is contumacious; just as one who renders himself unable to recite acts against the precept concerning reciting the office.

7. But that he is not excused from incurring the censure however much he repents, Suarez continues and explains thus (no. 17): But it must be recalled that in cases of this kind one time is that at which the offense is committed before God, and another that at which excommunication is incurred. For someone commits the offense at the time at which he becomes unable to pay according to the appointed term; but he does not incur excommunication until that term itself actually ends with the obligation unfulfilled, because the censure is not contracted until the omission of the precept has been externally consummated. But although the cause of the omission was posited earlier, and therefore the offense was then especially committed, nevertheless the omission itself was not consummated until the appointed term; and therefore until that time excommunication is not incurred, from which inability cannot then excuse him; because, since this inability was voluntary, it does not render the omission involuntary, but LEAVES IT SINFUL AND CONTUMACIOUS BY FORCE OF THE PRIOR CAUSE, EVEN IF PERHAPS IT NOW DISPLEASES HIM, WHICH IS NOT SUFFICIENT TO IMPEDE EXCOMMUNICATION.

8. But Suarez had explained in the place cited above (On I-II, On Sins, disputation 3, section 4, no. 8) how it can happen that even by the penalty of excommunication one is punished as guilty who has already been touched by sorrow for his sin, where he establishes that an omission culpable in its cause is better called a sin, even if the guilty person, before the omission itself follows, has so repented that he is now constituted in grace, as certain persons (ibid., no. 7) objected to the contrary: It ought to be said, says Suarez, that the PENALTY is imposed upon the external action not only because it is a sin when it occurs, but because it is culpable of itself and has an evil will as its cause, even if accidentally it should happen not to be a sin on account of a change of will; but perhaps those things would more properly be called sins because they proceed from a free and defective cause insofar as one is bound to avoid them. Nor does the subsequent will matter, because it is not the principle of the omission which follows, but another prior will which preceded. But the external action or omission is denominated a sin from the will from which it proceeds; hence at the same time the same omission both is willed as an effect by the will which is its cause and is unwilled after the manner of an object; and the first will is "I will"; the second is "I would not will the effect to follow." To the confirmation I reply that this omission has a twofold relation: one to the preceding depraved will, of which it is the effect; the other to the present circumstances and will; and as such it receives diverse denominations. Nor is it unfitting that the same external act be denominated good and evil from diverse wills. But the penalty concerning which Suarez speaks here is not irregularity alone, as the VV. said, but also censure, as was shown above.

9. Therefore, let it be concluded that the VV. did not rightly assert that Suarez in no way holds the opposite opinion and is in no way contrary to St. Alphonsus. Let us come to Cardinal de Lugo.

How consonant his doctrine is with those things which we have just reported from Suarez is apparent from the things which he replies (On Penance, disputation 16, no. 445) to those objecting (no. 442) that it can happen that a man is already justified through contrition or confession when the effect of the prior evil will is posited DE NOVO; therefore that effect does not suffice for giving a new denomination of sinner. Lugo therefore replies thus: However much the past will is in fact retracted, nevertheless, if the effect of death afterward follows, he who gave the poison will no less incur irregularity or excommunication, ACCORDING TO THE COMMON OPINION OF ALMOST ALL, than if the will had not been retracted; because through that retraction it is not removed that the effect which followed was voluntary, as proceeding from the will.

10. And a little afterward (no. 446) he adds a clearer explanation thus: That effect (namely, the death which followed from the poison) is voluntary and free denominatively insofar as it had its origin from a prior free will, not insofar as it now depends upon a will not retracted. And the reason is clear:

because denial of retraction does not cause the will now to influence the effect more, nor does retraction cause the will to influence less; for the whole influence on the part of the will was to posit the cause, which it now cannot remove. Therefore, since retraction does not diminish the positing of the cause, nor does the absence of retraction add strength to the cause already posited, it follows that the will influences the subsequent effect in the same manner whether it retracts or does not retract; because it influences in no way according to the present state, but only according to the past state, as it is past.

Hence it is permissible to conclude two things. For: 1. Lugo, as is apparent, testifies that in the case excommunication is incurred according to the common opinion of almost all. What, then, is this which the VV. affirm (page 847), that Lugo here hands down an entirely singular doctrine? 2. Therefore empty is the reason of those who excuse the penitent guilty person from incurring a censure because the effect is not imputable after the cause has been retracted. This reason would indeed prove, contrary to what even St. Alphonsus after others teaches, that not even irregularity is incurred.

11. And this is what Lessius also observes, where he writes (book 2, chapter 13, no. 17): If the revocation of the mandate does not become known to the mandatary, the one mandating is bound, when the effect follows, no less than if he had not revoked; because by force of the mandate the harm was done. Hence he also incurs censures and irregularity if perhaps these have been imposed upon the one mandating. Nor does it matter that he is now in the state of grace; because although such a censure is not contracted except through mortal sin, nevertheless it is not necessary that the fault of that sin then be committed, but it suffices that it has been committed and that its effect or the external work then occur by force of it, as happens in the proposed case.

12. But Coninck (disputation 14, no. 183) had already answered the little reason which the VV. appear to esteem greatly, namely, that the guilty person, employing every diligence to impede the effect, has put off contumacy. Even when, says Coninck, after all diligence of this kind has been employed it nevertheless remains established that the other (the mandatary) was still truly moved by the authority or reasons of the one mandating or counseling to perpetrate the crime ..., in that case, I say, he would truly incur the penalties established for those mandating or counseling such a work; because such penalties are generally established for those who mandate or counsel such a crime when the effect follows; but in this case such persons would truly have done this; therefore they would incur those penalties. Nor does it matter that the one mandating is now truly penitent for having mandated this, or that through contrition or confession he is in the state of grace ...; because, notwithstanding all these things, just as in that case he will truly be the cause of the injury, so he will incur those penalties; just as one who had mandated that a cleric existing elsewhere be mutilated, and afterward, penitent for the deed, contrite and confessed, seasonably sent even twenty messengers to revoke the mandate and impede the crime by any means, however much diligence he employed for this, if nevertheless those messengers, even from pure malice and fraud, failed to notify the revocation to the mandatary, when the effect followed the one mandating would incur excommunication, irregularity, and the obligation of restoring the harm which the cleric suffered, as all acknowledge. Note this: AS ALL ACKNOWLEDGE. How, then, do the VV. write that Lugo here hands down an entirely singular opinion?

13. But the VV. appear to have wished by these words not indeed to deny that the doctrine of Lugo set forth thus far was common to others, but to have ascribed to Lugo another certain portent of doctrine which everyone would truly call altogether singular and at the same time would vehemently marvel at. For they attribute to Lugo that he asserts that excommunication is incurred when the mandate is given; but that the one mandating is freed from excommunication when he repents before the effect follows, and then afterward falls again into excommunication when the effect follows!!! Thus they write (page 847): According to his (Lugo's) opinion, the one mandating or counseling homicide, at the time at which he gives the mandate or counsel, would incur excommunication but not the penalties annexed to excommunication, because the Church does not will to punish him unless the condition of the effect following has been posited. But if meanwhile he performed true penance for the offense committed, he would be freed from the bond of excommunication; nevertheless, when the effect followed, he would incur excommunication DE NOVO, and indeed this time with the annexed penalties. Thus they write.

14. But indeed you will ask: where in Lugo's books did the VV. espy this new monster of doctrine? Yet at hand is the passage of Lugo which the VV. themselves report from disputation 16, On Penance, no. 453. Thus Lugo there: They object secondly: Because the censure is incurred now when the effect is posited, and not before; but this is not incurred except on account of sin; therefore a sin is also posited now. - It is replied by denying the consequent; for the censure is incurred now on account of a past sin which the Church nevertheless does not will to punish unless the condition of the effect following has been posited. Hence it can also happen that a censure is incurred by one who has already been justified from the past sin through contrition or through attrition with the Sacrament, because a censure is a penalty by which the Church can still justly punish a man on account of a past sin. And just as one excommunicated, although justified through contrition, still remains excommunicated until he is absolved, so one who is now contrite can incur excommunication DE NOVO on account of a past sin. And indeed, on account of the censure or reservation, it will sometimes be necessary in confession, only after the effect has followed, to explain also the effect which followed. Thus far Lugo.

How the VV. saw those portents in these words can scarcely be divined. For: 1. Lugo, when he concedes the antecedent of the objection and denies the consequent, thereby affirms that excommunication is not incurred before the effect has followed; how then do the VV. fasten upon Lugo that the censure is incurred when the mandate is given? 2. Lugo expressly says here that excommunication is not removed except through absolution, however much the guilty person has already been justified through contrition; how then do the VV. fasten upon Lugo that through penance the guilty person is freed from that imaginary excommunication and afterward incurs another excommunication when the effect follows? 3. Lugo recalls no other penalty here by which the guilty person is justly punished by the Church except the penalty of censure; how then do the VV. invent penalties annexed to excommunication which Lugo asserts are not incurred when the mandate is given but only after the effect has followed?

But the VV. themselves candidly disclose the origin of these phantasms. For after premising the words above (no. 13), they subjoin: We do not see how this opinion (of Lugo) can be explained otherwise, since he expressly says DE NOVO; namely, the VV. explain that phrase de novo as though it there signifies again. But everyone knows that de novo is also used for newly or anew (see the lexicon under Nove), that is, to designate that which had not occurred before. And indeed one could see that this phrase de novo was employed in this sense in Lugo himself a little before the text adduced (see above, no. 9), where he writes: When the effect of the prior will is posited DE NOVO; for it cannot be understood of an effect posited again, but of an effect newly or only now finally posited. Against these portentous phantasms let it suffice to remember that saying: What can excessive fervor in disputing not do?

15. I would not wish to omit here that those words of the Note under discussion, nor does there appear to be any force in the reason which St. Alphonsus brings to the contrary from the Salmanticenses, are not, I say, our words, but those of John de Dicastillo.

He himself wrote thus concerning this question (On Censures, disputation 1, no. 291): But if, before (the revocation by the one mandating) comes to the knowledge of the mandatary, the latter perpetrates the offense, the one mandating incurs the censures.... Nor does it matter that perhaps he is now in the state of grace; because although a censure and irregularity are not contracted except on account of mortal sin, nevertheless it is not necessary that the fault endure when they are contracted; but it suffices that it has been committed and that the effect or external work then occur by force of that fault, as we said concerning one who wounds unto death, etc. And again (disputation 2, no. 344), where he recalls the opposite opinion: Filliuccius adds that one is excused from a censure to be imposed who, when the appointed term arrives, is sorry for the fault committed. This limitation rightly displeases others; for it matters little that someone is now sorry, provided that he previously gave a sufficient voluntary cause for the omission. For a censure is often incurred even if, at the time of incurring it, someone has already been contrite for the sin and constituted in grace. Thus one who cast a missile at a cleric or administered poison to him, even if he becomes contrite for the sin before the effect follows, incurs excommunication and irregularity, because he voluntarily gave cause for such killing and striking. Let Suarez, etc., be read. But concerning the opposite opinion of Filliuccius, at the end he says most expressly that IT IS PROVED BY NO SUITABLE FOUNDATION.

4. Not merely past; because a censure is a medicinal penalty and therefore cannot be imposed upon those who have already returned to better conduct. Therefore, for a sin to be called merely past in the case, it is necessary that it cease so entirely that it is in no way joined with any present disobedience and contumacy. See St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 54).

5. Joined with contumacy against a law or precept. The reason is that the principal end of a censure is to break obstinacy. - See St. Alphonsus, no. 30 and following [7].

[7] Therefore, it is not sufficient that the sin be contrary to natural or divine law unless it is also contrary to some law of the Church. For through censures contumacy against a law of the Church is punished, and indeed against a Church threatening a censure upon the contumacious.

935. ◦ Resolutions. - 1. One who is excused from grave fault on account of some circumstance is also excused from a censure, although the matter is grave in itself.

2. If something altogether light is commanded under censure, the censure is not incurred, provided that the thing which appears light under some respect does not become grave from another source.

3. A Superior who imposed a censure on account of any grave fault whatever would act imprudently and illicitly, but nevertheless validly; for the end of the Church is to punish only the graver crimes [8].

[8] The Council of Trent (session 25, chapter 3, On Reformation) has these words: Although the sword of excommunication is the sinew of ecclesiastical discipline and very salutary for keeping peoples in their duty, nevertheless it must be exercised soberly and with great circumspection; since experience teaches that, if it is inflicted rashly or for light causes, it is more despised than feared and produces ruin rather than salvation.

4. The excommunication which is said to be imposed upon harmful animals, for example, upon locusts, is not excommunication properly so called, but an adjuration or a prayer made for their destruction, lest they do harm.

5. Likewise, when the dead are said to be excommunicated, this must be understood of a certain execration or declaration of the excommunication which they incurred before death and in which they died [9].

[9] Therefore, absolution imparted to excommunicated persons who have died with signs of repentance is extended directly not to them but to the living, insofar as the latter are released from the obligation not to communicate with the deceased in burial and public prayers. See Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 39).

936. ○ Questions. - QUESTION 1. How is a censure latae sententiae distinguished from a censure ferendae sententiae?

Reply 1. Generally, a censure will be latae sententiae: 1. if the words by which it is expressed exclude the action or ministry of anyone else, for example, if it is imposed with these words: by the fact itself, by the law itself, by that very fact, without another sentence;

2. if the words are in the present or past tense, for example, we excommunicate, we have excommunicated, etc.; 3. if the words are in the imperative mood, for example, let him fall under excommunication, let him remain suspended, interdicted, etc. - St. Alphonsus, no. 7.

Reply 2. But a censure is to be held as ferendae sententiae: 1. if the words by which it is imposed demand the work and ministry of another, for example, let him be excommunicated by the Bishop; 2. if they are only comminatory, for example, we command under threat of anathema, unless something else is gathered from the circumstances; 3. if they express the future tense, for example, he will be excommunicated, he will be an excommunicated person, etc. [10].

[10] If the words are ambiguous, rule 49 of the Law in the Sext can be followed: in doubt concerning penalties, the more benign interpretation is to be made. Common opinion.

937. ○ QUESTION 2. Is one who doubts whether he has incurred a censure to be judged to have incurred it?

Reply. Negatively, whether you doubt that you sinned gravely or that the case falls under the censure. The reason is that, according to the commonly received axiom and the very rule of Law, odious things are to be restricted. Thus commonly. Nevertheless, you incur the censure if the doubt concerns the gravity of the matter itself, both considered in itself and in view of the end, etc. For then this matter is to be regarded as grave, since it is such in the judgment of the Superior who imposed the censure and, moreover, in doubt the presumption favors the Superior. - St. Alphonsus, no. 32; Salmanticenses, chapter 1, no. 207, etc. [11].

[11] For other resolutions according to the diversity of the doubt, see St. Alphonsus (book 7, nos. 67, 68).

QUESTION 3. Is someone bound by a censure which he knows to be manifestly unjust?

Reply. Negatively, whether the Superior, relying upon a false presumption, condemned an innocent person as guilty, or omitted the legal forms, or exceeded the limits of his jurisdiction. - St. Alphonsus, no. 68. - Nevertheless, the danger of error in one's own cause must be carefully avoided [12].

[12] Nevertheless, if it is not publicly established that the censure is null, it must be observed on account of scandal (see St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 68).

938. ○ QUESTION 4. Does ignorance excuse from a censure?

Reply 1. Ignorance of fact certainly excuses, namely, when someone does not know that he is positing an act prohibited under censure. Thus, for example, if someone strikes a priest whom he thinks to be a layman, he does not incur the censure imposed upon those who strike clerics. The reason is that the censure must be known to the sinner in order that he be contumacious. Thus in Canon Law, chapter Si vero aliquis, On the Sentence of Excommunication. - St. Alphonsus, no. 43.

Reply 2. Ignorance of an ecclesiastical law commanding or prohibiting something under censure also excuses. This is evident from the same reasons just given; for one who is ignorant of the law of the Church cannot be called contumacious against the Church, as is apparent from Canon Law, Sext, book 1, title 2, On Constitutions, chapter 2, where it is said: We do not will the ignorant to be bound, provided, however, that the ignorance was not crass or supine. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.

939. ○ QUESTION 5. Does vincible ignorance excuse from a censure?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if it is not gravely culpable; because then the ignorant person cannot be called contumacious against the Church. Thus all.

Reply 2. Negatively, however, if that ignorance is gravely culpable; because then it can be called crass; moreover, crass ignorance does not excuse from a censure, as is evident from the cited Canon Law. - St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 43, and others commonly [13]. Otherwise, however, ignorance does not prevent someone from being contumacious against a law of which he is culpably ignorant. Except, however, if it is said in the decree of censure: whoever shall have done this knowingly, deliberately, rashly [14], whoever shall have presumed, etc. For these words demand a perfect and direct voluntary act and certain knowledge of the censure. - St. Alphonsus, no. 46. Many nevertheless contend that gravely culpable ignorance excuses from a censure, although it does not excuse from mortal sin; because gravely culpable ignorance can exist without therefore having to be called crass.

[13] It is scarcely apparent why St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 45) called this opinion common, when the Salmanticenses, from whom he borrowed this opinion, cite more Authors for the opposite than for it (On Censures, chapter 1, no. 196); indeed Suarez himself (On Censures, disputation 4, section 10, no. 12) admits that other modern authors departed into another opinion. But the reason given by Suarez, if it is to be called a reason, is of no weight. Therefore, nothing ought to prevent someone from safely following the opposite opinion, which the Author presently subjoins.

 Against this little Note the VV. write (page 849): A marvelous argument! As though the Salmanticenses had intended to compile an exact catalogue of Authors! And then, besides the four cited by the Salmanticenses for the opinion of St. Alphonsus, they add Laymann, Bonacina, Bossius, Molina, Salas, Filliuccius, Reginaldus, and Alterius.

Reply. Let the antecedent pass; and I deny the consequent. For the question is whether the opinion of St. Alphonsus is to be called common. Moreover, even after those eight are added, would this opinion be called common? For the Salmanticenses (On Censures, chapter 1, no. 196) cite eight for the opposite, namely, Tanner, Caelestinus, Diana, Henriquez, Peter de Ledesma, Palaus, Sanchez, and Avila. Add also that, among those cited by the VV., Filliuccius (On Censures, chapter 8, no. 262), contrary to what St. Alphonsus holds, supposes ignorance mortally culpable which nevertheless is not crass or supine; add that Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 1, question 2, point 1, no. 10) calls the opinion of Sanchez not improbable, whom St. Alphonsus admits to be opposed to himself. Therefore, even if we insist upon these citations alone, is not number now balanced by number?

But other Authors can easily be added to those cited by the Salmanticenses against the opinion of St. Alphonsus. Thus, for example, Pirhing (book 5, title 39, no. 46), Dicastillo (On Censures, disputation 2, no. 298), Babenstuber (tract 4, disputation 1, article 3, no. 10), Tamburini (Decalogue, book 2, chapter 1, section 7, no. 22), Mazzotta (tract 8, disputation 1, question 2, chapter 3, section 2), Reuter (part 1, nos. 22 and 267), and, lest we seek others, Portellus, Serra, Quintanadvenas, Praepositus, and Barbosa in Diana (volume 5, tract 1, resolutions 33 and 35). Let us conclude, therefore, that the foundation is weak upon which the opinion of St. Alphonsus is called common. But let us come to the reason.

Since it is said in the little Note that the reason brought by Suarez is of no weight, the VV. subjoin (page 850): If someone judges the reasons brought by Suarez and other Authors to be of no weight, there is surely nothing by which he would be prevented from embracing the opposite. But the authority alone of Father B., who does not even adduce those reasons and nevertheless condemns them, is by no means sufficient; for no title is known to us by which he could claim this prerogative for himself.

Reply. Father B. claims no other prerogative for himself except that he advance nothing on his own authority, as he has professed more than once. Accordingly, behold Laymann, who writes concerning this question (book 1, tract 2, chapter 4, no. 5): But it appears to be a question of name. Namely, the entire controversy depends upon the sense in which crass or supine ignorance is taken. On this matter, behold Sanchez (Decalogue, book 1, chapter 16, no. 7), who writes: Vincible ignorance which is not affected is one thing when only mortally culpable, but another when crass or supine. Suarez, on the contrary (On Censures, disputation 4, section 10, no. 12): Every ignorance which suffices for mortal transgression or disobedience is to be called crass or supine.

But how does Suarez prove his thesis? Entirely by this argument (loc. cit.): Other modern Authors ... appear to distinguish degrees in that very ignorance which suffices for mortal sin, so that below a certain degree it is not crass or supine but only vincible, although mortal, and therefore excuses; but beyond that degree it is now crass or supine and does not excuse. But certainly the distinction of such degrees is founded upon no law and can be explained by no reason.

Therefore, the entire force of the argument resides in this: that the distinction of degrees cannot be explained. But does not Suarez himself admit this distinction of degrees? For he himself writes thus (On I-II, tract 2, disputation 4, section 1, no. 14): Because there can be more and less in this negligence, according to this various degrees of this ignorance are customarily distinguished. Hence Laymann also (loc. cit.): I admit this, he says, that among ignorances crass in the mind of Suarez there is a certain latitude, namely, one very crass and altogether supine, another less crass, all of which nevertheless can be mortal. Therefore, since, by Suarez's own admission, various degrees are distinguished among gravely culpable ignorances, to what does his argument finally amount, that the distinction of degrees cannot be explained?

Suarez insists: For who shall say that negligence sufficient for sinning mortally is crass in such a degree, but not in such another; or by what reason can these degrees be discerned?

Reply. Another will answer ad hominem: Who shall say that negligence sufficient for sinning mortally exists in such a degree, but not in such another; or by what reason can these degrees be discerned? Certainly, if it can sometimes be determined when ignorance is grave, and therefore, according to his opinion, crass, it will be possible to determine in the same manner when, among mortal ignorances, as Laymann says, ignorance is very grave and when less grave.

And behold the reason why it was said in the Note that the reason brought by Suarez is of no weight. For, finally, as Laymann says, it is a question of name. And just as it pleased Suarez, on account of that very slight little reason, to define as crass any ignorance however grave, so it seemed to others that only that ignorance should be called crass or supine which was distinguished by some greater gravity. Crass and supine ignorance, says Barbosa (Collections, volume 4, on book 1 of the Sext of the Decretals, title 2, chapter 2, no. 7), is called that which proceeds from THE GREATEST NEGLIGENCE, as happens when someone has employed no diligence or only slight diligence, etc. And from this he proves that Bonacina called the opinion of Sanchez and Navarre not improbable. And as to what Suarez cites for his own purpose from law 15, ff. On Contracting a Purchase, where a supine man is named, as though, namely, every ignorance which does not excuse from a grave obligation, for example, of restitution, were now to be called supine, the gloss explains it thus from other texts of Law: A supine man is one MOST negligent; which is apparent from law 9, ff. On Ignorance of Law and Fact, where it is read (section 2): But ignorance of fact only then does not harm anyone if THE GREATEST negligence is not charged against him. Moreover, does Suarez himself think that it is necessary for grave fault of ignorance that the negligence be the greatest? Hence Sanchez (loc. cit.), after distinguishing mortally culpable ignorance from crass and supine ignorance, well adds: Suarez denies this division, saying that every mortally culpable ignorance is crass or supine.... But I believe this division to be true.

I am led first because crass or supine ignorance is that which proceeds from the extensive fault of the ignorant person, namely, one who has employed no diligence or very slight diligence for knowing. And thus not every negligence, but the greatest, is what can constitute crass ignorance, as I proved from many sources in book 9, On Matrimony, disputation 32, nos. 32 and 33. Hence Valentia very well says that this ignorance exists when the ignorant person, although he could very easily overcome it, employed no diligence. But in order that ignorance be vincible and not excuse from mortal sin, such great negligence is not required; rather, as we shall say according to the mind of all in nos. 34 and 36, it is required that the moral diligence necessary according to the quality of the business was not employed. Secondly, because, in the matter of an unformed confession, the Doctors not to be condemned (Canus, Soto, Henriquez, Bartholomew de Ledesma, Peter de Ledesma, and many others) think that it will be valid when a sin has been tacitly omitted or when a sufficient examination was not previously made from mortal negligence or ignorance, provided that it was not excessively crass or supine. And Soto explains this crass ignorance, from which an unformed confession is rendered altogether invalid, as existing when almost no diligence was employed for recalling sins, which is the definition of crass ignorance. Sanchez draws a third argument from the Doctors, where they say that culpable ignorance perhaps excuses from the excommunication of particular Prelates, provided that it is not crass or supine, but not from censures of the common law. There they plainly speak in the former member of mortally culpable ignorance. For otherwise they would ineptly say that it does not excuse from excommunication of the common law; and still more ineptly would they use the particle perhaps, as though doubting whether it excuses from excommunication by particular Bishops, when it is clearer than the midday light that no excommunication is contracted except on account of mortal fault.

And let these things suffice so that it may be evident that it was not without cause said in the little Note: 1. that it is scarcely apparent why St. Alphonsus called his opinion common; 2. that the reason brought for it by Suarez is of no weight.

[14] Sanchez rightly notes (On Matrimony, book 9, disputation 32, no. 38) that Suarez, who (On Censures, disputation 4, section 10, no. 3) here takes temerity for imprudence by which an ignorant person exposes himself to the danger of acting against the law; for temerity in reality designates an act posited against express knowledge of the law.

And indeed this observation of Sanchez appears to apply equally to affected ignorance; which nevertheless the same Sanchez, less consistently with himself, teaches to excuse in On the Decalogue, book 2, chapter 10, no. 38, but denies to excuse in On Matrimony, book 9, disputation 32, nos. 39, 40. The Doctors also differ on this question, as may be seen also in St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 48), who says that he adheres to the negative opinion as though it were more common; but if you count the Authors cited for each opinion by the Salmanticenses (On Censures, chapter 1, no. 199), you will find more in reality for the affirmative. Hence, whether you consider authority or reasons, concerning which see Roncaglia (On Censures, question 5, chapter 5, question 1, reply 4), Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 1, question 2, part 1, no. 11), and the Salmanticenses (loc. cit.), you conclude that in an uncertain matter the general principle is to be employed, and that one is in possession of the right to enjoy spiritual goods where the opposite is not demonstrated.

 The VV. censure two things in this Note (pages 850-855). First (page 853), just as concerning the preceding Note, they complain that it is said that more Authors are cited by the Salmanticenses for the affirmative opinion than for the negative opinion.

Reply. Do the VV. perhaps think it wrong that readers be warned if at some time a doubt arises whether an argument drawn from authority may perhaps need some critical examination? Indeed, the Salmanticenses expressly cite only ten, and tacitly others in Diana, for the affirmative; but for the negative, seventeen are expressly recalled in St. Alphonsus, and tacitly others in Bossius and the Salmanticenses. But, for example: 1. Kazenberger, namely, the Author of the additions to Sporer, whom St. Alphonsus cites for the negative, writes thus (On Censures, chapter 3, no. 39): It is probable and safe that even affected ignorance in such a case excuses from incurring a censure, as Sporer teaches with Sanchez, Bonacina, and Tamburini, tract 2 on the First Precept of the Decalogue, chapter 5, no. 42. And since Palaus actually holds thus (tract 2, disputation 1, point 18, no. 1), whom St. Alphonsus nevertheless cites for himself, there now accede to the affirmative, besides the Salmanticenses themselves, as St. Alphonsus testifies, Sporer, Kazenberger, Palaus, and in addition Tamburinus (Decalogue, book 2, chapter 1, section 7, no. 27), who are not named by the Salmanticenses. 2. To these must also be added Filliuccius (tract 22, chapter 7, no. 205), who is not well cited by St. Alphonsus for the negative, and with Filliuccius also Tanner and Roncaglia, whom St. Alphonsus rightly numbers among those affirming; and Merolla must also be numbered with these (disputation 1, chapter 2, from no. 645), who treats this controversy more fully and solidly. And this light specimen, without our dwelling longer upon these things, sufficiently shows that it is not futile for Arguments sought from authority to be recalled to some weighing, especially since St. Alphonsus himself indicates that he was moved to prefer the negative opinion by authority rather than by reason, saying: I do not dare call this second opinion (the affirmative) improbable; but I adhere more to the first, at least as the more common.

The other thing which the VV. censure is that it is said in the Note that Suarez is noted by Sanchez because he takes temerity for imprudence; consequently they observe (page 852) that mere imprudence OF ITSELF never induces mortal fault.

Reply. The VV. rightly say, mere imprudence OF ITSELF. But it is not so understood by Suarez, who derives the gravity of this lack of consideration in acting from the dangers into which one acting without consideration casts himself. Hence Sanchez writes thus concerning this matter (On Matrimony, book 9, disputation 32, no. 38): I do not approve what Suarez says ..., where he thinks that one is called a rash violator if, when he has a suspicion or doubt concerning such a law, he employs no diligence to know whether that law exists; because otherwise he rashly exposes himself to the danger of transgressing it, and if it happens that he violates it in reality, he will be called a rash violator. But this does not please me; because although he is called rash, by reason of the danger to which he exposes himself, for contracting mortal fault, nevertheless laws punishing a rash violator demand something more, as I proved. Otherwise every person culpably ignorant of law would then be punished; because every culpable ignorance of law or fact necessarily supposes that some doubt concerning it preceded.

Namely, temerity is sometimes taken for an inconsiderate facility in acting, but sometimes temerity is said to exist when we do something by our own will and apart from the authority of the one commanding. To this pertain the things contained in chapter Eum qui 18, On Prebends, in the Sext: Moreover, so that violent men who by their own authority (or, more truly, temerity) do not fear to occupy ... any ecclesiastical benefices whatever, even if they are not restrained by love of virtue, may at least be restrained by fear of penalty from THE AUDACITY OF THEIR TEMERITY; by that very fact, etc. And this is what Sanchez intends to intimate when he says that laws punishing a rash violator demand something more. Hence Merolla (disputation 1, chapter 2, no. 235) well adds against that interpretation of Suarez: Temerity properly, beyond precipitation and imprudence, requires contempt; for the word rashly properly imports doing something with contempt of the law, and thus it proceeds from that root of pride which refuses to be subject to rule, as St. Thomas, II-II, question 55, article 3, reply to objection 2, and Cajetan there very well teach; he says that this is very much to be noted for interpreting Canons which inflict penalties upon those rashly doing something, and that these are to be understood of this proper temerity. Finally, the VV. by no means ought to despise the words of St. Alphonsus, where he expressly says (book 7, no. 61): TEMERITY REQUIRES TRUE KNOWLEDGE, according to the things said in book 1, no. 174. That citation, however, became fallacious when, after the edition of the year 1757, the order of numbers in book I was changed.

940. ○ QUESTION 6. Does grave fear excuse from a censure?

Reply. Affirmatively, generally speaking. The reason is that ecclesiastical penal laws do not appear to press with so great a rigor. For since ecclesiastical laws themselves cease to oblige where very grave fear presses, the penalty annexed to them must also fall [15]. The difficulty is greater where there is question of precepts of natural law, from fulfilling which grave fear cannot excuse. But even in this case contumacy against the Church is absent. For a censure is not incurred on account of a violation of divine law, but on account of a culpable transgression of ecclesiastical law [16]. - St. Alphonsus, no. 46.

[15] Schmalzgrueber well adds the reason (book 5, title 39, no. 79), that the delinquent thus cannot be held as contumacious and a contemner of ecclesiastical power, since he sins from the infirmity of nature rather than from the malice of an obstinate will.

[16] This doctrine nevertheless has exceptions. Reiffenstuel writes thus concerning the matter (book 5, title 39, no. 34): When observance of a human law appears morally necessary for conserving the public good, or if its violation tends toward contempt of the faith, or of the law, or of ecclesiastical power, one who, from grave fear even of life, transgresses a law placed under censure is not excused from it ...; because, since in such cases no fear excuses from observance of ecclesiastical law ..., so neither does it excuse from the censure.

941. ○ QUESTION 7. Is it required that an admonition of the delinquent precede the censure?

Reply 1. No admonition is required for censures imposed a iure, because the law itself, promulgated and known, sufficiently admonishes the subjects. Thus all [17].

[17] Although a censure a iure is latae sententiae, nevertheless, if the offense is occult, some juridical admonition or citation is prerequisite for denouncing or declaring someone contumacious as bound by the censure. Otherwise the declaration will be neither licit nor valid.

But when a censure a iure is ferendae sententiae, St. Alphonsus indeed holds as more probable against several others (book 7, no. 55) that no admonition is prerequisite. But it must be said candidly both that the Authors cited by him are adduced beside the point and that his opinion is fortified by no solid reason.

 Against the second part of this little Note the VV. oppose eighteen full columns (pages 853-863). They contend that St. Alphonsus both rightly cited for his opinion the Authors whom he adduces and fortified it with most weighty reasons. For clarity of the matter, please retain the state of the question treated in the little Note, namely, when a censure A IURE IS FERENDAE SENTENTIAE; and thus let us come at once to the first head.

St. Alphonsus, therefore (book 7, no. 55), denies that an admonition is necessary when a judge executes a sentence imposed by law by inflicting a censure upon the guilty. For this, and nothing else, is intended by the question proposed. But for that negative opinion he cites Busembaum, Sanchez, Filliuccius, and Bonacina; he also adds Palaus as holding it probable.

As regards Busembaum, therefore, the VV. urge these words cited by St. Alphonsus (loc. cit., no. 51): Understand this, however (namely, that an admonition must necessarily be premised), of a censure imposed ab homine by a particular sentence, because one which is imposed a iure, or by a general sentence, or even by a special sentence, YET WITH RESPECT TO A FUTURE ACT, does not need another admonition, since the law or sentence itself sufficiently admonishes. Therefore, let those words be noted: yet with respect to a future act. But in the present case the question is whether a judge, before he executes the sentence established by law by inflicting a censure, ought or ought not to admonish the one who sinned against the law. Therefore, the question concerns not a future act, of which Busembaum speaks, but a past one. Consequently, the cited text of Hermann Busembaum does not pertain to the matter.

As regards Sanchez, St. Alphonsus cites book 2, disputation 24, no. 28. Yet even the Salmanticenses themselves (On Censures, disputation 1, no. 90) warn that Sanchez is wrongly cited here because he does not speak there of a censure imposed a iure, but of one imposed ab homine. We suppose, they say, that if a precept has been imposed BY THE JUDGE HIMSELF under the penalty of a censure to be imposed, he will be able by that very fact to excommunicate its transgressor, with no admonition premised.... In this case Sanchez spoke, book 2, On Matrimony, disputation 24, no. 28, who is customarily cited for the opinion asserting that an admonition is not required WHEN THE LAW THREATENS A CENSURE.... But Sanchez does not speak in this sense, but in the one which we have stated. And in reality this is manifestly apparent from the state of the question proposed there by Sanchez (no. 26), namely, when the judge commanded the bridegroom that within a certain time he either enter religion or consummate the marriage under penalty of excommunication. Therefore, the citation of Sanchez also does not pertain to the matter; wherefore the VV. also (page 856) finally say that this citation must be attributed to inadvertence.

The same must be said of the citation of Palaus, unless perhaps it must be said that this question is treated so confusedly by Palaus that nothing can be drawn from him. St. Alphonsus cites disputation 1, point 5, no. 6. But in this place Palaus writes thus: There is a doubt whether, if some deed is prohibited or commanded to you under an excommunication or suspension to be imposed, the judge can pronounce a sentence of excommunication or suspension upon you when disobedient, with no other admonition. Abbas in chapter Cum sit Romana, no. 28, On Appeals; Sanchez, On Matrimony, book 2, disputation 24, no. 28; Filliuccius, On Censures, chapter 4, no. 95; Bonacina ...; Stephanus Davila, etc., affirm it as sufficiently probable. But if the words by which the question is proposed are inspected, you would more quickly say that Palaus treats of a censure imposed ab homine than of one imposed a iure. The citations of Abbas and Sanchez also confirm the same. Therefore, either these things do not pertain to the matter, or nothing can be gathered from this confused manner of disputing. But whatever the question is finally understood to mean, what the opinion of Palaus is appears from the following words (ibid., no. 7): But it is far truer that the aforesaid censure threatened against you cannot be inflicted without a new admonition.

Let us come to Bonacina. His words (On Censures, disputation 1, point 9, nos. 3-4), if the manner in which he establishes the question is inspected, leave the reader uncertain whether there is question of a censure a iure or ab homine. There is a doubt, he says, whether, in censures threatened for future faults, an admonition distinct from the publication of the law or edict enacted under penalty of excommunication is required. These words can be understood both of a censure a iure and of a censure ab homine. But the solution of the question removes the doubt. The opposite seems truer to me, he says, namely, that an admonition is not required. The reason is that there is sufficient admonition on the part of the judge and sufficient contumacy on the part of the delinquent who knows the prohibition under penalty of a censure to be imposed. But those words, sufficient admonition on the part of the judge, in no way agree with a law established a iure by a perpetual statute. This is confirmed because Covarruvias, part 1, section 9, no. 5, is there taken up for refutation. But Covarruvias does not there dispute concerning a censure a iure and ferendae sententiae, but plainly speaks first of a censure ab homine and then of a censure a canone, but latae sententiae.

Of those cited by St. Alphonsus, Filliuccius remains. But, first, it is in no way evident whether he disputes concerning a censure a iure or ab homine. For he asks generally (On Censures, chapter 4, no. 92): Is an admonition required in a censure ferendae sententiae? Then, as Bonacina admits (loc. cit.), Filliuccius would favor that opinion only in part. For he thus defends the opposite (loc. cit., no. 94): I say first that, speaking absolutely and regularly, the second opinion appears truer, namely, that an admonition must be premised. But he would favor the other opinion in that part in which that doctrine labors most, namely, when there is question of a censure to be imposed for a crime which is in no way extended into the future, requires no satisfaction, reparation, or restitution, and, in a word, is a merely and altogether past crime, for example, if entrance into some chapel on a certain day is prohibited to men, as he himself says at no. 92, under penalty of excommunication to be imposed.

I said that this doctrine labors most; for, as Palaus well says (On Censures, disputation 1, part 5, no. 7), it belongs to the nature of a censure that it be imposed for the prevention of an offense, as is a censure latae sententiae, or for correction, because it is a medicinal penalty. But if it could be imposed for an offense already committed, it would be not so much medicine as punishment and vengeance, and would often punish a delinquent already corrected. And to the same purpose Suarez says (disputation 3, section 10, no. 21): From this I infer that, if an offense is such that it is in no way extended into the future but, as soon as it is consummated, passes away altogether, leaving no obligation of restoring or satisfying with respect to men, but only with respect to God, such an offense cannot be prohibited by law under threat of a censure ferendae sententiae, but the censure must either be imposed by the law itself or not at all. And indeed the VV. add (page 857) that St. Alphonsus also agrees with Suarez in this doctrine.

Let these things suffice to establish that it was not gratuitously said in the little Note that the Authors cited by St. Alphonsus are adduced beside the point.

But as regards the reasons, the matter is resolved very briefly by the Doctors, because the text of the Law in chapter Reprehensibilis 26, On Appeals, is manifest. For Alexander III says there: We establish that Prelates also shall not pronounce a sentence of suspension or excommunication upon their subjects unless a canonical admonition has been premised, except perhaps when the fault is of such a kind that by its very nature it induces the penalty of suspension or excommunication. Therefore, since Prelates are generally and strictly forbidden to impose a censure unless a canonical admonition has been premised, and it is merely excepted when there is question of a fault which by its own kind, that is, by the law itself or by the fact itself, induces the penalty of suspension or excommunication, the rule now applies that an exception confirms the rule in the contrary case; and therefore, whenever the censure is not latae sententiae, a canonical admonition is always required.

The VV. reply (page 857): We answer that this assertion, namely, of the little Note, is false, and that the doctrine of St. Alphonsus is fortified not only by solid but by most weighty reasons. For: 1. the Holy Doctor in the case always requires the citation of the guilty party for declaring the censure; and 2. he agrees entirely with Suarez that sentence is not to be pronounced upon a repentant guilty party. but a DECLARATION and a citation FOR DECLARING a censure have place when the guilty party had already incurred the censure by the fact itself.

Reply to 2. For this very reason Suarez, contrary to what St. Alphonsus judged, requires an admonition beforehand. And these things, like certain other things which the VV. heap up in the same place in order to show that St. Alphonsus agrees with Suarez and other Doctors, prove only this: that the general thesis of the Holy Doctor, by which he denies the necessity of an admonition in the case, coheres less well with other doctrines of his.

Reply 2. But an admonition is required for censures to be imposed ab homine. The reason is that one is not contumacious who was not previously admonished concerning the precept and the penalty annexed. Indeed, by Canon Law a triple admonition is required, or at least one in which it is expressed that it is to have the force of three. Except 1. If there is question of a censure ab homine through a general sentence, or even a special one with respect to a future act;

Reply to 1. These things do not pertain to the matter. For here the question concerns a censure ferendae sententiae, namely, when the judge or Superior pronounces a sentence by which he imposes a censure which the guilty party had not yet incurred; for then an admonition is not necessary, since the decree concerning the censure to be imposed takes the place of an admonition [18].

[18] The resolution will be clearer if, according to the things said in the preceding note, you distinguish censures to be incurred by the fact itself from censures ferendae sententiae. For in this second case, especially if the crime in some way extends into the future, the opinion which judges an admonition necessary is truer. See Suarez (On Censures, disputation 3, section 9, no. 4).

But concerning the solemnities to be observed in an admonition, see Suarez (cited disputation 3, section 9 and following) and Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 1, question 1, part 9). Observe this, however: Palaus (On Censures, disputation 1, part 5, no. 9), from whom Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 28) and Reiffenstuel (same title, no. 25) afterward copied, asserted the necessity of making the admonition in writing, as though this were provided in chapter Medicinalis 1, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext; St. Alphonsus likewise, through a slip of the eye, thought that he had found this opinion among the Salmanticenses, who in reality teach the opposite. But in chapter Medicinalis the discussion is not about the admonition but about the sentence of excommunication; therefore the entire foundation of that opinion falls, which in any case is contrary to the common opinion of the other Doctors.

 The VV. attack this little Note in eight columns (pages 863-867). Passing over those things which do not pertain to the matter, we shall pursue those which touch the little Note.

1. First, therefore, the VV. write (page 863): Father Ballerini undeservedly attacks Palaus, Schmalzgrueber, and Reiffenstuel. And they give the reason (page 865), saying: Neither Palaus nor the two most illustrious Canonists cite chapter Cum medicinalis for this purpose.

2. Reply 1. The little Note does not say that the two most illustrious Canonists, Schmalzgrueber and Reiffenstuel, cited that canon for this purpose, but that they copied those things from Palaus. And Reiffenstuel in reality writes thus (book 5, title 39, no. 25): In order that this admonition be made legitimately, it must be made in writing, AS PALAUS WILLS, tract 29, disputation 4, point 5, no. 9.

Reply 2. Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 28) has thus: This admonition must be made in writing, which writing must contain the cause for which the censure is imposed and must be delivered to the guilty party upon whom it is imposed; but if the judge (unless he is a Bishop), without an urgent cause, has inflicted excommunication by word alone and not in writing, he is suspended by the law itself for a month from entrance into the church and from divine offices; and if during that time he intrudes himself into divine things, he becomes irregular, as is contained in chapter Cum medicinalis 1, this title, in the Sext. PALAUS, cited point 5, no. 9.

Whether these things were not copied from Palaus, let the impartial reader judge. Thus, therefore, Palaus (loc. cit.): This admonition must be made in writing containing the cause for which the censure is imposed, which writing must be delivered to the guilty party upon whom the censure is imposed. But if the judge (unless he is a Bishop), without an urgent cause, has pronounced excommunication by word alone and not in writing, he is suspended by the law itself for a month from entrance into the church and from divine offices; and if within that time he intrudes himself into divine things, he becomes irregular. ALL OF WHICH ARE CONTAINED

IN CHAPTER 1, ON THE SENTENCE OF EXCOMMUNICATION, IN THE SEXT. Therefore, what is asserted in the little Note, that Schmalzgrueber copied these things from Palaus, meets the eye, since one repeats the words of the other almost to the letter.

3. But that it is not gratuitously said in the little Note that Palaus asserted the necessity of making the admonition as though it were provided in chapter Medicinalis is apparent from his reported text, when he plainly says: All of which are contained in chapter 1, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext. And indeed whether Palaus cited chapter Cum medicinalis for this purpose, as the VV. say, might perhaps be judged doubtful if nothing were seen in that chapter of those things which Palaus transfers to the manner of making an admonition. But the contrary is true. For all those things, the admonition must be made in writing, which writing must contain the cause for which the censure is imposed and must be delivered to the guilty party, plainly appear to have been taken from the aforesaid chapter, where it is read: let him pronounce the excommunication in writing, and let him expressly write down the cause of the excommunication ...; but let him be bound to deliver a copy of such writing to the excommunicated person, etc. Therefore it is sufficiently manifest that Palaus transferred to the admonition those solemnities which in chapter Cum medicinalis are prescribed for pronouncing excommunication. And this is also confirmed by the fact that Palaus, when he afterward writes in the same place about excommunication, entirely omits the solemnity of delivering the writing to the guilty party, because, namely, he also took this as though it were said of the admonition.

4. Now concerning the other part of the Note, where it is said that it happened through inadvertence that St. Alphonsus attributed to the Salmanticenses the opinion concerning an admonition to be made in writing.

On this argument the Holy Doctor has merely these words (book 7, no. 56, at the end): The admonition must be made by the judge himself or by another in his name. And if the censure is imposed for the benefit of a party, the citation must be made at his instance. Thus Suarez, disputation 3, section 11, no. 1; Bonacina, no. 4; and the Salmanticenses, chapter 1, no. 95, with others. The admonition must also be made in writing unless the judge proceeds by virtue of his office, as he is sometimes bound to do on account of the common good, from chapter Venerabilibus, section Porro, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext. For then it suffices if the admonition is made orally, yet in such a manner that it can be proved in court. Thus the Salmanticenses, chapter 1, no. 95, with Gibalinus and Cornelius, from chapter Sacro, On the Sentence of Excommunication, etc.

5. But if you compare these things with the text of the Salmanticenses, from whom St. Alphonsus admits that he took them, you must certainly suspect, if not the inadvertence of one transcribing compendiously, at least a typographical error in the words of St. Alphonsus. Yet no edition is free from this error, since the same thing recurs everywhere from the first edition of the year 1748 down to the latest editions of our age. And indeed, for greater evidence of the matter, we shall join to the text of the Salmanticenses (chapter 1, On Censures, no. 95) the text of Suarez (On Censures, disputation 5, section 11, no. 1), since both the Salmanticenses and St. Alphonsus cite him, and it will be apparent that the Salmanticenses copied their material from him.

6. Thus, therefore, Suarez (loc. cit., no. 1): From the things which have been said concerning this admonition, it follows that it must be made by the authority and in the name of the judge himself who is to impose the censure. The reason is manifest, because the admonition must be such that, if someone does not obey, he is rendered contumacious and disobedient; which cannot be unless the admonition is made by the authority of the Superior. The Canonists add another reason: that this admonition has the force of a citation; but a citation, in order to be of any moment, requires the authority of the judge.

7. These same things, but a little more obscurely and intricately, the Salmanticenses express thus (loc. cit.): It is answered that the admonition must be made by the judge himself or in his name, because it has the force of a citation, which citation must be made in the name and by the authority of him by whom the censure is imposed; and because a censure is not incurred except through disobedience and contumacy against the mandate of the Superior, which contumacy does not exist unless the admonition is made in his name. In these words the Salmanticenses, certainly intricately and obscurely, bring from Suarez two reasons why an admonition must be made in the name and by the authority of the judge.

8. But St. Alphonsus, omitting those two reasons, merely has this: The admonition must be made by the judge himself or by another in his name.

9. Suarez continues (loc. cit.): They (the Canonists) also add that, when a censure is to be imposed for the benefit of some private person, then the admonition ought to be made at his instance, because it has the force of a citation; and a citation, in order to be valid, must be made at the instance of the party, because the judge ought not to interpose his office on his own motion for private advantage.... But if the censure is imposed for the common good, in which case the judge can proceed by virtue of his office, then he can also admonish by virtue of his office, just as he can also cite by virtue of his office; and this is taken from chapter Venerabilibus, section Porro, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext.

10. The Salmanticenses also present this part, certainly most clear in Suarez, compendiously and very obscurely thus (loc. cit.): And when a censure is imposed for the benefit of some private person, the admonition must be made at his instance. But if a censure is imposed for the common good, the judge on his own motion (perhaps, the judge) can proceed to the admonition, because by virtue of his office he is bound to this, chapter Venerabilibus, section Porro, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext.

But what metamorphosis these things underwent in the text of St. Alphonsus will appear a little later.

11. Finally, Suarez adds (loc. cit., no. 2): It is further added in chapter Sacro, On the Sentence of Excommunication, that this admonition must be made in the presence of suitable persons through whom the admonition can be proved if necessary. Hence Abbas infers that it is not necessary for this admonition to be made in writing, for, he says, the presence of persons is required for that reason.

12. But the Salmanticenses present this last part thus (loc. cit.): It is not required that the admonition be made in writing; nevertheless, it must be made before suitable witnesses through whom it can be proved in the external forum: chapter Sacro, On the Sentence of Excommunication; Diana, part 5, tract 9, resolution 19 (in the coordinated edition, volume 5, tract 1, resolution 5, no. 2); Gibalinus, no. 10; Cornejo, doubt 2, question 7.

13. But this last part of the Salmanticenses, mingled by an unfortunate confusion with the preceding one above, no. 10, is seen thus in the text of St. Alphonsus: The admonition must also be made in writing unless the judge proceeds by virtue of his office, as he is sometimes bound to do on account of the common good, from chapter Venerabilibus, section Porro, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext; for then it suffices if the admonition is made orally, yet in such a manner that it can be proved in court. Thus THE SALMANTICENSES, chapter 1, no. 95, with Gibalinus and Cornelius, from chapter Sacro, On the Sentence of Excommunication.

But from the comparison most manifestly made, it appears that those things which the Salmanticenses, above no. 10, after Suarez, above no. 9, had said concerning the judge who ought not to proceed to an admonition on his own motion except when the censure is to be imposed for the common good, these things, I say, were transferred in the text of St. Alphonsus to the judge, who ought not to make the admonition IN WRITING unless he proceeds by virtue of his office on account of the common good; concerning which, certainly, there is neither word nor syllable among the Salmanticenses and Suarez.

Consequently, according to the text of St. Alphonsus, the admonition would then have to be made in writing only when the judge did not proceed to admonition except at the instance of some private person, as the VV. themselves explain in reality (page 864), contending that this is drawn from the Salmanticenses. But from the very fact that no trace of such a theory can be found in any Author and that at the same time no reason whatever for such a distinction can be devised, it is permissible to conclude what is intimated in the little Note: that from a mere slip of the eye or through inadvertence St. Alphonsus could have thought that he had found that opinion among the Salmanticenses.

Except 2. If there is question of that suspension and interdict which are not censures properly so called and medicinal, but are imposed only by way of penalty. - St. Alphonsus, no. 52, etc. - See Cases, no. 1419.

Article II. On the Principle or Author of Censures

942. ○ Principles. - I. The Church enjoys true power to impose censures. This is proved from Sacred Scripture. For Christ handed over to His Church the power of casting out from her bosom delinquent and contumacious children by those words in Matthew 18:17: If he will not hear the Church, let him be to you as a heathen and a publican. Amen I say to you: whatsoever you shall bind upon earth shall be bound also in heaven. But this power includes the faculty of imposing censures, as is clear to all. It is established, moreover, from the universal and perpetual practice of the Church, and also from innumerable Councils, especially from the Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 3, On Reformation.

II. By ordinary right, all and only ecclesiastical Superiors having jurisdiction in the external and contentious forum can impose censures. This is apparent from the cited words of Christ in Matthew: Whatsoever you shall bind, etc. For by these words Christ gave to the Prelates of the Church, in the person of the Apostles, all power for the good and right administration of the Church. It is also established from several places in Canon Law.

III. By delegated power, all and only clerics to whom it has been granted by a Superior having ordinary jurisdiction can impose censures. The reason is that every cleric, and only a cleric, is capable of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction required for imposing censures. - See St. Alphonsus, no. 9 and following.

943. ○ Rules. - 1. By ordinary right, the Pope and a General Council can impose censures with respect to the universal Church; Archbishops, both in their own dioceses and in the dioceses of their Suffragans during visitation, and also when there is question of a cause brought before their tribunal, because then they possess jurisdiction over the Suffragans; Bishops with respect to their own diocese, provided that they have been elected and confirmed, even if not consecrated [1]; Vicars General of Bishops [2], for they constitute one tribunal with the Bishops themselves; Legates in the territory of the legation, and Cardinals in the church of their own title; provincial Councils in their provinces; Generals, Provincials, and local Superiors of religious Orders according to their various statutes; the Chapter of a cathedral church while the see is vacant and before the election of the capitular Vicar, who thereafter will enjoy such power exclusively. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.

[1] See St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 10) and chapter Transmissum 15, On Election. Compare also Gonzalez on this chapter.

[2] St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 10) adduces Sayrus, Ugolinus, and others in Croix (book 7, no. 24) as dissenting. But this is a mere error either of Croix or of another from whom Croix copied. For the cited Doctors deviate in nothing from the common opinion.

2. Pastors cannot by ordinary right [3] impose censures, because they do not have jurisdiction in the external and judicial forum, but only administration for the right order of the parish. - St. Thomas, On IV Sentences, distinction 18, question 3, article 3.

[3] The Author adds, by ordinary right, because it has seemed to some that pastors once exercised this right. But the texts of the law from which they draw this demonstrate nothing of the kind. See Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 20).

3. Laymen and women cannot impose censures even by delegation [4]. Hence Abbesses of nuns cannot impose them by their own authority, but can only obtain a decree by which their mandates must be observed under penalty of censure. - St. Alphonsus, no. 12.

[4] The Doctors nevertheless agree that the incapacity of a layman is only of ecclesiastical law. See St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 12) and Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 3). Therefore, the Supreme Pontiff can delegate this power to a layman, just as he can dispense so that a layman may be assumed by a Bishop as Vicar.

With respect to women, St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 12), after the Salmanticenses (On Censures, chapter 1, no. 48), judged it more probable that incapacity for jurisdiction is of divine law. Others, on the contrary, think it more probable that it is of merely human law, and therefore that the Pontiff, from the plenitude of power, can delegate to them the faculty of imposing censures. Besides others whom the Salmanticenses cite (loc. cit., no. 47), this opinion is held by Sayrus, Suarez, Laymann, Palaus, Pirhing, and Croix in Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 16), who adheres to them.

 It is scarcely apparent why the VV. thought they should linger over this controversy (pages 867-868). Since Father B., they say, touched this question as merely speculative, we also shall touch it briefly. But the reason why Father B. subjoined this Note is sufficiently manifest. Father Gury had written concerning this matter as though it were clearly and indubitably established. Therefore, it was not beside the point that the genuine state of the question should be indicated. For otherwise have they themselves added anything which either brings some greater light to this question or counsels that the judgment rendered concerning it in the Note should be reformed? Finally, they bring forward three things.

1. To the five Authors whom the Salmanticenses report for the opinion more acceptable to St. Alphonsus, the VV. add the Salmanticenses themselves and three others, among whom is Concina. You would say, namely, that they feared the small number of those Authors compared with the seven cited for the opposite opinion among the Salmanticenses, to whom another four were added in the Note. But in writing the Note there was in reality no concern for this matter. And if there had been some solicitude about it, indeed several are found in Dicastillo (On Censures, disputation 1, nos. 126-128) and Diana (volume 3, tract 1, resolution 75; otherwise, part 8, tract 4, resolution 39), among whom Cardinal de Lugo is also numbered, by whom this number could easily have been more than doubled.

2. The VV. then bring forward certain words of St. Thomas from his Commentary on book 8 of the Ethics, chapter 7. - But perhaps with too little deliberation. For there it is read: But some use of the keys is committed to a woman, as to have correction over subject women. Soto (On IV Sentences, disputation 20, question 1, article 4) adds to these words the following others from the same St. Thomas (On IV Sentences, distinction 25, question 2, article 1, reply to objection 1): Nevertheless, concerning Abbesses it is said that they do not have ordinary prelacy (Soto reads, jurisdiction), but as though by commission. From these texts others deduce a conclusion contrary to what the VV. judge.

3. Finally, the VV. transcribe the text of Suarez (On Censures, disputation 2, section 3, no. 7) in this manner: I add, moreover, that it is one thing to speak of the, so to say, absolute power of the Supreme Pontiff, and another of the ordinary ecclesiastical law. For in the former manner perhaps it is not repugnant for the Supreme Pontiff to grant this power (of imposing censures) to some woman, which Paludanus holds, and Soto, Navarre, and Ugolinus do not dissent. For this is not contrary to divine law; and therefore there is nothing why the Pontiff, from absolute power, cannot do this, just as he can also grant this jurisdiction to a layman. For what purpose these things are brought forward here by the VV. can scarcely be understood. For the question touched in the Note is whether the incapacity of a woman for this office is of divine law or only of positive law. Therefore, since Suarez says most clearly, there is nothing why the Pontiff, from absolute power, cannot do this, just as he can also grant this jurisdiction to a layman, he manifestly contradicts St. Alphonsus, who contends that it is more probable that this incapacity of a woman is of divine law. And indeed the final words of Suarez are most worthy of notice: Just as the Pontiff can also grant this jurisdiction to a layman. For, as Dicastillo writes (loc. cit., no. 152), Concerning laymen lacking every Order and even tonsure, the common opinion of the Doctors is that they are not by divine law incapable of this jurisdiction of the external forum. Moreover, for another reason it was of interest to the VV. to omit this text of Suarez. For since Suarez also testifies that Soto does not dissent from this opinion, it follows that Soto is not rightly cited by St. Alphonsus for his own opinion.

4. Delegated power ceases with the death of the one delegating [5], unless the cause has already been begun by the delegate, at least through citation. But one delegated to impose censures cannot subdelegate another [6], unless he has express permission from the one delegating, or unless at least he has been delegated for any causes whatever.

[5] Because, namely, there is question of a cause of justice; for otherwise it must be said in causes of grace.

[6] Except delegates of the Roman Pontiff, from chapter Si pro debilitate 5, On the Office of a Delegate. But concerning what is required by ordinary law in order that someone can be delegated, see Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 14).

944. ○ Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can heretical, excommunicated, and suspended Bishops validly impose censures?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if they are occult heretics, excommunicated persons, or suspended persons. The reason is that the Church, for the common good, does not take away from them the use of jurisdiction. Nevertheless, they act illicitly whenever they impose censures. - Thus commonly the Theologians with St. Alphonsus, no. 12.

Reply 2. Negatively, if they are excommunicated persons to be avoided, or not tolerated, because then they are deprived of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction. But what if they are indeed notorious, but not persons to be avoided? It appears that they can nevertheless validly impose censures, because, they say, this is gathered from the Constitution Ad evitanda of Martin V, where it is enacted that an excommunicated person who is tolerated is not to be avoided, in those things which pertain to public office, even by those who know it. - See St. Alphonsus, ibid.

945. ○ QUESTION 2. Can a Bishop impose a censure if he is outside the diocese?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if the censure is imposed by way of precept or statute for preventing future crimes. - St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 21.

Reply 2. Affirmatively, even if the censure is imposed by way of a sentence which nevertheless does not require cognizance of the cause and judicial proceedings; or even if it requires judicial proceedings, provided permission has been granted by the Ordinary of the territory.

Reply 3. Negatively, if the censure must be imposed with judicial proceedings and the Ordinary of the place refuses permission. Except if the Bishop was expelled by force from his own territory; for then it suffices that permission was sought from the Ordinary of the place, although it was not obtained. - See Schmalzgrueber, book 5, title 39, no. 26.

QUESTION 3. Conversely, can a Bishop existing in his own diocese impose a censure upon a subject existing outside the diocese?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if there is question of a crime committed in his own diocese. The reason is that otherwise the delinquent could be punished by no one; and although he has departed, he nevertheless does not cease to be subject to the jurisdiction of his own Bishop. Nor is it an objection that the citation cannot be made outside the territory; for it suffices for incurring the censure that the guilty party be cited at his own home or in a public place. - St. Alphonsus, no. 22.

Reply 2. Indeed, a Bishop can impose a censure upon a subject sinning outside the diocese if there is question of a matter pertaining to his diocese. Thus clerics who, when commanded to come to the Synod, do not obey can be excommunicated; otherwise, however, at least more probably, if the crime were consummated outside the territory [7]. Except if there is question of a censure imposed against someone by way of a special precept for preventing a crime, as St. Alphonsus more probably teaches, book 7, no. 23, and Laymann confirms with valid reasons, book 1, tract 5, part 1, chapter 4, no. 7. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.; Suarez; Salmanticenses.

[7] Since laws affect a territory, and therefore one who dwells outside it is not bound by the laws of his homeland, consequently one who sins outside the territory is not subjected to censures imposed by general statutes. This is plainly confirmed from chapter Ut animarum 2, On Constitutions, in the Sext. And since an exempt place, although situated within the boundaries of the diocese, is compared in this respect with places situated outside the territory, therefore, as the common doctrine holds, one sinning in an exempt place does not incur diocesan censures. See Laymann (book 1, tract 5, chapter 4, no. 6) and Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 49).

946. ○ QUESTION 4. Can a Bishop bind by censure another's subject sinning in his diocese?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that every delinquent acquires the forum of the place in which he sins. Thus from Canon Law, book 2, title 2, On the Competent Forum, chapter 3. Although a Bishop more probably cannot impose a censure upon a stranger before admonition, he can nevertheless do so after the latter has sinned in the place and the Bishop has cited him [8]. - St. Alphonsus, no. 26, and book 6, no. 591.

[8] These things, as is apparent, are said of censures ab homine through a sentence. For if there is question of censures inflicted by a special law of that place upon those sinning either against the common law or against the proper laws of that place, according to the more common opinion, which exempts strangers and travelers from the obligation of observing the proper laws of those places, they do not incur them. But you would wrongly urge with certain persons (see St. Alphonsus, book 1, no. 156, doubt 2, and book 3, no. 332, section An autem) any probability whatever of the opposite opinion, namely, of the opinion which subjects travelers to the aforesaid laws. For probability is not sufficient for imposing an obligation, and much less for undergoing penalties. See Lugo, Moral Responses, book 6, doubt 22, nos. 3-5.

But the cases in which a traveler acquires a forum by reason of the offense and can be punished by censures may be seen in the same de Lugo (loc. cit., no. 6) and Suarez (On Censures, disputation 5, section 5, nos. 12, 13).

 The VV. here oppose twelve full columns (pages 868-874), something which could scarcely appear credible to one inspecting the character of this little Note. But perhaps the reader will be all the more astonished when he sees that with so great a mass they fight almost nothing but mere shadows.

1. For first, as though an opinion obliging strangers to observe the laws of a place where they remain briefly and precariously were fastened upon the Holy Doctor Alphonsus in the Note, behold the VV., after reporting his texts both from book 7, nos. 26 and 27, and from the places indicated in our little Note, seriously conclude (page 871): St. Alphonsus does not generally urge for foreigners the obligation of obeying the special laws of a place unless ... they have contracted there a quasi-domicile.

Reply. I deny the supposition. Indeed, for this very reason, within that parenthesis in the little Note, the reader is sent to read St. Alphonsus, book 1, no. 156, and book 3, no. 332: because there the Holy Doctor defends the more common opinion which exempts strangers and travelers from the obligation of observing the proper laws of those places; from which thesis, as from a foundation, it is deduced in the little Note that those strangers do not incur the censures of which it speaks. Wherefore, entirely without cause, the VV. afterward repeat in the same place: Therefore neither the Holy Doctor nor another with him WRONGLY URGES OBLIGATIONS! As though those words of the little Note, But you would wrongly urge with certain persons the probability of the OPPOSITE opinion, were referred to St. Alphonsus, when they are manifestly referred to the opposite thesis which the Holy Doctor rejects in the cited places. And, what may appear amusing, the VV. immediately add in the same place: But rather Father Ballerini wrongly confuses the questions!

2. But from the same preconceived opinion, that those words of the little Note, But you would wrongly urge with certain persons, etc., attack the opinion of the Holy Doctor, the VV. in the same place thus assail the following part of that little Note: As regards that principle recalled again here by Father Ballerini, namely, that any probability whatever does not suffice for imposing an obligation ..., it appears clearer than light that the aforesaid principle is false whenever, AS IN THE PRESENT QUESTION, it is extended to a probability NOTABLY AND CERTAINLY GREATER than the opposite.

Reply. Again, first, I deny the supposition; because in the little Note this is said most plainly of whatever probability may be attributed to the opposite opinion of Suarez or others, which binds strangers to the laws of the place and consequently subjects them to the proper censures of the same place. This opinion is rejected elsewhere in the Notes to this compendium (see Note at no. 94, volume 1, page 87), and there it is again insisted against it that the mere probability of this opinion does not suffice for inducing an obligation. But this is by no means asserted against the more common and more probable opinion exempting strangers from this obligation, which St. Alphonsus also defends; and for this reason St. Alphonsus is cited in Gury's text (book 6, no. 591), where the Holy Doctor writes: Foreigners are not subject to these censures unless they have contracted a domicile or quasi-domicile in the place where they were imposed; and he had premised the reason there: because excommunication cannot be imposed except upon subjects and the contumacious.

3. But, moreover, a certain excessive fervor for contradicting and attacking caused the VV. here to contradict St. Alphonsus also. Let us resume their statements: The principle recalled here by Father B., namely, that any probability whatever does not suffice for imposing an obligation, is false whenever, AS IN THE PRESENT QUESTION, it is extended to a probability NOTABLY AND CERTAINLY greater than the opposite.

Let us even prescind from the confusion which these words of the VV. introduce. But what finally is this notably and certainly greater probability? If you consider the purpose of the VV. refuting the little Note, you will certainly conclude that they designate the probability to which the force of inducing an obligation is denied in the little Note; for on that account this principle is insisted upon in the little Note. But this is none other than the probability of the opinion which subjects strangers to the laws and censures of the place. Therefore, according to the VV., does the opinion which obliges strangers to the laws and censures of a place have a probability notably and certainly greater than the opposite? Yet, apart from the fact that this would be asserted against the more common opinion of the Doctors, the VV. would thus now attack St. Alphonsus, who holds as more probable the opinion exempting strangers from the aforesaid laws and censures. It remains, therefore, that by those words the VV. designate not the opinion which obliges strangers, but the more common opinion, as it is called in the little Note, which exempts strangers and travelers from the obligation of observing the proper laws of those places. For they expressly say that this notably and certainly greater probability is so present IN THE PRESENT QUESTION that it excludes the principle employed here by Father Ballerini. Therefore, it is necessary that they attribute this greater probability to one or the other opinion, namely, either to that obliging strangers, as we said, or to that exempting them from this obligation. But they neither attribute it, nor can attribute it, to the obliging opinion, as we have seen, without attacking both St. Alphonsus and the more common opinion of the Doctors. Therefore, it remains that they contend that this greater probability pertains to the opinion which exempts strangers from the obligation in question.

4. But thus the VV. do not attack Father Ballerini, and, on the contrary, again attack the Holy Doctor Alphonsus. They do not attack Father Ballerini, I say; for what is contended in the little Note they themselves strikingly confirm when they assert that the opinion which in the case exempts strangers from observing the laws of a foreign territory, and therefore from incurring the proper censures of that territory, is notably and certainly more probable; and, on the contrary, they concede scarcely any probability to the opposite opinion which binds the same strangers to the aforesaid laws and censures.

5. But thus the VV. again attack the Holy Doctor Alphonsus. For they contend that the opinion in question is both notably and certainly more probable. Yet, as the illustrious Father Haringer, a distinguished theologian of the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, testifies (in the Note to no. 40 of the Treatise on Conscience of St. Alphonsus), A notably more probable opinion approaches very closely to moral certitude, and is no longer strictly doubtful, but morally or quasi-morally certain, and THE OPPOSITE BECOMES SLIGHTLY PROBABLE; or, as St. Alphonsus says (loc. cit., no. 56), the opposite remains EITHER

SLIGHTLY OR AT LEAST DOUBTFULLY PROBABLE. Therefore, while the VV. proclaim that the opinion exempting strangers, etc., is certainly and notably more probable, they consequently contend that the opposite, which binds strangers to those laws and censures, is slightly or at least doubtfully probable. Yet this is precisely what again openly conflicts with the opinion of St. Alphonsus. For even the VV. themselves (page 870) cite the text of St. Alphonsus from book 1, no. 156, in which the Holy Doctor admits that this opinion is sufficiently probable. For he writes thus: This opinion, which obliges strangers, IS SUFFICIENTLY PROBABLE; but the second, which says that a stranger is not bound by the laws of the place, etc., APPEARS more probable. There, moreover, we see the Holy Doctor asserting the greater probability of the latter opinion somewhat doubtfully, appears, whereas, on the contrary, the VV. proclaim it notably and certainly more probable and therefore morally or quasi-morally certain. But again the VV. themselves (page 869) transcribe another text of the Holy Doctor, from book 3, no. 338, where that same opinion is furthermore called by St. Alphonsus deservedly probable. Thus the Holy Doctor: Suarez, Pontius, Joseph de Januario, and Salas in Palaus affirm, namely, that strangers are bound, etc., WHO DESERVEDLY CALLS IT PROBABLE with Sanchez and the Salmanticenses.... Sanchez with Toledo, Azor, etc., nevertheless more probably deny it. Therefore, while the VV. will that what St. Alphonsus teaches to be both sufficiently probable, which the Holy Doctor again has both in book 7, no. 27, and in The Apostolic Man, tract 2, no. 41, and deservedly probable should be held as slightly or doubtfully probable, it is manifestly apparent that they also attack the doctrine of St. Alphonsus.

6. Moreover, another argument that the VV. here pursue shadows is found where they write (page 871): But the more common opinion does not exempt from the obligation of observing local laws all strangers, as FATHER BALLERINI SUPPOSES, but only those who do not have the intention of remaining for the greater part of the year.

Reply. From where the VV. could have taken occasion to imagine that, according to Father B., those also are exempted from this obligation who have the intention of acquiring a quasi-domicile through that long stay, who can finally divine? Indeed, in the text of Gury, to which the little Note is subjoined, there is question of another's subject, who is there rightly called a traveler; but the nature of the matter itself demands that the discussion in the Note be about exactly the same subject. Why, therefore, do the VV. contend that the same word traveler has in the little Note so broad a sense, which is otherwise contrary to common usage? Has Father B. at least elsewhere attributed to this word so broad, unusual, and improper a sense that it embraces also those who, while contracting a quasi-domicile, now become subjects? Therefore, here also the VV. pursue shadows. Let us come to another head.

7. The VV. write (page 873): We do not understand how the things which Suarez teaches here can be reconciled with the assertions of Father Ballerini.

Reply. Suarez (On Censures, disputation 5, section 5, no. 12) is cited in the little Note in order to indicate the case in which a traveler acquires a forum by reason of an offense and can be punished with censures. For Suarez thus proposes in no. 12 the case which he resolves in no. 13: The objection stands thus: If a stranger commits an offense in another's territory, by that offense he also becomes so subject that proceedings can be taken against him where he sinned; and nevertheless, even if a censure is imposed by sentence in that territory on account of that offense, he does not incur it, although such a sentence embraces all subjects. But to these things he answers there thus in no. 13: Since two things can be considered in a statute or jurisdiction, namely, directive force and coercive force, by reason of an offense a man cannot become subject first and immediately in relation to directive force, but in relation to coercive or punitive force; for he is said to become subject because he can justly be punished where he sinned. Consequently, however, he can be obliged according to directive force to all those things to which a just judge can oblige a guilty party, but not to other things, precisely by force of that subjection. But from this it follows that, if this guilty party is obstinate and contumacious against such a just mandate of the judge, namely, of the Bishop, he can also be compelled by him through censures. And indeed, suppose, for example, that what is intimated in chapter Si seduxerit 1, On Adultery and Defilement, happens, in which the guilty party is condemned either to marry the seduced virgin or to provide a dowry for her. The Bishop can certainly cite the guilty party by reason of the offense, although he is a stranger and nevertheless made a subject, and, when he has been convicted, condemn him to the aforesaid penalties. Behold, therefore, the case concerning which Suarez treats, namely, when the judge can compel a stranger, even by censures, both to appear before him or obey the citation and consequently either to pay the dowry or to marry the young woman, as St. Alphonsus also intimates (book 7, no. 26, at the end).

8. But to the texts of Suarez with which the VV. fill four columns (pages 872, 873), the obvious response is at hand: all those things do not pertain to the matter. Namely, the context of that section 5 looks to whether one acting in another diocese contrary to the general sentence of his own Prelate is bound by his censure; and Suarez (no. 14), according to his own opinion, which he nevertheless does not deny elsewhere to be merely probable, that local laws oblige not only subjects but also travelers, answers affirmatively. But the citation of Suarez in the little Note did not look to this, but to those things which the same author incidentally has in nos. 12 and 13 concerning a censure which is ab homine, and which we reported above. And to the same point pertain those things also which Suarez had likewise incidentally said in the same section 5, for example, no. 10: An offense alone can make one a subject in relation to a future judgment and consequently with respect to all those things which can be ordained to the punishment of that offense. And again, no. 11: Although an offense committed in a territory constitutes a man a delinquent of that forum, and, the forum being supposed, he can be cited and become contumacious. Therefore, the VV. have that by which they may understand how those things which Suarez has in that section 5 can be reconciled with the assertions of Father Ballerini.

9. Moreover, perhaps with more useful labor the VV. would have inquired how what St. Alphonsus has in this same question (book 7, no. 27) is reconciled with the doctrines of Suarez, where he writes: If a censure is imposed by way of a general statute for future offenses ..., then it binds even foreigners if they are there with the intention of remaining for the greater part of the year; otherwise, if they remain there in passing. Thus the Salmanticenses with SUAREZ, etc. After these things the Holy Doctor then continues: This opinion is more probable to me, but I do not think it improbable that travelers are bound by the censure both in the first and in the second case, even if they are somewhere for a brief time, because it is sufficiently probable that travelers become subjects if they remain in some place even for a brief time, according to the opinion reported in book 3, no. 332.

In this place, as is apparent, Suarez is cited by the Holy Doctor for the opinion which he calls more probable to himself, namely, that travelers are not bound by the censure because, if they remain somewhere for a brief time, they do not become subjects. Yet the same Holy Doctor writes thus in the place to which he refers, namely, book 3, no. 332: Are travelers bound to hear Mass which must be heard from a particular precept of the place where they are, even if they remain there for one day? SUAREZ affirms (On Religion, book 1, chapter 14, no. 9), Pontius, etc. Sanchez, etc., nevertheless more probably deny it. But let us now omit the erroneous citation of Suarez, which recurs in the Holy Doctor also in book 1, no. 156, namely, On Religion, book 1, chapter 14, no. 9; for it labors under a twofold defect, both because Suarez's On Religion has ten treatises, each of which has several books, and because that opinion is found in none of the first ten books but is found in tract 2, book 2, chapter 14, no. 8. But what is principal: how is Suarez cited by St. Alphonsus in book 7, no. 27, for the more probable opinion which exempts travelers who remain somewhere for a brief time from observing laws and incurring local censures, and then in book 3, no. 332, the same Suarez is cited for the opinion which subjects travelers to a local precept even if they remain there for one day?

10. But there is also another thing which requires an explanation from the VV. in the same no. 27 of book 7. For the Holy Doctor, as we have seen, writes there: I do not think it improbable that travelers are bound by the censure both in the FIRST and in the SECOND case, even if they are somewhere for a brief time, because it is sufficiently probable that travelers become subjects if they remain in some place even for a brief time, according to the opinion reported in no. 332. But the first case there is this: If a censure is imposed by way of a particular precept or sentence in a particular case, namely, if excommunication is imposed against those who do not reveal thieves, this does not bind foreigners because a particular precept cannot bind non-subjects. Therefore, St. Alphonsus does not judge it improbable that even the aforesaid excommunication is incurred by strangers because, as he says, it is sufficiently probable that travelers become subjects according to the things reported in book 3, no. 332. Yet Suarez, whom otherwise the Holy Doctor cites here in the first place and whose numerous texts the VV. report, on the contrary absolutely denies that an excommunication of this kind is incurred by foreigners. For thus Suarez says (On Censures, disputation 5, section 5, no. 10), as the VV. themselves report: A sentence of this kind, although general, is directly imposed upon persons in order to restrain and punish their contumacy; and therefore it is not extended to strangers, who, although they remain in another's territory, are simply not subjects there, nor does there intervene any title by which they become subjects. He then gives the reason for this resolution in the same place, no. 15.

11. Likewise the VV. report (page 868) those things which St. Alphonsus has in book 7, no. 26, and they are of this kind: For this reason Croix, book 7, no. 32, thinks, against the Salmanticenses, chapter 1, no. 37, with Pignatelli and Gibalinus, who cites a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation, that a Bishop can excommunicate even his Archbishop sinning in the Bishop's diocese. But the reason premised by St. Alphonsus is that by reason of the offense that Archbishop becomes a subject of the Bishop. Yet: 1. It is not true that the Salmanticenses are of the opposite opinion. For, indeed, when the Salmanticenses establish in the cited place, no. 37, that a non-subject can be excommunicated by a Bishop by reason of an offense committed in his territory, they except: unless such a guilty party was his Superior, as his Archbishop or Patriarch; but afterward, no. 39, they add the limitation: if he does this by his own authority. Concerning which below: We said in the conclusion, by his own authority, because an equal or inferior can indeed by delegation of another Superior excommunicate his own Superior. 2. On the contrary, the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, which is taken from Croix, is expressed in words too general, namely, that an Archbishop can become subject to his Suffragan by reason of an offense; for it must be restricted by those limits which Gibalinus skillfully adds (On Censures, disquisition 4, question 1, no. 4), namely, that this happens only when the Superior has sinned within another's diocese against a law sanctioned BY SOME OTHER SUPERIOR OF BOTH and promulgated in the jurisdiction of that inferior; for example, if laws concerning the administration of some orphanage, hospital, or University were so sanctioned by the Pontiff that it pertained to the Bishop to restrain disturbers even through censures. 3. In the text of St. Alphonsus, a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation ascribed to Gibalinus is adduced for this doctrine; but this is not true, nor did Croix say this, for Pignatelli, not Gibalinus, adduces it, and Croix attributes it to Pignatelli. Moreover, Pignatelli (Consultations, volume 1, consultation 170, no. 8), contrary to what St. Alphonsus after La Croix intimates, in no way speaks of an Archbishop who can be excommunicated by his Suffragan, but merely has these words: Thus also a Bishop offending the jurisdiction of another Bishop in the latter's diocese is made a subject, so that proceedings can be taken against him with censures, as the Sacred Congregation of the Council judged after Alterius ... in a certain case of Bari on 27 February 1627. These things fit our case less well, when a Bishop against his own Metropolitan or Patriarch not so much defends his own jurisdiction as protects, as delegate, a law of the Pontiff coercing even through censures.

12. Finally, I would not omit here a little Note which the VV. incidentally add (page 872), where they write: We observe here in passing that the texts of St. Antoninus, St. Raymond, Gerson, and Gabriel Biel which Father Ballerini adduces in the Annotation to no. 152, volume 1, to prove that mortal sin is not to be asserted unless it is certainly established, must be received with a grain of salt, as they say. For a twofold certitude can be had, one direct and the other indirect from reflex or concomitant principles (compare above, On the System, page 103, at II); in which place there is discussion of that certitude which arises for that side for which a certainly more probable opinion stands.

Reply. Of what kind this grain of salt should be with which, according to the VV., the opinions of the aforesaid Doctors are to be sprinkled, someone will perhaps divine with difficulty. Indeed, according to the things cited above, no. 6, from the illustrious Father Haringer, A certainly more probable opinion approaches very closely to moral certitude, and is no longer strictly doubtful, but morally or quasi-morally certain. Therefore, is this the grain of salt which the VV. require: that those opinions of the Doctors are to be understood such that mortal sin is not to be asserted unless it is established as morally or quasi-morally certain? Yet, unless I am wholly deceived, it did not seem necessary for this grain of salt to be supplied by the VV. For in moral matters the certitude which is admitted and received is ordinarily none other than an assent of mind of such a kind as excludes a prudent fear of erring. Indeed, according to certain passages of St. Alphonsus, this grain of salt can appear altogether superfluous. And indeed, let the things which the Holy Doctor writes in book 6, no. 604, concerning a Confessor having an opinion diverse from the opinion of the penitent be weighed, please. That the penitent, he says, wills to follow this or that opinion is irrelevant to the judgment of the Confessor unless the latter judges the opinion of the penitent TO BE EVIDENTLY FALSE. And again in the same place: When, on the one hand, the penitent forms for himself a judgment concerning the uprightness of some action, and otherwise the Confessor does not have EVIDENT CERTITUDE concerning its falsity, he is bound to absolve him. And again in the same place: But whenever the opinion of the Confessor IS NOT EVIDENTLY CERTAIN ..., then he not only can but is also bound to absolve the penitent. Moreover, let these things be compared with those which the same Holy Doctor writes in the Moral System, no. 84. For there he reports these words of Cabassut: Every Confessor ought to absolve that penitent who does not wish to abstain from a work which, according to probable authority, is licit, although according to the probable authority of others which the Confessor himself follows it is held as LESS probable; moreover, to these final words of Cabassut the Holy Doctor adds within parentheses: It must be understood, NOT NOTABLY LESS. Therefore, the Holy Doctor manifestly had previously called evidently false that which he here calls notably less probable. And this is confirmed from those things which we read thus in the edition of the year 1757 (book 1, tract 1, no. 25): But what Busembaum says, that the Confessor ought to absolve the penitent even if he judges his opinion false, must be understood unless he judges it ALTOGETHER FALSE.

Therefore, according to St. Alphonsus, notably less probable is equivalent to ALTOGETHER FALSE; and therefore, conversely, notably or certainly more probable is equivalent to evidently certain or altogether true. Nor is it permissible to think that St. Alphonsus, when he absolutely determines the same question, although in diverse places, would so openly cohere less with himself. Therefore, what the VV. observe, that the statement of the Doctors that mortal sin is not to be asserted unless it is certainly established must be received with a grain of salt, that is, must be understood also when mortal sin is certainly more probably established, can deservedly appear altogether empty; since certainly more probable, according to the interpretation of St. Alphonsus and the illustrious Father Haringer, finally means the same as morally certain, indeed evidently certain.

Moreover, it would be more helpful to observe this here: it is indeed opportune that the VV., as readers of the moral works of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, warn what sense certain forms of speaking have or can have in the same Holy Doctor; but perhaps it is not likewise opportune that they contend that those forms of speaking are now to be received in the schools after the manner of a general norm, when that manner of speaking is found to be singular and proper to St. Alphonsus rather than generally common among the Doctors. An opinion MUCH, VERY, NOTABLY (add CERTAINLY) more probable, says the illustrious Father Haringer in explaining St. Alphonsus, approaches very closely to moral certitude and is no longer strictly doubtful, but morally or quasi-morally certain. Let us not now inquire whether the same sense constantly underlies these forms of speaking even in St. Alphonsus. But since the Doctors generally did not propose this form of speaking to themselves, the use of these hermeneutical canons for reading the Works of St. Alphonsus will perhaps be useful; but for one examining the Works of the Doctors who through the long succession of centuries adorned the Church and the schools with their labors, it will perhaps lead to distorted and erroneous interpretations.

QUESTION 5. Can Regular Prelates impose a censure upon subjects existing in any place whatever?

Reply. Affirmatively, according to the common opinion. The reason is that the jurisdiction of Superiors is not merely territorial but rather personal; hence a change of place on the part of the subject detracts nothing from the jurisdiction of the Superior. - Thus St. Alphonsus, no. 20.

These things, however, must be understood of censures imposed by a particular sentence or by statutes of the Chapter or of the Superior General. For if some censure has been imposed by a statute by a Superior who has a special territory, for example, a province, then the limitation of place can be attended to, and therefore the exemption of those who sin outside that territory. See Croix, book 7, no. 28.

Article III. On the Subject of Censures

947. ○ Principles. - I. The subject of a censure cannot be except a baptized man, capable of reason, and a subject. 1. He must be baptized, because, according to the Apostle, the Church does not judge concerning those who are outside; 2. capable of reason, because a censure is ordained to the correction of the delinquent, but this has no place in one who lacks the use of reason; 3. a subject, because a censure is an act of jurisdiction, which can be exercised only upon subjects.

II. Minors, although they can absolutely be bound by censures, nevertheless, on account of the levity of their age, through the indulgence and benignity of the Church do not incur them unless it is specially expressed in the law. - St. Alphonsus, no. 14.

But only a twofold case is found expressed in the law, namely: 1. If they have entered monasteries of nuns. Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 5.

2. If they have struck clerics. Chapter Pueris, book 5, title 39, On the Sentence of Excommunication. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.

948. ○ Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can Kings and Queens be bound by censures by Bishops?

Reply. Negatively. For although in spiritual matters they are subject to Bishops, nevertheless by privilege they cannot be punished with censure by them, but only by the Pope [1]. But this privilege was legitimately introduced in the course of time and is commonly attributed to them by the Doctors. - St. Alphonsus, no. 16; Salmanticenses, chapter 1.

[1] Kings, emperors, etc., are subject not only to pontifical censures latae sententiae through general statutes, for example, against those invading the goods, territories, rights, etc., of the Church, but can also be punished by censures through a particular or general sentence.

QUESTION 2. Are Bishops and Cardinals subject to censures?

Reply 1. Certainly they cannot be subject to censures imposed by themselves, because no one is his own subject.

Reply 2. But they are subject to papal censures, because the Pope is the Superior of all, even of Bishops. Nevertheless, by privilege of law they are bound neither by interdict nor by suspension unless in imposing those censures special and express mention is made OF THEM, namely, of the Cardinals. - St. Alphonsus, no. 15.

949. ○ QUESTION 3. Can exempt religious be bound by episcopal censures by the Bishop of the place?

Reply 1. More probably affirmatively, if religious, although exempt [2], sin concerning those things in which, by force of the Canons and Constitutions, they are subjected to the jurisdiction of Bishops, for example, in the observance of feasts which the Bishop has commanded to be observed in his diocese, or in the observance of censures promulgated by the Bishop, etc. The reason is that jurisdiction in the external forum cannot be unarmed for executing laws and statutes; for otherwise it would become useless. Therefore, if in some matter a Bishop possesses jurisdiction over religious, by that very fact he can proceed against delinquents even through censures. For one who has contentious power of the external forum can use it in the choice of any penalty whatever, but especially of a spiritual censure, by which ecclesiastical Prelates proceed against subjects. - Thus the laws and the unanimous opinion both of Canonists and of Theologians in Pignatelli (volume 3, consultation 46, no. 24).

[2] If they are not exempt, they are subject to episcopal laws and censures no differently from other clerics. Moreover, if they have the Bishop as their proper Prelate, they can be bound by censures by him just as the other religious by their Superiors. Sanchez (On the Decalogue, book 6, chapter 1, no. 11) and Schmalzgrueber (book 3, title 35, nos. 61-62).

But according to the more common opinion, Bishops proceed in these matters not by ordinary power but by power delegated by the Apostolic See. Thus St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 241 [3]. Moreover, St. Alphonsus enumerates the principal cases in which even exempt religious are subjected to the power of the Bishop in The Apostolic Man, tract 20, On Privileges, chapter 4 [4]. Nevertheless, this is absolutely denied by not a few authors, whom several decrees of the Pontiffs and of the Sacred Congregation of the Council appear to favor [5].

[3] Namely, after the privilege of exemption, religious are and remain exempt and immediately subject to the Roman Pontiff; wherefore Bishops proceed against them by no other title than that of mere commission or delegation. This must be carefully retained against the false hypothesis of De Luca, who (Ecclesiastical Miscellany, discourse 16, nos. 13-14) imagines that native jurisdiction is restored to Bishops in the case and thereby becomes ordinary, so that, namely, he may prove that it must be interpreted broadly.

[4] Barbosa (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, part 3, allegation 105, no. 14 and following) numbers fifty-two cases in which religious, even exempt religious, are subject to the jurisdiction of the Bishop; but Chockier (On the Jurisdiction of Ordinaries over Exempt Persons, part 2, question 45) numbers altogether one hundred and sixteen. The principal cases, however, are found in Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 33, nos. 253, 254).

[5] In these things you have a trace of no small confusion introduced into this question; to this it is also due that St. Alphonsus, when the various statements of the same opinion are compared together, compare On Privileges, no. 75; ibid., no. 77; and book 7, no. 241, appears less coherent with himself. But the principal cause of this confusion can be held to be that the authority of certain Doctors who either wrote before the promulgation of certain decrees of the Sacred Congregations or were ignorant of these decrees is nevertheless invoked as though their vote could contribute something toward deciding this question. Since other causes have acceded to this from a distorted interpretation either of Law or of Privileges, it is no wonder if we see called into controversy that which ought to be held beyond controversy. From this it must also be derived that the Author presents as merely more probable the power by which Bishops can use censures against exempt persons, But Benedict XIV (On the Diocesan Synod, book 9, chapter 16, no. 5, and book 7, chapter 41, no. 5) testifies that this was established as certain, decreed, and declared by the Sacred Congregation on 17 February 1632 in these words: In those matters in which jurisdiction over religious has been granted to the Bishop by the common law, by the Holy Council of Trent, and by the Apostolic Constitutions, he can compel them even through ecclesiastical censures. For this opinion, indeed, both the reasons, the repeatedly issued decrees of the Sacred Congregation, and the vote of Doctors agreeing almost unanimously may be seen in Pignatelli (volume 3, consultation 46, nos. 11 and 12) and Monacelli (part 3, title 3, formula 6, no. 13).

Reply 2. Negatively, if there is question of those religious who enjoy not only the general privilege of exemption but also a further special privilege by force of which, although they can be corrected and restrained by other penalties if they sin in those matters in which the Apostolic See has subjected them to Bishops, nevertheless they cannot be punished through censures. This privilege was never generally abrogated, although Gregory XV derogated from it in certain matters (Constitution Inscrutabili, section 6). - St. Alphonsus, no. 241 [6]. whenever it is necessary for compelling them in those matters in which religious are subjected to their jurisdiction.

[6] Care must diligently be taken lest the twofold exemption or immunity of religious from the censures of Bishops be confused. For one arises from this: that religious in certain matters are entirely exempt from the jurisdiction of Ordinaries; wherefore, since with respect to these things they are not their subjects, they are bound neither by their laws nor by their precepts, and therefore can be punished neither by censures nor by other penalties. If, however, in some matter they are subjected to the power of those same Ordinaries, and it has already been premised that in many matters they are so subjected, when sinning in these they can be corrected, punished, and restrained even by censures, as we have already said. But the other arises from this: that by a special privilege certain religious cannot be struck by censures even in those matters in which they are otherwise subject to the jurisdiction of Ordinaries, although they can be restrained and punished by them with other penalties. And indeed, from the lack of this distinction, see both Bonacina (On Enclosure, question 3, point 4, no. 8), Henriquez (Summary, book 7, chapter 25, no. 7), Ascanius Tamburinus (On the Right of an Abbess, disputation 25, question 9, no. 1), Peyrinus (On Religious, volume 2, on Constitution 6 of St. Pius V, no. 37), James de Graffis (Decisions, part 1, book 4, chapter 6, nos. 2, 3), and finally John Aloysius Riccius (Practice, volume 4, resolution 180), and in part also Joseph de Januario (Selected Resolutions, resolution 34, no. 16), carried astray.

Moreover, that this special privilege, plainly distinct from the common prerogative of exemption, was granted by the Apostolic See to certain religious is manifest from chapter Volentes 1, On Privileges, in the Sext; for in section 1 there is discussion of those to whom it has been granted by the Apostolic See that they cannot be interdicted, suspended, or excommunicated by anyone; as, it says, are very many religious, in whose privileges it is contained that no Bishop or Archbishop shall presume, for any cause or in any place, to interdict, suspend, or excommunicate the monks of their monasteries, etc. St. Alphonsus testifies the same concerning mendicants (book 7, no. 241), and that it was granted anew to the men of the Society of Jesus is plainly apparent from the Constitution Licet Debitum of Paul III, 18 October 1549. But what the Author says, that something was derogated from this privilege by Gregory XV, pertains only to any exempt persons whatever, both secular and religious, who presume to preach in the churches of others, or in churches which are not of their Orders, without the permission of the Bishop, and in their own churches or those of their Orders without having sought his blessing or while he contradicts; and power is given to Bishops that, against delinquents, as often as and whenever there is need, they may freely and licitly proceed through ecclesiastical censures and other penalties.

But what both De Luca, the most hostile enemy of this privilege (Ecclesiastical Miscellany, discourse 16), and Monacelli, who most diligently copied him (part 3, title 2, formula 6), object, that these privileges of religious were derogated by the Council of Trent, is nothing. For, first, privileges are derogated insofar as they conflict with the observance of the synodal decrees. But the faculty of proceeding through censures against religious is granted to Bishops by the Council concerning only these two things, namely: 1. that religious be compelled to restore to novices departing whatever they had given to the monastery; 2. that the enclosure of nuns be observed. Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 7, disputation 33, no. 23) adds a third case concerning a religious who celebrates Mass outside a church or oratory. But, moreover, that the mind of the Council was not to derogate from that special privilege of certain religious is apparent from the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of 9 April 1587, in which there is question of the same case as in the decree of the Council. Suarez (On Religion, tract 8, book 1, chapter 10, no. 27) reports it thus: Religious approaching monasteries of nuns without the permission of the Bishop incur the penalty of excommunication which the Bishop proposed by his edict, unless those religious had by privilege that they could not be excommunicated; and then they ought to be punished by their Superiors with another penalty.

And these things are splendidly confirmed from those which Prosper Fagnanus has on chapter Quanto, On Privileges, no. 9. For he proposes this question: Given the Constitution of Gregory XV concerning the privileges of exempt persons, can a religious, approaching without legitimate permission a monastery of nuns subject to religious and there speaking with a nun in the place appointed for conversations, be restrained and punished by the diocesan Bishop as delegate of the Apostolic See? He replies that the decision is plain: that he falls into excommunication if the Bishop imposed that penalty upon one going to the monastery. But then he expressly subjoins these things: The Sacred Congregation approved this opinion long ago when it declared that religious approaching monasteries of nuns, even those exempt from the jurisdiction of the Bishop, incur the penalty of excommunication proposed by the Bishop's edict against those approaching, unless they had a privilege by name that they could not be excommunicated; and nevertheless, even in that case, it judged that they were to be punished with other penalties.

From these things it is also gathered that neither Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 7, disputation 33, no. 23) nor Lezana (Summary of Questions of Religious, volume 2, part 3, under Exemption of Religious, no. 11) touched the matter precisely; for while they defend this privilege of religious, they except those three cases expressed in the Council of Trent. The same must be said of James Pignatelli, who falls into the same error, although otherwise he not only concedes that special privilege of certain religious (volume 3, consultation 46, no. 25, and volume 7, consultation 44, nos. 26, 27), but defends it by the vote of many Doctors.

 Concerning this and the preceding Note the VV. write (page 875): The things which Father Ballerini hands down here are indeed correct; but he less correctly asserts that St. Alphonsus, when his various statements are compared together, appears less coherent with himself. For from the things to be said it will be apparent that our Holy Doctor coheres well with himself and that the things Father B. hands down are also taught by St. Alphonsus.

Reply. I would indeed have preferred that the VV. had composed the sentence of the last part more suitably in almost this manner: Those things which Father Ballerini reported from more accurate Authors are taught by St. Alphonsus. And the reason is that Father B. advances nothing on his own authority, but everywhere devoted himself to this one pursuit: that those things which appeared to be more accurately arranged among the leaders and masters of every School should be subjected to the eyes and judgment of readers.

Meanwhile it remains that some reason be brought here why in the preceding Note it was said in passing that the opinions of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus concerning this argument, if they are compared together, may appear less coherent with one another.

1. Therefore, in the first place there occur those things which he writes generally of religious in this place (book 7, no. 26): But religious are simply exempt from episcopal jurisdiction from chapter Ne aliqui, On Privileges, in the Sext. See the Salmanticenses, no. 37. These things, moreover, appear to be referred to the immunity of all religious when there is question of censures which a Bishop imposes by his own and native authority; for to this also pertains the citation of the Salmanticenses (On Censures, chapter 1, no. 57). Let it now be passed over whether all religious of each sex enjoy this immunity and exemption. But as regards the present matter, the citation of chapter Ne aliqui would suggest that there is question there not of religious generally but specifically of those who among exempt persons themselves are fortified by a particular privilege.

2. Nearly the same obscurity and uncertain sense are displayed by those things which the Holy Doctor immediately subjoins there thus: And a Bishop cannot impose censures upon exempt or privileged religious, such as Mendicants and Jesuits (see below, no. 24, doubt 9), even if he proceeds as Apostolic Delegate, as Croix, book 7, no. 30, with Pelizzarius and others. Namely, the citation of Croix introduces a certain confusion. For those words, Even if he proceeds as Apostolic Delegate, which are likewise taken from Croix, would suggest that there is question here of exempt persons fortified by a special privilege. But, on the contrary, the Authors cited in that place by Croix, such as Krimer and Rodriguez, lead to a different opinion. For Krimer has these words in the place where he is cited by Croix (on book 5, no. 1681): It is inferred that exempt persons cannot be bound by censures by the Bishop either through a general or through a special sentence; thus Rodriguez, volume 2, question 59, article 5; which place of Rodriguez, namely, Croix also cites. But these things are referred to the common exemption of religious. - Moreover, Croix in the cited place, otherwise confusing diverse questions, as is apparent, had circumscribed his opinion by these words: Unless this has been granted to them, namely, to Bishops, specifically. When St. Alphonsus omits these words, his assertion becomes too universal under any hypothesis, as the example brought in the Note from the Constitution of Gregory XV suggests concerning religious who presume to preach in the churches of others without the Bishop's permission.

3. But, you will say, St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 26) refers the reader to no. 241 of the same book. But in this place he treats merely of the enclosure of nuns. Therefore, through this the opinion previously handed down is not sufficiently completed or limited here. But, moreover, what must be thought concerning the opinion of the Holy Doctor about this argument we now have from the VV. themselves. For they, as we saw above, write concerning the things said in the Note that the things which Father Ballerini hands down here are correct. But in the Note it is sufficiently shown that through those things which are contained in the Constitution of Gregory XV concerning the enclosure of nuns, the special privilege of religious was by no means derogated, so that those fortified by such a privilege, if perhaps they sinned concerning that matter, could be restrained and punished by the Bishop through censures. On the contrary, St. Alphonsus, in The Apostolic Man, tract 19, no. 42, answers affirmatively to the question, Do religious speaking with nuns incur excommunication reserved and imposed by the Bishop? And this applies even with respect to religious having a special privilege that the Bishop cannot excommunicate them. He adds this reason: For Bishops in Monasteries, even those subject to religious, are Delegates of the Apostolic See, as is said in the Bull Inscrutabilis of Gregory XV. But this reason otherwise can conclude nothing, since, as the Holy Doctor himself had said above, no. 2, a Bishop cannot impose censures against these privileged persons EVEN IF HE PROCEEDS AS APOSTOLIC DELEGATE. He repeats the same thing in book 7, no. 241, saying: Such a privilege ought to import this, that a Bishop cannot proceed against them even as Delegate of the Apostolic See. But this itself must also be moderated; because, as is shown in the Note, a Bishop certainly cannot proceed through censures against one privileged in this manner, but a religious of this kind can be restrained and punished with other penalties either by his own Superior or by the Bishop.

Moreover, the Holy Doctor in this place, book 7, no. 241, uses another reason for subjecting a religious of this kind to censures, as though the Constitution of Gregory XV derogated from such a privilege regarding the enclosure of nuns. Wherefore he subjoins: This, however, must be understood if the privilege was granted after the Bull of Gregory, but not if before it, since in the Bull it is said: They cannot protect themselves by any privileges and exemptions, etc. But it has already been indicated in the Note that the derogation of Gregory, even according to the testimony of Fagnanus, does not pertain to this; for in that paragraph of the Constitution, as is apparent from the text transcribed even by St. Alphonsus, not even the slightest mention of censures is made; and otherwise the VV. themselves admit that the things read in the Note are correct.

4. Now some things also concerning those which the Holy Doctor has in the Treatise on Privileges. First, therefore, no. 75, he writes: Here it must be noted that there is a response of the Sacred Congregation to the Bishop of Nebbio, 7 February 1632, where generally speaking it was said: In those matters in which jurisdiction over religious has been granted to the Bishop by the common law, by the Holy Council of Trent, and by the Apostolic Constitutions, he can compel them even through ecclesiastical censures. Wherefore, as Benedict XIV well observes (On the Diocesan Synod, book 9, chapter 15, no. 5), Bishops, with respect to the celebration of Masses, can compel all, although religious, to observe not only those things established by the Council but also those which are established by themselves. Wherefore the Most Eminent Cardinal Spinelli, when he was Archbishop of Naples, rightly commanded on 5 January 1743, under penalty of suspension from divine things, even religious not to admit any visiting priest to celebrate in their churches without permission of the Ordinary. Thus St. Alphonsus. But there are altogether many matters, as we said in the preceding Note, in which religious, even exempt religious, whom, namely, we distinguish from those whose Prelate is the Bishop, are subject to the jurisdiction of the Bishop. And Barbosa (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, part 3, allegation 105, from no. 14) numbers fifty-two cases; but Chockier (On the Jurisdiction of Ordinaries over Exempt Persons, part 2, question 45) numbers altogether one hundred and sixteen. But since, as St. Alphonsus himself teaches above, no. 1, religious are simply exempt from episcopal jurisdiction, it follows that if in some case a Bishop has jurisdiction over religious, it is granted to the Bishop either by the common law, by the Council of Trent, or by the Apostolic Constitutions, and that against them the Bishop, as the same St. Alphonsus teaches, tract 7, no. 241, proceeds in any of these cases as a Delegate. Therefore, according to the aforesaid Response of the Sacred Congregation to the Bishop of Nebbio, which St. Alphonsus adds in On Privileges, no. 75, was confirmed on 4 June 1672, and according to the consequences deduced from it by the same St. Alphonsus after Benedict XIV, it must be said that in all the cases which either Barbosa, Chockier, or others enumerate, Bishops can compel religious to their duty even through ecclesiastical censures.

 5. But behold, the same St. Alphonsus writes (On Privileges, no. 77): In three cases a Bishop can compel religious to obey, even by employing censures: the first is to restore goods to novices, as was said; the second, to observe enclosure, speaking of nuns; the third, to observe everything which has been established by the Bishop concerning the celebration of Masses. But these things are very far from those just premised, where the same Holy Doctor with Benedict XIV handed down that a Bishop can proceed through ecclesiastical censures against religious in all cases in which jurisdiction over those religious is attributed to him. For that St. Alphonsus, now recalling these three cases, speaks exclusively is evident from those things which he thus subjoins in the same place: Whether then in the other cases cited above the Bishop can compel religious by censure; Barbosa, Garzia, and others affirm, but Sanchez, Lezana, and the Salmanticenses with others more commonly deny it, on account of the many papal privileges which they bring forward concerning this matter.

6. Therefore, just as the things which the Holy Doctor hands down in this paragraph do not cohere with those which he had taught above, no. 4, in the same Treatise, so neither do they cohere with those which he has in book 7, no. 26, where, above no. 2, he generally denies that a Bishop can proceed through censures against privileged persons even if he proceeds as Apostolic Delegate; and again neither do they cohere with those which he discusses in book 7, no. 241, where he denies that a Bishop can proceed through censures even regarding the enclosure of nuns if the religious have those papal privileges which he recalls here.

But the cause of this dissonance of opinions is finally not obscure, if it is observed that St. Alphonsus took those things which he has in On Privileges, no. 75, from Lambertini's work On the Synod, book 9, chapter 15, no. 5; that he borrowed compendiously from the Salmanticenses (On Privileges, chapter 3, section 3) those things which he has in On Privileges, no. 77; that he excerpted from Croix, book 7, no. 30, and the Salmanticenses (On Censures, chapter 1, no. 37) the few things which he has in book 7, no. 26; and, from another source, those things which he discusses in book 7, no. 241, concerning the enclosure of nuns. For otherwise it is not easy to find an Author who treats this most intricate question exactly in all its parts; and otherwise, in order that the matter may shine forth sufficiently clearly as to each part, prolonged and intense labor is certainly needed, as can sufficiently be conjectured from those few things which are contained in the Note.

QUESTION 4. How ought one who doubts whether he is bound by a censure to conduct himself?

Reply. If he doubts whether he was absolved from a censure, he ought to hold himself as still entangled in the censure until he has questioned the Superior. The same must be said if he doubts concerning the power of the Superior in imposing the censure, since the presumption must always be for him. But it is otherwise if he doubts whether he has incurred the censure, whether the doubt is of fact, for example, concerning the crime, as if he doubts whether the striking of a cleric was gravely injurious; or the doubt is of law, that is, concerning the sentence, for example, in doubt whether the censure is latae or ferendae sententiae, etc. - St. Alphonsus, nos. 32 and 67.

950. ◦ QUESTION 5. Can someone be bound by several censures at once?

Reply. Affirmatively. For nothing prevents someone from being constrained by several bonds at once. For just as someone can commit several sins diverse in species and number, so also can he be bound at once by censures diverse in species and number, for example, by excommunication, suspension, if he is a cleric, and interdict, and also by several excommunications, etc. Indeed, on account of one offense someone can be bound at once a iure and ab homine, by the Pope and by the Bishop, so that he must be absolved by each, provided that the latter Superior intends to impose a new penalty. - Thus commonly, and absolutely more probably according to St. Alphonsus, no. 28.

Hence: 1. If someone by a single act commits two sins diverse in species, to each of which a censure is annexed, he will incur two censures; for example, one who kills a cleric in a place where homicide is prohibited under penalty of censure. It is otherwise, however, if that one sin does not have malices diverse in species. - St. Alphonsus, no. 28.

2. If someone repeats the same crime to which a censure is annexed by an act morally distinct from the first, he again incurs the same censure; but it is otherwise if the repeated acts are not morally distinct from one another. Thus one striking a cleric three or four times, with a notable interval posited between each strike, incurs three or four censures, while he incurs one if he strikes him several times continuously.

3. Likewise, an excommunicated Priest who successively absolves several penitents will incur several irregularities, because each time he confers a new Sacrament [7]. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.

[7] This example does not pertain to the matter, because it is not certainly established that several sins distinct in number are had here. See above, no. 211, question 9.

QUESTION 6. Does an appeal excuse from incurring a censure?

Reply 1. A legitimate appeal excuses from a conditional censure, provided that it is made before the lapse of the time granted for fulfilling the condition.

Reply 2. A legitimate appeal from a censure already imposed generally does not suspend it. Hence the common saying of Canonists is that the appeal is then devolutive, but not suspensive. - Thus Benedict XIV, Constitution A militantis.

QUESTION 7. Can an entire community be the subject of a censure?

Reply 1. Negatively with respect to excommunication, unless it is established that each and every person of the community is a participant in the crime and contumaciously persists in it.

Reply 2. Affirmatively with respect to suspension, yet so that, if there are any innocent persons, it strikes them only with respect to the functions and rights belonging to the community itself as such, but not with respect to functions and rights which belong to each one individually.

Reply 3. Affirmatively also with respect to interdict; this censure has this peculiarity, that if it is general it binds the entire community, and in it even the innocent, from chapter Si civitas 17, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext. Nor can the one imposing the censure therefore be accused of injustice; for, properly speaking, through such an interdict the innocent are not punished, but for just causes the Church withdraws her benefits and offices from the guilty and innocent alike. Common opinion. - See Schmalzgrueber, book 5, title 59, nos. 44-46.

Article IV. On Absolution from Censures

951. ○ Principles. - I. Censures are not removed through the repentance alone of the delinquent or through obedience toward the mandates of the Church, nor through the death of the one who imposed the censure; but absolution imparted by a legitimate judge or Superior is necessary. This is manifest from chapter Cum desideres, On the Sentence of Excommunication, and proposition 44 condemned by Alexander VII.

II. From a censure ab homine imposed by a particular sentence, only the following can absolve: 1. the one who imposed the censure; 2. his Superior; 3. his successor; 4. another delegated by any one of these. The reason is that it belongs to him to absolve to whom it belongs to bind [1]. The same must be said of reserved censures a iure.

[1] For this reason it applies even if the guilty party changes domicile. Hence St. Alphonsus well observes (book 7, no. 72) that if someone sinned in another territory in such a manner that he was specially excommunicated by the Bishop of that place, he cannot be absolved by his own Bishop except with the permission of the excommunicating Bishop.

But note that this is said of a censure ab homine imposed by a particular sentence; for censures which are indeed ab homine but imposed by a general sentence are, according to the more probable opinion, equated with those imposed a iure which are not reserved; and therefore whoever has jurisdiction over the guilty party can absolve him. See St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 73) and Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 94).

 But why the VV. here (page 948, no. 162) propose the doctrine of Father Gury as dissenting from the doctrine of St. Alphonsus can scarcely be understood. For after in Principle II he denies to any priest the right to absolve from censures ab homine, and then in Principle III likewise denies to any priest the faculty of absolving from censures reserved in any manner either to the Supreme Pontiff or to the Bishop, he appears to embrace everything sufficiently. The sole difference consists in this: that Gury hands down in this same place those things which the Holy Doctor Alphonsus has partly in no. 70 and partly in no. 73, as is apparent from this Note.

III. Any Confessor can absolve from censures not specially reserved to the Pope or Bishop. This is established from chapter Nuper, On the Sentence of Excommunication. - St. Alphonsus, no. 70 [2].

[2] St. Alphonsus adds that this absolution is valid also for the external forum; this opinion is admitted as more common and more probable. See Suarez (On Censures, disputation 7, section 5, no. 15), who nevertheless rightly warns in the same place, no. 29, that where the censure is public, although not juridically denounced, in order to prevent scandal it ought to be publicly established that absolution has been given, so that someone may publicly conduct himself as absolved. Nevertheless, scandal is sufficiently prevented if it is publicly established that he confessed to one having the faculty of absolving and that satisfaction, if any was necessary, was rendered.

But regarding privileges granted to religious for absolving from reserved censures, Clement X established (Constitution Superna, section 6): By force of the aforesaid privileges it is by no means licit for religious, even when satisfaction has been made to the party, to absolve penitents from censures with respect to the external and judicial forum; and those absolved by them in the penitential forum are certainly not considered absolved in the exterior and contentious judgment. Indeed, those entangled in and denounced by ecclesiastical censures can be compelled by Bishops to conduct themselves as such even if they were absolved by religious. Urban VIII likewise provided (Constitution In specula militantis) concerning those who by privilege of the Bull of the Crusade choose for themselves a Confessor by whom they may be absolved from cases even reserved to the Pope. But this declaration must not be extended to other indults; rather, the formulas of each must be inspected.

But whether and to what extent absolution from censures given in the forum of conscience can avail for the external forum, and how the absolved person ought to conduct himself both when the censure was occult and when it was notorious, and what caution must be employed where the cause has been brought to the external forum, see Laymann (book 1, tract 5, part 1, chapter 7, no. 7) and Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 1, question 3, point 10, no. 3).

952. ○ IV. By a privilege granted by the Council of Trent, chapter Liceat, Bishops can absolve even from occult papal censures, excepting those which are reserved to the Pontiff in a special manner. See the things said above, On the Privileges of Bishops, no. 124. But the Bishops of those regions in which the Council has not yet been received do not enjoy this privilege. See Fagnanus (on chapter Dilectus, On the Time of Ordinations, no. 15), Suarez (On Faith, disputation 44, section 2, no. 6), Sanchez (On the Decalogue, book 2, chapter 11, no. 3), and Lugo (On Faith, disputation 23, no. 54). - Moreover, from censures reserved to the Pope, even non-occult ones, in favor of those who are impeded from going to Rome either for a long time or even perpetually, of which sort the aged, children, women, the infirm, the poor, etc., are considered. Recall the things said concerning the privileges of Bishops in the Treatise on States, no. 124, and in the Treatise on Penance, no. 576. - See St. Alphonsus, no. 84 and following. - Hence this rule is commonly received by the Doctors: A papal case, when an impediment to approaching the Pope supervenes, becomes episcopal. Indeed, Castro Palao with certain others thinks that absolution from censures in this case pertains not only to the Bishop but to any Confessor; and this opinion does not appear improbable. - St. Alphonsus, no.

92; Pichler, book 5, title 39, no. 14. But absolution of this kind cannot be given either by the Bishop or by any other priest unless the burden of presenting himself to the Superior when the impediment has ceased is imposed upon the penitent [3].

[3] This burden is not imposed when the impediment can be judged perpetual. See the things said above, no. 575, and the Note there.

V. All Priests, from the Council of Trent, session 14, chapter 7, can absolve from any censure whatever, and therefore not only from excommunications but also from suspensions and interdicts, however reserved, those who are placed at the point of death, but, the Authors say, with the burden of presenting themselves to the Superior or Delegate if they recover. There are nevertheless those who think that the burden of presenting oneself to the Superior has place only when the censure is notorious, or the matter was brought to the contentious forum, or the law itself established such an obligation. - But see the things said in the section on Penance, no. 576.

953. ◦ Resolutions. - 1. An Archbishop or even a Patriarch, indeed also a Legate a latere, although superior to a Bishop, cannot absolve the subjects of Suffragans except in the sole case of a just appeal or visitation by virtue of office, because in other cases he does not enjoy jurisdiction properly so called.

2. An ecclesiastical Superior or delegate can absolve from censures even if he is not a Priest. The reason is that the jurisdiction required for absolving from censures can reside in a cleric initiated even by tonsure alone.

3. One who has a general faculty of absolving from papal censures cannot therefore absolve from cases reserved in a special manner, as formerly in the cases of the Bull Coenae, unless this is explicitly expressed in the concession; for special things are not contained of themselves in a general concession. Likewise, one who can absolve from specially reserved censures cannot therefore absolve from a censure inflicted upon one absolving an accomplice. Declaration of the Holy Office, 17 June 1866.

4. A faculty granted by a Bishop for reserved sins is not understood for sins reserved with a censure; it is otherwise if the concession was made by the Pope, because all papal cases are reserved with a censure, excepting two, namely: 1. false accusation of solicitation against a priest; 2. acceptance of notable gifts by religious. The moreover, notable gifts are considered those which are equivalent to ten scudi [4]. - See St. Alphonsus, no. 5. Nevertheless, note that this reservation does not affect the sin of accepting gifts; therefore, if someone, recognizing that he cannot retain the gifts accepted, restores them or wishes to restore them, he can be absolved by any Confessor. The reservation, therefore, consists in this: that he cannot be absolved unless he restores them or obtains remission of the debt from the Pope, since the Pontiff has reserved this to himself.

[4] What that means which the Author says concerning the sum of ten scudi you will learn more clearly from Innocent XII in the Constitution Romanus Pontifex, 3 September 1692, in which are contained the faculties granted to the Major Penitentiary. Let him not absolve, nor command to be absolved (he says), religious receiving gifts contrary to the Constitution of Clement VIII of happy memory beyond the value of ten scudi in money before restitution has been made; but below the aforesaid value, let him absolve, or command to be absolved, only after an alms has been made at the judgment of the Penitentiary himself or of the Confessor to be chosen by him, which is to be expended for the benefit of the Religion or Convent to which restitution would by law have to be made, if it can be done cautiously. And you have this same thing in the Constitution Pastor bonus of Benedict XIV, 13 April 1744.

Therefore, the words of the Author are not to be understood as though gifts which do not attain the value of ten scudi cannot be notable, or as though gifts below that value can be retained by the recipient in such a way that he does not need that remission of the debt which the Apostolic See reserved to itself; but those words are to be taken merely in this sense: that one receiving gifts exceeding that value cannot be absolved by the Major Penitentiary unless the obligation of restoring is imposed; but if the gifts do not exceed that measure, the recipient can be absolved with the obligation imposed of only some alms, to be determined at the judgment of the same Penitentiary or of the Confessor to be chosen.

5. Absolution from censures must be given not only to those who certainly or doubtfully incurred them, but also to every penitent before he is absolved from sins, so that any impediment which perhaps exists to receiving the Sacrament may be removed [5]. - (From the Roman Ritual.) But as to what formula is to be used, recall the things said where Penance was treated, no. 430.

[5] Since the use of the sacraments is forbidden to the excommunicated, absolution from excommunication must always precede absolution from sins. But where it is not established that the penitent is bound by it, absolution is merely premised as a precaution.

954. ○ Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can an absent person be absolved?

Reply. Affirmatively, at least validly. The reason is that, just as a penalty can be established against an absent person, so also it can be removed. This is also evidently deduced from Canon Law [6].

[6] If, nevertheless, there is question of the faculty granted to Bishops by the Council of Trent in chapter Liceat (see above, no. 952), so that they can absolve any of their subjects in their diocese, according to the more probable interpretation, which Lugo also embraces after Suarez (On Censures, disputation 41, section 2, no. 11 and following; On Faith, disputation 23, nos. 73-76), it seems that it must be said that a Bishop absent from the diocese can indeed absolve a penitent existing in the diocese, but not conversely. Lugo himself confirms this interpretation from a certain Declaration of the Sacred Congregation.

Nor ought it to stand in the way of this resolution that St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 593, and book 7, no. 81), with Barbosa (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, part 2, allegation 59, no. 8) and certain others, thinks that those words of the same Chapter, For the forum of conscience, have the same force as in sacramental Confession.

For, as Lugo well says (loc. cit., no. 64), the contrary opinion is common to almost all; and this is apparent from the lengthy catalogue of Doctors whom even Barbosa (loc. cit.) presents for it. And indeed (Lugo continues) the contrary cannot be sufficiently proved from the words of Trent; and it seems to be deduced from general principles, since it is established that absolution from censures can be separated from absolution from sins. Nor does that limitation, For the forum of conscience, compel this to be done in the sacrament; for those words have another sense, namely, lest this absolution avail for the external forum, in which, although someone has been absolved by the Bishop for the forum of conscience, he will be regarded as not absolved and will be punished with all the penalties of law. He then himself solves the difficulty which perhaps could be drawn from two Declarations of the Sacred Congregation; and that solution fits very well also with what Fagnanus (on chapter Dilectus, On the Time of Ordinations, nos. 35, 36) relates was declared by Gregory XIII; for the controversy was not then whether a Bishop could absolve within the sacrament of Penance or outside it, but whether by force of chapter Liceat he could absolve these or those persons.

Moreover, that anyone who has the power of absolving from a censure in the forum of conscience can perform this even outside confession is the common opinion, with which St. Alphonsus also agrees generally (book 7, no. 126); and it must be attributed only to a lapse of memory that Busembaum (in St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.) presents Suarez and Navarre as opposed, although they plainly agree with the others (see Suarez, On Vows, book 6, chapter 16, no. 4, and Navarre, Counsels, book 5, On Privileges, counsel XI, no. 2).

But what must be especially noted is that this same thing holds even if: 1. a faculty has been given of absolving in the penitential forum. See Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 1, question 3, point 6, no. 8) and Suarez (On Laws, book 8, chapter 6, no. 16); or 2. the faculty is committed to a priest, or to a priest-confessor, or even to a priest hearing confessions. See Suarez (On Laws, book 8, chapter 6, no. 16); indeed, 3. even if the faculty of absolving is given after confession has been heard. See Sanchez (On Matrimony, book 8, disputation 16, no. 11), Emmanuel Rodriguez (Questions of Religious, volume 1, question 61, article 7), Gaspar Hurtado (On Excommunication, disputation 15, difficulty 5, nos. 17, 18), Avila (part 2, chapter 7, disputation 3, doubt 13), Giles Coninck (disputation 14, On Excommunication, doubt 46, no. 252), and, others being omitted, Felix Potestas (Examination of Confessors, no. 3460).

Coninck (loc. cit., no. 251) thus indicates what use there can be of this doctrine, namely, that if the guilty party is not prepared to confess immediately and causes are present on account of which it is expedient that he immediately be absolved (from excommunication, suspension, or interdict); and the same could be said when one who has the power of absolving from reserved censures did not have time to hear an entire confession; for then he could hear only the cases which have excommunication annexed to them, and then absolve from this, and send the penitent to another who, after hearing the confession, would absolve from sins. Thus, with others, Avila, part 2, chapter 7, disputation 3, doubt 13.

QUESTION 2. Can an absent Bishop absolve one existing in the diocese?

Reply. Affirmatively, according to all. The reason is that knowledge of the cause and judicial proceedings are not required for absolution; and therefore nothing prevents a Bishop from exercising such an act of jurisdiction in another's territory. It is otherwise, nevertheless, if judicial proceedings should at times be required. - St. Alphonsus, no. 21.

955. ○ QUESTION 3. Can an unwilling person be absolved?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is the same as that just adduced; for just as a penalty can be imposed upon one absent and unwilling, so also it can be removed from him. Nevertheless, it is not expedient that this be done without a very grave reason, and care must be taken lest, while he has not ceased from contumacy, the censure be held in contempt. - St. Alphonsus, no. 117.

QUESTION 4. Can one who is bound by several censures be absolved from one while the others remain?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that there is no necessary connection among them. Mortal sins indeed can by no means be absolved one without the others; but it is otherwise with censures, whose absolution does not confer sanctifying grace upon the censured person. They are regarded, therefore, after the manner of chains, some of which can be loosed without the others.

QUESTION 5. Can one be absolved from censures who has not yet publicly repaired the scandal on account of which he was subject to those censures?

Reply. Negatively, at least per se and speaking generally. This is established from the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, 5 July 1857 [7].

[7] Here belongs the question concerning absolution which is conferred without satisfaction having been made to the party. Concerning it, this is certain: that it is illicit, whether it is thus given by the Ordinary or by a Delegate, both on account of the injury done to the party and because one absolving thus violates the order of law, which prescribes that real satisfaction be premised, if it can be done, as Schmalzgrueber says (book 5, title 39, no. 101).

Nevertheless, three cases, as is fitting, are excepted: 1. when the injured party remits the injury; 2. when the injured party rejects just satisfaction, because then it no longer stands through the guilty party that the one offended is not worthily satisfied; 3. when the guilty party is unable to make satisfaction; for then the judge (as St. Alphonsus notes, book 7, no. 128) not only can but ought to absolve him, and can be compelled to this from chapter Qua fronte 25, On Appeals, because when contumacy ceases, the guilty party ought to be absolved. Concerning this matter Suarez excellently adds (On Censures, disputation 7, section 5, no. 41) these things which pertain to practice: I think that, according to the quality of the matter and condition of the person and other circumstances occurring, it must be considered whether the penitent can morally make satisfaction effectively before he is absolved from the censure, and then this must be premised; but if he cannot, nor can absolution be deferred except for a long time or with great detriment, then I think that he can be absolved if he makes satisfaction in the manner in which he can at present, that is, by furnishing security, either by pledge, if he can, or by oath, if he cannot furnish greater, and by displaying such signs of repentance and purpose that the confessor may probably judge that absolution will both profit the penitent himself and not impede him, or become an occasion why he would not later make satisfaction after acquiring the ability.... But the reason for this opinion is that when the Pontiff says, the party having been satisfied, it is to be understood, insofar as the penitent can make satisfaction; because it is not likely that the Pontiff demands an impossible condition.

Nevertheless, what Diana has concerning the securities to be demanded (volume 5, tract 1, resolution 186, no. 2), citing John Valerus and Henriquez, must not be omitted: It must therefore be said probably that that procedure of satisfaction and security by pledge and oath appears to be understood for the exterior forum; for in the penitential forum, when the possibility of the penitent is lacking, his firm purpose alone has as much force as the giving of pledges or sureties in the judicial forum. Therefore in the forum of conscience it will suffice to believe the penitent.

But meanwhile there must be kept before the eyes also the warning which Reiffenstuel hands down (book 5, title 39, no. 270): Although Laymann rightly notes that, for the internal forum, with the quality of the person considered, even the bare promise or pledged faith of the censured person suffices if the censure is occult, nevertheless he also rightly warns (book 1, tract 5, part 1, chapter 7, no. 7) that privileged Regulars ought to beware lest, even for the internal forum alone, they absolve anyone notoriously censured by force of the common law or of a general sentence, for example, one excommunicated, or one whose excommunication has already been brought to the contentious forum, before he has actually made satisfaction to the injured party; because otherwise, if such a guilty party already exists as absolved at least for the internal forum, he cannot so easily be driven by the Church to make satisfaction to the injured party. Regular Confessors ought well to observe this; although even in notoriously excommunicated persons of this kind circumstances can persuade that absolution for the internal forum may prudently be given upon only a prior security or promise.

But as regards the validity of absolution imparted without satisfaction having been made to the party, two things are established among all, namely: 1. absolution is valid if it is conferred by the Ordinary; 2. but it is invalid if conferred by a Delegate, if satisfaction of the party is enjoined as a condition; for it is manifestly apparent that a faculty delegated with a condition is not conceded, and therefore does not avail, when the condition has not been fulfilled.

The question turns upon whether, when the faculty of absolving is given by the Pontiff with that clause, The party having been satisfied, this is to be taken as a condition without which the faculty is not granted. And St. Alphonsus indeed (book 7, no. 121) holds the affirmative opinion as more probable, although he also concedes that the opposite is probable. But contrariwise, the Salmanticenses (On Censures, chapter 2, no. 25) and Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 1, question 3, part 9, no. 3) judge the negative opinion more probable, and Sanchez calls it most probable (On Matrimony, book 3, disputation 33, no. 6). But other grave Doctors teach it absolutely; among whom it suffices to name Reiffenstuel (Moral Theology, tract 15, distinction 2, question 5, section 1, no. 107), Pirhing (on book 5, title 39, no. 163), Hurtado, and others, some of whom St. Alphonsus also recalls (book 6, no. 537, question VII).

And indeed this opinion rests upon a principle received among all. The Doctors distinguish (see Sanchez, On Matrimony, book 3, disputation 33, no. 3) whether in a commission or delegation the form of the common law is expressed in the manner in which it is inherent in the law, or whether some limited mode is added to the common form of law. In the prior case, namely, if the common form of law is merely expressed in the delegation, they establish that it is not the intention of the one commissioning to introduce a new form or condition, but that it is a certain admonition that the common form be observed; wherefore, if it is omitted, the act, which otherwise would be valid if that form were not expressed in the commission, is not invalidated. It is otherwise in the latter case; for that addition to the common form of law imports a condition. See Sanchez, who (loc. cit.) both illustrates the matter with examples and confirms it by the authority of the Gloss and the Canonists. Among them Covarruvias (on chapter Alma, part 1, section 9, no. 8) says: It is noted by the common opinion of all that those things which are inherent in law by no means introduce a form or condition, even if they have been expressed by man. He notes this so that he may establish that an excommunication imposed by a delegate without the threefold warning being premised is valid, though unjust, even if the clause the threefold warning having been premised were contained in the mandate.

Navarre, moreover (Manual, chapter 27, no. 37), having recalled the Gloss on the sole Clementine On the Office of a Delegate at the word shall find, which he calls most received and in which the principle under discussion is most expressly contained, after first premising that absolution would be invalid if the delegate did not observe a form other than that of law, adds: I said, Other than that of law; because, as we answered earlier, absolution given by virtue of the Pope's mandate to absolve according to the form of law is valid, although it is not observed, as it would be valid if done without that mandate by the Ordinary through ordinary authority; because it was not the Pope's intention to introduce a new form through those words (The party having been satisfied), but to admonish the commissioner of that which according to law he ought to do; which Innocent said in a similar matter, etc. You may see the same principle inculcated also by Reiffenstuel (Moral Theology, tract 15, distinction 2, no. 107) and Laymann (On Censures, part 2, chapter 6, no. 8).

The sole reason which is usually brought forward for the opposite opinion is that an ablative absolute, of which sort is the form The party having been satisfied, imports a condition, as Benedict XIV notes (Instruction 87, no. 68). It is easily answered that this pertains to that kind of arguments which are usually called arguments from congruity and which generally fail, unless at times they are accidentally true by reason of the matter, or, as Laymann says (loc. cit.), because the required condition pertains to the substance of the act. And of this kind, indeed, in the opinion of Benedict XIV, was that ablative absolute of which he was treating, The party having been informed; since (as he says) that mandate of the Penitentiary rests upon the common law, which demands a new consent from the spouses for duly ratifying a marriage, etc. On the contrary, it fails in the example which you have in Sanchez (loc. cit., no. 6), when the faculty is given of assisting at a marriage after the banns have been premised.

As to what certain ones say, that the delegating party is not considered to give the faculty of absolving without satisfaction having been made to the party because this is illicit, Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 101) solves it thus from the common opinion: Nor does it follow from this that the delegating party sins by granting the faculty of absolving validly without satisfaction having been made to the party; for just as the Church does not sin in granting this power to the Ordinary, so neither will the Ordinary sin if he delegates it in that manner in which he himself possesses it; for sufficient provision is made for the right of a third party, while absolution of this kind is prohibited. But concerning these things, enough has now been said for the measure of a note.

Chapter II. On Censures in Particular, Namely: 1. on Excommunication; 2. on Suspension; 3. on Interdict

Article I. On Excommunication

We must treat: 1. of its nature and division; 2. of its effects; 3. of excommunications in particular.

I. On the Nature and Division of Excommunication

956. ○ Definition. Excommunication is a censure through which someone is deprived of the communion of the Church; or, a censure by which a Christian is deprived, either entirely or in part, of the common spiritual goods of the Church, the distribution of which belongs to her [1].

[1] Since the goods in which the faithful communicate among themselves are of a threefold kind, namely: 1. internal; 2. merely external; 3. mixed; the Church by excommunicating deprives one only of communion in goods of the second and third kinds.

Under the old law it was distinguished into: 1. major excommunication, which deprives one of all the common goods of the Church [2]; 2. minor excommunication, which deprived one only of certain goods. But this latter must be said to have been abolished through the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis. For in it it is said: By this Constitution, to remain in force perpetually, We decree that, of whatever censures, whether of excommunication, suspension, or interdict, which up to this time have been imposed after the manner of a latae sententiae penalty and to be incurred by the fact itself, only those which We insert in this very Constitution, and in the manner in which We insert them, shall henceforth possess force. But that which is called minor excommunication, concerning which see the following number, question 2, is in no manner inserted in the aforesaid Constitution. Therefore. Nevertheless, the cessation of this penalty does not effect the cessation also of the fault which one incurs by communicating with an excommunicated person to be avoided.

[2] By the name of excommunication in law, Major Excommunication is almost always understood, as St. Alphonsus also notes from the common opinion (book 7, no. 133); nevertheless, before Gregory IX, Minor Excommunication was also at times included. See Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 119).

But the word anathema is used in the Sacred Canons sometimes to distinguish it from minor excommunication, as in chapter Engellrudam 12, cause 8, question 4; sometimes to signify excommunication inflicted on account of heresy or suspicion of it; finally, to signify certain solemnities, as, for example, when an excommunication is denounced with candles lit and afterward extinguished, and with other ceremonies instituted by the Church (Schmalzgrueber, loc. cit., no. 117).

Of those excommunicated by major excommunication, some are called tolerated, whom the faithful are not bound to avoid; others are called not tolerated, or persons to be avoided, whom the faithful ought to avoid [3].

[3] Under the ancient law, whoever had incurred major excommunication imposed either a iure or ab homine was to be avoided, with this difference alone: that those whose excommunication was public and notorious were to be avoided publicly; but those whose excommunication was not publicly known were to be avoided only privately by those who were aware of it. A trace of this discipline also exists in chapter Cum non ab homine 14, On the Sentence of Excommunication. But under the new law, in order to prevent various sins and scandals which it was observed could befall timorous consciences, it was granted to the faithful of Christ that no one should be bound to abstain from communion with anyone bound by any censure, whether a iure or ab homine, unless a sentence against a certain person had been specifically and expressly published by a judge, or unless it was so notoriously established that he had incurred excommunication imposed by the canon through a sacrilegious laying of hands upon a cleric that the fact could not be concealed by any evasion or excused by any defense.

In the Constitution of the Council of Constance approved by Martin V, through which this new law was introduced, these words also are added (as it is recited in the Council of Basel and the Bull of Leo X in the Lateran Council): Nevertheless, through this We do not intend in any respect to relieve excommunicated, suspended, interdicted, or prohibited persons of this kind, nor in any manner to aid them. From these words there exists the common doctrine of all that no advantage which censured persons can claim by law comes to them from the aforesaid Constitution.

957. ○ Questions. - QUESTION 1. In order that an excommunicated person to be avoided ought to be avoided, is it necessary that he be publicly known as such?

Reply. Affirmatively. For it does not suffice that you know he is to be avoided, but it is required in addition that the fact of that excommunication be truly notorious, namely, that he has been excommunicated by name and publicly by a competent judge, or denounced as already bound by excommunication. - St. Alphonsus, no. 137. But he is excommunicated by name who is designated by his expressed name in words or signs so indubitable that he is altogether distinguished from others. - St. Alphonsus, no. 136.

But it must be noted that, although you are not bound to avoid an excommunicated person who has not been denounced, nevertheless, you can avoid him, even publicly, if he is publicly known as excommunicated [4]. - St. Alphonsus, no. 157.

[4] The reason was given above, namely, that the faculty granted to the faithful of not avoiding an excommunicated person of this kind is only in their favor, not for any advantage of his.

But one who has laid sacrilegious hands upon a Cleric is excepted, in such a way that his offense can neither be concealed by any evasion nor excused by any means. Hence he immediately, and before the sentence itself of the judge, incurs excommunication and ought to be avoided. Thus expressly Martin V in the Bull Ad evitanda scandala [5].

[5] This Constitution, as it is inserted in the Acts of the Council of Basel and in the Bull of Leo X in the Lateran Council, and as Navarre also read it (Manual, chapter 27, no. 35), in its latter part commands that not merely notorious strikers of Clerics, but absolutely all persons notoriously excommunicated, although not denounced by name, are to be avoided. Hence Fagnanus (on chapter Quod a Praedecessore, On Schismatics, no. 55) contends that whoever is certainly recognized by the notoriety of the fact to have fallen into excommunication is to be avoided. But Navarre himself (loc. cit.) testifies that this was received by custom only with respect to notorious strikers of Clerics (as the Constitution appears to have been issued in the Council of Constance). But Fagnanus's opinion is commonly rejected, as Benedict XIV says (On the Diocesan Synod, book 12, chapter 5, no. 4), who then confirms this by the vote of many Doctors.

Benedict XIV adds (ibid.) that it is remarkable that the Acts of the Council of Constance in no Collection whatever of Councils make even the slightest mention of this Constitution, whose entire authority would therefore be derived from the testimony of St. Antoninus. But what he himself found neither in Labbe nor in Vonderhardt nor in the Supplements of Mansi did in fact exist in Hardouin (Councils, volume 8, column 892), from whom it was afterward also received into the very ample new Collection of Councils (volume 27, column 1189).

Moreover, the common opinion, which excepts only notorious strikers of clerics, is established from these words of the Constitution itself: Except if it is established that someone, for sacrilege and the laying of hands upon the clergy, has fallen under a sentence imposed by the canon so notoriously that the fact cannot be concealed by any evasion nor excused by any defense of law. For We will that communion with him, although he has not been denounced, be abstained from, according to the canonical sanctions.

QUESTION 2. What must be held concerning MINOR EXCOMMUNICATION, now abrogated?

Reply. Hold these few things:

1. It was not incurred except on account of communication with a person to be avoided. Hence, in the present discipline of the Church it is exceedingly rare, since excommunicated persons to be avoided appear very rarely†.

2. It deprived one only of the reception of the Sacraments [6], and of passive election to benefices and dignities of the Church. Hence it did not deprive one of the faculty of administering the Sacraments. And therefore one who, entangled in such an excommunication, administered the Sacraments sinned neither gravely nor, more probably, venially.

[6] By violating this precept one sinned gravely, from chapter Si celebrat, final, On an Excommunicated Cleric, which reads thus: If one bound by minor excommunication celebrates, although he sins gravely, he incurs no mark of irregularity; nor is he prohibited from electing or from exercising those things which belong to him by reason of jurisdiction. See Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 198).

3. Any Priest approved by the Bishop could absolve from it. For usage had thus prevailed. - Thus all.

958. ○ QUESTION 3. Was grave fault required for incurring minor excommunication?

Reply. Negatively; but a fully deliberate venial fault sufficed [7]. The reason adduced was that it does not deprive one of so notable a good, and absolution from it can most easily be obtained from any Priest. Nevertheless, the fault on account of which minor excommunication had been inflicted could not be omitted in confession, although it was venial, because it impeded reception of the Sacrament. - St. Alphonsus, nos. 153, 154.

[7] I think that this must be understood of a venial sin by reason of slightness of matter, as because the communication is slight, in some salutation, conversation, or common table; but if the sin is venial by reason of imperfect deliberation and advertence, it seems to me more probable that the censure is not incurred. Suarez (On Censures, disputation 24, section 3, no. 3).

II. On the Effects of Excommunication

959. ○ Eight effects of excommunication are numbered [8], namely: 1. deprivation of the Sacraments; 2. deprivation of divine Offices; 3. deprivation

[8] These effects of excommunication are called immediate, which the Doctors distinguish from others which they call mediate. But these are:

1. Irregularity, which anyone bound by major excommunication incurs when he exercises an act of some Order, for example, by conferring sacraments, etc. Concerning this below, where Irregularity is treated.

2. Suspicion of heresy, which he incurs who contumaciously persists, or grows sordid, in excommunication for an entire year; the reason is that he is presumed to think wrongly concerning the power of the Church, while he cares nothing either for the censures imposed by her or for the sacraments which are omitted by him contrary to the precept of the Church. See Bonacina (On Censures, disputation 2, question 2, final part, no. 2) and Suarez (On Censures, disputation 17, section 1, no. 6). And to this pertains that statement of the Council of Trent (session 25, On Reformation, chapter 3): If, hardened in mind and bound by censures, he has grown sordid in them for a year, it may be possible to proceed even against him as one suspected of heresy. Nevertheless, La Croix (book 7, no. 287), whom St. Alphonsus followed (book 7, no. 157), without reason transfers this to all censures; for the context of the Council expressly regards excommunicated persons. But two things are to be noted. The first is that this must be understood of excommunicated persons denounced by name. Thus Covarruvias (on chapter Alma, part 1, section 7, no. 10), Sayrus (On Censures, book 2, chapter 10, no. 10), Marius Alterius (On Censures, book 2, disputation

8, chapter 3), Ugolinus (On Censures, table 1, chapter 14, section 3, no. 34), etc. The other is that this is a light suspicion, even though it suffices for enjoining purgation upon the accused. See Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 195).

3. Proof of the offense or cause on account of which excommunication was imposed. For one who has been excommunicated by a judge on account of a civil or criminal cause and perseveres in that excommunication for a year, without showing any impediment or sign of satisfaction, ought to be held as convicted and confessed from chapter Rursus 36 and following chapter 37, cause 11, question 3; because that contumacy is regarded as confession by a fiction of law. Nevertheless, he is permitted to allege and prove his innocence. Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 196).

4. Deprivation of benefices obtained, if there is question of an ecclesiastical person and the crime for which he was cited beforehand is worthy of such deprivation. Concerning this matter Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 197) thus briefly presents the common doctrine: An excommunicated person persevering for three years in excommunication with a hardened mind ought to be deprived by the judge of all benefices; because he is unworthy to enjoy the fruits of the Church who exists in such rebellion against her, and thus the Pontiff acted in chapter Cum bonae 8, On Age and Quality.... On account of perseverance for a year, although judges can inflict this penalty of deprivation of benefices, nevertheless they are not bound to do so, because this obligation is nowhere provided in law.

 Against that which is said in this Note, no. 2, namely, that Croix without reason transfers to all censures that which the laws and the Doctors say concerning excommunication, namely, that he becomes suspected of heresy who grows sordid in it for a year, the VV. object first of all (page 877) that Croix proves this from the cited text of Trent not directly but indirectly, saying: It applies also to other censures.

Reply. The VV. plainly strive by these things to defend the Holy Doctor Alphonsus, who says that this is proved by Croix from Trent. For thus the Holy Doctor writes (book 7, no. 157): To grow sordid is to persevere for a year with a pertinacious mind and with contempt of the power of the Church in the same excommunication, or in another censure, as Croix says, book 7, no. 287, and proves from Trent, session 25, chapter 3.

But Croix does indeed prove from Trent what it is to grow sordid, but nothing else. For thus he says (book 7, no. 287): Insordescence is said principally by reason of excommunication; nevertheless it also applies to other censures. But according to the Council of Trent cited in no. 18, he is said to be growing sordid in a censure who with a pertinacious mind and with contempt of ecclesiastical power perseveres in the censure for a year. But if from Trent he had wished also to prove what he adds concerning other censures, he would have joined the citation of Trent to those preceding words, nevertheless it also applies to other censures, which he added of his own accord and contrary to the opinion of all the Doctors, and would not have appended it to the following period. But Croix can be excused only insofar as he wished to indicate that contumacy, which we shall call insordescence, can occur also in those who have been bound by another censure; which indeed all knew, even if he had remained silent about it.

Moreover, to what purpose would Croix have invoked Trent for that empty and groundless addition, when Trent treats merely of one excommunicated? For thus reads the Decree of the Council (loc. cit.): But any excommunicated person, if after legitimate warnings he has not come to his senses, is not only not to be received to the Sacraments and the communion and familiar association of the faithful; but if, hardened in mind and bound by censures, he has grown sordid in them for a year, it may be possible to proceed even against him as one suspected of heresy. Indeed, these words of Trent are so far from being capable of application to those bound by another censure as it is abhorrent to the law and custom of the Church that one merely suspended or interdicted cannot be received into the communion and familiar association of the faithful.

But what is the chief point, Croix in his definition of insordescence omitted that which was to be noted before all else, namely, that in the Decree of Trent there is question of one against whom, after a judicial cause had been instituted, the penalty of excommunication had been imposed by name and ab homine on account of contumacy. Although these things afterward can in some manner be inferred from those which the same Croix (loc. cit., nos. 288-291) subjoins concerning diverse causes, nevertheless, since this is entirely omitted in St. Alphonsus, his opinion, thus expressed in general words, can easily lead to absurd conclusions, namely, even to any censures imposed a iure.

To defend that anomalous extension by Croix of the Decree of Trent to any censure, the VV. (page 878) thus argue: Before the Council of Trent the Canonists commonly held that any excommunicated person persevering in excommunication for a year becomes suspected of heresy, although this was not expressed in law. But if it was lawful for them, on account of identity of reason, to extend a particular case circumscribed by certain conditions to all cases of excommunication, by the same right it is certainly lawful to extend the disposition of the Council of Trent to the other censures on account of the same identity.

Reply. With the historical part omitted: 1. I deny the antecedent; 2. I deny the consequence. I said, with the historical part omitted, because the VV. will never prove that it had not been received by usage that, even before Trent, proceedings were taken as against persons suspected of heresy against those contumacious for a year after, on account of another preceding contumacy, they had already been excommunicated by name and publicly. Wherefore, even if not by written law, it can nevertheless deservedly be supposed that this had already been introduced by custom.

But I said, I deny the Antecedent, that is, that the Canonists extended a particular case to all cases of excommunication. For in order that there be an extension properly so called, it is required that the same disposition of law and, in the present case, the same penalty be extended to another cause or other subjects. But in the present matter we have in no way either a common penalty or a common cause between the two cases. And this becomes plain in a few words. For the disposition of law which the VV. say was extended by the Canonists to other cases is of this kind (chapter Cum Contumacia 7, On Heretics, in the Sext): Since contumacy (especially in a cause of faith) adds a vehement presumption to suspicion, if one suspected of heresy, summoned by you so that he may answer concerning the faith, has been bound by you with the bond of excommunication (because he evades obedience or contumaciously absents himself), which he endures with a pertinacious mind for a year, let him then be condemned as a heretic. Therefore: 1. the penalty threatened here is the condemnation of the guilty party as a heretic; 2. the crime or cause for which someone had been cited is suspicion of heresy. But in the other case: 1. the crime or cause for which the contumacious person after citation was excommunicated is not suspicion of heresy; 2. the penalty which is threatened against the contumacious person even after excommunication is not the penalty proper to a heretic, but only that the guilty party can thereafter be cited as one suspected of heresy. Therefore nothing is common between case and case, and accordingly no extension properly so called is present here. But much less will even a certain shadow of this extension be found if, with the VV. after Croix and St. Alphonsus, you transfer that aforesaid disposition of law TO ALL CASES OF EXCOMMUNICATION, when the Decree of Trent, as we have already said, regards solely one contumacious for a year in that special excommunication which a judge had inflicted on account of the preceding contumacy of the guilty party, namely, because the guilty party did not obey a citation on account of another cause, whether civil or criminal.

I said in addition, I deny the Consequence, namely, that it is lawful to extend the disposition of Trent concerning a contumacious person excommunicated by name to those bound by lesser censures. For that proceedings can be taken against someone as one suspected of heresy is a most grave penalty. But according to the rules of Law, odious things are to be restricted. And indeed, according to Rule 49 in the Sext, a more benign interpretation is to be made in penalties; and according to Rule 155, section final, Digest, On Law, in penal causes a more benign interpretation is to be made; and law 42, Digest, On Penalties, says that by the interpretation of laws penalties are to be mitigated rather than made harsher; much more, therefore, a penal law ought not to be extended to those cases which the law does not touch in even the slightest degree and which are established to be of much less gravity. And again, even if that were true which, speaking precisely, ought to be called false, namely, that before the Council of Trent the Canonists extended to certain other excommunications (but not all, as the VV. say without reason) that which had been established in chapter Cum Contumacia, nevertheless no canon permits us to attribute to the authority of Claude La Croix, introducing this new doctrine without any foundation of reasons or authorities, that weight which we know ought to be attributed to the common doctrine of the Canonists, which the Council of Trent also confirmed.

3. deprivation of the suffrages of the Church; 4. deprivation of ecclesiastical burial; 5. deprivation of ecclesiastical jurisdiction; 6. deprivation of benefices; 7. deprivation of forensic communication; 8. deprivation of civil society.

The goods of which excommunication deprives one are comprised in these little verses:

Sacred things, rites, communion, burial place, power, Sacred estates, court, civil rights are forbidden.

I. Deprivation of the Sacraments

960. ○ Excommunication deprives one both of the right to receive the Sacraments and of the right to administer them [9]. Hence you will resolve:

[9] The Author, in order to consult brevity, wished to treat jointly of this twofold effect of excommunication, namely, the removal of both the passive and active use of the sacraments; and since each case involves a twofold cause, namely, both that of the excommunicated person and that of the other who either confers the sacraments upon the excommunicated person or asks for the sacraments from him, and in addition since in many matters the case of an excommunicated person to be avoided is one thing, but that of a tolerated person another, it is no wonder that the Author's treatment, very brief in itself, became obscure and exceedingly meager.

Therefore, with respect to the removed passive use of the sacraments, let these things be noted more distinctly.

1. An excommunicated person, even a tolerated one, is barred from receiving the sacraments and sins gravely by violating this prohibition of the Church. Nevertheless, from this illicit reception he incurs no penalty except suspension from the Order which he receives in that state. Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 128) and St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 160). From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, this penalty has ceased.

2. Not only inculpable ignorance, but also fear of death, mutilation, infamy, grave loss of goods, etc., excuses the excommunicated person from that fault; and also the necessity of fulfilling the annual precepts of Confession and Communion, if there is no one who can absolve him from the reserved censure. The reason is that an ecclesiastical law does not bind so rigorously and with such grave inconvenience. St. Alphonsus (no. 158) with the common opinion of the Doctors.

3. Although illicitly, indeed sacrilegiously, nevertheless an excommunicated person validly receives the sacraments, Penance excepted. Although even this sacrament will be valid if the penitent, otherwise disposed, approaches in good faith; which can happen either because he himself, through inculpable ignorance or forgetfulness, does not disclose the censure; or because the priest is ignorant of or does not advert to the censure annexed to the sin; or even, while adverting to it and indeed to one reserved, nevertheless without the faculty, thinks that the penitent is to be absolved from the non-reserved sins on account of the aforesaid necessity; or even through malice absolves a penitent who thinks that the priest does not lack the faculty of absolving.

4. Since the excommunicated person sins by receiving the sacraments before he is absolved, by that very fact the minister who knowingly confers the sacraments upon him sins.

5. If the excommunicated person to whom the sacraments are given is tolerated, the minister (as the Author well notes) indeed sins against divine law, but not against the law of the Church. But if he is a person to be avoided, not only does the minister violate the law of the Church, but under the ancient law he also incurred excommunication and also interdict from entering a church, from chapter Episcoporum 8, On Privileges, in the Sext; and suspension from office was added besides if these excommunicated persons had been excommunicated on account of heresy or as supporters of heretics; nor was such a minister to be restored to office without the Pope's dispensation, from chapter Excommunicamus 13, section Credentes, On Heretics. See Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 128). But now he will incur merely an excommunication reserved to the Pontiff if he ministers the sacraments to one excommunicated by name by the Supreme Pontiff himself. From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, chapter Significavit 18, On the Sentence of Excommunication, and Clementine 3 under the same title.

6. Moreover, someone licitly administers the sacraments to an excommunicated person whenever, according to the things said (no. 2), the latter licitly approaches to receive them before he is absolved.

But with respect to the active use of the sacraments, these things must be held:

1. In a case of necessity an excommunicated person, whether tolerated or to be avoided, administers the sacraments both validly and licitly, for example, by absolving at the point of death.

2. Outside a case of necessity, in order that a tolerated person administer licitly, the request alone of the faithful suffices, provided that he is otherwise in the state of grace and cannot first obtain absolution from the censure. But in order that the faithful licitly request this, although some require a cause at least of great utility, others nevertheless do not think even this necessary; and St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 165) also admits their opinion as probable.

3. But if necessity and the request of the faithful (at least tacit, according to St. Alphonsus, no. 169) are lacking, even a tolerated person sins gravely and, on account of the exercise of Holy Orders, also incurs irregularity, according to the things to be said below (St. Alphonsus, no. 171).

4. But a person to be avoided incurs irregularity even if, without necessity, he ministers the sacraments when requested by the faithful. In this case the faithful sin gravely by receiving the sacraments from him, and under the ancient law incurred minor excommunication (St. Alphonsus, no. 172).

5. Nevertheless, the person to be avoided is excused when, if he does not confer the sacrament, he incurs danger of death, mutilation, infamy, or grave loss of goods; for then, unless that threat is made in contempt of the censure, he can licitly minister the sacraments which he can validly minister, because the Church, a pious mother, is not presumed to wish to bind by her laws with such great loss. Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 144), St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 170).

6. In addition, by reason of necessity, the Doctors think that an excommunicated person to be avoided can not only confer baptism upon one in danger, but also the Eucharist or Extreme Unction when the dying person cannot receive the sacrament of Penance; because, since any sacrament can make one contrite from being attrite, it will sometimes happen that, on account of the reception of the Eucharist or Extreme Unction, salvation is obtained which would not be obtained if these sacraments were not received. Schmalzgrueber (loc. cit., no. 145), St. Alphonsus (loc. cit., no. 170). Indeed, grave Doctors add that the Eucharist or Extreme Unction can licitly be given by a person to be avoided to a sick person even if the latter has received the sacrament of Penance; the reason is that it is most necessary that the sick person be helped and receive strength from it to overcome the suggestions of the devil in that moment. Schmalzgrueber (loc. cit., no. 146).

7. Finally, a parish priest to be avoided would assist at a marriage validly but illicitly, although he does not incur irregularity through this; but he would deputize another to assist not only validly but also licitly. St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 166).

1. An excommunicated person, whether to be avoided or even tolerated, who receives or confers the Sacraments sins gravely per se; except: 1. if he confers the Sacraments in a case of necessity; 2. if, being tolerated, he confers them when asked by the faithful themselves.

2. Ministers of the Church who confer the Sacraments upon excommunicated persons, whether persons to be avoided or merely tolerated persons, sin gravely, at least per se, since they are unworthy. Nevertheless, one who confers the Sacraments only upon tolerated persons sins not against the prohibition of the Church but only against divine law. The reason is that the Church no longer prohibits communication, even in divine things, with tolerated persons. But they sin against divine law, because it is never licit to give holy things to dogs. - See St. Alphonsus, nos. 158, 165 and following.

II. Deprivation of Divine Offices

961. ○ By divine Offices are understood Mass, public Processions, Vespers solemnly chanted, solemn Benediction, the consecration of Chrism, and other ceremonies of this kind which are performed by the institution of Christ or of the Church, or which are proper to the clerical Order, such as the chanting of the Epistle or Gospel with the proper vestments, and ecclesiastical burial.

962. ○ Hence you will resolve. - 1. Every excommunicated person is prohibited under grave obligation from hearing Mass [10] and all other divine Offices properly public, even on days of precept. This is apparent from chapter Alma 24, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext. - St. Alphonsus, no. 175.

[10] At the time when Mass and the divine offices are celebrated, an excommunicated person is prohibited from entering the church. And if he is a person to be avoided, while the Sacrifice of the Mass is being offered he is to be warned to depart; but if he is unwilling, he is to be expelled even by force, if necessary. But if he cannot be expelled, the Mass, if the Canon has not yet begun, is to be broken off; and if the consecration has been performed, the consumption is to follow, and then one is to withdraw to the sacristy; if the Canon has been begun, the priest can either break off the Mass or continue it up to Communion, with the others nevertheless departing; for if they do not depart, they sin at least venially. St. Alphonsus (book 7, nos. 176-177). Under the ancient law, if the person to be avoided refused to depart, he incurred a new excommunication reserved to the Pope.

2. Nevertheless, an excommunicated person, even one to be avoided, can pray in the same place in which others pray, but separately and apart from the assembly of the faithful; he can also be present at a sermon, a reading of Sacred Scripture, and a lecture on Theology [11], because these are not included under the name of divine Offices, and the Church willingly permits them to him so that he may be led to conversion. - St. Alphonsus, nos. 174, 177.

[11] Otherwise, the person to be avoided himself is deprived of the faculty of preaching, lecturing in theology, and publicly interpreting canon law. Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 132).

3. He can also use images, relics, holy water, and other sacred things, so that he may obtain the graces which he needs. Nevertheless, he does not gain the Indulgences annexed to sacred things, nor does he receive from holy water and other sacramentals the fruit which proceeds from the blessing of the Church. - St. Alphonsus, no. 174.

4. An excommunicated person bound to the canonical Hours is not dispensed from them, but ought to recite them privately; nor can he employ a companion unless he is tolerated [12]. Nor can he say, The Lord be with you; but in its place he ought to say, O Lord, hear my prayer. Nevertheless, by saying The Lord be with you, he would sin only venially. - St. Alphonsus, no. 178.

[12] Even if he is not tolerated, he can call a companion for some necessity or utility, especially if the latter is subject to him, as a chaplain to a Bishop, a servant to a master, etc.; for a servant is not deprived of communication with his master in those things in which he was bound to serve him. Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 181).

III. Deprivation of the Common Suffrages of the Church

963. ○ The suffrages of the Church are either common or private. The common suffrages are those which come to the faithful from good works done in the name of the Church by her Ministers, such as Masses, the canonical Hours, and other prayers and works which are done by the Ministers of the Church insofar as they are such and are performed in the name of the Church herself. To these must also be referred the satisfactions of Christ, the Blessed Virgin, and the Saints, which constitute the treasury of the Church and are applied by the Prelates of the Church through indulgences.

The private suffrages are those which come from the good works which the faithful perform in their own name. Of this kind are fasts, prayers, and other good works which are done by private faithful or by Ministers of the Church as private persons.

964. ○ Hence you will resolve. - 1. Excommunicated persons to be avoided are deprived of all the common suffrages of the Church. This is apparent, because the Church by her own right prohibits prayer from being made for them [13], or any portion of her goods from coming to them. And this holds even if they were contrite and converted to a better life, because the excommunication still endures. - St. Alphonsus, no. 163.

[13] The reason why prayer in the Mass for an infidel is not forbidden, while nevertheless it is forbidden for an excommunicated Christian to be avoided, must be derived solely from the precept of the Church. See above, note to no. 349.

2. Neither tolerated persons nor even persons to be avoided are deprived of private suffrages. The reason is that the faithful are not prohibited from praying privately for excommunicated persons, even in a church and in a public place; therefore they can apply to them the fruit of good works. - St. Alphonsus, no. 162.

3. Tolerated excommunicated persons are not deprived of common suffrages. The reason is that the Church no longer prohibits the faithful from communicating with tolerated persons, as is deduced from the things said above. - St. Alphonsus, no. 164.

IV. Deprivation of Ecclesiastical Burial

965. ○ Ecclesiastical burial is that which takes place in a sacred place, or one blessed for the burial of the faithful. Hence:

1. An excommunicated person to be avoided cannot be buried in a sacred place; but if he has been buried in such a place, his body ought to be dug up, if it can still be done, and the sacred place polluted by such contact is to be expiated. - St. Alphonsus, no. 186.

2. A tolerated excommunicated person is likewise deprived of ecclesiastical burial; and if he has been buried in a sacred place, he is to be removed from it [14]. Nevertheless, the place is not considered polluted and therefore does not need expiation.

[14] If he gave signs of repentance, he can be buried in a sacred place, although it is fitting that he first be absolved from excommunication. But a person to be avoided who gave those signs cannot be buried in a sacred place unless he is first absolved. Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 127).

3. Clerics who carry forth and bury a person to be avoided incurred major excommunication under the ancient law. - Thus from the Clementine On Burial. - From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, only those commanding and compelling it are excommunicated, as will be seen below.

V. Deprivation of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction

966. ○ 1. An excommunicated person to be avoided is deprived of all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, or rather of its exercise and use. Hence he cannot absolve in the penitential forum, nor impose laws, censures, or sentences, nor elect to benefices or confer them, etc. But if he performed such acts, they would be altogether null and invalid. - St. Alphonsus, no. 185.

2. A tolerated excommunicated person, even if notorious, validly exercises jurisdiction, because otherwise great confusion would arise in the Church. Nevertheless, his acts can be invalidated and repelled through an exception or objection of excommunication, and he himself acts illicitly outside a case of necessity or unless he has been asked; and indeed in a grave matter he cannot be excused from mortal sin. But if he has been asked, he does not sin, even if he ministers the Sacraments without cause. For since communication with tolerated persons has been conceded to the faithful, indirectly it has also been granted to these persons to communicate with the faithful who request it. Nevertheless, this holds insofar as the sacraments are requested from an excommunicated person; for insofar as they are requested from a Minister existing in mortal sin, a just cause is required in order to request them licitly. - Thus St. Alphonsus, no. 139, and book 6, no. 88.

VI. Deprivation of Benefices

967. ○ 1. Every excommunicated person, whether tolerated or to be avoided, becomes altogether incapable of obtaining ecclesiastical benefices. The reason is that a benefice is given on account of an office, but an excommunicated person is altogether incapable of an office; therefore also of a benefice. Except if the benefice were conferred by the Pope himself. - St. Alphonsus, no. 180.

2. Nevertheless, excommunication does not deprive one of a benefice already obtained, nor of its fruits before the sentence of a judge. The reason is that neither is clearly expressed in law. If, however, he neglects to obtain absolution for a year, he can be deprived of the benefice by a judge. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.

3. An excommunicated person accepting a benefice [15], and the one from whom he receives it, sin gravely, since they act against a grave prohibition of the Church. But one conferring it formerly incurred minor excommunication and suspension ipso facto from the conferral of that benefice if the excommunicated person was one to be avoided. - After the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, these censures ceased.

[15] According to the more common and more probable opinion, the acceptance of a benefice which had been conferred before someone incurred excommunication is valid, although he accepts it when already bound by excommunication (Reiffenstuel, book 5, title 39, no. 65); just as, if an excommunicated person takes possession of a benefice duly conferred upon him or sends another into possession, the possession and the placing into possession are valid, because both possession and the placing into possession are matters of fact, not of law. See Schmalzgrueber (book 5, title 39, no. 150), who adds (ibid., no. 154) that the conferral of a pension which is given to an excommunicated cleric for support while he resigns or exchanges a benefice or yields in litigation is probably valid.

VII. Deprivation of Forensic Communication

968. ○ Forensic communication is understood as communication in those things which pertain to a judgment, whether civil or ecclesiastical.

1. An excommunicated person to be avoided is deprived of every act pertaining to a judgment in the civil forum. Therefore he cannot be a judge, advocate, plaintiff, witness, notary, procurator, etc. Likewise he cannot be a guardian, curator, or executor of a testament. - Thus from the common law, or the ancient Roman law. - St. Alphonsus, no. 184. But those dispositions of law today do not obtain usage in most places.

2. All the more is a person to be avoided deprived of all communication in Ecclesiastical Law. Nevertheless, he can appeal and prosecute an appeal. - Thus from canon law, title On Exceptions, chapter 5.

3. A tolerated excommunicated person is deprived ipso facto of no forensic communication; hence he acts validly if he uses it, but he can be juridically repelled through an exception both by adversaries and by the judge. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.

VIII. Deprivation of Civil Society

969. ◦ The civil actions in which it is commonly not licit to have association with a person to be avoided are contained in this little verse:

Mouth, to pray, farewell, communion, table are denied.

1. Mouth, that is, conversations, letters, signs of benevolence.

2. To pray, any communication in divine things, for example, assisting at Mass or at the public Offices of the Church.

3. Farewell, altogether particular salutations.

4. Communion, any partnership of business, habitation, contract, cooperation, etc.

5. Table, a reciprocal invitation to table. - St. Alphonsus, no. 188.

But grave causes can excuse reciprocal communication between an excommunicated person to be avoided and the faithful, namely: necessity; the spiritual good of the excommunicated person himself; the matrimonial bond; a state of subjection, for example, minor children of a family; ignorance either of law or of fact. - St. Alphonsus, ibid.

But all these things are said only of persons to be avoided; although the privilege of Martin V by no means favors tolerated persons, nevertheless, from present-day custom, these persons no longer sin by communicating with the faithful in civil matters, even if they were not requested by them. Nevertheless, these persons cannot licitly communicate with the faithful in divine things, because the privilege favors the faithful alone, and not them. This is apparent from the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, 5 July 1867.

III. On Excommunications in Particular

970. ◦ Formerly, for the convenience of students, Writers were accustomed to set before their eyes in this place only the principal excommunications or other censures, and to illustrate them with some annotation. But after the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX, 12 October 1869, by which the latae sententiae censures of the common law are limited [16], all of them, and any other that has subsequently been added up to the present, can now be enumerated without difficulty even in a brief compendium of moral theology; and therefore we do not hesitate to do this [17].

[16]  That the Supreme Pontiff set this end before himself is gathered from the following words of the Constitution: Since We had long revolved in Our mind that ecclesiastical censures which, after the manner of a latae sententiae penalty and to be incurred by the fact itself, have been enjoined and promulgated through the several ages... had gradually increased to a great number; that some also, with times and customs changed, had fallen away from the end and causes for which they had been imposed, or from their former utility and suitability; and that for this reason doubts, anxieties, and anguishes of conscience not infrequently arise both in those to whom the care of souls is committed and in the faithful themselves; We, wishing to meet inconveniences of this kind... after the matter had been weighed long and maturely, of Our own motion, with certain knowledge, Our mature deliberation, and from the plenitude of Our Apostolic power, decree by this Constitution, to remain in force perpetually, that, of whatever censures, whether of excommunication, suspension, or interdict, which up to this time have been imposed after the manner of a latae sententiae penalty and to be incurred by the fact itself, only those which We insert in this very Constitution, and in the manner in which We insert them, shall henceforth possess force.

[17]  Whatever we may subjoin concerning these matters in the Notes, let the Reader know that it has generally been taken from Commentaries, several of which have now appeared through the study of learned men. Among them the little work of the Most Reverend Joseph D'Annibale, Vicar of the Diocese of Rieti, published at Terni in 1873 under the title Commentaries on the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, easily excels in abundance and solidity of doctrine. We shall indicate this little work by the abbreviation Rieti Commentary.

With respect to this exception concerning the publication of books, it must be carefully noted how one Decree differs from the other. For while the Tridentine Decree and the recent Constitution agree in this, that they subject to anathema those who print, or cause to be printed, books treating of sacred matters without the approval of the Ordinary, they nevertheless differ: 1. because the Tridentine Decree treats merely of books published without the name of the Author, but the Constitution displays no restriction of this kind; 2. the Constitution punishes only those printing and causing to be printed, but the Tridentine Decree extends the penalty to those who communicate or publish books in writing, and also to those selling and retaining them. Therefore, the Constitution restricts the Tridentine Decree insofar as it confines the penalty to those only who print or cause to be printed; but it extends it insofar as it also comprehends books bearing the name of the Author.

But as regards the other censures imposed by the Council of Trent, the Constitution of Pope Pius IX reads thus: Whomever else the Most Holy Council of Trent decreed to be suspended or interdicted by the law itself, We in like manner will and declare the same persons to be subject to suspension or interdict.

Moreover, all agree that by force of this Constitution only those censures are confirmed which the Council of Trent itself directly inflicted, but not those which it only indirectly renewed or confirmed after they had previously been inflicted; and this either through general words, as, for example, when it thus establishes (session 21, chapter 1, On Reformation): Those who do otherwise... shall by the fact itself incur the penalties inflicted by law; or through a special citation of some statute, as, for example, when it declares (session 24, chapter 3, On Reformation): He is also to be punished with other penalties according to the Constitution of the Council of Lyons.... But this is openly gathered both from the words and from the purpose of the Constitution of Pius. See Avanzini's Commentary, appendix 3.

Therefore, of whatever censures now exist, the aforesaid Constitution embraces almost all of them, partly explicitly and partly implicitly. We call those explicitly contained which are expressly and individually enumerated in it; but implicitly, when those [18] are confirmed which are found both to have been imposed by the Council of Trent and to be contained in certain particular statutes [19].

[18]  Thus the Constitution: Besides those thus far enumerated, We likewise declare excommunicated those whom the Most Holy Council of Trent excommunicated, whether absolution was reserved to the Supreme Pontiff or to Ordinaries, or without any reservation; with the exception of the penalty of anathema established in the Decree of Session IV, On the Edition and Use of the Sacred Books, to which We will only those to be subject who print, or cause to be printed, books treating of sacred matters without the approval of the Ordinary.

[19]  To this pertain these words of the Constitution: But whatever censures, whether of excommunication, suspension, or interdict, have been imposed by Our Constitutions or those of Our Predecessors, or by the sacred Canons, besides those which We have enumerated, and have thus far persisted in their force, whether for the election of the Roman Pontiff, or for the internal governance of any Orders and Institutes of Regulars, and also of any Colleges, Congregations, Assemblies, and Pious Places, of whatever name or kind they may be, all these We will and declare to be firm and to remain in their force. Concerning these, however, some things are given below.

Meanwhile, with Avanzini note that those remaining censures imposed by the Roman Pontiffs or by the sacred Canons with respect to particular Institutes or particular places, of whatever kind they may be, are merely declared not to have been abrogated. But it is one thing to declare that they have not been abrogated and therefore remain in their force; it is another to affirm that they have been renewed. For renewal adds new force to censures which perhaps have gone into desuetude, and therefore they revive through renewal. But when through some Constitution it is merely said that they have not been abrogated, this one thing is gathered from it: that they remain in that state in which they were found, and by force of this Constitution are neither destroyed nor renewed. But this is sufficiently indicated by these words of the Constitution: And have thus far persisted in their force. Wherefore, if those particular censures in some Institute or Pious Place have perhaps gone into desuetude or have ceased for some other cause, they are by no means to be considered renewed through the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis.

971. ○ Even according to the most recent law introduced after the Constitution of Pius, latae sententiae censures are of four kinds. For some are reserved to the Roman Pontiff in a special manner [20]; others are likewise reserved simply to the Supreme Pontiff; others are reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries; and finally others are reserved to no one.

[20]  This fourfold distinction of censures was also seen in the preceding law. But the censures which are now said to be reserved in a special manner correspond generally to those which were contained in the Bull Coenae. Wherefore, from those things which were then said both concerning the cases contained in the Bull Coenae and concerning the special manner of their reservation, these things are generally to be transferred to the cases now reserved in a special manner. Indeed, by the Decree of the Holy Office, 4 April 1871, it was established that, in the formulas of faculties which the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith is accustomed to grant, where mention is made of cases reserved in the Bull Coenae, the censures reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff in the Bull Apostolicae Sedis are to be substituted.

According, therefore, to this fourfold partition, we shall here subjoin the general latae sententiae censures which remain in their force.

Point I. Excommunications Reserved to the Supreme Pontiff

I. Reserved in a Special Manner

972. ○ Concerning these, the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis reads thus:

> We declare subject to a latae sententiae excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff:
>
> I. All apostates from the Christian faith [1], and each and every heretic, by whatever name they may be designated and of whatever sect they may be [2], and those believing them [3], and their receivers, supporters, and generally any defenders of them.

[1]  Understand apostasy here as a withdrawal from the Christian faith, and an apostate as one who has departed from the Christian faith. And since the crime of apostasy consists in a withdrawal of this kind, it therefore makes no difference whether the apostate has gone over to Judaism or to Paganism, or whether he has fallen into Deism, Atheism, or Indifferentism. And to this last is commonly referred the sect of those who call themselves in Italian liberi pensatori, and in French libres penseurs, whom otherwise you would better call monsters of nature, more foolish than stupid beasts. For beasts follow the guidance of nature. But these two-footed monsters trample upon nature. Namely, just as the bodily eye is ignorant of liberty, so reason and intellect are ignorant of liberty. And just as it is indeed free for you to close your eyes or not to look at the objects placed around you, but it will not likewise be free for you not to see those objects if you look at them with open eyes, so must you also speak concerning truth placed before the eye of the mind which beholds it. Therefore, even the name of the sect itself displays foolishness more stupid than asinine stupidity, so that in this apostasy from the Christian faith that saying of the ancients shines forth most manifestly: the corruption of the best is the worst. But what civil society can also hope for in practice or fear from those men, if they are worthy of this designation, who according to their arbitrary manner of thinking and judging fashion right and wrong for themselves at pleasure, anyone easily sees.

[2]  Concerning the crime of heresy, see where faith was treated (volume I, no. 208). Note this, with the distinguished Author of the Rieti Commentary: it makes no difference whether someone has outwardly disclosed heresy by words or only by a deed, for example, if he has attempted to know the secrets of hearts or to divine the future free actions of men, which are open to God alone, through self-moving tables or the so-called Cristacos (magnetized persons). See the Encyclical Letter of the Sacred Inquisition, 30 July 1856 (above, volume I, no. 281), where it is declared that heretical deception is found in these things.

[3]  By those believing them, understand those who believe heretics either explicitly or implicitly.

These are distinguished in the text from heretics: 1. because someone can adhere to errors condemned by heretics, although he does not formally belong to the sects of heretics; 2. because a believer of this kind is understood both if in the forum of conscience he is a heretic properly so called and if he is not altogether a heretic, namely, when internal pertinacity of mind against the faith is not joined with the external act of believing. For under either hypothesis he shows himself a follower of the errors of heretics, and therefore, as one implicated in the cause of heresy, he is punished in the external forum with the penalty of heretics and is subjected to this censure in such a way that he cannot be absolved without a special faculty.

By receivers understand not those who for any other cause receive or conceal them in their houses or lands, but those who directly intend through this to foster or defend the heretic, for example, so that he may thus escape the penalties of heresy.

> II. Each and every person knowingly [4] reading, without the authority of the Apostolic See [5], books [6] of the same apostates and heretics [7] which defend heresy [8], and also books of any author prohibited by name through Apostolic Letters [9], and those retaining, printing, and in any manner defending those same books [10].

[4]  Knowingly, that is, with knowledge: 1. that the book is by an apostate or a heretic according to the sense of the preceding article; 2. that the book defends heresy; and 3. that the reading is punished by the penalty of this censure. But understand this also of those retaining, printing, etc.

[5]  That is, without a faculty granted either by the Supreme Pontiff or by those to whom the Supreme Pontiff has committed the faculty of dispensing.

[6]  Whether journals or newspapers are comprehended by these laws, see below where the reading of bad books is treated.

[7]  Avanzini raises a doubt (Commentary, no. 7) whether the books of those who are added in the preceding article, namely, believers, supporters, etc., are also comprehended if they defend heresy; and he replies: They do not appear to be comprehended. But immediately he so tempers the assertion that he all but destroys it: provided (he says) that these two things are not verified, namely: 1. that in the book is contained an indubitable defense of heresy or of apostasy from the faith; 2. and that the defense of heresy is made so pertinaciously that it cannot be doubted that the author of the book is certainly a heretic.

[8]  To these matters the excellent Rieti Commentary says well: To defend is, if I judge anything rightly, to undertake the patronage of heresy deliberately and as though with all one's strength; wherefore the excommunication does not bind one who reads a book of an apostate or a heretic if it does not defend heresy, even though it contains it, and indeed even defends it, but incidentally, in a few words, and as though while doing something else.

[9]  By books prohibited by name are not understood just any books condemned through Apostolic Letters, unless the proper title of the book has been expressed in those Letters. But understand by Apostolic Letters those which proceed immediately in the name of the Roman Pontiff, whether in the form of a Brief, a Bull, an Encyclical, or in any other form, provided that in them is read By Apostolic Authority, or something equivalent. Furthermore, if before this other books not prohibited by name were condemned through Apostolic Letters without any excommunication, or with an excommunication not reserved, one reading them today incurs no excommunication; because our Constitution in the former case does not introduce an excommunication, and in the latter, since it does not enumerate it among the non-reserved censures, has abolished it; and if they were prohibited under some other censure, for example, suspension, this also ceases (Rieti Commentary).

[10]  Concerning those printing, the Rieti Commentary has these things: To this belong all who cooperate proximately in the printing; and therefore: 1. those who furnish any work whatever for this matter, such as those who set the type, coat it with ink, moisten the paper, etc.; 2. those who hire their labors, that is, the printer, and all the more the publisher, who is understood to hire the labors of both; and the author of the book, if the book is published through his care. Cretoni adds (Note on this place): With respect to manual workers or subordinate cooperators, in order to incur this censure, besides the required knowledge it must also be judged from the circumstances whether in the case they are to be regarded as formal or material cooperators and, under this latter hypothesis, whether they are excused from the fault of cooperation (add, or at least from the penalty) by a just and proportionate cause or not.

Those defending the book in any manner are considered (Lugo, On Faith, disputation 21, no. 94) those who conceal the book lest it be denounced or burned, or who prevent this by force or fraud; one who tries to persuade others that the book is good and therefore not worthy of prohibition; one who tries to uphold the depraved doctrine contained in it and to defend it from every stain. For all these defend books by deed or word. See Sanchez and Palao, who note that this censure does not comprehend one who approves and praises the good and true doctrine contained in a book, provided that he is not considered to approve the book itself absolutely; nor one who praises the style, eloquence, diction, or talent, provided that he does not assert praise and approval of the book.

III. Schismatics and those who pertinaciously withdraw themselves or depart from the obedience of the Roman Pontiff for the time being [11].

IV. Each and every person, of whatever state, rank, or condition they may be, appealing from ordinances or mandates of the Roman Pontiffs for the time being to a future general Council, and also those by whose aid, counsel, or favor the appeal was made [12].

[11]  By schismatics properly so called are understood those who not only pertinaciously depart from the subjection owed to the Roman Pontiff, but, erecting themselves into an authority, establish new assemblies separated from the center of unity, such as the promoters of national churches, or follow those same assemblies. And these indeed pertain to perfect schism, even if you understand schism, as they call it, pure, namely, with which no heresy is mingled, which scarcely occurs. For if a schismatic holds something contrary to the faith, for example, that the Roman Pontiff is not the head of the Church, or indeed is, but only the primacy of honor belongs to him, as the Jansenist hypocrites hold, he would in addition be a heretic and therefore entangled in a twofold excommunication.

But by those who pertinaciously withdraw themselves or depart from the obedience of the Roman Pontiff for the time being are signified those who pertain to imperfect schism. And in this sense Avanzini (Commentary, no. 10) thinks that those who call themselves liberal Catholics are comprehended, namely, those who, setting aside the laws and mandates of the Roman Pontiff, publicly conduct themselves as though released from his obedience, since these also in the true sense are rebels against the obedience of the Roman Pontiff for the time being.

[12]  Lest those who pertinaciously withdraw themselves or depart from the obedience of the Roman Pontiff for the time being, concerning whom the preceding article treats, should pretend to do this with impunity under the pretext of an appeal to a future Council, contrary to the defined rights of the Primacy, this special crime of rebellion was punished with a special censure.

But to incur this censure of excommunication it is necessary to appeal to a future Council. Therefore, if an appeal has been made to a future Roman Pontiff or to a present Council, there is no place for the censure. But if not some individual person, but some community or moral person, has interposed an appeal of this kind, it incurs the Interdict reserved in a special manner, as will be said below.

V. All who kill, mutilate, strike, seize, imprison, detain, or pursue in a hostile manner Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, Patriarchs, Archbishops, Bishops, and Legates or Nuncios of the Apostolic See, or cast them out of their Dioceses, Territories, Lands, or Dominions; and also those commanding these things, or ratifying them, or furnishing aid, counsel, or favor in them [13].

VI. Those directly or indirectly impeding the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, whether of the internal or external forum, and those having recourse for this purpose to the secular forum and procuring or issuing its mandates, or furnishing aid or favor [14].

[13]  The excellent Rieti Commentary thus treats these: By this censure are punished injuries against the body, liberty, and dignity of the Princes of the Church. Against the body, namely, by killing, mutilating, or striking. To kill is to put to death in any manner, for example, by poison, hunger, etc.; to mutilate is to cut off a member; by striking we understand every injury which is done by the hand.

Against liberty, namely, by seizing, imprisoning, or detaining. To seize is to apprehend. To imprison is to cast or confine one in any place, even a private one. To detain is to keep one enclosed in any place lest he be able to depart.

Against dignity, namely, by pursuing in a hostile manner or casting out. To pursue in a hostile manner is to pursue with the intention of harming; therefore those who pursue them for the sake of frightening or despoiling them do not incur this excommunication. To cast out is to expel one previously received, and therefore those who do not receive them are not bound by it. From their Lands or dominions: interpreters understand by Lands also those where they maintain a domicile or were born. Nor is it distinguished by what authority they cast them out, public or private, or in what manner, whether by force employed, by threats, or by a bare precept.

Moreover, in this place not only those who strike, mutilate, etc., and those who furnish them aid or favor are excommunicated, but also those who ratify it. But in order that these incur excommunication, it is necessary: 1. that the striking, mutilation, etc., was done in their name, because someone cannot ratify what was not done in his name (chapter 23, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sext); 2. that at the time when these things were perpetrated, they could have authorized and therefore commanded them, for ratification is retroactive and is equated with a mandate.

[14]  The action which is restrained by this excommunication is to impede the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, both ordinary and delegated, whether of the external or internal forum; of this kind especially is that which the Sacred Penitentiary uses.

Moreover, to the power of jurisdiction belongs the issuing of laws and mandates, binding and loosing, conferring Benefices, deputing to ecclesiastical duties, sending preachers, visiting a Diocese, and committing to others for performance those things which belong to Order. And these things must be distinguished both from those which pertain to the power of Order, such as performing sacred rites, ministering the Sacraments, blessing and consecrating persons and things, etc.; and from those which are more matters of office or right, such as teaching, preaching, acquiring or alienating goods, and, in a word, entering into contracts.

Therefore, in order that someone be said to impede the exercise of jurisdiction, it is necessary that he oppose the one in whom jurisdiction resides, for example, an Ordinary, Pastor, or judge, and indeed oppose him so that he neither begin nor continue to use the jurisdiction. To this also pertains if someone impedes the execution of any sentence or decree of this kind, especially if he does this by appealing or otherwise having recourse in any manner to the lay power, as it is said, on account of abuse.

Or: 2. by issuing mandates, which is understood of one who establishes or decrees a mandate.

Or: 3. by having recourse to the secular forum and procuring its mandates, namely, in order to elude the judgment of the ecclesiastical forum.

Or finally: 4. all those who furnish aid, counsel, or favor in all these things, for example, those who procure mandates for persons wishing to impede.

Thus far from the excellent Rieti Commentary, where it is added that, when the effect has not yet followed, neither those impeding, nor those issuing mandates, nor those having recourse, and consequently neither those furnishing aid, etc., contract the excommunication. The contrary opinion, at least with respect to those having recourse, pleased Avanzini (Commentary, no. 11). But (the Rieti Commentary subjoins at article 8), I think that one ought not easily to depart from the general rules of law.

But this excommunication is incurred by those impeding the exercise of this jurisdiction, namely: 1. by some deed, for example, by force, threats, or command, either directly, for example, if someone threatens a Bishop with death, etc., or indirectly, as if by a deed

VII. Those directly or indirectly compelling lay judges to draw ecclesiastical persons before their tribunal contrary to the canonical provisions [15]; likewise those issuing laws or decrees against the liberty or rights of the Church [16].

VIII. Those having recourse to the lay power [17] in order to impede he prohibits those attached to the Ecclesiastical Court from performing their duty in that matter, etc. > any letters or acts [18] proceeding from the Apostolic See or from any of its Legates or Delegates [19], and those directly or indirectly prohibiting their promulgation or execution [20], or on account of them injuring or gravely frightening either the parties themselves or others [21].

IX. All forgers of Apostolic Letters, even in the form of a Brief, and of petitions concerning grace or justice, signed by the Roman Pontiff, or by the Vice-Chancellors of the Holy Roman Church or those acting in their place, or at the mandate of the same Roman Pontiff; and also those falsely publishing Apostolic Letters, even in the form of a Brief, and also those falsely signing petitions of this kind under the name of the Roman Pontiff or the Vice-Chancellor or of one acting in the place of the aforesaid persons [22].

X. Those absolving an accomplice in a shameful sin even at the point of death > if another priest, although not approved for confessions, can hear the confession of the dying person without grave infamy and scandal being likely to arise [23].

XI. Those usurping or sequestering [24] jurisdiction, goods, or revenues belonging to ecclesiastical persons by reason of their Churches or Benefices [25].

XII. Those invading, destroying, or detaining, by themselves or through others, Cities, Lands, places, or rights belonging to the Roman Church; or those usurping, disturbing, or retaining the supreme jurisdiction in them; and also those furnishing aid, counsel, or favor toward any of the aforesaid acts [26].

[15]  Formerly (Bull Coenae, section 15), judges who drew Ecclesiastics before their tribunal were subject to excommunication; today those who compel the lay judges themselves to this are subject, that is, those who exercise judgment by lay power. Thus the Declaration of the Sacred Inquisition, 1 February 1871: The word compelling certainly indicates that the excommunication does not reach those who are subordinate, even if they were judges, but was imposed only upon those who, compelled by no one, either perform such acts or compel others to perform them. Therefore, he contracts the excommunication who, either directly, for example, by threats, or indirectly, for example, through another, compels ecclesiastics to be drawn into court as though accused, whether on account of a penal cause for even a most grave crime, or on account of a civil cause of even a single farthing.

The Constitution limits it: Contrary to the canonical sanctions, namely, unless at some time through them an ecclesiastic is permitted to be drawn before a lay tribunal, with the conditions under which this is permitted otherwise observed.

[16]  With respect to the other part of this article, attention is directed to those issuing, that is, establishing laws or decrees against the liberty and rights of the Church, namely, of the universal Church.

Laws are those which are established in perpetuity by the supreme power; Decrees are those which are issued generally by any power, for example, by the Prefect of a city, Municipalities, etc., but not those which are issued against individual persons or in individual cases, which you would rather call mandates, and therefore not the sentences of judges.

But the words Against the liberty or rights, etc., extend most widely and strike altogether every kind of law or decree by which not only the exercise of ecclesiastical power, whether of Jurisdiction or Order, but any other right is intercepted, restricted, or disturbed, such as the right of teaching; promoting to Orders; conducting public supplications outside churches or at night; erecting Churches, Benefices, and Pious Associations; and conferring Benefices without any intervention of the lay power; indeed, also the rights which belong to the Church as a Society, such as the right of acquiring by acts of last will or among the living; alienating; or leasing her goods beyond nine years, etc.

But this excommunication is incurred by those issuing laws or decrees of this kind by lay authority; and if these were proposed by the vote, for example, of the people, senate, etc., all who voted for them are bound by this censure as soon as they have been promulgated.

[17]  Namely, to persons who exercise some jurisdiction over citizens, of which kind, for example, are judges, presidents, prefects of cities, etc. Nor does it matter in what manner someone had recourse, whether by appealing, by calling upon them, or by presenting a petition.

[18]  Acts of the Apostolic See are called those which are transacted at Rome by the Roman Pontiff or at his mandate, whether they contain a spiritual or temporal matter.

[19]  By Delegates understand those to whom the transaction of some matter is committed.

[20]  Promulgation, rather than being taken for dissemination, which consists in fact, appears to be taken for publication in the customary form and manner, which consists rather in law. It is disputed whether, in order to incur this censure, it is necessary that the publication or execution be prohibited by public authority. The Rieti Commentary follows those affirming, for the Pontiff appears to speak of that prohibition which flows from recourse to the lay power.

[21]  To injure appears to be taken in the strict signification, by which, namely, the body is said to be injured. But to frighten indicates the instilling of fear which is certainly grave. By the parties themselves understand those to whom the Apostolic Letters or Acts pertain, but by others those to whom the publication or execution of the Apostolic Letters pertains.

[22]  Not all forgers incur this excommunication, but only forgers of Apostolic Letters, whether they contain grace or justice. Those are said to contain grace which contain some favor or liberality of the Roman Pontiff; but letters of justice are those which pertain to lawsuits and therefore to the cognizance or determination of some cause. Indeed, Apostolic Letters or rescripts do not pertain here if they have not yet been signed or furnished with a seal or leaden bulla, because, since they are not yet authentic, they do not yet avail.

Since the crime of forgery concerning letters of this kind can be committed in several ways, it is punished with excommunication if it is done: 1. by corrupting; or 2. by fabricating Apostolic Letters; or 3. by signing petitions, etc. By corrupting, whenever something is varied, deleted, or added, which must be estimated not materially but formally, that is, from the sense principally intended by the Roman Pontiff. By fabricating, whenever a false writing is substituted. Finally, by signing petitions, etc., whenever Fiat is falsely subscribed in them.

But in order that the censure be incurred, it is necessary: 1. that these things were committed with evil intent; 2. that, if they concern another, this gravely harms or can harm the other; I said, if another, for if they concern only you, it suffices to have falsified them in any manner; 3. finally, that you have perfected and completed the falsity. But when the falsity has been perfected, the excommunication is immediately incurred even if you do not use the falsified Letters or Rescripts. Except that which is committed by fabricating Apostolic Letters, before whose publication this censure is not incurred. But one who uses these Letters incurs another excommunication reserved to the Bishop, as will be said below.

[23] Concerning this article there is nothing to be added to those things which were said above (at no. 584).

[24] Someone is said to usurp when, as though using a power of ruling and by his own right, he takes prior possession of something (Suarez, On Censures, disputation 21, section 2, no. 96). Therefore thieves, robbers, etc., are not comprehended here, as the Sacred Inquisition also declared, 9 March 1870. But to sequester in the present case is to impede something from being received by those to whom it belongs.

[25] By jurisdiction understand either spiritual or temporal jurisdiction (Suarez, loc. cit., no. 95); but by goods understand immovable or movable goods, or even rights; and by revenues, whatever a thing bears or is received in consideration of the thing. Moreover, those jurisdictions, goods, and revenues are understood which belong to ecclesiastical persons by reason of their churches or benefices. Avanzini (Commentary, no. 18) thinks that the goods of monasteries also pertain here, as belonging to ecclesiastical persons by reason of their churches. Indeed, in the Bull Coenae (section 17), from which this article is taken, it is said: Belonging to any ecclesiastical persons by reason of Churches, monasteries, and other Ecclesiastical benefices. But the word other there suggests that Monasteries are comprehended under the name of benefices rather than churches; otherwise, as is acutely noted in the Rieti Commentary, goods of this kind, etc., belong either to the monasteries themselves, to their Sacristies, or to the Roman Church.

Since by this article only those usurping and sequestering, etc., appear expressly to be subjected to this excommunication, it was doubted whether someone who purchases the aforesaid things from a usurper incurs the same excommunication. But that it is indeed incurred is settled law from the Allocution of Pius IX, 25 July 1873. Add the reply of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, 8 July 1874: It must by no means be doubted that those purchasing ecclesiastical goods usurped by usurpers fall into the excommunication reserved to the Roman Pontiff. For, setting aside the question whether the aforesaid purchase is in some manner touched by article XI of the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, it can be doubtful to no one that it is comprehended by the most clear disposition of chapter XI, On Reformation, session 22 of the Council of Trent.

The replies of the Sacred Penitentiary concerning those who in any manner retain ecclesiastical goods of this kind, see below from no. 1092 in the Appendix.

[26] This excommunication pertains to the defense and protection of the temporal Dominion belonging to the Apostolic See. Therefore, rights and jurisdiction here are taken as temporal, and jurisdiction is understood as supreme, that is, that which belongs to the Prince alone, such as the right of life and death, the right of imposing taxes, creating Magistrates, etc.

But this excommunication is incurred: 1. by those who destroy cities, lands, places, etc., and those who invade them by employing force; 2. by those who disturb the supreme jurisdiction of the Roman Pontiff in them, for example, those who impede Him from promulgating laws in these cities, imposing taxes, etc.; 3. by those who retain this jurisdiction or the cities, etc., even if they received them from others, such as heirs and heirs of heirs. 4. Finally, by those who furnish aid, counsel, or favor toward any of the aforesaid acts.

And as regards these last, it is a difficult matter, as the Rieti Commentary well says, to define when they incur excommunication by reason of aid, favor, etc., in detaining. A twofold kind of these (it says) must be distinguished. The one is of those who hold some public office; the other, of those who exercise none. And as regards the former, public offices pertain either to the necessities or utilities of the citizens, or to preserving the government, or to both. It can indeed be harmless to undertake the former, because society cannot kill itself.

But two things above the rest must be observed: 1. that they do not take an oath by which active obedience, as they say, is promised to the usurper, which would be as the price of the office. And if it is altogether necessary to swear, let them promise only passive obedience, and obedience to laws both divine and ecclesiastical, as was enjoined through the Letter of Pius VII to the Bishops of the Marches, 30 August 1808, and by the Sacred Penitentiary, 10 December 1860, replies 10 and 14.

2. That while they swear, they openly profess that they will do nothing contrary to divine and ecclesiastical laws. Wherefore, if something contrary to these laws should have to be done, it is necessary either to abstain from it or to renounce the office.

But with respect to public duties which do not pertain merely to the utilities and necessities of citizens but to preserving the government, the Sacred Penitentiary had already replied on 10 October 1860 (reply 11) that they can be tolerated, provided that there is no question of offices which directly and proximately contribute to the spoliation or to the maintenance of that same spoliation, and which cannot be exercised without danger of violating divine and ecclesiastical laws. But those who hold the first or supreme magistracy in any province, city, land, or town are understood to contribute by office to the maintenance of the spoliation. Thus the Instruction of Pius VII, 22 May 1809, declares: It is not lawful to accept employments and charges which have a more or less direct tendency to recognize, assist, and consolidate the new government in the exercise of the usurped power. But what duties are of this kind is declared more expressly thus in the Instruction of 10 June 1809: It is declared that by such employments are understood especially the offices of Governors, Prefects, or Mayors, who under this or another designation represent the first magistrate in each province, city, land, castle, or country whatever.

But departure from this policy began after it left no hope of impeding the consolidation of the usurpation, and otherwise the office of governing, committed and permitted only to rebels and wicked men, finally produced this sole fruit: that a policy of this kind turned to the destruction of Religion and to ever worse harms of subjects. And indeed, where an unjust usurper permits the oppressed subjects of another to provide in some manner for themselves and the common good, no reason at all appears why either the legitimate prince ought to be considered unwilling, for he would not reasonably be unwilling, or why oppressed subjects ought to be considered free of fault if they refuse offices through negligence. For they will not act thus as though they recognize some right in the most unjust usurper, but as persons who use the law of nature to provide for themselves and society. See the things said in volume I, no. 394, in the Note.

These things concern those holding public duties. But with respect to those who perform no office of this kind, those are understood to favor those detaining who furnish proximate assistance so that the usurpers remain in possession, for example, through money, denunciations, counsels, writings, etc.

Avanzini writes (Commentary, no. 19) that, if this article of the Constitution is compared with article XII of the Bull Coenae, it appears that adherents, supporters, and their defenders have been removed; concerning which matter he nevertheless subjoins that the Apostolic Letters of the year 1860 still remain in force. But unless by adherents you understand, as some are accustomed, those who merely stand for the usurpers, and by defenders those who contribute nothing to the maintenance of the spoliation, you certainly have these also sufficiently comprehended among those who furnish aid or favor.

973. ○ XIII. From the Bull Romanus Pontifex of Pius IX, 28 August 1873, there is added an excommunication likewise reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff against dignitaries and canons (add: and those who, when chapters are lacking, have power to appoint the administrator or Vicar of a vacant Church, or who legitimately administer vacant Churches), > who, before the exhibition of the Apostolic Letters, have dared, under any title, name, or specious pretext, to grant and transfer the care, governance, and administration of a vacant Church either to one elected, even legitimately, by Chapters as Bishop, or to one nominated or presented, even legitimately, by the lay power to the said vacant Church; then also those who, having been nominated and presented to vacant churches, dare to undertake their care, governance, and administration from the concession and transfer made to them by dignitaries, Canons, and others of whom above; and also those who have obeyed the aforesaid persons or furnished aid, counsel, or favor, of whatever state, condition, preeminence, and dignity they may be [27].

[27]  All who are subjected to the aforesaid excommunication are punished also with another penalty in the same Bull thus: And We bind them also with the penalties, likewise to be incurred by that very fact, of deprivation of the ecclesiastical fruits of any Benefices whatever and of other ecclesiastical revenues respectively obtained by them, and decree and declare that they shall be bound; and We reserve the relaxation of those penalties... ONLY IN A SPECIAL MANNER to Ourselves and to the Roman Pontiff for the time being.

Furthermore, with respect to those elected or presented in this manner, it is added: Moreover, We decree that those nominated and presented are by that very fact deprived of the right which perhaps was acquired for them through nomination and presentation. And below: Furthermore, We declare and decree by the tenor of the present Letters that whatever things are done, commanded, decreed, and ordained by those thus nominated and presented, intruded into the administration of vacant Churches, together with each and every thing in any manner following therefrom and in any manner to follow, are and shall perpetually be null, invalid, empty, void, damnably attempted and presumed in fact by those not having power, and of no value, moment, or efficacy; and We condemn and reprobate them.

The interdict which is added against those nominated, etc., if they are marked with the episcopal character, will be set forth below in its place.

XIV. Likewise: Whoever in the aforementioned dioceses (namely, those subject to the Patriarchate of Venice and the Metropolitan See of Milan), having been elected by the vote of the people to the office of Pastor or Vicar, dare to seize the pretended possession either of the Church or of its rights and goods, and to perform the duties of the ecclesiastical ministry, by that very fact incur major excommunication peculiarly reserved to the Holy See, and other canonical penalties. See the Encyclical Letter of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, 21 November 1873 [28].

[28]  In the same place these things follow: And let all those same persons (namely, the intruded) be avoided by the faithful according to the divine warning, as strangers or thieves, who come only to steal, slaughter, and destroy.

But what these things mean can be learned from those which, under Pius VI, had to be observed by prescription with respect to intruded persons in France. They are as follows:

1. It is not licit to approach an intruded pastor for the administration of baptism except in a case of extreme necessity, namely, if there is no other person capable of baptizing; nor is it licit to perform the office of sponsor if perhaps the intruded person baptizes.

2. It is not licit, even on feast days, to be present at the Mass of an intruded priest, even if another Mass is lacking; nor is it licit to be present at a sermon or other functions of the intruded person, or to ask other ministries from him, or to entrust a Mass to him to celebrate.

3. It is not licit to receive Communion from an intruded person, even when the Paschal season is pressing.

4. Although one must genuflect before Hosts consecrated by an intruded person, care must nevertheless be taken, lest in this worship Catholics appear to communicate with schismatics, that an encounter with the intruded person be avoided while he carries the Holy Eucharist. And it is licit for a Catholic priest, even if not fasting, to consume hosts consecrated by a Catholic, if they cannot be reverently preserved, lest they come into the hands of the intruded person.

5. It is not licit to approach an intruded Pastor for contracting matrimony; wherefore, if no other means is available and the superior cannot provide another Pastor or priest, the faithful ought to contract without the presence of a pastor.

6. It is not licit for women, after completing childbirth, to receive from an intruded person the blessing which is customarily given after childbirth.

7. The obsequies of the dead are to be celebrated by the legitimate pastor even in private houses, if they cannot be performed otherwise; but if the intruded person carries the body to the Church, let Catholics neither accompany the funeral nor recite sacred prayers nor perform other rites of the Church in association with him.

8. But whether in danger of death the faithful can licitly receive absolution from an intruded Pastor, it was replied: The course which certain Prelates of France entered upon is not to be disapproved, who, in that moment, permitted the sacrament of penance... when any other Catholic priest was lacking and scandal had been removed, to be received from intruded pastors in that necessity.

But it must be noted here that the Censure and Decree of which there is now question indeed pertain to the ecclesiastical provinces of Venice and Milan; but it must not be thought that persons intruded into parishes in this manner elsewhere are by no means subject to these penalties. For neither will these escape the excommunication set forth above in article XI. For either a legitimate pastor is supposed already to have been given to the parish, and thus we have on the part of the intruded person a usurpation of jurisdiction belonging to another by reason of a benefice; or we suppose that a legitimate pastor has not yet been given, and thus we have the jurisdiction of the Ordinary over the same parish violated. Therefore, the special Decree for the said Provinces can be regarded as a mere consequence or application of article XI.

974. ○ In the same Constitution these things are subjoined: We declare that absolution from all the excommunications enumerated up to this point is and remains reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff for the time being, and that for it a general concession of absolving from cases and censures or excommunications reserved to the Roman Pontiff in no manner suffices; any indults whatever granted in any form and to any persons, even Regulars of any Order, Congregation, Society, and Institute, even those worthy of special mention and constituted in any dignity, being revoked in addition with respect to those same excommunications [29]. But those presuming to absolve > without due faculty, even under any pretext, are to know themselves bound by a bond of excommunication > reserved to the Roman Pontiff [30], provided that there is no question of the point of death, in which nevertheless the obligation, with respect to those absolved, of standing by the mandates of the Church if they recover remains firm [31].

[29]  On account of those derogatory clauses a doubt had arisen whether all faculties, whether ordinary, namely, those customarily granted, or extraordinary, granted by the Apostolic See before the promulgation of the same Constitution, had been diminished or taken away by this Constitution, for example, the faculty of absolving from the crime of heresy which was contained in the Pagella of the Sacred Penitentiary. But by mandate of the Supreme Pontiff it was declared through the Office of the Sacred Inquisition as follows: Through the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis the Most Holy Father in no way intends to inflict even the least detriment upon faculties of whatever kind which were granted by the Holy See before the promulgation of the same Constitution, whether they are quinquennial or extraordinary or regard the present Jubilee; and he wills that they remain in their full force while the time defined in the said concessions or indults endures.

See above, no. 175, and the things noted there; concerning which the Reply of the Sacred Penitentiary, 5 December 1873, must not be omitted. Namely, to the doubt, Whether Regular Prelates, after the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, enjoy the same privileges which they did before, that is, whether or not they can absolve their subjects from papal cases simply reserved in the said Bull, this reply was made: The Sacred Penitentiary replies to the proposed doubt: Negatively, saving other faculties which proceed from particular Rescripts granted for a time.

But from this a question could be raised whether through these things something must be said to have been detracted from the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, confirmed by Pontifical authority, which elsewhere (above, page 114, in the Note) we reported in these words: The Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, after the matter had been spoken of with the Most Holy Clement VIII, ABSOLUTELY DECREED that all Bulls and Decrees derogating from the Privileges of Regulars with respect to the faculty of absolving from cases reserved to the Pope are to be understood only in relation to secular persons, but not in relation to their Regular subjects.

And, saving indeed a better judgment, it seems that it must be answered that these things can be reconciled together very well. For, besides the fact that what belongs to Bishops from chapter Liceat also belongs to Regular Prelates, see above, no. 175, the doubt proposed to the Sacred Penitentiary treats of Privileges properly so called. But what is established in the aforesaid Decree ought to be called not so much a Privilege as a certain provident disposition which, by a certain general norm, applies the principles of the common law to the condition and state of Regulars. For it is very well known both from the nature of the matter and from the consensus of all the Doctors that Regulars are numbered among those who are considered to have a perpetual impediment preventing them from being free and unimpeded to approach the Apostolic See personally for absolution from censures. But in these circumstances it is settled law that the faculty of absolving devolves upon the Ordinary, so that he can both absolve by himself and also through another, because this faculty belongs to him by ordinary law, and therefore he can delegate it to another. Thus in chapter Nuper 29, On the Sentence of Excommunication: We grant... that he may be absolved by his Bishop or his own Priest. But no one is ignorant that the Ordinaries of exempt Regulars are none other than their Prelates. Therefore the faculty is given to the Prelates of Regulars to absolve their subjects in the case, not by force of some special privilege, but by a norm taken from the common law. Nevertheless, this norm has a certain appearance of a privilege, insofar as, to remove all doubts for the future, the Apostolic See through the organ of the Sacred Congregation established this canon generally for Regulars. And indeed, what is worthy of note is that a Declaration or Decree of this kind appeared at the time when the same Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, by the Mandate and Authority of the same Clement VIII, under penalty of excommunication, deprivation of offices, and incapacity for hearing confessions, etc., had forbidden all Regulars to presume to absolve from cases reserved or to be reserved in any manner to the Apostolic See. For His Holiness (it is added in that decree) insofar as there is need, has willed and wills that the faculties and concessions themselves in this part are henceforth to be held as utterly null and void. Therefore, by this very fact the Sacred Congregation most manifestly declared that that disposition concerning Regulars pertained in no way to that privilege properly so called of absolving from Papal cases which Clement VIII, by that Decree of 9 January 1601, no less than Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX by the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, willed to be annulled, rendered void, and taken away. Therefore, the reply of the Sacred Penitentiary, which regards the privileges of which there is discussion in the proposed doubt, contradicts or detracts nothing from the Decree which, at the command of Clement VIII, established that special canon for the singular condition of Regulars.

[30]  You have, therefore, another excommunication simply reserved to the Roman Pontiff, and accordingly to be added to the following catalogue.

[31]  These persons, therefore, will have to present themselves in order to receive mandates, unless nevertheless these are already known and enjoined, for example, those which were prescribed by the Sacred Penitentiary to those who purchased ecclesiastical goods from a usurper, concerning whom in article XI.

II. Latae Sententiae Excommunications Reserved to the Roman Pontiff

975. ° I. Those teaching or defending, whether publicly or privately, propositions condemned by the Apostolic See under penalty of a latae sententiae excommunication [32]; likewise those teaching or defending as licit the practice of inquiring from a penitent the name of an accomplice, as it was condemned by Benedict XIV in the Constitutions Suprema, > 7 July 1745; Ubi primum, 2 July 1746; Ad eradicandum, 28 September 1746 [33].

II. Those who, at the instigation of the devil, lay violent hands upon Clerics or monks of either sex [34], excepting, with respect to the reservation, the cases and persons concerning whom it is permitted by law or privilege that the Bishop or another absolve [35].

III. Those perpetrating a duel, or simply challenging another to it, or accepting it, and any accomplices, or those furnishing any assistance or favor, and also those deliberately watching it, and those permitting it or, so far as it is in their power, not prohibiting it, of whatever dignity they may be, even royal or imperial [36].

[32]  The propositions which it is forbidden by the Apostolic See to teach or defend under penalty of a latae sententiae excommunication are commonly enumerated as follows:

1. The 45 Articles of John Wycliffe and the 30 Articles of John Hus. From the Constitution In eminentis Apostolicae, etc., of Martin V, dated at Rome, 13 February 1450. (See volume I, page XXXV.)

2. The 41 Errors of Martin Luther, condemned by Leo X in the Bull Exsurge Domine, etc., 16 May 1520. (Above, volume I, page XL.)

3. The 79 Propositions of Michael Baius, condemned by St. Pius V in the Bull Ex omnibus, 1 October 1567, etc. (Above, volume I, page XLIII.)

4. The Proposition concerning sacramental confession and absolution to be obtained by letters. Clement VIII, through the Decree of the Sacred Inquisition, 20 July 1602. (Above, volume I, page XLVIII.)

5. The 45 Propositions condemned by Alexander VII through Decrees of the Sacred Inquisition, 24 September 1665 and 18 March 1666. (Above, volume I, page L.)

6. The 65 Propositions condemned by Innocent XI through the Decree of the Sacred Inquisition, 2 March 1679. (Above, volume I, page LIII.)

7. The 68 Propositions of Michael de Molinos, condemned by Innocent XI in the Constitution Caelestis Pastor, 20 November 1687. (Above, volume I, page LVIII.)

8. The 2 Propositions condemned by Alexander VIII, 24 August 1690. (Above, volume I, page LXIV.)

9. The 31 Propositions condemned by Alexander VIII through the Decree of the Sacred Inquisition, 7 December 1690. (Above, volume I, page LXIV.)

10. The 101 Propositions of Pasquier Quesnel, condemned by Clement XI in the Constitution Unigenitus, 8 September 1713. (Above, volume I, page LXVI.)

11. The 5 Propositions On the Duel, condemned by Benedict XIV in the Constitution Detestabilem, 10 November 1752. (Above, volume I, page LXIX.)

12. The 85 Propositions of the diocesan Synod of Pistoia, condemned by Pius VI in the Constitution Auctorem fidei, 28 August 1794. (Above, volume I, page LXXV.)

[33]  See the things given above concerning this argument, no. 501.

[34]  Since this privilege, which is customarily called the privilege of the canon, is in favor not of persons but of the Order, it is taken most widely. Therefore, under the name of Clerics are included whoever have received tonsure; but under the designation of Monks, all Regulars of either sex, and their Novices and Tertiaries, indeed also Hermits who by mandate of the Bishop are assigned to the custody and service of some Church or chapel.

A violent laying on of hands is understood whenever injury is done by deeds to a person, namely, by harming either his body, liberty, or dignity; the body indeed by striking, wounding, or even harming by poison, or by in any way causing him to fall, tumble headlong, etc.; liberty, as if you thrust him into a prison or another place, even a private one; dignity, if force is in any manner employed against him, as, for example, by stopping the carriage or horse on which he is being conveyed, by violently taking something from him, such as a hat, purse, or staff; or by committing some other insulting act against him, for example, if you soil him with spittle, mud, or dust, or tear the clothes which he is wearing, etc.

All, even those who have not reached puberty, are subject to this excommunication. Nevertheless, a cleric who lays hands upon himself does not incur it (St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 274); nor, on account of a defect of full advertence, does one who strikes from sudden anger or in jest, or for the sake of correction or defense, or for some other just cause, as if he finds him acting shamefully with his daughter, sister, etc. Indeed, as can deservedly be held, neither do those commanding or ratifying it incur the censure, since the law, which expressed others (see article V among the excommunications reserved in a special manner), passes over these here.

[35]  Namely, if the striking was light, the Bishop can absolve the striker, whoever he may be. But a striking is called light which indeed inflicts grave injury but without grave harm, for example, one done with a fist, foot, stone, or club. But if the striking was grave, the Bishop can absolve only those who live collegiately, from chapter 50, On the Sentence of Excommunication; but it is held as grave, besides the fact that it must also be estimated from the place, the person, and other circumstances, from the Extravagant Perlectis of John XXII, if, for example, a tooth is knocked out or an abundance of blood is shed. Finally, if the striking was enormous, such as mutilation, the gouging out of an eye, the severing of a member, etc., the Bishop can absolve only those who have not reached puberty, whether they seek absolution before or after puberty, from chapter 60, On the Sentence of Excommunication. But in doubt whether the striking was light, grave, or enormous, according to the cited Extravagant the graver classification must be maintained.

But as to what Regular Prelates can do by common law concerning their subjects, compare the things brought forward above from St. Alphonsus in the Note to no. 175.

[36]  With the Rieti Commentary, note that for the character of a duel of this kind it is required that the combat be fought with lethal weapons; and therefore it does not pertain here if there is fighting with fists, sticks, or even iron with a blunted edge, although death follows accidentally. Nor is this contrary to the Constitution Illius vices of Clement VIII. at no. 405, page 388, volume I; because, namely, in this place also St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 220) refers to those things which he had written (book 3, no. 400), namely, that after those five Propositions on the Duel were condemned by Benedict XIV, that opinion which asserts that a Duel can licitly be accepted for the necessary defense of goods of great importance cannot be held as probable. St. Alphonsus indeed attributes this opinion to Lessius, Sanchez, Palao, Coninck, Valentia, Holzmann, Pichler, Reiffenstuel, Sporer, Albel, and others, and adds that it is called probable by Croix and Roncaglia. Indeed, it would certainly be licit for these Authors to add even the vote of St. Alphonsus himself; for he held the same doctrine altogether approved when he wrote these things (Note 1 of the Author on article 3, doubt 4, chapter 2, book 7, edition of the year 1748): It must be noted that a duel can sometimes be justified by just causes, for example, to avoid a loss of goods which the other challenger threatens; nevertheless the loss ought to be certain, and it ought to be impossible to meet it by another way unless the duel is accepted. And indeed, since St. Alphonsus afterward departed from this doctrine for no other cause than because he thought that it had been condemned by Benedict XIV, as he himself thus testifies concerning himself (Catalogue of Reformed Propositions, no. 97), therefore, when it can prudently be considered that this condemnation is not sufficiently established, nothing now prevents us from numbering the Holy Doctor among the patrons of that opinion.

But this is the argument of that Note to no. 405, volume I; there, namely, it is demonstrated that the falsity of the aforesaid opinion can by no means be logically deduced from the aforesaid condemned Propositions. For otherwise that opinion is by no means defended in the same Note by any positive reason; but, from a weighing of the Propositions proscribed by Benedict XIV, this alone was inferred: It must therefore be concluded that it is indeed lawful for anyone to seek reasons by which he may attack that opinion and whatever probability it has; but reasons of this kind must plainly be sought elsewhere than from those proscribed propositions.

And this plainly is what greatly displeases the VV. Wherefore, through fourteen columns (pages 879-885) they labor to establish that that doctrine was truly condemned in the aforesaid propositions. Nor indeed do they hesitate to write thus concerning those things which we said in the Note to no. 405: Father Ballerini appears to deceive himself. For even by observing the rules which he himself hands down for rightly converting condemned propositions, it is clearly gathered from the same propositions that the acceptance of a duel for preserving one's fortunes with honor is condemned.

Again, therefore, a few things concerning this argument. Concerning this matter I would note that it by no means appears why the VV. write, even by observing the rules which he himself (Father Ballerini) hands down, etc., as though Father Ballerini had brought forth here some singular and less well-established rules. For does any rule concerning condemned Propositions exist or can one be devised other than that which all have always admitted, namely, that nothing can certainly be forced from them except that the contradictory of that proposition which was condemned as false must be held as true? The contradictory, I say, but not the contrary, since two contrary propositions indeed cannot both be true, but certainly can both be false. Or can other rules for finding the contradictory of some proposition be produced than those which are everywhere extant in the first elements of dialectic?

Let us therefore come to the matter. The VV., after St. Alphonsus, object with the first and fourth of those five propositions. But the first reads thus: A military man who, unless he offers OR accepts (both in St. Alphonsus and in Gury and the VV. it is read incorrectly, AND accepts) a Duel, would be regarded as fearful, timid, abject, and unfit for military duties, and would therefore be deprived of the office by which he supports himself and his family, or would have to lack perpetually the hope of a promotion otherwise due and merited by him, would be free from fault and penalty, whether he offers or accepts the duel.

But concerning this the VV. write thus (page 881): The contradictory of the first condemned Proposition can be no other than the following: "A military man who, unless he offers and accepts a duel... would be deprived of the office by which he supports himself and his family,... would not be free from fault and penalty, whether he offers or accepts the duel"; and they add: Surely nothing clearer could be desired.

Yet this is by no means the contradictory of the preceding proposition, but its contrary. For, as the dialecticians teach, the distinction is this: in contradictories, one affirms or denies only as much as suffices for the other to be false; and therefore both can never be true, nor can both be false at the same time. But in contraries, one denies or affirms more than is necessary for the other to be false; whence it happens that both indeed cannot be true at the same time, but both can be false. Yet in this case we have the latter, not the former.

For let the Proposition be reduced to this simpler form: A military man... is free from fault and penalty, whether he offers or accepts a duel. Here take care to observe that the words whether he offers or accepts a duel are expressed not disjunctively but copulatively, just as if one were to say: he is free from fault both if he offers and if he accepts a duel. Hence it follows that, if with the VV. you say, he is not free from fault both if he offers and if he accepts a duel, you now deny more than is necessary for the other proposition to be false; and therefore both can be false, namely, when he would be free from fault if he accepts, but not if he offers, or vice versa. You will have the contradictory only if you say: Either he is not free from fault if he offers, or he is not free from fault if he accepts. Which part of this disjunction is then true must be determined from elsewhere, and not by force of the proposition itself. It is therefore evident that, by force of the condemned Proposition, it cannot be concluded that both cases are subject to fault and penalty.

Say the same of the other Proposition which the VV., following St. Alphonsus, press: It is licit in the natural state of man to accept and offer a duel in order to preserve one's fortunes with honor, when their loss cannot be warded off by another remedy.

Concerning this the VV. write thus (page 882): The other proposition sounds contradictorily thus: "It is not licit... to accept and offer a duel in order to preserve one's fortunes with honor." Yet this is opposed to the condemned proposition not contradictorily but contrarily, and can be false just as much as the opposite proposition, because it denies more than is fitting. If you wish the contradictory, say: Either to offer a duel in order to preserve one's fortunes with honor, or to accept it, is not licit.

Here the VV. add (loc. cit.): If the one accepting is not condemned because the proposition is copulative, for the same reason neither can the one offering be condemned; therefore, in the condemned proposition neither is certainly condemned: which is absurd.

But to these things it must be answered: I concede the whole, except that this must be called absurd. And indeed, if someone should say: Peter and Paul were crucified at Rome, its contradictory will not be, Neither Peter nor Paul was crucified at Rome, but the disjunctive: Either Peter or Paul was not crucified at Rome. But is that said absurdly because, by force of the proposition, it remains uncertain which of them was, or was not, crucified? This must be gathered from elsewhere, as we have said, and not by force of the contradictory proposition. And this indeed is also recommended by those things which the VV. themselves bring forward thus from Reuter: Since a condemned proposition can bear either a universal or a particular sense, while a composite proposition can bear either a copulative or a divided sense, in order that it may be understood in what sense it was condemned and which contradictory opposed to it is true, one must consider both the matter which is proscribed and the weight of the reasons on account of which it deserved to be proscribed, as well as the mind of those who taught that proposition, and finally the common sense of the Doctors.

Take careful note of those words: which contradictory opposed to it IS TRUE; for several contradictories are disjunctively opposed to a complex proposition, as is evident from the one aforesaid: either he is not free from fault and penalty while he offers, or he is not free from fault and penalty while he accepts. Which of these is true, Reuter rightly says must be argued from the matter, from the weight of the reasons, from the sense of the Doctors, etc.

And that recourse must finally be had to this is manifestly evident from innumerable other examples concerning condemned theses. Let there be, for example, proposition 36 among those proscribed by Innocent XI: It is permitted to steal not only in extreme necessity but also in grave necessity; which, as regards its form, is certainly equivalent to this other: It is licit not only to accept but also to offer a duel. All agree that something false and condemnable lies within it. But without an inspection of the matter or of the sense of the Doctors, what at length will you extract? This one thing, namely, which the contradictory presents: that it is not permitted to steal either in extreme necessity, or in grave necessity, or in both cases. But behold Doctors disagreeing as to whether that thesis is to be understood of formal theft, or merely of the material taking of another's thing, so that to steal there is the same as to carry off another's property. I ask, therefore: can this controversy be determined from the mere inspection of the thesis in itself? Or shall we on that account cry out with the VV. that it is absurd that nothing certain is gathered from the condemned Proposition?

Again, if you understand formal theft there as an unjust taking, unless you recur to a consideration of the matter, will you be able, from the contradictory thesis inspected in itself, to determine whether all the members of the disjunction, or only one of them, and which one, is to be judged true?

And again, if with Viva and St. Alphonsus you take that to steal not for formal theft but for a material taking, do you find it thus determined in that condemnation which member of the contradictory thesis is certainly to be held true and which false? Finally, do we not determine solely from an inspection of the matter, from the force of the reasons, and from the sense of the Doctors, what is true and what is false? And, what is chief, is not the rule which St. Alphonsus provides shown, from the interpretation of this thesis, to be deficient and fallacious, the rule by which the VV. contended that the propositions concerning the duel, as we saw above, ought to be converted? Indeed, according to the rule by force of which they convert the first proposition thus: he is not free from fault and penalty, whether he offers or accepts a duel; and the fourth thus: it is not licit to accept and offer a duel, etc.; according to this rule, I say, the aforesaid proposition 36 would also have to be converted thus: it is not permitted to carry off another's thing either in extreme necessity or in grave necessity. Yet St. Alphonsus (book 3, no. 520) indeed says that by this proposition it is condemned that it is licit to carry off another's things in grave necessity alone; but he acknowledges, with the consensus of all, that it is licit to carry off another's property in extreme necessity. Therefore the rule proposed by the VV. is fallacious; therefore by a fallacious conversion of the propositions premised concerning the duel, the VV. contend that both members of those complex theses must be held as condemned.

Since, therefore, it is not determined by force of conversion upon which member of a proscribed complex proposition the condemnation certainly falls, but in order to argue this it is finally necessary to appeal to the nature of the matter, to the force of the reasons, and to the sense of the Doctors, certainly, if someone should consider that St. Alphonsus too, with many grave Authors, could have agreed with that doctrine that a duel can sometimes be justified by just causes, etc., as we described above, he will plainly be able to deduce a consequence wholly opposite to the consequences which the VV. contend must be elicited from these propositions. Let us, however, be content with that conclusion which in the Note to no. 405 we deduced thus: It must be concluded that it is indeed lawful for anyone to seek reasons by which he may attack that opinion and whatever probability it has; but reasons of this kind must plainly be sought elsewhere than from those proscribed propositions.

To that which the VV. add (pages 882-885), that there have been several after Concina and Patuzzi who understand those condemned propositions in the same sense as St. Alphonsus, let this be the very brief reply: Let the VV. themselves assume the care of investigating whence this has happened; whether, namely, because the cited Authors did not inspect the matter attentively enough, or because, without weighing the matter for themselves, they adopted the opinion of others. For it is certainly not right to have thought them so unskilled in dialectic that they were ignorant either of the mode of arguing from condemned theses or of the mode of finding the contradictory of some Proposition. And these things suffice concerning this question.

The VV. have two other things in the Notes to this question (pages 880, 881), which nevertheless pertain to other arguments. First, therefore (page 880, note 1), they bring forth these words of St. Thomas (2.2, q. 64, art. 5, ad 4): It must be said that, as Augustine says, Samson is not otherwise excused for having overwhelmed himself together with his enemies by the ruin of the house, except that the Holy Spirit, who performed miracles through him, had secretly commanded this. And he assigns the same reason concerning certain holy women who killed themselves in time of persecution, whose memory is celebrated in the Church. From these words the VV. conclude that St. Alphonsus (book 5, no. 367, q. 2) rightly said that St. Thomas disagrees with the Doctors who more commonly hold that it is licit to set fire to a ship or tower so that the enemies may suffer grave harm, but with the certain loss of one's own life. To these things it must be answered that this was rightly observed when it is established that St. Thomas and St. Augustine had turned their eyes to a question of this kind.

The other observation of the VV. concerns these words of St. Alphonsus (book 3, no. 366): It is licit in a shipwreck to yield the plank... even if the plank has already been seized, as Sylvius apud Tournely and the Salamancans teach against Soto, Rodriguez, etc.... But Sylvius rightly observes that he cannot, in order to yield the plank, cast himself into the sea, because no one can positively kill himself. The VV. therefore censure (page 881) that in the Note to no. 391, volume I, page 372, we said that Sylvius's scruple was empty.

I reply: In this third edition (loc. cit.) we added the reason why it must be called a scruple and why this limitation of Sylvius cannot be reconciled with the preceding words of St. Alphonsus. We shall add two things here. The first is that St. Alphonsus says that it is licit to yield the plank even if it has been seized, as Sylvius teaches against Soto. But these are the words of Soto (On Justice and Right, book 5, q. 1, art. 6, final proposition): He who relinquished the plank would be in the same position as if he cast himself into the sea, which is directly to kill himself. How then does St. Alphonsus cite Sylvius for himself against Soto, when, as is evident, the doctrine of Soto and Sylvius is the same? Again, St. Alphonsus cites the Salamancans (On Restitution, chapter 2, no. 34) together with Sylvius for his opinion. Yet the Salamancans, when they say that it is licit to give the plank to another, bring forward a reason which overturns the opinion of Sylvius and, in a certain way, even that of St. Alphonsus, namely (they say): This is not to concur directly in death.... It is not to kill oneself, but to commit oneself to a certain danger of death, which one is not bound to avert by so difficult a means as leaving one's neighbor in danger and not helping him. Besides, for an honorable and praiseworthy cause he exposes himself to such danger, which is always licit. When all these things have been weighed, this one consequence results: that paragraph of the Holy Doctor would have been most fortunate if he had left to Tournely, that is, to Collet, that citation of Sylvius which thoroughly disturbs everything there.

In this place the VV. cast their complaints against those things which the reader will find noted concerning the duel

> IV. Those giving their names to the Masonic or Carbonari sect, or > other sects of the same kind which plot against the Church or legitimate > powers, either openly or secretly; and likewise those furnishing to those same > sects any favor whatever; and those not denouncing their secret chiefs and leaders until they have denounced them [37].

[37] According to the Constitution of Pius VII (Ecclesiam a Iesu Christo, section 10) and that of Leo XII (Constitution Quo graviora, section 13), under penalty of excommunication reserved to the Roman Pontiff, all those had to be denounced whom one knew to have given their names to these societies, or to have furnished them assistance, favor, etc., in any manner. But here a limitation is made, so that only those incur this penalty who do not denounce their secret chiefs and leaders.

Moreover, a Confessor must keep two things before his eyes before he indicates to a penitent the obligation of denunciation. The first is that which the Doctors commonly admonish and which Thomas Del Bene expresses in these words (On the Office of the Holy Inquisition, part I, doubt 19, no. 9): You are not bound to denounce on account of fear falling upon a constant man, just as a woman is not bound on account of fear falling upon a constant woman, as if you fear that for this reason you may be killed or maltreated. And again (ibid., doubt 21, no. 1): One is not bound to denounce with probable danger of death, infamy, or grave harm to oneself, or to one's father or mother, or wife, brothers, or others most closely joined by blood.

The other is that which others admonish apud Bonacina (On the Obligation of Denunciation, part I, section 4, no. 3): there is no obligation of denunciation when it is certainly known, or probably believed, that no remedy will be applied by the Prelate after denunciation has been made; for no one is bound to a useless work; or, as Scavini says (treatise 8, disputation 1, chapter 4, article 2, section 1): when there is altogether no hope of punishment; for no one is bound to a useless work; or, as the Decree of the Sacred Inquisition has it (see above in the Note to no. 593, question 5), when it is believed that those denounced can easily escape punishment.

Here it must be observed that, since under the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis (above, no. 972, no. II) those reading books of any author prohibited by name through Apostolic letters, and those retaining, printing, or defending those same books in any manner, incur an excommunication reserved in a special manner, a question can be raised whether books of sectaries of this kind are comprehended in this class, concerning which Pius VII thus decreed (Constitution Ecclesiam a Iesu Christo, section 11, 13 September 1821): Finally, that every danger of error may be warded off more efficaciously, We condemn and proscribe all catechisms, as they call them, of the Carbonari, and books in which there are described by the Carbonari the things which are customarily done in their assemblies; also their statutes, codes, and all books written in their defense, whether printed or manuscript; and under the same penalty of major excommunication reserved in the same manner, We prohibit any of the faithful from reading or retaining the aforesaid books or any one of them. And it seems that it must be answered that those whose title is designated can sufficiently be considered prohibited by name. But here we have Statutes, Codes, Catechisms, and a Description of acts in the Assemblies, etc. Therefore.

Gury has two questions concerning these sectaries. The first is:

Can those who have given their names to the aforesaid sect be absolved if, although they repent of the oath they took, they nevertheless communicate externally with the same associates?

Reply. Negatively, because it is not enough that someone internally renounce his errors if he appears externally to profess those same errors. This is evident from the reply of the Congregation of the Holy Office. For when this doubt had been proposed: Ecclesiastical penalties have been established by several Roman Pontiffs against those who have given their names to the society which they call that of the Freemasons and have taken an oath to preserve the secret in their little assemblies. The doubt arises whether those who, although they repent of the oath they took, nevertheless persevere in openly exhibiting themselves as true adherents of the same society by communicating with others adhering to the same sect, or by attending their little assemblies, or in any other manner, can lawfully be admitted by a Confessor to participation in the Sacrament of Penance or of the Most Holy Eucharist. Certain Priests are found who in fact admit men of this kind. It is asked: how ought the Confessor to conduct himself?

To this petition the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office replied on 5 July 1837: According to the things set forth, it is not licit.

The other is:

Are those associations to be held as prohibited which profess that they plot nothing against Religion or the civil Commonwealth and nevertheless secretly enter into a compact confirmed by oath?

Reply. Affirmatively. This is established from the Declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, 21 August 1850. For it replied: Those associations are comprehended in the Pontifical Bulls.

Notwithstanding the aforesaid Declaration, Kenrick contends that associations of workers joining together for their own advantages are licit in themselves, even if signs are employed in them and a secret is maintained. According to this opinion, the workers commonly called Compagnons du Devoir would not incur excommunication, at least certainly, since they chiefly enter into a compact to assist one another. But on account of the secrecy the matter is full of danger.

Meanwhile it is known from the Declaration of the Office of the Sacred Inquisition, 12 January 1870, that the society of the Fenians is comprehended among the condemned sects.

V. Those ordering the immunity of ecclesiastical asylum to be violated with rash audacity, or violating it [38].

[38] See below, Appendix On the Enclosure of Monasteries.

VI. Those violating the enclosure of Nuns, of whatever class or condition, sex, or age they may be, by entering their monasteries without legitimate permission; likewise those introducing or admitting them, and also Nuns departing from it outside the cases and form prescribed by St. Pius V in the Constitution Decori [39].

VII. Women violating the enclosure of male Regulars, and superiors or others admitting them [40].

VIII. Those guilty of real simony in any benefices whatsoever, and their accomplices [41].

IX. Those guilty of confidential simony in Benefices of any kind, of whatever dignity they may be.

X. Those guilty of real simony on account of entrance into Religion.

XI. All who, making profit from indulgences and other spiritual graces, are struck with the censure of excommunication by the Constitution Quam plenum of St. Pius V, 2 January 1569 [42].

[39] Which places enjoy the immunity of ecclesiastical asylum has been said elsewhere (volume I, in the Note to no. 285).

But this immunity is violated: 1. if one who has fled to those places is drawn out thence by force; but otherwise if he has been led out by deceit and fraud, or has departed deceived by false promises; for by the right of asylum provision is made for the sanctity and reverence of the place, not for the persons taking refuge; 2. if others are prohibited from carrying there those things which are necessary for life; 3. finally, if by any device the sacred place is besieged so that one who protects himself there is compelled to surrender himself (Benedict XIV, Constitution Officii nostri, section 14).

Moreover, for excommunication to be incurred there must be rash audacity, namely, when someone, in no way compelled by others, deliberately and knowingly either orders the right of asylum to be violated or violates it by executing the order, as one devoid of every excuse (Sacred Inquisition, 1 February 1871).

[40] See the same Appendix.

[41] With regard to this and the following two articles, compare the things said concerning Simony in volume I.

[42] According to this Constitution of St. Pius V, for excommunication to be incurred it is required that someone have made profit by granting or publishing indulgences or other spiritual graces (cited Constitution, sections 1 and 4). But one who orders a list of indulgences to be posted in sacred buildings is also considered to publish (ibid., section 2).

The spiritual graces enumerated by this Constitution are: 1. the faculty of choosing for oneself a priest who may absolve one from reserved cases (ibid., section 1); 2. the sacrifice of the Mass and burial during an interdict (ibid., section 3); 3. the use of prohibited foods (ibid.); 4. the taking of two or more sponsors at sacred baptism contrary to the Decree of the Council of Trent (ibid.); 5. absolution from the guilt of simony reserved to the Apostolic See (ibid.). Moreover, only those inferior to Bishops incur the excommunication (ibid., section 6).

XII. Those collecting alms of greater value for Masses and taking profit from them by causing those Masses to be celebrated in places where Mass stipends are customarily of lesser value [43].

[43] Although sin can be committed in many ways by reason of shameful profit sought from Mass stipends (see above from no. 367), nevertheless, for this excommunication to be incurred, it is necessary: 1. that in a certain proper sense someone be said to collect Masses, or to devote effort to collecting Masses. But one is not of this kind to whom Masses are entrusted to be celebrated by himself; nor one to whom, apart from the character of a collector, they are spontaneously committed to be celebrated even by others; nor, finally, one who seeks them from only one or another person. Avanzini well says (Commentary, no. 34): It is sufficiently indicated that there is no question of one or a few stipends in number, but of a certain abundant collection to be made in the manner of commerce. 2. That the collection be made of Masses which are customarily called manual; for the word collecting seems to import this, and it is sufficiently gathered from the Constitution Quanta cura of Benedict XIV. 3. That this be done for the sake of gain or profit; wherefore one who deducts a part from the stipends so that it may be expended upon certain pious uses does not incur excommunication, although the Sacred Congregation of the Council disapproved this on 9 September 1874 (above, in the Note to no. 375); nor one who retains some part for himself as compensation for his labor or effort.

Moreover, all indeed agree that the sanction of Benedict XIV, by which only laics were punished with the penalty of excommunication, was extended by this article, because it also comprehends clerics. But a doubt arises whether it was also limited in some respect. Avanzini (loc. cit.) judged it to have been limited because the article does not say in the same place (that is, in the place where the stipends were collected), but in places where Mass stipends are customarily of lesser value. Wherefore Del Vecchio (Compendium of Scavini, treatise 4, no. 611) thinks it more probable that, for the censure to be incurred, the Masses must be celebrated elsewhere, where stipends are customarily of lesser value. Avanzini, however, adds that the opinion of those asserting that the censure is incurred even if the Masses are celebrated where the stipends were collected is not to be disapproved, attention being given, namely, to the identity, if not of the wording, certainly of the rationale, between the Benedictine Constitution and the present article. Cretoni presses this rationale more tenaciously (Note to this article), adding that it is also gathered from those words of the Benedictine Constitution (section 5): Whether in the same place or elsewhere... he caused them to be celebrated.

But whatever this disagreement may be, it makes plain that the matter is somewhat more obscure. Indeed, if the Constitution of Benedict XIV is inspected, the greater stipends are understood (section 5) which customs or synodal statutes require in some place; but the lesser ones (section 1) are those where the alms or stipends, either by custom or by synodal law... are of lesser value, lesser, namely, than custom or a synodal statute requires elsewhere. With these things posited, it is asked: what do those words of the same Constitution (section 5) mean: "Whether in the same place" (where, namely, the greater stipends are given by custom or statute), "or elsewhere, where lesser stipends are given for Masses to be celebrated, he caused them to be celebrated"? Certainly, if the Masses are celebrated in the same place, retention of part of the stipend cannot occur unless either a stipend below the synodal rate is given to another or another is defrauded of the excess from a stipend exceeding the synodal rate. But neither case is easily reconciled with the words of this article XII. Not the former, because the Masses are not celebrated in places where Mass stipends are customarily of lesser value. Not the latter, because a certain abundant collection of stipends exceeding the synodal rate, which is signified in the Article, scarcely can have place. Therefore it is not without cause that it is written in the Rieti Commentary: Nor, finally, does he incur the censure who causes Masses to be celebrated either in the same place in which he collected them or in another where they are celebrated for the same stipend; although one who retains for himself a part of the stipend, unless it is freely given by the recipient, is guilty of theft, whether grave or light according to the quantity of the matter; and a grave quantity is otherwise required for incurring the censure. And this censure indeed is incurred, not when someone collects stipends with this depraved intention, but when, in handing over a stipend for Masses either celebrated or to be celebrated, he retains a part of it for himself.

XIII. All who are punished with excommunication in the Constitutions Admonet nos of St. Pius V, on the fourth day before the Kalends of April 1567; Quae ab hac Sede of Innocent IX, on the day before the Nones of November 1591; Ad Romani Pontificis curam of Clement VIII, 26 June 1592; and Inter caeteras of Alexander VII, on the ninth day before the Kalends of November 1660, which concern the alienation and enfeoffment of Cities and Places of the Holy Roman Church [44].

XIV. Religious presuming to administer the sacrament of Extreme Unction or the Eucharist as Viaticum to clerics or laics outside a case of necessity without permission of the pastor [45].

[44] Concerning this article the Rieti Commentary, deducing everything briefly and properly from the cited Constitutions, writes thus: The action which is restrained by this excommunication is to act before the Roman Pontiff concerning the alienation of Cities, Towns, or places belonging either immediately or mediately to the right and ownership of the Holy See, except places confiscated and assigned to the treasury. Nor is one excused under whatever title this may be sought, for example, that of government, Vicariate, fief, census, exchange, etc.; or from whatever cause, even merits toward the Holy See, necessity, or evident utility; or for whatever time, even a long time only, or for life, or only at pleasure.

But the following become subject to this excommunication: 1. those treating, consulting, or otherwise speaking about this matter, and consequently about choosing Orators to the Holy See for this purpose; 2. Orators receiving an office of this kind; 3. finally, any others who by themselves or through another suggest or recommend alienations of this kind to the Roman Pontiff; nor does it matter whether they have acted by voice or in writing. The first indeed incur excommunication as soon as they have proposed Orators, provided these have been elected; the Orators themselves when they have accepted the mandate; and the last when they have spoken with the Roman Pontiff concerning this matter or have offered a writing, even if they have lost their labor and oil.

[45] Four things are required for contracting this censure. 1. That the sacraments of which the Article speaks be administered without the permission of the pastor. But by pastor here is understood one who has the care of souls there, by whatever name he may be called, or one who acts in his place in this matter. Permission is also understood as merely presumed, that is, if the pastor certainly would have given it, or at least is probably believed to be going to ratify it, or if the pastor gave it to the sick person, although perhaps he would not have given it to the one who in fact administers these sacraments.

2. That those sacraments be administered outside a case of necessity. But a case of necessity must be estimated not only from the danger under which the sick person labors, but also from whether the Pastor can easily be summoned. Therefore the excommunication will not be incurred if either of these is not lacking, even though perhaps you falsely judged both to be lacking, since our judgment does not change the truth of the matter; or even if, conversely, you thought that either one was not lacking, that is, either that necessity was urgent or that the pastor would not be unwilling, although in fact both are lacking. The reason is that one administering thus is not said to presume.

3. That the one administering be a Religious properly so called. Therefore the excommunication ceases if either a secular priest or even one who professes an Institute in which only simple vows are emitted administers the sacraments in this manner. For in penal matters Institutes of this kind are called neither Religious nor Regular.

4. Finally, that the Religious administer those sacraments to Clerics or Laics. Therefore the excommunication ceases if a Regular has administered them to Regulars, even of another Order and outside a Monastery; or even to those who are reckoned as Regulars by law, that is, Novices and servants who actually serve them and live within the enclosure under their obedience; and probably also to their resident pupils (see above, no. 564, and Extracted Acts, etc., volume 3, page 61). Add to these the poor dwelling in the hospitals of Regulars and male Tertiaries who live collegiately or dwell with cloistered Religious.

XV. Those removing relics without legitimate permission from the Sacred Cemeteries or Catacombs of the City of Rome and its territory, and those furnishing them assistance or favor [46].

XVI. Those communicating with one excommunicated by name by the Pope in the crimen criminosum, namely, by furnishing him assistance or favor.

XVII. Clerics knowingly and voluntarily communicating in divine things with persons excommunicated by name by the Roman Pontiff and receiving them in the offices [47].

[46] From the Edict of 24 August 1613, by command of Paul V, and the Constitution Ex commissae of Clement X, 13 January 1672. Since in those same crypts (says Avanzini, no. 37), or catacombs, bones and ashes are everywhere found in open niches, concerning which it is now established that they are not the bones and ashes of martyrs but of the faithful who were laid there, one who, while visiting the crypts, takes for himself something from these bones or ashes as a remembrance or for the sake of devotion does not appear to incur the censure. It is otherwise if there is question of relics concerning which it is not yet established whether they are of Martyrs or merely of the faithful.

[47] By the ancient law, all who had incurred major excommunication, whether imposed ab homine or by law, were to be avoided, with this distinction alone: those whose excommunication was public and notorious were to be avoided publicly; but those whose excommunication was not publicly known were to be avoided only privately by those who were aware of it. See chapter Cum non ab homine 14, On the Sentence of Excommunication.

Then by the new law introduced by Martin V, it was granted that no one was bound to abstain from communion with anyone, whatever censure, whether by law or ab homine, bound him, unless a sentence against a definite person had been specially and expressly published by the judge; or unless it was so notoriously established that someone had incurred the excommunication imposed by the Canon through a sacrilegious laying of hands upon a cleric that the deed could not be concealed by any evasion or excused by any defense.

But on account of communication with one to be avoided, minor excommunication was incurred by the law itself, both if one communicated with him in divine and spiritual things and if in other merely civil matters. Nevertheless, in two cases, not minor but major excommunication was incurred by the law itself for this cause: 1. if a cleric had communicated in divine things with one excommunicated by the Supreme Pontiff, not in any manner whatever, but by admitting him voluntarily, freely, and willingly, while knowing that he was excommunicated by the Pope by name and, in addition, denounced (from chapter Significavit 18, this title; see Schmalzgrueber, book 5, title 39, no. 179); 2. if someone had communicated with one to be avoided in the crimen criminosum, or in the crime on account of which someone was struck with excommunication by name and denounced as such, by furnishing him assistance, counsel, or favor, lest he repent of that crime.

But by the most recent law of the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, first, minor excommunication was entirely abolished. Major excommunication nevertheless remains; but it is not incurred except by those who communicate with one excommunicated by name by the Supreme Pontiff, and this only in the two aforesaid cases, namely: 1. according to article XVI, if they communicate in the crimen criminosum with one excommunicated by name by the Supreme Pontiff; and 2. according to article XVII, if Clerics knowingly and voluntarily receive one excommunicated in this manner in divine offices, that is, admit him to the exercise of those offices. To the former, as is evident, both clerics and laics are subject; but to the latter, clerics only. Moreover, by one excommunicated by name by the Pontiff is not understood one who, after he has incurred a papal excommunication, is then denounced by name as excommunicated by any other Ordinary; but one who has been excommunicated by name by the same Pontiff, or one excommunicated by Him who is denounced by name.

XVIII. Those presuming outside the point of death to absolve from excommunications reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See, without the due faculty, even under any pretext whatever (Constitution Apostolicae Sedis) [48].

XIX. Clerics or laics, in whatever dignity they may shine forth, even imperial or royal, who presume, by themselves or through others, by force or fear inflicted, or even through substituted persons, Clerics or laics, or by any art or under any specious pretext whatever, to convert to their own uses and usurp the jurisdictions, goods, revenues, and rights, even feudal and emphyteutic, the fruits, emoluments, or any proceeds whatever of any Church, or of any secular or regular Benefice, of charitable loan institutions, and of other pious places, which ought to be converted to the necessities of ministers and the poor; or to impede them from being received by those to whom they belong by law. Council of Trent, session 22, chapter 11, On Reformation [49].

[48] In this case are not comprehended those who, according to the Canons, absolve persons legitimately impeded from approaching the Apostolic See even from cases specially reserved to the Supreme Pontiff.

[49] That those withholding tithes or impeding them are not comprehended by this Tridentine sanction is sufficiently gathered from the fact that in session 25, chapter 12, On Reformation, these are said to be excommunicated thus: The Holy Synod commands all, of whatever rank and condition they may be, to whom the payment of tithes pertains, that henceforth they pay in full those which they are bound by law to pay.... But let those who withhold or impede them be excommunicated; nor are they to be absolved from this crime unless full restitution has followed.

Moreover, it is manifest that the purchasers of the ecclesiastical goods of which there is question also fall under this censure: both because (as Avanzini rightly says, no. 62) purchasers convert goods of this kind to their own uses by usurping them under the guise of a contract, although they know that the usurper is neither their owner nor legitimate administrator, and finally that the goods are stolen and cry out for their owner; and because this point of law was defined by the Allocution of 25 July 1873, in which this Decree of Trent is also brought forward.

Avanzini judged (Commentary, page LVIII) that the excommunication imposed upon Missionaries engaging in commerce, etc., should be referred to this place. But this will be treated more conveniently below, where there is discussion of excommunications reserved to no one.

Point II. Latae Sententiae Excommunications Reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries

976. ○ Concerning these the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis declares thus:

We declare to be subject to latae sententiae excommunication reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries:

I. Clerics constituted in Sacred Orders, or male or female Regulars after a solemn vow of chastity, presuming to contract matrimony; and also all presuming to contract matrimony with any of the aforesaid persons [1].

II. Those procuring an abortion, the effect having followed [2].

[1] Briefly and at the same time excellently concerning this matter, the Rieti Commentary (no. 115) says: In order that this excommunication bind those of whom there is discussion in the article, it is necessary that a matrimony of this kind could otherwise have been valid, apart, namely, from the statute of the Church which prohibits and invalidates the marriages of those persons and punishes those presuming to contract with this penalty. Suarez well says (On Censures, disputation 11, section 3, no. 15): It is not necessary that the act be valid in reality, or have an effect; but it is enough that, insofar as it is done by the agent, it be such; for this is what the law prohibits and intends to punish. Moreover, as the same Suarez says elsewhere (ibid., disputation 4, section 3, no. 3), for the action to be such, it must be complete; but it is not complete when (as he himself says), although it was attempted or begun externally, nevertheless in reality it not only does not accomplish the final effect intended by the sinner, but has not even effected anything which would suffice for such an effect.

Therefore (as the Rieti Commentary continues most excellently), the excommunication is not incurred: either 1. if legitimate consent is lacking, whether on both sides or on either one, as if one contracted fictitiously, or was induced by error, or compelled by fear; or 2. if the legitimate form is lacking, as if they contracted without the pastor and witnesses where the Tridentine Decree has been promulgated; or finally, 3. if any other diriment impediment stood in the way, for example, if they contracted with a consanguineous or affinal relative, or an accomplice in crime, or an infidel. Therefore those things by which Avanzini (no. 35) extends this sanction to marriages which would be invalid from another cause must be altogether disregarded, as Cretoni also shows (Note to this article).

The praised Rieti Commentary adds pertinently that, since the excommunication strikes those presuming to contract, if for this reason either both or one of them labored under ignorance, whether of law or of fact, even crass and supine ignorance, the excommunication does not bind the ignorant person, even if afterward, when the matter has become known, he perseveres in cohabitation; as Sanchez also clearly proves (On Matrimony, book 7, disputation 48, no. 20).

[2] By those procuring are understood those who directly, studiously, or deliberately seek something or intend it by action; and we see them thus designated in the Constitution Effraenatam of Sixtus V (section 1): All who by themselves or through intermediate persons have procured an abortion or the ejection of an immature fetus by blows, poisons, medicines, etc. And since in the same Constitution (section 7) from these, as principals, there are distinguished those who knowingly gave assistance, counsel, favor, a potion, or other medicines of any kind for committing such a crime, etc., it ought to be evident that these latter are not contained in the class of procurers. Therefore, since the Article strikes only procurers, the excommunication does not bind these latter.

Avanzini (no. 40), after he said that those procuring an abortion are comprehended under the censure without distinction, and therefore that all fall under this censure, whether the woman herself procures an abortion upon herself or anyone else does so, adds: Others hold the contrary concerning the woman. Yet even in the Constitutions of Sixtus V and Gregory XIV the censure was imposed without distinction upon those procuring an abortion. Nevertheless, it is very well known that St. Alphonsus (book 3, no. 395) wrote: The second opinion, very probable and, with the intrinsic reason considered, more probable, denies that pregnant women incur excommunication, etc. And he concludes: Since it is doubtful whether this excommunication was imposed also upon pregnant women, they are very probably excused from it. And see that the Rieti Commentary, Cretoni, Del Vecchio, etc., have agreed in this opinion.

Avanzini adds: In this article no distinction is made between an animated and an inanimate fetus, and therefore neither ought we to distinguish. It would have been more expeditious to conclude that no one is now excused from the censure under the pretext of an inanimate fetus. For that the Constitution, in some manner presupposing that ancient distinction, willed to cast aside the moderation of Gregory XIV so as to recall the matter to the severer limits of Sixtus V is altogether improbable. It must therefore rather be said that no distinction of this kind is made in the Article because the hypothesis of an inanimate fetus is to be held as altogether obsolete.

III. Those knowingly using false Apostolic Letters, or cooperating in that crime [3].

[3] You have a clear explanation of this Article in the Rieti Commentary (no. 121): He who falsifies Apostolic Letters incurs excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff; he who uses false letters, and he who cooperates with him, whether laics or clerics, themselves incur excommunication, but one reserved only to the Bishop. And if someone has committed both, that is, if he falsified the letters and afterward used them, he is entangled in both excommunications. Moreover, by false letters we must understand either altered or supposititious letters; but by users, those who exhibit them so that they may have an effect; finally, by cooperators, those who furnish assistance to the user, not to the falsifier.

Point III. Latae Sententiae Excommunications Reserved to No One

977. ○ Concerning these the same Constitution Apostolicae Sedis declares thus:

We declare to be subject to latae sententiae excommunication reserved to no one:

I. Those commanding or compelling notorious heretics, or persons excommunicated or interdicted by name, to be given ecclesiastical burial [1].

[1] The censure which under the ancient law, from Clementine 1, On Burial, struck those burying in a sacred place persons publicly excommunicated, manifest usurers, etc., has been restricted in two ways by force of this Article. For: 1. it affects not those burying, but only those commanding or compelling burial, etc.; 2. it applies only when there is question of burying notorious heretics, under which class notorious apostates from the Christian faith must also come, and persons excommunicated by name or interdicted by name.

Avanzini writes in this place (no. 42): To this or another article in which there is question of persons declared excommunicated by name can in some manner be referred those things which are read in the Instruction of the Office of the Sacred Inquisition concerning the duty of the Ordinary to admonish or judicially declare by name those who incur censures reserved to the Roman Pontiff.

But Cretoni writes somewhat differently (Note to this article): Since, where there is question of persons declared excommunicated by name, a judicial sentence is presupposed by which the guilty person is declared to have incurred excommunication, it was asked generally whether those who incurred censures are to be admonished by the Ordinary. I said that the question is proposed here somewhat differently. For Cretoni takes it, according to the words in which it is thus presented in the Instruction, You asked whether those who incurred the aforesaid censures are to be admonished, as though it were merely asked whether an admonition must be premised if those who incur censures are to be denounced or declared by name, through a judicial sentence, to be excommunicated or interdicted.

But the Sacred Inquisition does not appear to have understood the question thus. For, setting aside for the present those things which it answers either concerning admonition by a confessor in the forum of conscience or concerning pastoral admonition by the Ordinary, with regard to a judicial sentence it merely has this: Whether it is expedient that this declaratory sentence be delivered cannot be determined generally, but must be discerned after the circumstances of the deed and persons have been carefully weighed. But these things answer nothing to the question which Cretoni judged to have been proposed.

Moreover, St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 137) had resolved the question thus understood by Cretoni from the common doctrine: one excommunicated by law, unless the crime is notorious, must first be cited by his own Superior so that he may defend himself. But the Holy Doctor understands notoriety not only of fact but also of law; for, as he says (loc. cit., no. 144), until the guilty person has confessed or been condemned in judgment, he can always be excused by some defense.

II. Those harming or terrifying Inquisitors, denouncers, witnesses, or other ministers of the Holy Office; those carrying off or burning the writings of its sacred Tribunal; or those furnishing assistance, counsel, or favor to any of the aforesaid persons.

III. Those alienating, and those presuming to receive, ecclesiastical goods without the Apostolic Good Pleasure, according to the form of the Extravagant Ambitiosae, On Ecclesiastical Things Not to Be Alienated [2].

[2] We shall take the explanation of this Article from the Rieti Commentary, than which nothing fuller and clearer can be desired. By this Article, therefore, alienations of ecclesiastical goods without the Apostolic Good Pleasure, according to the form of the Extravagant Ambitiosae, are punished with excommunication.

Ecclesiastical goods are said to be: 1. those which are in the patrimony of some Church or Monastery; 2. ecclesiastical Benefices and Chaplaincies, even merely lay ones; 3. finally, the goods of any Pious Places, provided these have been erected by ecclesiastical authority. But ownership of goods of this kind is in the Churches themselves and the Pious Places; administration is in their Rectors or Stewards; care and, as it were, guardianship is in the Ordinaries of Places or of Regulars. Wherefore administrators or stewards cannot alienate them, and if they have alienated them, they effect nothing; but Ordinaries regularly cannot alienate immovable or precious movable goods without the good pleasure of the Apostolic See.

It was said regularly; for otherwise they can alienate: 1. estates of small value, under which class there does not come a part of an estate, however small its value, or those which bring more inconvenience than advantage. But estates which formerly were estimated at no more than twenty-five Camera gold pieces, namely, about 212 lire, are held to be of small value; formerly, I say, because account of the value of money, altered from the beginning of the seventeenth century down to us, does not appear to be neglected even in these matters. 2. They can alienate anything else if either necessity which does not admit of delay presses, or an opportunity is present which would otherwise pass away; likewise things donated to the Church under the condition that they can be alienated, or purchased with an agreement of resale. Moreover, since according to law 28, ff., On the Signification of Words, He who does not use an opportunity of acquiring is not understood to alienate, as one who omits an inheritance or does not embrace an option given within a definite time, they can repudiate things offered to the Church by right, or left to it, but not yet accepted, for example, a donation, inheritance, or legacy; and thus they can fail to satisfy a condition under which something was left or promised to the Church or Monastery; and much more can they fail to employ an exception by which some right would be acquired or restored to the Church. Hence they can also make a settlement, not indeed by diminishing, but by not acquiring. Nor is it alienation to receive money on loan, or to invest money existing in the treasury of the Church, provided that, if by necessity of law it must be invested in a fruitful immovable thing, then, if such is lacking, it be invested in real annuities.

But the word alienation is here taken most broadly for any contract by which either: 1. ownership is transferred, as by giving a thing in payment, exchanging a thing, or granting it in emphyteusis; or 2. some real right departs from the Church, understand also a Monastery, etc., or a real burden is imposed upon things, for example, an annuity, mortgage, or servitude, or a servitude owed to it is remitted; or leases are made beyond a useful or fruitful three-year period.

Moreover, since the excommunication is not contracted unless the alienation is made without the good pleasure of the Apostolic See, and since in alienations which are made from Church to Church there is not sufficient agreement as to whether good pleasure of this kind is necessary, it is not established that there is place for the excommunication in these. Likewise, if an alienation has been made from a just cause and without detriment to the Church, the excommunication appears to cease; for the received opinion is that an alienation of this kind is valid in the forum of conscience, although it is not valid in the external forum.

In addition, since the excommunication is not incurred unless the alienation has been completed on both sides, it therefore will not be incurred when the thing has not yet been delivered, and indeed even if it has been delivered but sold under a suspensive condition. Leases beyond three years will also lack both fault and censure if either they were made under the condition that, after each three-year period has ended, the lessor may withdraw from the lease; or they were made by usufructuaries, for example, Beneficiaries or Chaplains, since they fall when their right is dissolved.

Finally, since this sanction strikes only those alienating and those presuming to receive, it therefore does not comprehend those consenting, counseling, favoring, etc.; and much less those who destroy ecclesiastical things or steal or plunder them. Indeed, it does not comprehend all who alienate, but only those to whom their administration is entrusted. And even from these Bishops and Abbots must be excepted, who are punished not with excommunication but with interdict from entrance into the Church. Add that, since that which once departed from me cannot depart from me any further, if someone afterward alienates a thing acquired by him contrary to the form of the Extravagant Ambitiosae, neither he nor the one who receives it incurs excommunication. See the praised Rieti Commentary, where all these things are seen to rest upon solid foundations.

IV. Those neglecting or culpably omitting to denounce within a month Confessors or Priests by whom they were solicited to shameful acts in any of the cases expressed by Our Predecessors Gregory XV in the Constitution Universi, 20 August 1622, and Benedict XIV in the Constitution Sacramentum poenitentiae [3].

[3] Since time does not run against one who is ignorant, the month must be computed from the time when someone knows: 1. the obligation of denunciation; 2. the excommunication annexed to this obligation; and 3. the time prefixed to the obligation. Therefore, so long as someone is ignorant of the obligation, he lacks both fault and penalty. But so long as, although he knows the obligation, he is nevertheless ignorant of the penalty of censure added to it, he likewise does not incur it, because contumacy against the sanctioning law is lacking. In the third case, however, if he falsely judged that the denunciation had to be made immediately, and thus he is not bound by excommunication until the month has elapsed, since a false judgment concerning a censure does not suffice for inducing it. But if he believed that the denunciation could be made whenever he pleased, he does not incur it even after a month, so long as in good faith he judges that it can still be deferred.

Moreover, if someone has promised that he will denounce and confidence can be placed in him, he can be absolved not only from sins before the month has elapsed, which is expressly provided in the Constitution of Benedict XIV (above, page 546, note b), but also from the excommunication which he incurred after the month elapsed.

Finally, take care to observe that, although besides penitents who were solicited, anyone else who learned of a solicitation of this kind from persons worthy of trust is also bound to denounce soliciting confessors (above, no. 390, II), these latter nevertheless, if they do not fulfill the obligation of denunciation, do not today undergo excommunication.

V. To this place appears to pertain the excommunication against Missionaries engaging in commerce in the East Indies, and against their immediate Superiors who have not punished delinquents, according to the Constitution Ex debito of Urban VIII, 21 February 1633, and Sollicitudo of Clement IX, 17 July 1669; which excommunication is known still to be in force by declaration of the Supreme Pontiff from the encyclical letters issued by the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda on 29 March 1873 [4].

[4] The Constitution of Clement IX thus decrees (section 3): Under the penalties, to be incurred by that very fact, of a latae sententiae excommunication and deprivation of active and passive voice... and also loss of all merchandise and profits,... by the tenor of the present letters We strictly prohibit... them from involving or mixing themselves, in any manner and howeversoever, in commerce and secular business, under any pretext, title, color, cause, occasion, and form, even once, by themselves or through agents.... And from now... after the case has occurred, We apply by the course of these letters any merchandise and profits which have proceeded from commerce and business of this kind... to the uses and benefit of the poor, hospitals, seminaries, etc.; and delinquents are bound to consign merchandise and profits of this kind to the Ordinaries of Places.... (Section 4.) Furthermore, with the same censures and penalties We bind and declare that there shall be bound the immediate Superiors, and the Provincials and Generals of the aforesaid Orders or Congregations, who have not punished their respective subjects delinquent in the aforesaid matters... in any manner even for a single occasion, at least by removing them from the places where the offense was committed by them.

But none of the aforesaid delinquents can be absolved from the sentence of an excommunication of this kind by Superiors or by any other person or persons, even supported by any authority, except one constituted at the point of death, unless profits of this kind have first been restored.

Avanzini (Commentary, page LVIII) thought that this censure should fittingly be enumerated in the catalogue of excommunications simply reserved to the Roman Pontiff. He derives the reason (Acts, volume 7, page 324) from parity with the excommunication inflicted upon those sectaries who do not denounce the secret chiefs and leaders of the sects until they have denounced them. For a similar clause (he says) is appended to the excommunication of which we are treating by the words: unless profits of this kind have first been restored.

But the argument sought from clauses of this kind appears too weak. These merely prescribe what must by law be required from one who asks to be absolved; nor in any other sense can a case be considered reserved to the Roman Pontiff by force of such a clause, except insofar as He, as legislator, reserves to Himself the relaxation of these obligations, namely, both of denouncing in the one case and of renouncing the profits in the other. Yet the same thing can be said of the obligation of denouncing solicitors, concerning which in the preceding article; for the faculty of absolving one who is not prepared to satisfy this obligation is given to no one besides the Roman Pontiff, and nevertheless that excommunication is not found among those reserved to the Roman Pontiff. Therefore, in order to determine in which catalogue an excommunication furnished with clauses of this kind must be numbered, it appears that one should rather inspect whether the case still remains reserved to the Roman Pontiff when the penitent satisfies his duty. But this happens only when there is question of sectaries; for even after the denunciation of the chiefs has been made, by law the one who failed to denounce can be absolved only by the Roman Pontiff; but in the other cases the penitent can be absolved by any Confessor. For otherwise there would have been no reason why the excommunication against those not denouncing the chiefs of sectaries should be placed among those reserved to the Pontiff, while on the contrary that imposed against those not denouncing a soliciting priest should be placed among those reserved to no one. Since, therefore, no special faculty is necessary to absolve one who has satisfied his obligation, it must be concluded that excommunications of this kind are to be added to the catalogue of those reserved to no one.

Moreover, with regard to those clauses until they have denounced and unless profits of this kind have first been restored, one must recall those things which the Doctors hand down concerning the clause the party having been satisfied and others of this kind. On this matter see above, no. 955, question V, with the Note.

VI. Magistrates are excommunicated if, at the request of the Bishop, they do not furnish assistance against those opposing the enclosure of nuns [5]. Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 5, On Regulars.

[5] Nevertheless, this censure (says Avanzini, no. 63) appears in the present condition of society already to have passed into desuetude through nonuse. It is, namely, a consequence of the apostasy by which governments have defected from the Christian religion to paganism, or rather to atheism.

VII. Likewise, abductors of women, and those furnishing counsel, assistance, and favor to abductors of this kind. Council of Trent, session 24, On the Reformation of Matrimony.

VIII. Likewise, those who violate the liberty of contracting matrimony. Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 9, On the Reformation of Matrimony.

IX. Those compelling a woman to enter a monastery, or impeding her from entrance. Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 18, On the Reformation of Regulars [6].

[6] The Tridentine Decree adds: Except in the cases expressed in law. But in law it is excepted that a Bishop can compel a wife to enter a monastery if, after her husband with her consent has entered Religion and already emitted solemn vows, she is suspected of incontinence, from chapter Significavit 18, On the Conversion of Spouses (see above, no. 761, page 741, in the Note). Likewise, that a Bishop can compel into a monastery a wife whom a husband, after she has fallen and repented, does not wish to receive (chapter Gaudemus 19, same title).

Moreover, since all are struck with this anathema if in any manner they have compelled any virgin or widow, or any other unwilling woman whatever... to enter a monastery, or to receive the habit of any Religion whatever, or to emit profession...; and those who, knowing that she does not voluntarily enter a monastery, or receive the habit, or emit profession, have in any manner interposed either presence, consent, or authority in that act, Sanchez rightly says (Decalogue, book 4, chapter 4, no. 12), with respect to entrance, that the limitation which Emmanuel Rodriguez thus appends is pleasing to him (Summary, tome 2, chapter 8, no. 10): Nor does a father incur it (the excommunication) who, with the permission of the Ordinary, provides that his daughter, orphaned of her mother, be placed in some monastery until she becomes fit to contract matrimony. Therefore someone will incur the censure (as Sanchez says) when that compulsion is ordered toward afterward receiving the habit, whether by the persuasions of the nuns or for another reason, but not when this is in no manner intended. See Bonacina (disputation 2, question 2, part 2, no. 6) and Ferraris (Nun, article 1, nos. 53 and 55).

Point IV

978. ° Above we said (above, no. 970) that certain censures are implicitly comprehended in the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, and that to this place pertain also these words of the same Constitution:

> But whatever censures, whether of excommunication, suspension, or interdict, besides those which We have enumerated, have been imposed by Our Constitutions or those of Our Predecessors, or by the sacred Canons [1], and have hitherto remained in force, whether for the election of the Roman Pontiff or for the internal governance [2] of any Orders and Regular Institutes whatever, and likewise of any Colleges, Congregations, Associations, and Pious Places, of whatever name or kind they may be, all these We will and declare to be firm and to remain in their force.

[1] Therefore, censures imposed by the Superiors of Regulars or by provincial or general Chapters for the proper subjects of the Order do not pertain here.

[2] There is question, namely, of censures sanctioning obligations which pertain to the governance of Regulars as such, whether at length they regard the general state of Regulars or some particular Institute. Therefore, for example, there does not pertain here the excommunication imposed under Clement VIII against Regulars who presumed to absolve from cases which the Ordinaries of places had reserved to themselves; for this does not concern internal governance, and therefore has ceased. The Rieti Commentary judges that the same must be said of the excommunication imposed against Regulars who usurp the tithes of Churches (Clementine 1, On Tithes); or who persuade others to choose burial in their Churches by interposing a vow or oath, or not to alter one chosen (Clementine 3, final section, On Penalties).

It is certainly not the purpose of our Institute to investigate what censures have hitherto been imposed for the internal governance of all those Associations which we see enumerated here, and much less which of those censures have still remained in force. It will be useful to touch only upon a few things concerning the Association of Regulars, as being the most extensive of all.

979. ○ Therefore Regulars who rashly lay aside the habit of their religion are punished with a latae sententiae excommunication. From chapter Ut periculosa 2, title That Clerics or Monks, in the Sext [3].

[3] There are some who infer from this text of law that apostates from Religion are excommunicated by that very fact. But Sanchez writes well concerning these (On the Decalogue, book 6, chapter 8, no. 45) that apostasy from Religion has altogether no bearing upon contracting this excommunication; for the text in that second chapter excommunicates only religious who rashly lay aside the habit of religion. But this laying aside can occur without apostasy, and conversely there can be apostasy without this laying aside. Wherefore a religious rashly laying aside the habit without apostasy with the intention of apostatizing incurs it; and conversely, however much he may be an apostate, if he does not lay aside the habit, he does not incur this censure.

Furthermore, since the Canon strikes one who rashly lays aside the habit of his religion, and does so in order that dangerous occasion for wandering about may be removed from Religious, it is manifest that this excommunication is not contracted by those who, for a reasonable cause, go about after laying aside or changing the habit of their religion.

Likewise, monks or Regular Canons, if, in order to inflict some harm upon their Prelates or Monasteries, they have presumed to have recourse to the courts of Princes. From Clementine 1, On the Status of Monks, section 5.

Likewise, monks keeping weapons within the enclosures of monasteries without the permission of the Abbots. From the same Clementine, loc. cit.

But Superiors of Regulars incur an excommunication reserved to the Supreme Pontiff if they do not denounce any Religious, even those not their subjects, whom they know to be infected with the stain of heresy or even to be suspected of it. Paul V, Constitution Romanus Pontifex, and Alexander VIII, Constitution Licet alias.

Likewise, if in cases pertaining to the Holy Office the same Superiors dare to intermeddle in any manner. From the aforesaid Constitutions.

Likewise, if the same Superiors in any manner turn aside, withdraw, or dissuade their subjects who wish to have recourse to the Holy Office. From the same Constitutions.

Religious subjects incur the same reserved excommunication if they do not denounce confreres or even Superiors of the same Order whom they know to be in any manner, even lightly, suspected concerning the faith. From the cited Constitutions.

All these same persons incur it if, under the pretext of fraternal correction or another pretext, they deter or delay persons seeking counsel from them from making a denunciation. From the cited Constitutions.

Point V. Ferendae Sententiae Excommunications

980. ○ The following can be subjected to them: 1. the faithful who do not satisfy the precept of Paschal Communion. This censure has passed into desuetude in most places [1]; nevertheless it is still in force at Rome. 2. Incestuous persons and adulterers, from various Synods of France. 3. Diviners, magicians, sorcerers, and those having recourse to them. Pichler. They incur a latae sententiae censure if their conduct savors of heresy. 4. Those striking a consenting Cleric. St. Alphonsus, no. 274. 5. Laics frequenting monasteries of Nuns in order to converse with them outside the enclosure. For Clerics there is the penalty of suspension, and for Regulars deprivation of office. St. Alphonsus, no. 232. 6. Those plundering gifts of hospitals and charitable loan institutions [2]. Other ferendae sententiae excommunications are found in the common law, but in practice they are little encountered. Most are different for different regions and dioceses. Moreover, in practice knowledge of these appears to be of the least importance, since they cannot be incurred except after a sentence of the ecclesiastical judge, which very rarely has place, at least in our times.

[1] The Author states a mere fact and signifies that in most places the faithful are not customarily compelled by the penalty of excommunication to fulfill the Paschal precept; for no one will say that the law itself has been so abrogated by desuetude that an ecclesiastical Superior, where the matter requires it, cannot use this means to break the contumacy of certain persons.

[2] The Council of Trent, session 22, chapter 11, On Reformation, subjects to an anathema reserved to the Roman Pontiffs all presuming to usurp or convert to their own uses, by themselves or through others, the jurisdictions, goods, revenues, feudal and emphyteutic rights, fruits, emoluments, or any proceeds whatever of Churches, benefices, charitable loan institutions, or another pious place; or to impede them from being received by those to whom they belong by law; and Clerics who devise or consent to fraud and usurpation of this kind. See above, no. 975, XIX.

In practice the Confessor ought especially to attend to the cases in force in individual places, which are found in the booklet of censures and reserved sins proper to each diocese. But for the most part they are reserved to the Ordinary by particular law.

Appendix I. On the Crime of Heresy, the Reading of Depraved Books, and the Index

I. On the Crime of Heresy

981. ○ Excommunication on account of heresy is the first and principal one of the Bull Apostolicae Sedis [1]. Not only heretics incur it, but also their supporters.

[1] See above, no. 972, I.

With respect to heretics themselves, for excommunication to be incurred, it is required that true heresy be present, that is, a voluntary error, externally manifested and pertinacious, against some article revealed by God and proposed by the Church. Hence:

1. Even vincible, indeed crass, ignorance excuses; but more probably affected ignorance does not excuse, because contumacy is present. St. Alphonsus, no. 301 [2], nevertheless holds the contrary as more probable on account of the defect of contumacy.

[2] This judgment is not that of St. Alphonsus alone, but is almost common. See the things said in volume I, in the Note to no. 210.

2. A positive doubt externally disclosed does not excuse, because one who doubts judges positively that the truth proposed by the Church can be false. St. Alphonsus, no. 302.

3. One who holds heresy within his mind, or who, while manifesting it externally, dissents internally, is excused from the censure. A fortiori, one who manifests his heresy in order to seek counsel is excused, because he does not manifest the error with the intention of professing it. St. Alphonsus, no. 304.

Principles concerning Absolution from Heresy

I. A Bishop can absolve from heresy which is notorious and brought into the judicial forum, either by himself or through a delegate. Benedict XIV, On the Synod, book 9, chapter 4.

II. The Pope alone can absolve from heresy, whether notorious or occult, which has not yet been treated in the judicial forum. But an occult heretic is said to be one who, although he has exchanged heretical conversation with another, is nevertheless not notoriously held as such; or one who, although he has communicated his heresies to no one, has nevertheless performed some external acts from which he could be recognized as a heretic. Benedict XIV, Constitution Pastor bonus, 13 April 1744.

Hence it is clear that no one guilty of heresy can be absolved by an inferior judge before he has been summoned into the judicial forum or has spontaneously presented himself to it. A Bishop, however, can receive the abjuration of Protestants in either forum.

According to Laymann, a usage is in force in Germany of not sending to the Bishop Protestants who wish to embrace the Catholic Church; but after they have been taught the true Faith and have abjured heresy, they are admitted to sacramental confession and the reception of the Eucharist. A practice of this kind also obtains elsewhere.

But with respect to the rite of absolving heretics in the external forum and receiving their abjuration, see the rules which Father Maurel gives in the excellent work entitled Guide pratique de la Liturgie romaine.

II. On the Reading of Depraved Books

982. ○ It was said above (no. 972, II) which books after the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis are forbidden to be read under penalty of censure, namely, that all and each knowingly reading, without authority of the Apostolic See, books of Apostates and heretics defending heresy, and also books of any author, even one not a heretic, prohibited by name through Apostolic letters, are punished with excommunication reserved to the Roman Pontiff. Therefore the penalty of excommunication incurred by the act itself, although not reserved, has ceased, by which according to the Rules of the Index there were prohibited all books of heresiarchs, or of those who are considered the chiefs or leaders of heretics, and also books of heretics treating expressly of Religion; or even books of an author, whether a heretic or not a heretic, condemned and prohibited on account of heresy or the suspicion of false dogma.

With respect to writings whose reading we have said is forbidden under censure, several teach that those reading a letter or sermon separately printed do not incur excommunication, because it is not a book. But St. Alphonsus, no. 293, rightly notes that in the Roman Expurgatory issued from the Tridentine Decree, all writings, even brief ones, were prohibited under excommunication, which we have said has ceased. But because public journals, commonly les journaux, are subject to ecclesiastical censure, it is evident that they are included under the aforesaid law if they are written by heretics and defend heresy. This is evident from the following Response of the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, directed in the year 1832 to the Bishops of Switzerland:

QUESTION 1. Whether newspapers or journals ought to be subject to the censure of the Ordinary, and whether also with respect to political opinions?

Reply. Affirmatively, with respect to both parts.

QUESTION 2. Whether not only doctrinal articles, but also articles in which facts are narrated, are subject to the same censure [3]?

[3] By the name censure in this Response of the Sacred Congregation there does not appear to be meant the penalty either of excommunication or suspension, etc., but merely the ecclesiastical examination and approval which is required by law before books are printed. Wherefore from it, in itself and directly, it is not proved that the aforesaid newspapers are subject to excommunication. Indirectly, however, it pertains to the matter in some manner, insofar as it sufficiently indicates that the care concerning books or writings to be published, which ecclesiastical power exercises by its own right, extends also to this kind of writing; and thus that with respect to these also it can appear not incongruous that it use the customary remedies for forestalling dangers to the faithful.

On this matter, that which we observe in the Decrees concerning books prohibited but not expressed by name in the Index is plainly worthy of notice. For in section 1 the title is prefixed: Books Written or Published by Heretics; then in no. 6 there is read: Poems, Orations, Images; and in no. 9: Confessions, Articles, or Formularies of Faith. Therefore in the Decrees concerning the reading of Books the name BOOKS extends also to these. Say the same of section 2, whose title is: BOOKS of Certain Subjects Prohibited. Nevertheless, see mentioned therein, in nos. 5, 6, and 7, Pamphlets, Letters, Ordinances, Arrests, Decrees, Epistles. Therefore, if in Decrees which condemn the reading of books even under censures it must be judged that the name Books is used in that sense in which it is generally accustomed to be employed in Decrees of this kind, the argument sought by others from the common appellation of a book, by which, namely, the reading of a letter, poem, oration, or some newspaper is exempted from the condemnation and added penalties, could appear empty. And this can be confirmed by another reason. For, after the Decrees have been inspected, it is sufficiently evident that by the name of a book there is understood anything whatever whose reading contributes to the detriment and corruption of faith and morals. But this belongs not only to writings which commonly have the name of books, but to any little writing. Therefore.

It is useful here to subjoin those things which the Rieti Commentary adds after relating the contrary opinion of Bouvier: The most learned writers of the periodical whose title is La Civilta Cattolica think otherwise (series VIII, volume VI, from page 648), being led chiefly by this reason, that newspapers differ from books in this: the former are issued from individual sheets or leaves on individual days, while the latter coalesce into books from several joined sheets published at the same time; a brief and pressing reason. However that is altogether indubitable, that newspapers whose reading is dangerous to faith or morals are forbidden under grave obligation by the natural law itself. And this is most certainly so after the Letters of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX given to the Most Eminent Vicar of the City on 30 July 1871....

Reply. Affirmatively.

But one who hears another reading does not incur excommunication, at least probably, because he does not read. Nor does one who reads some small portion, on account of paucity of matter. But the gravity of matter cannot be strictly determined; sometimes a few lines suffice if heresy occurs. St. Alphonsus, no. 284. Nor does one who reads from necessity in order to refute a heretic incur it, if recourse to the Superior is not available. St. Alphonsus, no. 283. Nor one who retains a book for a short time, for example, one or two days. St. Alphonsus, no. 295. Nor if he retains a book while awaiting an opportune time to hand it over to the Superior; but otherwise if he retained it for a long time, even though he abstained altogether from reading it. St. Alphonsus, ibid.

III. On the Index of Prohibited Books

983. ○ The Index was composed and promulgated by command of Paul IV in the year 1558; Pius IV perfected it with the Council of Trent and published it in the year 1564. Clement VIII enlarged it in the year 1595. The Congregation of the Index was instituted by St. Pius V. See St. Alphonsus, Appendix On the Prohibition of Books, book 1, at the end, no. 17, etc.

The Index presents three principal classes of prohibited books. The first class contains all books of heretics which contain heresy or treat expressly of Religion. The second class embraces books of Catholics against the Faith or good morals. The third class contains books published without the name of the author which hand down depraved doctrine. St. Alphonsus, no. 289.

Books of the first class, which by the ancient law were all prohibited under penalty of excommunication, still all remain prohibited; but which are now forbidden under penalty of excommunication, and indeed a reserved one, was said above. Books of the second and third class are not considered prohibited unless they are specially designated in the Index, unless nevertheless they pertain to certain general classes of matters which are designated in the Rules of the Index. Furthermore, in the Index all books of heresiarchs are prohibited generally in hatred of the author, even if they do not contain heresy or treat of Religion [4].

[4] Avanzini notes (Commentary, no. 8) that, with account taken of penalties, books prohibited or to be rejected can be divided into three classes, namely: 1. books prohibited under penalty of excommunication reserved to the Roman Pontiff, concerning which above, no. 972, II; 2. books prohibited under penalty of fault according to the Index of Prohibited Books and its rules in force. To this class can also be referred books or writings forbidden only by the law of nature, although not yet placed in the Index, which nevertheless can otherwise easily be referred to certain general classes of prohibited books; likewise, books prohibited by Bishops in individual dioceses. That Decree, however, both as regards the force of a positive precept and as regards the censure, if any were added, would bind only the subjects of each diocese. 3. Books which, according to the ancient usage in the Church, we shall call apocryphal, which, namely, we hold as destitute of all that authority, force, or use to which they might appear to be ordained. In this class we call a monument, canon, testament, decree, etc., apocryphal; but the Church simply repudiates these books without any sanctioned penalty. Of this kind are books treating of sacred matters but printed without the approval of the Ordinary. To this class can be referred all books of indulgences, journals, summaries, pamphlets, and sheets in which their concessions are contained but which were published without permission of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences; likewise ritual books issued without the approval of the Congregation of Sacred Rites, etc.

Principal Rules of the Index Issued by Command of the Council of Trent

984. ○ 1. All books condemned before the year 1515 are prohibited, even if they are not found described in the Index.

2. All books of heresiarchs are altogether forbidden, even if not erroneous or not treating expressly of Religion. Other books of heretics which are not erroneous and do not treat of Religion can be permitted, provided they have been examined and approved [5].

[5] This clause does not appear now to be in force.

3. The Scriptures and books of controversies in the vernacular language cannot be read unless they have been approved by the Holy See or published with notes taken from the holy Fathers of the Church or from learned Catholic men [6].

[6] POSTULATUM. Since it has been reported with certainty to the Sacred Congregation of the Index that in some places the most sacred books of the Bible are printed in the vernacular language without the most salutary laws concerning this matter being observed, and since it is therefore to be feared that, such being the conspiracy of wicked men especially in these times, errors wrapped in the more sacred array of the divine word may be insinuated perversely, the same Sacred Congregation judged that those things which were otherwise decreed must again be recalled to the memory of all: namely, that vernacular versions of the Bible are not to be permitted unless they have been approved by the Apostolic See or published with annotations taken from the holy Fathers of the Church or from learned Catholic men. 13 June 1757. Likewise, 7 January 1836.

4. Books treating expressly of obscene things are absolutely prohibited, although they are not found in the Index.

5. Likewise, all books treating of astrology, divination, and sorceries are forbidden, more probably under an excommunication not reserved.

6. All books condemned on account of suspicion of false dogma are prohibited under penalty of excommunication, but see above, no. 972, II; others under guilt of mortal sin.

Besides the ten Rules issued by command of the Council of Trent, there exist other general Rules established by the Sacred Congregation of the Index itself and published by command of the Pontiffs in the volume of the Index of Prohibited Books, under this title: Decrees Concerning Prohibited Books, etc.

By the ancient law, books of heretics treating of Religion or containing heresy were prohibited under excommunication in two ways: one reserved to the Roman Pontiff through the Bull Coenae; the other not reserved. For the new law see above, no. 972, II.

985. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the law of the Index, prohibiting the reading of certain books, binds by natural law or only by positive law?

Reply. It obliges by both laws, at least of itself, because it does not prohibit books except because they are pernicious and induce proximate danger of perversion or sin; but by natural law everyone is bound to flee danger of this kind. Hence, even if the obligation of the Index were not acknowledged somewhere, nevertheless the reading of books placed in the Index would be prohibited under grave obligation. Concerning this St. Alphonsus observes: All theologians add that even with the permission of the Pontiff the reading of that book which could be an occasion of ruin to someone cannot be permitted. Appendix On Prohibited Books, chapter 1, no. 12.

Two things must furthermore be noted.

1. Private persons ought to obey the commands of the Confessor in those things which concern the reading of books. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition replied in the year 1832 to the Bishops of Switzerland asking: Can the faithful, with conscience safe, read newspapers or books which have not undergone the censure of the Ordinary? Reply. Let them have recourse to the Confessor [7].

[7] Indeed, even when the faculty of reading prohibited books is given to someone, a clause is sometimes added that in this matter the counsel and judgment of the confessor are to be employed.

2. The Confessor himself ought carefully to seek the direction of the Bishop and diligently to keep before his eyes the most grave admonition which St. Alphonsus handed down, namely: In this matter it is ordinarily expedient to follow the stricter opinions. Chapter 5, no. 8.

986. ○ QUESTION 2. Whether the law of the Index is binding in France?

Reply. Not all agree concerning this matter. Some affirm it because the law is general. Others, however, deny it both because, they say, the law of the Index was not received, which the opponents otherwise say is historically false, and because of the long desuetude of the law. But others, walking a middle way, used to say that the prohibition of the Index was not received in France as regards the penalty of excommunication, but was binding as regards the guilt of sin, which is generally committed on account of the danger of perversion or of evil delight from reading such books.

But whatever not a few theologians of France formerly said, it does not now appear that there should be any further doubt on account of the unambiguous Declarations of Pius IX. For the Pontiff not only acted by persuasions to induce the Bishops of France to put the laws of the Index into execution, but also displayed such authority that henceforth it is licit for no one to affirm that the law of the Index is not in force in France. It suffices to bring forward the testimony of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, and consequently of the Pontiff himself, in the acts of the Council of Rheims in the year 1857, namely: Moreover, let the Rules of the Index be observed. See Cardinal Gousset, Exposition des principes du Droit canonique.

It is also worthy of note that the Bishops of France strive daily that the laws of the Index be put into execution, as is evident from the Provincial Councils of Avignon, Toulouse, Bordeaux, Auch, La Rochelle, etc.

987. ○ QUESTION 3. Does one violate the law of the Index who reads, for example, manuscripts of larger format written by a heretic?

Reply. It appears that this must be affirmed with St. Alphonsus, no. 293, Suarez, La Croix, and others more commonly. The reason is that in common usage manuscripts are often accustomed to be designated by the name of books; for thus all writings were called before typography had been invented. Several nevertheless contradict this because manuscripts do not come under the name of books [8].

[8] Yet it must not be neglected that in the Decree On Prohibited Books, section 2, nos. 4, 5, 6, 8, 10, 11, and 13, mention is expressly made also of manuscripts. Therefore, according to the proper sense of the Curia, manuscripts too come under the name of a book.

988. ○ QUESTION 4. From whom must permission to read prohibited books be obtained?

Reply. Ordinarily speaking, from the Roman Pontiff alone, or from the Congregations of the Sacred Inquisition or of the Index. For the faculty of permitting belongs to him whose office it is to forbid.

Bishops, however, are sometimes delegated to this office. Viva judges that they can grant this permission when some necessity urges.

Bishops and other Ordinaries of Churches possess the power of prohibiting the reading of depraved books, and indeed even under penalty of a censure to be incurred. Leo XII recalled this power to the memory of Bishops on 26 March 1825, and Pius IX more recently confirmed it on 24 August 1864, when he commanded Bishops to discharge this duty as by delegation of the Apostolic See.

Moreover, since in a matter so grave and difficult far more things would have to be said than the brevity of our work permits, we refer the reader to the Canonists.

Appendix II. On the Enclosure of Monasteries

With Respect To: 1. Those Entering; 2. Those Departing; 3. Those Conversing at the Grilles Without Faculty — I. With Respect to Entrance into Monasteries

989. ○ 1. All the faithful of either sex entering monasteries of Nuns, and the Nuns admitting them, incur the reserved excommunication mentioned above at no. 975, VI. In France, however, excommunication for those entering monasteries of women does not now appear admissible according to the things said concerning States, since there are not there Religious in the strict sense, or solemnly Professed women.

2. Likewise, women entering monasteries of men for any cause, except Queens or others from the families of Princes; likewise, Religious admitting or introducing them, incur the reserved excommunication mentioned above at no. 975, VII. But this must be understood only of monasteries or houses of Regulars who emit solemn vows. For with regard to Congregations in which they bind themselves only by simple vows, it is nowhere provided in the Sacred Canons that they are subject to the aforesaid law of enclosure. The following can enter monasteries of Nuns: 1. Bishops in a case of necessity or visitation, but accompanied by a few mature persons; 2. Regular Prelates once a year, for the sake of visitation; 3. the ordinary Confessor for administering the Sacraments in necessity, but vested with surplice and stole; 4. the ordinary physician, who must renew his permission every three months, and an extraordinary physician in the absence of the ordinary one; 5. artisans and other necessary persons who cannot exercise their craft outside the enclosure.

The Bishop, or anyone else delegated by him, for example, the Vicar General or the Confessor of the Nuns, or the Abbess herself, etc., can grant permission to enter monasteries; but a grave cause is required, though a lesser one for a woman than for a man, for entrance by day than by night, and for the entrance of relatives than of strangers.

II. With Respect to Departure from Monasteries

990. ○ I. On the Part of Nuns.

1. Nuns departing from a monastery without the most urgent necessity incur a reserved excommunication, even if it is done secretly.

The Constitution, however (see above, no. 975, VI), excepts the cases and form prescribed by St. Pius V in the Constitution Decori. But this Constitution of St. Pius (section 2) has the following: We will, decree, and ordain that henceforth none of the Abbesses, Prioresses, or other nuns... of any Orders whatever... be permitted, even on the occasion and pretext of illness, or of visiting other monasteries, even those subject to them, or houses, parents, or other blood relatives, or on any other occasion and pretext, to depart from the aforesaid monasteries, except from the cause of a great fire or an illness of leprosy or epidemic; which illness, however, besides being known by the other Superiors of the Orders upon whom the care of the monasteries would be incumbent, must also be known and expressly approved in writing by the Bishop or another Ordinary of the place, even if the aforesaid monasteries are found to be exempt from the jurisdiction of Bishops and Ordinaries; nor even in the aforesaid cases is it permitted to remain outside them except for the necessary time. Moreover, that cases of fire or epidemic disease are mentioned here by way of example and not exclusively with respect to cases inducing a similar danger, see demonstrated apud St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 229).

St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), with Sanchez and Bonacina, holds as more probable that there is no paucity of matter in this matter, and therefore that excommunication is incurred both if a nun departs even one step from the enclosure or if someone enters even one step within the bounds of the enclosure. Others apud the same St. Alphonsus (ibid.) nevertheless deny this.

991. ○ II. On the Part of Male Religious.

1. By custom and by the end of their state, Religious are so bound to enclosure that they cannot depart from their own convent without permission.

2. Nevertheless, they are not subject to the penalties of Apostates unless they depart after laying aside the habit and with the intention of not returning. But a furtive departure by night is a case capable of being reserved.

3. Departure is a grave sin of its kind because it disturbs the order and end of religious life; by reason of matter it can be venial, for example, if it is done by day and for a brief time, etc.

III. With Respect to Conversation at the Grilles with Nuns

992. ○ 1. Laics frequenting monasteries of Nuns incur a ferendae sententiae excommunication, or in various places a latae sententiae excommunication.

2. Clerics, however, incur a suspension to be imposed by the Bishop.

3. Regulars, moreover, undergo deprivation of voice and office ferendae sententiae, even if the conversation takes place once and for a quarter-hour and a half-quarter, according to the Decree of the Sacred Congregation in the year 1669. St. Alphonsus, no. 236. According to the earlier Decree of Sixtus V in the year 1590, deprivation of office and of every voice is incurred by the act itself if they presume to frequent the place in order to converse with any woman dwelling there. St. Alphonsus, no. 232. The Abbess outside Rome is probably excepted.

4. Frequency consists in this: that someone approaches a monastery on three continuous days, or once in each month for about a year, or four times in a week.

Article II. On Suspension

993. Definition. - Suspension is a censure by which a Cleric is deprived for a time, in part or in whole, of the use of the power which he has by reason of Order, office, or benefice.

Suspension is a censure because of itself it is imposed medicinally by way of admonition, so that the delinquent may cease from contumacy. Thus: 1. it differs from deposition and degradation, which are mere and perpetual penalties for the vindication of a crime; 2. it differs from irregularity, which is not of itself a penalty, but a mere impediment or inability preventing not only the exercise of ecclesiastical power but also its reception.

Nevertheless, suspension is not necessarily and essentially a censure; for sometimes it is imposed either for a definite time or perpetually to punish fault which is merely past, and therefore it is then not medicinal. This is established from the practice of the Church, from book 2 of the Decretals, title 20, chapter 33.

Division. A twofold suspension is distinguished:

1. Total, by which a Cleric is barred from every ecclesiastical function or right.

2. Partial, by which he is deprived only of some function or right.

But partial suspension is threefold: 1. from Order, which deprives one of the exercise of the functions of Order, for example, the celebration of Mass, the solemn chanting of the Gospel or Epistle, etc.; 2. from office, which deprives one of the use both of Order and of jurisdiction, whether in the external forum or even in the internal forum; 3. from benefice, which deprives one of the revenues and administration of the benefice. But each of these can again be subdivided into total or partial suspension, whether from Order, office, or benefice. See St. Alphonsus, no. 315 and following.

994. General Rules. - I. Rule. A suspended Cleric sins gravely if he solemnly exercises a forbidden act of sacred Order, unless he is excused by invincible ignorance or another legitimate cause, for example, necessity. The reason is that in a grave matter he resists the Church.
Nevertheless, he can do all those things which are customarily done by laics, for example, sing in choir in the manner of laics, etc. But one suspended from Order, if he exercises it, not only sins gravely but also incurs irregularity, as we shall say in its place.

II. Rule. Suspension absolutely and simply, without any determination to this or that, is always considered total and therefore deprives one of every use of Order, jurisdiction, and benefice. But partial suspension deprives one only of that part of this power which is expressed in the law, statute, mandate, or sentence.

III. Rule. Suspension from Order absolutely and simply deprives one of the exercise and use of every Order, whether major or minor. Suspension from jurisdiction imports deprivation of all jurisdiction.

IV. Rule. Suspension from office simply and without limitation deprives one of the use both of jurisdiction and of Order, or of every ecclesiastical ministry. Hence a Pastor suspended from Office can neither celebrate Mass, nor preach, nor preside over offices, nor administer the Sacraments.

995. Resolutions. - 1. One simply suspended from Order is not understood to be suspended from jurisdiction, and vice versa. One suspended from a higher Order is not thereby suspended from a lower one. Likewise, one suspended from a benefice is not considered suspended from office, nor vice versa.

2. Irregularity is not incurred by violation of a suspension imposed on account of an offense which is merely past, or imposed perpetually. St. Alphonsus, no. 314 and following. The reason is that such a suspension has the character of a mere penalty and not of a censure, as was said above, no. 941; therefore, there is not then a violation of censure. A fortiori, this is so if the suspension was imposed on account of an inculpable defect of mind or body. Nor is irregularity incurred through the exercise of any act from which someone was suspended, except the solemn exercise of sacred Order. Thus commonly.

3. A Bishop suspended from pontificals, if he celebrated Mass, even with pontificals, would not incur irregularity, because he would not exercise a substantial act of episcopal Order. St. Alphonsus, no. 314, etc.

4. Acts of Order of a suspended Cleric which do not depend upon jurisdiction are valid, because the Church cannot take away the power of Order, but can only prohibit its exercise. But acts of jurisdiction are invalid if the suspended person has been denounced by name, because he is deprived of actual jurisdiction; they are valid, however, unless he has been denounced, because the Church, by the very fact that it tolerates the suspended person, does not take away his jurisdiction, for the good of the faithful. St. Alphonsus, no. 314, etc.

996. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can a suspended Priest be absolved from sins by a simple Confessor before he is released from the censure by the Superior?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that the effect of suspension is not to deprive one of the reception of the Sacraments. It suffices, therefore, if he is disposed for the Sacrament of Penance, namely, if he is at least attrite concerning his sins and promises that as soon as possible, insofar as it lies in him, he will procure absolution from the censure, and that in the meantime he will not use the prohibited power or rights.

QUESTION 2. Can a partial suspension be imposed for only a venial fault?

Reply. Affirmatively, according to the common opinion, provided it is for a brief time [1], and therefore imposed ab homine. The reason is that it does not then introduce a great burden, and therefore proportion between fault and penalty is not lacking. It is otherwise, however, if it were for a long time or imposed by law so that it is incurred without a previous admonition; for such a censure is not incurred except on account of mortal sin. St. Alphonsus, no. 320, etc.

[1] But the Author himself has already admonished several times that suspension for a definite time, whether long or brief, is not a censure properly so called. Concerning these things the Rieti Commentary speaks briefly and clearly thus (section 13): Suspension and interdict are sometimes imposed by way of punishment alone or of a certain deprivation. By way of punishment, when contumacy is not restrained, but they are imposed upon individuals for offenses altogether past, that is, which have no successive course, as they say; or are established perpetually, or until a certain day, or for as long as it shall seem good to the Ordinary. But by way of a certain deprivation, when they are imposed upon some College or University. Between censures and penalties or deprivations this especially differs: one who violates a censure by exercising Order incurs irregularity; but violation of a penalty or deprivation makes no one irregular unless something else is provided in law, as in chapter Cum aeterni 1, On Sentences and Matters Adjudged, in the Sext, where a judge is declared irregular if he damnably intrudes himself into divine things during the suspension otherwise imposed upon him for a year.

997. ○ QUESTION 3. How is suspension removed?

Reply 1. If the suspension has the character of a censure, it is removed like excommunication, namely, by absolution alone, and indeed that of the Superior if it is reserved. Nevertheless, if it was imposed for a definite determined time or under a condition, it ceases of itself when the time has elapsed or the established condition has been fulfilled.

Reply 2. But if it was imposed perpetually on account of fault altogether past, it is removed as a mere penalty by dispensation alone of the Prelate or his delegate, because it is not then a censure. Thus commonly.

QUESTION 4. What form must be employed for removing suspension?

Reply 1. If the suspension is occult, it is removed by absolution under the general form: I absolve you from every bond, etc.

Reply 2. If it is public, it is removed in the internal forum by the same form; but in the external forum the solemn form determined in the Ritual must be employed. But no one can solemnly absolve from suspension except the Superior himself or another specially delegated for this.

QUESTION 5. Can a Priest simply approved absolve a person suspended by censure at the point of death if the Superior or delegate is lacking?

Reply. Not a few deny this, being led by the reason that no cause appears why the Church should confer such power upon him; for suspension does not deprive one of the faculty of receiving the Sacraments, if you except promotion to a higher Order. It therefore suffices for eternal salvation that one suspended and constituted in such danger be absolved from sins. Others, however, probably judge that a Priest in this case can absolve the dying person. The reason is that the Council of Trent says generally and without distinction, from any censures; and thus, since it excepts no censure, it is not ours to distinguish where the law of the Council distinguishes nothing. See Diana, tome V, treatise 1, resolution 205.

Latae Sententiae Suspensions Reserved to the Roman Pontiff

998. ○ I. Those who, already marked with the episcopal character, having been nominated and presented or elected to vacant churches, see above, no. 973, dare to undertake their care, governance, and administration before the exhibition of the Apostolic Letters incur the penalty of suspension from the exercise of Pontificals [2], reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff. From the Constitution Romanus Pontifex of Pius IX, 28 August 1873.

[2] By the name of Pontificals is understood the authoritative use of Pontifical insignia, such as the miter, pastoral staff, and pallium. Therefore, one suspended from Pontificals is barred from acts of episcopal Order which are customarily performed with the aforesaid insignia. Therefore, without dispensation he cannot confer the sacrament of Confirmation or Orders, nor consecrate virgins, Churches, etc., because these are numbered among Pontificals. Nevertheless, he can celebrate Mass in the manner of other priests, hear confessions, baptize, and even impose censures, confer benefices, and exercise other acts of jurisdiction, for these do not pertain to Pontificals.

From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis.

999. ○ II. Chapters and Convents of Churches and monasteries, and all others, who receive for the governance and administration of those Churches or monasteries Bishops or other Prelates provided in any manner by the same Holy See for the aforesaid Churches or Monasteries before they have exhibited the Apostolic Letters concerning their promotion, incur by the act itself a simply reserved suspension from the receipt of revenues from their Benefices at the good pleasure of the Holy See [3].

[3] This suspension strikes moral persons or communities, see above, no. 950, question 7, such as chapters and monasteries, if they have received Bishops or Prelates provided by the Holy See for their respective Churches or Monasteries, but who have not yet exhibited the Apostolic Letters concerning their promotion, and accordingly have shown obedience and subjection to them as endowed with legitimate authority.

But since suspension can be imposed either upon a Chapter as a moral person, or upon the individual Clerics of that Chapter, or simultaneously upon the Chapter and the individuals, the question is whether Chapters and monasteries here incur suspension only from the benefices which they possess in common, as Suarez judged (On Censures, disputation 31, section 5, no. 23, and disputation 28, section 3, no. 5), or also from those which individuals obtain, as Bonacina thought (tome 3, disputation 3, question 4, point 10, no. 4)? The opinion of Suarez, says the Rieti Commentary, agrees better both with the words of our Constitution and with the rules of Canon Law; and in doubt, since we are dealing with penal matters, it is to be preferred.

Bonacina was moved (loc. cit.) by the fact that in the Extravagant Iniunctae, On Election, chapter 1, from which this censure is taken, it is said and any others, just as in our Constitution it is said and all others. But since all those others do not belong to the Chapter or monastery, let it be granted that they are punished with deprivation of those things which the individuals obtain, since they undergo no other deprivation; but if the members of the Chapter or monastery were punished thus in addition, they would now undergo a double penalty in comparison with those others.

But here take care to observe that both in the Constitution Iniunctae and in the text of our Constitution, under the name of benefices come also goods which pertain to monasteries. Hence that which we indicated above, in the Note to no. 972, XI, is confirmed: how, under the appellation of benefices, the usurpation of goods pertaining to monasteries falls under the censure of excommunication reserved in a special manner.

III. Those ordaining someone without the title of a Benefice or patrimony, with an agreement that the ordained person not seek support from them, incur by the law itself a suspension for three years from the conferral of Orders. From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis [4].

[4] This suspension is imposed generally upon a Bishop who promotes to sacred Orders a cleric not possessing suitable means of support through a Benefice, patrimony, etc. And since the Holy Synod of Trent decreed, session 21, chapter 2, On Reformation, that henceforth no secular cleric be promoted to sacred Orders unless it is first legitimately established that he peacefully possesses an ecclesiastical benefice or patrimony which suffices for his honorable support; and since the laws, chapter Cum secundum 16, On Prebends, require that whoever promotes to sacred Orders a cleric lacking a benefice or patrimony be bound to supply him with what is sufficient for honorable support; it is therefore established that a Bishop prevaricates who ordains one destitute of the title of a benefice or patrimony and at the same time, by entering into an agreement, exempts himself from the burden of providing him with those things necessary for support. And indeed, the penalty of suspension inflicted for agreements of this kind is seen inserted in the canonical laws concerning Simony, chapter Si quis 45, since these agreements savor of a certain simony. This canon, however, has a limitation in our Constitution; for in it a three-year suspension from the Order thus received was also inflicted upon the ordained person, but by force of the new law only those ordaining incur the suspension. See Avanzini, Commentary, no. 49, where he suitably resolves at length the doubts concerning this matter.

Moreover, when a cleric is or is not to be judged, in the present matter, destitute of every title, the Rieti Commentary embraces briefly and properly thus (section 145): The Pontiff says, without a title. But one is understood to be ordained without a title also if he is ordained with a false title,

(which, namely, does not exist, whether the estates, instruments, or names of those establishing it are fictitious), or with one from which no right of receiving fruits passes to the ordained person. Not so, if my opinion is of any worth, for we are dealing with penal matters, if a right of this kind does indeed pass but: 1. the title is not sufficient; or the title is sufficient but the right of receiving the fruits was established, 2. from a certain day, for example, from the day of ordination to the subdiaconate, or 3. perhaps only until a day, for example, for three years. For in the first case some title exists; in the second it exists in law; in the third it exists in fact and reality. Nor does one incur the suspension if he ordained him under a fictive title, which, namely, really exists but was established for appearance's sake, that is, perfunctorily and without the intention of establishing it, or a fiduciary title, which, namely, is established under the condition that it be afterward restored following ordination, or that the ordained person not receive the fruits, because it is valid, according to the Sacred Congregation of the Council, 14 May 1671, apud Benedict XIV, Notification 26, no. 18; or under a title subject to restitution in integrum or rescission, because meanwhile it is valid; or under an unjust title, which, namely, was made without the form of law being observed, because it is uncertain whether it is invalid, at least in the forum of conscience, as St. Alphonsus has it, book 3, nos. 711 and 927.

IV. Those ordaining the subject of another [5], even under the pretext of a Benefice immediately to be conferred or already conferred but by no means sufficient, without dimissorial letters from his Bishop [6]; or even their own subject who has remained elsewhere for so long a time that he could have contracted a canonical impediment there, without testimonial letters from the Ordinary of that place [7]. From the same Constitution Apostolicae Sedis [8].

[5] By the subject of another we must understand one who is not a subject of the one ordaining, either by reason of origin, domicile, benefice, or service or familiarity, although he may by chance have been born in the latter's diocese; for the Bishop of origin is said to be the one in whose Diocese his father had a domicile when the one to be ordained came forth into the light, or his mother if he is illegitimate. See the Rieti Commentary, section 140.

But the one ordaining will avoid the suspension intended here if he has ordained a cleric after first conferring a benefice upon him; for from this he has now begun to be his subject, provided that the benefice exists in his Diocese, from the Constitution Speculatores, section 3, of Innocent XII; that it is sufficient; and that the one to be ordained is in peaceful possession of it.

I said, that it is sufficient, etc.; for Innocent XII had provided all these things in the cited Constitution, section 3: Although a cleric by reason of any Benefice obtained in another Diocese is said to be subject to the jurisdiction of that Bishop in whose Diocese the Benefice is situated, nevertheless We will that henceforth in this matter the following rule be observed unshaken: that no one be considered to acquire a subjection of this kind for the effect of receiving Orders unless the aforesaid Benefice is of such revenue that, after burdens have been deducted, it suffices of itself for a fitting support of life, whether according to the synodal rate or, if that is lacking, according to the custom of the region for those to be promoted to sacred Orders, and unless it is peacefully possessed by the one to be ordained; every faculty of supplying what is lacking from the fruits of the same Benefice by the addition of patrimony, even abundant, which the one to be ordained might possess in the same or any other Diocese, being removed.

[6] Those are called dimissorial letters by which faculty is given to another Bishop to ordain one's own subject under the condition that he nevertheless remain a subject of his own Bishop. Moreover, these letters can be given not only by the proper Bishop of the one to be ordained, but also by the Vicar General if the Bishop dwells in remote places; and even by the Capitular Vicar while the See is vacant, and indeed even within the year to those constrained, that is, those for whom, by reason of a benefice either received or to be received, it is necessary that the conferral of some sacred Order or tonsure not be deferred.

[7] Those are called testimonial or commendatory letters by which the Ordinary certifies that the cleric to be promoted is adorned with such morals that he is fit to receive Orders. Moreover, testimonials must always be sought from the Bishop of domicile; likewise from the Bishop of origin and from the Bishop of that place where someone was born by chance, Constitution Speculatores, sections 4 and 5; and in addition where someone has remained for some time, where, finally, he has remained so long at that age that he could have contracted a canonical impediment there. For after seven years he could have contracted censures and irregularities; but a stay longer than six months recommends that testimony of a state free from the bonds of matrimony be required.

[8] Those things said in the preceding Notes concerning testimonial and dimissorial letters pertain also to those who have given their names to Pious Societies or Congregations in which simple vows are vowed. Therefore, these too cannot be promoted to tonsure or Orders without dimissorials or testimonials from that Bishop in whose Diocese they are staying, Sacred Congregation of Bishops, 6 May 1864. The law is otherwise with Regulars. For them their one Ordinary is the superior of the domicile, that is, of the monastery in which the one to be ordained dwells. Therefore, they are not bound to present dimissorials of the Ordinaries of their own origin, Sacred Congregation of the Council, 28 February 1754, but those of their Regular Superiors; these nevertheless can be given only to the diocesan Bishop, Benedict XIV, Constitution Impositi nobis. And although formerly it was not sufficiently agreed by whom dimissorials should be given to Novices, St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 765, today it is provided that, during the three years after novitiate and before solemn profession, they can be given by Regular Superiors only with respect to tonsure and minor Orders, Sacred Congregation of Regulars, 12 January 1858. But if they have deserted Religion or have been dismissed from it, whether the former after (before?) simple vows or the latter before solemn vows have been emitted, they fall again under the jurisdiction of the Bishop to whom they were subject before they entered Religion, Sacred Congregation of Regulars, 20 January 1860; Sacred Congregation of Bishops, 6 March 1864.

In addition to these, according to the Council of Trent: 1. one who ordains either his own subject or another's in the Diocese of another without the express permission of its Ordinary, session 6, On Reformation, chapter 5; 2. titular Bishops, if they promote anyone to minor Orders or first tonsure, session 14, On Reformation, chapter 2; finally, 3. Capitular Vicars who, within the year, grant dimissorials to Orders to persons who are not constrained, incur suspension: the former indefinitely, the second for one year from the exercise of Pontificals, and the third likewise for one year from office and benefice.

V. One who, except in a case of legitimate privilege, has conferred sacred Order without the title of a Benefice or patrimony upon a Cleric living in some Congregation in which solemn profession is not emitted, or even upon a religious not yet professed, incurs by the law itself a suspension for one year from the conferral of Orders [9]. From the same Constitution.

[9] That which the Council of Trent established concerning the title necessary for sacred Orders for the secular clergy, St. Pius V likewise sanctioned for the Regular clergy, Constitution Romanus Pontifex, 15 October 1568. The inconvenience which he willed to forestall he thus explains (section 2): Since... certain Religious or canons or clerics of certain Orders, as We have received with displeasure, living in common in the manner of Regulars within the cloisters of monasteries or houses, who never or only for a definite time emit profession and can freely and licitly depart from the cloister or be dismissed and return to the world, under the pretext of Religion presume to be promoted to sacred Orders neither with the title of a sufficient Benefice nor according to the tenor of the Decree, and are everywhere promoted by certain Bishops, and thence for the most part this inconvenience occurs, that those thus promoted and departing from the cloister and wandering through the world are compelled either to beg or to exercise sordid gain, not without their own disgrace, contempt for the Order, and the scandal of very many of Christ's faithful. But St. Pius supplies the remedy thus (section 3): The aforesaid decree (namely, that of Trent, session 21, chapter 2, On Reformation), speaking of secular Clerics, by the tenor of these presents We extend and enlarge to each and every Religious Cleric of whatever Order, or secular Cleric living in common after the manner of Religious, not professed; and We interdict and prohibit the aforesaid Religious and other non-professed persons from being promoted to sacred Orders, and likewise all... Bishops... from conferring those Orders upon Religious persons of this kind, unless the form of the said Decree is observed...; and We suspend by the law itself for one year from the conferral of such Orders those who act contrary thereto.

In our Constitution is added: except in a case of legitimate privilege; that this was granted, for example, to the Society of Jesus is evident from these words of the Constitution of Gregory XIII (Constitution Ex Sedis Apostolicae, 28 February 1573): And likewise that those who have emitted the aforesaid three vows in the same Society may, with the permission of their Superior General, be promoted even to the sacred Orders of the priesthood, even before solemn profession has been emitted... approving the aforesaid Institutes, by the tenor of these presents and by Apostolic authority, insofar as there is need, We grant this anew.

VI. Expelled Religious living outside Religion incur by the law itself perpetual suspension from the exercise of Orders [10]. From the same Constitution.

[10] The canonical reason why an expelled Religious remains suspended is also this: one who is expelled from his Religion thereby lacks the title of his ordination, and indeed also a church to which he is attached. Thus Avanzini (Commentary, no. 53), who then asks why Apostates and fugitives do not incur the same penalty.

For, as the Rieti Commentary excellently states, two things are necessary for Religious to contract this suspension, namely, that they have been expelled and that they are living outside Religion. Therefore, apostates and fugitives do not incur it; nor are expelled Religious still bound by it if they have entered another Religion, even one less strict. And it is further necessary that someone have been justly expelled, that is, for a just cause and with the order of law observed; for there must be no departure here from that law which is constantly observed in other laws. Hence one who has been unjustly expelled ought indeed to abstain from the exercise of Orders, lest he cause scandal; but if he does not abstain, he sins against charity, but does not act against a censure; and therefore guilt binds him, not irregularity; and not even guilt, if scandal is absent, for example, if he celebrates where it is unknown that he has been expelled and this cannot easily become known.

VII. Those who have presumed to receive an Order from one who has been excommunicated, suspended, or interdicted by name, or from a notorious heretic or schismatic, incur by the law itself suspension from the Order received; but We declare that one who in good faith has been ordained by any one of them does not have the exercise of the Order so received until he is dispensed [11]. From the same Constitution.

[11] One who receives Orders, as the Rieti Commentary observes, incurs suspension under our Constitution in this case alone, namely, if he has received them from a Bishop excommunicated, suspended, or interdicted by name, or from a notorious heretic or schismatic.

And indeed, if someone receives Orders from one excommunicated by name by the Supreme Pontiff, he incurs in addition an excommunication reserved to the same Pontiff, according to what was said above, no. 975, XVII.

For the rest, under the Constitution it makes a difference whether someone received Orders in bad faith or in good faith. If in bad faith, that is, if he presumed to do so, he will be bound by perpetual suspension, from which it pertains to the Roman Pontiff alone to dispense; but if in good faith, he will not properly be called suspended, but only the exercise of the Order is interdicted to him until his Bishop has dispensed him. But what if he doubted and, from culpable negligence indeed, but not broad, gross, or supine, neglected to inquire? Can he not be dispensed by the Bishop because he was not in good faith? Or can he, because he did not presume? And it replies: Since that which is more favorable to the accused must always be adopted, I think the latter. Furthermore, for someone to incur this suspension it is necessary that he have received an Order; therefore, if he was invalidly ordained, suspension cannot even be conceived.

VIII. Secular Clerics from outside Rome who have remained in the City for more than four months and have been ordained by someone other than their own Ordinary without the permission of the Cardinal Vicar of the City, or without a previous examination held before him, or even by their own Ordinary after they have been rejected in the aforesaid examination; and likewise Clerics belonging to any of the six suburbicarian Bishoprics, if they are ordained outside their own Diocese with dimissorial letters of their Ordinary directed to someone other than the Cardinal Vicar of the City; or if, before receiving sacred Order, they have not first made spiritual exercises for ten days in the Roman house of the Priests called the Congregation of the Mission, incur by the law itself, at the pleasure of the Holy See, suspension from the Orders thus received; while the Bishops ordaining them incur suspension from the use of Pontificals for one year. From the same Constitution.

1000. Suspensions Imposed by the Council of Trent, of Which Some Are Reserved to Bishops and Others to No One. - I. No Bishop may, under the pretext of any privilege, exercise Pontificals in the Diocese of another unless with the express permission of the Ordinary of the place and only upon persons subject to that Ordinary. If otherwise has been done, the Bishop is suspended by the law itself from the exercise of Pontificals, and those thus ordained from the exercise of their Orders (session 6, chapter 5, On Reformation) [12].

[12] By this Decree it is not excluded that Clerics of other Dioceses also can be ordained by an outside Bishop in another Diocese when the Clerics both have dimissorial letters from their own Ordinary and this outside Bishop exercises Pontificals there with the express permission of the Ordinary of the place.

And according to a Resolution of the Sacred Congregation, 22 February 1630, which is customarily cited, a Bishop present in another Diocese can, with the aforesaid prior permission of its Ordinary, ordain both his own subjects and those of the Bishop granting permission without incurring the penalties.

II. Those who were not constrained by reason of a Benefice received or to be received and, while the See was vacant, were ordained within a year from the day of the vacancy by dimissorial letters received from the Chapter, if they were thus constituted in minor Orders, are to enjoy no clerical privilege, especially in criminal matters; but if thus constituted in major Orders, they are suspended by the law itself from the exercise of their Orders at the pleasure of the future Prelate (session 7, chapter 10, On Reformation) [13].

[13] It pertains to the Capitular Vicar, and not to the Chapter, to grant dimissorial letters after a year, as is reported to have been decided in the Sacred Congregation of Bishops, 12 January 1604.

But the Vicar of the Pope is not prohibited from granting dimissorial letters even immediately after the Apostolic See becomes vacant; for the Tridentine Decree in no way restricts the jurisdiction of the Apostolic See, even when vacant.

But while an episcopal See is vacant, recourse for receiving Orders within the year must be had neither to the nearest Bishop nor to the Metropolitan, but to the Apostolic See.

Nevertheless, while the See is vacant, the Chapter can within the year give testimony of fitness, or testimonial letters.

III. None of the Bishops who are called titular, even if they reside or remain in a place of a Diocese nullius, even exempt, or in some monastery of any Order, may, by virtue of any privilege granted to him for the time being of promoting whomever comes to him, promote or ordain the subject of another, even under the pretext of familiarity and continual sharing of his table [14], to any sacred or minor Orders or to first tonsure without the express consent or dimissorial letters of his own proper Prelate. One who acts contrary is suspended by the law itself from the exercise of Pontificals for one year, and the one so promoted from the exercise of the Orders thus received until it shall seem good to his Prelate (session 14, chapter 2, On Reformation).

[14] Namely, Pius IV had decreed that titular Bishops could ordain no one by reason of familiarity, Constitution Cum sicut accepimus, 12 May 1562.

IV. If anyone petitions to be promoted by someone other than his own Bishop, this is by no means to be permitted to him, even under the pretext of any general or special Rescript or privilege, unless his uprightness and morals are commended by the testimony of his Ordinary. If otherwise is done, the one ordaining is suspended from the conferral of Orders for one year, and the one ordained from the exercise of the Orders received for as long as it shall seem expedient to his own Ordinary [15].

[15] Here the matter concerns only a lack of testimonial letters, and not the absence of dimissorial letters. And it can in fact happen that a Cleric approaches either with dimissorial letters or under the pretext of some general or special Rescript or privilege, and lacks the testimony of his Ordinary by which his uprightness and morals are commended (session 25, chapter 8, On Reformation).

V. Abbots and other exempt persons, or any colleges or Chapters [16], even of cathedral churches, are not to grant dimissorial letters to any secular Clerics [17] that they may be ordained by others. But those granting dimissorial letters contrary to the form of the Decree are suspended by the law itself from office and Benefice for one year (session 23, chapter 10).

[16] Understand Chapters which by some special right have jurisdiction in some part of a Diocese; for another decree exists concerning Chapters while the See is vacant.

[17] Namely, just as Abbots established within the boundaries of some Diocese can confer tonsure and minor Orders upon their own Regular subjects only, but not upon secular subjects, so the same thing has been established concerning the granting of dimissorial letters.

VI. If any pastor or other priest, whether Regular or secular, even if he contends that this is lawful for him by privilege or immemorial custom, has dared to join in matrimony or bless the betrothed of another parish without the permission of their pastor, he remains suspended by the law itself until he is absolved by the Ordinary of that Pastor who ought to have assisted at the matrimony, or from whom the blessing ought to have been received (session 24, chapter 1, On Reformation).

VII. If Bishops, which God forbid, have not abstained from this crime of concubinage and, after being admonished by the Provincial Synod, have not amended themselves, they are suspended by the fact itself (session 25, On Reformation, chapter 14).

Short Appendix — On Deposition and Degradation

1001. ○ Deposition and degradation are most grave penalties very closely allied to suspension and are customarily likened to it, because they affect Clerics alone and in the same manner induce privation of ecclesiastical rights and Benefices. Nevertheless, they are not properly censures, because they are inflicted only as punishment and not as medicine.

Deposition is an ecclesiastical penalty by which a Cleric is deprived of the use of ecclesiastical power and of every radical title for exercising it, and also of every right validly to possess Benefices, and this perpetually. It is therefore of itself an irremissible penalty. See St. Alphonsus, no. 324 and following.

Degradation is the solemn privation of all titles, goods, privileges, and ecclesiastical goods, so that the degraded person, with only the indelible character of Order remaining, is reduced to the lay condition. Hence it differs from deposition: 1. because degradation is a solemn privation of ecclesiastical goods, but deposition is not such; 2. because degradation deprives one of both clerical privileges, namely, of canon and forum, whereas deposition does not deprive one of these privileges. Hence one who struck a deposed person would incur excommunication, but not if he laid violent hands upon a degraded person; for the latter does not differ from a layman.

Degradation cannot be inflicted except for monstrous crimes, such as the manifest crime of heresy, falsification of Apostolic letters, habitual and notorious sodomy, a most grave calumny laid against a Bishop, etc. See St. Alphonsus, ibid.

QUESTION. Is a degraded person bound to the canonical Hours and to the vow of chastity?

Reply. Affirmatively as to both, because he ought not to be released from this burden and receive an advantage from his own malice. Hence he would contract matrimony invalidly. St. Alphonsus, no. 327.

Article III. On Interdict

1002. Definition. - An interdict is a censure by which, as punishment for some crime, the use of divine Offices, of certain Sacraments, and of ecclesiastical burial is prohibited to certain persons or in certain places.

Hence an interdict differs: 1. from excommunication, which deprives one of greater goods than an interdict and affects not places but persons alone;

2. from suspension, which affects Clerics alone and deprives them of sacred things only insofar as these are the use of some ecclesiastical ministry, but not insofar as they are goods of the faithful; moreover, an interdict affects places and deprives one of ecclesiastical burial, but suspension does not; 3. from irregularity and from cessation from divine Offices, which properly and of themselves do not have the character of a penalty and therefore not of a censure. See St. Alphonsus, no. 328 and following.

Division. An interdict is manifold, namely: 1. personal, local, or mixed, insofar as it immediately affects a person, a place, or both together.

2. General or particular, insofar as it extends to an entire region, city, and community, or is restricted to an Oratory, a particular Church, or determinate persons.

1003. Rules. - I. A general interdict falls only upon the persons or places designated. Hence: 1. if the Clergy of some place is interdicted, the people are not thereby interdicted, nor are Regulars interdicted; and conversely. 2. If a city is interdicted, innocent inhabitants are not interdicted and can go elsewhere to assist at divine Offices. If the citizens of a city are interdicted, the Churches are not subject to the interdict; travelers can assist at Offices there. Bishops are always exempt unless they have been specially designated.

II. An interdict imposed without limitation upon some whole affects all its parts. Hence: 1. the interdict of a city includes all the Churches of that city, even those exempt from the jurisdiction of the one imposing the interdict, because then they are interdicted by law. 2. The interdict of a family or community embraces each of its members, even all those who began to be members of that community after the interdict was imposed. 3. The interdict of a Church extends to each chapel contained within it, but the converse cannot be said.

III. An interdict imposed upon certain places, for example, a fortress or city, also affects the suburbs and contiguous buildings. Hence, if a Church is interdicted, chapels which immediately touch it and contiguous cemeteries are interdicted; but not conversely, because the accessory follows the principal, and not the principal the accessory.

1004. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What are the effects of an interdict?

Reply. There are three, as is clear from the definition given above, namely:

1. Prohibition from divine Offices, namely, from Mass, public and solemn prayer, public recitation of the Hours in choir, public blessing of water, oil, a church, candles, etc. Clerics who do not fall under the interdict can celebrate, but with the doors closed and without the sound of bells. St. Alphonsus, no. 333.

2. Prohibition from administering and receiving certain Sacraments, namely, the Eucharist, Order, and Extreme Unction. Viaticum can be administered to the dying, and according to some, Extreme Unction also. Baptism, even solemn, Confirmation, and Penance are permitted to all except those who gave cause for the interdict, even by aid or favor. Matrimony also is more probably permitted, but without the blessing. See St. Alphonsus, no. 334.

3. Prohibition from ecclesiastical burial. In a local interdict it extends even to infants and the insane. Nevertheless, Clerics not interdicted by name can be buried in a Church, with Mass; indeed, even if the Church were specially interdicted, but without Mass. St. Alphonsus, no. 335.

1005. ◦ QUESTION 2. How do those who violate an interdict sin, and what penalties do they incur?

Reply 1. As to Clerics. 1. They sin gravely by violating a personal interdict, because the matter is grave, unless slightness of matter excuses, for example, if they exercise functions which can be performed by laymen, or if they leave the door of a church open for a short time, etc. 2. They also sin gravely by violating a local interdict, if the place is specially or generally interdicted and they act publicly, with the doors open, against the prohibition; otherwise they sin only venially. But if, notwithstanding the interdict, they exercise sacred functions, they incur irregularity. Finally, by the fact itself they incur interdict from entrance into a Church if they celebrate or cause divine Offices to be celebrated in an interdicted place, or admit to divine Offices, the Sacraments, or ecclesiastical burial those excommunicated by name [1], as is said below. St. Alphonsus, no. 336.

[1] Understand this if they are excommunicated by name by persons other than the Roman Pontiff. For if Clerics knowingly and of their own accord conduct themselves thus with persons excommunicated by name by the Roman Pontiff, they incur an excommunication reserved to the same Pontiff. See above, no. 975, XVII.

Reply 2. As to laymen. 1. Those who violate a personal interdict sin gravely, since it affects them directly. 2. Those who violate a local interdict likewise sin gravely if they compel Clerics to celebrate divine Offices contrary to the interdict. Likewise, if they were to receive the Sacraments in an interdicted place, because they would cooperate in that which is prohibited to Clerics under grave sin. 3. But they sin only venially if, while the place is interdicted but they are not personally interdicted, they merely assist at divine Offices. St. Alphonsus, ibid.

QUESTION 3. For what cause can an interdict be imposed?

Reply. Properly speaking, it cannot be imposed except for grave fault opposed to the common good. Thus, for a personal interdict, the fault of the one interdicted is required, for punishment is imposed because of fault. But for a general and local interdict, the fault of the one who is head of the community, or of its principal members, suffices. This is gathered from Canon Law. St. Alphonsus, no. 337.

Interdicts Reserved to the Roman Pontiff

1006. ◦ I. Those who, already distinguished by the episcopal character [2], and nominated, presented, or elected to vacant Churches, dare to undertake their care, government, and administration before the presentation of the Apostolic Letters, incur the penalty of interdict from entrance into a Church reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff (from the Constitution of Pius IX, Romanus Pontifex, 28 August 1873).

[2] See above, no. 973, XIII, and no. 998, I.

II. Universities, Colleges, and Chapters, by whatever name they are called, which appeal from ordinances or mandates of the reigning Roman Pontiff to a future general Council, incur by the law itself an interdict reserved in a special manner to the Roman Pontiff (from the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis) [3].

[3] This interdict differs from the excommunication likewise imposed against those appealing to a future Council, concerning which above, no. 972, IV; for there individual persons are punished, whereas here moral persons are punished. Nevertheless, the interdict binds the individual members of these bodies; otherwise it would be useless (chapter 16, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sixth).

Furthermore, since an interdict of this kind does not have the force of a censure, Clerics who did not give cause for it do not contract irregularity if they violate it by exercising an Order.

The question is asked whether those incurring this interdict also contract the excommunication concerning which no. 972, IV? I do not think so, says the Rieti Commentary, chiefly because there the matter concerns individuals, but here moral persons. From this it can furthermore be understood that those who furnish aid, counsel, or favor to these moral persons do not incur this interdict, because our Constitution passes them over; but neither do they incur that excommunication, because they furnish these things not to the individuals mentioned there, but to a moral person. See the cited Rieti Commentary, no. 158.

An Interdict Not Reserved

1007. ○ Those who knowingly celebrate or cause divine Offices to be celebrated in places interdicted by the Ordinary, by a delegated Judge, or by law; or who admit persons excommunicated by name to divine Offices, ecclesiastical Sacraments, or ecclesiastical burial, incur by the law itself an interdict from entrance into a Church until they have duly made satisfaction at the discretion of him whose sentence they have contemned (from the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis) [4].

[4] This penalty, says the Rieti Commentary, as formerly, so also today, binds Clerics alone; for the Pontiff says, those causing celebration... those admitting; but these are acts of those who have authority in sacred places.

This article has two parts. The first pertains to those who celebrate or cause divine Offices to be celebrated in interdicted places. But by divine Offices, as elsewhere, see above, no. 975, XVII, in the Note, we understand those things which it is lawful for ministers of the Church alone to perform. That it is unlawful to celebrate, etc., must be understood as in the old law, excepting those days and places, and with the conditions observed, in which it was then lawful. Now, under the old law, in a specially interdicted Church it is lawful to offer the sacred rite once a week for renewing the Eucharist, lest it be lacking to the dying; and in Conventual Churches it is lawful to recite the canonical Hours in groups of two or three. But if the interdict is general, it is lawful daily to offer the sacred rite and perform other divine Offices, but without the bells being rung, with the doors closed, those under interdict excluded, and in such a way that by those who are outside nothing can be heard and nothing seen. See the Rieti Commentary, no. 160.

The other part of the article pertains to those who admit persons excommunicated by name to divine Offices or to the Sacraments, namely, excepting Penance and Viaticum at the point of death. The word admitting indicates those to whose care it pertains to prohibit or admit someone to an act of this kind, that is, it pertains to those who have governance of the Church or cemetery. Therefore these alone are bound by the interdict, and not other Clerics who assist at divine Offices in the manner of laymen or accompany a funeral; nor those who furnish counsel or favor to the persons admitting.

Moreover, not every fear or compulsion excuses those admitting, but only grave fear; for of their own accord is not added here as elsewhere, see above, no. 975, XVII, nor is it to be believed that this was omitted without deliberation. Furthermore, besides the interdict, the other canonical penalties concerning which chapter 8, On Privileges, in the Sixth, do not bind them.

Interdicts Imposed by the Council of Trent

1008. ○ I. Chapters of Churches, while the See is vacant, are not permitted within a year from the day of the vacancy to grant permission for ordination or dimissorial letters to anyone who has not been constrained by reason of an ecclesiastical Benefice received or to be received. If otherwise is done, the Chapter acting contrary is subject to an ecclesiastical interdict (from session 7, chapter 10, On Reformation).

II. As the contumacy increases, namely, of a Bishop absent beyond the second six-month period, the Metropolitan is bound within three months to denounce the absent Bishops to the Roman Pontiff by letter or messenger, and the oldest resident suffragan Bishop to denounce the absent Metropolitan, under penalty of interdict from entrance into a Church incurred by the fact itself (from session 6, chapter 1, On Reformation).

Appendix I. On Cessation from Divine Offices

1009. ○ Cessation from divine Offices is a prohibition made to Clerics that they abstain from divine Offices, from the administration of the Sacraments, and from ecclesiastical burial in some determinate place.

This cessation is distinguished from an interdict: 1. because an interdict can be personal, but cessation from divine Offices cannot. 2. Because an interdict is a censure, whence one who violates it becomes irregular; but a transgressor of cessation from divine Offices, although he sins gravely, incurs no censure and does not become irregular. For this cessation is not employed to correct delinquents. 3. Because during a general interdict it is lawful to celebrate divine Offices with the doors closed and in a low voice, and even solemnly on certain feasts; but in cessation from divine Offices even these things are prohibited.

A twofold cessation from divine Offices is distinguished:

1. One from law, which exists by the fact itself when a Church is polluted or execrated.

2. One from a man, which is imposed by a Superior having jurisdiction having jurisdiction in the external forum, as a sign of sorrow or for the reparation of a grave injury inflicted upon God; and then it affects all who remain in that place.

The causes of cessation from divine Offices by law are reported in the Treatise on the Eucharist, where the place of celebration is treated. The Sacraments which can be administered during an interdict are also permitted during cessation.

QUESTION. By whom can cessation from divine Offices be imposed?

Reply. It can be imposed by the same persons who can impose censures, with the requisite admonitions preceding. St. Alphonsus, no. 340.

Appendix II. On Ecclesiastical Burial

1010. ○ The bodies of the faithful deceased are, by precept of the Church, to be buried in a sacred place blessed and consecrated for this purpose, or in the Church itself. But those who do not belong to the Church of Christ can be buried neither according to the ecclesiastical rite nor in a sacred place. Ecclesiastical burial must also be denied to Christians who are deemed unworthy of it because they have either abandoned the faith, departed from the living in contumacy and impenitence, or were rebellious children, as is evident from what was said concerning the effects of excommunication and interdict.

1011. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Who are to be deprived of ecclesiastical burial?

Reply. By common law they are the following:

1. All infidels, whoever they may be, whether pagans, Jews, Mohammedans, or even infants who died without Baptism.

2. Apostates from the Christian Faith. Moreover, all impious men who teach atheism, deism, or pantheism in writings, or in one word, all who deny Christian revelation, must be numbered among apostates.

3. Heretics who profess their errors openly, and their notorious supporters, as well as public schismatics.

4. Public and notorious excommunicated persons, and persons interdicted by name, if they have died without signs of repentance and have manifested no desire for reconciliation with the Church.

5. Suicides who have inflicted death upon themselves under the impulse of anger or despair, unless they gave signs of repentance or insanity. Burial is not denied, however, to those who killed themselves in a state of delirium or during another paroxysm of disease.

1012. ◦ 6. Duelists, if they have perished in the conflict itself. Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 19, On Reformation. Indeed, according to the Roman Ritual, they are to be deprived of burial even if they gave signs of repentance; and according to the Bull of Benedict XIV, even if they were absolved, and even if they died outside the place of the conflict with signs of repentance.

7. Public and notorious sinners who met death in impenitence. Such are, for example, those who publicly live in adultery or concubinage. But for this it is required: 1. that the impenitence be altogether certain; 2. that it be so public that burial cannot be granted without new scandal.

QUESTION 2. Are guilty persons who are punished by death to be buried in a sacred place?

Reply. Affirmatively, if they confessed before death or gave undoubted signs of repentance. But they are to be buried without solemnity.

1013. ◦ QUESTION 3. What is to be done in doubt whether ecclesiastical burial must be denied or not?

Reply. The Bishop is to be consulted if easy recourse to him is available; otherwise action must be taken in favor of granting burial according to the principle: In doubt, odious things are to be restricted. For since great inconveniences, especially in our times, are accustomed to arise from the denial of burial, it is expedient that such denial not be made unless its obligation is certainly established.

QUESTION 4. Is burial to be denied if the Priest alone was a witness to the dying person's rejection and impenitence?

Reply. Negatively, unless burial ought to be denied to him from some other source because of one of the causes set forth above, for example, because of a censure, etc. But the Priest must remain silent concerning the impious disposition of the dying person and allow it to be believed that he was duly purified by the Sacraments. For scandals must be avoided insofar as possible. Indeed, it will be worthwhile for a Priest who is doubtful concerning the disposition of the dying person to speak with him without witnesses and induce him to confession, lest his evil disposition become known, provided that some scandal need not necessarily be repaired. Prudence counsels this, which has been established in various Dioceses.

1014. ◦ QUESTION 5. Is burial to be denied to mimes and actors?

Reply. Negatively, provided they have not refused the Sacraments of the Church, as was said concerning other sinners in the preceding question. For no canonical law is found which excludes them from ecclesiastical burial. Gousset, On Extreme Unction, no. 637.

When a cemetery is blessed, some outer part of it is to be left without blessing so that it may serve for the burial of infants who departed from the living without Baptism, of infidels who died in Christian places, and also of any others to whom ecclesiastical burial must be denied. It is not absolutely required that this part be separated from the rest of the cemetery, for example, by a wall, hedge, or some trench, but it suffices that it can be distinguished in some way.

End of the Treatise on Censures.

Treatise On Irregularities

Chapter I. On Irregularities in General

1015. Definition. - Irregularity strictly taken is a canonical impediment prohibiting someone from being enrolled among the Clergy, ascending to a higher Order, or exercising the functions of an Order received.

Hence irregularity differs from censures, and especially from deposition and degradation, principally in this respect: deposition and degradation always presuppose fault and have the character of a penalty; but irregularity does not always presuppose fault, and if it is sometimes imposed by way of penalty, this is done only secondarily, not for punishing the guilty person, but for guarding against unbecomingness in the sacred ministry.

1016. Division. - A manifold irregularity is distinguished:

1. Irregularity from defect or from delict, insofar as it arises from certain defects expressed in law, or is contracted from certain delicts determined in law.

2. Total or partial irregularity, insofar as it excludes one from every Order, from the use of an Order, and from every ecclesiastical Benefice, or excludes one only from receiving some Order, but not from the use of those already received.

3. Perpetual or temporary irregularity, insofar as of itself it always endures unless removed by dispensation or by other ways to be determined below; or it endures only for some time and afterward ceases without any dispensation. Thus irregularity from defect of age vanishes when the time required for Orders has been completed.

1017. Principles. - I. No irregularity is ever incurred unless it is expressed in Canon Law. Hence: 1. irregularity from a man is not admitted; 2. irregularity is incurred by the fact itself before any sentence of a judge, and even because of an occult defect or crime. From chapter Is qui 18, On the Sentence of Excommunication, in the Sixth.

II. Irregularity from defect is always incurred while the defect remains, because it does not have the character of a penalty but only that of an impediment. But irregularity from delict is not incurred without fault, and indeed grave fault, because although the end of irregularity is neither to punish nor to correct the guilty, nevertheless it is not contracted except by reason of a properly voluntary and truly grave delict. St. Alphonsus, no. 348.

1018. Questions. - QUESTION 1. For incurring irregularity FROM DELICT, besides knowledge of the divine law, is knowledge of the prohibiting ecclesiastical law required?

Reply. Affirmatively, more probably. The reason is that this irregularity has the character of a penalty. St. Alphonsus, no. 350, calls this opinion the more probable and most common. Except homicide, however, because of the particular unbecomingness which it induces. St. Alphonsus, ibid.

QUESTION 2. Is knowledge of the penalty, or of the irregularity, also required?

Reply. There are two probable opinions.

FIRST OPINION. It denies this, because irregularity is not a medicinal penalty, but an incapacity, or a merely punitive penalty. Thus Lacroix, Elbel, etc.

SECOND OPINION. It affirms this. The reason is that irregularity from delict is considered a true and indeed extraordinary penalty, imposed in vindication of a crime, although its primary effect is to constitute incapacity. Now, where so great a penalty is inflicted, the Church is not considered to proceed with such rigor that it is incurred by one who is ignorant of it. This opinion seems sufficiently probable, says St. Alphonsus, no. 351.

QUESTION 3. Are you considered irregular when it is doubtful whether you have incurred irregularity?

Reply 1. Negatively in a doubt of law, or in a doubt whether such a case is subject to a law establishing irregularity. Thus nearly all Theologians. The reason is that, where doubt is present, this irregularity is not certainly expressed in law. Therefore, etc. Besides, odious things are to be restricted. St. Alphonsus, no. 346.

Reply 2. In a doubt of fact, distinguish: either there is a doubt concerning a homicide committed [1], or concerning another delict. If the former, more probably and more truly you have incurred irregularity because of the special unbecomingness found in homicide, as is gathered from law. If the latter, more probably and more truly you have not incurred it, because in doubt no one is to be condemned. St. Alphonsus, no. 347.

[1] These words of the Author, Either there is a doubt concerning a homicide committed, are indeed somewhat obscure. You will obtain their meaning more clearly from St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 347, doubt 3, whom the Author himself cites. Thus the Holy Doctor: This proceeds in the case in which someone is certain of the homicide, as is supposed in the aforesaid texts, but doubts only whether he himself by his action was the cause of it. Therefore the Author's words, Either there is a doubt concerning a homicide committed, are not to be understood of a doubt whether, for example, the one who was wounded has actually died, but of a doubt whether you were the cause of the death which in fact followed. Hence the VV. could properly have noted this passage of Father Gury as obscure, but not properly have presented it, page 948, no. 163, as dissenting from the doctrine of St. Alphonsus.

1019. ○ QUESTION 4. Is irregularity incurred because of a crime which is indeed external and consummated, but altogether occult?

Reply. Affirmatively, more truly, says St. Alphonsus, no. 349. The reason is that the Church, in reserving crimes, reserves even the most occult, provided they are subject to her jurisdiction, namely, provided they are external, just as she imposed excommunication for altogether occult heresy, etc. This is proved also from chapter 6, Liceat, in Trent, session 24, where the Council grants Bishops the faculty of dispensing from and absolving occult irregularities and censures.

QUESTION 5. How is irregularity removed?

Reply. It is removed in the following ways:

1. By dispensation: 1. of the Pope in every case, provided there is not an impediment of natural law, or one which renders the exercise of sacred Order impossible; 2. of the Bishop and of Regular Superiors, if the irregularity arises from an occult delict, except homicide; 3. of any delegate according to the faculty received, as was said concerning absolution from censures, no. 951.

2. By cessation of the cause, for example, upon attaining the age required, if the irregularity arises from defect of age; likewise by change of domicile or place, or by amendment, if it arises from infamy. For infamy of law, however, a dispensation is required. See St. Alphonsus, no. 352 and following.

1020. ◦ QUESTION 6. How is dispensation from irregularity made?

Reply. No form is found prescribed in law; hence no determinate form necessarily must be employed. It can, however, be made by the following formula or another equivalent: I dispense you from the irregularity which you incurred because of... such a cause, in the name of the Father, etc.; or, By the authority granted to me by the Holy Father or by the Bishop, I dispense you, etc., and I render you capable and restore you to the exercise of your Orders and offices, in the name of the Father, etc.

Chapter II. On Irregularities in Particular

Article I. On Irregularities from Defect

1021. ○ Eight species of these are numbered, namely, from defect of: 1. mind; 2. body; 3. birth; 4. age; 5. freedom; 6. Sacrament; 7. lenity; 8. reputation.

These defects, or rather the qualities opposed to them, are expressed in these little verses:

Birth, mind, freedom, body, and age; Not a bigamist, gentle, nor marked by evil fame.

I. From Defect of Mind

1022. ○ A threefold defect of mind is assigned, namely, of reason, knowledge, and confirmed faith.

1. Of reason. Hence those perpetually insane, lunatics, the furious, epileptics, and the possessed are irregular, even if they have lucid intervals. Nevertheless, the exercise of Orders already received is permitted to them less reluctantly than the reception of new ones.

2. Of knowledge. Those who do not have the knowledge necessary for the several Orders are irregular, whether they are in fact ignorant or incapable of learning. This is deduced from what was said in the Treatise on the Sacrament of Order and from the Decree, part 1, distinction 36, canon 1.

3. Of confirmed faith. Neophytes recently baptized at an adult age are irregular until they are judged worthy by the Bishop. This is evident from Canon Law. See St. Alphonsus, no. 397 and following.

II. From Defect of Body

1023. ○ This irregularity is incurred on two grounds: 1. if someone is unfit for the exercise of an Order; 2. if he causes notable horror in others or displays something unbecoming.

Hence the following are regarded as irregular:

1. The mutilated, those bearing a wooden leg, and those unable to use a hand, thumb, or index finger.

2. The blind, those altogether lacking sight, or those so dim-sighted that they cannot read in the Missal.

3. The deaf, who hear nothing, so that they cannot at all hear the voice of the server responding.

4. The mute or stammerers, who cannot pronounce whole words, or cannot do so except with great difficulty, such that they provoke the laughter or contempt of those present.

5. The lame, who cannot stand at the altar without a staff.

6. Those lacking a nose, or having one enormously distorted, sunken, or protruding.

7. The monstrous, for example, those having an enormous hump which produces great deformity, etc. See St. Alphonsus, no. 403 and following. See, however, what was said concerning the Eucharist, no. 404, in the Note.

1024. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is one who lacks one eye irregular?

Reply 1. Negatively, if he lacks only the right eye, because it is less necessary for the celebration of Mass, provided no notable deformity arises from it.

Reply 2. Affirmatively, if he lacks the left eye, which is called the Eye of the Canon, because it is necessary for reading the Canon of the Mass. Except if he can read the Canon with the right eye without deformity. This, however, must be submitted to the judgment of the Bishop. Thus commonly with St. Alphonsus, no. 404.

QUESTION 2. Can one who, already promoted to the Priesthood, has an impaired thumb or index finger celebrate and administer the Eucharist?

Reply 1. It seems that this must be denied absolutely as to the celebration of Mass, at least more probably according to the common opinion. St. Alphonsus, no. 408 and book 6, no. 244.

Reply 2. Negatively also of itself as to the administration of the Eucharist, excepting nevertheless cases of necessity in which he can use other fingers.

III. From Defect of Birth

1025. ○ Defect of birth induces irregularity. This is evident from the Decretals, book 1, title 18.

Hence: 1. the illegitimate, even occult, are irregular, or all who were born from fornication, adultery, or incest; 2. those who were born from a clandestine matrimony and within a prohibited degree, even if unknown; 3. but those who were illegitimate at the time of their conception or birth, whose parents were then capable of contracting matrimony and afterward contracted it, are not irregular, because they were legitimated by the subsequent matrimony. See St. Alphonsus, no. 420 and following.

Those illegitimately born from a public but invalid matrimony because of an impediment unknown to at least one party are not irregular. St. Alphonsus, ibid.

QUESTION. How is irregularity from defect of birth removed?

Reply. It is removed: 1. by the subsequent legitimate matrimony of the parents, as was just said; 2. by religious profession; 3. by legitimate dispensation.

IV. From Defect of Age

1026. ○ 1. Those who have not attained canonical age are regarded as irregular. But this is not irregularity strictly so called, since it ceases when the required age is completed.

2. Those who knowingly receive Orders before canonical age sin gravely.

V. From Defect of Freedom

A defect of freedom arises from a threefold bond, namely, from the bond of servitude, matrimony, and office. Hence:

1. All who are properly called slaves are irregular until they obtain full freedom.

2. Married men are irregular and cannot receive Orders unless their wife consents, vows chastity, and enters Religion, at least if she is young.

3. Those who by office and oath are involved in secular business, such as judges, magistrates, etc., are irregular [1]. See St. Alphonsus, no. 355 and following.

[1] Except if they have a special dispensation of the Pope for those offices, or if custom, with the Pope's knowledge, permits it. St. Alphonsus, book 7, no. 456.

VI. From Defect of Sacrament

1027. ○ By defect of Sacrament in the present case is understood the Sacrament of Matrimony received several times, or bigamy. That bigamists are irregular is evident from Canon Law in the title On Bigamists. The reason of congruity is that in bigamy there is lacking a perfect signification of the union of Christ with the Church, which union is altogether simple and not multiple. This is inferred from the Apostle, 1 Timothy 3:2: A Bishop must be blameless, the husband of one wife.

Bigamy in Canon Law is of three kinds, namely, true bigamy, interpretative bigamy, and similitudinary bigamy.

1. True bigamy exists when someone successively marries several wives and consummates the matrimony with each.

2. Interpretative bigamy is that by which someone is regarded as a bigamist by interpretation of law, although he has married only one wife. Such is: 1. one who marries and has carnal knowledge of a widow who was carnally known by her former husband; 2. one who marries any woman corrupted by another and consummates the matrimony; 3. one who has carnal knowledge of his own wife after adultery committed by her; 4. one who contracts two marriages, one valid and the other invalid, although in good faith. Indeed, even if both marriages were invalid, one who consummated both with marital affection would become irregular. This is proved from various passages of Canon Law.

3. Similitudinary bigamy occurs when someone contracts matrimony after a solemn vow of Religion or after sacred Order has been received, although the matrimony is null. The reason is that he is deservedly considered to have contracted two marriages, the first spiritual with Christ, the second carnal with a woman. This is deduced from the title On Bigamists. See St. Alphonsus, no. 436 and following.

VII. From Defect of Lenity

1028. ○ All who voluntarily, actively, efficaciously, and proximately concur in the death or mutilation of someone, even justly, by an action of its nature ordered to that end, contract irregularity from defect of lenity. See St. Alphonsus, no. 457 and following.

Resolutions. 1. Executioners, judges, and all who cooperate in a judgment of this kind are irregular. Except: 1. compelled witnesses; 2. accusers seeking compensation for their damages.

2. Nevertheless, physicians and surgeons are not irregular, although they amputate limbs or hasten death by remedies given in good faith, unless grave negligence intervenes. St. Alphonsus, no. 385.

3. Nor are Clerics who practice medicine or surgery without incision and cauterization. Indeed, neither are they irregular if they employ incision or cauterization in a case of necessity, for necessity is governed by no law. Indeed, even outside necessity, if the Clerics are not constituted in sacred Orders, provided death or mutilation does not follow. St. Alphonsus, nos. 384, 385.

4. Those who kill an aggressor in just defense are not irregular, because it is not considered a defect of lenity to defend one's own life with due moderation of blameless defense, even with the death of an unjust aggressor.

5. Soldiers do not become irregular in a just defensive war, nor in a just offensive war unless they killed with their own hand; but in an unjust war the whole army becomes irregular even if only one man perishes. St. Alphonsus, no. 474.

VIII. From Defect of Reputation

1029. ○ A twofold infamy is distinguished: 1. infamy of fact, which is contracted before any sentence from the notoriety of some enormous crime or through the practice of a dishonorable occupation; 2. infamy of law, which is contracted in a threefold manner, namely, from a crime noted in law, from the sentence of a judge, and from the crime of parents.

1030. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What are the crimes to which infamy is attached by law?

Reply. They are the following: homicide, perjury committed in judgment, simony, sodomy, adultery, the practice of usury, and an attack upon Cardinals or Bishops. Thus from Canon Law. In addition, from Trent, session 24, chapter 6, On Reformation, are added the abduction of women, a duel, and the preparation of arms against parents. Nevertheless, irregularity is not incurred unless these crimes are truly notorious; otherwise reputation is not lacking. See St. Alphonsus, no. 362 and following.

QUESTION 2. Are innocent persons irregular who, because of false testimony, were condemned to infamous penalties?

Reply. Affirmatively, until the sentence has been revoked or they have obtained legitimate dispensation; the reason is that in fact they are infamous.

QUESTION 3. Are the sons of executioners irregular?

Reply. Negatively, properly and of itself; nevertheless, it is fitting that they not be promoted to sacred Orders except in another Diocese, lest disgrace redound upon the Church.

Irregularity from infamy of fact ceases when the infamy itself ceases, without dispensation; it is otherwise if infamy of law is in question. See St. Alphonsus, ibid.

Article II. On Irregularities from Delict

1031. ○ Irregularity from delict is incurred on five grounds, namely: 1. from the improper reception of Baptism and from its repetition; 2. from the improper reception and usurpation of Orders; 3. from violation of a censure; 4. from the perpetration of certain enormous crimes; 5. from homicide and mutilation.

These are presented in the following little verse:

Guilty at the font, in sacred things, by censure, by crime, by death.

I. Repetition and Improper Reception of Baptism

1032. ○ Hence the following are irregular:

1. One who at an adult age received Baptism from a declared heretic outside a case of necessity, because he appears to communicate in his error.

2. One who publicly and solemnly rebaptizes; likewise one who knowingly is rebaptized; likewise a Cleric assisting at Baptism conferred a second time. Thus from several passages of Law. See St. Alphonsus, no. 356.

According to Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 7, chapter 6, one who culpably, or without just cause, rebaptizes even conditionally becomes irregular. But he himself held this as a private Doctor, against many others, and when he was in minor Orders. Now, certainty is required for contracting irregularity.

Questions. QUESTION 1. Does one who secretly rebaptizes become irregular?

Reply. It seems more probably to be denied, because in Canon Law the matter appears to concern only one who publicly rebaptizes. Thus Laymann, Sylvius, etc.

QUESTION 2. Is one who rebaptizes or is rebaptized because of fear irregular?

Reply. Negatively, at least probably, although fear does not remove voluntariness nor excuse from sin. Thus St. Alphonsus, no. 356, etc.

II. Usurpation or Illicit Reception of Orders

1033. ○ 1. Usurpation. Those who solemnly exercise an act of sacred Order which they do not possess are irregular. Probably, however, only Clerics are subject to this irregularity.

2. Illicit reception. Thus those incur irregularity who are ordained furtively, that is, who, not examined nor admitted, by deceit and without the Bishop's knowledge mingle themselves among those being ordained; those who arrange to be promoted by another Bishop without dimissorial letters; those who receive several sacred Orders on the same day; probably also those who are ordained per saltum; and finally, those who are ordained by a suspended, heretical, schismatic, or simoniacal Bishop. St. Alphonsus, no. 357 and following.

III. Violation of a Censure

1034. ○ Those who, bound by the bond of some censure, solemnly exercise a sacred Order are irregular, as was already said above. Hence:

1. Not only would a Priest who celebrated Mass while under censure be irregular, but also a Deacon who chanted the Gospel with a stole, etc., and a Priest who compelled one under censure to celebrate.

2. One who, bound by two censures, exercises a sacred Order, incurs two irregularities; and these must be expressed in the petition for dispensation. The same must be said of one who celebrates several times while under the same censure. But it suffices that the petition be expressed in the plural number.

3. A Priest who, suspended from Order, absolves sacramentally is irregular, because absolving also is an act of the power of Order, and not an act of jurisdiction alone, such as would be, for example, an act of excommunicating, approving Confessors, assisting at matrimony, dispensing from vows, etc.

IV. Enormous Crimes

1035. ○ By this appellation are understood heresy and apostasy from the Faith. The supporters, receivers, and defenders of heretics and apostates, and even their sons, also incur this irregularity, chapter Statutum, On Heretics, in the Sixth. But these crimes, in order to induce irregularity, must be public; hence this irregularity falls back into irregularity from defect of reputation, as St. Alphonsus says, no. 362.

V. Homicide and Mutilation

1036. Principle. - Irregularity is incurred from voluntary and gravely culpable homicide, even occult, whether willed directly or indirectly, and perpetrated by an action either physical or moral. The same must be said concerning mutilation.

Mutilation is understood to occur when some principal member is separated from the body, or a part of the body which has an office distinct of itself, for example, a foot, hand, eye, etc.

1037. Resolutions. - 1. Those who are the immediate cause of someone's death are irregular, even if they repent before the injured person dies. The reason is that a physical cause operates necessarily. Likewise those who mutilate others or themselves. If someone mortally wounds a man and another kills him, each is truly a homicide.

2. Those giving a command and those giving counsel are irregular if the effect followed from the counsel or command. Except if they revoked the command before its execution and the revocation became known to the mandatary. St. Alphonsus, no. 371.

3. Likewise those cooperating so that a homicide is committed more quickly, boldly, or securely. Thus the following become irregular: 1. those who mutually incite one another, although only one kills; 2. all fighting in an unjust war, if anyone perishes there; 3. those who furnish arms or money for a homicide; 4. all unjust accusers, judges, and witnesses.

4. Likewise those consenting, if the consent effectively influenced the homicide. Hence one who approves a homicide, even one committed in his name or gratuitously, is not irregular, because he did not influence it.

5. Those who apply themselves to a licit matter, sufficient diligence having been employed lest homicide occur, do not become irregular. Hence the following are not irregular: 1. those who commit accidental homicide, unless gravely culpable negligence intervenes; 2. those who in good faith furnish a sick person with some harmful food or drink, or who, by moving or turning him, are the cause of his death; 3. physicians who have given a deadly medicine to the sick, provided they are skilled or act in good faith. Except, however, Clerics in sacred Orders who perform an incision or cauterization outside a case of necessity. See St. Alphonsus, no. 384.

1038. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does one incur irregularity who, while applying himself to an illicit matter, kills someone, for example, if a Cleric while hunting accidentally kills a man?

Reply. More probably, negatively. The reason is that the homicide is voluntary neither in itself nor in its cause; for the work undertaken, although illicit of itself, is not of itself death-dealing. It would be otherwise if, by reason of the circumstances, a proximate danger of death were brought upon someone, for example, if someone set fire to a cannon where there was a crowd of people. St. Alphonsus, no. 387, etc.

QUESTION 2. Does one become irregular who kills another in defense of his own life or that of an innocent person?

Reply to the first. Negatively, unless he exceeds the moderation of blameless defense. The reason is that he is guilty of no fault. This is further confirmed from Canon Law. Consult St. Alphonsus, no. 388.

Reply to the second. Negatively likewise. The reason is that irregularity from private homicide is not incurred except with mortal sin, as is gathered from chapter Ex litteris, On Homicide. Thus St. Alphonsus, no. 388, etc.

1039. ◦ QUESTION 3. Does one become irregular who kills another in defense of liberty, honor, or temporal goods, with the moderation of blameless defense?

Reply. Negatively, according to the more common opinion. This appears to be proved from Canon Law. Moreover, since no sin is present there, irregularity cannot be incurred except from defect of lenity; but irregularity from defect of lenity is not incurred except in cases expressed in law, and the present case is not found in law. Therefore, etc. St. Alphonsus, no. 389.

QUESTION 4. Is one to be regarded as irregular who doubts whether he committed a homicide or not?

Reply 1. Negatively, when it is not established that the homicide was committed, or if there is doubt concerning the homicide itself, whether it followed or not. The reason is that a penalty is not to be inflicted unless the delict itself is established. Thus commonly. St. Alphonsus, no. 347.

Reply 2. Affirmatively, however, if it is established that a homicide was committed and the only doubt is whether you were its cause by your action. The reason is that, although irregularity generally ought not to be incurred in doubt, nevertheless in the present case it is to be incurred by the provision of Canon Law, because of the special odium which homicide merits. This is evident from chapter Significasti and chapter Ad audientiam, etc. St. Alphonsus, no. 347.

1040. ◦ QUESTION 5. Is one irregular who doubts whether he influenced the mutilation of another, the fact of the mutilation being established?

Reply. Negatively. The reason is that the law imposed irregularity for doubt concerning homicide alone. St. Alphonsus, no. 347.

QUESTION 6. Is one to be regarded as irregular who procured an abortion while doubting whether the fetus was animated or not?

Reply. Negatively. The reason is that then homicide is not properly established [1]. St. Alphonsus, ibid. See what was said in the Treatise on the Fifth Precept of the Decalogue, nos. 402 and 403.

[1] It was observed elsewhere, volume 1, no. 402, Note, page 382, that the hypothesis of an inanimate fetus is now scarcely, if indeed scarcely at all, admitted. Hence this question, as resting upon a hypothesis now already antiquated, becomes useless.

End of the Treatise on Irregularities.

Appendix. On Indulgences and the Jubilee

Chapter I. On Indulgences

1041. ○ Indulgence, as the word itself indicates, is the same as favor, condonation, mercy, remission. For an indulgence is the condonation of the penalty due to sins through the application of the satisfactions of Christ and the Saints; for Christ our Savior offered His satisfactions to God the Father for the full remission of our sins. These satisfactions of infinite value, to which are also added the satisfactions of the Blessed Virgin and the superabundant satisfactions of the Saints, are called the treasure of the Church, in which we participate through Indulgences.

Definition. An indulgence is the remission of temporal penalty due to God for sins remitted as to guilt, granted by a legitimate minister outside the Sacrament of Penance through the application of the treasure of the Church.

Division. An indulgence is distinguished in manifold ways:

1. Plenary or partial, insofar as the whole temporal penalty is remitted, or only a part of it.

2. Personal, local, or real, insofar as it is granted immediately to persons, for example, to a Confraternity; or is attached to some place, for example, a Church, Oratory, etc.; or is joined to some thing, for example, an Image, Cross, Rosary, etc.

3. Temporary or perpetual, insofar as it is granted for a determinate time or without any prescribed term.

1042. Principles. - I. The Church has true power to grant Indulgences. This is of Faith against the Protestants. For Christ, as is evident from Sacred Scripture, gave the Church full power of binding and loosing, both in the internal forum and in the external spiritual forum. Thus Christ Himself said to Peter, Matthew 16:19: Whatsoever thou shalt bind upon earth, it shall be bound also in heaven; and whatsoever thou shalt loose upon earth, it shall be loosed also in heaven. Therefore He gave Peter, that is, His Church, the power of loosing whatever is bound, and therefore also the power of freeing from the penalty due to sins. To this is added the definition of the Council of Trent, session 25, Decree On Indulgences, where those who assert either that they are useless or that the Church lacks the power to grant them are condemned by anathema. It is further evident from the universal tradition and perpetual practice of the Church.

1043. ○ II. The Prelates of the Church alone have the power to grant Indulgences. For this faculty can belong only to those who have power over the mystical body of Christ and who can dispense the treasure of the Church.

Hence:

1. The Pope alone can grant Indulgences with respect to all the faithful, for he alone has jurisdiction over all the faithful. Suarez; Lacroix, no. 1317.

2. Bishops can indeed by common law grant Indulgences to their Diocesans. But their power is so restricted by the Decree of the Fourth Lateran Council, canon 62, that ordinarily they can grant only Indulgences of forty days, and on the day of the consecration of a Church, of one year.

3. A delegate can grant the same Indulgences as the one by whom he was delegated [1]. The reason is that acts of jurisdiction can be exercised through delegates, as is acknowledged by all.

[1] Understand this according to the measure which the delegating person has prescribed for the delegate.

4. Cardinals can grant Indulgences of one hundred days in the Churches of their titles; Nuncios, however, can grant to their subjects Indulgences of one hundred, two hundred, or three hundred days, but of less than one year. Lacroix, no. 1322.

5. Prelates inferior to a Bishop cannot grant any Indulgences; neither can Vicars General, except by express delegation of the Bishop; nor Capitular Vicars while the See is vacant; much less can Pastors. Lacroix, no. 1323.

1044. ○ III. Four things are required in the subject for gaining Indulgences:

1. That he be baptized, because the treasure of the Church cannot be dispensed to infidels; and that he not be excommunicated, because otherwise he is deprived of the communion of spiritual goods.

2. That he be a subject of the one granting [2], as is evident from what has been said.

[2] Nevertheless, travelers are not excluded from Indulgences which have been granted generally in some place to those visiting a Church, altar, image, etc. Marchant, apud Diana, tome 4, tract 5, resolution 50, no. 4.

3. That he fulfill the works enjoined within the prescribed time, because Indulgences are granted under this condition.

4. That he be in the state of grace, at least when he performs the last prescribed work, because the penalty is not remitted unless the guilt has been remitted. St. Alphonsus, no. 433, etc.

1045. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is the grant of an Indulgence made without cause valid?

Reply. Negatively. The reason is that the Prelates of the Church are only delegates of Christ for dispensing the treasure of the Church. But Christ cannot ratify the lavish distributions of His treasure made by prodigal dispensers. Furthermore, it does not belong to the faithful, nor to simple Priests, to judge concerning the sufficiency of the cause for which an Indulgence is granted; for they ought simply to judge it to be just. St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 532, etc.

QUESTION 2. Is venial sin an obstacle to gaining an Indulgence?

Reply. Negatively, unless the matter concerns an altogether plenary, or most fully plenary, Indulgence. The reason is that although the penalty due to this sin cannot be remitted, nevertheless the penalty due for other sins already blotted out can be remitted; for just as it is not repugnant that the guilt of some venial sin be remitted without the guilt of others being remitted, so neither is it repugnant that the penalty of remitted venial or mortal sins be blotted out, although the penalty for one or more venial sins remains to be discharged. Thus St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 534, etc.

1046. ○ QUESTION 3. Can an Indulgence which is granted as PLENARY be obtained at least PARTIALLY if there is an obstacle preventing it from being obtained in its entirety, for example, an attachment to some venial sin?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is: 1. because, from what was said in the preceding question, some unremitted venial sin does not prevent the penalty due for other sins from being remitted; 2. because the Supreme Pontiff, in granting a plenary Indulgence, is not presumed to will to restrict it only to those to whom all venial sins are remitted, but rather is deservedly considered to grant it according to the capacity of the subject, so that at least the penalty which can be remitted is remitted, namely, the penalty of remitted sins. For otherwise plenary Indulgences would often be of no benefit, since the faithful rarely cast off every, even the least, attachment to any venial sin and conceive sufficient sorrow for all venial sins in such a way that they obtain the remission of all. Hence it would come about that partial Indulgences were preferable to plenary ones, which is repugnant to common sense. St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 534.

Nevertheless, some teach that a plenary Indulgence is not granted except plenarily or most fully, as they say, so that it must obtain either the whole effect or none. But this opinion does not appear probable.

1047. ○ QUESTION 4. What is understood by Indulgences of ten or fifteen days, years, forty-day periods, etc., etc.?

Reply. According to the common opinion, there is to be understood a remission of as much penalty as formerly was remitted, or would have been remitted, through canonical penance of the same duration. Thus, for example, through an Indulgence of seven years, as much penalty is remitted as was remitted through a penance of seven years customarily imposed according to the ancient Canons. But how much canonical penances availed before God, and how much partial Indulgences of so many days or years now avail, is altogether unknown to us, because we do not know what proportion our satisfactions bear to the penalty due to our sins. Thus commonly.

QUESTION 5. Does one gain Indulgences who does not completely perform the work prescribed for them?

Reply 1. Negatively, if he omits a notable part of the work, such that according to moral estimation he does not perform it as to its substance; because he is not considered simply to satisfy the required conditions.

Reply 2. Otherwise, if he omits a very small part, because then the prescribed work is considered to be performed morally, or as to its substance. But a very small part must be taken relatively. Thus, in the Rosary, omission of one Pater and Ave seems very small; but it is otherwise if five Paters and Aves are required, because omission of a fifth part of the work is notable. Thus St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 534; Voit, no. 658, etc.

1048. ○ QUESTION 6. Can Indulgences be applied to the deceased, and how?

Reply 1. They can be applied if the following two conditions are present: 1. that they be specially granted in the Rescript of the Pontiff as applicable to them; 2. that there be an intention of making such an application. Thus all; Suarez, disputation 53, section 4.

Reply 2. Nevertheless, an Indulgence cannot be applied to the deceased by way of absolution, but only by way of suffrage, namely, by beseeching God that He may benignly will to accept such an application and apply it to the souls in Purgatory. The reason is that the Pontiff does not have jurisdiction over the souls of the deceased. Hence he cannot absolve them from penalties as though by a sentence. Thus Lacroix, no. 1336; Lugo, disputation 27, no. 58.

1049. ○ QUESTION 7. Does an Indulgence infallibly benefit the souls in Purgatory to whom it is applied?

Reply. It is disputed.

FIRST OPINION. It affirms. The reason is that Christ gave the Church infallible power by these words: Whatsoever thou shalt loose..., etc. But the grant of an Indulgence for the deceased is truly an act of the keys, since it proceeds from Apostolic authority; and a key always opens when the requisite conditions have been met. Therefore, an Indulgence is always efficacious and infallible for the deceased as well as for the living, provided the requirements are present. Thus Suarez.

SECOND OPINION. It denies. The reason is that there is no divine promise by force of which God is considered certainly to accept an offered Indulgence. Hence He appears to admit it for application according to His good pleasure alone. Moreover, the Church maintains the practice of celebrating Masses for many years and for the same souls, for example, anniversary Masses, even at privileged altars, or altars to which the privilege of a plenary Indulgence adheres. But that practice would be empty if they were freed immediately by the first Mass applied to them. St. Alphonsus, no. 534; Billuart, Appendix, article 6.

It is certain, however, that Indulgences benefit the deceased at least for the most part; for otherwise the Church would do something useless in applying them to the deceased, which certainly cannot be said without impiety.

1050. ○ QUESTION 8. Must a special application be made to certain determinate souls, or does a general application suffice?

Reply. A general application made to all the souls dwelling in Purgatory suffices, because suffrages are divisible and therefore can be distributed to all souls. This is further clear from the practice of the Church, which commands Masses to be celebrated for the deceased in general, especially on the second day of November. Likewise, when collections are made in Churches for the souls in Purgatory, the Masses to be celebrated from them must be applied for all in general. But if someone wishes to restrict his application, he must then specially determine certain souls. It is a pious practice by which Indulgences are applied to the souls needing greater assistance [3]. Furthermore, let each follow his own devotion.

[3] Piety is never lacking in any work by which the souls in Purgatory are aided. Furthermore, piety seems to shine forth more if, with the order of charity preserved, greater help is given to the souls of those to whom we owe more under some title.

QUESTION 9. Is the state of grace required for gaining an Indulgence for the deceased?

Reply. There are two probable opinions:

FIRST OPINION, the more common [4]. It affirms, because no one can apply an Indulgence to another unless he first makes it his own; but one who remains in the state of mortal sin cannot make Indulgences his own. Therefore, etc. St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 534, calls this opinion more probable.

[4] But Naldus, Summa, word Indulgence, no. 7, says that the negative opinion is more received; and those who prefer it certainly judged it more probable.

SECOND OPINION. It denies, because the work is performed only as a condition upon which, once it is fulfilled, the Supreme Pontiff applies the Indulgence, or the satisfactions of Christ and the Saints, to the deceased [5]. Billuart, Suarez, Navarre, Toledo, Praepositus, etc.

[5] According to Toledo, the reason is that the cause of satisfaction, or the price of the penalties, is not the work of the one who is in sin, but the Indulgence itself and the treasure of the merits of Christ and the Saints. But that particular work through which the Indulgences are applied is done in the name of the Church, in which grace is never lacking. An example is at hand in one who gives alms and sends them through the hands of a man existing in mortal sin; for the fruit of the alms is not lost from the fact that the one who executes the work is in sin. See Diana, tome 4, tract 5, resolution 36.

The VV. here object, page 948, no. 164, to the first opinion the words of St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 534, at Busembaum's resolution 10: This seems truer to me with Wigandt, because no one can apply an indulgence to another unless he first makes it his own. Then, ibid., they add in a Note: When St. Alphonsus calls some opinion truer, he no longer regards the other as probable.

Reply 1. St. Alphonsus did not say here that this opinion is truer, but, this seems truer to me; and the word seems is that of one opining, while opinion signifies assent with prudent fear concerning the opposite. 2. The names of Toledo, Suarez, Navarre, etc., for several others may be seen cited in Diana, both loc. cit. and tome 4, tract 1, resolutions 4 and 5, can bring it about that, with the reverence due to the Holy Doctor Alphonsus preserved, it is lawful without the note of temerity to doubt concerning this judgment of his, or better, opinion; especially since the authors of the opposite opinion easily answer the reason adduced by Wigandt by denying the supposition, namely, as though in the case the faithful first gain an Indulgence for themselves, or make it their own, and then yield or apply it to another. For from the fact that the Church herself thus applies the merits of Christ and the Saints, and that the work enjoined to the faithful is something like a condition, it is also argued therefrom that no one has considered it to be within our power to apply Indulgences to another living person; although, if someone truly makes Indulgences his own, no reason appears why he cannot yield them to another living person, or why the authority of the Church is necessary for applying Indulgences to the deceased, which authority is not necessary for anyone to apply to the deceased the satisfactory merit of fasts, alms, mortifications of the flesh, etc.

The first opinion is to be recommended as safer. Therefore the faithful are to be urged most strongly that, whenever they find themselves guilty of grave sin, they take care to be reconciled with God before they endeavor to make satisfaction for others [6].

[6] The care of bringing it about that the faithful are reconciled with God is certainly excellent. But care must be taken at the same time lest, while a reason of this kind is urged more fervently than is fitting, an effect altogether contrary to the desire of the preacher should follow and souls be deprived of the suffrages of very many. Diana cries out to the contrary, loc. cit.: No one is excused when some indulgence is applied by the Supreme Pontiff to the deceased by way of suffrage if they do not take it for them. For, as was said, both the just and sinners can obtain it for the deceased.

1051. ○ QUESTION 10. Are CONFESSION and ABSOLUTION, even from venial sins, required for gaining Indulgences which are granted with the clause: CONTRITE AND CONFESSED?

Reply 1. Confession is certainly required notwithstanding the state of grace. The reason is that although confession is then not necessary for the remission of sins, nevertheless it is required as a condition, or a prescribed work. This is evident from the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences approved by Clement XIII on 19 May 1759. Hence the probability of the opposite opinion, which formerly was defended by many theologians, falls. Confession can, however, be made on the vigil of the day on which the Indulgence is to be gained. Thus the same Congregation established. See St. Alphonsus, no. 534, etc.; Bouvier.

Reply 2. Absolution, however, is not required. This is evident from a recent Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences on 15 December 1841. See the work of Father Antonin Maurel entitled Le Chretien eclaire sur la nature et l'usage des Indulgences, page 64. This work was approved by a special decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences.

1052. ○ QUESTION 11. Is confession required as often as a plenary Indulgence is to be gained?

Reply 1. It is not required with respect to all plenary Indulgences, for there are several Indulgences for the gaining of which no confession is required. Such are the Indulgences granted for the exercise of the Way of the Cross.

Reply 2. It is required with respect to most plenary Indulgences. This is proved from the Rescripts of many grants.

Nevertheless, by a special indult granted in perpetuity, the faithful who are accustomed to confess once a week can gain all plenary Indulgences occurring during the week, provided they remain in the state of grace. Thus from the Decree of Clement XIII, 9 September 1763; and it is also confirmed by the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 15 November 1841.

Indeed, not a few Bishops, especially in France, obtain from the Roman Curia an extension of this privilege to every other week, or to those who confess twice a month.

Likewise, according to a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences approved by Pius VII on 12 June 1822, the faithful who are not accustomed to confess every week can make the confession necessary for gaining an Indulgence on a feast day eight days before the feast.

1053. ○ QUESTION 12. Can someone gain DIFFERENT Indulgences, or THE SAME Indulgences several times, on the same day?

Reply 1. As to different Indulgences, the faithful generally can gain them, at least if they are partial and attached to different works, or to the same works which can be repeated several times in a day. Thus commonly the Theologians, and this is confirmed by the practice of the Church and of the faithful.

Reply 2. As to the same Indulgences, this depends upon the mind of the Pontiff granting the Indulgences. Hence attention must be given to the letters of grant; and if these determine nothing, one must stand by the common interpretation and practice of the Church.

Thus the Indulgences of stations, or of the visitation of a Church, cannot be obtained several times on the same day, as is evident from a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences approved by Innocent XI. Voit, no. 653; Lacroix, no. 1370. On the contrary, it is lawful to gain several times in a day the several Indulgences attached to the Rosary and to each of its parts, or to the recitation of the acts of Faith, Hope, and Charity, etc., because in the Rescript of the Pontiff it is said: as often as.

QUESTION 13. Can someone gain several Indulgences by the same act or work?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if the prescribed work cannot or is not customarily repeated on the same day, such as fasting, Communion, etc., and different Indulgences to be gained concur, for example, Indulgences of different Confraternities, or those attached to different Churches, granted under different titles and on the same day.

Reply 2. Negatively, however, if the Indulgences concur under the same title, for example, if someone has two medals, to each of which an Indulgence of one year has been granted with the burden of repeatable works; for then several Indulgences cannot be obtained together at the same time unless the enjoined works are repeated, because such is considered to be the mind of the one granting when he enjoins works which can be repeated. Thus with Voit, no. 655, etc.

1054. ◦ QUESTION 14. Can several plenary Indulgences be acquired on the same day?

Reply 1. No one can gain a second Indulgence at the same time if, after the first, no penalty to be discharged any longer remains [7].

[7] The reasons which were adduced by both parties to the dispute, see reply 2, manifestly show that those things which are said in this first response do not pertain to the matter.

Reply 2. Otherwise, affirmatively. This is proved by a recent Decision of the Sacred Congregation [8]. Formerly it was disputed in the Schools. Some denied it, at least for the most part, because Communion, which is generally customarily prescribed for gaining an Indulgence, cannot be repeated on the same day. Others affirmed it, because Communion was not imposed as a work to be fulfilled, but rather as a condition necessary for gaining the Indulgence. But with the aforesaid Decision intervening, the entire dispute has been removed.

[8] To the question, Can several plenary Indulgences be gained on the same day when the reception of the divine Eucharist is prescribed for each? the Sacred Congregation replied: Affirmatively, provided, however, that the other conditions imposed respectively are observed. 27 May 1841.

1055. ◦ QUESTION 15. Is an intention required for gaining Indulgences, and if so, what kind?

Reply 1. An intention at least virtual is certainly required whenever an Indulgence is granted with a certain intention to be formed by the recipient; otherwise it would be null.

Reply 2. In other cases it is disputed.

FIRST OPINION, which seems more probable, teaches that a positive intention, at least virtual, is required. The reason is that the prescribed work must be directed to the end intended by the Church; but one who does not at least virtually intend to gain the Indulgence cannot accomplish this. Thus Billuart, Appendix on Indulgences, article 5. This, however, must be understood only when the matter concerns an end expressly prescribed by the Church.

SECOND OPINION. It holds that a habitual intention suffices. The reason is that of itself no intention is required; for the effect of the Indulgence, or the remission of penalty, depends wholly upon the grant of the Church and not upon the intention of the agent. Hence, although he conducts himself passively and does not attend to the Indulgence, indeed, does not know that he is gaining it when it accrues to him, nevertheless he obtains a right to it. For an Indulgence is granted by the Church by way of payment for the work performed; but for the validity of a payment it is not necessarily required that the one for whom it is made know of it.

In practice the former opinion seems to be recommended as safer and more efficacious for exciting pious movements of the soul. From another consideration, the use of probability does not avail in the matter of Indulgences [9], since not probability, but truth produces the effect. Furthermore, it is commonly admitted that an intention formed in the morning suffices for gaining all the Indulgences occurring during the day. Praiseworthy and most useful is the practice of pious souls who always renew in the morning the intention of gaining all the Indulgences attached to the good works which they will perform on that day. Lacroix, etc.

[9] Others will easily deny this. For it is a very well-known principle that, whenever probable opinions concerning matters situated within the power of the Church are advanced and put into practice, she supplies, wherever there is need, that which pertains to the validity of acts. Now in the present matter, see Diana, tome 4, tract 5, resolution 18, both parties to the dispute have recourse to the mind and will of the Roman Pontiff granting the Indulgences. For those who contend that the performance of the work does not suffice give as their reason that such does not appear to be the intention of the Pope; and conversely those who contend that the performance of the work suffices prove this because it is not to be thought that the Supreme Pontiff requires in one gaining an Indulgence an actual intention, actual being opposed to habitual and interpretative, because neither does the nature of an Indulgence necessarily demand it, nor do the words of the grant signify it, etc. See Laymann, book 5, tract 7, chapter 6, no. 5.

Furthermore, the reason adduced for the first opinion, as the Author says it is to be 1056. ◦ QUESTION 16. If a faculty is granted to commute the works enjoined for gaining Indulgences, must the commutation necessarily be made in confession?

Reply. Affirmatively. For one must stand by the rule handed down by Benedict XIV, Constitution Inter praeteritos, section 63, where he establishes that commutations of this kind must be made in confession alone.

For, after recalling the controversy concerning the commutation of vows, absolution from censures, and the power of dispensing in other matters, or of commuting the prescribed works, namely, whether all these things must be done by the Confessor in the act of sacramental confession or not, he concludes thus: But We, in order to remove every difficulty, have enjoined in the instruction, Constitution Convocatis, that no absolutions, commutations, or dispensations can be given by penitentiaries outside the act of sacramental confession. This has seemed to Us both congruous and fitting to the gravity of the matter and the quality of the ministry; it removes every occasion of controversy and is conformable to the practice of Our Apostolic Penitentiary [10].

[10] Benedict XIV, as is clear, speaks here of faculties granted and of the manner of using them on the occasion of the Jubilee of 1750; he does not establish a general law. Hence, in the Instruction which he had handed down in the Constitution Convocatis, and which he expressly indicates in this place, he imposed for the use of the granted faculties not only this condition but other conditions at the same time, which surely no one has judged should be held as general laws. Let them understand, he says in sections 24 and 25, that they cannot use peculiar faculties of this kind granted to them by Us, as above, for this Holy Year, except with those penitents who sincerely and seriously will to obtain the present Jubilee of the same Holy Year... Let them further observe that the aforesaid absolutions, commutations, and dispensations cannot be exercised by them outside the act of sacramental Confession, NOR OUTSIDE EACH ONE'S OWN BASILICA OR CHURCH.... Therefore let us conclude that commutations, etc., must necessarily be made in Confession only when a condition of this kind is expressly provided in the grant of the faculty.

1057. ○ QUESTION 17. Can deaf-mutes gain Indulgences to which vocal prayers are attached, and if so, how?

Reply. Formerly they could not gain these Indulgences, since they could not satisfy the required conditions. But by the benign understood, leads rather to the second opinion. For he establishes that only that end must be intended which the Church expressly prescribes. But the Church certainly has never expressly prescribed that the faithful have the intention of gaining an Indulgence. Therefore. But if the Church sometimes prescribes that the faithful pray for this or that end, for example, that God may deign to humble the enemies of Holy Church, this pertains to the work enjoined, not to the intention of enjoying the gain of the Indulgence. Hence it can happen that someone directs prayers to that end, but neither thinks nor knows anything concerning the gain of the Indulgence. grant of Pius IX on 15 March 1832, they can enjoy this benefit, provided they observe the following: 1. if some Church is to be visited, it will suffice if, in approaching it, deaf-mutes pray to God in mind and affection; 2. if public prayers are to be offered, nothing else is required of them except that they unite themselves with the assembled faithful with a pious mind; 3. if private prayers are to be recited, they can obtain from a Confessor a commutation into any other pious works. See the newspaper L'Univers, 1 February 1854; L'Ami de la Religion, 2 February 1854.

1058. ○ QUESTION 18. Are Indulgences lost if a movable thing to which they are attached is handed over to another?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if ownership of that thing is transferred to another. The reason is that the Church intends to grant the Indulgences only to the person for whom some thing was blessed, or to the first person who uses it. The Church most wisely established this to forestall abuses which otherwise would creep in if Indulgences could be transferred and given from one person to another.

Reply 2. Negatively, however, if ownership of the thing is not transferred by the handing over, that is, if the thing is delivered to another only on loan, provided nevertheless that the lender does not intend to grant the borrower the benefit of the Indulgence. This is proved from the Decision of the Sacred Congregation, 26 November 1714. Gousset, no. 906, etc.

QUESTION 19. To what things can Indulgences be applied?

Reply. Indulgences can be applied to any solid things whatsoever, not even iron or wood being excepted, as formerly. Even a chaplet made of solid glass can be blessed with the Indulgences attached. Therefore, only things which can easily be broken or torn, such as paper, blown glass, etc., must be excepted. This is evident from a recent Decision of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences. Father Maurel, work cited, page 184.

1059. Resolutions. - 1. A Bishop can grant Indulgences to his subjects staying outside his Diocese, because he has personal jurisdiction over them. Bishops, however, can grant Indulgences only by way of absolution, and therefore for the living alone. Thus commonly.

2. Anyone can gain Indulgences for any other living Christian by way of payment or satisfaction; for although the fruit of merit is not applicable to another, nevertheless the fruit of satisfaction is applicable, provided that the other person is in the state of grace. But for this a special intention of gaining the Indulgence determinately for that person is required. The application of satisfaction can be made for one who is ignorant, does not request it, or is absent, etc. Thus Suarez, Lugo, Lacroix, no. 1327, etc. [11].

[11] Croix does not assert that absolutely anyone can, at his own discretion, apply to any other living Christian those Indulgences which he himself can gain; rather, as is evident from the following no. 1329, book 6, part 2, he admits this when the Pope has expressly granted that some Indulgence can be applied to another living person, as is customarily done for the deceased; this, however, is not customarily done.

Suarez also supposes the same thing, writing thus, On Penance, disputation 52, section 8, no. 6: If the form of the Indulgence is only that one who does this or that obtains such a remission, then the Indulgence cannot be applied to another, because an Indulgence effects no more than it expresses. Hence, just as it does not extend beyond the quantity expressly granted, so neither does it extend beyond the persons expressed. Likewise... because an effect granted ex opere operato in favor of one who performs such a work can never be applied to another by that person's will unless this very thing is expressed in the grant, because it is as it were a personal privilege.... But if the very form and tenor of the Indulgence is expressed such that the one acting thus can obtain such a fruit either for himself or for another, then there is no doubt that one can act for another to gain that Indulgence.

Lugo speaks thus concerning the same matter, On Penance, disputation 27, no. 77: A just man could, from the same faculty of the Pontiff, gain an Indulgence for other baptized persons, whoever they might be. Commonly, however, the faculty of gaining an Indulgence for other living persons is not granted, because, since they themselves can also assist themselves, it is not expedient to foster their sloth, so that they take care neither to make satisfaction nor even to gain Indulgences for themselves.

3. Indulgences attached to some thing are not lost unless that thing has been completely changed so that it can no longer be called the same thing; for example, if a Church were entirely or almost completely demolished, the Indulgences adhering to it would cease. They are not lost if it is totally renewed through successive repairs, since it would remain morally the same. Therefore, neither does a chaplet which is successively repaired lose its Indulgences, although its beads have from time to time been completely renewed in parts. Gousset, no. 905.

4. Indulgences do not expire by the death of the one granting, since they are favors, nor before knowledge of their revocation. Indulgences are to be accepted as they read; nevertheless, since they are favors, they are to be interpreted broadly, while the proper meaning of the words is nevertheless preserved. Hence they are to be considered perpetual if they were given without a restriction of time. St. Alphonsus, no. 524.

1060. ○ 5. An Indulgence granted for the point of death does not require the application of a Confessor or the ministry of another. Nevertheless, it is expedient that the dying frequently invoke the names of Jesus and Mary and that the gaining of the Indulgence be recalled to their minds.

6. If a dying person has several blessed Images, Crosses, Medals, or Rosaries, he can gain an Indulgence toties quoties, as often as he repeats the name of Jesus or performs the required work, at least more probably, whether the Indulgences proceed from the same grant or from different grants. Nevertheless, any time during which the point of death is verified suffices for gaining them, even if death follows only several days afterward. Thus St. Alphonsus, ibid.; Suarez, etc. Dying persons can likewise gain several Indulgences under the title of various Confraternities, even if they are ignorant of them or do not remember them. St. Alphonsus, ibid.

7. It is required, however, that the dying person have with him the things to which the Indulgences are attached, namely, Rosaries, Crosses, etc. Nevertheless, it is not necessary that he have these suspended from his neck or wrapped around his arm, as is customary to be done for the deceased, or grasped in his hand; but it suffices that these things be in the bed or suspended near the dying person, although he neither sees nor touches them, nor knows or remembers that he has them. St. Alphonsus, no. 534.

8. Although it is expedient that all the works be performed in the state of grace, nevertheless this is not necessary according to the common opinion; rather, it suffices that the last work be performed in grace. St. Alphonsus, ibid.

Chapter II. On the Jubilee

1061. ◦ According to many, the word Jubilee is derived from the Hebrew iobel, which signifies fiftieth, because among the Hebrews the year of Jubilee recurred in the fiftieth year; or, according to others, from the same word signifying the sound of a trumpet by which the fiftieth year was announced. According to still others, Jubilee is derived from iubal or iobal, which signifies to sprout, because in the fiftieth year the land was not cultivated and the inhabitants fed upon fruits springing up spontaneously.

In imitation of the Jubilee of the Old Testament, the ecclesiastical Jubilee was instituted, which is now celebrated at Rome and throughout the world with a most full indulgence of sins, great joy, and solemnity. After its first institution by decree of Boniface VIII in the year 1300, it was held every fiftieth year; by decree of Urban VI, however, every thirtieth year; finally, by the statute of Paul II, it began to be celebrated every twenty-fifth year.

1062. Definition. - A Jubilee is a solemn plenary Indulgence which the Supreme Pontiff sometimes grants to all the faithful with the obligation of performing certain pious works, at the same time giving Confessors a special power of absolving from reserved sins and censures and of commuting most vows.

Hence a Jubilee differs only accidentally from an ordinary plenary Indulgence, namely, by reason of the solemnity and the privileges attached to it, and also by reason of the most abundant and extraordinary graces which accompany it. For the marvelous and astounding effects which a Jubilee is accustomed to produce demonstrate these altogether special graces, even if solemn assemblies of the faithful are not held and the divine word is not preached.

1063. Division. - A manifold Jubilee is distinguished:

1. A greater Jubilee, which regularly occurs every twenty-fifth year, which is called a Holy Year. It is also called an ordinary Jubilee because it is fixed and determined by law.

2. A lesser Jubilee, which is customarily granted by individual Supreme Pontiffs after the elevation of each and in other particular circumstances, and is called an extraordinary Jubilee.

3. General, which is granted to the whole world, as the greater Jubilee always is, and sometimes also the lesser Jubilee; but it is customarily granted to the City, or to Rome alone, before it is granted to the world.

4. Particular, which is granted to some province, city, or particular place, such as the most celebrated Jubilee granted to the Church of Anicium whenever the feast of the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin falls upon the sacred day of Parasceve.

An entire year is ordinarily granted at Rome for gaining the greater Jubilee, and in the following year it is customarily granted by extension to all other regions of the Christian world. But only fifteen days or three weeks are granted to individual parishes for gaining the Jubilee. Nevertheless, the Bishop can for just causes prolong that time. The lesser Jubilee is also first held at Rome, but for a few weeks, and then is extended to the whole world, so that during the course of the year it can be held for a time to be determined by the Bishop.

Conditions Required for the Jubilee

1064. ◦ I. For a general Jubilee, whether greater or lesser, the following conditions are required: 1. a fast of three days, Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday; 2. some alms according to the means of each; 3. visitation of Churches, praying piously for the intention of the Supreme Pontiff. Formerly it was placed in the Indult: Those who have taken part in the procession or have visited the Churches. Now a procession is not enjoined as a condition of the Indulgence. 4. Confession of sins performed with sincere sorrow. 5. Communion made in the state of grace. Thus from many Constitutions, especially that of Benedict XIV, Bull Inter praeteritos, 3 December 1749, for the Jubilee of the Holy Year. See the compendium of this Bull in St. Alphonsus, no. 536.

II. For a particular Jubilee, attention must be given to the tenor of the Indult granted; ordinarily only three things are required, namely, confession, Communion, and visitation of some Church.

1065. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can children, the elderly, the sick, or others who cannot fast gain the Jubilee without fasting?

Reply. Negatively, unless they obtain a commutation of the fast into another work. The reason is that fasting is expressly prescribed as a condition for gaining the Indulgence. For it is not enjoined as a precept from which necessity excuses, but is assigned as a counsel with the promise of an Indulgence. Confessors approved for the Jubilee, however, enjoy the faculty of a commutation of this kind. Thus Laymann, book 5, tract 8, chapter 8, no. 12; Voit, no. 663.

QUESTION 2. Can the enjoined fasts be satisfied through fasts otherwise due, for example, if the Jubilee is held during Lent or the Ember Days?

Reply. Of itself, negatively, with St. Alphonsus, book 6, nos. 536 and 538. The reason is that by one payment a double burden cannot be satisfied, and the Pontiff, when he imposes a fast, always intends to impose a special obligation concerning a matter not yet commanded.

Nevertheless, if the Pontiff determines, or permits to be determined, for gaining the Jubilee a time in which a fast must already be observed by precept of the Church, such as the time of Lent or the Ember Days, by that very fact he is considered to dispense the faithful from the obligation of obtaining a commutation of the fast into another work. St. Alphonsus, no. 536. This doctrine is confirmed by a recent Decision of the Sacred Penitentiary [1].

[1] Questions proposed to the Sacred Penitentiary on the occasion of the Jubilee granted by Pius IX in the year 1863:

1. Whether Bishops who determine the time of Lent for gaining the Jubilee in their Diocese ought to commute the prescribed fasts into other pious works, abstinence being observed in places where, by Pontifical faculty, they are accustomed to dispense from it?

2. Whether Bishops in whose Diocese the Jubilee falls during Paschal time can declare to the faithful that a single Communion, namely, the Paschal Communion, suffices for obtaining the grace of the Jubilee, with that which is prescribed by the Pontiff omitted?

3. Whether Bishops can assign different times for the various places of a Diocese to obtain the Indulgence of the Jubilee during the course of the year?

4. Whether Confessors, during the time of Jubilee, can absolve those who cooperated in the usurpation of Pontifical territory, notwithstanding the reservation made in the Bull of 26 March 1860?

The Sacred Penitentiary, after a report of the foregoing was made to our Most Holy Lord Pius IX, according to the mind of the same Most Holy Lord, replied on 20 January 1865:

To 1: Through the Lenten fast, even if there is necessity of using milk foods, the double burden is satisfied.

To 2: Affirmatively.

To 3: Affirmatively, from a new Indult of His Holiness.

To 4: Negatively, and recourse must be had to the Ordinaries of the places, who will provide according to the instructions.

1066. ○ QUESTION 3. Can the visitation of Churches be commuted for those impeded?

Reply. Affirmatively. Thus Nuns, those detained in prisons, the sick, and any others impeded from visiting a Church for a grave cause can obtain from a Confessor a commutation of this work into another. Thus Benedict XIV established in the Bull Inter praeteritos, and the other subsequent Supreme Pontiffs.

QUESTION 4. Can confession and Communion be commuted?

Reply. Negatively, at least generally speaking. The reason is that Bulls speaking of works to be commuted do not speak of confession or Communion, at least for adults. Indeed, they are expressly excluded by Benedict XIV in the Bull cited, section 1, where it is said that the faculty of commuting pious works is not understood to be given concerning confession and Communion, except for children, or the prayer necessary in the visitation.

Nevertheless, as it seems, if someone intending to communicate on the last day were prevented from Communion by an unforeseen occurrence, he could obtain a commutation of Communion or a prolongation of the Jubilee. Thus commonly, says Bouvier, little work on Indulgences and the Jubilee, chapter 3, section 4.

1067. ○ QUESTION 5. Can children not yet refreshed by Communion gain the Jubilee with it omitted?

Reply. Negatively, unless they obtain a commutation. For it is gathered from the Bull of Benedict XIV, ibid., and of Leo XII for the Jubilee that, with the Bishop's permission, they can gain the Jubilee when Communion is commuted into another pious work. Bouvier, ibid.

1068. ○ QUESTION 6. Does Paschal Communion suffice for gaining the Jubilee if the Jubilee is celebrated during Paschal time?

Reply. Affirmatively, unless a special Communion for acquiring the Indulgence of the Jubilee is required in the Bull or Rescript of the Pontiff. This is evident from the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences on 14 December 1841, as will be said below at the end of this appendix, no. 1086.

QUESTION 7. Are those who have only venial sins bound to confess?

Reply. Altogether affirmatively. Formerly a great controversy was conducted concerning this, but it fell after the express Declaration of Benedict XIV, ibid., section 77. Absolution, however, is not necessarily required, since no mention is made of it.

1069. ◦ QUESTION 8. Does a confession made on the vigil of the first day of the Jubilee suffice?

Reply. Negatively. The reason is that all the works must be performed within the interval of time established for gaining the Jubilee. Nevertheless, confession can be begun either on the vigil or before, provided it is completed during the time of the Jubilee. Bouvier, ibid. Nevertheless, confession could be made in that part of the vigil which follows first Vespers, because the first day, according to ecclesiastical custom, is usually reckoned from first Vespers; and this is constantly observed in the ordinary Jubilee of the City, as is evident from the Bull Peregrinantes of Benedict XIV, section 4. Moreover, the days for performing the enjoined works, as is evident from section 6 of the same Constitution, can be taken either as natural or ecclesiastical, namely, from first Vespers of one day until the full evening twilight of the following day.

QUESTION 9. What quantity of alms must be given?

Reply 1. If in the Bull it is said, He who shall have given alms, any quantity suffices, provided it is not so small that it appears to be almost nothing.

Reply 2. If it is said, As much as shall have seemed fitting to each according to his means, then the quantity ought in some way to bear proportion to the means of each; hence to give a small coin would suffice for a poor person, but not for a rich person. Thus sufficiently commonly; St. Alphonsus, no. 528.

1070. ◦ QUESTION 10. Must the poor, Religious, and children under parental authority give alms, and if so, how?

Reply 1. All are bound either to give alms in some way, at least through another, or to substitute another pious work determined by the Confessor. The reason is that, where the obtaining of some favor is in question, impossibility of fulfilling the condition does not excuse from it, as impossibility of fulfilling a precept does, as was already said above. Laymann, chapter 8, no. 12; Lacroix, nos. 1428-1430.

Reply 2. The poor can satisfy by giving the smallest thing, for example, a penny or a small piece of bread, etc. But it is more prudent to commute this work into another for them, as Lacroix expressly says, ibid., and Laymann, ibid.

Reply 3. Religious and children under parental authority satisfy if some alms are given by their Superiors in their name and with their knowledge. Wives can likewise satisfy through their husbands, and servants through their masters.

1071. ◦ QUESTION 11. Must all the works enjoined be completed in one week?

Reply 1. Affirmatively as to the fasts. This is clearly proved from the formula which reads thus: Those who shall have taken part in the procession or visited the Churches, and shall have fasted on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday of one of the two weeks, and likewise shall have confessed their sins, been refreshed by Holy Communion, and given alms..., etc. From these things it is plainly evident that the three fasts are to be performed in the same week.

Reply 2. Negatively, however, as to the other works. The reason is that in the cited formula, which is customarily employed, it is said only that the fasts are to be performed in the same week, but not the remaining works, as will be evident to one attending to the grammatical order. Moreover, otherwise an absurdity would follow, namely, that if a procession were enjoined, and indeed only one, for example, at the beginning of the Jubilee, no one could gain it in the second week.

Nevertheless, St. Alphonsus and several others affirm, relying both upon the text of the Indult and upon the custom of the faithful. But from each the contrary can deservedly be maintained.

Furthermore, the difficulty vanishes, and the mind of the Church is most clearly evident from the Bull of Pius IX granted for the Jubilee after his elevation, 20 November 1846, where it is said: 1. For the City: Those who, from the sixth day of December until the twenty-seventh day of the same month, shall have visited twice within those three weeks the Basilicas, etc., and shall have prayed devoutly there for some space of time, and within the same weeks shall have confessed their sins and reverently received the most holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, etc. 2. For the World: Those who... shall have visited twice during the space of three weeks the designated Churches or one of them, and shall have devoutly performed the other works, etc.

1072. ◦ QUESTION 12. Can travelers gain the Jubilee, and if so, how?

Reply. 1. The time of the Jubilee can be prolonged for them until their return, and one is not bound to delay his journey unless he can conveniently do so. 2. If they are found on a journey when the Jubilee begins in their own place, they can likewise gain it there after their return. 3. If they pass through places where the Jubilee is being celebrated, they can gain it there. Thus St. Alphonsus, no. 538, commonly with others. This is evident from the Bulls for the Jubilee. Consult the Bull of Pius IX just cited.

1073. ◦ QUESTION 13. Can the Jubilee be gained several times?

Reply. It seems that this must be denied unless it is found specially expressed in the Bull or Rescript of grant [2].

[2] This was said less exactly. For Benedict XIV, Constitution Inter praeteritos, no. 84, hands down as a general canon that this holds when the Jubilee is granted for a short time, for example, two weeks, but otherwise if the Jubilee of the Holy Year is in question. We, he says, have judged it opportune to declare Our mind concerning this controversy proposed elsewhere. For, considering that the matter here is by no means a Jubilee of two weeks, but a Jubilee which endures for an entire year; that the matter does not concern enjoined works which can be fulfilled several times in a day;... but concerns visits, not few in number, to Basilicas which are separated and distant from one another and which can be made only on many distinct days, We have by no means doubted to declare that the Holy Indulgence can be acquired several times during the Holy Year by repeating the enjoined works.

It is added in the same place: But since other favors and graces are joined to the Indulgence of the Jubilee,... We have declared that one who has once become a participant in them the first time he obtained the Jubilee cannot again become a participant in them if, after the first acquisition of the Jubilee, he again incurs censures, commits reserved cases, or needs new commutations or dispensations from Vows. By these words the question raised elsewhere is sufficiently clearly resolved: Can one who has already obtained the Jubilee, but did not then become a participant in favors and graces of this kind because he did not need them, afterward enjoy them if perhaps he later needs them? For in the Constitution the discourse is most expressly about those who perhaps need to become participants AGAIN, those who AGAIN incur censures and commit reserved cases, and finally NEW commutations of Vows, etc. And the Sacred Penitentiary also, in a Response of 1 June 1869, when it denied that the Jubilee could be gained several times with respect to absolution, expressly limited this to absolution from censures and reserved matters into which one already absolved had FALLEN ANEW. Therefore, for anyone who has not yet been a participant in these graces, the exception that he obtained the Jubilee the first time certainly does not hold; for it must be denied that, besides the Indulgence, he in any way became a participant in those graces the first time.

QUESTION 14. Through an INVALID confession during the Jubilee, are censures and the reservation of sins removed?

Reply 1. More probably affirmatively, if the confession was inculpably null.

Reply 2. Probably affirmatively, even if the confession was culpably null, provided the penitent did not omit the reserved sins themselves through sacrilegious silence. See the Salmanticenses, On Penance, chapter 13, no. 41; Lugo, On Penance, disputation 20, no. 110, etc. [3].

[3] Compare what was said above concerning this question, no. 580, question 9.

1074. ○ QUESTION 15. Does one sin gravely who, after he has been absolved from reserved matters, does not fulfill the other prescribed works?

Reply. Negatively, with the common opinion. The reason is that such an obligation does not appear to have been imposed either from the nature of the Jubilee or from a precept of the Pontiff or Confessor. Thus St. Alphonsus, no. 557; Lugo, disputation 20, no. 100; the Salmanticenses, chapter 13, no. 57, against some.

QUESTION 16. Can one who confessed during the time of the Jubilee and forgot to confess his reserved sins afterward be absolved by any Confessor?

Reply 1. Affirmatively, if the Confessor had the express intention of absolving from all sins, even reserved sins.

Reply 2. More probably affirmatively even if the Confessor did not think about this, because by force of the Jubilee the penitent acquired the right to be absolved by any Confessor. Thus more commonly with St. Alphonsus, no. 537, question 4; Lacroix, no. 1449, etc.

But if someone began confession within the Jubilee, he can afterward be absolved from all reserved sins. Laymann, Navarre, etc.

1075. ○ QUESTION 17. During the Jubilee, is it lawful to choose as Confessor anyone approved by the Ordinary?

Reply. Affirmatively, and this faculty particularly regards Nuns and their Novices, and indeed Regulars themselves. Thus Benedict XIV declared after Gregory XIII and Alexander VII. St. Alphonsus, no. 536.

Except, however, the case of an accomplice. For Benedict XIV declared that outside the point of death a Priest can never, even during the Jubilee, absolve his accomplice in a shameful sin, Bull Inter praeteritos.

QUESTION 18. How far does the extraordinary power concerning the absolution of sins extend?

Reply. Unless otherwise and expressly declared, all Confessors have the faculty of absolving from any sins whatsoever, even those reserved to the Apostolic See in the Bull Coenae or otherwise reserved in any manner; and also from sins reserved to the Bishop, even if this is not expressed.

1076. ○ QUESTION 19. Can a Confessor absolve from all reserved censures?

Reply. Affirmatively, and there belongs to him full power of absolving from any censures whatsoever, whether imposed by law or by a man, in any manner and for any cause, even those reserved to the Ordinaries of places, or to the Pope and Apostolic See, or contained in the Bull Coenae, and otherwise reserved in any way. Observe, however, that the faculty of absolving from censures of the Bull Coenae does not include the faculty of absolving from heresy. St. Alphonsus, etc.

1077. ○ QUESTION 20. Can a Confessor grant DISPENSATIONS from vows?

Reply. Negatively; for, says Benedict XIV, the faculty of dispensing is not included in the faculty of commuting. Not a few Theologians assert that one who confessed during the time of the Jubilee can afterward receive from any Confessor a commutation of vows, although he did not request the aforesaid dispensation then. This opinion is called probable by St. Alphonsus. Ibid., no. 536.

QUESTION 21. Does the faculty of absolving from censures include the faculty of absolving from irregularities?

Reply. Negatively. Thus the common opinion against some who consider irregularities from delict to be comprehended under the name of censures. There are, however, several examples of a grant of this kind.

Two things should be noted here.

1. During the Jubilee of a Holy Year, or greater Jubilee, all other Indulgences, both plenary and partial, granted for the living are suspended for the entire year, but not those which are granted for the deceased. Indeed, by the grant of Benedict XIV, all Indulgences, even those which otherwise were not applicable to the deceased, can be applied to them in this year. See the Bull of the same Pontiff already cited several times.

The following are excepted from the suspension of Indulgences for the living: 1. Indulgences for the dying; 2. Indulgences for the prayer Angelus; 3. Indulgences for the visitation of the Most Holy Sacrament solemnly exposed; 4. Indulgences for those who accompany the Most Holy Sacrament carried to the sick; 5. all Indulgences granted by someone other than the Pope. These things are deduced from the Constitutions of Benedict XIV and Leo XII.

2. No order is necessarily required in performing the works, provided the last work is performed in the state of grace. But if someone falls into mortal sin after confession, he is not bound to repeat the visitations of Churches, the fasts, or the alms; nevertheless, he is bound to confess again. Thus Benedict XIV in the Bull just cited.

More Recent Decisions of the Roman Curia — Concerning Indulgences — Petition — Concerning the Confession Required for Gaining Indulgences

1078. ◦ Doubt 1. By a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences issued on 12 June 1822, it is granted that a sacramental confession made within a week before a feast can avail for gaining an Indulgence.

QUESTION 1. Do the words, within a week, signify only the eight days immediately preceding the feast; or the entire and complete week which runs before the feast, so that, for example, a confession made on Sunday would avail for gaining an Indulgence on Saturday of the following week, on which day the feast would fall, although thirteen days would then have intervened between the confession and the feast?

QUESTION 2. Does a confession made on the eighth day before the feast, by force of this Indult, avail only for gaining one Indulgence; or can other Indulgences also be gained through this confession which occur within the aforesaid time and for the gaining of which sacramental confession would otherwise be required?

Doubt 2. QUESTION. When confession is prescribed as a condition sine qua non in the Bull or Brief by which an Indulgence is granted, is it necessary that sacramental absolution be given to the penitents for gaining the Indulgence?

The Sacred Congregation appointed over Indulgences and Sacred Relics judged on 15 December 1841 that the response should be:

As to the first Doubt:

To 1: Affirmatively as to the first part; negatively as to the second.

To 2: Negatively as to the first part; affirmatively as to the second.

As to the second Doubt: The response is negative. In testimony whereof, etc.

Petition — Concerning the Tablets Used for the Exercise of the Holy Way of the Cross

1079. ◦ 1. The Bishop of Saint-Flour in France asks whether the Indulgences which are gained in contemplation of the stations of the Way of the Cross cease if the Crosses or tablets are removed for whitewashing the walls, for adorning the same walls with painting, or for another cause, although afterward both the Crosses and the tablets are restored to their places?

2. What if not all but only some are removed for the aforesaid causes? What if all the Crosses with the tablets are removed for about a month, as very often happens for whitewashing the walls?

3. What if, in the first erection, the Crosses and tablets adhere to one another in such a way that no symmetrical order exists? Can they be moved from place to place within the bounds of the same Church so that they are equally distant, without the Indulgences being lost; and in what cases is a new canonical erection required?

From the Secretariat of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, on 21 March 1836, the response to the proposed doubts is:

To 1: They do not lose the Indulgences.

To 2: They enjoy the Indulgences, notwithstanding, etc.

To 3: Affirmatively; and the Indulgences do not cease unless the material perishes.

Concerning the Requirements for Gaining Indulgences for the Exercise of the Way of the Cross 1080. ○ QUESTION. For gaining the Indulgences granted for the visitation of the fourteen stations of the Way of the Cross, is the recitation of six Paters, Aves, and Glorias required in addition to the visitation of the aforesaid stations?

RESPONSE. For obtaining the Indulgences granted for the visitation of the fourteen stations of the Way of the Cross, nothing else is required than to pass from one station to another while meditating upon the Passion of the divine Redeemer Jesus Christ, insofar as the multitude of persons visiting the aforesaid stations, or the capacity of the place in which they are erected, permits. The matter is thus evident from the Bull Inter plurima of Benedict XIII, 3 March 1726, confirmed by another Bull, Exponi nobis, of Clement XII, dated 16 January 1731, and by a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences dated 3 April 1731, and also by the Brief of Benedict XIV which begins Cum tanta, dated 30 August 1741. Hence it is that We adore Thee, O Christ; Our Father; Hail Mary, etc.; and Have mercy upon us, O Lord, are only a praiseworthy custom introduced by pious faithful of Christ into the exercise of visiting the stations of the Way of the Cross. In testimony whereof, etc. 22 September 1829.

Response — Of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences Concerning Various Indulgences

1081. ○ QUESTION 1. Does a Priest satisfy the obligation of celebrating Mass for a deceased person by observing the rite of the feria or of any Saint, even if it is not semidouble or double?

QUESTION 2. Must one who has a personal privilege for four Masses in each week celebrate in vestments of black color on days not impeded, so that he can gain a plenary Indulgence for the souls of the deceased?

QUESTION 3. Must one who celebrates at an altar privileged for every day always use black vestments on days not impeded in order to obtain the Indulgence of the privilege?

QUESTION 4. For gaining the plenary Indulgence granted to the prayer, O good and most loving Jesus, is it necessary to add another prayer for the intention of the Supreme Pontiff?

QUESTION 5. For Indulgences applicable to Crosses, Rosaries, etc., is any rite necessary besides the sign of the Cross made by the Priest who has received this faculty?

QUESTION 6. Does the granted Indulgence adhere only to the figure of Christ made of bronze, wood, or any other material, such that it can be transferred from one Cross to another without danger of losing the Indulgence conferred upon it?

The Sacred Congregation appointed over Indulgences and Sacred Relics judged that the responses to the foregoing Doubts should be as follows, 11 April 1840:

To 1: Affirmatively.

To 2: Affirmatively.

To 3: As in the second.

To 4: Negatively. Nevertheless, afterward Pius IX, by a Decree issued on 31 July 1858, declared that some prayers must be recited for the intention of the Church in order to gain the Indulgence granted to the prayer O good and most loving Jesus.

To 5: Negatively. Nevertheless, according to a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation on 11 April 1864, a formula and sprinkling with blessed water are required for blessing chaplets of St. Dominic and of the Seven Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

To 6: Affirmatively.

Indult of His Holiness Pope Gregory XVI

1082. ○ By which the members of the Confraternity of St. Mary of Mount Carmel are henceforth exempted from the inscription of their names in the registers of the aforesaid Confraternity so that they may be able to gain its Indulgences. At the petition of the Reverend Father General of the Discalced Carmelites, from an audience of His Holiness on 30 April 1832, Our Most Holy Lord Pope Gregory XVI, in view of the particular circumstances and with prior sanation as to the past, benignly assented to all things according to the petition, those things nevertheless which are customarily to be observed in other respects being observed according to the form of the preceding grants, anything whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding. The present grant is to remain in force in perpetuity without any issuance of a Brief.

Questions Concerning Indulgences

1083. ○ 1. For gaining the Indulgence or fruits of the prayer Sacrosanctae, etc., must this prayer necessarily be said on bended knees, or, at least in a case of legitimate impediment, can it be recited while walking or sitting?

2. Must small habits or scapulars necessarily be worn immediately upon the body so that they physically touch it, or can they be retained over the clothing?

3. Do the Indulgences attached by Pius V of holy memory to the recitation of the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary avail for the Roman Office alone, or for the various Offices of the Blessed Virgin Mary composed by episcopal authority after the pattern of the Roman Office?

4. Does one who recites the hymn Veni Creator, etc., not according to the correction of the meter but according to the former meter, gain the Indulgences? Is the variation of the doxology of the hymn Veni Creator within and outside Paschal time of the essence of the work for gaining the Indulgences?

In France, the hymn Veni Creator has a doxology proposed by episcopal authority; can those who recite the aforesaid hymn with that doxology make its Indulgences their own?

5. The antiphon Regina caeli, which is customarily said during Paschal time in place of the prayers Angelus Domini, is recited in some places with versicles and responses different from those given in the Roman Breviary; does the recitation of the aforesaid antiphon with this change give an equal right to the Indulgences?

These Doubts having been maturely considered by the Most Eminent Fathers appointed over sacred Indulgences in a general Congregation held at the Vatican on 5 March 1855, and the vote of the Consultors having been heard, on 16 July 1855 they were of the opinion that the rescript should be:

Question	First part	Second part
To the first	Affirmative	Negative
To the second	Negative	Affirmative
To the third	Affirmative	Negative
To the fourth	Negative in all respects	-
To the fifth	Negative	-

Concerning Chaplets Made in the Form of Rings

1084. ○ To the question: Can gold or silver rings surrounded by ten knobs, which certain pious persons use for reciting the Rosary of the Blessed Virgin, be blessed with the Indulgences attached?

The Most Eminent Cardinal Castracane, Major Penitentiary, replied by mandate of His Holiness Gregory XVI: Negatively.

Concerning the Intervention of the Ordinary with Respect to Indulgences Granted by the Apostolic See 1085. ○ QUESTION 1. Are local Indulgences, that is, those which are attached to a certain place, for example, to a Church or altar, null and of no value, so that the faithful would strive in vain to gain them as long as the Bishop of that place has not permitted them to be published?

Reply. Negatively as to the nullity of the Indulgences. Nevertheless, the publication of the Ordinary must be awaited after he has reviewed them, so that the faithful may know whether the Indulgences are plenary or partial and what conditions are assigned for acquiring them.

QUESTION 2. Are personal Indulgences, privileges, and faculties, that is, those granted to some private person, for example, an Indulgence granted to someone for the point of death, a personal Indult of a privileged altar, or the faculty of blessing chaplets of the Blessed Virgin Mary with the application of Indulgences, likewise null and of no value as long as the Bishop has not reviewed them and permitted them to be put into effect?

Reply. Negatively.

1086. ○ QUESTION 3. Are Indulgences which the Supreme Pontiffs have granted to all the faithful of the whole world in Bulls or Rescripts already published and cited by most approved authors null and of no value, so that the faithful cannot gain them unless they have first been promulgated by the Ordinaries of the places in their respective Dioceses?

Reply. Negatively.

QUESTION 4. Supposing the necessity of that promulgation, can any Bishop promulgate in his Diocese those Indulgences concerning which the third Doubt treats, provided he finds them related by authors worthy of faith, for example, Ferraris or La Raccolta?

Reply. Affirmatively from the things explained above, and in the case concerning which the said Doubt treats. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 31 August 1844, for all these questions.

1087. ○ QUESTION 5. Must one who obtains various faculties from the Apostolic See, namely, of a personal privileged altar, of erecting stations of the Way of the Cross, or of blessing Crosses and Medals, exhibit the said faculties to the Ordinary, even if no mention was made of this in the Rescripts of the grants?

Reply. Affirmatively as to the erection of the Way of the Cross; negatively with respect to the other faculties, unless it is otherwise provided in the grants obtained. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 6 February 1844.

Concerning the Indulgence at the Point of Death

1088. ○ QUESTION 1. Does the recitation of the confession, that is, the Confiteor, made in the Sacrament of Penance suffice for the prescribed recitation of it when the blessing with an Indulgence at the point of death is to be imparted?

Reply. Negatively, according to the practice and Rubrics, unless necessity urges.

QUESTION 2. Is it necessary to recite the Confiteor three times when sacred Viaticum and Extreme Unction are administered and the Indulgence at the point of death is imparted?

Reply. Affirmatively, according to the practice and Rubrics.

QUESTION 3. Can a sick person gain the plenary Indulgence at the point of death several times from several Priests having the faculty of imparting it?

Reply. Negatively, in the same point of death.

QUESTION 4. Does a Priest validly confer the plenary Indulgence at the point of death if, because a book is lacking, he omits the formula prescribed by the Supreme Pontiff?

Reply. Negatively, because the formula is not merely directive but preceptive. 5 February 1841.

Concerning the Privileged Altar

1089. ○ QUESTION 1. What is the efficacy of a privileged altar?

Reply. By the Indulgence attached to a privileged altar, if the intention of the grantor and the use of the power of the keys are considered, there is to be understood a plenary Indulgence which immediately frees a soul from all the punishments of Purgatory; but if the effect of the application is considered, there is to be understood an Indulgence whose measure corresponds to the good pleasure and acceptance of divine mercy. Sacred Congregation, 28 July 1840.

QUESTION 2. Must one who celebrates at an altar privileged for every day always use black vestments on days not impeded in order to obtain the Indulgence of the privilege?

Reply. Affirmatively. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 11 April 1840. But one who celebrates for a deceased person gains the Indulgence of the privileged altar even though he reads the Mass of the occurring feast when the day is impeded. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 11 March 1851.

The privilege inheres in the altar, not in the stone, which can be substituted for another as necessity or convenience may require (Sacred Congregation, 20 March 1839); thus, if the altar is demolished, the privilege does not perish, but revives when the altar is rebuilt under the same title. Indeed, the privilege does not perish if the altar is erected under the same title but in a different place in the Church. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 30 August 1847.

Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences Concerning a Privileged Altar

1090. ○ Angers. In the general sessions of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences held on 29 February 1864, the Bishop of Angers proposed the following Doubts for resolution:

I. Can the privilege of a privileged altar, whether real or personal, be applied to the souls of several deceased persons in the Mass of any day?

II. Can the Apostolic faculty granted to the Ordinary of Angers, that in all the parish Churches of the Diocese of Angers Masses of Requiem be celebrated with chant three times in each week when Offices of double rite occur, only certain ones being excepted, be freely put into practice; or must the Masses of Requiem be deferred to other days of the week on which a semidouble rite occurs? III. Can a Priest enjoying the personal privilege of an altar celebrate and gain the Indulgences in a week when a double feast recurs, or must he await semidouble feasts in order to gain them?

The Sacred Congregation judged that the response should be as follows, 20 August 1864:

To 1: Negatively.

To 2: Affirmatively, insofar as semidouble feasts do not occur in the week.

To 3: As to the second.

Concerning the Indulgence of the Portiuncula

1091. ○ It is asked: Do those visiting Churches of the Order of St. Francis on the second day of August gain a plenary Indulgence toties quoties, as often as they enter them and pray there for a short time; and is it required that Communion be received in the same Church?

The Sacred Congregation replied on 22 February 1847: Affirmatively to the first part; negatively to the second part.

Second Appendix — Responses of the Sacred Penitentiary Prescribing the Norm for Absolving Those Who Have Incurred a Censure Both for the Invasion of the Pontifical Territory and for the Usurpation of Ecclesiastical Goods

1092. ○ Since Confessors need a special faculty to absolve these persons, it must be sought either from the Sacred Penitentiary or from the Ordinaries, to whom most ample faculties for this purpose were granted by Apostolic Letters of 11 April 1869. The norm to be observed in the use of these faculties is sufficiently evident from the following Responses or Declarations of the Sacred Penitentiary given on 1 June 1869.

1093. ○ QUESTION 1. By force of the faculties granted through the Apostolic Letters of 11 April, can Confessors approved by the Ordinaries absolve those who carried into effect the invasion or rebellion of the territories of the Holy See, and those who commanded, adhered to, and cooperated with them; and also those who promoted unjust laws or contributed their labor to their execution?

Reply. Affirmatively, provided the penitents exhibit signs of true repentance, have repaired the scandal, or at least are prepared to repair it as soon as possible in the best manner they can, and have sincerely promised obedience to the Holy See and to its commands to be issued concerning the matter. Public officials, however, whose office appears to involve some cooperation in acts condemned by the Holy See, or to be opposed to divine and ecclesiastical laws, are not to be absolved unless they have first resigned the office; and insofar as they cannot resign it, the officials themselves are to consult the Ordinary of the place, who is to decide and provide according to the Letters of the Sacred Penitentiary of 26 July 1867, which Letters must be followed in every respect.

1094. ○ QUESTION 2. Can those Clerics who composed petitions concerning the abdication of the temporal Dominion of the Holy See, or subscribed to them, be absolved by Confessors, and how?

Reply. Affirmatively, after a retraction has first been made and sufficiently published according to the Letters of the Sacred Penitentiary of 28 May 1863.

1095. ○ QUESTION 3. Can violators of personal and local Ecclesiastical immunity and of enclosure be absolved by Confessors?

Reply. Affirmatively, after satisfaction has been made to the injured party and the injury done to the Church has been repaired in the best manner possible.

1096. ○ QUESTION 4. Can those who acquired or possess immovable ecclesiastical goods sold by the treasury, commonly called the State Domain, be absolved, and how?

Reply. Penitents who retain goods of this kind are not to be absolved unless they first deliver to the Ordinary of the place, or to other ecclesiastical men designated throughout the Diocese by the Ordinary himself according to his prudence, a written instrument signed by them, or subscribed before witnesses, to be transmitted as soon as possible to that same Ordinary and carefully preserved in the Diocesan Chancery or elsewhere, by which they declare that they subject themselves and their heirs and successors to the following obligations or conditions:

1. To retain those same goods at the will of the Church and thereafter to obey its commands.

2. To preserve the goods themselves and to administer them profitably.

3. To fulfill the pious works attached to those goods.

4. To assist, from the fruits of those goods, the Persons or Pious Places to which they belong by right [4].

[4] In other rescripts it reads: And to expend the revenues of those goods which, after a proportion has been made, exceed the price paid, either in favor of the persons or Pious Places to which the said goods belong by right, or in satisfaction of the price paid in the purchase, insofar as the purchaser may wish to seek its recovery and with the consent of the Ordinary.

The conditions prescribed in this entire paragraph for those who retain goods purchased without permission are customarily prescribed likewise for those who purchased goods of this kind with permission. But today this faculty is not granted so easily unless extraordinary circumstances are present and with the recommendation of the Ordinary. To obtain this faculty, recourse is made to the Sacred Penitentiary, which, for this grant, sends it to the Ordinary of the Diocese; he imparts this faculty under the aforesaid conditions, which are to be accepted and subscribed by the same persons and carefully preserved in the episcopal Chancery.

5. To admonish their heirs and successors, by a signed written instrument, concerning obligations of this kind, so that they too may know to what they are bound.

1097. ◦ QUESTION 5. Can those who acquired immovable ecclesiastical goods and afterward sold them to others, and those who cooperated in contracts concerning those same goods, be absolved, and under what conditions?

Reply. Affirmatively, after the profit unjustly received from them has been deposited in the hands of the Ordinary so that he may preserve it in favor of the Pious Places which suffered losses; after the scandal has been repaired; after the new purchasers and other accomplices have been admonished to take counsel for their own conscience; and after the obligation has been imposed upon each to abide by the commands of the Holy See to be issued concerning the matter.

1098. ◦ QUESTION 6. Can those who acquired movable ecclesiastical goods be absolved, and what must be enjoined upon them?

Reply. Affirmatively, after some alms have been imposed upon them in favor of the Pious Places to which the said goods belong, insofar as they purchased them at a price which, in the judgment of the Ordinary or Confessor, was less than just. But if the matter concerns things which are not consumed by use, or which can be preserved by being kept, or ecclesiastical furnishings and sacred vessels, the obligation is to be imposed upon the Penitents of having recourse as soon as possible to the Ordinary of the place, so that he may provide concerning those same things according to the Indult already granted to the Ordinary himself by the Sacred Penitentiary [5].

[5] The Sacred Penitentiary is accustomed, namely, to grant Bishops the faculty: 1. of permitting those who have recourse to them lawfully to acquire provisions, fruits of the earth, and movable things belonging to Churches or Pious Places and usurped by the Government, after scandal has prudently been removed and some alms have been expended, especially in favor of the Churches or persons to whom the things themselves belonged, to be assessed by the Ordinary or by the Confessor, insofar as they purchased them at a price which, in the judgment of that Ordinary or Confessor, was less than just; 2. of providing under the same conditions, and after their absolution with a suitable salutary penance, for those who have already purchased those same things.

But if the matter concerns things which are not consumed by use, the purchasers are to be bound to deliver a list of them to the Ordinary, and to be prepared to restore them whenever required to the Churches or Pious Places upon receipt of the price paid, and to take care according to their ability that ecclesiastical furnishings, vessels, and sacred utensils be transferred to the uses of other Churches or Oratories and not appropriated to profane uses. The case in which the things purchased exceed the value of five hundred scudi is excepted.

1099. ○ QUESTION 7. Can those who leased ecclesiastical goods unjustly occupied or sold by the treasury, commonly called the State Domain, be absolved, and how?

Reply. Affirmatively, after the obligation has been imposed upon the Penitents of having recourse as soon as possible to the Ordinary of the place, so that he may provide concerning the goods leased according to the Indult likewise already granted to the Ordinary himself by the Sacred Penitentiary [6].

[6] The Sacred Penitentiary is accustomed to grant the Ordinaries of places the faculty of permitting the faithful to lease, or to retain already leased, ecclesiastical goods occupied by the Government, after some alms have been imposed upon them in favor of the persons or Churches to whom those same goods belong by right, insofar as they leased them at a price which, in the judgment of the Ordinary or Confessor, was less than just; and with the obligation of doing as much as they can under the direction of the Ordinary for the preservation especially of sacred edifices and churches which were attached to those goods; and after prior absolution with a salutary penance, insofar as they leased them illicitly, and after the scandal has been removed and repaired.

Although it is most desirable that leases of this kind be made for a short time, nevertheless, the Sacred Penitentiary declares that it is no obstacle if, because the Government so commands, the lease is made for more than three years, since a contract of lease of this kind is null by the law itself, and the Apostolic Indult is granted to the lessee only for the peace of his conscience and is entirely revocable at the will of the Holy See.

1100. ○ QUESTION 8. Can those who received ecclesiastical goods in emphyteusis from the Government be absolved, and how?

Reply. Penitents of this kind are not to be absolved unless they first deliver to the Ordinary of the place, or to other ecclesiastical men designated by the Ordinary as above in Doubt 4, a written instrument by which they declare that they subject themselves and their heirs and successors to the following obligations or conditions:

1. To preserve those same goods and to administer them profitably.

2. Not to use any privilege or law, whether enacted or to be enacted, concerning redemption from the rent.

3. To retain the goods themselves at the will of the Church and thereafter to obey its commands concerning the restitution of those goods.

4. To fulfill the pious burdens attached to those goods, insofar as they are not fulfilled from elsewhere.

5. In the meantime to pay the annual rent, and to increase it according to the paths of justice and according to the valuation of experts of a timorous conscience, if one too small was imposed in the stipulation of the contract.

6. To admonish their heirs and successors concerning obligations of this kind by a written instrument, so that they too may know to what they are bound.

1101. ◦ QUESTION 9. Can those who not only received ecclesiastical goods in emphyteusis from the Government but also redeemed them from payment of the rent be absolved, and how?

Reply. Provision is to be made for Penitents of this kind as in the preceding response to Doubt 4.

1102. ◦ QUESTION 10. Can those who redeemed Censuses and ecclesiastical rights redeemable of themselves be absolved, and how?

Reply. Affirmatively, provided they first pay into the hands of the Ordinary whatever amount short of the capital sum they paid to the Government, so that he may preserve it in favor of the Pious Places to which the censuses or redeemed rights belonged.

1103. ◦ QUESTION 11. Can those who redeemed rents, ground-rents, payments, or other ecclesiastical rights not redeemable of themselves be absolved, and how?

Reply. They can be absolved, provided they first deliver a written instrument, as in the response to Doubt 4, by which they declare that they subject themselves and their successors to the following obligations and conditions:

1. To retain the estates thus invalidly enfranchised at the will of the Church and thereafter to obey its commands.

2. To preserve those same estates and to administer them profitably.

3. To preserve the Pious Places unharmed at any time concerning the complete receipt of the rent, ground-rent, and payment and concerning any other rights which belonged to those Pious Places; and also to fulfill according to law the pious burdens attached to the estates, insofar as they are not fulfilled from elsewhere.

4. To admonish their heirs and successors concerning obligations of this kind by a signed written instrument, so that they too may know to what they are bound.

1104. ◦ Moreover, we read the faculties granted for absolving those who incurred censures in the foregoing matters as follows: The Sacred Penitentiary, by special and express Apostolic authority, the circumstances set forth having been considered, grants to all Venerable Fathers in Christ, Archbishops, Bishops, and other Ordinaries of places in Italy the following... faculties, which they may lawfully use for the flock committed to them, either by themselves or through suitable ecclesiastical Persons specially deputed for this purpose.

To absolve by Apostolic Authority from Censures and ecclesiastical Penalties each and every penitent who voted for laws concerning the usurpation of goods and other rights belonging to the Church and to Pious Places and the suppression of Regular Orders, or adhered to the same laws, or cooperated in their promulgation or execution; provided, however, that they have first exhibited signs of true repentance and have retracted an illicit oath, insofar as they made one; a suitable salutary penance being enjoined upon each according to the measure of his faults, together with reparation of the scandal given in the best manner possible and the imposition of the other things to be enjoined by law.

Public Officials, however, who were newly created or assumed for executing the said laws, or who, through the exercise of an office which they previously held, culpably cooperate, according to the rules handed down by approved Authors concerning theft and rapine, with the aforesaid laws or usurpations, or with their maintenance or consummation, are not to be absolved unless the obligation of resigning the Office has been imposed upon them. But the remaining Officials, whose office in the judgment of prudent men does not appear to involve culpable cooperation of this kind, insofar as they cannot resign it without grave detriment to themselves or their own family, may be tolerated, but under the condition that they abstain altogether from praising, approving, counseling, or promoting the said usurpations; indeed, that according to their abilities they take care to delay and mitigate them in favor of the Church and ecclesiastical Persons, directing themselves by the counsel of a pious and learned Confessor. 26 June 1867.

1105. ◦ But with respect to Patrons of Benefices, by grant of the Sacred Penitentiary of 23 January 1868, Bishops have the faculty of permitting the Patrons to pay to the Government what is demanded from them for the said Benefices and, with scandal removed, to obtain those same goods according to the norm of the law, under the following conditions:

1. To retain those goods at the will of the Church and thereafter to obey its commands;

2. To preserve those goods and to administer them profitably;

3. To expend the fruits in equitable satisfaction of the sum paid to the Government by the patrons, if they wish it to be recovered, and in the restoration of those same Benefices. So that this restoration may be obtained more easily, the Sacred Penitentiary grants by Apostolic Authority the appropriate faculties, so that for a time the Ordinary may suspend the nomination and provision of the said vacant Benefices, and, as it shall seem to him after all things have been considered, may reduce for a time, or even suspend altogether, the pious burdens attached to them. Yet in such a way that, if Mass obligations are in question, some number of Masses to be celebrated annually is imposed upon the patrons, the remainder being supplied from the treasury of the Church. But when the restoration has been made, the patrons are to present someone to whom the totality of the fruits, with all the burdens according to the foundation, may pass;

4. To inform their heirs and successors concerning an obligation of this kind by a written instrument, so that they too may know to what they are bound.

1106. ◦ The faculties granted to Ordinaries for absolving, either by themselves or through suitable ecclesiastical persons, those who incurred censures because of the invasion of or rebellion against the Pontifical Territory are as follows:

1. To absolve by Apostolic Authority from censures and ecclesiastical penalties each and every penitent who cooperated in the rebellion of the Pontifical Territory, or adhered to it, or in any way offered their labor or favor, or voted for the union of Italy under one king, or violated ecclesiastical immunity; provided, however, that they have first exhibited signs of true repentance, have repaired the scandal given in the best manner they can according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary or Confessor, and have promised under oath obedience to the Holy See and to its commands to be issued concerning the matter; a suitable salutary penance being enjoined upon each according to the measure of his faults, together with the other things to be enjoined by law. Excepted, however, are the leaders, chiefs, and instigators of the rebellions and public officials, and also those who violated ecclesiastical immunity by laying hands upon Cardinals, Bishops, or other ecclesiastics constituted in dignity; for all of these recourse must be had in individual cases to the Sacred Penitentiary.

2. To absolve under the aforesaid conditions and exceptions Ecclesiastics, if any were culpable in the foregoing matters, but only after they have entered some religious house and there devoted themselves to spiritual exercises for at least a month; and mercifully to dispense with them by Apostolic Authority concerning an irregularity contracted in any manner from violation of the said censures; a suitable salutary penance being enjoined upon each, together with the things to be enjoined by law; the persons excepted in no. 1, however, always being excepted.

3. Likewise to absolve, under the conditions expressed in no. 1, from censures and ecclesiastical penalties, soldiers who took up arms and fought against the Pontifical Territory, provided, however, that they are prepared in mind to desert the unjust military service as soon as they can without danger to life, and meanwhile to abstain from all acts of hostility against the subjects and soldiers of the legitimate Prince and from acts against ecclesiastical goods, rights, and Persons; a suitable salutary penance being likewise enjoined upon each according to the measure of his faults, together with the obligation of repairing damages according to law if they inflicted any upon a certain person by their own private action, and the other things to be enjoined by law. Excepted, however, are the commanders and officers who could have withdrawn and deserted the military service without danger to life or of another most grave penalty, and, as above, those who violated Ecclesiastical Immunity by laying hands upon Cardinals, Bishops, or other Ecclesiastics constituted in Dignity; for all of these recourse must be had in individual cases to the Sacred Penitentiary.

Response of the Holy Office of the Holy Inquisition Concerning Fasting

1107. ○ A Doubt was proposed by the Bishop of Bayonne: Does the obligation not to mix fish with meat on days of Lent extend to all who by force of an Indult can eat meat, or only to those who fast?

On 23 June 1875, in the General Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition held before the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Cardinals, General Inquisitors, the above-written Doubt having been proposed and the vote of the Lord Consultors having first been received, the same Most Eminent and Most Reverend Fathers commanded that the rescript be: Affirmatively as to the first part; negatively as to the second part; and that the Decree of 24 March 1841 be given, namely, to the Doubt: Does the law against mixing permitted and forbidden foods also regard those who are not bound to a single meal, such as youths before they have completed their third septennium, and others reasonably excused from it because of incapacity or labor? The Most Eminent Fathers decreed: It is not lawful [7].

[7] Namely, that those also who are in any way exempted from the law of fasting which prescribes a single meal are forbidden to eat meat with fish at the same repast. The reason is by no means obscure. For the eating of meat on fast days is granted under this express condition: that whoever wishes to use this Indult not mix meat with fish at the same repast. But even those who for a just cause are excused from observing a single meal can eat meat only by force of the Indult. Therefore, they too are bound to observe that condition.

Section III. On the wearing of the habit and tonsure. 33

Section IV. On the recitation of the canonical Hours or the divine Office. 36

Point I. On the obligation of reciting. 37

V. With respect to the duties of Canons while the see is vacant. 74

Appendix I. On the privileges of Clerics. ibid.

I. On the privileges of Clerics in common. ibid.

II. On the privileges of Bishops. 75

Article II. On the ceremonies of Baptism. 164

Appendix. On the Caesarean operation. 165

Chapter II. On the matter of the Sacrament of Penance. 288

Chapter III. On the form of the Sacrament of Penance.

Appendix. On the conditional form. 302

Article II. On the purpose of amendment. 342

Chapter II. On confession. 358

Article I. On the necessity of confession. 359

Article II. On the qualities of confession. 360

Section I. On the necessity of integrity. 362

Point I. On the necessity of integrity in general. ibid.

Point II. On doubtful sins. 366

Point III. On the circumstances of sins. 371

Point IV. On forgotten sins. 379

Section II. On causes excusing from integrity. 380

Point I. On causes excusing from integrity in general. ibid.

Point II. On the confession and absolution of the dying. 389

Appendix I. On the examination of conscience. 392

Article III. On the repetition of confession. 395

Appendix II. On general confession. 402

I. On the necessity or advisability of general confession. ibid.

II. On the manner of making a general confession. 404

Appendix III. A norm for conducting a general confession by means of questions. 406

Chapter III. On satisfaction. 408

Article I. On the imposition of penance. ibid.

Article II. On the fulfillment of penance. 414

Appendix. On penances more usefully imposed. 420

Article III. On reserved cases. 469

Section I. On the reservation of cases, or on the principle and nature of reservation. ibid.

Section II. On the absolution of reserved cases. 515

Appendix I. On the absolution of one's own accomplice in a shameful sin. 537

Appendix II. On solicitation in confession. 543

Chapter II. On the office of the Minister: 1. in confession; 2. after confession. 559

Article I. On the office of the Minister in confession. ibid.

Section I. On the duties of the Confessor. ibid.

Point I. On the office of a Father. 560

Point II. On the office of a Physician. 562

Point III. On the office of a Teacher. 564

Section I. On the knowledge of the Confessor. 565

Section II. On the obligation of instructing penitents. 569

Point IV. On the office of a Judge. 572

Section I. On instructing the cause, or on the obligation of questioning penitents. ibid.

Section II. On rendering sentence, or on granting, deferring, or denying absolution. 575

Section II. On the manner of acting with various kinds of penitents. 592

Point I. On those who are situated in an occasion of sin. 593

Point II. On habitual sinners and recidivists. 601

Point III. On pious penitents. 622

Article II. On the office of the Minister after confession. 623

Article III. On the dissolution of betrothals. 691

Chapter II. On the proclamation of banns. 708

Article I. On the necessity of banns. ibid.

Article II. On the circumstances of banns. 710

I. The circumstance of time. ibid.

II. The circumstance of place. 711

III. The circumstance of persons, namely, minors, soldiers, vagrants, and servants. 712

Article III. On dispensation from banns. ibid.

Article IV. On the revelation of impediments. 714

Chapter III. On the nature and properties of matrimony. 715

Article I. On the nature of matrimony. ibid.

Article II. On the properties of matrimony, namely, on its unity and firmness. 727

Section I. On the unity of matrimony. ibid.

Section II. On the firmness of matrimony. ibid.

Point I. On the firmness of matrimony with respect to the bond. 728

Point II. On the firmness of matrimony insofar as it regards the bed, and on divorce from the bed. 737

Chapter IV. On the matter and form of matrimony. 745

Chapter V. On the Minister and subject of matrimony. 746

Article I. On the Minister. ibid.

Article II. On the subject of matrimony. 749

Chapter VI. On the impediments to matrimony. 751

Article I. On impediments impeding matrimony. ibid.

I. The prohibition of the Church. 759

II. Time. 761

III. Betrothals. 762

IV. A vow. ibid.

Article II. On diriment impediments. 764

Chapter I. On censures in general. 922

Article I. On the nature, division, and conditions of censures. 922

I. On the nature of a censure. 922

II. Division of censures. 923

III. Conditions of censures. 924

Chapter I. On irregularities in general. 1036

Chapter II. On irregularities in particular. 1038

Article I. On irregularities from defect. ibid.

I. From defect of mind. ibid.

II. From defect of body. 1039

III. From defect of birth. 1040

IV. From defect of age. ibid.

V. From defect of freedom. ibid.

VI. From defect of Sacrament. 1041

VII. From defect of lenity. ibid.

VIII. From defect of reputation. 1042

Article II. On irregularities from delict. ibid.

I. Repetition and improper reception of Baptism. 1043

Conditions required for the Jubilee. 1059

More recent decisions of the Roman Curia concerning Indulgences. 1066

Another Appendix: Responses of the Sacred Penitentiary, by which a norm is prescribed for absolving those who have incurred a censure both because of the invasion of Pontifical Territory and because of the usurpation of ecclesiastical goods. 1072

Third Appendix. 1079

Fourth Appendix. ibid.

Therefore, the Sacred Congregation did not wish to disapprove that Decree; but it gave the aforesaid Response to the twofold doubt proposed by the same Bishop, whether, those inconveniences having been removed, both those entrusting and those accepting Masses to be celebrated as above would act illicitly.

Third Appendix — Note of the Editor to No. 819, Note (d), Volume II of Father Gury

The conclusion which Father Ballerini hands down in this note against the opinion of Father Gury was determined by Our Most Holy Lord Leo XIII on 17 March 1879.

The Sacred Congregation of the Council had been asked: Does the act commonly called civil marriage produce the impediment of public propriety? On 13 March 1879, the Sacred Congregation replied: Negatively; and the Most Holy Father was to be consulted so that he might deign to declare and establish it. The Most Holy Father thus established and decreed: ...Our Most Holy Lord Pope Leo XIII, having heard the entire relation of the matter in an audience on the seventeenth day of the same month and acceding to the vote of the Sacred Congregation, by the present decree declares and establishes that the aforementioned act, commonly called Civil Marriage, in places where the decree of the Council of Trent, session XXIV, chapter 1, On the Reformation of Marriage, has been promulgated, whether the faithful performing the act itself intend, as is fitting after ecclesiastical marriage has already been duly celebrated or with the intention of celebrating it as soon as possible, to perform a merely civil ceremony; or intend to enter betrothals concerning a future marriage; or finally, from ignorance or in contempt of ecclesiastical laws, intend to contract a present marriage, does not produce the impediment of the justice of public propriety....

Fourth Appendix — Note of the Editor to No. 867, Note (b. 39), Volume II of Father Gury

Since Father Ballerini in this note presents the history of the controversy concerning the question whether incestuous intercourse had between the petitioners must necessarily be expressed in a petition for a dispensation concerning any prohibited degrees whatsoever, and there teaches the reader how great is the weight of Declarations of the Sacred Congregations, from the responses which exist concerning the same question we transcribe here one which was given after the death of Father Ballerini and confirms certain preceding ones.

Wednesday, 1 February 1882

I. In the General Congregation of the Holy Roman and Universal Inquisition held before the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lords Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, General Inquisitors in matters of faith, the following doubt was proposed: For the validity of dispensations which are granted concerning any prohibited degrees whatsoever of consanguinity, affinity, spiritual and legal relationship, and also public propriety, whether directly by the Apostolic See or by Pontifical Delegation, is it necessary to express incestuous intercourse had by the spouses before the obtaining or execution of the aforesaid dispensations, and also to express the design and intention with which they entered upon intercourse in order to obtain a dispensation more easily?

The same Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lords, the vote of the Lord Consultors having first been received, decreed that the response should be: The Decrees of the Holy Office, Wednesday, 8 August 1866, and of the Sacred Penitentiary, 20 July 1869, are to be followed, namely:

Wednesday, 8 August 1866

II. The Most Eminent Fathers decreed that dispensations which are granted concerning any prohibited degrees whatsoever of consanguinity, affinity, spiritual and legal relationship, and also public propriety, whether directly by the Apostolic See or by Pontifical Delegation, are surreptitious and valid nowhere and in no manner if, before the execution of those dispensations, whether before or after obtaining them, the spouses perpetrated the guilt of incest and, whether questioned or even not questioned, maliciously or even ignorantly concealed the incestuous intercourse entered upon between them, whether it was publicly known or occult, and concealed the design and intention with which they entered upon that intercourse in order to obtain the dispensation more easily. It suffices, however, that one of the spouses disclose this offense of his or the aforesaid wicked intention. This indeed is not only commonly handed down by approved authors but is also confirmed by the Supreme Pontiff Benedict XIV in the Constitution which begins Pastor bonus.

The Sacred Penitentiary replied on 20 July 1869:

After the Constitution Pastor bonus of Benedict XIV, there can no longer be any doubt about the nullity of a dispensation obtained when incestuous intercourse was concealed, or when the depraved intention of obtaining the dispensation more easily was entertained in perpetrating it.

INDEX OF VOLUME II (AS PRINTED)

INDEX OF VOLUME II OF THE COMPENDIUM OF MORAL THEOLOGY
TREATISE ON PARTICULAR ACTS
PART FIRST. - On the State of Laymen. 1
Chapter I. On the obligations of judges. 1
Appendix I. On jurors. 8
Appendix II. On arbiters. 9
Chapter II. On the obligations of the advocate and the procurator. 9
Chapter III. On the obligations of an apparitor. 13
Chapter IV. On the obligations of scribes and notaries. 15
I. On scribes or secretaries. 15
II. On notaries. 16
Chapter V. On the obligations of an accuser and of an accused. 18
I. On the accuser. 18
II. On the accused. 18
Chapter VI. On the obligation of witnesses. 20
Chapter VII. On the obligations of physicians, surgeons, and pharmacists. 23
Chapter VIII. On the obligations of guards. 25
Chapter IX. On the state of craftsmen and workmen. 26
PART SECOND. - On the State of Clerics. 28
Chapter I. On the common obligations of Clerics, both positive and negative. 28
Article I. On the positive obligations of Clerics. 28
Section I. On holiness of life. 28
Section II. On celibacy. 29
Section III. On the wearing of the habit and tonsure. 33
Section IV. On the recitation of the canonical Hours or the divine Office. 36
Point I. On the obligation of reciting. 37
Point II. On the time and the place or position due for reciting the Hours. 42
I. With respect to time. 42
II. With respect to place and position. 48
Point III. On the manner of reciting the Hours. 50
I. With respect to order. 50
II. With respect to pronunciation. 53
III. With respect to attention and devotion. 56
Point IV. On causes excusing from the recitation of the Hours. 58
Article II. On the negative obligations of Clerics, or on those things which are prohibited to Clerics. 63
Section I. On dwelling with women. 63
Section II. On games of chance. 64
Section III. On the carrying of arms and hunting. 65
Section IV. On commercial dealing. 65
Chapter II. On the particular obligations of Clerics. 66
Article I. On the obligations of Bishops. 66
Article II. On the obligations of Pastors. 68
Article III. On the obligations of Canons. 71
I. With respect to residence. 71
II. With respect to the Office of choir. 72
III. With respect to the conventual Mass. 73
IV. With respect to assisting the Bishop, etc. 73
V. With respect to the duties of Canons while the see is vacant. 74
Appendix I. On the privileges of Clerics. 74
I. On the privileges of Clerics in common. 74
II. On the privileges of Bishops. 75
Appendix II. On the benefices of Clerics. 82
I. On the nature of benefices. 82
II. On the acquisition of benefices. 83
III. On the loss of benefices. 84
PART THIRD. - On the Religious State. 85
Chapter I. On the nature of the religious state. 86
Chapter II. On religious vocation. 92
Chapter III. On the obligations of Religious by reason of vows. 94
Article I. On the vow of poverty. 94
Article II. On the vow of chastity. 106
Article III. On the vow of obedience. 108
Chapter IV. On the privileges of Regulars. 111
I. Concerning exemption from episcopal jurisdiction. 111
II. Concerning the Sacrament of Penance. 112
III. Concerning reserved cases. 113
IV. Concerning irregularities and impediments. 116

V. Concerning Mass, Communion, and the last Sacraments. 116
VI. Concerning particular cases. 117
Appendix. On the current state of Regulars in France. 117
TREATISE ON THE SACRAMENTS IN GENERAL
Chapter I. On the definition, number, and division of the Sacraments. 124
Chapter II. On the matter and form of the Sacraments. 128
I. On the nature and union of matter and form. 128
II. On the change of matter and form. 130
III. On the repetition of the Sacraments in doubt concerning the valid application of matter and form. 131
Chapter III. On the Minister of the Sacraments. 132
Article I. On the requisites for the administration of the Sacraments, or on the attention, intention, faith, and probity of the Minister. 132
Section I. On the attention of the Minister. 132
Section II. On the intention of the Minister. 133
Section III. On the faith and probity of the Minister. 136
Article II. On the office of the Minister. 140
Section I. On the obligation of administering the Sacraments. 141
Section II. On the obligation of denying the Sacraments to the unworthy who seek them. 142
Section III. On the manner of conferring the Sacraments. 146
Chapter IV. On the subject of the Sacraments. 147
Article I. On the requisites for the valid reception of the Sacraments. 147
Article II. On the requisites for the licit reception of the Sacraments. 150
TREATISE ON BAPTISM
Chapter I. On the nature, properties, and necessity of Baptism. 153
Chapter II. On the matter and form of Baptism. 154
Article I. On both the remote and proximate matter of Baptism. 154
Section I. On the remote matter of Baptism. 154
Section II. On the proximate matter of Baptism. 155
Article II. On the form of Baptism. 157
Chapter III. On the Minister of Baptism. 158
Chapter IV. On the subject of Baptism. 160
Chapter V. On the accessory solemnities of Baptism, namely, on sponsors and ceremonies. 163
Article I. On sponsors. 163
Article II. On the ceremonies of Baptism. 164
Appendix. On the Caesarean operation. 165
TREATISE ON CONFIRMATION
Chapter I. On the matter and form of Confirmation. 168
Article I. On the matter of Confirmation. 168
Article II. On the form of Confirmation. 170
Chapter II. On the Minister of Confirmation. 171
Chapter III. On the subject of Confirmation. 172
TREATISE ON THE EUCHARIST
PART FIRST. - On the Eucharist as a Sacrament. 175
Chapter I. On the nature and efficacy of the Eucharist. 175
Chapter II. On the matter and form of the Eucharist. 178
Article I. On the matter of the Eucharist. 178
I. On the remote matter. 178
II. On the proximate matter, or on the use of the requisite matter in the consecration itself. 180
Article II. On the form of the Sacrament of the Eucharist. 187
Chapter III. On the Minister of the Eucharist. 190
Article I. On the power of the Minister of the Eucharist. 190
Article II. On the obligation of dispensing the Eucharist. 193
Article III. On the requisites for the licit dispensation of the holy Eucharist. 194
Article IV. On the manner of administering the Eucharist to the sick. 201
Article V. On the manner of reserving the Holy Eucharist. 204
Chapter IV. On the subject of the Eucharist. 208
Article I. On the obligation of receiving the Eucharist. 208
Article II. On the dispositions required in the subject of the Eucharist: 1. with respect to the soul; 2. with respect to the body. 220
Section I. On the dispositions of the soul. 220
Section II. On the dispositions of the body. 222
Point I. On the fast required for Communion. 223

Point II. On bodily decorum. 229
Appendix I. On frequent Communion. 230
Appendix II. On spiritual Communion. 237
PART SECOND. - On the Eucharist as a Sacrifice. 238
Chapter I. On the nature and efficacy of the Sacrifice of the Mass. 238
Chapter II. On the application of the Sacrifice of the Mass. 244
Chapter III. On the obligation of celebrating. 246
Article I. On the obligation of celebrating by reason of the priesthood. 247
Article II. On the obligation of celebrating by reason of office. 248
Article III. On the obligation of celebrating by reason of a stipend. 251
Appendix for Priests of the Society of Jesus. 261
Chapter IV. On the time and place of celebration. 264
Article I. On the time of celebration. 264
Article II. On the place of celebration. 267
Chapter V. On the manner of celebrating. 270
Article I. On the requisites for Mass. 270
Article II. On the Rubrics. 276
TREATISE ON THE SACRAMENT OF PENANCE
PART FIRST. - On the essence of the Sacrament of Penance. 283
Chapter I. On the nature of Penance. 283
Chapter II. On the matter of the Sacrament of Penance. 288
Chapter III. On the form of the Sacrament of Penance.
Appendix. On the conditional form. 302
PART SECOND. - On the subject of the Sacrament of Penance, or on the acts of the penitent. 307
Chapter I. On contrition. 307
Article I. On contrition properly so called. 308
Section I. On the necessity of contrition. 310
Section II. On the qualities of contrition. 326
Section III. On the efficacy of contrition. 339
Article II. On the purpose of amendment. 342
Chapter II. On confession. 358
Article I. On the necessity of confession. 359
Article II. On the qualities of confession. 360
Section I. On the necessity of integrity. 362
Point I. On the necessity of integrity in general. 362
Point II. On doubtful sins. 366
Point III. On the circumstances of sins. 371
Point IV. On forgotten sins. 379
Section II. On causes excusing from integrity. 380
Point I. On causes excusing from integrity in general. 380
Point II. On the confession and absolution of the dying. 389
Appendix I. On the examination of conscience. 392
Article III. On the repetition of confession. 395
Appendix II. On general confession. 402
I. On the necessity or advisability of general confession. 402
II. On the manner of making a general confession. 404
Appendix III. A norm for conducting a general confession by means of questions. 406
Chapter III. On satisfaction. 408
Article I. On the imposition of penance. 408
Article II. On the fulfillment of penance. 414
Appendix. On penances more usefully imposed. 420
I. Works of piety. 420
II. Works of mortification. 421
III. Medicinal penances. 422
PART THIRD. - On the Minister of Penance. 424
Chapter I. On the power of the Minister. 424
Article I. On approbation. 424
Article II. On jurisdiction. 429
Appendix I. On the jurisdiction and approbation of Regulars. 459
Appendix II. On jurisdiction with respect to Nuns. 466
Article III. On reserved cases. 469
Section I. On the reservation of cases, or on the principle and nature of reservation. 469
Section II. On the absolution of reserved cases. 515
Appendix I. On the absolution of one's own accomplice in a shameful sin. 537
Appendix II. On solicitation in confession. 543
Chapter II. On the office of the Minister: 1. in confession; 2. after confession. 559
Article I. On the office of the Minister in confession. 559
Section I. On the duties of the Confessor. 559
Point I. On the office of a Father. 560
Point II. On the office of a Physician. 562
Point III. On the office of a Teacher. 564

Section I. On the knowledge of the Confessor. 565
Section II. On the obligation of instructing penitents. 569
Point IV. On the office of a Judge. 572
Section I. On instructing the cause, or on the obligation of questioning penitents. 572
Section II. On rendering sentence, or on granting, deferring, or denying absolution. 575
Section II. On the manner of acting with various kinds of penitents. 592
Point I. On those who are situated in an occasion of sin. 593
Point II. On habitual sinners and recidivists. 601
Point III. On pious penitents. 622
Article II. On the office of the Minister after confession. 623
Section I. On the obligation of correcting defects committed in confession. 624
Section II. On the seal of confession. 628
Point I. On the obligation of the seal. 628
Point II. On the subject of the seal. 630
Point III. On the object of the seal. 632
Point IV. On the various ways of violating the seal. 639
TREATISE ON EXTREME UNCTION
Chapter I. On the nature and effects of Extreme Unction. 653
Chapter II. On the matter and form of Extreme Unction. 654
Article I. On the matter of this Sacrament. 654
Article II. On the form of Extreme Unction. 657
Chapter III. On the Minister of Extreme Unction. 658
Chapter IV. On the subject of Extreme Unction. 660
TREATISE ON ORDER
Chapter I. On the nature and division of Order. 663
Chapter II. On the matter and form of Order. 665
Chapter III. On the Minister of the Sacrament of Order. 668
Chapter IV. On the subject of the Sacrament of Order. 670
Appendix. On the clerical vocation. 675
TREATISE ON MATRIMONY
Chapter I. On betrothals. 677
Article I. On the nature of betrothals. 677
Article II. On the obligation and effects of betrothals. 688
Article III. On the dissolution of betrothals. 691
Chapter II. On the proclamation of banns. 708
Article I. On the necessity of banns. 708
Article II. On the circumstances of banns. 710
I. The circumstance of time. 710
II. The circumstance of place. 711
III. The circumstance of persons, namely, minors, soldiers, vagrants, and servants. 712
Article III. On dispensation from banns. 712
Article IV. On the revelation of impediments. 714
Chapter III. On the nature and properties of matrimony. 715
Article I. On the nature of matrimony. 715
Article II. On the properties of matrimony, namely, on its unity and firmness. 727
Section I. On the unity of matrimony. 727
Section II. On the firmness of matrimony. 727
Point I. On the firmness of matrimony with respect to the bond. 728
Point II. On the firmness of matrimony insofar as it regards the bed, and on divorce from the bed. 737
Chapter IV. On the matter and form of matrimony. 745
Chapter V. On the Minister and subject of matrimony. 746
Article I. On the Minister. 746
Article II. On the subject of matrimony. 749
Chapter VI. On the impediments to matrimony. 751
Article I. On impediments impeding matrimony. 751
I. The prohibition of the Church. 759
II. Time. 761
III. Betrothals. 762
IV. A vow. 762
Article II. On diriment impediments. 764
Section I. On diriment impediments in general. 764
Proposition I. 764
Proposition II. 765
Errors condemned by Pius IX. 773
Section II. On diriment impediments. 774
Point I. On the impediment of error and condition. 774
Point II. On the impediment of a vow and of Order. 777

Point III. On the impediment of consanguinity. 778
Section I. On natural consanguinity. 778
Section II. On spiritual relationship. 784
Section III. On legal relationship. 786
Point IV. On the impediment of affinity. 789
Point V. On the impediment of public propriety. 794
Point VI. On the impediment of crime. 796
I. Adultery alone. 796
II. Homicide alone. 798
III. Both together. 798
Point VII. On the impediment of disparity of worship. 801
Point VIII. On the impediment of force or fear. 806
Point IX. On the impediment of prior bond. 808
Point X. On the impediment of age. 808
Point XI. On the impediment of clandestinity. 809
Section I. On the force of the Decree of the Council of Trent. 810
Section II. On the assistance of the Parish Priest. 823
I. What Parish Priest ought to assist. 823
II. How the Parish Priest ought to assist. 827
Point XII. On the impediment of impotence. 829
Point XIII. On the impediment of abduction. 832
Section III. On dispensation from diriment impediments of matrimony. 834
Point I. On the power of dispensing. 835
Point II. On the causes of dispensation. 836
Point III. On the manner of seeking a dispensation. 865
Forms for petitioning for dispensations. 869
I. From the Datary. 869
II. From the Penitentiary. 869
Chapter VII. On the revalidation of matrimony. 872
Article I. On the revalidation of a matrimony invalid because of a defect of consent. 872
Article II. On the revalidation of a matrimony invalid because of a defect of the prescribed form. 872
Article III. On the revalidation of a matrimony invalid because of the incapacity of the parties. 874
Section I. On the revalidation of matrimony in the ordinary manner. 874
Section II. On the revalidation of matrimony with a dispensation in radice. 877
Chapter VIII. On the conjugal debt. 880
Article I. On the licitness of the conjugal act: 1. in itself; 2. with respect to circumstances. 881
Section I. On the licitness of the conjugal act considered in itself. 881
Section II. On the licitness of the conjugal act with respect to circumstances. 885
I. On the circumstances of the person. 886
II. On the circumstances of manner or position. 898
III. On the circumstances of time. 905
Article II. On the obligation of the conjugal act. 908
Article III. On the sins of spouses. 909
Section I. On the sins of spouses by excess. 909
Section II. On onanism in particular. 915
Decisions of the Sacred Congregations concerning onanism. 919
TREATISE ON CENSURES
Chapter I. On censures in general. 922
Article I. On the nature, division, and conditions of censures. 922
I. On the nature of a censure. 922
II. Division of censures. 923
III. Conditions of censures. 924
Article II. On the principle or author of censures. 941
Article III. On the subject of censures. 949
Article IV. On absolution from censures. 959
Chapter II. On censures in particular, namely: 1. excommunication; 2. suspension; 3. interdict. 965
Article I. On excommunication. 965
Section I. On the nature and division of excommunication. 966
Section II. On the effects of excommunication. 969
I. Privation of the Sacraments. 972
II. Privation of divine Offices. 974
III. Privation of the common suffrages of the Church. 975
IV. Privation of ecclesiastical burial. 975
V. Privation of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. 976
VI. Privation of benefices. 976
VII. Deprivation of forensic communication. 977
VIII. Privation of civil society. 977
Section III. On the principal excommunications in particular. 978
Point I. Excommunications reserved to the Supreme Pontiff. 980
I. Those reserved in a special manner. 980

II. Excommunications latae sententiae reserved to the Roman Pontiff. 991
Point II. Excommunications latae sententiae reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries. 1003
Point III. Excommunications latae sententiae reserved to no one. 1004
Point IV. 1009
Point V. Excommunications ferendae sententiae. 1010
Appendix I. On the crime of heresy, the reading of depraved books, and the Index. 1011
I. On the crime of heresy. 1011
Principles concerning absolution from heresy. 1012
II. On the reading of depraved books. 1012
III. On the Index of prohibited books. 1014
The principal Rules of the Index issued by order of the Council of Trent. 1015
Appendix II. On the enclosure of monasteries. 1017
I. With respect to entrance into monasteries. 1017
II. With respect to departure from monasteries. 1018
III. With respect to conversation with Nuns at the grilles. 1019
Article II. On suspension. 1019
Suspensions latae sententiae reserved to the Roman Pontiff. 1022
Short appendix on deposition and degradation. 1029
Article III. On interdict. 1029
Interdicts reserved to the Roman Pontiff. 1031
An interdict not reserved. 1032
Interdicts imposed by the Council of Trent. 1033
Appendix I. On cessation from divine Offices. 1033
Appendix II. On ecclesiastical burial. 1034
TREATISE ON IRREGULARITIES
Chapter I. On irregularities in general. 1036
Chapter II. On irregularities in particular. 1038
Article I. On irregularities from defect. 1038
I. From defect of mind. 1038
II. From defect of body. 1039
III. From defect of birth. 1040
IV. From defect of age. 1040
V. From defect of freedom. 1040
VI. From defect of Sacrament. 1041
VII. From defect of lenity. 1041
VIII. From defect of reputation. 1042
Article II. On irregularities from delict. 1042
I. Repetition and improper reception of Baptism. 1043
II. Usurpation or illicit reception of Orders. 1044
III. Violation of a censure. 1044
IV. Enormous crimes. 1044
V. Homicide and mutilation. 1044
APPENDIX ON INDULGENCES AND THE JUBILEE
Chapter I. On Indulgences. 1047
Chapter II. On the Jubilee. 1058
Conditions required for the Jubilee. 1059
More recent decisions of the Roman Curia concerning Indulgences. 1066
Another Appendix: Responses of the Sacred Penitentiary, by which a norm is prescribed for absolving those who have incurred a censure both because of the invasion of Pontifical Territory and because of the usurpation of ecclesiastical goods. 1072
Third Appendix. 1079
Fourth Appendix. 1079

The response of the Sacred Congregation, which is related on page 258 concerning the Decree of the Bishop of Caltanissetta, ought to be read thus: THE DOUBT HAVING BEEN REFORMULATED - Whether, and how, a response is to be made to the Bishop of Caltanissetta in the case? - Negatively in all respects, to both.

For the Decree of the aforesaid Bishop, by which it was forbidden that Masses to be celebrated should be entrusted or accepted in exchange for books or journals, etc., had in view the averting of certain inconveniences, which the Sacred Congregation also disapproves.

Therefore, the Sacred Congregation did not wish to disapprove that Decree; but it gave the aforesaid Response to the twofold doubt proposed by the same Bishop, whether, those inconveniences having been removed, both those entrusting and those accepting Masses to be celebrated as above would act illicitly.

Each reference is a link to the passage it cites; a reference into the other volume is left as the print sets it.

ALPHABETICAL INDEX (AS PRINTED)

Larger numerals designate the volume; smaller numerals, the page.

A

Abortion. What kind of sin? I, 382. - Is it ever lawful? 384. - Do those procuring an abortion incur penalties? II, 1003.

Absent person. Can he be absolved from sins? II, 361. - From censures? 962.

Absolution. To whom must it be given, denied, deferred? II, 578. - When and how must it be given to relapsing and habitual sinners? 601; to those remaining in an occasion of sin? 593; to the dying? 389; to those doubtfully disposed? 304, 585; to children before first Communion? I, 447; to debtors? II, 590; to an accomplice in a shameful sin? 537. Conditional absolution, 302. - Absolution by letters, 361. - What certainty of disposition is required for absolution? 585. - Absolution from censures, 959; from reserved cases, 515.

Abstinence from flesh meat, eggs, and milk foods, I, 461, 469. - Abstinence from servile works, 347.

Acceptance. Is it necessary for a law? I, 89.

Taking another's property, I, 546.

Accession. What is acquired through it? I, 547.

Accuser. On the office of an accuser, II, 18. - Is he irregular? 1041.

Sloth. What is it, and what are its daughters? I, 156.

Act. What is it, and how many kinds are there? I, 1. - Its qualities in order that it may be human and moral, 3. - Does an external act add anything? 23. - Are there indifferent acts? ibid. - What acts can a law command? 83. - Can several precepts be fulfilled by one act? 94. - Are there several sins if several precepts are violated by one act? 135, 136. - How are acts interrupted? 137. - Acts of Faith, 160; Hope, 173; Charity, 176. - The conjugal act, II, 881.

Adjuration. What is it, how many kinds are there, and when is it lawful? I, 311.

Adoption, or legal relationship, II, 786.

Adultery. What is it, and what kind of sin? I, 413. - What obligation of restitution does it induce? 609. - Adultery as an impediment invalidating marriage, II, 796; insofar as it is a cause of divorce from bed and habitation, 742.

Stranger. See Traveler.

Advertence to mortal sin, I, 130.

Adventitious property, I, 486.

Advocate. His obligations, II, 9.

Building. What is acquired through it? I, 519. - Spiritual edification: its obligation for Clerics, II, 28.

Equivocation, I, 425; is it ever lawful? ibid.

Age for law, I, 86; for fasting, 453; for Orders, II, 670; for marriage, 808.

Affinity. What is it? How many kinds are there? II, 789. - When does it invalidate marriage, and by what law? ibid. - Affinity from incest impedes payment of the debt, 790.

Aggressor against life, honor, property, or chastity, I, 376 et seq.

Games of chance. Gambling, II, 64.

Alluvion, I, 518.

Agnus Dei. What is it? For what use? II, 125.

Support. It is owed to parents, I, 356; to children, 360; to a spouse, 364; to brothers, 683; to illegitimate children, ibid.

Altar, II, 270. - Privileged altar, 1071 et seq.

Insane persons. With respect to laws, I, 85; with respect to ownership, 486.

Lost things. See Finding.

Love. See Charity.

Amphibology. Is it ever lawful? I, 425.

Lack of space. A cause for dispensing in marriage, II, 836.

Soul. Dispositions of the soul for the Eucharist, II, 220. - How must a Confessor deal with spiritual souls? 622. - Irregularity from a defect of soul, 1038.

Animals. Do wild animals belong to the one who captures them? I, 500.

Antichresis. What is it? Is it lawful? I, 750.

Bees. What if they fly away? I, 502.

Apparitor. His duties, II, 13.

Application of Mass, II, 244. - Obligation of Pastors to apply Mass for the people, 251; with respect to the Fathers of the Society of Jesus, 261.

Approval of a confessor, II, 424; its necessity, ibid. - Approval of Regulars, 459.

Water in Baptism, II, 154; in Mass, 178.

Arms. Prohibited to Clerics, II, 65.

Earnest money in a sale, I, 731; in betrothals, II, 689.

Arts. Which excuse from fasting? I, 464.

Wealthy artisan. Is he excused from fasting? I, 467.

Obscene looks. Among the unmarried, I, 410 et seq.; between spouses, II, 910.

Insurance. What is it? I, 751.

Assistance at Mass, I, 334; at marriage, II, 823.

Attention in Mass, in hearing it, I, 337; in the Hours, II, 56; in confecting the Sacraments, 132.

Attrition. What is it? Does it suffice in the Sacrament of Penance? II, 340.

Hearing Mass, I, 334; detraction, 432.

Avarice. What is it, and what are its daughters? I, 154.

Birds. See Occupation.

B

Balsam in confirmation, II, 169.

Banns. Must they be made, and how? II, 708; dispensation from them, 712.

Baptism. Its nature, II, 153; matter, 154; form, 157; Minister, 158; subject, 160; sponsors, 163; ceremonies, 164. - Baptism by Caesarean operation, 165.

Barber. Can he exercise his craft on a feast day? I, 351.

War. Is it lawful? I, 390; what is to be done in doubt concerning its justice? ibid. - When do combatants become irregular? II, 1042.

Nuptial blessing, II, 748, 829.

Beneficed cleric. When does he commit simony? I, 267 et seq.; when is he bound to distribute his surplus to the poor? 494; when is he bound to the Hours? II, 37.

Benefice. What is it? How many kinds are there? II, 82; manner of acquiring, losing, and resigning one, 83.

Bestiality. How grave a sin? I, 422.

Bigamy. It induces irregularity, II, 1041.

Blasphemy. What is it, how many kinds are there, and what kind of sin? I, 291.

Good faith. With respect to prescription, I, 515; how does bad or doubtful faith harm a possessor? ibid.

Property of children, I, 486; of wives, 488; of Clerics, 493. - Found property, 503.

Goodness of human acts, I, 2 et seq.

Breviary. See Divine Office.

Briefs, Bulls, I, 114.

C

Blind man. Is he irregular? II, 1039.

Chalice. It is required for Mass, II, 273.

Calumny. See Detraction.

Exchange. What is it, how many kinds are there, and is it lawful? I, 746.

Money changer, I, 746.

Candles. A lighted candle for Mass, II, 275.

Canons. Their obligations, II, 71.

Capital. See Principal.

Those condemned to death. Are they to be given Communion? II, 219.

Chapter. With respect to laws, I, 82; with respect to dimissorial letters, II, 669; with respect to censures, 942.

Meat. Abstinence from meat, I, 451, 461; with respect to children, ibid.; with respect to innkeepers, 224; with respect to the mixing of meat with fish for those dispensed from the law of abstinence, 469, 470, II, 1078.

Chastity. Vow of chastity, I, 330 et seq.; with respect to Religious, II, 106; spouses, 889; as a prohibiting impediment, 762; as an invalidating impediment, 777.

Military property, I, 486.

Reserved cases. On the nature of reservation, II, 469; on the power of reserving, ibid.; on the power of absolving from reserved matters, 515; what is to be said of a reserved case during a Jubilee? 1058, 1063.

Innkeeper. Can he sell wine to those who will become intoxicated, or meat to those who will eat it on a forbidden day? I, 224.

Cause. What is it? I, 6; with respect to dispensation from law, 102; irritation of vows, 324; their dispensation and commutation, 327, 330. - Causes excusing from hearing Mass, 346; from fasting, 463; from works prohibited on a feast day, 352; from theft, 534; from restitution, 597; from recitation of the Hours, II, 58. - Causes for absolving under condition, 304; for dissolving betrothals, 691; for dispensing from the proclamations of banns, 712; in impediments of marriage, 836.

Celebration of Mass. By reason of priesthood, II, 247; by reason of office, 248; by reason of stipend, 251; on the time and place of celebration, 264; on the requisites for celebration, 270; on the Rubrics, 276.

Censure, II, 922; power of imposing it, 941; its subject, 949; excommunication, 968; suspension, 1019; interdict, 1029; on absolution from censures, 959.

Census. What is it, and when is it lawful? I, 748.

Certainty. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 40; of faith, 160; of hope, 173; for swearing, 305; for giving absolution, II, 585.

Cessation of law, I, 106; of dispensation, 105; of prescription, 511; of promise, 667. Cessation from divine services, II, 1033.

Cession of goods. Does it free the debtor? I, 598.

Sacramental character, II, 127.

Charity. What is it? I, 176 et seq.; its object, 177; subject, ibid.; necessity with respect to God, ibid.; with respect to neighbor, 181; with respect to enemies, 188; with respect to aiding the poor, 193; with respect to correcting delinquents, 200; order to be observed among goods, 182; among persons, 184; opposing vices, 203.

Bonds. Can they be sold? I, 731, 733.

Surgeon. Obligations, II, 23; is he irregular? 1041.

Chocolate. On a fast day, I, 455.

Dances. Are they lawful, and when? I, 212.

Choir with respect to Canons and Religious. See Office.

Chrism in Baptism, II, 165; in Confirmation, 169.

Circumstance. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 24; with respect to restitution, to whom, how much, etc.? 585; with respect to confession, II, 371; aggravating circumstances, ibid.

Citizens. Their obligations toward the civil authority, I, 367.

Clandestinity with respect to marriage, II, 809.

Enclosure. How must it be observed? II, 107; what kind of sin if it is violated? ibid.; what penalties do violators incur? 1017.

Clerics. Are they bound by civil laws? I, 85; their ownership, 493; general obligations, II, 28; garb, 35; prohibited arts, 63; striking a Cleric, how many kinds are there and what penalties does it induce? 992; can a Cleric practice medicine with cautery and incision? 1041.

Codicil. On the requisites for a codicil, I, 685.

Celibacy. Its obligation, II, 29.

Cemetery. When is it considered violated? II, 975.

Little supper on a fast day, I, 457.

Relationship: natural, II, 778; spiritual, 784; legal, 786.

Cohabitation. Are spouses bound to cohabitation? II, 737.

Collation with respect to heirs, I, 671; of a benefice, II, 83.

Collation, or little collation. See Little Supper.

Pigeons. Can they be occupied or killed? I, 502.

Comedy. See Spectacles.

Commixture. What is acquired through commixture? I, 519.

Loan for use. What is it? What are its obligations? I, 691.

Easter Communion, I, 448; where must it be made? ibid.; administration, II, 190; dispositions of the soul, 220; of the body, 222; to the insane, the half-witted, the mute, and the possessed? 215; to an occult sinner, 143; can one who is doubtful concerning the fast receive Communion? 225.

Frequent Communion, II, 230; Spiritual Communion, 237.

Commutation of a vow, I, 330; of an oath, 309; of penance, II, 417.

Occult compensation: what is it? I, 538; conditions, ibid.; is it lawful for servants? 539; is compensation admitted in restitution of reputation? 435.

Accomplice in damage with respect to restitution, I, 573 et seq.; in a shameful sin with respect to absolution, II, 537; what if the sin cannot be disclosed without manifestation of the accomplice? 382; if the Confessor asks his name? 384.

Preacher. Must he fast? I, 468.

Concubinage. What is it? I, 413.

Concupiscence. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 14; what influence has it upon a human act? 15; remedies, 17.

Competition. What if an unworthy or less worthy person is chosen in a competition while the worthier is passed over? I, 570. - Concurrence in sin and damage. See Cooperation.

Condition. For law, I, 78; for prayer, 228; for an oath, 299; for a vow, 313; for a testament, 677; for prescription, 507; for contracts, 662; for contrition, II, 326; for confession, 360; for a purpose of amendment, 342. - A condition placed in Sacraments, 135; in absolution, 302; in marriage, 719. - Condition as an invalidating impediment, 774. A shameful condition in a contract, I, 662.

Remission of a debt, I, 597; of the punishment of sin. See Indulgence.

Hiring. See Lease-Hire.

Confessor. His duties, II, 559; his knowledge, 565; approval, 424; jurisdiction, 429. On the manner in which a Confessor must deal with the indisposed, 590; with those remaining in an occasion of sin, 593; with habitual and relapsing sinners, 601; with the scrupulous, I, 47; with the uninstructed, II, 578; with pious souls, 622; with the dying, 389; must he dispose penitents? 585; admonish them? 569; interrogate them? 572; what is to be done concerning errors committed? 624; is a penitent bound to follow the opinion of the Confessor? I, 70; II, 591.

Annual confession, I, 447; when must it precede the administration of Sacraments? II, 139; can it be made by signs or in writing? 361; its institution, 359; precept, 360; conditions, ibid.; integrity, 362; causes excusing from integrity, 380; when must it be repeated? 395; general confession, its necessity or utility, 402.

Confirmation. Nature, II, 168; matter, ibid.; form, 170; minister, 176†; subject, 172.

Roman Congregations. Their authority, I, 112; Sacred Congregation of the Council, ibid.; of Bishops and Regulars, ibid.; of the Propagation of the Faith, ibid.; of the Holy Office, I, 113; of Indulgences and Relics, ibid.; of the Sacred Penitentiary, ibid.; of the Dataria, 114.

Spouses. Their obligations, I, 363; society between them, whether they must live together? ibid.; rights, burdens, donations, 675; with respect to the debt, II, 880.

Blood relatives. Does incest with blood relatives in various degrees differ in species? I, 414.

Consanguinity, II, 778. - Tree of consanguinity, 781.

Conscience. What is it? I, 38; right and erroneous, 39; certain and doubtful, 41; scrupulous and lax, 44; probable and improbable, 49.

Military conscripts, I, 619.

Consecration. Matter, II, 180; form, 187.

Consent to sin, I, 124; to a contract, 647; to marriage, II, 718. - Consent of parents to the marriage of their children, 726; to the separation of spouses, 740.

One consenting to damage, I, 578.

Habitual sinners. Are they to be absolved? II, 601.

Custom. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 120; effect toward introducing or abrogating a law, ibid. - A custom of sinning: must it be declared in confession? II, 373.

One counseling damage, I, 575.

Contempt of law: when is it mortal? I, 92.

Continence. See Celibacy.

Contract. Matter of a contract, I, 625; consent to it, 647; subject, 637; its obligation, 657. - Gratuitous contracts, 664; onerous contracts, 728. - What if it is confirmed by oath? 660; if error or fear intervenes? 650. - Modifications of contracts, 660; conditions, 662.

Triple contract, I, 743.

Contrition. What is it? II, 307; necessity, 310; qualities, 326.

Contumacy for a censure, II, 929.

Contumely. What is it? I, 437; with respect to reparation, ibid.

Cooperation. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 216; in sin, ibid.; in damage, 573; with respect to servants, 217; workers, 222; merchants, 223; innkeepers, 224.

Positive cooperators, I, 573; negative, 582; order of restitution among cooperators, 589.

Availability of a Confessor. When is it said to be lacking? II, 220.

Conjugal intercourse, II, 881; when is it lawful? ibid.; obligatory? 908; what kind is required for affinity? 769; what is to be said of one extorting intercourse under a promise of marriage? I, 605; when must it be disclosed by related betrothed persons in order to obtain a dispensation? II, 837.

Dispositions of the body for the Eucharist, II, 222; irregularity from a defect of body, 1039.

Fraternal correction. When does it oblige? I, 200; what order must be observed in correction? 201; on the part of parents, 362; on the part of masters, 365; on the part of teachers, 367; on the part of equals or inferiors, 202.

Creditors. Order of restitution, I, 590.

Credit. Its sale, I, 731, 733.

Crime. When is it public so that it can be divulged? I, 431; impediment of crime, II, 796. - Crime with respect to irregularity, 1042; crimen criminosum, 1001.

Crucifix. What kind is required at Mass? II, 275.

Fault for mortal sin, I, 127; for a reserved case, II, 469; for a censure, 924; for an obligation of restitution, I, 561; theological and juridical fault, ibid.

Worship owed to God, I, 226; owed to the Saints, 227.

Disparity of worship. What kind of impediment of marriage? II, 801.

Carriage. Can it be driven on a feast day? I, 354.

Guardians of fields, etc., II, 25; of the sick, little children, a house, or a flock, I, 346.

D

One causing damage. With respect to restitution, I, 561.

Emerging damage in a loan for consumption, I, 701; excusing from restitution, 702; from law, 96. - See Difficulty.

Dataria. What is it? What is its office? I, 114; II, 865.

Debts from delict, from contract, I, 591.

Conjugal debt: its lawfulness in itself, II, 881; with respect to time, manner, and place, 885; its obligation, 908; how is the right to it lost? 790. - Debt with respect to goods of fortune. See Debts.

Deception. See Error, Fraud.

Decisions of the Roman Curia: how do they bind? I, 115.

Defects. How must they be disclosed in a loan for use? I, 692; in a sale? 729; in betrothals? II, 705. Must defects committed in confession be repaired? 624.

Defender. See Aggressor.

Deflowerer. To what is he bound? I, 605.

Morose delectation: what is it? What kind of sin? I, 145; is parvity of matter admitted in it? 396.

Delegation. Can one delegated subdelegate? I, 102; II, 430; what is to be said of delegated jurisdiction? ibid.

Deliberation for a human act, I, 1, 2; for sin, 125; for a vow, 313.

Delict. With respect to irregularity, II, 1042.

Denunciation. Its obligation with respect to one soliciting to shameful acts, II, 548. - Denunciation for correction. See Fraternal Correction.

Deposition. What is it? What is its effect? II, 1029.

Deposit. Its conditions and obligations, I, 692.

Deserters. See Soldiers.

Desire of an evil work: what kind of sin? I, 145.

Despair. What kind of sin? I, 175.

Detraction, I, 426. What if the offense is public? 430; if the person is already defamed? 431; reparation of detraction, 435.

Diaconate. Is it a sacred Order or a Sacrament? II, 664.

Deacon. Can he solemnly baptize? II, 158; give Communion? 190.

Grave difficulty: does it excuse from human precepts? I, 96; from Mass? 346; from fasts? 463; from the Divine Office? II, 58.

Delay of restitution at death, I, 545; of fulfillment of a vow, 320; of fulfillment of penance, II, 416; delay of absolution, 578.

Love of enemies. See Charity.

Dimissorial letters. By whom can the dimissorial letters necessary for ordination be granted? II, 669.

Disciple. On the obligations of disciples, I, 367.

Dispensation from a law, I, 100; from a vow, 327; from banns, II, 712; from prohibiting impediments, 763; from invalidating impediments, 834; manner of petitioning for it, 865; causes for obtaining it, 836; dispensation in the root, 877.

Disposition for receiving Sacraments, II, 150; for Confirmation, 173; for Communion, 220; for Penance, 307; for Unction, 661; for Order, 671; for Matrimony, 749.

Dissolution of betrothals, II, 691; of marriage, 728.

Distance. When does it excuse from Mass? I, 347.

Distillation. See Pollution.

Distraction at Mass, I, 337; in prayer, 229; in the Hours, II, 56.

Divination. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 233; what is its gravity? ibid.

Divorce. What is it? II, 737; with respect to the bond, 738; with respect to habitation and bed, ibid.

Doctor. Office of a doctor in confession, II, 564.

Sorrow. See Contrition.

Fraud in a contract, I, 653.

Domicile. With respect to laws, I, 86, 87; with respect to Orders, II, 669; with respect to marriage, 823.

Ownership. Nature and division, I, 483; object, 484; subject, 485; of children, 486; of wives, 488; of Clerics, 493; of authors, 498; manner of acquiring it, 499; in one's own reputation, 484.

Master. Obligation of masters, I, 365.

Gifts. Can they be accepted by a judge? II, 4. - Gifts of betrothed persons, 689.

Donation. Who can donate? I, 669; what can be donated? 670. - Donation between the living, 672; in contemplation of death, 688. - Donation of spouses, 675; for pious causes, 678.

Dowry. With respect to marriage, I, 488.

Qualities of contrition, II, 326; of confession, 360. - See Disposition.

Doubt. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 41; is it lawful to act with it? 42; what is to be done in doubt concerning the existence of a law? See Probability. - What is to be done in doubt concerning the fulfillment of a law or obligation? 74; concerning a vow? 315; the justice of a war? 391; possession of another's property? 558; damage inflicted? 569; the influence of an unjust vote? 578; payment of a debt? 599; offspring, whether born of adultery or from which father? 610; what is to be done in doubt concerning sins committed, whether they were grave, or whether they were confessed? II, 366; concerning the validity of the matter and form in Sacraments? 131; jurisdiction? 432; reservation of a sin? 477; an impediment of marriage? 771; a censure? 931; irregularity? 1037; homicide or mutilation? 1045.

Duel, I, 386; its penalties, II, 992.

E

Drunkenness. What is it, and what kind of sin? I, 156.

Church. Its precepts, I, 444; are shameful acts, words, looks, or thoughts in a Church sacrileges? 258, 414; is theft in a Church sacrilege? 264; is it lawful to celebrate in a violated Church? II, 267; when is it violated and restored to worship? 268.

Education of children, I, 360.

Effects of the Sacraments, II, 124; of Baptism, 153; of the Eucharist, 177; of the Sacrifice of the Mass, 240; of Extreme Unction, 653; of excommunication, 969; of interdict, 1030.

Alms. When do they oblige? I, 193; can a wife, son, or servant give alms? 199.

Emphyteusis. What is it? I, 744.

Purchase. See Sale.

Buyer. His obligations, 730; to what is the buyer of a stolen thing bound? 731.

Epikeia. What is it, and when does it have place? I, 100.

Bishop. Power of a Bishop with respect to dispensation from laws, I, 101; from vows, 327; from prohibiting impediments, II, 763; from invalidating impediments, 835. - Obligations of a Bishop, II, 66; with respect to residence, ibid.; preaching, 67; visitation of the Diocese, ibid.; privileges, 67†.

Error in contracts, I, 650; in the Hours, II, 51; in marriage, 774; with respect to the jurisdiction of a Confessor, 431; of a Pastor, 826.

Errors condemned by Pius IX concerning marriage, II, 773.

Eucharist. Its institution, II, 175; matter, 178; form, 187; Minister, 190; necessity, 208; at death, 209; dispositions for receiving it, 220.

Eviction. What is it? What are its effects? I, 549, 731.

Examination. What kind is prerequisite for the integrity of confession? II, 394.

Excommunication. Nature, II, 966; effects, 969; principal excommunications in particular, 978; minor excommunication, 968.

Executor of a testament, I, 687.

Disinheritance. Can a son be disinherited? I, 681.

Exorcism. See Adjuration.

Extreme Unction. Institution, II, 653; matter, 654; form, 657; Minister, 658; subject, 660; necessity, 661; disposition, ibid.; when, how, and how often must it be administered? 659 et seq.

F

Reputation. What is it? I, 426; how must it be repaired? 435; does it fall under our ownership? 484; what excuses from restoring it? 436.

Servant. Obligations, I, 366; can he give alms? 199; compensate himself? 539; cooperate with his master in evil? 217 et seq.; be excused from Mass? 347; what is to be said of thefts by servants? 529.

Female. When is she of puberty? II, 809; can she minister and make the responses at Mass? 275.

Feast. On the obligation of celebrating feasts, I, 444; on things prescribed on a feast day, 332; on things prohibited, 347.

Fief. What is it? I, 744.

Fideicommissum. What is it, and is it lawful? I, 689.

Suretyship. What are its conditions? I, 749.

Faith. What is it? I, 160; necessity, 161; dissimulation, 162; object, 164; good faith for prescription, 515; for possession, 547.

Son. Obligations, I, 355; with respect to ownership, 486; testament, 680; vocation, 359; marriage, ibid.; what is to be said of thefts by sons? 529.

End. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 25; how does it exert influence? 26. - See Intention.

Fetus. When is it animated? I, 382, in the note; what is to be said of abortion? ibid.

Form of the Sacraments, II, 128. - See the individual Sacraments at the beginning.

Formulas for testaments, I, 676; for petitioning for dispensations, II, 869.

Fornication. What is it? What kind of sin? I, 413; with respect to restitution, 604.

Defrauding of taxes, I, 615.

Fruits of a thing: what are they? I, 547; of another's thing sold, ibid. et seq. - Fruits of the Mass, II, 240; when must they be applied? 244.

Theft. How many kinds are there? I, 526; what kind of sin? ibid.; grave matter, 527. - Petty thefts, 530 et seq.; of a wife, 529; of sons, ibid.; of servants, ibid.; of Religious, II, 94 et seq. - Causes excusing from theft, I, 534.

G

Tax. See Tribute.

Management of affairs, I, 695.

Degrees. Must the degrees of incest be explained in confession? II, 374. - Rules for recognizing the degrees of consanguinity, 779.

Gravity of sins, I, 124; in theft, 527; in law, 91; in a vow, 319; in fasting, 455; in Mass, 335; in servile works, 348.

Gluttony. What is it, and what are its daughters? I, 156.

H

Garb of Clerics, II, 35.

Habitual sinner. When must he be absolved? II, 602.

Heresy, I, 174†; II, 1011.

Heretics. With respect to the laws of the Church, I, 85; their penalties, II, 980.

Auction. Sale by auction, I, 738.

Testamentary inheritance, I, 680; its division, ibid.

Homicide, I, 369; what must be restored because of it? 602; to whom must restitution be made? 603; with respect to irregularity, II, 1044.

Propriety, II, 794.

Hour of the meal during fasting, I, 462.

Canonical Hours. Obligation, II, 37; who are bound to them? ibid.; how must they be recited? 50; in what order? ibid.; what excuses from them? 58.

Foundling hospital. Must those who bring offspring to it pay the expenses? I, 613.

Host for consecration. What if it is broken? II, 185.

Mortgage. What right does it produce? I, 751.

I

Idolatry. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 230.

Fasting. Nature, I, 453; obligation, ibid.; hour of the meal, 462; causes excusing, 463; with respect to Communion, II, 223; Responses of the Sacred Penitentiary concerning fasting, I, 469; II, 1107†.

Ignorance, I, 12; is it admitted in the natural law? 108; does it excuse from punishment? 118; does it impede the invalidating force of a law? 120; an impediment? II, 765; reservation? 472; a censure? 931; irregularity? 1037.

Illegitimacy. When is it removed? II, 1040.

Impediment dissolving betrothals, II, 691; prohibiting marriage, 751; invalidating it, 764; its dispensation, 835. - See the various impediments in the particular index of Volume II.

Impotence which excuses from Mass, I, 346; from fasting, 463; from restitution, 597; from the Divine Office? II, 58. - Impotence as an impediment of marriage, 829.

Those below puberty. With respect to vows, I, 325; with respect to contracts, 644; with respect to censures, II, 951.

Incest. What is it? I, 414; must the degrees be declared? II, 374; it deprives one of the right to the debt, 793.

Index of prohibited books, II, 1014.

Indissolubility of marriage, II, 728.

Indulgence. What is it? How many kinds are there? II, 1047; conditions, 1048; for the deceased, 1050.

Infamous person. Irregular, II, 1042.

Infamy. See Reputation.

Infant or child: when must one be baptized? II, 160; confirmed? 172; given Communion? 212; anointed? 660.

Infidelity, I, 170.

Infidels. With respect to laws of the Church, I, 85; with respect to censures, II, 949; can their children be baptized? 161.

Entrance into Religion. See Vocation.

Incapacity for a contract, I, 640; for a donation, 669.

Enemy. How must he be loved? I, 190.

Injury. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 523.

Injustice. See Theft, Damage.

Innocent person. Can he be killed? I, 381; can he be condemned if juridically held guilty? II, 3.

Integrity in confession, II, 362.

Intention in fulfillment of a law, I, 93; in confecting a Sacrament, II, 133; in receiving it, 147; for Orders, 150; in applying Mass, 244.

Interdict, II, 1029.

Those civilly interdicted, I, 647.

Interpretation of law, I, 99.

Interest in a loan for consumption. See Usury.

Interrogation made by a judge, II, 19; by a Confessor, 572.

Interruption of acts, for their multiplication, I, 137; on a fast day, with respect to the meal, 463; in prescription, 511; in the administration of a Sacrament, II, 131; in the Hours, 53; at Mass, 278.

Finding. With respect to ownership, I, 503; what is to be said of a recently lost thing which is found? 504.

Envy. What is it? Its daughters, I, 155.

Anger. What is it? Its daughters, I, 155.

Irregularity. How many kinds are there? II, 1036; from defect, 1038; from delict, 1042.

Invalidation by reason of law, I, 119. - Invalidation of a vow, 324; of an oath, 309.

Journey. Is it lawful on a feast day? I, 351; does it excuse from fasting? 468.

One commanding. See One mandating or commanding.

Jubilee. Nature, II, 1058; conditions, 1059.

Jews. Communication with them, I, 171; can their children be baptized? II, 161.

Judge. Obligations, II, 1; judge in the internal forum, 572.

Judgment in an oath, I, 302; rash judgment, 438; forensic judgment, II, 1 et seq.

Oath. Nature, I, 299; lawfulness, 300; conditions, ibid.; in a contract, 660.

Jurors (Jurees), II, 8; their duties, ibid.

Jurisdiction for absolving, II, 429; at the point of death, 437; concerning reserved sins, 515; with respect to matrimony, 823.

Jurisdiction of Regulars, II, 459; of a Confessor with respect to nuns, 466.

Law: natural, I, 107; divine, 100; canonical, 111; civil, 117; Roman, ibid.; Gallican, ibid. Right of ownership, 478.

Justice. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 472; its reparation. See Restitution.

L

Labor on a feast day, I, 347; excusing causes, 352.

Milk products. When are they prohibited? I, 461 et seq.

Nursing. The time of nursing, by reason of the conjugal act, II, 906.

Reading of prohibited books, I, 211; II, 1012.

Lectorate. See Order.

Legatee or heir: his rights, I, 681 et seq.

Legacy. How must it be fulfilled? I, 685.

Legislator. What power does he enjoy? I, 79.

Legitime owed to children, I, 682; to parents, ibid.

Lenity. Irregularity from defect of lenity, II, 1041.

Law. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 77; author, 79; object, 183†; subject, 84; obligation, 91; interpretation, 99; dispensation, 100. - Natural law, 107; divine, 110; ecclesiastical, 111; civil, 117; penal, 118; invalidating, 119.

Book. On bad books, I, 211; on bad books of heretics, II, 981; what is to be said of the Index? 1014.

Liberty. Free will, I, 10; irregularity from defect of liberty, II, 1040.

Bond. On the impediment of bond, II, 808.

Letters. Opening another's letters, I, 442; dimissorial letters, II, 669.

Liturgy. Which is to be followed in the Breviary? II, 40.

Lease-Hire. On the contract of lease-hire, I, 744.

Place for hearing Mass, I, 343; for restitution, 594; for the Hours, II, 48; for Baptism, 164; for matrimony, 828.

Lottery, I, 752.

Gain. A son's gain in his father's house, I, 487; in gaming, 752; in a mutuum, 699 et seq.; does it excuse from Mass on a feast day? 347.

Ceasing profit in a mutuum, I, 703.

Gaming. Conditions, I, 753. - Games prohibited to Clerics, II, 64.

Light in a Church, II, 204; at Mass, 275.

Lust. What is it? Its daughters, I, 154; directly voluntary, indirectly voluntary, 395; unconsummated, 398; consummated, 413; against nature, 417.

M

Magic. What is it? What kind of sin? I, 235.

Teacher. His obligations, I, 367.

Animal magnetism: is it lawful? I, 238 et seq.

Maleficium. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 235.

One mandating or commanding. To what is he bound? I, 573.

Mandate. Its conditions, I, 693.

Husband. Can he invalidate the vows of his wife? I, 325; his obligations. See Spouses.

Mother. Can she invalidate the vows of her children? I, 325; her obligations. See Spouses.

Matter of law, I, 83; of a vow, 316; of a contract, 625; of the Sacraments, II, 128; of Baptism, 154; of Confirmation, 168; of the Eucharist, 178; of Penance, 288; of Extreme Unction, 654; of Order, 665; of Matrimony, 745.

Smallness of matter: is it admitted in blasphemy? I, 293; in a promissory oath, 308; in hearing Mass, 335; in a venereal matter, 396; in violation of fasting, 455; in eating flesh meat on a day of abstinence, 451; in theft? 531.

Matrimony. Nature, II, 715; consent, 718; matter and form, 745; Minister, 746; unity, 727; indissolubility, 737; divorce, 738; prohibiting impediments, 751; invalidating impediments, 764; authority for constituting them, 765; dispensation, 834; revalidation, 872.

Godmother. See Godfather.

Matins. Can it be separated from Lauds? II, 56; can the Nocturns be separated? ibid.; even with the night intervening? ibid.; at what hour must it be recited? 42. - See Canonical Hours.

Doctor. His obligations, II, 23.

Lie. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 424; what kind of sin is it? ibid.

Merchant. See Sale.

Merchants. With respect to cooperation, I, 223.

Merit. What is it? How many kinds are there? Its conditions, I, 35.

Fear. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 17; what effect does it have in violation of a law? 92, 96; in an oath? 308; in a vow? 315; in a contract? 653; in betrothals? II, 682; in matrimony? 806.

Soldiers. Duties in war, I, 390; with respect to restitution, 619; are they irregular? II, 1042.

Military service. Damage on its occasion, I, 619.

Minister of the Sacraments, II, 132; his obligation with respect to intention, 133, 134; probity, 136; Sacraments to be administered, 141; to be denied to the unworthy, 142.

Minor. Who is one? I, 642 et seq.; can he validly contract? 644.

Mass. Hearing it on feasts, I, 334 et seq.; presence, ibid.; place, 343; manner, 337. - Parochial Mass, 345; excusing causes, 346. - Sacrifice of the Mass. See Sacrifice of the Mass.

Mohatra. What is the contract of mohatra? I, 737.

Mollities. See Pollution.

Nun. Status in France, II, 117; enclosure, 107, 1017. - See Religious.

Admonition. When must it be made by a Confessor? II, 569; what is to be done in doubt whether it will be profitable? 570.

Monitory. Excommunication in a monitory, II, 936.

Monopoly. What is it? I, 740; is it lawful? ibid.

Mounts of Piety, I, 726.

Dying person to be assisted, II, 380 et seq.; destitute of his senses, 389; doubtfully disposed, 390.

Those civilly dead. Can they contract? etc., I, 647.

Movements. See Concupiscence.

Woman. Can she be a witness in a testament? I, 677; in matrimony? II, 809. - See Wife and Female.

Presents. See Gifts.

Mutilation of oneself, I, 369; of others, 374; of syllables in the Canonical Hours, II, 53, 55; irregularity from mutilation, 1044.

Mute person. A deaf-mute with respect to confession, II, 387; one remaining silent with respect to damage, I, 582.

Mutuum. What is it? I, 695; obligations, 697; is it lawful to receive gain from a mutuum? 698; from emerging damage? 701; from ceasing profit? 703; from danger of the principal? 704; from the title of civil law? 705; from the lease of money? 710.

N

Necessity excusing from a law, I, 96. - Necessity of Faith, 161; of Hope, 174; of Charity toward God, 178; toward one's neighbor, 181; toward enemies, 188; toward the poor, 193; excusing from hearing Mass, 346; from the prohibition of servile works on a feast day, 352; from fasting, 463; from theft, 534; from restitution, 597.

Trading. See Sale and Contract of Society. - Forbidden to Clerics, II, 65.

Nocturns. See Canonical Hours.

Name. The name of an accomplice must not be sought by a Confessor, II, 384.

Hospital. See Foundling hospital.

Notary. His obligations, II, 16.

Novitiate. Is it necessary for religious profession? II, 87.

Nudity. See Obscene looks.

Number of sins: whence is it derived? I, 136; to be expressed in Confession, II, 362; to be sought by a Confessor, 572.

Fairs. Are they lawful on a feast day? I, 349.

Messenger. Can he accept a double wage? I, 626.

Nuptials. See Matrimony.

O

Obedience. With respect to sons under paternal power, I, 357; servants, 366; disciples, 367; citizens, ibid.; Religious, II, 108.

Obligation in an oath, I, 307; in a vow, 319; in a contract, 657. - Obligation of restitution, 542.

Obligations of children, I, 355; of parents, 359; of spouses, 363; of masters, 365; of servants, 366; of teachers, 367; of disciples, ibid.; of laics, II, 1; of Clerics, 28; of Religious, 94.

Obreption and subreption in the petition for some dispensation, I, 102; II, 836.

Vain observance. What is it? I, 231.

Occasion of sins, II, 593; what is it? How many kinds are there? How must a Confessor act with those who are in an occasion of sin? ibid.

Killing. See Homicide.

Occupation. A manner of acquiring ownership, I, 499.

Hatred of enemies: obligation of forgiving, I, 189.

Office. See Canonical Hours.

Omission. Sins of omission, I, 124. - Omission of hearing Mass, 335; in reciting the Hours, II, 38.

Works. How many kinds are there? I, 347; which are forbidden on feasts? 348.

Workman. Is he excused from fasting? I, 464.

Caesarean operation. Is it lawful or obligatory? II, 165.

Opinion. What is a probable, more probable, or equiprobable opinion? I, 49; which may be followed? 50 et seq.; what is to be done in conferring Sacraments? 47; in the matter of the seal? II, 630.

Prayer. Necessity, I, 227; conditions, 228. - Morning and evening prayer, 229; for whom must one pray, and who must pray? ibid.

Private oratory: what is it? I, 343; II, 268.

Orders. Which are they? II, 664; which are minor? 665; which are major? ibid.; which invalidate matrimony? 777.

Sacrament of Order, II, 663.

Order in the observance of law, I, 93; in correction, 201; in charity, 182; in restitution, 589, 590; in the recitation of the Hours, II, 50.

Kisses. See Obscene looks.

P

Pact. See Contract.

Pall. What kind must it be? II, 270, 273.

Flatterer. To what is he bound? I, 579.

Bread. What kind is the matter of the Eucharist? II, 178.

Pope. His power with respect to laws, I, 80; with respect to vows, 328; with respect to impediments of matrimony, II, 835.

Paraphernal goods. Which goods belong to a wife? I, 488.

Parents. Their obligations, I, 359.

Parish. Mass to be heard in it, I, 345; Paschal Communion to be made, 448; banns to be announced, II, 711.

Parish Priest. His obligations, II, 68; residence, ibid.; celebration for the people, 248; correction of his sheep, 70; administration of the Sacraments, 141; assistance at matrimony, 823.

One participating in a bad action, I, 216; in theft, 580; in damage, ibid.

Smallness of matter. See Matter.

Pastor. See Bishop, Parish Priest.

Patrimony of Clerics, I, 493; title of patrimony, II, 671.

Godfather in Baptism, II, 163; his qualities, ibid.; obligations, ibid.

Poor persons. Are they excused from the prohibition of labor on a feast day? I, 353; from fasting? 463; from the law of abstinence? 452; from theft in extreme necessity? 534.

Poverty. Vow of poverty, II, 94; title of poverty for Orders, 671.

Sin. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 124; diverse gravity, 127; mortal, 128; venial, 129; specific difference, 134; numerical difference, 136. - Internal sins, 145; capital sins, 155.

Striking of parents, I, 356; of Clerics, II, 992.

Stranger. With respect to laws, I, 86; confession, II, 443, 537; Orders, 669; matrimony, 825.

Danger of sin. See Occasion of sins. - Danger in a mutuum, I, 704.

Perjury. See Oath.

Commutation of the Divine Office, II, 51; of a benefice, 84.

Person in a contract, I, 637; in matrimony, II, 774.

Plague. Obligation of a Pastor with respect to the Sacraments in time of plague, II, 141.

Asking. See Conjugal Debt.

Pharmacist, II, 23. See Doctor.

Pledge. What is it? What are its conditions? I, 750.

Painting on feast days, I, 350; painting with a needle, 351.

Fishing. Is it lawful on feasts? I, 351.

Fish. Can they be mixed with flesh meat on a fast day? I, 462, 470; 1078†.

Conventional penalty in a mutuum, I, 705; in betrothals, II, 689. See Earnest money. - Penalty of sin. See Censure.

Penal. Is there a penal law? I, 118.

Penitent. Is he bound to follow the opinion of the Confessor? I, 70; II, 591; must he be questioned? 572; how must he be treated? 560.

Penance as a virtue, II, 283; as a Sacrament, 285; remote matter in the Sacrament, 288; proximate matter, ibid. - See Contrition.

Sacramental penance. See Sacramental satisfaction.

Penitentiary. What is it? I, 113; II, 866.

Polygamy, II, 727, 1041.

Pollution. What is it? How great a sin is it? I, 417.

Portiuncula. Indulgence of the Portiuncula, II, 1072.

Possession in doubt concerning ownership of a thing, I, 71; in prescription, 508.

Demonic possession. Its signs, I, 312. - See Adjuration.

Possessor in good faith, I, 547; in bad faith, 553; in doubtful faith, 558.

Power of a legislator, I, 79; of the Church, ibid.; of the Minister of Penance, II, 424.

Drink. Does it break a fast? I, 455.

Precept. See Law.

Precepts of the Decalogue, I, 226.

Preaching to be heard, I, 333; to be performed by a Parish Priest, II, 69.

Prescription. What does it effect? I, 506; its conditions, 507 et seq.; how is it interrupted? 514†.

Presence of Christ in the Eucharist, II, 175; of a priest for consecration, 182; of a Confessor for absolution, 301; of a Parish Priest at matrimony, 827.

Presumption, I, 175.

Meal. With respect to fasting, I, 456.

Precarium, I, 691.

Priesthood. See Order.

Price of a thing: how many kinds are there? Which is lawful? I, 732.

Prince. With respect to laws, I, 77; war, 390; tributes, 614.

Principles of human acts, I, 3; reflex principles in probabilism, 56; for forming conscience in doubts, 56.

Privilege, or a favorable law, I, 122. - Privileges of Clerics, II, 74; of Bishops, 75; of Religious, 111.

Probability. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 49; which kind is lawful? 56 et seq.

Probity in the Minister of the Sacraments, II, 136; in their subject, 150.

Proclamations of matrimony, II, 708.

Procurator. Obligation, II, 9; matrimony through a procurator, 718.

Prodigal. Can he validly contract? I, 647.

Profectitious goods: what are they? I, 486.

Religious profession, with respect to dissolution of betrothals, II, 691; dissolution of a ratified marriage, 731; irregularity, 1041. - See Bigamy.

Offspring. What if it is exposed in a hospital? I, 613.

Promise. What is it? I, 664; how does it bind? ibid.; betrothal promise, II, 677. - Promise of matrimony while one's spouse is living, 796.

Promulgation of law, I, 88.

Pronunciation in the Canonical Hours, II, 53.

Purpose. How does it differ from a vow? I, 314; required for contrition, II, 342.

Broker. His obligations, I, 741.

Neighbor. How must he be loved? I, 183; assisted? 193; corrected? 200.

Puberty, I, 642; II, 809.

Boy. With respect to obligation of law, I, 86; ownership, 485; confession, 447; Viaticum, II, 212; Extreme Unction, 660.

Q

Lent. See Fasting.

R

Roots of restitution, I, 546.

Robbery. What is it? I, 526.

Raptus (violent abduction) as a species of the sin of lust, I, 417; as invalidating matrimony, II, 832.

Ratified marriage, II, 716; how is it dissolved? 728.

Recidivist. Is he to be absolved? II, 601; how must he be treated by a Confessor? 603.

Recourse. To what is one furnishing recourse bound? I, 579.

Regulars. Their obligations, II, 94; with respect to reciting the Hours, 39; privileges, 111; approbation, 459; administering the Eucharist, 116; Extreme Unction, 658.

Rules for Religious, II, 90; for the scrupulous, I, 47. - Rules for interpreting law, 99; for absolving recidivists, II, 601; for conditional absolution, 304.

Single meal in fasting, I, 454.

Reference of actions to God, I, 28 et seq.

Report. A manner of receiving gain from money, I, 738.

Religion. Religious state, II, 85; vocation, 92; novitiate, 88; privileges, 111; obligations, 94; enclosure, 107, 1017.

Religious. See Regulars.

Relics of Saints, I, 227.

Remission by a creditor, I, 597; by one defamed, 436; of sin. See Absolution. - Of punishment due to sins. See Indulgence.

Found thing, I, 503.

Residence. Of a Bishop, II, 66; of a Parish Priest, 68.

Responses of the Holy See with respect to magnetism, I, 245, 250; fasting, 469; usury, 725; religious vows in France, II, 120; the obligation of celebrating for the people, 248; matrimony, 773; onanism, 919; Indulgences, 1066.

Reservation of cases. See Reserved cases.

Restitution. Obligation, I, 542; roots, 546; circumstances, 585; excusing causes, 597. - Restitution in particular, 600; for homicide in particular, 602; for defloration, 604; for adultery, 609; for fraud in tributes, 614; for damage on the occasion of military service, 619.

Mental restriction. What is it? How many kinds are there? Is it lawful, or which kind is lawful? I, 425.

Retrovendition. Is it lawful, and how? I, 737.

Accused person. Is he bound to confess his crime? II, 18.

Revalidation of confession, II, 395; of matrimony, 872.

Revelation of a crime, I, 426; of a secret, 440; of the sacramental seal, II, 628.

Reviviscence of the Sacraments, II, 150 et seq.

Revocation of a testament, I, 687; of a mandate, 573; of counsel, 575.

Rubrics at Mass, II, 576†.

S

Priest. Obligations. See Clerics. - With respect to distribution of the Eucharist, II, 193; celebration of Mass, 248; knowledge, 671.

Sacramentals. What are they, and what are their effects? II, 125.

Sacrament. Nature, II, 124; matter, 128; form, ibid.; Minister, 132; what is required for confecting it? ibid., 146; the obligation of administering it? 141; of denying it to the unworthy? 142; simulated administration? 144; requesting it from an unworthy minister? 151.

Sacrifice of the Mass. In what does it consist? II, 238; effects, 239; fruits, 240; application for the people, 248; application for a stipend, 251.

Sacrilege. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 256; with respect to lust, 415.

Cruelty as a cause of divorce, II, 740.

Tailor. Is he excused from the prohibition of labor on a feast day? I, 352; his obligation by reason of justice, II, 27.

Sacramental satisfaction, II, 408; its imposition, 409; fulfillment, 414; commutation, 417.

Scandal. What kind of sin is it? I, 204; concerning lust? 209; bad books? 211; dances? 212; spectacles? 214.

Knowledge necessary for those to be ordained, II, 671; for Confessors, 565; is it necessary for incurring a reserved case? 472; a censure? 931; an irregularity? 1037. - Knowledge of law for sin, I, 12 et seq., 41.

Scrupulous person. Rules for the scrupulous, I, 47; for Confessors, ibid.

Secret. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 440.

Old person. With respect to fasting, I, 464; with respect to matrimony, II, 884.

Burial. Who are unworthy of it? II, 1034; what must a Parish Priest observe concerning it? ibid.

Sequestration. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 693.

Servants, or domestics: obligations, I, 366; what is to be said concerning cooperation? 217; domestic thefts? 529.

Servitude as the servile state of a man, I, 484; as a species of ownership, 521; as a burden, ibid.

Seal of letters, I, 442; sacramental seal, II, 618†.

Signs of sorrow: ordinary, II, 589; extraordinary, 618.

Simony. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 267; various modes, 270; with respect to benefices, 271.

Simulation in the Sacraments, II, 144.

Society in a contract, I, 742.

Sodomy. How great a sin is it? I, 421.

Solidarity. Upon whom is it incumbent? I, 585.

Solicitation to shameful acts, II, 543; must the circumstance of solicitation be confessed with respect to every accomplice? I, 208.

Dreams. Do they merit belief? I, 235.

Divinatory lots, I, 234.

Sortilege, I, 234.

Danger of the principal, I, 704. - See Usury.
Species of sins, I, 134; of sacrileges, 256.
Specification. A manner of acquiring ownership, I, 518.
Spectacles. Are they lawful? I, 214.
Hope. Object, I, 173; opposed vices, 174.
Spiritism, I, 253.
Betrothals. Nature, II, 677; obligation, 688; dissolution, 691.
Betrothed persons. See Betrothals.
Wager. Is it lawful? I, 752.
Illegitimate child. With respect to inheritance, I, 682; with respect to irregularity, II, 1040.
Religious state, II, 85. - State of Clerics, 28; of laics, 1.
Stipend of servants, I, 366; for the celebration of Mass, II, 251.
Stock with respect to degrees of consanguinity, II, 778.
Stuprum. What kind of sin is it? I, 415; with respect to restitution, 604.
Subdelegation, I, 102; II, 827.
Subject of law, I, 84; of the Sacraments, II, 147; of Baptism, 160; of Confirmation, 172; of the Eucharist, 208; of Penance, 307; of Extreme Unction, 660; of Order, 670; of Matrimony, 749; of a censure, 949.
Subdiaconate. Is it a sacred Order? II, 664; is it a Sacrament? 665.
Substitution. See Fideicommissum.
Succession of inheritance, I, 680; of ascendants, ibid.; of descendants, ibid.; of collaterals, ibid.
Suicide, I, 370; its penalties, II, 1034.
Pride. What kind of sin is it? Its daughters, I, 154.
Superfluities of benefices, I, 494; of one's own state, 197.
Superstition. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 230.
Deaf person. With respect to confession, II, 387; with respect to irregularity, 1039.
Suspension. Its nature and effects, II, 1019.
Suspicion, I, 438.
T
Tobacco. Does powdered tobacco break a fast? II, 225; does tobacco smoke? ibid.
Turning tables (Tables tournantes), I, 236.
Obscene touches, I, 400; in a Church, 414; between spouses, II, 910.
Time for promulgating a law, I, 88; for observing it, ibid.; for custom, 121; for a vow, 325; for prescription, 509; for restitution, 595; for acts of Faith, 161; of Hope, 174; of Charity, 178; for Confession, 447; Communion, 449; Matrimony, II, 761.
Temptation. See Concupiscence. - Temptation of God, I, 254.
Testament. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 676; conditions, 677; obligations of heirs, 681.
Witness in a testament, I, 677; in judgment, II, 20; in matrimony, 809.
Found treasure: to whom does it belong? I, 503.
Dread. See Fear.
Title for prescription, I, 509; for an increase in a mutuum, 701; for hearing confession, II, 429; for receiving Orders, 670.
Tonsure. Obligation of wearing it, II, 35.
Tribute. Obligation of paying it, I, 615.
Triple contract. Is it lawful? I, 743.
Tutor, I, 644.
U
Unction in Baptism, II, 164; Confirmation, 168; Extreme Unction, 654.
Usury. What is it? Is it prohibited? I, 699; titles excusing from it, 701. - See Mutuum.
Use and usufruct, I, 521.
Wife. Her ownership, 488; thefts, 529; alms, 199; with respect to the vows of her husband and children, 325 et seq.; with respect to habitation, II, 908; with respect to the conjugal debt, ibid.
V
Vagrant. With respect to laws, I, 86; with respect to matrimony, II, 825.
Vain observance. What is it? What kind of sin is it? I, 231.
Vain usurpation of the name of God. Is it a sin, or what kind? I, 289.
Tax. See Tribute.
Hunting. Is it lawful on feasts? I, 351; is it prohibited to Clerics? II, 65.

Sale. Obligations of the seller, I, 729; of the buyer, 730; what is to be said concerning earnest money? 731; eviction? ibid.; a just price? 732; sale on credit? 734; retrovendition? 737; sale by auction? 738; through monopoly? 740; through brokers? 741. - Is sale lawful on feasts? 350; for Clerics? II, 65.

Vespers. Are they obligatory on a feast day? I, 333.

Sacred vestment: can it be converted to profane use? I, 266. - Garb of Clerics, II, 35.

Way of the Cross. Conditions, etc., II, 1066.

Viaticum. Who can give it? II, 193; and when can it be given? 203.

Vicar General with respect to jurisdiction, II, 434.

Wine in fasting, I, 454; in the Eucharist, II, 178.

Violation of a Church, II, 268; reconciliation, 269.

Divining rod. Is its use lawful? I, 235.

Virtue. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 185†. - Moral and theological virtues, ibid.; Faith, ibid.; Hope, 173; Charity, 176.

Force and violence with respect to a human act, I, 19; insofar as it invalidates matrimony, II, 806. - See Fear, Raptus (violent abduction).

Vocation to the religious state, II, 92; to Orders, 675.

Voluntary. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 3; its efficacy, 5.

Vomiting with respect to Communion, II, 212.

Vow. What is it? How many kinds are there? I, 313; obligation, 319; doubtful vow, 315; reserved, 329; commutation, 330; dispensation, 327; invalidation, 324. - Is a solemn vow admitted in France for nuns? II, 117; for Religious? 121. - Vow of poverty, 94; of chastity, 106; of obedience, 108. - Vow as a prohibiting impediment to matrimony, 762; as an invalidating impediment, 777. - Vow of virginity, II, 762; of chastity, ibid.; of receiving Orders, 763; of entering Religion, ibid.

Each reference is a link to the passage it cites; a reference into the other volume is left as the print sets it.