COMPENDIUM OF MORAL THEOLOGY

of Father John Peter Gury, S.J.,

revised by the author and enriched with the notes of Anthony Ballerini of the same Society, Professor in the Roman College

II

Particular States, the Sacraments, Censures

Eighth edition

Rome, Polyglot Press of the S. C. de Propaganda Fide, 1884.
The English translation is our own, made from the Latin for the Morals of the Church library, where the text may be read and searched online.

Contents

Title Page and Approvals 13

Compendium — Of Moral Theology 13

Volume Second 13

Treatise on Particular States ..... nn. 1–188 14

Part First. On the State of Laymen ..... nn. 1–37 14

Chapter I. On the Obligations of Judges ..... nn. 1–8 14

Appendix I. On Jurors ..... nn. 5–6 19

Appendix II. On Arbiters ..... nn. 7–8 20

Chapter II. On the Obligations of the Advocate and the Procurator ..... nn. 9–14 21

Chapter III. On the Obligations of the Apparitor ..... nn. 15–18 24

Chapter IV. On the Obligations of Scribes and Notaries ..... nn. 19–23 26

I. On Scribes or Secretaries 26

II. On Notaries 26

Chapter V. On the Obligations of the Accuser and of the Accused ..... nn. 24–26 28

I. On the Accuser 28

II. On the Accused 29

Chapter VI. On the Obligation of Witnesses ..... nn. 27–30 30

Chapter VII. On the Obligations of Physicians, Surgeons, and Pharmacists ..... nn. 31–34 33

Chapter VIII. On the Obligations of Guards ..... nn. 35–36 35

Chapter IX. On the State of Craftsmen and Workmen ..... n. 37 36

Part Second. On the State of Clerics ..... nn. 38–135 37

Chapter I. On the Common Obligations of Clerics ..... nn. 38–105 37

Article I. On the Positive Obligations of Clerics ..... nn. 38–97 37

§ I. On Holiness of Life ..... n. 38 37

§ II. On Celibacy ..... nn. 39–44 38

§ III. On Wearing the Habit and Tonsure ..... nn. 45–48 43

§ IV. On the Recitation of the Canonical Hours or Divine Office ..... nn. 49–97 44

Point I. On the Obligation of Reciting ..... nn. 50–61 44

Decree — Of the Sacred Congregation of Rites concerning the Present Liturgy of the Church of Le Mans, 10 Jan. 1852 ... 47

Point II. On the Time and Place and Position of Body Due for Reciting the Hours ... nn. 62–71 49

I. As to Time 49

II. As to Place and Position 54

Point III. On the Manner of Reciting the Hours ..... nn. 72–92 55

I. As to Order 55

II. As to Pronunciation 58

III. As to Attention and Devotion 61

Point IV. On Causes Excusing from the Recitation of the Hours ..... nn. 93–97 63

Article II. On the Negative Obligations of Clerics, or on Those Things Which Are Prohibited to Clerics ... nn. 98–105 67
§ I. On Habitation with Women ... nn. 99–100 67
§ II. On Games of Dice ... nn. 101–102 68
§ III. On Bearing Arms and Hunting ... nn. 103–104 69
§ IV. On Trading ... n. 105 69
Chapter II. On the Particular Obligations of Clerics ... nn. 106–135 70
Article I. On the Obligations of Bishops ... nn. 106–109 70
Article II. On the Obligations of Pastors ... nn. 110–114 71
Article III. On the Obligations of Canons ... nn. 115–135 74
I. As to Residence ... 74
II. As to the Office of Choir ... 75
III. As to the Conventual Mass ... 76
IV. As to Assistance of the Bishop, etc ... 76
V. As to the Duties of Canons, When the See Is Vacant ... 76
Appendix I. On the Privileges of Clerics ... nn. 123–126 77
I. On the Privileges of Clerics in Common ... 77
II. On the Privileges of Bishops ... 78
Appendix II. On the Benefices of Clerics ... nn. 127–135 84
I. On the Nature of Benefices ... 84
II. On the Acquisition of Benefices ... 84
III. On the Loss of Benefices ... 85
Part Third. On the Religious State ... nn. 136–188 86
Chapter I. On the Nature of the Religious State ... nn. 137–147 87
Chapter II. On Religious Vocation ... nn. 148–152 92
Chapter III. On the Obligations of Vows ... nn. 153–172 94
Article I. On the Vow of Poverty ... nn. 153–163 94
Article II. On the Vow of Chastity ... nn. 164–167 105
Article III. On the Vow of Obedience ... nn. 168–172 106
Chapter IV. On the Privileges of Regulars ... nn. 173–188 109
I. Concerning Exemption from Episcopal Jurisdiction ... 109
II. Concerning the Sacrament of Penance ... 110
III. Concerning Reserved Cases ... 111
IV. Concerning Irregularities and Impediments ... 113
V. Concerning Mass, Communion, and the Last Sacraments ... 113
VI. Concerning Particular Cases ... 114
Appendix. On the Current State of Regulars in France ... nn. 177–188 114
Treatise On the Sacraments in General ... nn. 189–233 121
Chapter I. On the Definition, Number, and Division of the Sacraments ... nn. 190–195 122
Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of the Sacraments ... nn. 196–201 126
I. On the Nature and Union of Matter and Form ... 126
II. On the Change of Matter and Form ... 128

III. On the Repetition of the Sacraments in Doubt Concerning the Valid Application of Matter and Form ... 128
Chapter III. On the Minister of the Sacraments ... nn. 202–226 130
Article I. On the Requisites for the Administration of the Sacraments, or on the Attention, Intention, Faith, and Probity of the Minister ... nn. 202–212 130
§ I. On the Attention of the Minister ... n. 202 130
§ II. On the Intention of the Minister ... nn. 203–206 130
§ III. On the Faith and Probity of the Minister ... nn. 207–212 133
Article II. On the Office of the Minister ... nn. 213–226 137
§ I. On the Obligation of Ministering the Sacraments ... nn. 213–216 137
§ II. On the Obligation of Denying the Sacraments to the Unworthy Who Ask ... nn. 217–222 139
§ III. On the Manner of Conferring the Sacraments ... nn. 223–226 142
Chapter IV. On the Subject of the Sacraments ... nn. 227–233 144
Article I. On the Requisites for the Valid Reception of the Sacraments ... nn. 228–230 144
Article II. On the Requisites for the Licit Reception of the Sacraments ... nn. 231–233 146

Treatise On Baptism ... nn. 234–259 149
Chapter I. On the Nature, Properties, and Necessity of Baptism ... nn. 234–235 150
Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of Baptism ... nn. 236–242 151
Article I. On the Matter, Both Remote and Proximate, of Baptism ... nn. 236–240 151
§ I. On the Remote Matter of Baptism ... nn. 236–237 151
§ II. On the Proximate Matter of Baptism ... nn. 238–240 152
Article II. On the Form of Baptism ... nn. 241–242 153
Chapter III. On the Minister of Baptism ... nn. 243–246 155
Chapter IV. On the Subject of Baptism ... nn. 247–249 157
Chapter V. On the Accessory Solemnities of Baptism, Namely on Sponsors and Ceremonies ... nn. 250–259 160
Article I. On Sponsors ... nn. 250–252 160
Article II. On the Ceremonies of Baptism ... nn. 253–259 161
Appendix. On the Caesarean Operation ... nn. 256–259 162

Treatise On Confirmation ... nn. 260–271 165
Chapter I. On the Matter and Form of Confirmation ... nn. 261–266 166
Article I. On the Matter of Confirmation ... nn. 261–264 166
Article II. On the Form of Confirmation ... nn. 265–266 167
Chapter II. On the Minister of Confirmation ... nn. 267–269 169
Chapter III. On the Subject of Confirmation ... nn. 270–271 171

Treatise On the Eucharist ... nn. 272–410 173
First Part. On the Eucharist as Sacrament ... nn. 272–345 173
Chapter I. On the Nature and Efficacy of the Eucharist ... nn. 272–275 173
Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of the Eucharist ... nn. 276–287 175

Article I. On the Matter of the Eucharist ..... nn. 276–284 175
I. On Remote Matter 175
II. On Proximate Matter, or on the Use of the Matter Required in the Consecration Itself ... 177
Article II. On the Form of the Sacrament of the Eucharist ..... nn. 285–287 183
Chapter III. On the Minister of the Eucharist ..... nn. 288–315 185
Article I. On the Power of the Minister of the Eucharist ..... nn. 288–290 185
Article II. On the Obligation of Dispensing the Eucharist ..... nn. 291–293 188
Article III. On the Things Required for the Licit Dispensation of the Holy Eucharist ... nn. 294–303 189
Article IV. On the Manner of Ministering the Eucharist to the Sick ..... nn. 304–308 195
Article V. On the Manner of Preserving the Holy Eucharist ..... nn. 309–315 198
Chapter IV. On the Subject of the Eucharist ..... nn. 316–345 202
Article I. On the Obligation of Receiving the Eucharist ..... nn. 316–323 202
Article II. On the Dispositions Required in the Subject of the Eucharist: 1. as to the Soul, 2. as to the Body ... nn. 324–345 211
sec. I. On the dispositions of the soul 211
sec. II. On the dispositions of the body 214
Point I. On the Fast Required for Communion ..... nn. 329–335 214
Point II. On the Decency of the Body ..... nn. 336–337 219
Appendix I. On Frequent Communion ..... nn. 338–344 220
Appendix II. On Spiritual Communion ..... n. 345 225
Second Part. On the Eucharist as Sacrifice ..... nn. 346–410 226
Chapter I. On the Nature and Efficacy of the Sacrifice of the Mass ..... nn. 347–353 227
Chapter II. On the Application of the Sacrifice of the Mass ..... nn. 354–358 231
Chapter III. On the Obligation of Celebrating ..... nn. 359–380 234
Article I. On the Obligation of Celebrating by Reason of the Priesthood ..... nn. 359–360 234
Article II. On the Obligation of Celebrating by Reason of Office ..... nn. 361–366 235
Article III. On the Obligation of Celebrating by Reason of a Stipend ..... nn. 367–380 238
Appendix. For Priests of the Society of Jesus ..... nn. 378–380 246
Chapter IV. On the Time and Place of Celebration ..... nn. 381–390 249
Article I. On the Time of Celebration ..... nn. 381–385 249
Article II. On the Place of Celebration ..... nn. 386–390 252
Chapter V. On the Manner of Celebrating ..... nn. 391–410 254
Article I. On the Requisites for Mass ..... nn. 391–401 254
Article II. On the Rubrics ..... nn. 402–410 260

Treatise On the Sacrament of Penance ..... nn. 411–671 266
First Part. On the Essence of the Sacrament of Penance ..... nn. 412–439 267
Chapter I. On the Nature of Penance ..... nn. 412–416 267
Chapter II. On the Matter of the Sacrament of Penance ..... nn. 417–424 271
Chapter III. On the Form of the Sacrament of Penance ..... nn. 425–439 280
Appendix. On the Conditional Form ..... nn. 431–439 282

Part II. On the Subject of the Sacrament of Penance ..... nn. 440–536 287
Or on the Acts of the Penitent 287
Chapter I. On Contrition ..... nn. 440–463 287
Article I. On Contrition ..... nn. 441–457 288
§ I. On the Necessity of Contrition ..... nn. 442–448 290
§ II. On the Qualities of Contrition ..... nn. 449–453 302
§ III. On the Efficacy of Contrition ..... nn. 454–457 312
Article II. On the Purpose ..... nn. 458–463 314
Chapter II. On Confession ..... nn. 464–520 327
Article I. On the Necessity of Confession ..... nn. 464–466 327
Article II. On the Qualities of Confession ..... nn. 467–510 328
On the Integrity of Confession 330
§ I. On the Necessity of Integrity ..... nn. 469–496 330
Point I. On the Necessity of Integrity in General ..... nn. 469–476 330
Point II. On Doubtful Sins ..... nn. 477–481 333
Point III. On the Circumstances of Sins ..... nn. 482–493 338
Point IV. On Forgotten Sins ..... nn. 494–496 344
§ II. On Causes Excusing from Integrity in General, and Especially with Regard to the Dying ... nn. 497–506 346
Point I. On Causes Excusing from Integrity in General ..... nn. 497–504 346
Point II. On the Confession and Absolution of the Dying ..... nn. 505–506 353
Appendix I. On the Examination of Conscience ..... nn. 507–510 355
Article III. On the Repetition of Confession ..... nn. 511–520 358
Appendix II. On General Confession ..... nn. 517–519 364
I. On the Necessity or Suitability of General Confession 364
II. On the Manner of Making a General Confession 365
Appendix III. Norm for a General Confession ..... n. 520 367
to be conducted by questions 367
Chapter III. On Satisfaction ..... nn. 521–536 369
Article I. On the Imposition of Penance ..... nn. 521–526 369
Article II. On the Fulfillment of Penance ..... nn. 527–536 374
Appendix. On Penances More Usefully Imposed ..... nn. 535–536 380
I. Works of Piety 380
II. Works of Mortification 381
III. Medicinal Penances 382
Part III. On the Minister of Penance ..... nn. 537–671 383
Chapter I. On the Power of the Minister ..... nn. 537–598 383
Article I. On Approval ..... nn. 538–544 383
Article II. On Jurisdiction ..... nn. 545–569 387
Appendix I. On the Jurisdiction and Approval of Regulars ..... nn. 557–564 411
Appendix II. On Jurisdiction with Respect to Nuns ..... nn. 565–569 416
Article III. On Reserved Cases ..... nn. 570–598 419

§ I. On the Reservation of Cases, or on the Principle and Nature of Reservation ... nn. 570–573 419
§ II. On Absolution from Reserved Cases ... nn. 574–583 456
Appendix I. On Absolution of One's Own Accomplice in a Shameful Sin ... nn. 584–589 472
Appendix II. On Solicitation in Confession ... nn. 590–598 477
Chapter II. On the Office of the Minister ... nn. 599–671 490
Article I. On the Office of the Minister in Confession ... nn. 599–642 490
§ I. On the Duties of the Confessor ... nn. 599–627 490
Point I. On the Office of Father ... nn. 599–602 490
Point II. On the Office of Physician ... nn. 603–605 493
Point III. On the Office of Teacher ... nn. 606–613 495
Section I — On the Knowledge of the Confessor ... 495
Section II — On the Obligation of Instructing Penitents ... 498
Point IV. On the Office of Judge ... nn. 614–627 501
Section I — On Instructing the Cause, or on the Obligation of Questioning Penitents ... 501
Section II — On Rendering the Sentence, or on Granting, Deferring, or Denying Absolution ... 506
§ II. On the Manner of Acting with Various Kinds of Penitents ... nn. 628–642 518
Point I. On Those Who Are Situated in an Occasion of Sin ... nn. 628–631 518
Point II. On Habitual Sinners and Recidivists ... nn. 632–640 524
Rules ... 525
Rule II ... 526
Point III. On Devout Penitents ... nn. 641–642 541
General Rules of Direction ... 541
Article II. On the Office of the Minister After Confession ... nn. 643–671 542
§ I. On the Obligation of Correcting Defects Committed in Confession ... nn. 643–646 542
§ II. On the Seal of Confession ... nn. 647–671 546
Point I. On the Obligation of the Seal ... nn. 647–650 546
Point II. On the Subject of the Seal ... nn. 651–654 547
Point III. On the Object of the Seal ... nn. 655–663 549
Point IV. On the Various Ways of Violating the Seal ... nn. 664–671 555

Treatise on Extreme Unction ... nn. 672–693 567
Chapter I. On the Nature and Effects of Extreme Unction ... nn. 672–673 568
Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of Extreme Unction ... nn. 674–683 569
Article I. On the Matter of This Sacrament ... nn. 674–681 569
Article II. On the Form of Extreme Unction ... nn. 682–683 571
Chapter III. On the Minister of Extreme Unction ... nn. 684–688 573
Chapter IV. On the Subject of Extreme Unction ... nn. 689–693 576

Treatise on Order ... nn. 694–721 578
Chapter I. On the Nature and Division of Order ... nn. 694–699 579
Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of Order ... nn. 700–703 582
Chapter III. On the Minister of the Sacrament of Order ... nn. 704–708 585

Chapter IV. On the Subject of the Sacrament of Order ..... nn. 709–721 587
Appendix. On Clerical Vocation ..... nn. 719–721 591

Treatise on Matrimony ..... nn. 722–931 593
Chapter I. On Betrothals ..... nn. 722–733 594
Article I. On the Nature of Betrothals ..... nn. 722–725 594
Division 595
Article II. On the Obligation and Effects of Betrothals ..... nn. 726–730 602
Article III. On the Dissolution of Betrothals ..... nn. 731–733 605
Chapter II. On the Proclamation of Banns ..... nn. 734–743 620
Article I. On the Necessity of Banns ..... nn. 734–735 620
Article II. On the Circumstances of the Banns ..... nn. 736–738 621
I. Circumstance of Time 621
II. Circumstance of Place 622
III. Circumstance of Persons, Namely, Minors, Soldiers, Wanderers, and Servants 623
Article III. On Dispensation from the Banns ..... nn. 739–740 623
Article IV. On the Revelation of Impediments ..... nn. 741–743 625
Chapter III. On the Nature and Properties of Matrimony ..... nn. 744–764 627
Article I. On the Nature of Matrimony ..... nn. 744–756 627
Article II. On the Properties of Matrimony, Namely, its Unity and Firmness ... nn. 757–764 636
I. On the Unity of Matrimony 636
II. On the Firmness of Matrimony 637
Point I. On the Firmness of Matrimony Insofar as It Regards the Bond ..... nn. 758–759 637
Point II. On the Firmness of Matrimony Insofar as It Regards the Bed, and on Divorce from the Bed ... nn. 760–764 647
Chapter IV. On the Matter and Form of Matrimony ..... nn. 765–766 652
Chapter V. On the Minister and Subject of Matrimony ..... nn. 767–775 653
Article I. On the Minister ..... nn. 767–771 653
Article II. On the Subject of Matrimony ..... nn. 772–775 655
Chapter VI. On the Impediments of Matrimony ..... nn. 776–889 658
Article I. On Impediments Impeding Matrimony ..... nn. 776–784 658
I. The Prohibition of the Church 665
II. Time 665
III. Betrothals 666
IV. Vow 666
Article II. On Diriment Impediments ..... nn. 785–889 669
§ I. On Diriment Impediments in General ..... nn. 785–793 669
Proposition I 669
Proposition II 669
Errors Condemned by Pius IX — Concerning Matrimony and its Impediments 676
§ II. On the Impediments in Species ..... nn. 794–860 677

Point I. On the Impediment of Error and Condition ... nn. 795–796 677
Point II. On the Impediment of Vow and Order ... nn. 797–798 679
Point III. On the Impediment of Relationship ... nn. 799–809 680
Section I — On Natural Relationship ... 680
Rules for Computing Degrees of Consanguinity ... 681
1. On the Father's Side ... 683
2. On the Mother's Side ... 684
Degrees of Consanguinity ... 684
Section II — On Spiritual Relationship ... 685
Section III — On Legal Relationship ... 687
Principles ... 687
Point IV. On the Impediment of Affinity ... nn. 810–815 689
Degrees of Affinity ... 691
Point V. On the Impediment of Public Propriety ... nn. 816–819 693
Rules ... 693
Point VI. On the Impediment of Crime ... nn. 820–823 695
I. Adultery Alone ... 695
II. Homicide Alone ... 697
III. Both Together ... 697
Point VII. On the Impediment of Disparity of Worship ... nn. 824–831 700
Point VIII. On the Impediment of Force or Fear ... n. 832 704
Point IX. On the Impediment of Prior Bond ... nn. 833–834 705
Point X. On the Impediment of Age ... n. 835 706
Point XI. On the Impediment of Clandestinity ... nn. 836–853 707
Section I — On the Force of the Decree of the Council of Trent ... 707
Section II — On the Assistance of the Pastor ... 718
I. What Kind of Pastor Ought to Assist ... 718
II. How the Pastor Ought to Assist ... 722
Point XII. On the Impediment of Impotence ... nn. 854–856 724
Point XIII. On the Impediment of Abduction ... nn. 857–860 726
§ III. On Dispensation from Diriment Impediments of Matrimony ... nn. 861–889 728
Point I. On the Power of Dispensing ... nn. 861–863 728
Point II. On the Causes of Dispensation ... nn. 864–875 729
Point III. On the Manner of Seeking a Dispensation ... nn. 876–889 752
Forms — For Seeking Dispensations — I. from the Datary ... 756
II. from the Penitentiary ... 756
Another Form for a Vow of Perpetual Chastity ... 757
Another Form concerning the Same Matter ... 757
Chapter VII. On the Revalidation of Marriage ... nn. 890–905 759
Article I. On the Revalidation of a Marriage Invalid Through Defect of Consent ... n. 891 759
Article II. On the Revalidation of a Marriage Invalid Through Defect of the Prescribed Form ... nn. 892–894 759

Article III. On the Revalidation of a Marriage Invalid Through the Incapacity of the Parties ... nn. 895–905 761
§ I. On the Revalidation of Marriage in the Ordinary Manner ... nn. 895–900 761
§ II. On the Revalidation of Marriage with a Dispensation in the Root ... nn. 901–905 763
Chapter VIII. On the Conjugal Debt ... nn. 906–931 767
Article I. On the Liceity of the Conjugal Act: 1. in Itself; 2. with Respect to Circumstances ... nn. 907–914 767
§ I. On the Liceity of the Conjugal Act Considered in Itself ... nn. 907–908 767
§ II. On the Liceity of the Conjugal Act with Respect to Circumstances ... nn. 909–914 784
I. on the Circumstances of the Person ... 784
II. on the Circumstances of Manner or Position ... 785
III. On the Circumstances of Time ... 786
Article II. On the Obligation of the Conjugal Act ... nn. 915–916 788
Article III. On the Sins of Spouses ... nn. 917–931 789
§ I. On the Sins of Spouses by Excess ... nn. 918–920 789
§ II. On Onanism in Particular ... nn. 921–931 794
Decisions — Of the Sacred Congregations concerning Onanism ... 797
Treatise On Censures ... nn. 932–1014 800
Chapter I. On Censures in General ... nn. 932–955 801
Article I. On the Nature, Division, and Conditions of Censures ... nn. 932–941 801
I. On the Nature of a Censure ... 801
II. Division of Censures ... 801
III. Conditions of Censures ... 802
Article II. On the Principle or Author of Censures ... nn. 942–946 817
Article III. On the Subject of Censures ... nn. 947–950 825
Article IV. On Absolution from Censures ... nn. 951–955 831
Chapter II. On Censures in Particular, Namely: 1. on Excommunication; 2. on Suspension; 3. on Interdict ... nn. 956–1014 838
Article I. On Excommunication ... nn. 956–992 838
I. On the Nature and Division of Excommunication ... 838
II. On the Effects of Excommunication ... 840
I. Deprivation of the Sacraments ... 842
II. Deprivation of Divine Offices ... 844
III. Deprivation of the Common Suffrages of the Church ... 845
IV. Deprivation of Ecclesiastical Burial ... 846
V. Deprivation of Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction ... 846
VI. Deprivation of Benefices ... 847
VII. Deprivation of Forensic Communication ... 847
VIII. Deprivation of Civil Society ... 848
III. On Excommunications in Particular ... 848
Point I. Excommunications Reserved to the Supreme Pontiff ... nn. 972–975 850
I. Reserved in a Special Manner ... 850

II. Latae Sententiae Excommunications Reserved to the Roman Pontiff 859
Point II. Latae Sententiae Excommunications Reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries ... n. 976 869
Point III. Latae Sententiae Excommunications Reserved to No One ..... n. 977 870
Point IV ..... nn. 978–979 874
Point V. Ferendae Sententiae Excommunications ..... n. 980 875
Appendix I. On the Crime of Heresy, the Reading of Depraved Books, and the Index ... nn. 981–988 876
I. On the Crime of Heresy 876
Principles concerning Absolution from Heresy 877
II. On the Reading of Depraved Books 877
III. On the Index of Prohibited Books 879
Principal Rules of the Index Issued by Command of the Council of Trent 879
Appendix II. On the Enclosure of Monasteries ..... nn. 989–992 882
With Respect To: 1. Those Entering; 2. Those Departing; 3. Those Conversing at the Grilles Without Faculty — I. With Respect to Entrance into Monasteries ... 882
II. With Respect to Departure from Monasteries 882
III. With Respect to Conversation at the Grilles with Nuns 883
Article II. On Suspension ..... nn. 993–1001 884
Latae Sententiae Suspensions Reserved to the Roman Pontiff 886
Short Appendix — On Deposition and Degradation 892
Article III. On Interdict ..... nn. 1002–1014 892
Interdicts Reserved to the Roman Pontiff 894
An Interdict Not Reserved 895
Interdicts Imposed by the Council of Trent 896
Appendix I. On Cessation from Divine Offices ..... n. 1009 896
Appendix II. On Ecclesiastical Burial ..... nn. 1010–1014 896

Treatise On Irregularities ..... nn. 1015–1040 899
Chapter I. On Irregularities in General ..... nn. 1015–1020 900
Chapter II. On Irregularities in Particular ..... nn. 1021–1040 903
Article I. On Irregularities from Defect ..... nn. 1021–1030 903
I. From Defect of Mind 903
II. From Defect of Body 903
III. From Defect of Birth 904
IV. From Defect of Age 904
V. From Defect of Freedom 905
VI. From Defect of Sacrament 905
VII. From Defect of Lenity 906
VIII. From Defect of Reputation 906
Article II. On Irregularities from Delict ..... nn. 1031–1040 907
I. Repetition and Improper Reception of Baptism 907
II. Usurpation or Illicit Reception of Orders 907

III. Violation of a Censure 908
IV. Enormous Crimes 908
V. Homicide and Mutilation 908

Appendix. On Indulgences and the Jubilee ..... nn. 1041–1107 911

Chapter I. On Indulgences ..... nn. 1041–1060 912
Chapter II. On the Jubilee ..... nn. 1061–1107 923
Conditions Required for the Jubilee 924
More Recent Decisions of the Roman Curia — Concerning Indulgences — Petition — Concerning the Confession Required for Gaining Indulgences ... 929
Petition — Concerning the Tablets Used for the Exercise of the Holy Way of the Cross ... 930
Concerning the Requirements for Gaining Indulgences for the Exercise of the Way of the Cross ... 931
Response — Of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences Concerning Various Indulgences ... 931
Indult of His Holiness Pope Gregory XVI 932
Questions Concerning Indulgences 932
Concerning Chaplets Made in the Form of Rings 933
Concerning the Intervention of the Ordinary with Respect to Indulgences Granted by the Apostolic See ... 933
Concerning the Indulgence at the Point of Death 934
Concerning the Privileged Altar 934
Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences Concerning a Privileged Altar 935
Concerning the Indulgence of the Portiuncula 935
Second Appendix — Responses of the Sacred Penitentiary Prescribing the Norm for Absolving Those Who Have Incurred a Censure Both for the Invasion of the Pontifical Territory and for the Usurpation of Ecclesiastical Goods ... 936
Response of the Holy Office of the Holy Inquisition Concerning Fasting 941
Third Appendix — Note of the Editor to No. 819, Note (d), Volume II of Father Gury 945
Fourth Appendix — Note of the Editor to No. 867, Note (b. 39), Volume II of Father Gury ... 945
Wednesday, 1 February 1882 945
Wednesday, 8 August 1866 945

Index of Volume II (as printed) 947

Alphabetical Index (as printed) 953

Title Page and Approvals

Compendium — Of Moral Theology

OF FATHER JOHN PETER GURY, S.J.

REVISED BY THE AUTHOR

AND

ENRICHED WITH THE ANNOTATIONS

OF ANTHONY BALLERINI

OF THE SAME SOCIETY

PROFESSOR IN THE ROMAN COLLEGE

EIGHTH EDITION

MORE POLISHED AND ENLARGED WITH NEW CARES ESPECIALLY BY RESPONSES TO THE ALPHONSIAN VINDICATIONS

Volume Second

ROME

FROM THE POLYGLOT PRESS

OF THE S. C. DE PROPAGANDA FIDE

MDCCCLXXXIV. The rights which are by law, the publishers reserve to themselves.

Since the work whose title is Compendium of Moral Theology of Father John Peter Gury, S.J., revised by the Author and enriched with the annotations of Anthony Ballerini of the same Society, Professor in the Roman College, etc., has been reviewed by certain theologians of the same Society, to whom this was entrusted, and they have approved that it can be published; we grant the faculty that it be committed to type, if it shall seem so to those whom it concerns.

In faith of which we have given these letters, signed by our hand and furnished with the seal of our Society.

Rome, 15 October 1874.

PETER BECKX, Praep. General of the Society of Jesus.

IMPRIMATUR

Fr. VINCENT M. GATTI, O.P.

Master of the Sacred Apostolic Palace.

Treatise on Particular States

One must treat of the state 1° of laymen, 2° of clerics, 3° of regulars.

Part First. On the State of Laymen

Already in the fourth precept of the Decalogue we have spoken about the various and mutual duties of superiors and inferiors. But in the present Treatise we must speak about the duties which regard the public good, and especially about forensic duties. Hence

One must treat 1° of the obligations of judges; 2° of advocates and procurators; 3° of apparitors; 4° of scribes and notaries; 5° of the accuser and the accused; 6° of witnesses; 7° of physicians, surgeons, and pharmacists; 8° of guards; 9° of craftsmen and workmen.

But the obligations of merchants and other men of this sort are sufficiently understood from those things which we have discussed concerning justice and contracts.

Chapter I. On the Obligations of Judges

1. ○ A judge is a public person, constituted by legitimate authority [1], in order that according to the laws he may vindicate justice, and decree the due punishments against delinquents.

[1] By this the judge is distinguished from an arbiter, who assumes the office of judging not by public authority, but by the spontaneous choice of the contending parties.

Principles. - I. A judge is bound, from a quasi-contract with society, to fulfill his office rightly; and unless he does this, he will be guilty of violated justice, both legal justice and also commutative justice.

II. In order that a judge may be able to discharge his office rightly, he must have 1° intelligence equal to the office, so that he may be able to look into intricate causes; 2° sufficient knowledge and sagacity, so that he may take account of all the circumstances both of law and of fact [2]; 3° incorruptible integrity, so that he yield neither to love nor to hatred.

[2] Whoever seeks or undertakes the office of judge, knowing himself to be so unequal to it that he foresees that probably grave damage to his neighbor will follow, sins mortally. But whether knowingly or unknowingly he has done this through his insufficiency, he ought not be absolved unless he resigns the office, or unless he has a firm purpose of resigning, or at least, if there is hope that he will become fit by study, of supplying meanwhile for his insufficiency by using the counsels and work of another endowed both with ability and with knowledge. St. Alphonsus, Bk. 4, n. 195.

III. A judge is bound to pass sentence according to the laws and the order determined by the laws; for he is not constituted to change or reform the laws, but to put them into execution [3]. Except a special case, in which the mind of the law is rather to be followed by the judge than the bark of the words; but then account must also be taken of the age, and of the condition and fortune of him upon whom he must impose punishment [4].

[3] These things hold for an inferior judge, who ordinarily cannot relax or lessen a penalty, even if the plaintiff consents, unless at times epikeia should dictate that it be done otherwise for the good of the republic, or unless the matter concerned only the private injury of the plaintiff. Yet the supreme judge can do this for a just cause; and if this is lacking, he would sin gravely, because he would embolden delinquents and would concur in sin. St. Alphonsus, Bk. 4, n. 205.

[4] Account of these circumstances is taken in the laws themselves. Wherefore, not even in these circumstances is the matter fully left to the discretion of the judge.

IV. In a doubtful cause let him hold these rules:

1º In criminal matters the accused is to be favored [5], unless the crime is established. - Rule of canon law 11 in 6º.

[5] Understand this both of the existence of guilt and of the merits of punishments.

2º In doubt about ownership and possession at the same time, judgment must be made according to the more probable reasons, as is clear from natural law and from the 2nd proposition condemned by Innocent XI, which sounds thus: "I probably judge that a judge can judge according to an opinion even less probable." But if the reasons are equally probable on each side, the thing must be divided [6].

[6]  Gury ought not to have passed over in silence another opinion, which several have embraced (see Lugo, On Justice, disp. 37, nn. 114, 115), and they, as the Salmanticenses say (tr. 29, ch. 1, n. 41), very grave Doctors, and which Lugo (l.c.) expresses thus: "When each opinion is equally probable, the judge indeed will do better by seeking to bring the parties back to agreement; nevertheless absolutely he can choose one of them." And Sanchez (Dec., bk. 4, ch. 9, n. 45): "It is truer that it is open to the judge to choose the opinion which he shall have preferred, and to judge according to it; indeed, scandal ceasing, now according to one, now according to another." I said that this opinion ought not to have been passed over in silence, since the opposite opinion, which alone Gury proposes, even the Salmanticenses themselves (l.c. n. 42) merely hold as the more probable for themselves.

This also must not be omitted, that for that opinion of the Salmanticenses and Gury, St. Alphonsus also alleged Villalobos, Prado, Sayrus, etc., since he found them cited by the Salmanticenses. But these authors, and others whom St. Alphonsus tacitly indicates, the Salmanticenses were adducing not where the question is about equal probability on the part of the law, but where there is equal probability on the part of the fact. For where there is discourse about equal probability of law, even the Salmanticenses (ibid. n. 41) acknowledge that the aforesaid authors think with Lugo and Sanchez against Gury.

Besides, whichever opinion at last you prefer in this question, the authors rightly warn (p. 926) that an exception must be made, as St. Alphonsus has it (Bk. 4, n. 410), if there is question of causes of matrimony, dowry, widow, ward, and other pious causes; for then one must judge for these, when the rights are equal, even if they are plaintiffs, from the final chapter De sentent. et re iudicata. Yet one must confess that hence a difficulty arises against the opinion of Gury, which otherwise St. Alphonsus (l.c.) says must be held entirely, namely that generally the thing must be divided among the parties. For this opinion St. Alphonsus after Roncaglia and Reiffenstuel brings this reason, because the judge is not the owner of things, but a distributor, and, as Reiffenstuel says, a minister of justice according to the rights of the parties; and therefore if the rights are equal, he must divide the thing equally between them. But when Canon Law, alleged by St. Alphonsus, commands that, if there is question of widows and wards, judgment in the case must be made for these, does it command that the rights of justice be violated? And if it is not lawful to affirm this, and otherwise the right of the other party must by no means be said to perish of itself because the right of the ward or widow is equal, how, while the laws of justice are preserved, will the judge not decree that the thing be divided, but be able to adjudge the whole thing to the other party? Therefore it is not without reason that very grave theologians, say the Salmanticenses, and very many and those not of slight name, as Roncaglia calls them (tr. 15, q. 2, ch. 1, q. 9), gave little or nothing to the argument which both Roncaglia and Reiffenstuel, and after them St. Alphonsus, thought most firm.

4º† In doubt about ownership alone, one must stand for the certain possessor. This is established from the rule of law: In equal fault or cause [7], the condition of the possessor is better. - St. Lig., n. 210.

[7] In order that the cause may be called equal, the reasons of each party must be equally probable. But if the reasons of the plaintiff are more probable, that rule of law, as St. Alphonsus admits, has no place; nor does the opinion, though more common, of those who oblige the judge to pass sentence for the possessor exceed the limits of probability. See St. Alphonsus, Bk. 4, n. 210, q. II.

2. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Can a judge condemn an accused person whom by private knowledge only he knows to be guilty, or an innocent person who juridically is proved guilty?

Resp. to the 1st: By no means, according to all. The reason is that a judge is bound to judge according to the things alleged, and according to the forms prescribed by law. For there is no danger in sometimes releasing a hidden guilty man, whereas there would be great danger in violating the established forms of trial [8].

[8] Understand this of an inferior judge, who cannot dispense from the law, especially in a matter of such great moment. For although power to kill someone from private knowledge is denied to a prince when there is question of a crime, nevertheless this is lawful for him if there is question of preventing an evil which threatens the republic through some person. Thus the common opinion apud Lugo, On Justice, disp. 57, n. 50. Moreover, speaking about civil causes and about the removal of offices, etc., perhaps a greater power is in the prince for this, that from private knowledge he can sometimes condemn an accused person not convicted. Thus Lugo (l.c. n. 54), in whose work you may see the reasons for this doctrine.

Resp. to the 2nd: It is much disputed. St. Thomas, 2.2, q. 64, art. 6, affirms. St. Bonaventure denies. St. Ligorius, n. 208, admits each opinion as probable, if there is question of civil causes, or even of criminal causes of lesser moment; but if a case occurs concerning greater criminal causes, and especially capital ones, he thinks the opinion of St. Bonaventure the more right. The reason is that in the former case it can be said, at least probably, that a private inconvenience must yield to the common good, since it is not so great. But it is otherwise in the latter case; and therefore then to condemn the innocent seems intrinsically evil [9].

[9] There are three principal opinions, says Lugo (disp. 57, n. 42), on this point. The first denies that it is ever lawful for a judge to pronounce sentence against him whom he certainly knows to be innocent. The second, extremely contrary, affirms that a judge can always pronounce sentence in any cause according to the things alleged and proved. St. Thomas holds this, and without doubt theologians and jurists commonly incline to this side. The third, a middle opinion, distinguishes concerning criminal causes in which there is question of the penalty of life or mutilation, and in these it denies that it is lawful for a judge to condemn the innocent; but in civil causes, or where there is question of a pecuniary penalty or exile, or deprivation of offices, it concedes that it is lawful. They give this reason for this last part (n. 44), that although the republic does not have dominion over the life and members of subjects, nevertheless it does have it over these other goods, so that, a just cause arising on account of the common good, it can dispose of them, and take away goods, deprive men of offices, expel citizens from the city, etc. Therefore it is credible that it gave this power to the judge for this end, that judgment be made according to the laws and proofs, lest the judicial order be contemned, the observance of which conduces supremely to the peace and quiet of the republic. These things indeed more clearly define and explain the doctrine of the Author, and give its more inward reason.

But the judgment of Cardinal de Lugo concerning the aforesaid opinions is this (ibid. n. 45): "Among these opinions the second is very probable because of the authority of St. Thomas and the common opinion; yet the third perhaps has more efficacious reasons: for although not all its arguments prove the point, some nevertheless have great force."

Each one can see for himself the reasons for each of these opinions in the same de Lugo; here it is better to subjoin, from the same author (ibid. n. 41), those things which are outside controversy: "It is certain in the first place," he says, "that that judge is bound to try all means and to use every diligence to liberate that accused man. First, by devising causes sufficient to repel the accusation. Second, by examining the witnesses with the greatest dexterity, after the example of Daniel, by questioning the circumstances of place, time, etc., until he finds them disagreeing. Third, he will be able, if it can be done without scandal, to dissemble in the custody of the prison, so that the innocent man can flee. Fourth, to remit the cause to a superior judge, and before him to testify to the innocence of the accused, which he himself knows. Fifth, if the judge is the supreme prince, he can more easily absolve the accused by absolute power, according to which a prince can sometimes remit a due penalty." The sum of these things is taken from St. Thomas, 2.2, q. 64, art. 6, ad 3, and q. 67, art. 2. And from these Lugo rightly concludes that it can happen very rarely that a judge cannot liberate him whom he certainly knows to be innocent.

3. ○ QUESTION 2º. Can a judge accept gifts for passing sentence?

Resp. No. For this is prohibited by every law: 1º by natural law, at least in some way [10], because gifts blind the mind and impel it to favor the giver more than is just; and hence arises the vice of acceptance of persons; 2º by canon law; for in 6º (bk. 1, tit. 3, ch. 2), Boniface VIII established that judges should accept neither any gift, nor anything else, unless perhaps food and drink offered from mere liberality; 3º positive law, both Roman and French, is consonant. Thus in art. 177 of the Penal Code every corruption of magistrates by gifts and promises is punished with grave penalties, both in the corrupted and in those corrupting [11].

[10] It is said, "in some way"; for the matter concerns only temptation, or the danger of prevarication, which the law of nature commands to be removed. Hence St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 216) only says that sin is sometimes committed.

[11] If a judge sins by receiving gifts, by that very fact whoever offers them also sins; for he cooperates in another's sin. Except, however, the unlearned, whom ignorance very often excuses. Likewise except, if gifts are given to redeem an unjust vexation, when otherwise an unjust sentence seems prudently to be feared; nevertheless these must be restored, and also can be recovered in court after the sentence. St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 212) with the common opinion. Except also, besides other cases apud Lugo, disp. 37, n. 132, with Laymann (Bk. 3, tr. 4, ch. 4, n. 9), if the judge has been engaged without sufficient stipend, or if he increases his labor to expedite someone's cause more swiftly, without damage to others. Laymann adds that he does not dare condemn an accepted gift, considered by natural law, if a judge expedites the cause of one before others, when it is within his discretion whom he should prefer to whom; yet he subjoins that the matter is not free from danger; and Lugo (l.c. n. 136) reproves it absolutely, because whenever he is bound from justice to do something gratuitously from among alternatives, he cannot accept anything for the choice of this part.

But as to those things which depend only on positive law, Lugo adds another observation (l.c. n. 132), namely that in some places fees are accepted from litigants beyond the public stipend; and the acceptance of these fees in certain places has been established by custom. "In general," he continues, "observe that all those things which in this kind are held by legitimately prescribed custom are presumed lawful, provided they are not against natural law; but where that custom does not exist, one must stand by the particular law of each kingdom or province; for individual ones are accustomed to have their own laws on this point, more or less strict, which will oblige as long as they are not abrogated by a contrary custom."

QUESTION 3º. Is a judge bound to restitution if he has accepted gifts from litigants?

Resp. Probably no, before sentence; because even if he acts illicitly by accepting gifts, nevertheless he does not sin against justice. Thus more commonly: Lugo, Lessius, St. Antoninus, Azor, against others, who also probably affirm. St. Ligorius, n. 216, says that each opinion is sufficiently probable [12].

[12] St. Alphonsus in this place reports the doctrine of the Salmanticenses from tr. XIII, ch. 1, nn. 170-173, where the discussion is not about this special question, but generally: whether from an illicit donation, and one reprobated by the laws, there arises in the receiver an obligation of restitution. And indeed, while the Salmanticenses mingle together both things which are given for sins perpetrated, and things which merely foster the avarice of the receivers, and things which are acquired simoniacally or in a game of chance forbidden by the laws (to which pertain the two places of St. Thomas alleged by them, one of which St. Alphonsus brings here after them), they introduce such confusion that it is not permitted to extract anything in reality from them.

Therefore it is better to retain the opinion which St. Alphonsus (l.c.) reports thus from Busembaum: "Even if a judge, by accepting liberal gifts from the parties, sometimes sins either because of scandal or because of danger of perverting justice, nevertheless he acquires ownership of the things accepted." Concerning this St. Alphonsus subjoins: "This is common and certain." Busembaum adds: "Even if a positive law prohibits the acceptance of gifts, nevertheless he who accepts is not bound to restitution before the sentence of a judge, unless the law expresses that the acceptance is not only illicit, but also invalid." See Bonacina, On the Eighth Precept, q. 2, punct. 8, whose allegation regards the obligation of restoring to the poor if someone has received something for obtaining favor or justice in the Roman Curia; Laymann, Bk. 3, tr. 4, ch. 4, nn. 9 and 10. And Cardinal de Lugo is authority that this opinion is handed down by many and very grave doctors (disp. 37, n. 134), who subjoins that it is proved from the common practice of all judges, even those fearing God, who never restore those gifts when they were given liberally, nor are they obliged to this by confessors. Indeed this practice of confessors also warns us not to use easily and without the greatest discretion the counsel which the Author subjoins, lest we cast unnecessary snares upon penitents.

Nevertheless judges should at least be urged to restore gifts received, or to expend them on pious works. Sometimes this could be enjoined as a penance to draw the judge away from relapse [13].

[13]  From what has been said it is plain that here the matter is merely of giving counsel; for neither can the confessor command that which it is probable penitents are not bound to perform, nor will prudence easily agree that it be enjoined as a sacramental penance.

QUESTION 4º. Is a judge bound to restore what he has accepted by agreement for passing some sentence?

Resp. 1º Yes, if he accepted it for passing a just sentence, that is, for performing that which he already owed from justice. The reason is that whatever is already owed from office, and therefore from justice, cannot be the matter of a contract. A fortiori he is bound to restore those things which he extorted by force, threats, or unjust vexation.

Resp. 2º If he accepted it for passing an unjust sentence, he is certainly bound to restitution before he passes that sort of sentence; but after the sentence has been passed, it is disputed, according to what has been said about a contract in a base matter, vol. 1, n. 760 [14].

[14] If the question is made merely according to the principles of natural law, from what was said in the note to n. 760, vol. I, it must be beyond controversy that a price of this sort can be retained in conscience; for no probability, unless fictitious, can be attributed to the opposite opinion. But if positive law is considered, the question seems to be solved from what was said in the preceding note.

4. ○ QUESTION 5º. Is a judge bound to repair damage which he did not prevent, or whose reparation he does not procure, when he can?

Resp. Yes, because he is an unjust and efficacious cooperator. Recall what was said about negative cooperators, vol. 1, n. 690 and following, and elsewhere throughout [15].

[15] Concerning this question have these things more distinctly from St. Alphonsus:

1º If a judge has passed an unjust sentence by fraud, he has made the lawsuit his own, that is, he has transferred to himself the damage of the injured party, to whom he is bound to restore (Bk. 4, n. 214). Understand this with the order among those liable to restitution preserved; for before the others he is bound to restore who has in his possession the thing owed to another.

2º If a judge judges badly through great incompetence, he is bound to indemnify the injured party and to pay the expenses of the lawsuit, and this whenever notable damage occurs to the parties, whether in the substance of the lawsuit or in superfluous expenses, because of his culpable ignorance. This is common (ibid. n. 195).

3º If otherwise worthy of his office, even if by seeking it he obtained it while others more worthy were neglected, he erred through forgetfulness from human frailty, he is not obliged in conscience to restitution from his own goods, since he did not inflict a formal injury, nor did he receive any advantage from such a sentence, or rather, according to others, since he did not commit theological fault; nevertheless he ought to revoke the sentence if he can without grave inconvenience (ibid. n. 214). And more clearly: "If a judge recognizes an error committed by himself, even without grave fault, to the prejudice of a litigant, he is bound, if he can without infamy, to prevent the error, for example by secretly warning the injured party to provide for himself by appeal or otherwise; because this pertains to the due execution of his office" (ibid. n. 195).

4º A judge sins mortally against his office by delaying very notably the dispatch of causes without just cause. Likewise he is bound to restore to the injured party the damages and expenses which have followed from the unjust delay, because he is their unjust cause (ibid. n. 196).

These things St. Alphonsus says; concerning which, nevertheless, note that the legitimate order must always be preserved among those who are liable to restitution. For before the others the first debtor of all is he who has the thing, or who from another's thing has been made richer. Hence if the judge restores, the holder of the other's thing will be bound to restore to the judge himself, who otherwise could also use occult compensation.

QUESTION 6º. Does a sentence of a judge that is doubtfully just, or certainly unjust, oblige?

Resp. to the 1st: Entirely yes. For presumption favors the superior or judge. See On Conscience, n. 75, etc.

Resp. to the 2nd: Of itself, no, as is plain [16]. Except, however, unless there is present a reason of scandal or of disturbance of public order; because a private good must always yield to the public good. But he who obtains the cause through an unjust sentence cannot receive the thing adjudged to him, or he must restore it, and besides he is bound to repair all damages and expenses to the opposing party [17]. Yet if he was in good faith, when this ceases he must only return the other's thing, according to what was said about the possessor in good faith, n. 635 [18].

[16] More clearly St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 215): "An unjust sentence, either from the nature of the thing or from omission of an order of law simply necessary, whether it is passed through things falsely alleged and proved, or from the iniquity of the judge, has no force in the forum of conscience; and the injured party's right remains to him, even if he does not appeal, and it will be lawful, if he can do it without scandal, to recover his goods. I said, in the forum of conscience: because in the external forum, where not so much the truth of the fact as juridical proof is considered, a proved sentence is to be observed to avoid scandals and inconveniences; nor, after the term has elapsed within which it was permitted to appeal, is an action granted to him, the law so establishing both as a penalty of sloth and for the public good, so that there may be an end of lawsuits."

[17] For this reason the injured person can, unless the other has prescribed justly, recover his own goods by occult compensation, because he recovers his own right. St. Alphonsus, Bk. 4, n. 215.

[18] He who in good faith petitioned a thing from the judge, and in good faith accepts it, and possessed the thing in good faith for the time necessary for prescription, is not bound to restore, because he has legitimately prescribed. St. Alphonsus, Bk. 4, n. 215.

Appendix I. On Jurors

5. ○ Jurors, so called because of the oath which they take about rightly exercising the office entrusted to them, are men selected from the chief citizens to discharge some part proper to judges. They are employed only in criminal causes, and their office is to pronounce concerning the existence of the fact and the culpability of the accused; but afterward the judges decree the penalty according to the law. The institution of jurors, taken from the English, was created in favor of the accused, so that the fact might be examined by grave men designated by lot, with no malicious affection toward the accused, as being for the most part wholly unknown to them, and therefore so that that fact might be known more certainly.

[1] On the title above.  The question whether this institution of jurors contributes to the common good is not part of our undertaking. Indeed, it has against it the judgment and practice of all previous centuries. Moreover, since right judgment depends finally on the expertise and integrity of those judging, will it be permitted to hope for this from those jurors rather than from ordinary judges? Recall the things that happened in England concerning those who, some years ago, plotted against the life of the Emperor of the French. You have the inconveniences and absurdities of this English institution excellently set forth by Saint-Paul.

Jurors are taken from notable citizens determined by law. The body of jurors (le Jury) consists of twelve citizens for each case to be judged.

Jurors who by lot are designated for the session of the Court called d'Assises contract the same obligations as the judges themselves, whose office in great part they exercise; and therefore concerning jurors, as concerning the judges themselves, one must speak generally.

6. ○ QUESTION. Whether a JUROR can give a vote against the accused, who indeed has been juridically convicted of the crime, but whose innocence he certainly knows by private knowledge?

Resp. No. The reason is that this seems contrary to the mind of the law. For jurors must pronounce only concerning the fact, and according to the intimate conviction which they have about its existence, nor in any way are they bound to render a legal reason for their sentence. Indeed from the law itself they are not bound to found their sentence either on such and such a number of witnesses, or on these or those reasons brought forward from the various sides, etc. Therefore they must give their vote only according to that which they feel in the forum of conscience. And so, with regard to the office which is imposed on jurors, it is easily plain that those controversies which are debated about judges, n. 2, by no means have place concerning them.

Appendix II. On Arbiters

7. ○ They are called arbiters who are freely chosen or admitted by each opposing party, after the manner of judges, for deciding some lawsuit.

The agreement by which the faculty of composing the lawsuit is given to them is called a compromise (in French, compromis). By this agreement the opposing parties promise by mutual consent that they will execute whatever shall be established by the arbiters. But a compromise can be made either by a private writing, or by an authentic writing made by a notary, or even from common consent expressed orally before the arbiters themselves. Under penalty of nullity, both the matter to be judged and also the names of the arbiters must be reported in it.

Arbiters, whoever they are, once admitted by the different parties, properly enjoy the office of judges and perform all their functions, no otherwise than if they had been designated by public authority. Therefore they can instruct the cause brought before them, defer the matter to another more suitable time, hear witnesses, and finally, by a sentence passed, decide the lawsuit absolutely. Nevertheless, from French civil law, in order that such a sentence may have force in the external forum, it must be recognized by the President of the tribunal of first instance of the province in which it was given.

8. ○ Since arbiters fulfill the duties of judges, they undergo approximately the same obligations and the same burdens as judges. Hence:

1º They ought not undertake a lawsuit for the judging of which they do not have sufficient learning; otherwise they sin against commutative justice and contract the obligation of restitution [1].

[1]  Understand these things thus: they always sin because of the danger to which they commit themselves of erring in a matter of justice, unless perhaps they employ the aid of experts; but they are bound to restitution if in reality they have inflicted damage by erring.

2º Arbiters are bound to judge according to the laws of the region, unless the parties have granted to them the faculty of composing the matter according to equity and good. For then they ought, from what is good and equitable, to promote the advantage of each party.

3º They must take the greatest care against acceptance of persons, namely lest, drawn aside by hatred, aversion, or excessive affection, they pass sentence against the rules of equity. As to the rest, the same things must be said about arbiters as about the judges themselves.

Chapter II. On the Obligations of the Advocate and the Procurator

9. Principles. - I. Advocates and procurators are bound by commutative justice toward litigants to have competent knowledge, to undertake and pursue the cause with fitting diligence and study, and to forestall delays damaging to the litigants; otherwise they sin and are liable to restitution, as was said above about judges.

II. In civil matter neither the advocate of the accused nor the advocate general can licitly sustain a cause certainly unjust [1]; therefore if by defending it he obtains an unjust sentence, he is bound to repair all damages following from it, if they are not repaired by those in whose favor the unjust sentence falls. - St. Ligorius, n. 223.

[1]  Note that these things are said about a civil cause; for it happens otherwise in criminal causes, when by the cares of an advocate the prince can at least be moved to mercy. See below, q. 1.

A fortiori in criminal matter neither can an advocate undertake the part of an evidently unjust accuser, nor can the procurator general pursue one unjustly accused, if he discovers his innocence either at the beginning or in the course or at the end of the cause; but each is bound to abandon the accusation begun.

III. An advocate, when consulted by a client, ought seriously to examine his cause, and with that diligence which the gravity of the matter demands, to keep faith with him, to disclose the justice or injustice of the cause, and scrupulously to indicate the probability of obtaining it or losing it; for otherwise he will impel the client to useless expenses, which he himself is bound to make good.

But in pleading a cause he must beware of frauds, false proofs, or other unjust means against the opposing party; for otherwise he is likewise bound to compensate all damages following from them.

10. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Can advocates defend causes even less probable, both of the accused and of plaintiffs?

Resp. 1º In civil causes, yes, with the common and certain opinion, because they can have hope that the truth will come to light. - St. Ligorius, n. 222; Laymann; Sanchez, against a few [2].

[2]  The authors warn (p. 926, n. 78) that to this response of the Author there must be added an exception, which St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 222) indicates in these words: "Nevertheless Lugo, Malderus, Diana, and Lorca apud the Salmanticenses (tr. 29, app. De Offic., ch. 4, n. 36) note that this runs if the probability is of law; for if it is of fact, even in equal probability (because then the accused must altogether be favored) they commonly say that it is not lawful for an advocate to support the plaintiff."

Resp. 1º To this exception, which is taken from Lugo (On Justice and Law, disp. 41, n. 7), the authors could usefully have added another part of the exception, which St. Alphonsus omits, but the Salmanticenses (l.c.) obscurely enough, and Lugo clearly enough (ibid.) had expressed thus: "The same proceeds in a civil cause; for a plaintiff, knowing that he cannot prove against the possessor, but that the matter remains doubtful, acts unjustly and vexes him, since in doubt the cause of the possessor is better; therefore an advocate knowing that the matter always remains doubtful, and therefore that the judge ought to judge for the accused, cannot justly help the plaintiff seeking an unjust sentence." But it is manifest that Lugo here treats of a negative doubt; this is clearer from what has been said elsewhere (disp. 37, nn. 113 and 122).

Resp. 2º The authors also would not have uselessly noted that in the cited text of St. Alphonsus, Malderus, Diana, and Lorca are not well alleged. For Lugo (l.c., disp. 41, n. 7) adduces them not for his own opinion, but for the contrary opinion. And this the Salmanticenses also note, saying (l.c.): "In such a case," says Lugo against Malderus, Lorca, and Diana, "the advocate cannot licitly," etc. Wherefore from the cited text of St. Alphonsus the word "commonly" could be removed without loss; since the opinion of Lugo is not common to Malderus, or Lorca, or Diana. Lugo (l.c.) cites no one for himself except Salas, and the Salmanticenses followed him, and afterward Roncaglia, and any others there may be. But besides Malderus, Lorca, Diana, and Merolla, whom Lugo reports as dissenting from himself, you will see very many others, whom Sanchez follows, dissenting from the opinion of Lugo, in the same Sanchez (Dec., bk. 1, ch. 9, n. 51).

Resp. 2º But in criminal causes the accused can always be defended, even if his culpability were established, yet by honest and licit means, lies, frauds, etc., being excluded. The reason is that an advocate defending the accused inflicts injury on no one, and besides, from his office, he ought to patronize the accused as much as he can. - St. Ligorius, n. 220.

11. ○ QUESTION 2º. To what is an advocate bound by reason of his fee or stipend?

Resp. 1º Generally speaking, he can accept nothing beyond what is just, which either perhaps has been fixed by law, or must be determined by the judgment of prudent men, taking account of the business, the skill of the advocate, the labor which he expends, and received custom.

Resp. 2º With regard to the poor in particular, 1º he is bound to assist gratuitously, even with grave inconvenience to himself, those who are in extreme necessity; 2º likewise he is bound to plead gratis for those who are in grave necessity, and indeed under mortal sin, though not with notable inconvenience to himself; 3º finally, even in common necessity he is bound from charity to protect the causes of the poor, but not with grave inconvenience; namely, it suffices that he bestow on them some work when he is free from others. - Hom. apost., tr. 13, n. 69.

QUESTION 3º. What can an advocate demand if, after agreement has been made about the stipend, the client abandons the cause already begun?

Resp. He can demand the whole, if it does not stand through him that he does not pursue the lawsuit, no otherwise than one hiring out his work for some wage can demand this, if it stands through the employer that the work is not completed. Except, however, if a just cause for abandoning the lawsuit intervened, since this condition is always understood in the agreement. - St. Ligorius, Hom. apost., tr. 13, n. 69.

12. ○ QUESTION 4º. To what is an advocate bound who, when the cause has already been completed, notices that it is unjust?

Resp. He must at once warn about the injustice of the cause, lest he cooperate in unjust damage. Nor can he counsel a composition, since this ought to have place only in a doubtful matter. But if he has knowingly pursued an unjust cause, he will be bound to compensate all damages occurring to each party. For he must restore to the opposing party from the sin of commission, since he himself was the positive cause of the damage; but to his own client, if he was in good faith, from the sin of omission, since from his office he was bound to warn him about the injustice of the cause. Nevertheless an advocate, by abandoning a cause which he detects to be unjust, ought not help the other party, or reveal the secrets of his own cause to the other party, as is clear from natural law, and as St. Thomas expressly teaches, 2.2, q. 71, art. 3.

QUESTION 5º. To what is an advocate bound who, noticing that the cause is unjust, does indeed warn the client, but, with him willing it, pursues the cause?

Resp. 1º He is bound to nothing toward the client, if he loses the cause, because injury is not done to one who knows and wills.

Resp. 2º He is bound, by title of positive cooperation, to compensate all damages which the opposing party suffers.

13. ○ QUESTION 6º. Whether and how does an advocate sin who defends a just cause by unjust means, for example, if he substitutes a new bond in place of the previous one lost, etc.?

Resp. 1º He sins against fidelity and truth, more gravely indeed or less gravely according to the character of the unjust means employed [3]. The advocate will be guilty of a greater sin if he not only substitutes a new bond for the previous one, but supposes one which never existed. Nor can he be excused from the good end which he intends; for evils are not to be done that goods may come.

[3]  It is supposed here that it is established both to the client and to the advocate that the right wholly favors them. But it cannot but seem very hard that they must lose the cause merely because of the misfortune of a lost bond. Otherwise, the remedy employed is indeed rejected by the laws, as liable to frauds; but as to the substance of the cause no injustice appears. Therefore of itself it will be an officious lie. See below, n. 28, q. 2.

Resp. 2º Of itself he does not sin against justice, since the cause is supposed just. Nevertheless accidentally he can harm justice and be obliged to restitution, namely if damage comes from this to his own party or to the opposing party; for if, for example, the fraud is detected, it can easily happen that a cause however good is brought into suspicion and collapses.

14. Resolutions. - 1º Advocates sin against justice toward the client if, when they are not sufficiently skilled and fit, they undertake causes to be defended; if they disclose the foundations or secrets of the cause to the opposing party, or if they serve each party; if, because they seem to themselves to bring forward peremptory arguments, they neglect other arguments not to be despised, because perhaps the judges would be moved by those neglected motives; if they do not prepare themselves sufficiently for pleading the cause, etc.

2º The same men sin against justice toward the opposing party if they cite false or abrogated laws, or bend them to an alien sense; if they employ deceit or lies, by which judges or jurors are drawn aside into an unjust sentence or vote; likewise if they impute false crimes or vices to the opposing party, etc.

3º Procurators of parties sin against justice if they prolong causes, if they obtain undue delays, if they do not procure in the first place a cause previously accepted, if they bring the parties to an unjust composition, etc.

4º The procurator general sins against justice if from negligence, from haste or prejudice, from hatred or acceptance of persons, etc., he brings an innocent man into detention, into trial, and into undergoing an unjust sentence. Likewise, if he has sustained the accusation after in the course of the cause he has recognized his innocence, or has gravely doubted of it; therefore he is bound for all damages subsequently suffered by the accused.

To this also pertains the office of the referendary, who is sometimes employed in explaining causes. Sometimes the acts of the litigants are committed to him to be discussed, so that afterward he may report their foundations, reduced as it were into a compendium, to the judges. From these things it is clear with how much knowledge, diligence, skill, and fidelity the referendary must excel, so that he may report causes in the due manner and rightly instruct the judges.

Chapter III. On the Obligations of the Apparitor

15. ○ The apparitor (huissier) is he who by office carries summonses [1] (in French, citations) and mandates of justice, and completes the executions decreed by the judge. Hence the office of the apparitor is twofold.

[1] Understand the order of appearing in court; for the word vadimonium rather signifies a promise of appearing in court.

Since apparitors are ministers of justice, it is supremely fitting that they discharge their office very humanely, and temper the rigor and harshness of their ministry as much as can be done. They ought to be sufficiently instructed in all things which pertain to their office. They must also show fidelity in executing the mandates of the tribunal, equally guarding both against negligence in discharging their office and against rigor and vexation toward those whom public justice pursues. A special care also lies upon them, lest they omit any necessary formalities in their acts; for otherwise they would often harm justice, and would be bound to repair the damages coming from this.

16. ○ Apparitors act unjustly especially:

1º If by price or favor they allow themselves to be corrupted to the prejudice of the client, for example, by prolonging or neglecting the denunciations of sentences, or by doing other things from which it happens that the creditor cannot receive payment. Likewise by favoring certain solidary debtors, so that they do not include them in executions.

2º If they do not grant the time fixed for making juridical acts; if they ascribe a day falsely (fausses dates); if they affirm something false in verbal acts (procès verbaux); if they do not make at the prescribed time the juridical acts committed to them.

3º If, in searching houses, they act too harshly in order to extort some gift; if they inflict unjust force or another injury; if they state what is false in their acts.

4º If they exceed the mandate of the judge, or the statutes of the law, in seizing the things or goods of private persons; if they do not observe the just price in the sale of things seized, etc.; if they retain for themselves part of this price, etc.

17. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Are apparitors bound to restitution if they have accepted a price above the tariff determined by law under the title of donation?

Resp. Yes, of itself. The reason is that such a donation generally cannot be called spontaneous. Hence if the excess of the price is something grave, they are obliged under mortal sin to restore it. - Thus commonly with the Salmanticenses. Nevertheless, if they had undergone extraordinary and undue labor, they could accept something above the ordinary price. - St. Ligorius [2].

[2] Neither the Salmanticenses, whom the Author here calls upon, nor St. Alphonsus in reality have anything about Apparitors, but they discuss Advocates, Notaries, Tabellions, Relators, etc. Yet the matter comes down to the same thing. For the same question is made about all those to whom a wage is owed for some office which they perform in judgments.

Moreover, if the question is instituted with the Author about a price fixed by laws, the doubt which St. Alphonsus also touches must not be passed over in silence (Bk. 4, n. 231), namely whether the law establishing the tariff for them (notaries, etc.) obliges in conscience. But he himself responds thus: "Navarrus, Trull., etc., apud the Salmanticenses (tr. 29, ch. 5, n. 18) affirm, since it is a just law. But Machado and Fagundez deny, because this law is penal, or at least mixed, and therefore does not oblige in conscience, as Villalobos, Diana, and others hold concerning a mixed law. Lugo also denies with Turrianus and others apud the Salmanticenses (ibid. n. 19), but led by another reason, namely because, since tabellions and other ministers of justice ought to live from the stipends of their own office, and in the course of times the prices of things and expenses according to custom concerning food and clothing are increased, therefore they do not unjustly demand something above the tariff." And the Salmanticenses say that this opinion of Lugo seems in these times more conformable to equity. To these things note that the Salmanticenses (l.c. n. 20), even setting aside the reason or opinion of Lugo, hold each of those opinions as probable.

Besides, even if the opinion of the Author seems to be preferred, as the more common, who otherwise supposes that the price fixed by law is altogether just, and therefore excludes Lugo's hypothesis about a wage determined by ancient laws which afterward, because of the increased price of all things in the course of times, has become too small, nevertheless it must be added that the same opinion suffers its exceptions, just as the reason brought forward suffers exceptions, namely that such a donation generally cannot be called spontaneous. For both in many circumstances (see Lugo, On Justice and Law, disp. 44, n. 19, and Salmanticenses, l.c. n. 24) a donation can and must be held wholly spontaneous, and moreover not every donation even less spontaneous must be judged to lack that consent which suffices for transferring ownership. For not rarely occasions present themselves even to the unwilling which imply a certain necessity of giving, and yet no one thinks that a burden of restitution must be imposed on the donees.

18. ○ QUESTION 2º. Can an apparitor demand multiple wages if at one and the same time he carries different summonses?

Resp. 1º From natural law considered in itself alone, it would seem that one must answer yes, because he furnishes the same utility to each one requiring him as if he undertook the journey and work for one alone, according to what was said in the Treatise On Contracts in General, n. 757. - Thus St. Ligorius, Hom. apost., tr. 13, n. 68, etc.

Resp. 2º Attention must be given to the statutes of particular places. But by French law this is prohibited. Nevertheless, whatever the case may be concerning the civil law, a usage has prevailed, with the Government knowing and seeing it, that advocates and procurators so compose the matter that for individual summonses apparitors have nearly the same price.

Chapter IV. On the Obligations of Scribes and Notaries

I. On Scribes or Secretaries

19. ○ A scribe or secretary (in French, greffier) is he who reports in writing the testimonies, sentences of judges, and all other things which are transacted in tribunals. Hence he is accustomed to be considered as it were the right hand of the judge and his public and authentic secretary.

But a scribe can commit various injustices, especially:

1º If he does not employ due diligence in exactly reporting in writing all things heard and established or decided; for an omission in things of this kind can easily become grave.

2º If he does not use serious and constant attention in reporting into authentic books all things pronounced and transacted in the tribunal; for very easily a defect of attention in a scribe can induce grave fault and the obligation of restitution, unless it is altogether involuntary. For who does not see how great damages can follow from even a slight defect [1] on the part of secretaries?

[1] You have here an example of one who in conscience is bound for slight fault, that is, who is gravely obliged to most exact diligence, so that a defect which in itself could seem slight induces a grave obligation of restitution. Cf. note to n. 661, vol. I.

3º If from malice he omits something in writing, or if he adulterates or badly guards the public tablets committed to him; if he does not append, or does not take sufficient care that there be appended, the due formalities and signatures; if he does not faithfully transcribe testimonies, whether by exaggerating, or by diminishing, or by changing or inverting.

4º If in distributing lawsuits he obeys favor rather than order; if, in order to increase his wage, he makes the acts to be distributed larger, for example, by writing on two pages those things which could have been reported on one.

5º If he betrays a secret committed to him; if he manifests a sentence not yet published; if without the prescription of the judge he shows completed proceedings to the parties.

6º If he gives the acts of the judge to the parties before they have been signed according to the legal forms. For then he exhibits a defective and false instrument, whose dispatch is held of no value. - St. Ligorius, n. 229.

II. On Notaries

20. ○ A notary, or tabellion, is said to be one who is constituted by legitimate authority to write acts or public instruments, which have credibility both in court and outside court.

Hence it appears how great is the importance of the office of notary, how widely it extends, and by how grave obligations it is bound. Therefore notaries must enjoy knowledge equal to this office, uncommon perspicacity, and especially outstanding fidelity, prudence, and probity. For since they must handle business and contracts of every kind, from their negligence, ignorance, and defect of attention the greatest evils can follow for society, and damages for the parties.

21. ○ Notaries are unjust especially in the following cases:

1º If they are ignorant of the things which pertain to their office, and therefore do not make instruments rightly; if, with detriment to the contracting parties or others, from negligence they omit necessary solemnities, for example, to employ suitable witnesses, to append signatures, to indicate the day, month, year, etc.

2º If they make a false, usurious, or unjust instrument; if to the damage of another contracting party or a third party they feign in the instrument those things which are not; if they append false notations of the day, or change true ones, even if they do not intend damage; likewise if they counsel such things; if they make acts which exceed their office, or if they exercise their ministry outside the territory assigned to them: for then their acts are by that very fact void.

3º If they do not describe faithfully the wills of the contracting parties, or by ambiguous drafts furnish occasion for lawsuits and injustices; if they do not warn the parties about clauses which can harm them, or about difficulties which can be born from them. For they are bound to these things from quasi-contract with the parties.

4º If they write falsely that a sum has been paid before them or previously, with damage to the other party or a third party; likewise if they easily write such things, gravely suspecting that they are being deceived by the contracting parties; for then they cooperate in their sin.

5º If they negligently guard acts and instruments with danger of damage to the parties; if they delay the dispatch of instruments in order to extort money; if they commit something to a copyist with danger of error.

6º If they change something in the protocol (la minute), from which some right is violated or impeded; if they admit false witnesses; if they do not exhibit, or conceal, or deny a transcript of, some necessary testimony to their client.

7º If they communicate acts to others than the parties; if by their fault they lose protocols; if they violate oaths or secrets; if to the sayings or deeds of the parties, or to the testimonies of witnesses, they add or subtract something; if they do not transcribe all things sincerely, just as they stand.

8º If they neglect to watch over their ministers, and for that reason instruments are badly made; for notaries are bound to answer for all the ministers whom they employ; if they sign instruments made either by other notaries or by their own ministers before they have diligently reviewed them and have had perfect knowledge of the things contained in them; likewise if, where several notaries are required, they have declared absent ones as present.

9º If they ask a price beyond the tariff or approved custom [2], or if they amplify writings, or write in a larger or more extended character, so that the number of pages is notably increased; if they prolong business to be handled for the sake of increasing the wage.

[2] Compare the things said above in the note to n. 17.

In all these things, and many other similar things, notaries are bound under grave obligation, of itself, to restitution, as unjust damagers or cooperators, as is plain from what was said in the Treatise On Justice and Law. - St. Ligorius, nn. 230, 234.

22. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Is a notary bound to restitution toward the fisc if, in making an instrument of sale or of inventory, at the request of the parties, or even with himself hinting it, he does not inscribe the true price of the thing, but another lower one, so that the tax to be paid may be diminished?

Resp. It is disputed. Some affirm, because thus he cooperates in the defrauding of taxes, which is iniquitous and unjust on the part of a magistrate to whom the Republic entrusts confidence. Others deny, provided that at least the lowest price is reported in the authentic writing. Others finally excuse him totally, because from custom generally received even among the upright, the whole price, even the lowest, is not customarily declared, but only a little beyond the middle part is declared, or around two thirds of this price. But if the parties do not sin by dissembling the true price, neither does the notary sin by cooperation; for he is not constituted, like one set over customs duties, to exact taxes, but to make instruments.

23. ○ QUESTION 2°. Does a notary sin who makes instruments on Sunday or on a feast day?

Resp. From a custom now general they can make whatever instruments, provided they do not pertain to contentious jurisdiction, that is, to forensic business. Thus they can make an instrument of contract, testaments of the sick, matrimonial agreements, processes of elections to public office, and other similar things.

But writings pertaining to the contentious forum they can by no means make on feast days [3]. This is prohibited not only by canon law, but by civil law itself, even French law. But if a notary made such acts on a feast day and feigned a different assignment of the day, he would sin against ecclesiastical and civil law, and would write a false instrument.

[3] Nevertheless nothing forbids the whole context of the writing from being set down on a feast day, to which afterward on a lawful day the signatures and other solemnities are added.

Chapter V. On the Obligations of the Accuser and of the Accused

I. On the Accuser

24. ○ An accuser is said to be one who in criminal causes brings a crime before the judge, and asks from him vindication on account of the common good, and at the same time undertakes the obligation of proving the crime charged; but in civil causes, one who, as the injured party, compels an adversary to the judge, is called not accuser but plaintiff.

An accuser differs from a denouncer [1], who brings some crime before the superior or judge, and yet does not undergo the obligation of proving it. - St. Ligorius, n. 253.

[1]  Understand denunciation here not indeed as fraternal denunciation, whose aim is not punishment but the amendment of one's neighbor, with the paternal admonition of the superior intervening, from which, because of his authority, amendment is hoped for more certainly; but juridical denunciation, whose aim, no otherwise than that of accusation, is the same as the aim of the judge in punishing, namely the common good, which redounds from the punishments of the wicked. Wherefore juridical denunciation seems to pertain to the same virtue to which the vindication of the judge pertains, namely to legal justice. See note to n. 518, vol. I.

According to Roman Law, all who are not specially prohibited by law can be accusers. But wards, the prepubescent, women, magistrates, the infamous, those closely joined, namely children with respect to parents and vice versa, brothers with respect to brothers, a wife with respect to her husband, and conversely, are prohibited. But by Canon Law there are excluded from the office of accuser 1º clerics in a secular judgment, especially in a cause of blood; 2º laymen with respect to clerics, unless the crime is monstrous, or tends to great harm of the Church; 3º heretics not tolerated, and excommunicated persons, with respect to the faithful. - St. Ligorius, n. 238.

Accusers according to the same Roman Law, if they are convicted of calumny, incur the penalty of retaliation, namely the penalty which they were seeking for the accused they themselves must undergo.

But by French law it is lawful for no private person to institute an accusation, but the whole office of accusing and of proving the crime is reserved only to the magistrate constituted for this, or to the general procurator of the Government. Hence it happens that it is also called the public ministry, because it undertakes and protects the interests of the community and of good morals against the accused.

II. On the Accused

The accused is said to be he who is accused in a trial, whether criminal or civil, whether he is guilty or innocent. Concerning the accused various doubts occur, especially about confession of the crime and flight. Hence:

25. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Is the accused, when questioned by the judge, bound to confess the truth?

Resp. 1º No, if he is not legitimately questioned; which happens when the judge is not legitimate, or when he does not observe judicial form, as if he questions without a previous accusation, etc.; they also add, when there is not at least half-full proof of the crime. Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 272.

Resp. 2º Yes, if the accused is legitimately questioned, because he must obey the just precept of the judge. Except, sufficiently probably, if there is question of undergoing a great penalty; because the law is not judged to impose upon the accused so arduous an obligation, which seems to exceed human strength, namely that he, by confession of the crime, should spontaneously commit himself to the certain risk of a very grave penalty, provided however that grave public damage is not imminent from his silence [2]. St. Ligorius, n. 274, also says this opinion is sufficiently probable even intrinsically, although he calls the contrary more probable.

[2] St. Alphonsus expresses this exception thus, after other doctors (Bk. 4, n. 274): "Unless common damage is imminent from the withholding of confession of the crime, for example of heresy, treason, etc.; for then the accused is bound to betray himself, or at least his associates, as much as is necessary to avert the common damage, even if death is imminent to him from the revelation of the associates, from whom he will become convicted in court." Moreover, two things occur that must be noted. For 1º damage to the republic must be understood not as just any kind, but as very great. For as Lugo says (On Justice, disp. 40, n. 15), human law can oblige a subject with danger of life only very rarely and on account of very great damage to the republic; but in the present case that danger is most certain. 2º Since the reason of averting this damage equally obliges all who are conscious of the crime, even if they have not been called into court, and since a precept which brings certain danger of life presents the greatest difficulty, hence it is plain that some impunity is fittingly granted from time to time to the accused, so that from a fuller knowledge of crimes and delinquents provision can be made more suitably for the public good.

Add also the warning from St. Alphonsus (l.c.): "All agree, as is fitting, in saying that if the accused is in good faith, and it is known that he will be induced with difficulty to confess the crime when questioned by the judge, the confessor must leave him in his good faith."

QUESTION 2º. Can an innocent accused person reveal the hidden crimes of the witnesses or of the accuser for his own defense?

Resp. Yes, provided 1º the crime is true; 2º the revelation is absolutely necessary for the defense of his innocence; 3º and he himself otherwise would suffer grave damage. - St. Ligorius, n. 277.

26. ○ QUESTION 3º. Is it lawful for an innocent accused person to flee or resist?

Resp. It is indeed lawful for him to flee and to snatch himself from the hands of the officers; but it is not lawful to repel force by force, by killing or wounding, because he would violate the rights of public power. - St. Ligorius, n. 279.

QUESTION 4º. Is it also lawful for an accused person who has truly committed a crime to flee?

Resp. Yes, if he has not yet been condemned by juridical sentence to the penalty; because no one is bound to pay the penalty before the sentence. Likewise if he has already been condemned to a very grave penalty, and prison has been assigned to him for custody until he is punished with the established penalty. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 280.

They more commonly deny, however, if prison has already been assigned by the sentence of the judge as the penalty. The reason is that the accused is bound to obey in the execution of a just sentence. Nevertheless several except the case if necessary things are not given to him, or if the prison is very hard, because the obligation of not freeing oneself from a very grave penalty seems to exceed human strength, when someone can accomplish this without force and resistance. - Thus St. Ligorius, ibid. [3].

[3]  St. Alphonsus adds in the same place: "Probably by Lugo, Sanchez, and Navarrus with the Salmanticenses, against Sayrus, those condemned to the galleys are excused if they flee from prison, and even from the galleys themselves, as Sanchez, Lugo, Lessius, etc., hold as the more probable."

QUESTION 5º. Is it lawful for the accused to flee, even if from this the guard will suffer damage?

Resp. Yes, because he uses his own right and does injury to no one, unless charity nevertheless should counsel otherwise because of much graver damage to the guard. Yet it is not lawful for the accused to corrupt the guard with money, because since the obligation lies upon the guard not to let the accused go, he would cooperate in his sin.

Chapter VI. On the Obligation of Witnesses

27. ○ I. No one is bound from justice [1] spontaneously to offer himself for testifying; but sometimes there is such an obligation from charity, for example, if someone can by his testimony easily liberate an innocent person, prevent a grave injustice, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 264.

[1]  Understand this of commutative justice, unless nevertheless the discussion is about those who from office are bound to accuse. For otherwise, speaking in general and from the nature of the thing, the general rule is that there is an obligation of accusing or denouncing a crime pernicious to the republic, if public damage cannot be prevented by another way. Thus the common opinion with St. Thomas (2.2, q. 68, art. 1). The reason is that the part from legal justice is bound to provide for the safety of the whole. But here a crime pernicious to the republic is understood as one which is directly and immediately against the common good, such as betrayal of the city, etc.

But although regularly it suffices to denounce, nevertheless sometimes there can be an obligation to accuse, where this would be needed to avoid public damage, when perhaps the nature of the danger does not allow delay for inquiry, and therefore it is necessary to free the judge from that burden and to present proof ready at hand. See Lugo, disp. 38, n. 2.

II. A witness legitimately cited is bound to present himself before the judges, to take the oath prescribed by law, to speak the whole truth [2] and nothing beyond the truth, and then to respond simply according to conscience to the things asked. - Thus all.

[2]  Except if what the witness knows he knows only from a secret committed to him, as below, q. 2, or if the judge does not question legitimately, etc.

III. A witness who has maliciously deposed what is false is perjured and a violator of justice [3]; and therefore he is bound to the reparation of all damages, and also to the revocation of the false oath with equal damage to himself, even with danger of life, if by force of false testimony an innocent person has been condemned to death. - St. Ligorius, n. 269.

[3] You have violated justice if someone lies to the damage of others, but not if he merely dissembles without damage to others; for thus he is only disobedient and a transgressor of legal justice. In this matter some account must also be taken of the prejudice not infrequent among the common people, to which charity seems to require that crimes be covered and thus the damage of one's neighbor be guarded against.

28. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. To what is a witness bound who has said what is false from invincible ignorance, or inadvertence, or inculpable forgetfulness?

Resp. He is bound to disclose the false testimony, and in the way he can to prevent the damage; nevertheless he is not bound to reparation of the damage that has followed [4], since he is free from theological fault. - St. Ligorius, Bk. 4, n. 269, with Busembaum. Likewise one would have to say, more probably, even if he had sinned venially, according to what has been said about Restitution, n. 662.

[4] Understand damage from his ignorance which has already followed and which he could not prevent. For if he can still forestall it and does not prevent it by correcting the error, he violates commutative justice and will be bound to restitution.

QUESTION 2º. What about him who substitutes or adulterates a writing, bond, or receipt, to supply lost acts, or to pursue a certain right?

Resp. 1º He sins at least venially by reason of the lie; because however the matter stands, the bond which is exhibited is different from that which gives credibility in court.

Resp. 2º He can sometimes sin gravely against charity toward himself, when he exposes himself to proximate danger of the gravest penalties if the falsity is detected.

Resp. 3º He in no way sins against commutative justice, and therefore is by no means bound to restitution.

29. ○ QUESTION 3º. When is a witness excused from giving testimony?

Resp. He is excused in the following cases: 1° if he received the matter only under the secret of confession; 2° if he knows the matter under a committed secret, or even under only a natural secret [5]; 3° if he received the matter from men not worthy of faith; 4° if he knows that the accused did not sin mortally, for example, on account of ignorance; 5° if he foresees that grave damage will come to himself or to his own. Except if common damage is imminent from this. - St. Ligorius, n. 268.

[5] If there is question of a witness juridically and legitimately questioned, and you take natural secret as it is distinguished from committed secret, this certainly does not exempt from the obligation of testifying, since not even a promise, even with an oath, excuses. See Lugo, On Justice, disp. 38, n. 6. But the words of St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 268), by which he says that you are not bound to testify if you received it under a natural secret, even only under a committed secret, etc., are plainly to be taken of committed secret, although not explicitly promised.

QUESTION 4°. Is a witness bound to reveal an altogether hidden crime, for example, one which he alone knows?

Resp. 1° Yes, according to the law in force in France or other places, which establishes that even a single witness can suffice for condemning the accused, and requires nothing else from the jurors except that they assert that they have no doubt about the truth of the fact, whatever finally may be the proofs on which their testimony rests [6].

[6] Whatever may be the wisdom of this disposition, it is plain that the latter words of the Author cannot have this sense, as if there ought not be or could not be any foundation on which the persuasion of the jurors rests, but that they are not bound to render any reason why they so judge.

Resp. 2° More probably no, according to Roman Law, which necessarily requires two witnesses for condemning, even when the confession of the accused has been had. Hence the axiom: "One witness, no witness." - St. Ligorius, n. 266, etc.

30. ○ QUESTION 5°. Whether and how does a witness sin who hides himself lest he be cited by the judge, or who flees after citation?

Resp. To the 1st: He does not sin 1° against legal justice [7], because no one is bound to obey the precept of a superior before it is imposed on him; 2° nor against commutative justice, because he has himself merely negatively. Nevertheless he can sin against charity toward his neighbor, as was said above, n. 27 [8].

[7] It has been observed elsewhere that legal justice must not be confused with the virtue of obedience. Hence it happens that there can be an obligation of testifying by denunciation or accusation even apart from the precept of the superior or judge. See the notes to nn. 24 and 27.

[8]  He sins against charity toward his neighbor if there is question of the good of a private person; but he will sin against legal justice if there is question of the common good, to which detriment is directly brought from this.

Resp. to the 2nd: He sins gravely against legal justice, or against the obedience owed to the judge in a grave matter and one necessary to society; but more probably he does not sin against commutative justice, because that citation does not impose an obligation of justice, but only of obedience. - St. Ligorius, n. 270; Vogler, n. 337; Billuart; Lessius.

QUESTION 6°. Is a witness who, when legitimately questioned, conceals the truth, yet does not say what is false, bound to restitution?

Resp. Probably no. The reason is that then the witness has himself merely negatively, nor is he bound to depose the truth except from the precept of the judge; and therefore by concealing it then he sins only against obedience owed to the judge, or also against religion because of the oath taken about speaking the truth. - St. Ligorius, ibid.; Lugo; Lessius.

Chapter VII. On the Obligations of Physicians, Surgeons, and Pharmacists

31. ○ They are bound above all under grave obligation 1° to have sufficient knowledge and skill; 2° to employ diligence proportioned to the gravity of the matter which is committed to their care. But if they are deficient in these things, they are bound concerning all damages which follow from this.

Moreover, they must furnish their work gratuitously to the poor who are in necessity [1], as was said above, n. 11, about advocates.

[1] Say the same if they receive a stipend from the Community; although not every reception of gifts is on this account forbidden to them. Nevertheless care must be taken that in this matter they do not conduct themselves in such a way that it is now commonly established that from the bestowal of gifts depends that diligence in healing which otherwise, by reason of the stipend, is to be employed toward the sick.

But in curing the sick they must observe the following rules:

I. They are bound to follow opinions of physicians that are safe and secure, at least ordinarily, because the danger of the sick person cannot be removed by probability.

II. When it is certain that some medicine will be profitable to the sick, they are bound to employ it, doubt being set aside; but if certainty is lacking, they ought to prefer the more probable.

III. When no hope appears concerning the health of the sick person, and there is no remedy present except a doubtful one, or one concerning which it is doubted whether it will be profitable or harmful, it seems that it must be employed [2]. - St. Ligorius, n. 291.

[2] In what sense this can be admitted, see in the following note to n. 34.

Hence a physician sins gravely: 1° if without sufficient capacity he undertakes to cure a grave disease. 2° If, when a grave and unusual disease occurs, he does not expend special work. 3° If he employs untested medicines for the sake of testing. 4° If, the nature of the disease not being well understood, he rashly prescribes dangerous remedies, especially with risk of life or of grave injury. 5° If, when the danger of the sick person has been recognized, he is not present opportunely, visiting him by day and night if there is need, and does not employ all means suitable for driving off the disease. 6° If he does not permit other physicians to be called when it would be fitting, or if, calling others for the sake of consulting, he attends rather to friendship than to skill. 7° If, on the contrary, without necessity he calls other physicians with useless expenses to the sick person, or if against his conscience he adheres to their counsels. 8° If he prolongs the cure for the sake of gain, needlessly multiplies visits where a wage is demanded for each one, or if he demands an excessive price. 9° If, to favor friendly pharmacists, he prescribes superfluous medicines. 10° If he counsels abortion, or the means of procuring it, or executes it himself. 11° Finally, the physician sins gravely, indeed most gravely, if he does not forewarn concerning the grave danger of the sick person, so that the Sacraments may be conferred upon him. - St. Ligorius, n. 291, and Bk. 3, n. 182.

32. ○ Pharmacists, if you except a few things, sin almost as physicians do in the cases just set forth, especially by employing old medicines, by selling useless ones, by supplying to pregnant girls means for expelling the fetus, by not faithfully executing the mandates of the physician, for example by giving one medicine for another, etc. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

33. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. To what is a physician specially bound with regard to the soul of the sick person whose care he has undertaken?

Resp. He is bound of himself under grave obligation to admonish him concerning the grave danger in which he is placed, and concerning the necessity of receiving the Sacraments, lest he die without absolution, Viaticum, and Extreme Unction. It is clear 1º from natural law, or from the precept of charity. It is clear 2º from the very well-known Decretal of Innocent III, confirmed and renewed by other subsequent Supreme Pontiffs. It is clear 3º from the general Lateran Council, year 1245 (chapter Cum infirmitas [3], 13, De Poenit. et remiss.). - Yet it is not always necessary that the physician himself admonish the sick person concerning the proximate danger of death. Sometimes it suffices that he take care that he be admonished by relatives or friends, so that he may kindly admit the Priest and be induced to receive the Sacraments. If the sick person has a known Confessor, it will be enough if he is warned about the state of his penitent; for then by visiting him he will be able more efficaciously to move him to provide for the salvation of his soul. But let the physician beware lest he allow the admonition to be deferred too long. For he ought not prolong it until the danger of death is certain; but he is bound to this office when he notices that the danger is gravely imminent. If physicians observed this custom, sick persons would not so greatly dread the admonition, nor would they be seized with terror at mention of confession.

[3] The chapter Cum infirmitas in reality is nothing other than that very well-known Decretal of Innocent III alleged by the Author a little before, and which holds the 22nd place among the Decrees of the Fourth General Lateran Council, with the title: "That the sick should provide for the soul before the body." But most wisely the Lateran Fathers observed that this decree also serves to avoid the danger of bodily health. "This indeed," they say, "among other things gave cause to this edict, that certain persons lying on the bed of sickness, when they are advised by physicians to dispose concerning the salvation of souls, fall into an article of desperation, whence they more easily incur the danger of death." On the contrary, as Sylvester notes with Io. Andrea (Sum., v. Medicus 3), from the fact that the sick know that physicians say this in every illness, mortal and non-mortal, from precept, fear and danger will cease.

34. ○ QUESTION 2º. Does a physician sin gravely who in time of plague deserts the sick, lest he contract the disease?

Resp. Yes, of itself, unless there are other physicians who will furnish help to the sick. The reason is that physicians from office are constituted for the common good of society; hence in a common danger they must consult not for themselves, but for society; for a private inconvenience must yield to the public good [4]. - Thus all theologians.

[4] Make a distinction between physicians who, by reason of a stipend constituted for them by the Community, are bound from justice, and physicians to whom no certain stipend is assigned by the Community; for these latter are bound from charity alone, which surely does not oblige with grave risk of life.

QUESTION 3º. Can a physician apply remedies of doubtful efficacy when the sick person is despaired of?

Resp. 1º A remedy probably going to be profitable must be employed, if another more certain one is not had. The reason is that provision must be made for the sick person in the better way in which it can be done; but then he is helped without any danger of damage.

Resp. 2º A remedy cannot be applied to a sick person, even one despaired of, concerning which it is simply doubted whether it is healthful or harmful, and this for making an experiment for other sick persons. The reason is that it is altogether illicit to seek an experiment with danger to another's life.

Resp. 3º If a remedy is certainly not going to harm and doubtfully going to benefit, it must absolutely be applied. The reason is plain: for some hope shines forth of rescuing the sick person from death, and no danger is imminent.

Resp. 4º In mere doubt whether the remedy is going to benefit or harm, outside the case of a sick person despaired of [5], it is not to be furnished, but one must wait that nature, with God helping, may raise herself up. - Thus St. Antoninus, whose words are these, p. 3, tit. 7, ch. 2: "If he, the physician, doubts about a medicine, whether it ought to harm or benefit, he does badly by giving it, because in doubt he ought rather to leave the sick person in the hand of the Creator."

[5] The Author in this place seems to except the case of despaired-of health, although in the preceding response 2º he denies that a remedy concerning which it is simply doubted whether it is healthful or harmful can licitly be applied even to a sick person despaired of. But this apparent contradiction will vanish if you understand the second response of negative doubt, so that the phrase "it is doubted" is equivalent to "it is unknown," as St. Alphonsus has it more clearly thus (Bk. 1, n. 46): "It is certain 2º that it is not lawful to apply to a sick person, even one despaired of, a remedy concerning which it is unknown whether it is healthful or harmful, for making an experiment on the sick person." But the final response will be understood of a remedy which some reason suggests can benefit the sick person. Yet concerning this case St. Alphonsus sets down a twofold opinion, one denying that this remedy is licit, the other affirming; and of this opinion the same St. Alphonsus judges thus: "The second opinion, however, which is sufficiently probable, and perhaps more probable, affirms that it is licit; because when the sick person is despaired of, it is more conformable to prudence and to the will of the sick person, especially if he expressly consents to this, to apply to him a doubtful remedy than to omit it with certainty of death."

Chapter VIII. On the Obligations of Guards

35. ○ Guards are those who are placed over the keeping of forests, fields, etc., by the Prince or by a community or by a private lord. Besides the sin which they commit against the oath by keeping negligently [1], they sin against commutative justice toward those damaged; and, in defect of those causing damage, they are bound concerning damages culpably not prevented, especially in the following cases:

[1]  It is supposed, of course, that an oath is exacted from these; and yet it is easily plain that this is very imprudent, and uniquely suitable for entangling and ensnaring even timorous consciences. For even those few things which the Author subjoins show that very many questions, and those not easy to solve, occur in this matter; likewise no one is ignorant that questions about the obligation of an oath, namely when and of what kind it is present for the diversity of cases, are not easy to solve; but on the other hand here the matter is with men rude in talent and learning, who are scarcely found fit for seeing clearer and grosser things. What therefore is to be expected from oaths of this sort, except a heap of insoluble difficulties?

1º If they do not report delinquents in grave matter within the determined time. Nevertheless they are probably bound only by reason of the damage, not by reason of the fine. 2º If afterward before the judge they do not sustain the report duly made; if they accept gifts in order not to report. 3º If they report innocent persons from hatred, revenge, etc., or if they denounce for merely accidental damage. - St. Ligorius, n. 237, and Hom. apost., n. 73.

36. ○ QUESTION. Are guards always bound to denounce delinquents?

Resp. They are bound to denounce whenever the damage is notable, unless the delinquents spontaneously offer themselves to compensate it secretly. But they can sometimes act more mildly with those causing damage, if the damages, for example, are of lesser moment and have not been repeated more often; if it can prudently be presumed that the owner does not wish the delinquent to be reported; if the delinquent is very poor and is not accustomed to commit offenses, etc.; but let guards carefully beware lest in these things they indulge more than is right.

Chapter IX. On the State of Craftsmen and Workmen

37. ○ Craftsmen and workmen are to be examined carefully by the Confessor; for very often they are silent in confession about the injustices and sins proper to their condition.

I. In general they are unjust by selling or hiring out their works for an unjust price; by not manifesting hidden defects of the works according to what was said about sale; by wasting time through culpable negligence; by turning other workers away from labor; by executing work badly, whether by too much haste or by omission of necessary things, etc.

II. But in particular the following especially are unjust:

1º Goldsmiths and silversmiths who adulterate gold and silver, pour lead into hollow spaces, buy diamonds from the ignorant below even the lowest just value, or sell counterfeit or artificial diamonds as if natural.

2º Clothmakers and wool-workers who mix wool of lesser price with good wool, and sell it for as much as if the whole material were of the same quality; who weave the beginning and end of a roll of cloth from much better wool; who use colored dyes deceptively; who, having been deceived in buying cloths, likewise deceive others by selling.

3º Millers who change grains, or mix with them foreign things of almost no value, such as beans, to increase the weight and mass; who for a wage retain something of the wheat or flour beyond the practice of the God-fearing.

4º Bakers who bake badly; who maliciously mix with wheat flour another from rye, barley, beans, etc.; who fraudulently diminish the weight.

5º Butchers who sell corrupted meats, or hand over worse quality for better.

6º Tailors and shoemakers who cut badly; who use corrupted or burned cloth or leather; who retain part of the cloth handed over to them, pretending that they used the whole in making the work.

7º Makers of hats who sell hats re-stuffed or dyed as new, or as if they had been standing in the shop for a longer time.

8º Printers who print copies in a greater number than was agreed upon, and retain them for themselves; who make adulterated editions against the right of one having a privilege [1]; who have unskilled correctors; who do not employ paper of the same quality as they promised in the prospectus, etc. - See St. Ligorius, n. 292.

[1] Nevertheless, one must inspect whether the laws granting a privilege of this sort can be held, or not, as merely penal, whether the editions which others attempt against the privilege are adulterated or not adulterated.

Part Second. On the State of Clerics

One must treat 1º of the common obligations of clerics; 2º of the peculiar obligations of certain ones.

Chapter I. On the Common Obligations of Clerics

Article I. On the Positive Obligations of Clerics

Clerics are chiefly obliged: 1º to holiness of life; 2º to celibacy; 3º to ecclesiastical habit and tonsure; 4º to the canonical Hours.

§ I. On Holiness of Life

38. ○ How great the internal holiness and external edification of clerics ought to be needs neither demonstration nor exposition. For the very idea alone of the clerical state and of the priesthood manifestly argues this. Therefore in very few words we shall declare that clerics ought to be pious, holy, and modest, both from the nature of their state and from Scripture, the Fathers, and the Councils.

1º From the nature of the clerical state. Most holy is the ministry of clerics, since they are always applied, proximately or at least remotely, to sacred things, to the Sacraments to be conferred upon the faithful, to divine praises solemnly paid in the name of the Church, to instructing the Christian people about the way of eternal salvation, and also to celebrating the most holy sacrifice of the Mass. For why are clerics and priests constituted in the Church? That, with the Gospel as witness, they may be the salt of the earth and the light of the world. But they cannot be such unless they shine forth with distinguished and splendid holiness of morals. Not only the sublimity and excellence of the duties to be fulfilled, but even the garments with which the cleric is clothed, cry out that he must profess holiness. Hence St. Jerome says, Epistle 58: "The garment cries out, the state cries out, the profession cries out holiness of soul." 2º From Scripture. Thus concerning the priests of the old law the Lord said, Lev. 21:6: "They shall be holy to their God, and shall not pollute his name: for they offer the incense of the Lord and the loaves of their God, and therefore they shall be holy." Likewise in Isa. 52:12 it is said: "Be cleansed, you who carry the vessels of the Lord." But if such holiness of life was required in priests who offered oxen and sheep and other animals to God, what must be required in those who sacrifice the divine Lamb himself? And if such cleanness was required in those who carried the vessels of the Lord, what purity of soul must be required in those who carry the Lord himself in their hands? Read also St. Paul to Titus, Timothy, etc.

3º From the Fathers. Thus St. Chrysostom, hom. 10 on the First Epistle to Timothy: "The priest ought to have an immaculate life, so that all may look upon him as upon some excellent example; for therefore God chose us, that we may be as luminaries and teachers of the rest, and live as Angels on earth." St. Thomas teaches that greater holiness is required in a priest than in a simple religious,

saying, 2.2, q. 184, art. 8: "Through Sacred Order someone is deputed to the most worthy ministries, by which Christ himself is served in the ministry of the Altar; therefore for this there is required greater interior holiness than the state of Religion also requires" [1]. And in the Supplement, q. 35, art. 4: "For the fitting execution of Orders, excellent goodness is not sufficient; but just as those who receive Order are constituted above the people by the grade of Order, so also they should be higher by merit of holiness."

[1]  In this place St. Thomas compares a priest with a lay religious, and merely contends that a priest, as to dignity, excels a lay religious because of the preeminence of Order.

4º From the Councils. Innumerable things are found in Canon Law about the holiness of clerics, which are also confirmed by very many Councils. But it is enough to report what the Council of Trent has by solemn Decree, sess. 22, ch. 1, De Reformat.: "It is altogether fitting that clerics called into the portion of the Lord so compose their whole life and morals that in habit, gesture, walk, speech, and all other things they bear before them nothing except what is grave, moderate, and full of religion."

§ II. On Celibacy

39. ○ All clerics receiving sacred Orders contract by that very fact the obligation of celibacy. This is clear from various Decrees of Canon Law, but especially from ch. 1, dist. 28, where St. Gregory prescribed thus: "Let Bishops presume to make no one a subdeacon unless he has promised that he will live chastely, because no one ought to approach the ministry of the Altar unless his chastity has been proved before the ministry has been received." Likewise from the Council of Trent, sess. 24, ch. 9, where it is defined thus: "If anyone shall say that clerics constituted in sacred Orders, or Regulars solemnly professed in chastity, can contract matrimony, and that the contract is valid, notwithstanding ecclesiastical law or vow, let him be anathema."

40. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Is the obligation of celibacy of divine law?

Resp. No, with the common opinion against some; but it is from merely ecclesiastical institution, namely from the force of a precept of the Church, or also from the vow annexed to sacred Orders. The reason is that celibacy was introduced only from the precept of the Church or of the Apostles. It is further plain from the Council of Trent reported above, where it is said: "Notwithstanding ecclesiastical law." Therefore, etc. - Thus commonly the theologians. St. Ligorius, On Order, Bk. 6, n. 807. Therefore the Church can dispense from that obligation. But she never dispenses with those constituted in sacred Orders so that they may be bound by the bond of matrimony, unless under this law, that they be altogether excluded from clerical offices. Thus Pius VII convalidated the sacrilegious marriages of some Priests who had entered into nuptials during the French disturbance.

41. ○ QUESTION 2º. Does the obligation of celibacy proceed immediately from a precept of the Church, or mediately, namely from the vow which is emitted in the ordination itself [1]?

[1] The controversy is more aptly and clearly proposed by asking whether this obligation of chastity arises from the mere precept of the Church, or also from a vow annexed to sacred Orders. To this question an easy answer offers itself, that the Church wills both that clerics keep chastity and that they profess chastity from a vow. Wherefore ecclesiastical law commands clerics both chastity and at the same time the manner of professing chastity, namely from a vow.

Resp. Certain ones have thought it probable that the obligation is from ecclesiastical law alone; yet this opinion seems to have its origin from the doctrine of certain older authors understood wrongly. But the more common and to-be-held opinion says that this obligation arises from a vow. And indeed unless you derive it from a vow, it would be probable that a cleric is not guilty of sacrilege in internal sins against chastity, which is against the opinion of all [2].

[2] When you establish that clerics are probably obliged to keep chastity only by force of ecclesiastical law, another perhaps will subsume that human laws do not reach acts merely internal, as the opinion has it which is at least extrinsically probable from authority. And if indeed ecclesiastical law does not extend itself to these acts, therefore through them a cleric will certainly sin against natural law, but not against ecclesiastical law, from which alone the guilt of sacrilege could be deduced for those acts. Therefore acts merely internal will not be infected with the malice of sacrilege; whence it will also follow that the circumstance of Sacred Order in the confession of these sins is not necessarily to be expressed.

But since a consequence of this sort openly conflicts with the doctrine which doctors most commonly have as certain, namely that a cleric constituted in sacred Orders by sins even merely internal against chastity also incurs the guilt of sacrilege, necessarily to be expressed in confession (see Tamburini, On the Sacraments, bk. 7, ch. 3, § 3, n. 7; Verricelli, tr. 4, Quaest. Mor. 5, n. 2; St. Alphonsus, Bk. 3, n. 454), therefore one must conclude that, if not in both, at least in one of those premises from which that consequence flows spontaneously and legitimately, a defect lies hidden, and probability is wrongly attributed to it. For the probability of the premises would make the consequence probable; but probability of that consequence cannot cohere with the certainty of its contradictory.

Moreover the Author rightly detects a defect of this sort in the probability which, through mere equivocation, was attributed to the proposition deriving the obligation of chastity with regard to clerics immediately from mere ecclesiastical law. I said "through mere equivocation"; for if you diligently inquire, not with another's eyes but with your own, into the opinion of those authors whom, as patrons of that opinion, you have enumerated in a long train apud Sanchez (On Matrimony, bk. 7, disp. 27, n. 9), and after Sanchez apud Aversa (On Order, q. 4, sect. 7, § Praeferendus), you will find that most of them are wrongly alleged, since they are treating a wholly different question. And indeed several of them by no means ask whence is the obligation of perfect chastity with regard to clerics, whether from a vow or from a mere precept of the Church, but whence is the force of diriment impediment or of rendering invalid the matrimony which a cleric perhaps contracts after receiving Sacred Order; namely, whether this is to be derived from the nature of Sacred Order, or by force of a vow, or only from ecclesiastical law. But they establish that this does not flow from the nature of Sacred Order, both because the custom tolerated in the Greek Church contradicts it, and because the Supreme Pontiff can dispense; likewise not by force of a vow, both because the matrimony even of that cleric who perhaps did not wish to vow, at least by internal will, is held invalid, and because not even the solemn vow of a monk of itself, but through a statute of the Church, has this force. Wherefore they rightly conclude that the invalidity of a matrimony of this sort can be deduced from ecclesiastical law alone; and this conclusion is wrongly confused with the opinion which derives every obligation of chastity, which can be present even apart from the force of diriment impediment, from the law of the Church alone. But lest these things seem to be tossed out wrongly, it will not be burdensome for the reader to have inspected here with his own eyes the genuine senses of these doctors who are objected to as contrary.

Therefore the conclusion of Scotus is this (In 4, dist. 37, single q.): "The Church makes such a person simply illegitimate, namely for nuptials." Say the same about Innocent III and Henry of Ghent, of whom the former (In C. Placet 12, De Convers. Coniug.) merely says that it is from the constitution of the Church that a presbyter, after the death of his first wife, cannot take another; but the latter (Quodl. 5, q. 38), that the Church indeed exacts continence from a cleric, but nevertheless does not dissolve matrimony contracted before Orders were received. To these add Bellamera, who (In C. De illo 5, dist. 32, n. 4) establishes this one thing, that the Pope can dispense with a subdeacon, because the prohibition about not contracting matrimony is not of natural or divine law, but ecclesiastical. But Durandus (In 4, dist. 37, q. 1, ad 1) also merely concludes: "When they receive Sacred Order, from then they are unfit and illegitimate simply for contracting matrimony by statute of the Church." And from Durandus Turrecremata transcribed (In C. Placuit 13, dist. 32, art. 1, n. 6, ad 5), saying: "Sacred order impedes matrimony to be contracted and dissolves one contracted, not by reason of order absolutely, nor by reason of the annexed vow, but it impedes completively by statute of the Church making the persons illegitimate for contracting," etc. Nor otherwise Paludanus (In 4, dist. 37, q. 1, concl. 2), where he writes: "Each sacred order dissolves a contracted matrimony, not by reason of the annexed vow, but by statute of the Church." But the hallucination of those who understood these things as if the annexed vow were denied is plain from q. 2, concl. 2, where Paludanus expressly even asserts this vow: "A solemn vow," he says, "which dissolves, is only either that of Sacred Order, or of approved Religion, as the new Decretal says, namely of Boniface VIII, in the single chapter De Voto in VI." You see this same thing apud Henry (In C. Ex litterarum, tit. Qui clerici vel voventes, n. 2), who has these things: "They, clerics, retain the character which is imprinted on the soul, nor can it be removed by deposition; whence a deposed cleric must live clerically, and the vow of continence is annexed to the character."

But what is more remarkable, even those are alleged for the opinion denying the vow who, openly asserting the vow itself, then dispute whether that vow is annexed to order by divine or human law, or whether that vow dissolves matrimony by its own force, or only by ecclesiastical statute. Thus the Archdeacon, namely Guido de Baysio, while he refutes those who asserted that a vow is annexed to Order by its own nature, and on the contrary refers this to the constitution of the Church, grants the vow itself thus (In C. Cum in praeterito 3, dist. 84): "There is an argument that he who has accepted order by that very fact makes a vow of continence, even if it is not expressed: for since some things are annexed to it, he who accepts one, since it cannot be without the other, seems to accept the other." Thus also the Provost, namely Ioannes Antonius de S. Georgio (In Rubr. Qui Clerici vel voventes, n. 6): "You have, therefore, that continence, even if someone is bound to it by a solemn vow, is not included by divine law, but by the positive law of the Church, and therefore a solemn vow dissolves matrimony rather by constitution of the Church than by divine law. For by divine law the Priests of the Synagogue could contract matrimony, and even the Eastern Church has it that Priests contract matrimony, that is, retain a wife previously taken." But Valentia (Controv., single bk., De Caelibat., ch. 2) institutes the question thus: "Whether the solemn vow of continence is annexed to sacred Orders not only by ecclesiastical law, but also by divine law." He repeats this in the Theological Commentaries (tom. 4, disp. 9, q. 5, punct. 5, § 1), establishing that the law of celibacy with regard to all those things which it includes is only of ecclesiastical law, not divine; and therefore that the vow of continence is annexed to Sacred Orders only by ecclesiastical law. And John Gutiérrez (Quaest. Canonic., bk. 2, ch. 7, n. 2): "Although clerics do not emit an explicit vow of chastity, nor is the debt of continence essentially annexed to Sacred Order, but by statute of the Church, implicit, namely hidden in the very reception of Order; therefore by constitution of the Church they are bound to observe it. For by that very fact that someone is promoted to Sacred Order, he is tacitly understood to vow continence, even if no mention is made of a vow of continence."

Nor less beside the point are Aegidius de Coninck and Palaus alleged for that opinion, since they derive the obligation of clerical continence both from a vow and immediately from ecclesiastical law. Thus the former (On the Sacraments, disp. 20, dub. 13, n. 130): "Although the second opinion reported in n. 126, namely the one which deduces the obligation immediately from the vow alone, is probable because of the authority of very many doctors, nevertheless I believe it more probable that those receiving sacred Orders, besides the obligation of the vow there explained, are also immediately obliged to continence from ecclesiastical law." And Palaus (tr. 27, single disp., punct. 17, n. 5): "I judge it truer with Aegidius de Coninck that those initiated in sacred orders are bound to keeping chastity not only from a vow, but from a special law." These authors were moved, namely, by this: that if someone through ignorance or malice in receiving Sacred Order did not vow, this one would in no way be bound to chastity, contrary to what all the doctors teach. And this reason indeed moved some even of the older authors, about whom we spoke above, so that they said that the invalidity of matrimony contracted by a cleric flowed not from a vow but from an ecclesiastical statute; namely lest, if someone did not emit the vow, which must be emitted by each one's will, his marriage would have to be held valid.

Therefore, for the opinion which attributes the obligation of clerical chastity solely to ecclesiastical law, only some jurists remain, whom Zabarella also hints at (in Clement. Ad nostrum De haereticis). While these men were asking of what crime, adultery or incest, etc., a fornicating presbyter was guilty, and of what penalty he was worthy, they advanced so far that, against the common opinion of all theologians, they ascribed to him no other guilt except that of simple fornication, led of course by empty little reasons, both because in ch. Presbyter, 5, dist. 82, this offense is called fornication, "A presbyter, if he has committed fornication," and because clerics do not solemnly vow, although, as Decius adds in ch. At si clerici, De Iudiciis, n. 227, they promise chastity.

Since therefore no solid reason favors this opinion, and the authority on account of which some attributed to it some probability is finally resolved into the support of certain jurists who by vain reasonings declined to opinions opposed to the common doctrine of theologians; and since to the authority of Boniface VIII, in the single chapter De Voto in VI, there accedes the Constitution of Benedict XIV Inter praeteritos, 3 Dec. 1749, in which (§ 41) it is expressly said that a vow is solemnly emitted in the reception of Sacred Order; one must conclude that that opinion is wrongly called probable. And each one will admit this conclusion the more willingly, the more certainly it is established among all that to the sins against chastity of clerics initiated in sacred Orders, even if merely internal, the malice of sacrilege accedes.

 Nothing about St. Alphonsus, as is plain to the reader, had been said in this note. But because St. Alphonsus also held as probable the opinion which derives the obligation of keeping chastity, with regard to clerics, from ecclesiastical law alone, behold, the Vindicators (p. 327, note 1) judged that this note too must be attacked.

And indeed, 1º in order to weaken the argument which is taken from the very common opinion of the doctors, namely that clerics become guilty of sacrilege through acts even merely internal, which nevertheless human law, according to an opinion at least extrinsically probable, does not reach, they object that internal acts can be commanded by the Church at least indirectly, if they are connected with external acts as effects and cause.

Resp. Let the antecedent pass, and I deny the consequence. For it is very well known that even grave sins against chastity can be committed through acts merely internal, which are in no way connected with external acts as cause and effect. And nevertheless, by the unanimous consent of the doctors, these sins in those initiated in Sacred Order contract the malice of sacrilege. Therefore in that opinion one cannot avoid an absurdity of this sort, which of itself suffices to take away every probability from it.

2º The Vindicators add that the extrinsic value, namely the extrinsic probability of the opinion which is rejected in the note, is derived by St. Alphonsus chiefly not from certain old jurists, but from the very words of the Holy Council of Trent.

Resp. Someone perhaps would rightly prefer that certain jurists had been alleged by St. Alphonsus, rather than the theologians Scotus, Palaus, Valentia, etc. For the former, although less effectively, nevertheless seem in some way to pertain to the matter, because they touch this question; not so the latter.

But as to Canon 9, sess. 22, of the Holy Synod of Trent, this is brought forward much less to the matter. For even if you suppose what must be denied, that this canon does not stand in the way of saying that clerics in sacred Orders are kept from nuptials by ecclesiastical law alone, and that nuptials are contracted invalidly by them, can a law of this sort, keeping them from nuptials and establishing them as invalid, be confused with a law which makes clerics themselves guilty of sacrilege for any sin whatsoever committed by them against chastity? But I said that that hypothesis must be denied. For, as was indicated in the note, after the declarations both of Boniface VIII and Benedict XIV, it is not lawful to deny that clerics constituted in sacred Orders are bound by a solemn vow of chastity.

42. ○ QUESTION 3º. Is the obligation of celibacy universal in the Church?

Resp. Some exception is given from the tolerance of the Church among Easterners. For in the Eastern Church priests indeed can never enter matrimony after sacerdotal ordination, or even after the diaconate; but those married before the diaconate can be advanced to further Orders, and nevertheless live with their wives. Bishops are excepted, who all must constantly keep perfect chastity. But apud the Greeks the subdiaconate is not numbered among Sacred Orders. Hence the precept of chastity is imposed on unmarried clerics in the ordination of the diaconate.

QUESTION 4º. Would one be bound to chastity who expressly did not wish to vow chastity?

Resp. This one nevertheless would be bound to chastity, if not from a vow, since no one can be bound unwillingly by a vow, then certainly from a precept of the Church, which from the motive of Religion would bind him to chastity when the vow was lacking [3]. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, Bk. 6, n. 809. Others hold that he is bound to emit a vow of chastity; and no one will deny that the Church can oblige him to this.

[3] "What certain ones have said, that if such a one sinned against chastity he would not commit sacrilege, this does not seem sufficiently probable, and is against the common opinion, because chastity would be commanded from the motive of the virtue of religion." - St. Alphonsus, Bk. 6, n. 809, q. 2.

43. ○ QUESTION 5º. Whether or when can a married man, while his wife is living, receive Sacred Orders?

Resp. A married man can licitly be promoted to Sacred Orders with the express and altogether spontaneous permission of his wife, provided that she herself also vows chastity. But then the wife is not bound to enter Religion according to the more probable opinion [4], against Sanchez, etc. Nevertheless exception must be made unless the husband becomes a Bishop or a Religious, and the wife is young [5]. - Thus St. Ligorius, Bk. 6, n. 812. Others say that then the wife indeed is bound to enter a Monastery, but not to profess; others finally exempt her from every obligation except the vow of chastity [6].

[4] But now by received custom alone a man is not admitted to Sacred Orders unless the wife, if she is young, enters religion and professes, and if she is old, vows continence. Thus Pontius, On Matrimony, bk. 7, ch. 25, n. 7.

[5] This limitation, "if the wife is young," is to be understood only of the case of a husband professing religion, but not of one promoted to the Episcopate. For the wife of him who is chosen as Bishop must altogether pass to a monastery, even if she is old. For thus in ch. Sane 6, De Convers. Coniug., Alexander III established: "By Apostolic authority we prohibit you from presuming to ordain a married man as Bishop, unless the wife first, having professed continence, puts on the sacred veil for herself and assumes religious dress."

[6] But these authors seem to have been ignorant of what has been sanctioned in law (ch. Cum sis 4, De Convers. Coniug.). For thus Alexander III: "You ought not be ignorant that it is contrary to the constitution of the holy Fathers that a husband, with his wife not assuming the habit of religion, or a wife, with her husband not assuming it, should pass to religion. Hence it is that by apostolic authority we prohibit you from permitting a husband or wife in your episcopate to pass to religion, unless each shall have migrated to religion. But if the wife is so old and sterile that she can remain in the world without suspicion, you will be able to dissemble, so that with her remaining in the world and promising chastity, her husband may pass to religion."

44. ○ QUESTION 6º. Can a wife who vowed chastity outside Religion after the ordination of her husband, when he has died, validly contract matrimony?

Resp. There is a twofold probable opinion.

The 1st OPINION denies, and rests on Canon Law, ch. Quia sunt, 10, dist. 28, where it is said of such a matrimony: "Let those who are badly joined be separated." But the reason of this decision is that the Church, because of reverence for the Order assumed by the first husband, renders the wife incapable of a subsequent marriage. St. Ligorius, n. 812, calls this opinion the more common and very probable. The 2nd OPINION affirms. The reason is that it is not established that such a matrimony is invalid. For 1º it is not invalid by reason of the simple vow of chastity emitted by such a wife; 2º nor is it invalid from a special law of the Church; for from the fact that the spouses are ordered to be separated, it does not follow that their matrimony is invalid; for separation can be ordered as a penalty of a second matrimony contracted against the vow and prohibition. The same St. Ligorius, ibid., says this is sufficiently probable [7].

[7] For this opinion St. Alphonsus had no one whom he could allege except Soto and Pontius. The former of these (On Justice and Law, bk. 7, q. 5, art. 3) writes scarcely a few words about this matter in passing, where he also supposes that a priest, unlike a religious, is not simply incapable of matrimony; but the latter (On Matrimony, bk. 7, ch. 25, n. 10) rests on this argument, that the Canons sometimes order spouses to be separated, although the matrimony is valid; but the Toledan canon grants the sacrament at the end of life to one sinning. But it would further have to be proved that separation of this sort and the interdict of the sacrament until the end of life were then imposed by the canons on delinquents only when the matrimony had existed validly, but by no means when, although invalidly, it had nevertheless been attempted. Since this cannot be proved, the argument of Pontius falls back into a mere sophism. Otherwise, St. Alphonsus does not deny that the former opinion is received by the common support of theologians and canonists, so much so that he scarcely, or not even scarcely, makes mention of the contrary opinion. See Schmalzgrueber, bk. 4, tit. 6, nn. 40-42.

§ III. On Wearing the Habit and Tonsure

45. ○ Clerics, at least those initiated in major Orders, are obliged to wear the tonsure and clerical dress. This is clear from the whole of Canon Law, especially from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 6, De Reformat., where it is said: "But because, although the habit does not make the Monk, nevertheless clerics must always wear garments congruent to their own Order, so that by the decency of the exterior habit they may show the interior honesty of morals." Moreover in the same place it is enjoined on Bishops that they seriously admonish transgressors, and if they do not obey, remove them from sacred functions.

But the clerical habit varies for various regions. Therefore one must stand both by custom and by the particular statutes of places.

46. Questions. - QUESTION 1°. Do clerics sin gravely by not wearing the habit?

Resp. Yes, of itself, unless there is present a just reason, or lightness of matter excuses, or the smallness of the time. - St. Ligorius, Bk. 6, n. 825; Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, bk. 11, ch. 8; Ferraris, v. Clericus.

But they commonly admit that it is venial only once or again to leave off the habit. But how much space of time is required for mortal sin can be determined not in general, but only from the circumstances.

But for those making a journey a shorter habit is permitted, but of black color, and one in which the decorum and honesty of the clerical state shine forth. But the clerical habit can be totally left off for a grave cause, for example, if persecution is imminent, or if one must pass through places of heretics, infidels, or impious men, etc.

47. ○ QUESTION 2°. Are clerics not constituted in sacred Orders also bound under grave or under light obligation to wear the clerical habit?

Resp. It seems one must deny as to each. For from the common opinion they are not bound to this under grave obligation, scandal being excluded; nor probably under light obligation, strictly speaking and of itself, because the obligation seems to have been imposed only on clerics constituted in sacred Orders. Nevertheless attention must be given to particular laws and to the custom of places. Besides, even simple clerics, as long as they wish to be clerics, must wear garments redolent of clerical modesty [1].

[1] A cleric not wearing the habit and tonsure, if after being admonished a third time by the Bishop he is not corrected, loses the privilege not only of the forum but also of the canon. St. Alphonsus (Bk. 6, n. 827).

Nevertheless beneficed clerics must be excepted, who, although they are not in sacred Orders, are bound by the same law as higher clerics to wear the habit, and indeed under the penalty of suspension from benefices and every ecclesiastical dignity, as is clear from the Bull of Sixtus V, Cum sacrosanctae, 9 Jan. 1588 [2].

[2]  This suspension seems to have been abrogated by force of the Constitution of the Supreme Pontiff Pius IX.

48. ○ QUESTION 3º. Do clerics sin gravely by not wearing the tonsure or crown?

Resp. 1º Clerics who are not constituted in sacred Orders never sin gravely, unless they are beneficed. - Thus most commonly.

Resp. 2º Even clerics initiated in sacred Orders at least do not sin gravely unless they omit wearing the tonsure for a notable time [3], such as is not the time of one or another month. But whether it is grave not to wear the tonsure for a whole year is not clear. Theologians more commonly affirm; but it is not clearly proved. - See St. Ligorius, Bk. 6, On Order, n. 820.

[3] What the Author above, n. 46, warns, that for a grave cause the clerical habit can licitly be put aside, this same thing must be held about the tonsure, and all the more easily, because it is not the case that, just as garments can be put off and changed quickly when danger is imminent, so the tonsure can be put off quickly when there is need.

§ IV. On the Recitation of the Canonical Hours or Divine Office

49. ○ The canonical Hours are said to be a collection of prayers and readings to be recited at certain hours on individual days by persons deputed to this. Hence the Hours are also called 1º Divine Office, because it is recited in honor of God; 2º ecclesiastical Office, because it is paid in the name of the Church; 3º canonical Office, because it must be recited according to the rules of the Canons; 4º Breviary, because that Office is a compendium of the old and new Testament, and also of the sentences of the Fathers and the lives of the Saints.

The origin of the Divine Office as to substance seems to be derived from the very times of the Apostles, as is gathered from various places in the Acts of the Apostles, from the testimonies of the Fathers, and from various documents.

In the course of times the form and quantity of the Breviary was varied. The Council of Trent, sess. 25, at the end, commanded that a new reform of the Roman Breviary be made. St. Pius V corrected it, increased it by some additions, and by the Bull Quod a Nobis, 7 July 1568, prohibited all other Breviaries which from institution or legitimate custom did not surpass 200 years. Nevertheless in France the custom unhappily grew strong that most Bishops would have and change their own proper Breviaries [1]. For a long time the Church was silent because of the calamities of the times, so that she was believed to tolerate this custom. But in these most recent times, according to the various circumstances of things, she has kindly opened her mind, and thence the pious Mother rejoicing sees almost all Bishops eagerly returning to liturgical unity.

[1]  This custom is owed in no small part to the artifices of the old Jansenists, who, having undertaken to disturb the order of the ecclesiastical hierarchy for the subversion of the Church, attributed to individual Bishops for their own Diocese the plenitude of power by which the Roman Pontiff prevails over the universal Church.

The whole Divine Office is divided into seven Hours, namely Matins with Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline.

One must treat 1º of the obligation of the Breviary; 2º of the time established for recitation of the Hours; 3º of the manner of reciting them; 4º of causes excusing from recitation.

Point I. On the Obligation of Reciting

50. Principles. - I. There are obliged to recite the canonical Hours daily: 1º all clerics constituted in sacred Orders, even those suspended and excommunicated. This is clear from various places of Canon Law, from the Lateran Council, year 1215, and from the Bull of St. Pius V, Quod a Nobis. - 2º All beneficed persons who have a right in the thing and full dominion of the benefice. This is drawn from the Lateran Council under Leo X, and also from the Bull of Pius V, Ex proximo. - 3º All religious of each sex professed in an Order approved by the Church and destined for choir. This is plain from custom, and also from the Decree of Gregory X, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 140 and following.

II. All these sin gravely if they omit the whole Office or a notable part of it without legitimate cause. The reason is plain: for they violate a law of the Church in a grave matter. - St. Ligorius, n. 146, and others most commonly.

III. The obligation of reciting the Hours is affixed to the day, so that it can in no way be satisfied on another day; therefore the obligation according to the mind of the Church ceases with the day assigned to it, and accordingly it is usually called the burden of the day.

51. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What is grave matter in the omission of the Office?

Resp. Theologians most commonly agree that the omission of one little Hour, or of Compline, or of a part of the Nocturns at least equivalent to the quantity of one little Hour, is the matter of mortal sin [1]; but the omission of a smaller part does not exceed venial sin. - St. Ligorius, n. 147, etc.

[1] Certain ones use this argument, that one omitting even one of the little Hours is bound to restitution of fruits by apostolic definition. But this argument does not seem sufficiently firm. For someone can be bound to restitution lightly and because of a light fault.

Some have written that it is mortal sin even to omit a third part of a little Hour, because such a part with respect to that Hour is already notable matter; but more probably this must be denied. The reason is that although that part is notable with respect to a little Hour, it is nevertheless light in itself and with respect to the whole Office. Hence concerning smallness of matter one must regard the quantity of the whole Office, but not of each Hour. Therefore if someone does not omit altogether a whole Hour, he can be excused from grave sin, because more probably it is light to omit less than an entire Hour. - St. Ligorius, n. 147; Elbel, n. 367; Lacroix, n. 1200, etc.

52. ○ QUESTION 2º. Is it grave to omit Vespers on Holy Saturday?

Resp. No, at least more probably, because the matter is very slight both in itself and with respect to the whole Office. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others commonly.

Nevertheless some have judged this matter grave, not indeed in itself materially, nor with respect to the whole Office, but by reason of the special signification which the individual Hours seem to have [2].

[2] The opinion is anomalous and of no use.

QUESTION 3º. Does he who omits the entire Office commit one grave sin or multiple grave sins?

Resp. He seems to commit only one grave sin. - Thus commonly the theologians with St. Ligorius, n. 148, after St. Antoninus, part 3, tit. 13, ch. 4, where he says: “He who omits all the Hours of one day does not on that account commit seven mortal sins, but one, and so much the graver as he omits more of the Office; because the whole Office of the day falls under one precept." - St. Ligorius, ibid.

53. ○ QUESTION 4º. If someone doubts whether he omitted something in the Office, is he bound to recite it?

Resp. No, if the doubt is positive, that is, if he probably judges that he has satisfied. Thus St. Ligorius, n. 150 [3], who says that this is the most common opinion, with Sanchez, Lacroix, Azor, Navarrus, Tamburini, etc.

[3] In this place you have St. Alphonsus proving and calling most common that doctrine which establishes that probable satisfaction of the law suffices; nevertheless certain ones wished to ascribe the opposite of this to the Holy Doctor. See vol. 1, n. 80, with note.

 But the Vindicators (p. 987, n. 80) bring these things from the questions reformed by St. Alphonsus: "If someone probably judges that he has fulfilled the canonical Hours, is he bound to satisfy if it is still probable or doubtful that he has not fulfilled? Several Authors deny; but the opposite must be held."

Resp. The Holy Doctor, as we said above, confessed that the opinion which denies the obligation of reciting in this case is most common. Therefore, with reverence due to the Holy Doctor preserved, the faculty must be denied to no one that according to theological canons he may prefer the most common opinion and follow it with a safe conscience.

Hence, they say, you are rightly excused from repeating the Office if you do not remember that you said something, and you have a just conjecture for believing that you said it; suppose, if you remember that you began a Psalm, or some Lesson, or an Hour, and afterward, distracted, you arrived at the end of the Psalm, Lesson, or Hour, without remembering whether you recited the whole; for presumption favors you, because you are accustomed to recite integrally those things whose recitation you began. Likewise if you have arrived at some Hour, for example Sext, and doubt whether you recited the preceding one, you can hold the same decision, because you are not accustomed to recite the later Hour unless you have sent the former ahead, and therefore you can prudently believe that you have omitted nothing. - St. Ligorius, n. 150; Lacroix, etc.

54. ○ QUESTION 5º. Are Religious who, for a just cause, do not attend choir bound under grave obligation to recite the Office privately?

Resp. Yes. The reason is that the principal obligation for a Religious does not fall on choir, but on the recitation of the Office by reason of the Religion, which has undertaken that burden from its institute. This obligation is clear from the universal sense and custom of Religious, who, when they cannot be present at choir, believe themselves obliged under grave obligation to recite the Office privately. But a universal custom which has been constantly observed with great inconvenience by Religious and Nuns furnishes a sufficient argument concerning a grave obligation undertaken. Hence the opinion of some, who say that the obligation of the Office does not urge a Religious outside choir, is not probable. - St. Ligorius, n. 142, and others commonly.

55. ○ QUESTION 6º. Does a Religious sin gravely who recites the Office privately while he could easily be present at choir?

Resp. No. For the obligation of choir, although it is grave for the Community, is nevertheless held light for individual private persons, provided that choir is not altogether removed. But for choir four who are free, or able to sustain choir, suffice. But if there are fewer Religious, they are in no way obliged to recite the Office in choir; nevertheless they are not exempt from private recitation, as was just said. - St. Ligorius, n. 143, and others commonly.

QUESTION 7º. Are those obliged to the Office bound to supply those things which they omit in choir because of the functions of choir, for example, by ringing the bells or the organ, or by searching out Psalms, and other similar things?

Resp. No. The reason is that the omission in choir, provided it is not excessive, is supplied by the companions. Thus one satisfies who coughs while others are reciting, etc., and probably also if a whole Psalm is said meanwhile. A fortiori he who did not hear some things of the alternate part is not bound to repeat [4]. - St. Ligorius, n. 443, and others commonly.

[4] These things ought to have force also in the private recitation of several together.

56. ○ QUESTION 8º. Which Breviary must be used?

Resp. By common law only the Breviary reformed by St. Pius V must be used; this is clear from the Bull of the same St. Pius V, Quod a Nobis, given on 7 July 1568. In this Bull the Pontiff removes and abolishes all other Breviaries which from institution or legitimate custom do not surpass two hundred years. Nevertheless he permits that even those more ancient than two hundred years can be changed into the Roman Breviary if the Bishop and the whole Chapter consent. But he commands this Breviary to be observed in the whole world [5], with the sole exception just reported. Indeed, in another Constitution which begins Ex proximo, he declares that all obliged to the Hours will not satisfy their duty if they use another Breviary, and therefore that beneficed persons do not make the fruits their own.

[5] Understand here the whole world as the Church using the Latin rite. Nevertheless the law about not introducing changes pertains to any rites already approved.

57. ○ QUESTION 9º. What is to be thought about those who recite another Breviary preserved from the custom of the place?

Resp. 1º There is no difficulty for places where the Breviary had already prevailed for two hundred years before the Bull of St. Pius V, if nevertheless Breviaries still exist which have remained unchanged. This is clear from the Decree cited above.

Resp. 2º As to Breviaries reprobated by the Supreme Pontiff, whether they existed before the Bull or were introduced afterward, they are materially opposed to law, as is evidently clear from the aforesaid Constitution, unless they have been confirmed by the approval, either express or at least implicit, of the Supreme Pontiff. This is confirmed from the following response of the Sacred Congregation of Rites directed to a Canon of Le Mans.

Decree — Of the Sacred Congregation of Rites concerning the Present Liturgy of the Church of Le Mans, 10 Jan. 1852

1º Whether in the years 1748 and 1749 the innovation of the Breviary and Missal of Le Mans, altogether alien from the Roman rite, was licit, after the old Breviary and Missal corrected to the Roman form had first been removed, done or approved by the authority of the Bishop alone and the Chapter of the Church of Le Mans, and without the Apostolic See having been consulted?

2º Insofar as negative, whether at least this Liturgy of this sort, by force of prescription or century-old custom, has been made legitimate, so that today any Priest of Le Mans can observe it with a safe conscience? 3º Insofar as again negative, whether any Priest of Le Mans, even a Canon and Pastor, is at once bound in conscience both to pay the canonical Hours and to celebrate Mass according to the Roman rite, namely when he recites and celebrates privately?

To the 1st: Negative.

To the 2nd: Negative.

To the 3rd: Let him consult jointly both Constitutions of St. Pius V, namely that which begins Quod a Nobis, 7 Ides of July 1568, and the other which begins Ex proximo, 12 Kalends of October 1571 [6].

[6]  The Constitution Quod a nobis (§ 7) establishes that he who recites another breviary than the one prescribed does not satisfy, as if he had not recited in any way. But the Constitution Ex proximo declares that the same person is bound to restitution, and does not make the fruits his own.

Moreover from a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, 15 March 1608, apud D. Bouix, On Liturgical Law, Churches which formerly could use the benefit of the exception made by St. Pius V, so that they might retain their proper breviary, can no longer return to the old liturgy, if once they have cast this aside in favor of the Roman Breviary. Likewise Churches have lost that privilege of exception if they have introduced into their liturgy any additions or changes whatsoever, as is clear from several declarations of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, and very recently from the Response of the Holy See to the Archbishop of Besançon on 28 Aug. 1856.

58. ○ But although all the Bishops of France desire to return to the Roman rite, so that they may comply with the Holy See, nevertheless they cannot at once remove all difficulties from the midst; whence Cardinal Gousset (n. 698) concludes that private Priests meanwhile can recite the Breviary of the diocese.

59. ○ QUESTION 10º. Does a Priest need the permission of the Bishop to recite the Roman Breviary in places where another is tolerated?

Resp. No. This is clear from the response of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, to which this question was recently proposed. For the most eminent Cardinals, having weighed the question, responded negatively by unanimous consent.

60. ○ QUESTION 11º. Are clerics obliged to the Breviary bound to use the Proper of the diocese?

Resp. Yes, provided that that Proper has been recognized and approved by the Sacred Congregation of Rites. The reason is that although this concession of proper Offices has the character of a privilege, nevertheless all private persons are bound to use a privilege conceded to the whole community. - Except if private persons, by virtue of an apostolic indult, can not use the Proper of the diocese.

QUESTION 12º. Is there still an obligation of reciting the GRADUAL Psalms, the little Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the Office of the Dead?

Resp. 1º No, with regard to clerics who recite the Office privately.

Resp. 2º No also for those reciting the Office in choir, unless where there is a custom of reciting the aforesaid Offices from the time of St. Pius V. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Rites has declared several times.

61. ○ QUESTION 13º. Are those obliged to the Office bound under grave obligation to recite the Office of the Dead on the day of Commemoration of All the Dead, and also the Litanies on the feast of St. Mark and the three days of Rogations?

Resp. to the 1st: Yes, according to all. But this Office consists only of Vespers, Matins, and Lauds. - St. Ligorius, n. 161.

Resp. to the 2nd: Yes, according to the common opinion. The reason is that in the Rubric after Feria II of the Fifth Sunday after Easter it is said thus: "Those who are not present at the procession of the Litanies should say them privately after Matins with their prayers and orations." But the word "should say" imports a grave precept when the matter is grave, such as the matter of the Litanies surely is. Moreover, everywhere the custom is in force of reciting the Litanies on these days. But custom is the best interpreter of laws. Nevertheless some deny the grave obligation, saying that the precept is not established, especially as grave. - St. Ligorius, n. 161, says: "The first opinion is much more pleasing to me; yet I do not dare to say that the second is improbable."

Point II. On the Time and Place and Position of Body Due for Reciting the Hours

I. As to Time

62. ○ 1º The time prescribed for fulfilling the entire recitation of the Office begins from midnight and ends at the following midnight, so that whoever recites the whole Office within this time is always to be exempted from grave sin, at whatever hour he satisfies such a duty. The reason is that he satisfies as to substance by reciting the whole Office on the natural day. Indeed Matins and Lauds, from a privilege conceded by the Church, can be recited on the preceding evening.

2º Matins and Lauds must be recited by Priests before the celebration of Mass. This is clear from the Rubric of the Missal, tit. 1, De Praeparat. sac., where it is read: "The Priest about to celebrate Mass, at least Matins with Lauds having been completed," etc. Likewise from the Constitution of Innocent IV, year 1254 [1].

[1]  On this argument see the things which will be said below, q. 2 and 3.

3º All the little Hours can be recited in the morning time; and the first two must indeed be recited before midday; but the two latter can be said during the whole time both morning and evening. Vespers and Compline are recited from midday until midnight. In Lent, however, from the first Sunday, Vespers can be recited before the meal because of the ancient discipline, according to which the fast was not broken before the recitation of Vespers. Nevertheless on Sunday Vespers cannot be anticipated, because the fast is not observed on that day.

Formerly the Hours were recited thus: Matins after midnight, Lauds at dawn, Prime after sunrise, Terce at the ninth hour of the morning, Sext at midday, None at the third hour after midday, Vespers at sunset, Compline at the twilight of night. Hence a cleric ordained subdeacon is bound only to recite the Hours corresponding to the time of ordination. Therefore if the ordination happens before the ninth hour of the morning, he will be bound to recite Terce, but not the preceding Hours.

63. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Can the little Hours be recited even before dawn without any cause?

Resp. More probably, yes. The reason is that from the time when the ancient custom of reciting those Hours at a determined time was removed, no other law or new custom imposed the obligation of paying them only in the time following dawn. Indeed grave theologians expressly assert that these Hours can be recited during the whole morning time, or from midnight to midday. Thus expressly St. Ligorius, Hom. apost., tom. 5, app. 5, n. 74; Saettler, On the Hours, art. 2, q. 3, etc.

QUESTION 2º. Does the obligation of reciting Matins and Lauds before Mass urge under grave obligation?

Resp. No, at least more probably. The reason is that there is no connection between the Office and Mass, and therefore the recitation of Matins does not seem a disposition for celebrating, since a Priest can also otherwise by praying dispose himself piously for the Sacrifice; nor does a grave obligation appear from the Rubric reported above, nor is it generally apprehended under grave obligation. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, On the Eucharist, n. 347 [2], and Benedict XIV in the work On the Sacrifice of the Mass, bk. 3, ch. 13, against Antoine and a few others, who contend that, a cause excusing being excluded, it is grave.

[2] St. Alphonsus (Bk. 6, n. 347) responds to the controversy, "What kind of sin is it to celebrate Mass before recitation of Matins?": "There are three opinions. The first says that it is mortal. But the second opinion recognizes no fault in this. But the third opinion, more common and more probable, teaches, against the first, that this is by no means mortal; but against the second, that it is not excused from venial fault."

64. ○ QUESTION 3º. What cause can excuse from that obligation?

Resp. Any reasonable cause will excuse [3], for example, if someone asking a Priest to celebrate Mass for him desires that it be celebrated at once; likewise if the people, or some grave person, is waiting; if the Superior commands; if the time of celebrating has arrived and the celebration cannot be deferred without some inconvenience; if greater convenience of study, or greater utility to be perceived from studies, demands this; if some unexpected business has come up; if some penitent must be heard before, and similar things. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

[3] St. Alphonsus (Bk. 6, n. 347) says: "Any moderate reasonable cause."

65. ○ QUESTION 4º. At what hour is it licit to begin the recitation of Matins in the evening of the preceding day, according to the privilege reported above?

Resp. From the common opinion of the theologians, it is licit to begin at the hour of Vespers, which is held to be when the sun holds the middle of its course between midday and sunset [4]; for then, according to all, the ecclesiastical day begins, since first Vespers are customarily chanted. This is confirmed by universal custom. Hence in various places tables are customarily drawn up determining this hour at the various times of the year. - St. Ligorius, n. 174.

[4] This resolution must be taken affirmatively, but not exclusively, as is clear from the following resolution; namely, it is asserted, from the common opinion of theologians, that the recitation of Matins is licit at that hour; but it is not defined that anticipation is not licit.

QUESTION 5°. Must the recitation of Matins be repeated if it was had before the aforesaid time?

Resp. More probably, yes. The reason is that the Breviary is the burden of the day; therefore it must be recited on the day assigned to it. But if the aforesaid anticipation is made, the Office is then recited outside the day, no otherwise than if the little Hours of the following day were recited before midnight. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 175. - Nevertheless Sanchez, Diana, the Salmanticenses, Trullench, Quintanadvenas, Leander, etc., hold the opposite opinion, and Tamburinus judges it probable. Moreover this opinion does not seem to lack its probability [5]. Therefore if someone has recited Matins indeed after the second hour from midday, but before the time fixed by the Rubric, as sometimes is accustomed to happen from error, he could be excused from repeating the Breviary.

[5] The Salmanticenses have thus concerning this question (Tract. 16, ch. 3, n. 15): "We judge it most probable that Matins with Lauds can be recited immediately at the second hour of the day (namely after midday), at which Vespers are customarily recited." For this opinion they soon allege Sanchez, Molfesius, Quintanadvenas, Leander, Antonius a Spiritu Sancto, Martinus Ledesma, Trullench, Martinus a S. Joseph, Caramuel, and Diana. But they add: "From these, several say that this anticipation, even made without cause, is not even a venial sin; others indeed assert that it is venial, but that any cause excuses from it." St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 174) adds to these Tamburinus, who (In Dec., tr. 2, ch. 5, § 5, n. 2) calls this opinion probable equally with the others. Diana indeed (tom. 3, tr. 6, resol. 62) adds Faber, and (resol. 64, n. 2) Escobar a Corro, Garcia, and Machado; and he further notes that Sanchez (Consil., bk. 7, ch. 2, dub. 37) confirmed his opinion from the doctrine of St. Thomas, Viguerius, Turrecremata, and Navarrus.

 Even this little note, although merely historical, since it only reports certain authors alleged by others for the aforesaid opinion, nevertheless could not escape the censures of the Vindicators.

Therefore they object (p. 927, note 3), 1° that St. Thomas, Navarrus, and Viguerius are wrongly alleged by Sanchez, since St. Thomas (Quodl. 5, art. 28) merely affirms that Matins can licitly be said de sero, in the evening. But wrongly, they say, does Sanchez, whom Ballerini follows, explain that phrase de sero, as if it already designated the second hour after midday. Navarrus moreover and Viguerius speak in the same way as the Angelic Doctor. - Resp. 1° Ballerini there affirms nothing, nor denies anything, but merely reports. 2° Sanchez does not rely on the phrase de sero, but on other words of the Holy Doctor. For thus he writes (Consil., bk. 7, ch. 2, dub. 37, n. 4): "This conclusion is gathered from the cited doctrine of St. Thomas, Viguerius, Turrecremata, who say that if someone after Vespers and Compline says Matins of the following day, this now pertains to the following day." And in fact St. Thomas (l.c., ad 1) has these words: "As to the ecclesiastical office and the celebrations of solemnities, the day begins from Vespers; whence if someone after the said Vespers and Compline says Matins, this now pertains to the following day." But the same thing may be read apud Viguerius, Navarrus, and Turrecremata in the places cited by Sanchez.

The Vindicators object 2°: among the other authors brought forward by Father Ballerini for his opinion, several are more lenient than is fair. And after five have been counted up they add: "Of the remaining patrons of Father Ballerini, there are few who should be numbered among the weightier Doctors." - Resp. 1° Father Ballerini did not bring forward authors for his own opinion; but he indicated certain authors reported by others, so that in some way it might appear why he did not deny probability to Father Gury's second opinion. - Resp. 2° What the Vindicators add, namely that from nineteen authors reported in the note five are mentioned who are considered too, or sufficiently, benign, this argument, otherwise rather liable to ill-will, in the present case lacks all force. I said that this argument is liable to ill-will; for, to omit now the question whether those five are rightly disparaged as too benign, would the Vindicators prove that someone would throw back the very same thing whenever St. Alphonsus alleges one of those five, as often happens, for his own benign opinion? But besides, in the present case this exception is destitute of any force. For suppose an exception of laxity or excessive benignity of this sort is objected, rightly or wrongly, when some opinion rests on the authority of one writer alone. But where several others agree in the same opinion, on whom no one has dared to bring the mark of excessive benignity, does fairness permit that their suffrage be attributed to laxity or excessive benignity? And here indeed perhaps someone could invite the Vindicators to inspect whether there is any place for this exception of theirs concerning the authors brought forward by St. Alphonsus. The Vindicators say that eight authors are brought forward by the Holy Doctor for the less benign opinion. But what if someone perhaps with stronger right objected (of which a little later) that in reality Concina alone existed who defended the thesis of the Holy Doctor, and that this author, by the judgment of St. Alphonsus himself, is most rigid?

But as to what the Vindicators add, that the patrons of the aforesaid opinion are few who are to be numbered among grave Doctors, Resp. judgment concerning these men must more aptly be left to others, both for other reasons and also so that the danger may be avoided that someone should boast the same authors as grave, and indeed most grave, when they fight for him, but not grave when they fight against him. In the Preface which St. Alphonsus prefixed to the edition of the year 1748, these words are read: "Some things I judged must be explained, others added, from the various authorities of approved Doctors, namely Sanchez, ... Viva, Croix, Roncaglia, and others; especially the Salmanticenses, who, in the common estimation, treat this moral science diffusely and excellently; whom I myself had more frequently familiar than the others, so that nearly all things which the same men recall for examination with a broader pen in so many books, you will find here briefly arranged." Therefore at least those five, whom St. Alphonsus calls approved Doctors, are not brought forward vainly for that opinion.

Indeed even St. Alphonsus can be alleged for the same opinion; for in that same edition (Bk. 4, ch. 2, art. 4, dub. 2, note D) he wrote: "It is most probable that Matins can be recited at the second hour after midday ..., as Sanchez, Viva with Fill., Bon., Trull., and Tambur., the Salmanticenses with Led., Dian., Molf., Leand., etc., hold." What wonder therefore that an opinion could seem probable to Gury which could seem most probable to St. Alphonsus? You will say that afterward the contrary opinion was more pleasing to the Holy Doctor. But, setting aside now the question whether the later opinions of the Holy Doctor are always more probable than his earlier ones, one may ask: do the Vindicators think that the Holy Doctor gratuitously called the earlier opinion most probable? Therefore by the very fact the Holy Doctor confessed that some grave and solid reason stands for that opinion.

Moreover, so that force may be attributed to the allegations, it seems that in this question a threefold class of authors must be distinguished. For there are, 1º those who merely propose their own opinion, with no mention made of the other opinions, affirming, for example, that Matins can be recited at the fourth hour. But these indeed could be brought forward efficaciously against those who would deny that very thing, but not in the same way against opinions about which they pronounce no judgment; just as he who merely affirms that in a little supper those fasting can eat herbs would wrongly be alleged against those conceding some little fish, or even a portion of a larger fish, tuna for example, since he in no way touches the question about fish. Hence, when for example Filliuccius writes (tr. 23, ch. 8, n. 274): "It is licit to anticipate Matins half an hour before sunset, from the common opinion," would he rightly be alleged as if refuting, for example, the rule of St. Alphonsus or others who establish that it can be recited before that hour? Indeed Filliuccius himself (n. 276) adds: "If elsewhere there were another custom, it will be advisable to observe it." But with Concina removed, of this sort are nearly all the authors whom both St. Alphonsus and the Vindicators oppose to the controverted opinion.

There are, 2º others who report several opinions, and among these also the controverted one, which they either embrace, or call probable, or at least do not reprobate. Of these latter you have Mazzotta, who (tr. 2, disp. 1, ch. 2, q. 5), after reviewing various opinions, leaves the choice to readers; you have Illsung (tr. 5, disp. 1, q. 1, art. 4, n. 35), Reiffenstuel (tr. 6, dist. 1, ch. 2, n. 71), Gobat (tr. 5, n. 679), Croix (bk. 4, n. 1314), and Sporer (tr., append., De Hor. Canon., ch. 2, n. 140), who, although they do not prefer this opinion to the others, nevertheless permit it without a mark of censure, and certainly do not reprobate it. But among the former, namely those who either profess it absolutely, or at least judge it probable, besides those several whom each one sees alleged above in the note, Viva must be added, who (Curs. Theol., part 2, q. 3, art. 5, n. 11) writes: "Matins and Lauds ... from custom already received, can probably be recited without venial sin and without any cause from the declining of the preceding day, namely two or three hours after midday of the preceding day." And Azor (part 4, tr. 10, ch. 9, q. 5): "Therefore that doctrine and sentence of St. Thomas seems to me simpler and plainer, that the Nocturnal Office ... can be discharged privately by clerics as soon as the Vesperal and Compline prayers have been recited ..., namely after three, or two, hours after midday have elapsed." And Felix Potestas (Exam. Conf., tom. 1, part 2, n. 459): "In private recitation Matins and Lauds, from the already prescribed custom, can licitly be recited two hours after midday of the preceding day." And Giribaldi (tr. 5, ch. 3, n. 194), after recounting after others also those who will that it can be recited at the second hour after midday, adds (n. 195): "But probably each of the said authors judges that at the time assigned by them ... it is licit to discharge Matins." And Babenstuber (tr. 5, disp. 2, art. 3, n. 111): "Certain ones apud Tamburini think that it is licit to recite three hours before sunset; others three hours after midday; others between the third and fourth afternoon hour; others at the second hour after midday. I judge with the same Tamburini that all these opinions are probable, and that each one can embrace whichever he prefers." And Trullench (bk. 1, ch. 7, dub. 18, n. 9), after he brought forward Sanchez asserting that on any day of the year one reciting Matins of the next day at the second hour after midday, even if he has not yet recited Vespers and Compline, satisfies the precept, and ... with a cause existing in no way sins, adds: "I gladly admit it on account of the reason given." And Roncaglia (tr. 5, q. 2, ch. 5, q. 4): "Setting aside so many diverse opinions ..., to me that opinion is very probable which affirms that it can be recited at the hour at which first Vespers are said. The reason is that then tomorrow's feast day begins.... Besides, there is no inconvenience if, when tomorrow's feast day has now begun, the Matins of that day are anticipated." But the allegations which he subjoins, of Sanchez and Antonius a Spiritu Sancto, sufficiently explain the sense of these words. But to those alleged both now and in the preceding note, Neusser and Josephus Angles apud Gobat (l.c.) and Sporer (l.c.) must be added for the same opinion, and also Narbona, Verricelli, and Bassaeus apud Giribaldi (l.c.), and Leander (disp. 4, q. 93), and Concina (In Dec., bk. 2, disp. 2, ch. 9, § 8, q. 4), after Leander, brings forward also Acacius. And certainly it was to be desired that the Vindicators, who, most intent in seeking out the opinions of authors on this matter, could not fail to see these things with their own eyes, would not have passed over these same things in silence. Indeed both the examples and warnings of the Holy Doctor Alphonsus demand that our chief cares be borne not to defending some cause of our own, but to preserving the rights of truth.

There are, 3º finally, those who, following another opinion, undertake to attack the aforesaid one, which grants that Matins can be recited at the second hour after midday. But no one who preceded St. Alphonsus in attacking this opinion has up to now been found except Daniel Concina. For neither the seven others whom St. Alphonsus adds, nor the many others whom the Vindicators most diligently collected, touch this special question.

With these things inspected, let the fair reader now judge whether Gury should be blamed because he said that that opinion did not seem to lack probability, which otherwise so many Doctors either plainly admitted, or at least judged probable, and which no one in reality attacked except Concina and, after him, St. Alphonsus, who nevertheless earlier had defended it as most probable. But as to what can regard the reason brought forward by St. Alphonsus, for now it is enough to observe that it is not some abstruse reason which would not easily occur to the eyes of all. And if indeed so many and such great doctors have shown by the very fact that they were in no way moved by it, then let pardon finally be given also to others, that they may judge that it is not a reason of such a kind as settles the controversy.

The Vindicators object 3º finally (l.c.): "The Church conceded to certain Religious Orders the privilege of reciting Matins with a reasonable cause at the second hour after midday.... But this privilege would be useless if, by force of the common law, this were licit to any cleric."

Resp. I retort the argument. For, as Suarez (On Religion, tr. 4, bk. 4, ch. 17, n. 12) and Filliuccius (tr. 23, ch. 8, n. 274) have it, by Pontifical privileges the faculty of saying Matins one hour before sunset is granted. Therefore will the privilege be useless, if by force of the common law it is licit for each person to recite not only one hour before sunset, but much earlier, as St. Alphonsus concedes? Well does Suarez say (l.c.): "This argument is weak, because many things are granted in privileges, not because they are necessary, but because they are requested either because of fear or scruple, or for removing doubt arising from various opinions, or because what is requested is not licit according to the rigor of law and depends on custom, which can be uncertain and various." And Diana had already solved the same difficulty as to the second hour thus (tom. 3, tr. 6, res. 54, n. 3): "You will say: Pontiffs grant privileges that Matins can be recited two hours after midday. Therefore. I respond: those who seek this privilege are a sign that they hold the contrary opinion, and many things are sought from the Pontiff for greater caution and because of scruple; but from these things it does not follow that the cited opinion of the Doctors is not probable, nor that it cannot be followed."

66. ◦ QUESTION 6º. Can the Matins of the Office of the Dead and the Litanies for the feast of St. Mark and the days of Rogations be recited on the preceding evening?

Resp. to the 1st: More probably, yes. It is established from universal custom, and also from the Rubrics which have thus: "Once the Benedicamus Domino has been said, Matins of the Dead begins absolutely." Therefore, since the Matins of the Octave of the feast of All Saints is customarily, or at least can be, anticipated, consequently the Matins of the Dead also can be anticipated. Some with Lacroix deny this, relying on a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites. But that Decree, according to St. Ligorius, n. 174, seems to regard only recitation in choir.

Resp. to the 2nd: No. The reason is that the Litanies are affixed to the day, nor do they seem of themselves to be joined with Matins and Lauds. Besides, they supply attendance at the procession, which is wholly affixed to the day. Moreover, if the feast of St. Mark is transferred, the Litanies must not be transferred; therefore they do not inhere in Matins, nor do they have any connection with it. - St. Ligorius, n. 174, q. 3. - Lacroix.

67. ○ QUESTION 7º. Is one foreseeing an impediment to reciting the Office on the very day of obligation bound to recite Matins and Lauds on the evening of the vigil?

Resp. No. The reason is that, although Matins and Lauds can be recited on the preceding day, nevertheless they need not be [6]. Therefore the strict obligation does not press before the following midnight. Therefore, with an impediment standing from midnight to midnight, the obligation is removed.

[6] Namely, it is granted only by force of privilege that Matins can be recited on the preceding day. But the general rule is that no one is bound to use any privilege.

68. ○ QUESTION 8º. At what hour can the recitation of Vespers be begun in the morning during the time of Lent?

Resp. The Salmanticenses say, tr. 16, ch. 3, n. 15, that in Lent Vespers can be recited from the eleventh hour, or one hour before midday [7]. But the general rule is that Vespers can be recited privately at the same hour at which they are customarily recited in choir. But in choir they must be recited after the conventual Mass and None. The hour of the Mass, however, depends on the custom of places.

[7] As to the hour of reciting any part whatsoever of the Office, this must not be passed over, which St. Alphonsus has (Bk. 4, n. 173): "In order that someone may licitly anticipate or postpone the due time of the Hours, any useful or honorable cause suffices ..., greater devotion, or rest, a time more apt for studying, and the like."

Moreover, there is no obligation to recite Vespers before midday, but it is a mere privilege, which no one is bound to use. Compline, however, does not enjoy the aforesaid privilege; hence even during Lent it must be recited after midday.

II. As to Place and Position

69. ○ 1º As to place. The Office of choir must be recited in the very place destined for this, or in choir or in the Church. But the Office, if it is recited privately, can be said in every place, whether in an oratory, or at home, or in the country, or even while walking along the road, or making a journey, provided that the place is suitable for the attention required and does not impede devotion. - St. Ligorius, n. 179.

2º As to position. Privately the Office can be recited in every decent position, whether with knees bent, or standing, or sitting, or walking. Thus the universal practice, with which all theologians agree.

70. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Is it licit to recite the Office while lying down in bed?

Resp. No, a reasonable cause being excluded; for such a position savors of some irreverence. The same must also be said of any other such position. Yet this irreverence never exceeds venial sin. - Thus Concina and Viva apud St. Ligorius, n. 179. But any moderate cause will excuse from all fault, for example, sickness or any infirmity, headache, fatigue, or if someone cannot sleep at night, he could recite the Office without being bound to rise.

QUESTION 2º. Is it licit to recite the Office in a carriage or on horseback?

Resp. Yes. The reason is that this is prohibited by no law; nor from elsewhere does it stand in the way of attention, nor of the reverence due to prayer, even if others were journeying and conversing at the same time. For this has been obtained by the general custom even of pious persons. - Thus commonly.

71. ○ QUESTION 3º. Is it a fault not to observe the rubric according to which certain prayers must be recited with knees bent?

Resp. 1º No, if there is question of recitation outside choir; for from custom and common interpretation this rubric regards only choir. The same must be said of the sign of the cross and of other signs used in choir. These things indeed are laudably done in private recitation, but they are omitted without fault. - St. Ligorius [8], n. 179, and others commonly.

[8] St. Alphonsus indeed discusses position; but concerning the sign of the cross he has nothing.

Resp. 2º If there is question of recitation in choir, it is disputed. It seems one must affirm, because a rubric prescribing something imposes a precept [9]. Yet such an omission can never exceed venial fault. - St. Ligorius, ibid., etc.

[9] That a rubric prescribing something, by that very fact, imposes a precept accepted in the strict sense, is an opinion to which certain ones adhere, but certain others by no means, because they distinguish some rubrics as preceptive, others as merely directive.

QUESTION 4º. Is it a sin to recite the Breviary in an indecent place?

Resp. More probably, it seems it must be denied of itself, unless the place were to stand in the way of due attention, for example, because of a crowd of people, noise, etc.; for otherwise it would be indecent to pray in an indecent place, which is false, since, as God is everywhere, so also everywhere he can be prayed to and adored, as is clear from the Apostle, 1 Tim. 2:8: "I will that men pray in every place." - St. Ligorius, n. 179. - Lacroix, n. 1320, and others, against not a few who said that venial sin is present because this does not lack some irreverence.

Point III. On the Manner of Reciting the Hours

The Hours are to be recited 1º in the prescribed order; 2º with due pronunciation and devotion.

I. As to Order

72. ○ A twofold order must be observed in the recitation of the Breviary, namely the order of Offices and the order of Hours. 1º The order of Offices is described in the calendar of feasts and in the rubrics for their translation, where several occur at the same time. 2º

The order of Hours is that which is set out in the Breviary, namely that Matins with Lauds be recited in the first place, then the little Hours be subjoined, that is, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, and finally Vespers with Compline follow.

73. Questions. - 1º Does one satisfy the precept of reciting the Hours who from error or inadvertence recites another Office for the Office of the day?

Resp. Yes [1]. The reason is that the Church is not presumed to will to oblige someone twice on one day to this burden, and because the substance of the recitation has been sufficiently preserved. Hence the common axiom which is held as a rule in these circumstances: Officium pro Officio valet, "Office counts for Office." Therefore, when the recitation has been completed, there is no obligation to recite another Office. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 161, q. 3. - Lacroix, n. 1351. - The same must also be said about any part of the Office according to the axiom: "Error is corrected where it is detected."

[1] Thus you would say rather that one erring is excused from paying the task twice, than that he has satisfied.

Nevertheless it is counsel, says Laymann with others, but not obligation, to subjoin the propers of the omitted Office. But when the Office would be notably shorter, for example, the Office of some Saint for the Office of Sunday, compensation must be made by reciting nine Psalms from the first Nocturn. - St. Ligorius, ibid. [2].

[2] St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 161, q. 3) does not define the matter so absolutely, but merely has these words: "Tournely with Laymann, Bonacina, etc., reasonably notes that if the Office said was notably shorter, suppose the Office of a Saint in place of Sunday, compensation must be made by reciting nine Psalms from the first Nocturn." Therefore St. Alphonsus only reports the opinion of certain ones as reasonable. But neither is this opinion perfectly reported there. For Laymann, by merely opining, hints at it (Bk. 4, tr. 1, ch. 5, n. 5), saying: "You would seem to be obliged to make some compensation." Nor otherwise Suarez (On Religion, tr. 4, bk. 4, ch. 25, n. 15): "Although it seems necessary to make some compensation, if he can, within the same day." Add that Laymann (l.c.) affirmed this especially about culpable error.

74. ○ QUESTION 2º. If someone from error has recited only some part of an undue Office, and notices the error, can he proceed with the Office begun, or is he bound to recite the remaining parts from the Office of the day?

Resp. According to the common opinion of theologians, liberty is given. Therefore he can either proceed, or recite the remaining parts from the due Office, after the Psalm or prayer has been finished. Yet it is better to change the Office according to many, who establish this rule: "Error is corrected where it is detected." But this is from mere counsel, not from precept. - St. Ligorius, n. 161, q. 5. - Lacroix, n. 1255. - Tamburinus, etc.

75. ○ QUESTION 3º. When you have already said one Office for another, can you recite the omitted Office on the day on which the Office already recited by you occurs?

Resp. No. But the Office recited must be recited again. The reason is that the Church prescribes that an Office be transferred only when it is not recited because of a Sunday or a greater Office; besides there is an obligation of conforming oneself with the common rite of the Church [3]. - Thus Lugo, Resp. Mor., bk. 5, dub. 8. St. Ligorius, n. 161, says this is more probable; but it must be held as morally certain from the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, 17 June 1674, apud Gardellini, n. 2634 (3rd ed.).

[3] Nevertheless, that this obligation is not grave is sufficiently shown by those things which St. Alphonsus discusses (Bk. 4, n. 161, qq. 3 and 4).

76. ○ QUESTION 4º. Whether or how does he sin who knowingly recites another Office for the Office of the day?

Resp. 1º He commits no sin if he does this for a reasonable cause, for example, if he cannot easily have the proper Office, or if from charity he recites with a companion saying a different Office, provided that that Office has been approved by the Holy See, and is equal or nearly equal; indeed the reason of companionship alone appears sufficiently reasonable, says St. Ligorius, n. 161.

Resp. 2º If a reason is excluded, it will indeed be a sin, but only venial, if the Office is changed into one equal or nearly equal, because the obligation is satisfied as to substance, provided however that it happens rarely [4]. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - Roncaglia, - Sporer, etc., against others, who say that it is always mortal.

[4] St. Alphonsus (Bk. 4, n. 161, q. 3, at the end) calls the opinion which apposes that condition, "provided it happens rarely," more equitable; but he adds that the opinion which does not admit that condition or restriction is sufficiently probable.

Resp. 3º If a notably shorter Office is recited, it is a grave sin, because then the substance of the obligation is not satisfied. This is clear both from the nature of the thing and from proposition 34 condemned by Alexander VII, which reads thus: "One reciting the Paschal Office on Palm Sunday satisfies the precept."

77. ○ QUESTION 5º. What sort of sin is it to invert the order in the recitation of the Hours?

Resp. 1º In private recitation it never exceeds venial sin, because such an inversion of order does not contain grave deformity; for the order to be observed is not under precept except as a secondary precept and as a circumstance of lesser moment. But if you change the order for some just cause, for example, to recite with a companion who has already proceeded further in the recitation, you will be wholly free from all fault. Certain ones say that inversion of order is a mortal sin if it happens frequently; but more probably this must be denied with St. Ligorius, n. 169.

Resp. 2º In public recitation, it is disputed whether it is a grave sin or not to invert the order or to change the time of the Hours. Some affirm, if the inversion or change of time is notable and there is no excusing cause. The reason is that the Canons repeat several times that the Hours must be recited at the appointed times. - Azor, etc. - But others deny, because a circumstance of this sort does not pertain to the substance of the precept, but is merely accidental. Each opinion is probable; but the second is more probable, because there is no certainty about a grave precept. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 171.

78. ○ QUESTION 6º. What is a cause for inverting the order of the Hours?

Resp. Any reasonable cause excuses. But the following can be assigned, namely: 1º if you are invited by a friend to recite some Hour with him, and you have not yet recited the preceding Hour or Hours; 2º if in the morning you do not have the Breviary at hand, nor can conveniently wait, then from the Diurnal which you have you could recite the daytime Hours, afterward to recite Matins; 3º if you do not have the Lessons at hand, you can recite the Psalms of Matins and Lauds, indeed also the rest, with the Lessons deferred; 4º if you come to choir when an Hour has already been begun, you can proceed with the others, and afterward supply what has been omitted. Likewise, if you come to choir when one Hour has already been completed, you can sing the later one with the choir, and afterward supply the prior. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 170. - Lacroix, nn. 1509 and 1311, and others commonly.

79. ○ QUESTION 7º. Is it a sin to say Matins of the following day before the Office of the present day has been completed?

Resp. It is indeed a sin, says Lacroix, n. 1315, but only venial, if it is done without cause. But neither is it certain that it is venial, since the Office of one day seems to have no order with the Office of another day. According to the opinion, however, which holds that it is a venial sin, a sufficient cause for beginning Matins of the following day before you have completed the Office of the present day is if you are asked by another to recite the Matins of the following day with him; and generally every cause sufficient for an inversion of order among the Hours of the same day would also suffice in the present case. - Lacroix, n. 1315.

80. ○ QUESTION 8º. Does he sin who does not recite the commemorations according to the order assigned by the rubric?

Resp. Several deny, because that rubric seems merely directive, like those which regard the position of the body or signs of the cross. Indeed they say the same about the order to be observed among commemorations in Mass. But this at least as to the latter must be denied, because all the Rubrics to be observed in Mass are preceptive, as St. Ligorius says, Bk. 6, n. 399 [5].

[5] St. Alphonsus, after proposing the question whether the rubrics of the Missal are merely directive, or of counsel for instruction, or are preceptive, obliging to fault, responds that there are four opinions of the Doctors. Therefore one must not think that the opinion which St. Alphonsus prefers, and which the Author here proposes, is the only one which it is licit to follow.

And indeed, as to prayers, the same St. Alphonsus (Bk. 6, n. 412) writes these things: "Concina and Croix with Pasqualigo probably say that although it is more satisfactory to observe the rubric, nevertheless it is not forbidden from some cause or devotion to add one collect." And Gobat and Pescara add that this can be done even on a feast of the second class.

II. As to Pronunciation

81. ○ Pronunciation must be vocal, integral, continued.

1º Vocal. The Office must be recited with the voice, and indeed distinctly; but it does not suffice that it be read by the mind alone, or only run through with the eyes; nor is it enough if it is recited in the throat or between the teeth, or by syncopating, or abbreviating with a stammering tongue. The reason is that properly vocal prayer is prescribed; but it is not judged properly vocal unless it is made with a distinct voice. - Thus all.

2º Integral. The Office must be recited integrally; but to its integrity pertain the Pater, Ave, and Credo at the beginning and end of the Hours, as is noted in the Rubrics. Nevertheless the prayers Aperi, Domine and Sacrosanctae do not pertain to the integrity of the Office; but they are recited only from counsel.

3º Continued. Any notable interruption within one Hour, if it happens without any cause, is not free from fault; but it does not exceed venial sin. - St. Ligorius, n. 166.

82. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Must one reciting the Office hear himself in order to satisfy?

Resp. More probably, no. The reason is that hearing is not prescribed, but only recitation, that is, pronunciation of words, which is called vocal; therefore it suffices if the one who recites is conscious to himself that he is pronouncing the words. - Laymann, Sporer, the Salmanticenses, and St. Ligorius, n. 163, says this is sufficiently probable, against others.

83. ○ QUESTION 2º. What are just causes for interrupting the Office?

Resp. Any reasonable cause suffices for interrupting any Hour; but especially the following causes are numbered: 1º any utility, one's own or another's, which cannot be deferred without some inconvenience; 2º a reason of civility or charity, or the reason of executing the commands of Superiors; 3º if the confession of someone who would not gladly wait must be heard; 4º if you wish to do or note something so that you may remove distraction or solicitude, for example, lest you forget, etc., provided nevertheless that it does not happen frequently; for frequent interruption on account of this cause does not lack some irreverence; 5º some brief prayer also, or some pious affection of the heart, can licitly be inserted into the recitation. Nevertheless it would not be licit to linger in these things longer and frequently for the sake of meditating, because the character of recitation or vocal prayer would not be sufficiently preserved; likewise if a longer vocal prayer and one in no way pertaining to the Office were said; for a notable part would be added to the Hours, which would be venial as against the prescribed form. - St. Ligorius, n. 168. - Salmanticenses, tr. 16, ch. 3, n. 4. - Lacroix, n. 1307, and others commonly [6].

[6] None of the authors alleged here introduces discussion about meditation not being inserted into the recitation of the Office; likewise none reprehends other prayers perhaps intermingled, unless these are added as parts of the Office.

84. ○ QUESTION 3º. Can Matins be separated from Lauds?

Resp. Yes, according to the common opinion. For thus St. Ligorius, n. 167: "It is common that Matins can be separated from Lauds without any cause, as the Salmanticenses, Bonacina, Concina, Suarez, Sanchez, Navarrus, Lacroix, Lessius say." Then, however, when Matins has been finished, the Pater noster must be said, as must be done after any Hour.

85. ○ QUESTION 4º. Can the Nocturns be separated without cause?

Resp. Yes. It is established from universal custom, against which no law can be opposed. Indeed formerly from the practice of the Church they were separated, since they were customarily recited at various hours of the night. Why therefore could they not now be separated? - Thus the Salmanticenses and others more commonly against others. Indeed not a few say that even without a special cause an interval of three hours can be placed between individual Nocturns. But if there is a just cause on account of which the Nocturns must be separated, that interval can also be prolonged according to the reason of that cause. - Thus Busembaum, Bonacina, the Salmanticenses, Viva, whose opinion St. Ligorius, n. 167, deservedly calls probable.

86. ○ QUESTION 5º. Whether or how does he sin who, after one or another Nocturn has been recited on the vigil, recites the remaining part of Matins with the whole night intervening?

Resp. 1º He must always be exempted from mortal sin, because he satisfies the substance of the precept. For from the general rule handed down by St. Ligorius, n. 168, and by others commonly, the substance of the precept is satisfied whenever the Office is recited integrally on the natural or ecclesiastical day, so that venial sin is never then exceeded, however great an interruption may intervene even without cause. Therefore the present case must not be excluded.

Resp. 2º He also will be excused from venial sin who does this for a reasonable cause, for example, if the Office is very long, as the Office of Sunday, and after the first Nocturn has been recited he is very fatigued or overwhelmed by sleep, etc. The reason follows from what has been said, since any interruption from a just cause is licit. Reuter, On the Canonical Hours, n. 262.

87. ○ QUESTION 6º. Whether or to what extent must some Hour be repeated because of a notable interruption placed within it?

Resp. 1º An entire Hour must never be repeated, even if the interruption was placed without just cause. The reason is clear from what was just said. Besides, individual Psalms, and individual Lessons or Prayers, have their complete signification, and they are sufficiently united by the intention of continuing.

Resp. 2º Indeed, speaking of itself, nothing must necessarily be repeated, even if the interruption occurs in the middle of a Psalm, provided it is not in the middle of a versicle or in the middle of a prayer, because individual versicles also have their own particular signification. - St. Ligorius, n. 168, and others commonly, against some.

QUESTION 7º. In the recitation of the Office, is it licit to mix in or append something from devotion?

Resp. No, because in the Offices nothing is to be added or changed unless it has been conceded by the Apostolic See. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Rites, 10 June 1690 [7].

[7]  Understand: nothing is to be added as a part of the Office. See above, n. 83, q. 2.

88. ○ QUESTION 8º. To what is one reciting the Hours with a companion or with the choir bound by reason of pronunciation?

Resp. For satisfying the obligation, it is required: 1º that the recitation be made in alternate verses. But if more than two recite, after a double choir has been made, it must be recited alternately, because this manner is admitted by the custom of the Church; 2º that the verses be said successively and not simultaneously, and that one not resume before the other has completed his own; 3º that the things which are said by one be heard by the others, so that they may communicate, and one moral prayer be made. Nevertheless it is not necessary that those hearing pronounce in a lowered voice the part of the others. - Thus most commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 162.

QUESTION 9º. Do you satisfy if you recite the Hours with a layman, or another not obliged, or with one distracted or not attentive?

Resp. Yes to all. The reason is that these things do not prevent you from reciting the Hours according to the custom of the Church. The defect of obligation or of attention on the part of the other does not change or vitiate your recitation. Therefore, if the companion is obliged and does not attend, he himself does not satisfy, since he does not communicate with you; but he does not prevent you from communicating with him, if he pronounces rightly and you hear rightly. - Lacroix, n. 1295.

89. ○ QUESTION 10º. Are you bound to repeat the things which you recited with imperfect or mutilated pronunciation?

Resp. 1º Yes, if the mutilation is very notable, so that the sense of the words is corrupted and destroyed; and this holds even if you did it involuntarily, because the defect affects the substance of the recitation; except unless impossibility stands in the way, for example, stammering.

Resp. 2º No, if you so mutilate syllables that the sense of the words is not corrupted, or if you mutilate in small quantity; for then the fault does not affect the substance of the obligation, and therefore does not exceed venial sin. Indeed you sin in no way if you do this involuntarily because of inadvertence, or stammering, or an inveterate custom which can only with difficulty be overcome; otherwise suitable effort must be applied to amend this custom.

QUESTION 11º. Must the prayer be said after Matins when Lauds are separated?

Resp. Probably, no, but it suffices to recite the Pater noster after Matins. The reason is that probably Matins and Lauds morally effect one Hour, and from another source a prayer is prescribed on the night of the Nativity of the Lord alone. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 167. - Salmanticenses. - Sanchez. - Viva, etc. - Voit, n. 1064, etc.

Nevertheless others also affirm, probably, because, they say, it is probable that Matins and Lauds are two distinct Hours. Thus Gavantus, Bonacina, Navarrus, and St. Ligorius, ibid., says it is probable [8].

[8] These things contribute to the mere erudition of the reader, but nothing to practice. For a merely probable obligation is now not an obligation, but a mere opinion about an obligation, which does not have the force of obliging.

QUESTION 12º. Before Lauds separated from Matins, must the Pater and Ave be said, as before the other Hours?

Resp. Some affirm absolutely, because then Lauds are an Hour distinct from Matins. Thus Saettler, etc. Others more probably deny, because this is prescribed nowhere. Nor is the reason valid, that Lauds then are like a distinct Hour; for the Pater and Ave are not said at the beginning of Compline, although this is a distinct Hour. - Thus Voit, n. 1064. - Lacroix, n. 1305.

III. As to Attention and Devotion

90. ○ The Office must be recited attentively and devoutly, since it is prayer, and indeed public prayer, or prayer to be recited by a public minister deputed by the Church. Hence one voluntarily distracted in reciting the Hours sins at least venially. But whether at some time he sins gravely will soon be said in the questions.

Moreover, not only distractions which are intended are voluntary, but also those which are willed in their cause, namely those which arise from negligence, levity, excessive preoccupation with business to be done, from curiosity in looking around at external objects, from circumstances of an unsuitable place or time, unless some reason excuses this. - Bouvier, etc.

91. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. How many kinds of attention are distinguished?

Resp. Twofold, namely internal and external. The former consists in the interior advertence of the mind to that which is being done; but the latter is that which excludes every external action physically incompatible with recitation, such as conversing, writing, etc.

Again, internal attention is threefold, namely: 1º spiritual, which is to God himself, as the term of prayer; 2º literal, or to the sense of the words and the signification of the things; 3º material, which is made to the words only, namely to pronouncing them rightly. - See vol. 1, n. 344.

QUESTION 2º. Is internal attention required under grave obligation?

Resp. There is a twofold opinion among theologians.

The 1st OPINION, the more common, affirms. The reason is, 1º because prayer without internal attention is not prayer. For prayer is an elevation of the mind to God; but with internal attention excluded, there is no elevation of the mind to God. Therefore... Besides, for discharging the Hours there is required at least some intention of worshiping God; but this intention cannot be had without some internal attention. Therefore... 2º Because one must not believe that the Church intended to prescribe only material attention in discharging the Divine Office. Indeed the Council of Trent seems expressly to have declared the necessity of internal attention by saying that the Office must be recited reverently, distinctly, and devoutly. 3º If no internal attention were required, there would be no reason why voluntary distraction would be prohibited by divine law. - Thus Sanchez, Azor, Roncaglia, and many others.

The 2nd OPINION denies, and says that external attention absolutely suffices for satisfying the substance of the recitation and for removing mortal sin. The reason is that if internal attention were required, one who involuntarily distracted recited the Hours would not satisfy his obligation; for when the essence of a thing has been destroyed, although inculpably, the thing itself remains destroyed. Nevertheless, not even the adversaries admit this. But thus St. Ligorius concludes, n. 177: "The first opinion seems more probable at least on account of extrinsic authority, and altogether is to be counseled as safer [9]; but the second, both on account of the authority of the Doctors, which is not to be contemned, and on account of reasons resting on foundations not slight, appears sufficiently probable." I gladly adhere to this conclusion. - Recall what was said about Mass, vol. 1, n. 345.

[9] Namely, attention even interior is to be recommended, but not the opinion which imposes a grave obligation of interior attention; for it is not lawful to impose an uncertain opinion as a certain obligation.

92. ○ QUESTION 3º. What internal attention is required according to the former opinion?

Resp. Any certainly suffices, because whether it is spiritual, or literal, or material, the mind is elevated to God, and true prayer is made, even if the attention were only to the words. Hence neither spiritual attention nor literal attention is required, which is impossible for many, namely for Nuns and for some Religious ignorant of the Latin language. Therefore it is enough if material attention is had; for attention to the words with the general intention of worshiping God suffices. Indeed attention to individual words is not required, but moral and general attention suffices, by which someone takes care to say all things with the intention of praying [10]. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 176. - Lacroix, n. 1344.

[10] If for internal attention any one of the three aforesaid kinds, and material attention also, suffices, De Lugo, according to whose opinion it is probable that external attention suffices, rightly notes (De Euch., disp. 22, n. 41) that Father Aegidius Coninck (In 3 P. S. Thom., q. 83, n. 301) not without reason said that in reality many of the adversaries agree, namely those requiring internal attention, and that there seems to be a disagreement only about the name. For they require internal attention, but only to the words, and such that it suffices lest someone expose himself to the danger of pronouncing the words badly and in a disturbed manner, or of omitting them. This attention can be had by one who even voluntarily at that time would think about some metaphysical question, or another similar thing.

Indeed De Lugo does not hand these things down as if, from this opinion, the voluntary distractions of those praying lacked fault. For soon, speaking about other adversaries who require some greater internal attention, he subjoins these things: "Therefore we confess that whenever vocal prayer is continued, some internal attention is given; but this is sometimes so slight that certain adversaries deservedly do not wish to call it attention; because when they demand attention from obligation, they understand it of a more formal and explicit obligation. Yet we say that this cannot be voluntarily omitted without venial fault because of the irreverence which intervenes, if you speak to God exteriorly, with the mind wholly distracted to other things; nevertheless there is no certainty about an obligation under mortal sin, since prayer still remains substantially." But that prayer then remains substantially, Lugo had shown by those reasons (ibid., nn. 29-39) which certainly, to use the words of St. Alphonsus (Bk. 5, n. 552), can with difficulty be solved.

QUESTION 4º. What are the remedies for repelling distractions?

Resp. Some are negative, and others positive. Negative remedies are reduced to the removal of all those things which are the cause of distraction, for example, to prevent the eyes from wandering about, to withdraw oneself from greater noise of men, not to hurry toward diverse business, etc. - But positive remedies are: 1º at the beginning of the recitation to form the intention of praising God; 2º to renew the intention at the end of the Psalms, when the Gloria Patri is said; 3º often to bring the presence of God back into the mind; 4º to set before oneself the Passion of our Lord, distributing the various circumstances of that Passion through the individual Hours, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 177.

Point IV. On Causes Excusing from the Recitation of the Hours

The causes excusing from the recitation of the Divine Office are 1º impossibility; 2º charity; 3º dispensation.

93. º I. Impossibility, whether physical or moral, which consists in grave difficulty of reciting the Office. Hence he is excused:

1º Who does not have a Breviary, because, for example, undertaking a journey, he forgot it, or lost it on the journey, with inability to procure another. If, however, through his own fault he forgot or lost it, or threw it away, he sinned gravely [1], and the omission of the Hours is to be imputed to him. 2º Who labors under a grave illness, for example, fever, pain of the intestines or head; or who justly fears lest grave inconvenience follow from the recitation, etc. Hence he is sufficiently excused who prudently believes or fears that because of the recitation of the Office some notable heaviness of the head, or rawness of the stomach, or weariness of strength, or some other grave inconvenience would thence come upon him. - St. Ligorius, n. 154, note 1.

[1] Better say that this person has sinned gravely or lightly, according as the cause of the omission existed as gravely or lightly culpable.

3º One convalescing from grave illness can be excused for some days at the judgment of a prudent person, until his strength is restored. And this can be admitted even if the sick person already celebrates Mass. - St. Ligorius, ibid., note 2.

4º He also is excused who in time of persecution fears lest from the recitation of the Breviary he be betrayed; likewise he who labors gravely with his eyes, etc. - St. Ligorius, nn. 156 and 157, and others commonly.

II. Charity toward one's neighbor, that is, a grave occupation which cannot be omitted without scandal or notable detriment of the neighbor. Such occupation excuses from the recitation of the Office, because the natural precept of charity prevails over ecclesiastical law. Hence you are excused from the recitation of the Hours, either totally or partially, 1º If at night, about to recite the Office, for example Vespers, you are called immediately to a dying person, and time or convenience for discharging the obligation of the Office does not suffice for you.

2º If the whole day you are occupied in hearing confessions which, because of peculiar circumstances, cannot be deferred, for example, in sacred missions, and especially under their end, when you are about to depart, etc.

3º If you could not omit a sermon without scandal or detriment to reputation, and nevertheless time for preparing it would not suffice if the Office had to be recited.

4º If you are occupied the whole day in settling quarrels, or in assisting the sick, for example, in time of contagious disease, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 156, and others.

94. ○ III. Legitimate dispensation, or one conceded by a legitimate Superior.

1º The obligation of reciting the Divine Office, since it is of ecclesiastical law, can be removed by ecclesiastical Superiors.

2º The Pope can validly concede this dispensation in every case, even without cause; but licitly from a reasonable cause, for example, because of excessive occupation, for quieting scruples, etc.

3º A Bishop also can dispense from this law, but not validly without sufficient cause, and only with someone in particular for a time, namely: 1º when there is doubt about moral inability, or about the gravity of a detriment to be feared; 2º when recourse to the Pope is difficult; 3º when the dispensation is sought on account of a cause which frequently recurs, for example, because of infirmity; 4º when the dispensation is sought for a brief time. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 159. - Recall what was said in the Treatise on Laws, vol. 1, n. 115.

95. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. What must be done in doubt whether infirmity suffices for excusing or not?

Resp. 1º The sick person can commit himself to the judgment of a physician, as is said in Canon Law, ch. Fraternitatis, De frig. et mal.; 2º he can acquiesce in the judgment of the Superior, who in doubt also has power to dispense; 3º he can remit himself to the probable judgment of a prudent man; 4º indeed probably he can also stand by his own judgment, if he himself is able to form such a judgment. - St. Ligorius, n. 154 [2].

[2]  St. Alphonsus (bk. 4, n. 154) adds these things: If it is only doubtful whether the indisposition reaches so far as to excuse, as above; then, since the law of reciting is in possession and the doubt concerns the exemption, the law must certainly be fulfilled. This holds, however, when it is a pure doubt; otherwise if there is a probable judgment. Tournely, Roncaglia, Elbel, Anacletus, etc. In which you again see that, in the judgment of St. Alphonsus, the principle of possession certainly holds when it is a matter of negative doubt, but not where a probable opinion stands on the other side. See above, Vol. I, the Note to n. 80.

St. Alphonsus adds besides (ibid.): But what if, these things having been premised (namely those which Gury reports in this place), the doubt still persists? It is answered: if the doubt is whether the recitation would gravely harm him, then he is certainly not bound, indeed he cannot recite, because the natural right of preserving health is to be preferred to the precept of the Church, as Viva and the Salmanticenses say with others; unless he did it from love of virtue, the danger of death being excluded, according to what was said in bk. 3, n. 371, with Lugo, the Salmanticenses, Villalobos, etc. But these things are to be understood with discretion: 1. because, if the recitation would in fact gravely harm him, it would perhaps follow that afterwards he would have to be free from reciting for a longer time, which love of virtue ought rather to shun. 2. The citation of bk. 3, n. 371 seems perhaps less to the point. For the question there concerns Monks who by living austerely perhaps incur some loss of a longer life. On which matter Lugo, whom St. Alphonsus cites, has thus (De Iust., disp. 10, n. 32): It is inferred, seventhly, that penances, fasts, and mortifications of the flesh voluntarily undertaken are unlawful only when they would bring a notable hastening of death...; otherwise... it is not unlawful to perform those works, although some shortening of life, not notable, is feared. Now that danger of a harm perhaps to follow little by little differs considerably from the injury which by the very fact will bring grave harm to the one reciting.

QUESTION 2º. To what is a sick person bound, if he is certain that he cannot discharge the whole Office, but doubts whether he is able to recite a part?

Resp. Probably he is bound to nothing. For he is reasonably excused from the whole Office, lest he be distressed by scruples, not knowing how far he can and is bound to recite; indeed such anxiety, as St. Ligorius says, would bring him great harm. - St. Ligorius, n. 154, at the end.

96. ○ QUESTION 3º. Is one who is in any way impeded from reciting the whole Breviary bound to the part which he can recite?

Resp. Entirely yes. The reason is evident. For the obligation of the Breviary falls on its individual parts, since the thing prescribed is divisible. This is also established from proposition 54 condemned by Innocent XI, which lies thus: "He who cannot recite Matins and Lauds, but can recite the remaining Hours, is bound to nothing, because the greater part draws the lesser to itself." Therefore he who lacks a Breviary, and knows nothing else by memory except Lauds or Compline, is bound under grave obligation to recite those.

QUESTION 4º. Are you bound to recite the Psalms if you have only these before your hands, or know them by memory, with the Lessons and Responsories left aside?

Resp. More probably, yes. The reason is that, since you can recite a notable part of the Office, there is no cause why you should be excused from it. - St. Ligorius, n. 158. - Lacroix, n. 1220. - Sporer, etc. Yet several say that you are bound to nothing, because then the form prescribed by St. Pius V is lacking. Moreover the opinion of these seems sufficiently probable. Nor does the above-cited proposition 54 condemned by Innocent XI stand in the way, because in that proposition there is question of one who can complete entire Hours. - But the following rule is handed down by St. Ligorius and others [3]: If you can recite as much as is a little Hour, you are bound under grave obligation to recite it; but if less, you are not obliged to recite anything even under venial obligation, because such a small part, taken separately, is not judged appreciable for the end intended by the law.

[3]  St. Alphonsus had prefaced this rule with these things: "Busembaum with Bonacina, Holzmann with Illsung, and Croix with Laymann and Filliuccius, rightly assign this rule, that if you can recite as much as a little Hour, you are bound under grave obligation to recite it."

But, what you will surely wonder at, neither Busembaum, nor Bonacina, nor Holzmann, nor Illsung, nor Laymann, nor Filliuccius has anything about a rule of this sort. Therefore Croix alone is the one who (Bk. 4, n. 1220) wished to deduce it from Illsung, who again entirely wrongly wished to deduce another rule of his from Laymann. But from Croix this rule flowed into St. Alphonsus, and from the Holy Doctor into Gury, and into Scavini, who (tr. 5, disp. 1, ch. 2, art. 3, § 5, n. 1, in note) wrote: "Behold the rule: if you can recite as much as a little Hour, you are bound under grave obligation."

I said that Illsung wrongly wished to deduce a certain rule of his from Laymann. For after he had stated beforehand (tr. 5, disp. 1, q. 1, art. 6, n. 41) that he who cannot say even an entire Hour is not obliged to say the Psalms, or prayers, or parts of Hours, he adds: "Laymann is still more severe; for he judges that, although Matins is only one Hour, he who could say all its Psalms, but not the Lessons because of lack of a book, would altogether be bound to say them. Hence he says that, provided someone can say only as much as suffices for an omission mortally sinful, as indeed all the Psalms of Matins, exceeding the smallness of the other Hours, would suffice, by this very fact there is an obligation of saying; which also seems true to me." But from this Croix fashioned his rule, reasoning thus: From Laymann and Illsung, someone is obliged to say that whose omission is gravely sinful. But the omission of one little Hour is gravely sinful. Therefore he who can recite as much as one little Hour is bound to this under grave obligation. But Croix indeed drew this inference, not Illsung, who, with the context considered, together with the mark of a more severe opinion attributed to Laymann in comparison with others, seems to be understood of a notable part of one and the same Hour which is omitted. Otherwise it would be inferred that one who knows by memory only two Psalms of Matins, the last two from Lauds, and two from Vespers, is now, as if from the opinion of Illsung, bound under grave obligation to recite these, since they exceed, not merely equal, the measure of one little Hour; which certainly Illsung did not even dream of.

Moreover Croix and Illsung attribute both Croix's rule and Illsung's other rule to Laymann wholly wrongly. For he (Bk. 1, tr. 4, ch. 19, n. 6), after positing this thesis: "If the precept is about an indivisible thing, he who is excused from a substantial part of it is excused from the whole," then subjoins this exception: "Unless the part of the precept which cannot be observed is slight, so that he who observes the remainder is judged morally to fulfill the precept as to substance." But he adds an example also from the Breviary, saying: "It is similar if someone has lost his Breviary, and in the Matins of some feria knows all the Psalms by memory, but does not know the three Lessons with the Responsories, he is obliged to recite the Psalms, because then the part which is omitted is not notable." And from these things indeed Illsung generally inferred that one is obliged to recite the Psalms of Matins, even if someone lacks the Lessons; and further he inferred as if from the mouth of Laymann a certain general principle about the obligation of reciting that whose omission would be gravely sinful. But both of these are vainly ascribed to Laymann. For Laymann immediately follows: "But something else must be said about Matins of nine Lessons, the omission of which is judged notable; wherefore he who cannot recite that part seems to be excused from the whole." Therefore Laymann did not say generally that the Psalms of Matins must be recited if the Lessons are lacking; but he asserted this only concerning the lack of three Lessons in the Matins of a feria. Much less does he generally admit the obligation of reciting that whose omission constitutes grave fault; for is not the omission of the nine Psalms of Matins grave? Yet he excuses from reciting them one who lacks the nine Lessons. Namely, he takes the norm not from the part of the Hour considered in itself, but from its proportion to preserving the substance of the precept, which he says must be measured, not in relation to the whole Office, but in relation to individual Hours. Therefore he subjoins (l.c., n. 7): "If the precept is about a divisible thing, he who is excused from one part must nevertheless observe the other, since in that part the substance of the precept can consist; for example, a priest who for some cause is impeded from reciting Matins is nevertheless bound to recite the little Hours and Vespers, if he can." From these things it is also clear that Bonacina (De Pecc., disp. 2, q. 8, punct. 1, n. 7) did not rightly number Laymann among those who assert that he who cannot recite the greater part of the Divine Office is not bound to the lesser, since otherwise Bonacina had established the same principle as Laymann (l.c., n. 4), namely that he who cannot conveniently fulfill the whole precept is bound to fulfill part, provided it is a notable part and is judged intended by the Superior, provided namely, as Laymann says, that in that part the substance of the precept is preserved. And from these things we are again taught how cautiously allegations are to be trusted, although the authors apud whom they stand may seem more accurate.

97. ○ QUESTION 5º. Are you bound to employ a companion if you are not able to recite the Hours alone?

Resp. Yes, if you easily find someone whom you can conveniently employ. The reason is, 1º because then there is not inability properly so called; 2º because the precepts of the Church require ordinary diligence for their fulfillment. But no means is more ordinary than to employ in recitation a companion whom perhaps you can easily find. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 158. - Salmanticenses, etc.

QUESTION 6º. Are you bound to employ a companion, with a stipend paid, if you cannot conveniently find another?

Resp. No, according to the common opinion. The reason is that the means is wholly extraordinary, and also is full of inconveniences; whence the Church is not judged to oblige to it. Indeed, if a companion who will recite with you gratis does not promptly occur, you are not bound to seek someone with anxiety and solicitude, because this too would become an extraordinary means. - Thus the Salmanticenses, ch. 3, n. 44. - Suarez, On Religion, tom. 2, bk. 4, ch. 8, n. 12.

Article II. On the Negative Obligations of Clerics, or on Those Things Which Are Prohibited to Clerics

98. ○ Generally, clerics are prohibited from giving themselves to those things which are unbecoming to the ecclesiastical state, for example, from exercising the art of butcher, innkeeper, physician, and surgeon, except in a case of necessity; from acting as judge in a case of blood, or advocate, or patron, or notary in secular contracts. Likewise clerics are prohibited from going about armed, entering taverns, and many other things. But the following are especially prohibited to clerics: 1º habitation with women; 2º games of chance; 3º bearing arms and hunting; 4º trading. Of each briefly.

§ I. On Habitation with Women

99. ○ Habitation under the same roof with women was generally prohibited to clerics by the sacred canons already from the earliest times of the Church. Thus in the First Council of Nicaea, canon 3: "The great Synod has altogether forbidden that it be licit for a Bishop or Presbyter, or Deacon, or any one at all of those who are in the Clergy, to have an introduced woman [1], except certainly a mother, or sister, or aunt, or those persons alone who escape all suspicion." - It is also established from chapters 1 and 9, De Cohab. Likewise from the First Lateran Council, ch. 3. Hence in most places Bishops also prescribed in Synods that it should be lawful for clerics to cohabit only with those women who are joined by a strict bond of consanguinity or affinity, namely in the first and second degree. Nor did they permit maidservants to be admitted by them unless they were of known probity. Indeed in most synodal statutes it is found prohibited that clerics have with them maidservants who have not completed the age of forty years. But the reason of the precept is both that the danger which clerics could incur because of human frailty may be removed, and that calumnies may be forestalled, which otherwise could easily be fastened upon the innocent. To this pertain those words of Ecclus. 42:12: "Do not dwell in the midst of women; for from garments proceeds the moth, and from a woman the iniquity of a man."

[1] Subintroducta (Greek syneisaktos) was called not just any woman or maidservant, but a devout woman professing celibacy, who would be loved by a cleric as a sister with special love, and would live together with him. Wherefore this Canon seems less to pertain to the matter.

100. ○ But the mind of the Church is that clerics not only abstain from cohabitation with women, but also that they take care not to visit or speak with them frequently. Thus all the Fathers admonish. Among others St. Ambrose must be heard, thus instructing his clergy, bk. 4, Offic., 20: "Let the younger not go to the houses of widows and virgins, except for the sake of visiting; and this with older men, that is, either with the Bishop, or, if the cause is graver, with Presbyters. What necessity is there that we give secular persons a place for disparagement? What need is there that those frequent visitations also receive authority? What if some one of them perhaps slips? Why should you undergo envy from another's fall? How many even strong men has enticement deceived? How many have not given place to error, and have given place to suspicion? Why do you not spend on reading those times in which you are free from the Church? Why do you not revisit Christ, speak with Christ?"

§ II. On Games of Dice

101. ○ A game of dice is said to be one which is situated wholly in pure lot, and whose outcome depends on mere chance, without the player's industry obtaining any part in it: such, for example, is the game of dice.

Games of dice are severely prohibited to clerics, at least those constituted in major Orders and beneficed persons. This is established 1° from the Fourth Lateran Council, canon 16, where it is said: "Let clerics not play at dice and games, nor be present at games of this sort"; 2° from the Council of Trent, sess. 22, ch. 1, De Reformat.

With laws of this sort considered, he who, initiated in sacred Orders, indulged in games of this sort for the sake of gain and much, was commonly held guilty of grave sin. - St. Ligorius, bk. 3, n. 896. - But from present custom the prohibition of the ancient Canons seems greatly tempered.

At present, according to many, a cleric is judged immune from every sin who plays sparingly, moderately, privately, and without scandal at dice and cards, however much the outcome depends on fortune, if he plays where the aforesaid Canons are not rigidly observed. - St. Ligorius, n. 899. - A fortiori he would be free from every fault who for the sake of recreation and without scandal would recreate himself with those games; for example, if there is no gain or the least gain, or if the gain is assigned to the poor, because custom in this way has interpreted the sacred Canons.

102. ○ QUESTION. Is any card game whatsoever judged aleatory?

Resp. No. For a twofold card game must be distinguished. One is of pure lot and altogether aleatory; but another is mixed, or partly aleatory and partly depending on the skill or industry of the player. This latter kind of game is not to be held as illicit of itself, if it is played moderately, without scandal, and for a small quantity of money, unless nevertheless it is prohibited somewhere by special law; for thus the interpretation of the law and universal custom bear. Yet clerics should take care lest in playing they be carried away to excesses, levity, and dissipation of mind, and also to the affection of cupidity or passion. It is especially expedient that they generally abstain from playing with seculars, unless these are men of uncommon prudence and gravity; because otherwise their holy ministry will easily suffer detriment, and sometimes grave detriment. Above all they must beware of waste of time, and as much as possible of the scandal of the faithful.

§ III. On Bearing Arms and Hunting

103. ○ The bearing of arms, necessity excluded, is prohibited to clerics. This is established, besides other things, from the Decretals, bk. 3, tit. 1, De vita et honest. Cleric., ch. 2, where it is said: "Let clerics bearing arms be excommunicated." The reason is that bearing arms is unbecoming to the character of clerics, who, after the example of Christ, ought to be meek and humble of heart. From another side, the arms of clerics ought to be merely spiritual, since it belongs to them to fight against the powers of darkness. Hence the theologians with Benedict XIV, note 101, say that clerics in sacred Orders who embrace military service sin gravely. Nevertheless they are not to be reprehended who cooperate in a just war by counsel, exhortation, or even aid, provided they do not bear arms nor discharge the office of leader. These things are established from various places of Canon Law. I said outside necessity, because necessity has no law.

104. ○ Hunting is prohibited to clerics; but understand hunting to be noisy hunting, or that which is done with dogs and the noise of arms, or with hawks; but not quiet hunting, for example, with snares or other instruments. This is established from various places of Canon Law, but especially from the Fourth Lateran Council, canon 15, where it is said: "We interdict hunting and fowling to all clerics; whence let them not presume to have dogs or birds." Likewise from the Council of Trent, sess. 24, ch. 13. - See St. Ligorius, bk. 5, n. 606.

But it is disputed whether noisy hunting is a grave sin if it happens rarely. St. Ligorius denies, scandal being excluded. Likewise hunting with a gun and one dog does not seem strictly prohibited of itself; but generally it involves indecency, nor is it free from some scandal, unless perhaps it happens rarely, for example, without running, in a garden, etc.

§ IV. On Trading

105. ○ Trading is prohibited to all clerics, especially to those who have been initiated in sacred Orders. This is established from innumerable texts of Canon Law, chiefly from Trent, sess. 22, ch. 1, De Reformat.

Nor is it licit for clerics to devote themselves to trading even because of the necessity of supporting a family, without the permission either of the Apostolic See within Italy, or of the Ordinary outside Italy. From the Decree of Clement XIII, constitution Cum priorum, 17 September 1759. - See St. Alphonsus, On Contracts, nn. 832, 833. But the following are not contained in that prohibition: 1° Clerics who sell the fruits which they gather from their own fields. 2° Those who exercise an art consonant with their own condition and state, and sell the works. 3° Those who buy things at a small price when there is abundance, so that, when scarcity of provisions comes on, they may sell them at the same price to friends, relatives, and the poor. 4° Those who buy animals so that, fattened on their own farms, they may sell them; but otherwise, if they are fattened in another's stalls. 5º Probably from the common opinion, also those who buy the fruits of the fields of others for fattening animals, and selling them when fattened. 6º Those who buy for their own use, but afterward sell if the price rises, so that a similar thing may be bought more cheaply. 7º Those who buy many things so that they may provide for themselves more safely, and then sell what remains, even at a higher price.

Chapter II. On the Particular Obligations of Clerics

We shall speak of the obligations 1º of Bishops; 2º of Pastors; 3º of Canons.

Article I. On the Obligations of Bishops

106. ○ A Bishop is called an Ordinary, because he uses ordinary jurisdiction in his diocese. He is also called Diocesan by reason of the territory subject to him, and Suffragan by reason of the Metropolitan to whom he is subject. His Church is called Cathedral because in it is the episcopal See, or Chair.

The obligations of Bishops, besides those by which on the day of consecration they bind themselves by oath, are reduced to residence, prayer, preaching, and visitation of the diocese.

107. ○ I. As to residence. Bishops, although they are Cardinals, are bound to dwell in their episcopal see, as is gathered from the Council of Trent, sess. 6, ch. 1, De Reform., and sess. 23, the same chapter.

But there are several causes excusing a Bishop from perpetual and continuous residence.

1º Christian charity, for example, if some Church is placed in great danger of heresy and he can bring help to it, or if his mediation is necessary for composing peace, etc.

2º Urgent necessity, for example, if the Bishop's life is endangered because of sickness, inclemency of the air, personal persecution, etc.; but not because of a general danger, for example, in time of contagion, etc.

3º Due obedience, namely when the Pontiff calls some Bishop so that he may entrust to him the care of some business: thus Cardinals assisting the Roman Pontiff have a sufficient cause why they are rather often absent from their Churches.

4º The evident good of the Church, for defending its rights, for example, in a provincial or general Council. - St. Ligorius, n. 125.

It is permitted to Bishops that for an honorable cause and without detriment to the flock they can be absent each year for two or three months, either continuously or at intervals. From the Council of Trent, sess. 23, ch. 1, De Reform. But they cannot be absent longer without an Apostolic Indult, if you except pilgrimage to the thresholds of the Apostles and attendance at a provincial Council.

108. ○ II. As to preaching. Bishops are bound by a most strict obligation of preaching the word of God, by themselves or at least through others, if they themselves have been legitimately impeded: this is established from Sacred Scripture. Thus the Apostle, 2 Tim. 4:2: "Preach the word; be urgent in season, out of season; reprove, entreat, rebuke in all patience and doctrine," etc. It is also established from the Council of Trent, sess. 5, ch. 2, De Reform.

III. As to prayer. Bishops, after the likeness of the Apostles, ought often to devote effort to prayer, and to exercise themselves in the contemplation of divine things, and continually to implore divine light for themselves, the Clergy, and the whole people.

Frequently, and at least on Sundays and feast days, they ought to offer the Sacrifice for the whole diocese, and often to incite the people to prayer, by teaching the manner of praying, by appointing private and public prayers in chief necessities, and by decreeing supplications, etc. - St. Ligorius, Hom. apost., tr. 7, nn. 65-66.

109. ○ IV. As to episcopal visitation. The Bishop, as pastor of the whole diocese, ought to bear great care for the souls committed to his solicitude and labors. Wherefore he is bound diligently to visit the various Churches of his jurisdiction, so that he may know his sheep, as is fitting, detect their necessities, and search out the means of meeting them. To all these things he is obliged by divine and natural law, nor can this law be abrogated or diminished by any custom, as is open from the Council of Trent, sess. 24, ch. 3, De Reform. - St. Ligorius, Hom. apost., tr. 7, nn. 59-60.

Bishops who administer distant and immense dioceses, as in France, cannot survey them whole every year or every other year: therefore they are excused because of impossibility, provided they do what they can and visit a great part of the diocese, at least through Vicars General, if they are personally impeded.

In all things which pertain to visitation and correction of morals, Bishops have the right of ordering, moderating, punishing, and executing those things, according to the sanctions of the Canons, which according to their prudence seem necessary for the amendment of subjects and the utility of the diocese. - Thus from the Council of Trent, sess. 24, ch. 10, De Reform.

Article II. On the Obligations of Pastors

110. ○ A Pastor, once canonically constituted, enjoys ordinary jurisdiction over the people entrusted to him, and without a new approval of the Bishop has the right to undertake all parochial duties. Therefore no Cleric, with the Bishop and his Vicar General and their delegates excepted, can licitly in any way perform any sacred functions in his Church or parish, without his express or reasonably presumed consent [2].

[1] On the title above. On this subject, most worthy to be read, indeed to be thumbed day and night, is the little work entitled: Manuale pratico pel Parroco novello, by Giuseppe Frassinetti, Prior of St. Sabina in Genoa: operetta utile anche agli altri Ecclesiastici, specialmente Confessori e Predicatori. For whatever can in any matter pertain to any of the duties of a Pastor -- namely in the administration of the Sacraments, in sacred functions, in administering the goods that belong both to the parochial benefice and to the fabric of the church, in the beauty of the church and the decency to be kept in the parish house as well, in the care of the poor, of the sick, and of schools, in founding or fostering pious Confraternities, in furnishing the people with the food of the divine word both by preaching and by the useful reading of books, in correcting subjects where there is need, in removing scandals whether against faith or against good morals, etc. -- all of it is touched on in this excellent little work. Nor does the Author carry this out by long and, as it were, sermon-like exhortations, much less by the sharper remonstrances, as some are wont, by which he would seem to carp at the vices of ecclesiastics; but briefly and soberly, by certain admonitions full indeed of wisdom and prudence, such as the sweetest and gentlest charity, solid doctrine, long experience, and a most temperate cast of judgment (others would say discretion) are able to furnish. And hence arises this advantage, surely of the greatest moment: that against the errors into which some, either not yet sufficiently taught by experience or less furnished with prudence, are sometimes wont to stumble, they are fortified beforehand, not by trials made with their own or others' damage, at times grave, but by a most safe way shown in advance.

[2]  You cannot, therefore, hear confessions in his Church without the consent of such a pastor. If, however, you are permitted to celebrate Mass there, you can then also distribute the Most Holy Eucharist. As regards hearing confessions, however, distinguish the parish from the parochial Church. For you can go to hear the confessions of the sick even without the pastor's knowledge.

Pastors, like Bishops, are chiefly bound: 1º to residence; 2º to prayer; 3º to preaching; 4º to administration of the Sacraments; 5º to correction of the sheep; 6º to visitation of the sick and of the parish.

111. ○ I. As to residence. The Pastor is bound to residence; because when he undertook the administration of the parish, he obliged himself to consulting for the salvation of souls, and to procuring it according to his strength. - Council of Trent, sess. 23, ch. 1, De Reform. - St. Ligorius, n. 121. The Pastor must dwell in the presbyteral residence, or, if this is lacking, in the nearer house within the boundaries of the parish, so that he can easily be approached, and he himself not be impeded in fulfilling the duty of residence. But in order that satisfaction be made to the duty of residence, he must not only be present in body, but also by himself he must serve the parish. - St. Ligorius, nn. 124-127.

Yet, if they obtain permission from the Ordinary, they can for a just cause be absent each year for two months, provided they substitute for themselves a suitable Vicar through the Bishop. The permission of the Ordinary is necessary even if they wish to be absent for a week. But for one or another day they can be absent without special license from a cause which seems legitimate to them, provided they commend the parish to a suitable Vicar.

II. As to prayer. The Pastor, like the Bishop, is bound to offer the Sacrifice for the parish on feast days and Sundays, as will be clear from the things to be said in the Treatise on the Eucharist. Likewise he is bound to pray frequently for his sheep, so that he may implore for himself and his subjects the graces necessary for salvation and heavenly blessings.

Moreover the Pastor ought to take care that all learn to pray, that they pray well, and that they teach their own to pray. To this it will contribute greatly if sometimes, especially on feast days and Sundays, and also during Advent and Lent, the faithful publicly perform morning and evening prayers. - St. Ligorius, Hom. apost., tr. 7, n. 35 and following.

112. ○ III. As to preaching. Pastors are bound rather often to speak words to the people, to nourish them with saving food, at least on individual Sundays and on individual greater feasts. - Thus Trent, sess. 5, ch. 2, De Reform.

Therefore Pastors sin gravely who for a notable time abstain from preaching. But a notable time is held by many to be if preaching is abandoned for an entire continuous month, or for three months not continuous, or divided in the year. - Thus St. Ligorius, Bk. 3, n. 269 [3]. - Nor do those sufficiently fulfill the obligation who do not strive to accommodate preaching to the capacity of the hearers.

[3] Thus indeed are the opinions reported there by St. Alphonsus. Nevertheless the words of Trent, from which they infer the gravity of guilt in an omission of three months, seem to regard three continuous months rather than interrupted ones.

By the name of preaching here there do not come sermons perfected and elaborated with much and subtle art, filled with elegances, and committed to memory [4]; for although these sermons are useful and sometimes necessary, nevertheless for the most part a Pastor giving sermons of this sort would in no way satisfy his duty, because according to Trent he ought to teach those things which are more necessary, and in a more useful way and one more accommodated to the greatest part of the hearers. Nor less are those to be reprehended who, with no preparation employed, babble whatever comes into the mouth, without order, clarity, piety, and zeal. These disfigure the word of God and create nausea and distaste in the hearers. - Thus all.

[4] The Author had before his eyes the words of the Synod of Trent (sess. 5, De Reform., ch. 2): "Let them feed the flocks committed to themselves, according to their own and their flock's capacity, with saving words, by teaching the things which are necessary for all to know for salvation, and by announcing to them, with brevity and ease of speech, the vices which they must decline, and the virtues which they ought to follow," etc.

But the Pastor who reads pious books to the hearers does not fulfill his duty of preaching, because reading is not preaching; unless someone is of so weak a memory that he cannot do otherwise. But then from time to time he ought to take care that sermons be given to the people through another, or to notify the Bishop about the impediment.

113. ○ IV. As to administration of the Sacraments. Pastors are bound by themselves to minister the Sacraments, not only when the time of precept and of grave necessity urges, but also, as regards the Sacraments which can be repeated, as often as the sheep duly, or not unseasonably, ask, unless they are legitimately impeded, or can provide for them through another without inconvenience and offense of those asking. See several other things concerning this obligation in the Treatise on the Sacraments in general.

V. As to correction. The Pastor is bound to correct subjects living in mortal sin or in proximate danger of mortal sin, even if grave danger had to be undergone; if nevertheless some hope of amendment seems to shine forth. He must also, insofar as he can, with due prudence, remove scandals from the midst, or forestall them by himself or through others, directly or indirectly, by command, counsel, exhortation, prayers, etc. - Thus commonly, and indeed more probably from justice, not from charity only. - St. Ligorius, Hom. Apost., tr. 7, n. 30 and following [5].

[5] St. Alphonsus does not hesitate in this place to affirm that pastors, and much more Bishops, are bound to the office of correction even with danger to life. But here the Doctors do not use correction in the strict sense for an admonition about the amendment of offenses, but more broadly for care of warding off or impeding any spiritual ruin of the sheep committed to them. For in reality it sometimes happens that, whatever danger finally must be undergone, the pastor nevertheless must teach and warn his people. Thus, for example, where those rebellious laws against divine law are in force, which with regard to the validity or invalidity of Christian matrimony take no account of canonical laws, the pastor, with any danger whatsoever disregarded, is certainly bound to proclaim that Catholic dogma which is declared in the letters of our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX to the King of Sardinia, given 19 Sept. 1852: that any union whatsoever among Christians, even if sanctioned by civil laws, if it is not a sacrament, is nothing except foul concubinage.

Then Pastors ought solicitously to provide for the spiritual good of their subjects, according to that word of the Apostle, Rom. 12:8: "He who presides, in solicitude." Therefore they ought to investigate the morals of parishioners, correct delinquents, sustain the wavering, and strive that all fulfill their obligations, always holding in memory that they will one day have to render an account for their souls.

114. ○ VI. As to visitation of the sick and of the parish. It is an abuse very harmful to the salvation of souls not to visit the sick before the Pastor is summoned by them. But when the Pastor has visited the sick and refreshed them with the Sacraments, let him not think that he has fulfilled his duty; but let him visit them rather often and console them. Let the admonitions of the Roman Ritual concerning the care and visitation of the sick be read and recalled with pious meditation.

As to visitation of parishioners, the Council of Soissons of the year 1849, title 15, ch. 1, has these things:

"Because, as Christ himself says, the good Shepherd knows his sheep and calls them by name, therefore the Pastor ought to know the faithful committed to him. Therefore let him not neglect this so salutary custom of visiting individual families of his parish at certain times; and let him fulfill this duty with gravity and modesty together, and also with singular charity. For although he ought to abstain from every useless roaming through the parish, nevertheless let him not think that he has satisfied his office if, shut up at home, he waits for the parishioners to come to him. Indeed this precept of the Lord has always had force, but especially in these present times has force: Go to the sheep which have perished of the house of Israel."

Article III. On the Obligations of Canons

115. ○ Canons, so called because formerly they were subjected to a common rule, constitute the council of the Bishop, and are bound by various obligations as to divine worship, the altar, choir, and, when the See is vacant, administration of the diocese.

Canons are constituted chiefly where there is an episcopal See, or Cathedral Church. Churches which besides the cathedral have a college of Canons are called Collegiate.

Some Canons are regular, who under a Provost live the common life bound by vows, and these are now found fewer; but others are secular, who live separately from benefices or ecclesiastical pensions, and observe the canonical institute as to various duties to be fulfilled in the Church.

But the chief obligations of Canons are reduced 1° to residence; 2° to the Office of choir; 3° to the conventual Mass; 4° to assistance of the Bishop; 5° to certain duties, when the See is vacant.

I. As to Residence

116. ○ Canons are bound to residence. For thus the Council of Trent establishes, sess. 24, ch. 12, De Reform.: "It is not lawful for Canons by force of any statute or custom whatsoever to be absent beyond three months ... in any year, with the constitutions of Churches which require a longer time of service nevertheless preserved; otherwise in the first year let each be deprived of half the fruits," etc. 2° Not all Canons can be absent at the same time, but not beyond a third part of the Chapter, because vacations are indeed conceded to Canons, but not to the Chapter; for divine worship, to which they are assigned, must not be vacant. Nor do they need the permission either of the Chapter or of the Bishop for departing within the diocese; but if they wish to go about outside the diocese, the permission of the Bishop is necessary for them. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Council established. Nor do they need any special reason in order that they may be absent, as the same Congregation of the Council expressly declared on 4 May 1737.

But the time of vacation must not fall on the greater solemnities of Easter, Pentecost, the Nativity of the Lord, etc., nor on their Octaves, nor during the time of Advent or Lent.

117. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Can the Bishop permit a longer absence?

Resp. If there is a legitimate cause, the Bishop can permit an absence of four months, indeed also a longer one because of an extraordinary cause, namely because of the offices of Christian charity, infirm health, raging persecution, or undoubted utility of the Church or Republic.

QUESTION 2º. Are absent Canons bound to substitute someone for themselves?

Resp. No. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Council of Trent declared. The reason is that the other Canons present are supposed to suffice for attendance at choir and for performing divine worship. Hence they are of a better condition than Pastors, who can never be absent unless they substitute for themselves another suitable Priest.

II. As to the Office of Choir

118. ○ All Canons are bound to sing or chant the Divine Office in choir. This is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 24, ch. 12, De Reform. Nor are they for that reason excused because perhaps they are few; for the Congregation of the Council defined on 13 March 1696 that Canons, even if few, suppose two or three, are bound to sing or recite the Office in choir. Hence it does not suffice that Canons only be present in choir or at the Offices; but insofar as they can, they are bound to concur in the singing or recitation, with elevated voice and pious affection of heart. Nor do they satisfy, even when present, with private recitation, as is clear from the Constitution of Benedict XIV, Cum semper, 19 Aug. 1744. Therefore they sin gravely who without probable cause are notably absent from choir beyond the time permitted by the Council of Trent, and venially if for a brief time, for example, three or four days. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, Bk. 3, n. 675. Nor can they be absent longer, an Apostolic Indult being excluded, which for example is customarily conceded for preaching.

119. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Can the Bishop permit that not all the Hours be sung?

Resp. No. For the Sacred Congregation, very recently asked by the Chapter of the Church of Moulins whether the statute of Lord Antoine de Pons, first Bishop of this See (year 1822), by which such permission was conceded to Canons, can be sustained, responded: "The aforesaid ordinance is not to be attended to." Nevertheless the same Congregation conceded permission to the Bishop that things be retained in the old state until certain circumstances are changed (apud D. de Conny, Des usages et des abus en matière de cérémonies, at the end of the work).

QUESTION 2º. Must the Office of the Dead, of the Blessed Virgin Mary, and the Gradual Psalms be recited in choir from obligation?

Resp. No. Because they are not of precept, but of directive rubric, or of counsel. - Thus commonly the Canonists. - Recall what was said above about the Canonical Hours, n. 60.

III. As to the Conventual Mass

120. ○ 1º Canons, according to the common opinion of theologians and canonists, are bound under grave obligation to sing the conventual Mass daily. - St. Ligorius, Bk. 6, n. 314. This is established from the Bull of Benedict XIV, Cum semper, etc., and also from the response of Leo XII, who, having been asked by the Chapter of Le Mans, ordered that response be made in that sense. - Bouvier, on the fourth precept of the Decalogue.

2º But the conventual Mass 1º must be sung daily; 2º it must be applied to the founders and benefactors of the Church in general. Yet this obligation could be reduced by the Sacred Congregation of the Council to feast days, if the canons are so poor that they need the stipends of Masses for living. - Thus expressly as to all these things Benedict XIV in the cited Bull.

IV. As to Assistance of the Bishop, etc

121. ○ 1º The Council of Trent, sess. 24, ch. 12, De Reform., thus established concerning Canons of cathedrals: "Let all be compelled to assist and serve the Bishop celebrating or exercising other Pontificals." The Ceremonial of Bishops, bk. 1, ch. 15, agrees, and declares that all Canons are bound to assemble in canonical habit at the designated place, and to conduct the Bishop proceeding to the Church for the sake of exercising Pontificals, and likewise to accompany him returning. But this must be understood when the Bishop comes to the Church on more solemn feasts or ceremonies, about to celebrate or to be present at the Sacrifice, clothed in the cope, or about to perform Pontificals. But they are not bound to assist the Bishop privately celebrating.

2º Canons moreover compose the council of the Bishop. For the Bishop, unless a contrary and true custom is present, in a particular case ought to ask the counsel of the Canons before he issues mandates; but he does not need their consent in order to establish and urge them, except in cases determined by law [1]. For thus Benedict XIV, On the Synod, bk. 13, ch. 1, nn. 8-9: "Much in this matter must be deferred to the custom of places.... It certainly is not necessary that a Bishop about to promulgate new laws ask for the opinion of the whole Clergy; but it suffices if he requests the counsel of his Chapter, although he is not bound to follow it.... Indeed the Bishop who by legitimately prescribed custom has acquired for himself the right of making and publishing laws without consulting the Chapter will be freed from the very obligation of seeking the counsel of the Chapter."

[1]  Namely, Canons in that Council do not have the right of a deliberative vote, but merely of a consultative one.

V. As to the Duties of Canons, When the See Is Vacant

122. ○ 1º The Chapter, when the See is vacant, succeeds the Bishop in ordinary jurisdiction, but not in that delegated by the Supreme Pontiff. Thus from Canon Law, with all Canonists agreeing.

2º The Chapter is bound within eight days to constitute a Vicar General, or to confirm an existing one; but if it has not done this, the right of constituting him devolves to the Metropolitan, and in his defect to the older Suffragan [2]. Thus the Council of Trent establishes, sess. 24, ch. 16, De Reform.

[2] Say the same if the election indeed has a place within the legitimate space of eight days, but has not been made duly and regularly.

3º The whole episcopal jurisdiction passes into the capitular Vicars General regularly elected, nor can the Chapter retain even the least part of it with itself. But Vicars elected by the Chapter can no longer be removed, except from a cause which has been recognized as sufficient by the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. Nor can the Chapter place any conditions even on the election of the Vicar. Hence the power of capitular Vicars is indefinite, and endures until the Bishop elected and instituted by the Pope has shown the letters of his institution to the Chapter of his Church, and thus has obtained possession.

Moreover capitular Vicars can do whatever the present government of the diocese requires; but not all the faculties of the Bishop are attributed to them. Thus by Canon Law they are specially prohibited from innovating anything, diminishing episcopal rights, granting indulgences, conceding dimissorial letters before a year has elapsed, conferring irremovable titles, etc.

Appendix I. On the Privileges of Clerics

I. On the Privileges of Clerics in Common

123. ○ Clerics enjoy certain privileges from Canon Law and from Roman Civil Law, indeed according to several from divine law, namely the privilege of immunity, lest they be punished by a lay court, and of exemption from the lay forum as to their own goods, both ecclesiastical and patrimonial.

But these privileges and most other ones, in many places, as also in France, are no longer acknowledged by the civil power [1]. Nevertheless there remains everywhere the privilege which is called of the Canon, by reason of which they incur excommunication who unjustly lay hands upon Clerics, as is established from the Second Lateran Council, in which it is said: "If anyone, at the instigation of the devil, lays violent hands on a Cleric or Monk, let him lie under the bond of anathema."

[1]  This namely is the beginning, or rather the consequence, of apostasy from the Christian Religion. For the power which holds any Religion whatsoever in the same place has surely consummated apostasy from the Christian Religion. There you find Christian men; but you do not have a Christian kingdom or empire.

This privilege is enjoyed by 1º all Religious, even novices; 2º all Clerics, even those endowed only with simple tonsure; 3º indeed all Nuns and all religious persons living under a rule in Community, and also tertiaries of each sex wearing the habit of religious Orders and living in Community. - St. Ligorius, Bk. 1, Appendix II. - Hom. Apost., tr. 22, ch. 2.

II. On the Privileges of Bishops

124. ○ The privileges of Bishops regard 1° censures and irregularities; 2° impediments of matrimony; 3° vows and oaths; 4° other special cases, as may be seen apud St. Ligorius, Bk. 1, at the end of the Appendix on privileges, and in Hom. apost., tr. 20, ch. 3.

I. Concerning censures and irregularities.

1° They can absolve subjects from any hidden papal cases whatsoever, at least those reserved before Trent [2], with the cases of the Bull Coenae excepted.

[2] Whether Bishops can absolve from cases reserved after Trent, if they are hidden, was not the one opinion of the Doctors. For the affirmative opinion stood Bonacina, Mazzuchellus, Peregrinus, Bossius, Gavantus, and Suarez alleged by Diana (tom. 3, tr. 3, res. 27, n. 2); to whom St. Alphonsus (Bk. 6, n. 594) adds Sanchez, Sorbus, Delbene, Renzi, Beia, Mazzotta, and Diana himself, who brings forward these reasons (l.c.): "This opinion is proved, because although the Council uses a word of past time, nevertheless it is extended also to future things because of the nature of law, whose property is to comprehend future things, as is had in the final chapter, De Constit., and the Doctors there. And it is confirmed from law Ariani, C. De haereticis, where it is had that the law is always in fresh observance and always speaks. But a general Council has the force of law, both because the Council grants to Bishops the said faculty generally, not distinguishing between past and future reservations; therefore it must be understood generally (law Pretio, ff. de publ. in rem action., and ch. Solitae, § final, de maior. et obed.); and because the faculty of absolving which is given in jubilees extends to future sins; and because the Council in the said decree places a general rule concerning pontifical Reservations, namely that they are to be understood of public crimes, but not of hidden ones, with the limitation placed in the same decree; and finally because in reserved cases and in cases to be reserved there is the same reason of absolution, if they are hidden, and therefore in each one there ought to be the same disposition of law. For why

To these reasons there is added an argument taken from the Constitution of Sixtus V, Effraenatam, 29 Oct. 1588, against those procuring abortion. For while he reserved to himself both absolution from the sin and censure, and dispensation from irregularity as to clerics who perchance were accomplices in this crime, he judged that the privilege granted to Bishops by the Synod of Trent, that they can absolve from hidden papal cases, had to be expressly derogated. But there would have been no need to derogate this privilege if the privilege did not extend itself to cases reserved after the Synod of Trent. Therefore.

And St. Alphonsus indeed (l.c.) grants that these things are affirmed very probably; nevertheless he judges that the response is not solid enough which the aforesaid Doctors return to those objecting the Declaration of Gregory XIII, when they answer that it is not authentically established concerning it. But on the contrary St. Alphonsus opposes the authority of Fagnani, who (In C. Dilectus De Tempor. Ordin., nn. 30-33), while generally establishing the thesis that Bishops cannot absolve from hidden cases reserved by a new Constitution after the Council of Trent, adds that the Sacred Congregation so judged. Indeed this thesis of Fagnani and the alleged Declaration would otherwise overthrow also the opinion of St. Alphonsus, which we shall set forth below.

For the rest it seems plainly to be said that the reasons brought forward by Fagnani for that thesis are very lame. And surely, first, he argues from the fact that today a Bishop cannot absolve from heresy and from the other cases reserved in the Bull Coenae, although they are hidden. But from these things one argues wrongly to other cases. For the faculty of absolving from cases, even hidden ones, reserved in the Bull Coenae, according to the opinion of the Doctors, was taken away from Bishops by force of the derogatory clause concerning the decrees of any Council whatsoever, which, according to Benedict XIV (De Syn. Dioec., bk. IX, ch. 4, n. 8), after Card. De Lugo (De Fid., disp. 23, n. 48), began to be appended to the same Bull under Gregory XIII. But this clause is by no means found in other Constitutions which reserve some case to the Supreme Pontiff.

Fagnani next argues from the response given to the Archbishop of Florence under Gregory XIII. For when the Archbishop of Florence had doubted (I recount the matter in the words of the same Fagnani) whether by force of ch. 6, sess. 24, he could absolve a nun who secretly and for an evil end had broken enclosure, notwithstanding the Bull of Pius V, which seems to have place in a public case, there was a divergence in opinions. For out of ten Cardinals, three judged that the Bull was to be understood also in hidden cases, because its words are general, and only the case in the article of death is excepted, etc.; and because it had already been declared that the Bull Coenae Domini, which prohibits absolution by others, has place even in hidden cases; and because, since the Bull was drawn up after the Council, it is judged to have derogated the Council. Four judged that that Bull did not have place in hidden cases. But the remaining three said that the matter should be brought before the Most Holy One; who declared that the Bull of Pius V has place even in hidden cases.... Hence afterwards the Sacred Congregation, having been generally consulted, whether, if a nun of some monastery subject to the jurisdiction of Regulars secretly committed an offense in the matter of enclosure, she could in the forum of conscience be absolved by force of the same Decree by the Bishop, to whom, as Delegate, authority in those things which pertain to enclosure was attributed by the Decree ch. 5, sess. 25, De Regularibus, with the aforesaid Bull of Pius V standing, responded: SHE CANNOT. Thus Fagnani. But this argument too labors under the same defect as the preceding one. For 1º the Declaration of Gregory XIII affects only the Constitution of St. Pius V concerning the enclosure of nuns. 2º The response of the Sacred Congregation, which is added, regards only the case of violated enclosure. 3º Indeed another reason for this negative response was available; for the power given to the Bishop as Delegate of the Apostolic See concerning the enclosure of exempt nuns attributes to him no jurisdiction over the exempt nuns themselves (see St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, n. 602, q. VII). Indeed this can seem the stronger reason why the faculty was denied. For otherwise, since nuns are reckoned among persons impeded from going to the City, and according to the common opinion one thus impeded is not held to seek absolution by letters (see St. Alphonsus, bk. 7, n. 89), by common law the faculty of absolving would be made to the Bishop, unless the exempt nun, removed from the jurisdiction of the Bishop, had another Ordinary. Therefore the reasons of Fagnani conclude nothing concerning the general question.

St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, n. 504, at the end), after mentioning from Fagnani the history of the aforesaid Declaration, judged that that Declaration was indeed not to be extended to all Constitutions, but only to those which are fortified with the same clauses; in which matter, as is plain, he departs from Fagnani. Thus he says: It must be noted with the same Fagnani (In C. Quoniam De Constit., nn. 29-30), that for the cases contained in two Bulls, namely in the Bull Coenae and in this aforesaid one of St. Pius V, derogation was made from the faculty granted by Trent to Bishops in the said ch. Liceat, because of the derogatory clauses, namely in the first: "Notwithstanding the decrees of any Council"; and in this second: "Unless in the article of death." Hence we say that any Bull whatsoever, where the aforesaid clauses are present, takes away from Bishops the faculty of absolving hidden cases reserved to the Pope; but not other Bulls, in which no derogatory clause is present, as Diana, p. 7, tr. 2, res. 22.

But this theory ought to be ascribed neither to Diana nor to Fagnani. Not to Diana, since he (l.c.) indeed excepts if in the new Constitution there is a clause sufficiently derogating this decree of the Council; but nowhere does he say that a clause of this sort is contained in the words, "Unless in the article of death." Not to Fagnani, who (in the cited ch. Dilectus) extends his doctrine to any reservations whatever later than Trent; but elsewhere (in the cited ch. Quoniam) merely says that the Sacred Congregation declared: from the Bull Coenae the faculty attributed to Bishops by the decree of the Council (ch. 6, sess. 24) was taken away, and similarly from the Bull of Pius V the faculty belonging to Bishops (from the same ch. Liceat) of absolving nuns secretly offending in the matter of enclosure was removed. But concerning the clauses of the same Bull of St. Pius V he has nothing at all. Therefore what St. Alphonsus adds from his own opinion, that this is to be understood of any Constitution having the clause, "Unless in the article of death," this indeed, as we saw above, was said by three Cardinals in the Congregation, with reasons brought forward which do not seem to be of great weight; but that there is any value in this opinion of theirs no one has defined, nor is it in any way established that Gregory XIII had this before his eyes in his Declaration. Wherefore that extension to other Constitutions, viewed according to the principle on which it rests, does not seem sufficiently firm.

Finally, of lighter weight are the things which Cajetan Giraldi has concerning the Decree or Declaration mentioned by Fagnani, both in the Exposit. Iuris Pontif. (part 2, sect. 152), and in the Notes to Thesaurus' work De Poenis Ecclesiasticis (part 1, ch. 22). For thus he writes concerning this matter: Since it is not indicated by Fagnani in what year this decree, first cited by him, was issued, lest its issuance be called into doubt, after the Registers of the Sacred Congregation of the Council had been diligently turned over by me, I found that it had been issued in the month of January 1589 in the Response to Postulate XII, which among other things Gaspar Visconti, Archbishop of Milan, made to the same Congregation on the occasion of the visitation to the sacred thresholds. For when the said postulate XII expressed in the Italian idiom what, translated into Latin, sounds thus: "Because it often happens that censures reserved to the Apostolic See are incurred by contravening Papal Constitutions issued after the Council of Trent, the Archbishop desires the faculty of absolving the contraveners, who sometimes remain bound by censures for a longer time, since they do not have the means of obtaining absolution from the Roman Curia, especially concerning the enclosure of nuns and of male Regulars," as is found in bk. 5 of the Decrees, p. 239, the Sacred Congregation abstained from the concession of the Postulate, but only tacitly confirmed what the Archbishop himself thought concerning this faculty by these precise words, in the month of January 1589, as they are found in the cited bk. 5, p. 240: "Reservations of cases newly made after the Council are not comprehended in ch. 6, sess. 24, De Reform., and especially concerning the enclosure of nuns." Gallemart reports that this declaration, at this same chapter, was confirmed by Gregory XIII. From these things it is plain what the sense of the Bishops was, soon, as it were, after the publication of Trent, concerning the faculty attributed to them in the cited ch. 6.

I said that these things are of lighter weight; for who, I ask, would admit this response, such as it is, as the first decree of the Sacred Congregation on this matter, which Gregory XIII then confirmed, if indeed the mere denial of a requested faculty is worthy of the name of a response, when that Postulate of the Archbishop of Milan is said to have been offered in the month of January in the year 1589, while Gregory had already departed from life four years before? And then, what does this TACIT RESPONSE, which Giraldi fashions for himself, have in common with the Decree by which the Sacred Congregation, according to Fagnani, EXPRESSLY responded that thing, namely, SHE CANNOT? Indeed, what does the question concerning hidden cases, about which Fagnani speaks, have in common with the Postulate of the Archbishop of Milan, in which a faculty of absolving is sought without any distinction between hidden and non-hidden cases? Therefore the whole force of the argument will finally reside in this, that in the supplicatory petition that opinion of the petitioner is found expressed. But ought the private opinion of the Bishop petitioning to be confused with the Decree of the Sacred Congregation, which responds nothing about that very opinion? Surely if this new canon is established, and if the opinions which the petitioner expressed in a supplicatory petition must be held as so many Decrees of the Sacred Congregation, we shall now say that this too has been defined by the Sacred Congregation: that a Bishop cannot absolve from papal cases those who are detained by a legitimate impediment from approaching the Pontiff for absolution from papal cases! For in the same petition the faculty is sought of absolving those who otherwise remain (these are the words of the Postulate) bound by censures for a longer time, since they do not have the means of obtaining absolution from the Roman Curia; and nevertheless the Sacred Congregation did not judge that assent should be given to that petition, but denied the faculty of absolving them. Therefore let us conclude that Giraldi's great labor in searching the Registers of the Sacred Congregation not only contributed nothing to proving the authenticity of the Declaration about which the question is, but on the contrary, since he did not find anything better in the same Registers, although most diligently turned over, it rather has deservedly cast the gravest suspicion that Prosper Fagnani, who dictated his work while blind, slipped in memory, and that this Declaration in fact never existed.

But neither do those things completely settle the controversy which are reported from the Cremonensis of 4 Dec. 1632 in another Severina of 28 May 1796, where the Secretary narrates these things: "Adhering (the Sacred Congregation) to declarations made at other times, it rescripted that Bishops by force of ch. 6, sess. 24, De Reform., cannot absolve or dispense in the case of heresy, nor in other cases reserved to the Apostolic See by a new law after the Council. But in these cases, in which such a faculty has not been taken away from Bishops, it is indeed transferred to the Capitular Vicar," etc. And surely here it is not sufficiently apparent whether that new law must be taken for one which, in the accustomed manner, reserves absolution from sin to the Apostolic See, or rather must be taken for one which only places an exception upon the faculty conceded to Bishops by that ch. 6 concerning hidden cases, of which sort are held to be the Constitution of Pius V as to the enclosure of nuns, and that of Gregory XIII concerning the cases of the Bull Coenae. Now unless this is certainly defined, nothing in fact can be concluded from these things. For the rest, if the consequences are inspected, surely you would say that that reservation must be taken in this latter sense. For it follows: "But in these cases in which SUCH A FACULTY HAS NOT BEEN TAKEN AWAY FROM BISHOPS," etc. Therefore the context requires that the preceding words be understood of a new law by which such a power has been taken away. But such a power is no other than that which is conceded to Bishops by ch. 6 concerning hidden cases. Therefore the new law is here to be understood as one by which the Pontiff after Trent has placed an exception or limitation upon the faculty of Bishops concerning hidden cases, not indeed as one by which he has generally reserved some case to the Apostolic See.

And these things indeed have been said concerning the state of the controversy, as it has hitherto been possible to judge from the reasons which are customarily brought forward by each of the dissenting parties. For that the Apostolic See was able to revoke the faculties conceded to Bishops by ch. Liceat, as in fact was done, for example, as to the cases contained in the Bull Coenae, or was able so to circumscribe them that, for example, they would not extend themselves to reservations later than Trent, no one ought or can doubt.

For the rest, after the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis issued by our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX on 12 Oct. 1869, there is now no doubt that a controversy of this sort must be held as defined. "Nevertheless" (says the Supreme Pontiff) "we will that the faculty of absolving conceded by the Synod of Trent to Bishops, sess. 24, ch. 6, De Reform., remain firm in any censures whatsoever reserved to the Apostolic See by this Our Constitution, with only those excepted which we have declared reserved in a special manner to the same Apostolic See."

Therefore the difference between the old Law and the new resides in this: that in the former the cases contained in the Bull Coenae and the censures issued against violators of the enclosure of Nuns were excepted; but in the more recent one, only the cases reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See are excepted. These are fourteen, to which must be added 1º the interdict against universities, Colleges, and Chapters appealing from the ordinations or mandates of the Roman Pontiff existing at the time to a future universal Council; 2º from the Declarations of the Holy Office of the Inquisition, 17 June 1866 and 4 April 1871, the case of a person of whatever sex falsely denouncing a Priest for the crime of solicitation in Confession.

would the authority of Bishops be lesser in new reservations than in old ones?

2º They can dispense from all irregularities and absolve from all suspensions on account of a hidden offense, excepting irregularity from voluntary homicide.

3º In irregularities also doubtful from defect. (Probably.)

4º In non-hidden irregularities from defect of birth for minor Orders and simple benefices. - Council of Trent, sess. 24, ch. Liceat. - See St. Ligorius, bk. 4, Appendix on privileges, n. 49 and following.

125. ○ II. Concerning impediments of matrimony, Bishops can dispense:

1º In impeding impediments, except the vow of perpetual chastity, the vow of entering Religion, espousals, and the impediment of disparity of worship between Catholics and heretics.

2º In supervening impediments, once marriage has been contracted, in order to asking for the debt, for example, if they contracted affinity because either one had carnal intercourse with the other's blood relatives; or if one vowed chastity. Indeed the Bishop can also dispense the spouse from a vow of perpetual chastity which he or she emitted before marriage, so that he or she may exercise matrimonial rights [3].

[3]  Nevertheless the Confessor ought to know that in these circumstances, which sometimes do not permit delay, or do not leave prompt access to the Bishop, another way is present by which provision is made for the necessity of the spouses, namely that one spouse indirectly irritates the vow of the other, that is, suspends its obligation. See vol. 1, n. 330.

3º In doubtful diriment impediments [4]. - St. Ligorius, Appendix, n. 55, where he says that this opinion is very common.

[4]  Yet someone will be able to note that, where the impediment is doubtful, there is no need that a dispensation be sought, as will be said in the treatise on matrimony.

4º Per accidens in certain diriment impediments, both before and after the contracted marriage, when recourse to the Pope is very difficult, or when there is danger in delay [5], or where there is imminent danger of scandal, infamy, incontinence, etc. - St. Ligorius, ibid., n. 56 and following.

[5]  St. Alphonsus, as we shall see in the Treatise on Matrimony, judges it probable that the impediment ceases when, some grave cause urging, access is not open even to the Bishop.

5º In publications of the Banns. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - See the things to be said in the Treatise on Matrimony, n. 739.

III. Concerning vows and oaths, Bishops can dispense:

1º In all simple private vows, excepting the five reserved to the Pope, namely of perpetual chastity, of Religion, and of pilgrimages to Jerusalem, to the thresholds of the Apostles, and to St. James of Compostela (tom. 1, n. 330).

2º In all oaths, if you except oaths accepted by a third party, which were not extorted by fear or fraud. - St. Ligorius, passim.

126. ○ IV. Concerning certain particular cases, Bishops can dispense:

1º In all matters of lighter moment, both from custom and because recourse to the Pope would be too inconvenient.

2º In all things which commonly occur, for example, in fasting, in abstinence, in the divine Office for particular cases [6], or for a brief time, etc.

[6]  Understand, with particular persons; for in common law Bishops do not have the faculty of dispensing with a whole community.

3º In all statutes which have the clause, "until dispensation is given." But whether a Bishop can dispense in canonical statutes not expressly reserved, St. Ligorius judged that the negative opinion is altogether to be held, bk. 1, n. 191 [7].

[7]  St. Alphonsus (Hom. Apost., tr. II, ch. VI, n. 58) writes these things concerning this question: But whether Bishops can dispense in all Canonical laws where the Dispensation is not expressly reserved, many Doctors admit this, as Soto, Covarruvias, Sporer, St. Antoninus, who calls it common, and Elbel, who calls it most common and for it adduces St. Bonaventure and Scotus, and Castropalaus calls it probable with the Gloss on ch. Nuper, De Sent. Excomm., where the Pontiff thus acknowledged: "Yet because the founder of the Canon did not specially retain absolution to himself, by that very fact he seems to have conceded to others the faculty of relaxing." And the Gloss adds: "Here is an argument that Bishops can dispense where Dispensation is not specially prohibited, from law Nec non, ff., Ex quibus causis." But on the contrary Suarez, Bonacina, the Salmanticenses, etc., deny from ch. Dilectus, De Temp. Ord., where a certain Bishop, since he had conferred several orders on one person on the same day, was suspended for this reason: "Since a Dispensation of this sort from the Canon was by no means permitted to him." And they respond to the text first alleged, that that disposition was made only for absolution from censures. But, notwithstanding this, the first opinion is sufficiently probable, because we can use the same response for the second text, that it has force only in the matter of ordination. All the more because in the first text the words seem to speak generally, but in the second specially about ordination, since that word, "of this sort," is used. Thus far St. Alphonsus.

4º For performing the Sacred Rite from midday. By force of the quinquennial faculties they enjoy the privilege of celebrating for one hour before dawn and another after midday, and of communicating this faculty to suitable Priests.

5º They can choose for themselves a Confessor outside the diocese, provided he is their subject, and they can take him with them to different places; but if he is not a subject, he must be approved by the Ordinary of the place. Cardinals can do the same, but only at Rome, although they can take him whom they have chosen with them outside Rome. - St. Ligorius, Appendix, bk. 1, n. 65.

6º They can dispense from interstices for ordination. - St. Ligorius, bk. 6, n. 793.

7º They can absolve from some cases per se papal, but which by common law are reserved to Bishops or Ordinaries. They are the following: 1º The excommunication imposed on Clerics constituted in sacred orders, or Regulars or Nuns, after a solemn vow of chastity, presuming to contract marriage; and also all persons presuming to contract marriage with any of the aforesaid persons. From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX.

2º Likewise the excommunication imposed on those procuring abortion, the effect following. From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, etc.

3º Likewise on those knowingly using false Apostolic Letters, or cooperating in the crime in that matter. From the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, etc.

4º A light striking of a Cleric, or a grave one done by a woman, or by a boy, or by another person impeded from being able to approach the Apostolic See. From ch. Pervenit, 17, and ch. Quod de his, 26, and ch. Quamvis, 58, De Sent. Excommunic.

5º Reincidence into the censure by which anyone is punished who, absolved in the article of death by one not having the faculty, does not present himself to the Superior.

6º Communication in a criminal crime with those excommunicated by the Bishop. From ch. Nuper, 29, and ch. Si Concubinae, 55, De Sent. Excomm. [8].

[8]  In order that it may be understood what this privilege of Bishops means for itself, it must be noted that by general law it has been sanctioned that he who communicates, that is, cooperates, in the same crime with him who for this very crime has already been excommunicated, incurs altogether the same excommunication. The Doctors derive this rule from ch. Si Concubinae, 55, De sent. Excom., which they usually allege here. Therefore if there is question of a crime reserved to the Pope, the communication in that crime will also be reserved to the Pope; if the crime is reserved to the Bishop, communication will likewise be reserved to the Bishop. Therefore it is plain that the privilege about which the Author speaks concerns absolution from an excommunication reserved to the Bishop; for he therefore says, "with those excommunicated by the Bishop." But then, you will say, what privilege will it be, that the Bishop can absolve an excommunicated person not indeed by the Pope, but by a Bishop? That the reason may be understood, one must have recourse to the doctrine concerning those excommunicated by name ab homine, whom by law only the excommunicator can absolve (see Bonacina, De Cens., disp. 2, q. 2, p. 6, § 1, n. 9). But by force of the privilege the faculty is given to Bishops of absolving him for whom it is difficult to approach the excommunicator. To this matter the Doctors adduce ch. Nuper, 29, de Sent. excom., in which this question is clearly solved. For thus Innocent III says: "Since such a person communicates in the crime and participates with the criminal, and by this seems, by reason of the condemned crime, to offend against him who condemned: absolution will then deservedly have to be sought from him or from his superior by merit of the offense, since equal punishment binds the doer and the consenter.... But if from some just cause it is difficult for him to approach the excommunicator himself, we concede by way of indulgence that ... he be absolved by his Bishop or proper priest." See Thesaurus, De Poen., part 2, word Censura, ch. V.

7º The extraction of one who has fled for refuge from the Church, done by private authority, or the striking or plundering of the goods of the same fugitive, likewise by private authority. Ch. Definivit, 35, caus. 17, q. 4.

8º A visit of a sick person made by a physician, if after he has visited him on the third day, it has not been established for him by the testimony of the Confessor that the same sick person has made sacramental confession, or has deferred it by the counsel of a learned Confessor. From the Roman Council under Benedict XIII, tit. 32, ch. 1.

9º All censures reserved to the Pontiff, if the offense is hidden, with those excepted about which above, n. 84, in the Note.

10º All papal censures and cases, even reserved in a special manner, if because of a legitimate impediment or urgent necessity of hearing confession the Apostolic See cannot be approached. - See St. Ligorius, bk. 7, n. 213.

Appendix II. On the Benefices of Clerics

Although the matter of benefices has been treated at length by most Theologians, nevertheless it is filled with innumerable and intricate difficulties, which otherwise have altogether vanished in France, from the time when by force of the Concordat between Pius VII and the French Government benefices were taken away and commuted into a yearly pension to be paid by the Government.

We must speak briefly about benefices regarded only in general, namely 1° about the nature; 2° about the acquisition; 3° about the loss of benefices.

I. On the Nature of Benefices

127. ○ A benefice is a perpetual right of receiving fruits from the goods of the Church because of some spiritual office constituted by the authority of the Church.

One benefice is simple, another double.

1° A simple benefice is one which has no obligation annexed except that of performing the divine Offices, such as canonries, chaplaincies, etc.

2° A double benefice is one which has jurisdiction, administration, and care of souls annexed, such as the episcopate, the parochial office, etc. It is called double because it is subject to a double burden; for besides the recitation of the breviary, common to all, it has some administration and eminence.

3° The pension which is paid by the Government in France to Bishops and Canons and Pastors, since it has been substituted in place of benefices, obtains their place, and therefore must be regarded as an ecclesiastical good, as is plain from various responses of the Sacred Penitentiary (tom. 1, n. 563).

II. On the Acquisition of Benefices

128. ○ The way of acquiring a benefice is threefold: 1° by election, by which a Cleric is chosen by the whole Chapter and is confirmed by the Superior; 2° by presentation, by which someone is offered by the Patron to the Superior, and is instituted by him if he is found suitable; 3° by collation, when a benefice is freely given from the sole right of the Prelate, and is not subject to the right of Patronage. - St. Ligorius, n. 85.

In any diocese the Bishop is the proper collator of benefices, unless by legitimate prescription such a right belongs to another. But the Pope is the supreme and universal collator of all non-patronage benefices. - St. Ligorius, n. 86.

The right of Patronage is twofold: 1° ecclesiastical, if it has arisen from some title of the Church; 2° lay, if it has been acquired by some layman through the foundation, for example, of a Church. The right of Patronage is constituted by os, aedificatio, fundus, namely patronage, the building of the Church, and donation of the land. - St. Ligorius, n. 87.

129. Questions. - QUESTION 1°. What qualities are required for obtaining a benefice?

Resp. It is required 1° that the person be suitable and capable, that is, that he be a Cleric, not illegitimate, of good morals; 2° that he have enough knowledge and skill for rightly performing the duty annexed to the benefice. - St. Ligorius, n. 112.

130. ○ QUESTION 2º. Is there an obligation of choosing the more worthy for a benefice?

Resp. 1º Affirmative, and indeed under grave obligation per se as to benefices with cure, or double benefices, because the good of the Church demands this. But that it be a grave sin, it is required that the one choosing, after all the circumstances have been diligently inspected, judge that the one chosen is evidently and much less worthy. But greater worthiness is not to be taken absolutely, but relatively to the utility of the Church and of the faithful. - St. Ligorius, nn. 91-92.

131. ○ Resp. 2º Affirmative, also more probably and more commonly as to simple benefices, because the advantage of the Church also and distributive justice demand this; unless rarely one less worthy is chosen, and there is question of benefices of lesser moment. - St. Ligorius, n. 93 and following. Nevertheless the election of one less worthy is more probably valid in every case, nor does it induce the burden of restitution per se [1]. - St. Ligorius, nn. 102, 103, 106.

[1]  Well does the Author add, "per se"; for otherwise one must speak if some implicit or explicit pact is violated, for example, if collation is made by concursus.

132. ○ QUESTION 3º. Is it lawful for someone to possess several benefices?

Resp. Generally no, unless they are simple and do not oblige to residence. Indeed, neither by dispensation of the Pontiff can several benefices be held at the same time if there is not present a cohonestating cause, because this is against natural law, since one suffices for honorable support [2], and various duties cannot rightly be performed by one and the same person. - St. Ligorius, n. 117 and following.

[2]  This reason sometimes fails. For in certain places no one applies for the parochial benefice, because it has revenues so slender that it by no means suffices for the support of the pastor. Hence it also happens that for this cause the Sacred Congregation sometimes dispenses a Pastor from applying Mass for the people on certain days.

133. ○ QUESTION 4º. What causes cohonestate plurality of benefices?

Resp. According to the common judgment of the Doctors, they are the following: 1º necessity of the Church, namely if other suitable ministers are lacking; 2º utility of the Church, namely if one alone, although absent, is judged likely to profit more by his authority, doctrine, and prudence than another; 3º prerogative of merits, namely if someone should excel among others in doctrine, counsel, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 118.

III. On the Loss of Benefices

134. ○ Benefices can be lost in four ways: 1º by the death of the benefited one, because they are conceded only to persons; 2º by disposition of law ipso facto because of certain enormous crimes; 3º by sentence of the judge because of crimes not so enormous [3]; 4º by spontaneous dimission or resignation.

[3]  Even in the preceding case a sentence of the judge is required, if not condemnatory, at least declaratory of the crime; because no one is compelled to abdicate by himself.

But resignation is twofold: 1º tacit, for example, if someone enters Religion; 2º express, if it is done before a Superior accepting it. But this is either simple or conditioned, accordingly as it is done simply without condition, or with some condition appended, namely that it be conferred upon a certain designated person, etc. - St. Ligorius, nn. 133, 134.

135. ○ QUESTION. What are the conditions, that resignation or permutation of a benefice may be valid?

Resp. It is required 1º that it be made freely; 2º that it be made before [4] the Bishop. or Pope; 3º that it be accepted by the Prelate, in whose hands it is made, and by him to whom it is conferred; 4º that the consent of the Patron or of the electors be present, when the benefice is from patronage or election. - See St. Ligorius, n. 133.

[4]  Understand, with the consent and authority of the Bishop or Pontiff intervening, accordingly as the collation of the benefice belongs to the Bishop or to the Pope.

To a benefice is referred an ecclesiastical pension, which is the right of receiving fruits from another's benefice. But a pension is threefold: 1º lay, which is given to laymen because of temporal service toward the Church; 2º ecclesiastical, which is given to Clerics because of spiritual ministry; 3º mixed, which is given to a Cleric only for honorable support.

Moreover for the validity of a pension there is required 1º that dispensation of the Pope accede; 2º that it be given from a just cause; 3º that ordinarily it not exceed the third part of the benefice.

Part Third. On the Religious State

136. ○ Besides the way of the commandments, by which all men ought to tend toward obtaining eternal salvation, there is given the way of counsels or of special perfection, which is merely of counsel, and is proposed only to a few selected by God Himself, who, bidding farewell to the world, lead life in monasteries.

Christ Himself teaches us this twofold way in many places of the Gospel; for example, Matt. 19:17, He says to the young man inquiring about the way of salvation: "If you wish to enter into life, keep the commandments." And v. 21: "If you wish to be perfect, go, sell what you have, and give to the poor, and you will have treasure in heaven; and come, follow me."

There is also a certain third way, midway between each of the preceding two, namely the way of chastity, or of continence preserved in the world.

Hence a threefold class of men is established by reason of the means proposed for attaining God, or a threefold state of life, namely 1º the state of matrimony; 2º of celibacy; 3º of religious life. Hence also a threefold grade of perfection; for celibacy, as St. Paul declared and the Council of Trent defined, is more perfect than the matrimonial state; but religious life is, as is plain, the most perfect of all. The sacerdotal state, although in dignity it is the most excellent of all, nevertheless, by reason of perfection, falls far short of religious life. But just as God is wonderful in His saints, so also is He wonderful in the various modes by which He promotes them to sanctity.

We must treat 1º of the nature of the religious state; 2º of religious vocation; 3º of the obligations of Religious by force of vows; 4º of the privileges of Regulars; to which there will be added an Appendix concerning the condition of Religious in France.

Chapter I. On the Nature of the Religious State

137. ○ The religious state is a stable institute of life approved by the Church for the faithful who, under a certain rule and common mode of living, wish to tend toward perfection by the three perpetual vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

I said 1º a stable institute of life; because the Religious by the three vows of religion devotes himself in perpetuity to God.

I said 2º approved by the Church; for since the religious state is a certain sacred community, it ought to be instituted by spiritual power. Formerly indeed this approval was conceded by any Bishop for his own diocese; but afterwards it was established in the Lateran Council under Innocent III that no new Religion be introduced unless it had been approved by the Supreme Pontiff. - St. Ligorius, bk. 4, n. 5.

I said 3º who... wish to tend toward perfection; for a religious, by force of his Profession, is held under grave obligation to study in some way for perfection by the observance of the vows; because by force of his Profession he is held to will to preserve his state, which is a state of perfection. But a Religious is not held by force of his Profession to be perfect, but only to study for perfection. - Thus all.

138. Resolutions. - 1º Solemn vows are not required for the essence of Religion, but simple vows suffice. For all the conditions necessary for the substance of Religion are had even in simple vows, since through them a man can perpetually bind himself to God in an Order approved by the Church [1]. It is established moreover from the Bull of Gregory XIII, Ascendente Domino, in which the Pontiff declared that those also are true Religious in the Society of Jesus who have emitted only simple vows. 2º Those are Religious who in an approved Religion, according to a certain rule, emit the three essential vows. But on the contrary, those who, although they emit these three vows and lead life in common, nevertheless do not profess a rule approved by the Apostolic See, are not Religious properly so called. Hence various Congregations of men or of pious women approved only by the Bishop do not constitute Orders strictly religious. Nevertheless those who in Congregations of this sort emit simple vows and live under a common rule and dependence on a Superior can enjoy the same merit before God as Religious properly so called, since they exhibit the same denial of self to the Lord. But we note that, from today's practice, the Apostolic See does not approve new religious Institutes as Orders properly so called with profession of solemn vows, but only as religious Congregations, or, more strictly from the manner of speaking of the Holy See, as secular Congregations, with simple vows, to which therefore the privileges conceded to solemn vows do not belong per se. - See Analecta I.P.

[1]  An Order approved by the Church is here distinguished from religious Congregations, which, as the Author warns below, are also called secular. Therefore what Gregory XIII defined concerning the Scholastics of the Society of Jesus, that they are true Religious although they have emitted only simple vows, seems certainly to have to be said also of those who, from the recent disposition of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX, remain bound for some years only by simple vows in religious Orders before they emit solemn profession.

3º Those are not Religious who, having emitted a vow of perpetual poverty and chastity, vow obedience to a Confessor or Bishop. The reason is that by force of this vow they are not subjected to Superiors.

4º From the Decree of Pius IX, promulgated by the encyclical letters of the Sacred Congregation of Regulars given to the Superiors of Religious Orders on 19 March 1857, all Religious of those Orders in which solemn vows are emitted, in the future, the novitiate having been completed, emit only simple vows, at least for a triennium; then they are admitted to solemn vows if they are found worthy by their Superiors. But for just causes solemn Profession will also be able to be deferred longer, though not beyond the completed age of 25 years. - See Analecta I.P., series 2, col. 2954.

But from the declarations of the Sacred Congregation of Regulars given on 23 February 1859, etc., and pertaining to the aforesaid decree, the simple vows about which there is question are perpetual on the part of the one vowing, and dispensation from them is reserved to the Supreme Pontiff. Yet on the part of the Order they can be dissolved through dismissal of the Professed, so that, dismissal having been given, by that very fact the professed become free from every bond of the said vows. But no one will be able to be dismissed on account of infirmity arising after Profession of simple vows [2]. For the rest, the professed of these vows become participants in all the graces and privileges which the solemnly Professed enjoy in the same Order. - See Analecta I.P., 24 Sept. 1859, col. 4891.

[2]  Others extend a law of this sort more broadly, so that, unless some fault intervenes, he cannot be cast out for any other cause.

139. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. What things are required for the validity of Profession?

Resp. The following conditions are required:

1º Aptitude of the one vowing, namely that he has entirely completed the sixteenth year of his age; that he has spent at least a whole year of Novitiate with the religious habit [3]; that he has no impediment which, from statutes confirmed by the Supreme Pontiff, is judged substantial.

[3]  Understand this according as the Constitutions of each Order require or do not require it, or also according as the circumstances of times or places demand or allow.

2º Consent and express or tacit acceptance of the Prelate of the Order, or of the Chapter, where it is required. But error concerning the substance, both on the part of the one professing and of the one admitting, makes the Profession invalid.

3º Liberty of the one vowing, that is, that the Profession be made spontaneously, grave fear being excluded, or even reverential fear joined with importunate requests more often repeated, blandishments, command, or grave offense or indignation long continued of blood relatives. - St. Ligorius, n. 7, and de Matr., n. 1056 [4].

[4]  Concerning reverential fear St. Alphonsus more clearly says thus (bk. 4, n. 7): Profession should be made spontaneously, with grave fear not compelling, such as would be... Likewise reverential fear, not indeed by itself, but with the importunity of requests, blandishments, and command often repeated acceding, or grave offense, or indignation long continued of blood relatives, with threats also of denying support if he departs from Religion. For these things individually, or certainly joined together, with the condition of a rude, timid man considered, can instill just fear and invalidate profession, as Laymann with others, etc.

140. ○ QUESTION 2º. To what is the Bishop held as to girls about to enter Religion?

Resp. He is held under grave obligation, from the statute of the Council of Trent, to explore by himself, or, if he himself is impeded, through a Vicar or deputy, the will of those girls, both before the reception of the habit and before Profession. Nevertheless the omission of one of the two examinations would not be regarded as grave. For the rest, the Profession would not be invalid if each examination were omitted, provided the girls were free in emitting Profession. An examination of this sort is required even if the monastery which the girl is about to enter is exempt from episcopal jurisdiction; because the Bishop then acts as one delegated by the Holy See for this. - St. Ligorius, n. 4.

QUESTION 3º. Is the integrity of the year of Novitiate required for validity?

Resp. Affirmative, so that in a leap year the lapse of the day which is to be added must be awaited. Thus the Sacred Congregation of the Council of Trent expressly declared. But the time of Novitiate begins from the moment of reception of the habit [5].

[5]  This can have force with those Orders which use a peculiar habit. For example, the Society of Jesus, which by force of its Constitutions does not use any proper habit, is not held by this law.

141. ○ QUESTION 4º. Does interruption of the Novitiate harm the validity of Profession?

Resp. Affirmative. It is established from the decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, which established that a Novice who had departed from the monastery in order to enter another Religion, and, after only two hours had been spent in another convent, repenting of the deed had returned, was held to begin the year of probation again.

QUESTION 5º. When is the year of probation judged to be interrupted?

Resp. 1º It is judged to be interrupted chiefly 1º whenever the Novice goes out from the monastery without permission with the intention of not returning, even if he immediately returns, as is established from what has just been said; 2º whenever he is dismissed absolutely by the Superiors and is then admitted again; 3º if he departs by private authority in order to enter another house or another province even of the same Order.

Resp. 2º But the Novitiate is not judged to be interrupted 1º if the Novice is sick in the house, even for a notable time, although he can by no means be present at the exercises of the Novices; 2º if, compelled by violence, he departs from the house; 3º if, with permission accepted, he turns aside to parents or others for a brief time for the sake of recovering health or conducting business; 4º if he is dismissed by false accusation, and afterwards, when the truth has been known, is admitted again; 5º if he makes a journey ordered by his Superiors, because then he remains under their dependence. - There are several other doubtful cases, which can be seen apud the authors.

142. ○ QUESTION 6º. By what means is a Religious held to tend toward perfection?

Resp. 1º He is held to tend primarily through the essential means of the religious state, namely through observance of the three vows, poverty, chastity, and obedience. For if he does not observe these at least for the most part, he can be called Religious only in name and habit, but not in reality [6].

[6]  Understand this as to the manner of life; for as to the state he both is and must be called Religious also in reality.

Resp. 2º He is held to tend secondarily also through accidental means, namely through the proper Rules of the Order, at least by not contemning those helps. But then a Religious is judged to omit the rules from contempt when he transgresses them with the intention of not being subject to them or to his Prelates; or if he holds them as vain [7]. - St. Ligorius, n. 10. - Laymann. - Busembaum. - Sanchez. - Lessius, etc.

[7]  To hold rules as vain does not always imply contempt of the true name. It is surely one thing to contemn the authority of the one commanding, another to hold of little account the thing prescribed as if useless or imprudent, etc. In the former case you have truly formal contempt, but not likewise in the latter. Make sure that you have this before your eyes for rightly understanding also those things which are read in the following Question 7.

143. ○ QUESTION 7º. When does a Religious sin gravely against the precept of tending toward perfection?

Resp. In this he gravely offends: 1º if he violates the vows very often in a grave matter, as is plain; because he omits the means essential for observing this obligation, and consequently altogether necessary. - Thus all. 2º If he transgresses the rules generally from contempt, as was just said. But otherwise, if he violates them led by concupiscence, or because he thinks that they are not necessary for him for salvation, or if he thinks that they are not prescribed under grave obligation. For to transgress rules in matters of slight moment, even from custom, contempt being excluded, does not exceed venial sin. - Thus expressly St. Ligorius, n. 10, with St. Thomas, the Salmanticenses, and others commonly.

Yet there are not lacking those who contend that a Religious sins gravely against the obligation of tending toward perfection if he frequently, or at least for the most part, violates the rules; because they are efficacious means, although secondary, for directing a Religious in the way of perfection. But the prior opinion, which is common, appears truer, provided the omission of the rules does not lead into grave and frequent violation of the vows [8].

[8]  I think it rarely happens that that relaxation of soul in observing lighter rules, even directly voluntary, is from this title alone a mortal sin; because that negligence, speaking per se, is only a remote disposition, unless some peculiar circumstances accede which in some matter consummate a proximate occasion. Thus Suarez (De Relig., tr. VIII, bk. 1, ch. 4, n. 18). See also Card. De Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 15, nn. 49-50).

144. ○ QUESTION 8º. Does a Religious sin gravely who intends to observe only commandments obliging under grave obligation, and to care in no way about the rest?

Resp. There is a twofold probable opinion:

I. The first opinion affirms absolutely, because the very purpose of not caring about the rules, even those not prescribing under sin, is virtual contempt of the same. - Lacroix, bk. 4, n. 57. - Elbel. - Sylvius, etc.

II. The second opinion denies. The reason is that by the very fact that the Religious wishes to fulfill those many things which oblige under grave obligation, he already tends toward perfection, since he wishes to fulfill many things which, with respect to others, do not oblige, but are mere counsels. - Thus Sanchez. - Salmanticenses, etc. And St. Ligorius, n. 10, calls this opinion the more common and more probable.

For the rest, St. Ligorius, n. 11, rightly notes that a Religious so disposed can be in grave danger of sinning mortally from other heads, for example, by reason of the danger of transgressing the vows, or of inflicting grave harm upon Religion as to discipline, etc.

145. ○ QUESTION 9º. Whether and to what extent does a rule taken distributively, or with individual rules attended to in particular, oblige under sin?

Resp. In most Orders, the rule, speaking generally and per se, does not oblige under sin, not even venial sin. This is established from the constitutions themselves of various Orders and from the common interpretation of Theologians. Orders are to be excepted in which the constitutions expressly establish the opposite.

I said 1º speaking generally; because whatever things fall under vows or express precepts of Superiors are not without fault, and indeed grave fault according to the gravity of the matter, as below we shall say concerning vows.

I said 2º per se; because Theologians agree that transgression of the rule is very rarely free from all fault because of extrinsic reasons. St. Ligorius, n. 10, says that such a transgression is scarcely ever to be excused from venial sin, because almost always there will be some fault by reason of negligence, concupiscence, scandal, sloth, or any other inordinate motion [9]. - Thus also Laymann. - Suarez. - Busembaum. - Sanchez, etc.

[9]  In these things, as is plain, reasonable use of epieikeia is not comprehended.

146. ○ QUESTION 10º. Does a Prelate sin gravely by neglecting to correct slight defects of subjects?

Resp. Affirmative, if the defects are several and such that they can notably relax discipline. Therefore the Prelate is held not only to correct the defects of subjects tending toward the harm of the whole Community, but also to inquire so that he may correct, excessive solicitude nevertheless being excluded. Sometimes, however, it is expedient that he dissemble, if the defects do not bring scandal, or if he foresees that the subject will come out worse from correction, or if a more opportune time must be awaited. For prudence persuades this for obtaining a greater good or removing an evil. - St. Ligorius, n. 13, and others commonly.

QUESTION 11º. Whether and what obligation of reciting the divine Office arises from religious profession?

Resp. 1º There is no obligation by force of religious profession considered in itself; and in fact there are several religious Orders in which the Professed are by no means obliged to the Hours, unless they have been constituted in sacred orders.

Resp. 2º A grave obligation urges all Religious of Orders who emit solemn vows and are destined to choir to recite the divine Office immediately from the time Profession has been made, so that those impeded from choir ought privately to satisfy the canonical Hours, whether they are Clerics or laymen, whether men or women; Conversi nevertheless excepted. - Thus most commonly. - St. Ligorius, bk. 4, n. 141, against a few.

Yet in Orders in which only the Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary is recited, this recitation does not oblige under grave obligation, although solemn vows are emitted in those Orders, for example, in the Order of Nuns called of the Visitation, as has several times been decided.

Moreover, in Communities in which, besides the Office of the day, the Office also of the Blessed Virgin or of the Dead, or the seven penitential Psalms, must be recited, the obligation does not affect those privately reciting the Office outside choir; indeed not even those reciting in choir itself, at least commonly, as was said above, n. 60. - St. Ligorius, n. 143.

147. ○ QUESTION 12°. Can the Pope dispense from solemn vows?

Resp. Affirmative, from a most grave cause. The reason is that the solemnity of vows was instituted from ecclesiastical Law alone, as is established from the Extravagant of John XXII, tit. 6, and from the Bull Ascendente Domino, in which Gregory XIII says: "We, considering that the solemnity of a vow was invented by the constitution of the Church alone," etc. Therefore the Supreme Pontiff can dispense in solemn vows, just as in simple vows, since the reason of the difference which intervenes between them is from merely ecclesiastical institution [10]. But according to all, the Pontiff can dispense in simple vows. Therefore, etc. It is established also from several examples related in Ecclesiastical history that Supreme Pontiffs have sometimes used power of this sort. Especially in more recent times Pius VII conceded several dispensations of this kind to Monks and Nuns solemnly professed, for revalidating marriages sacrilegiously entered. - Thus Bouvier, who says that the opinion of Theologians is now most common, against Billuart and some others.

[10]  Therefore the dispensation would be valid even if it were conceded without cause; nevertheless this must be understood of the solemnity of the vow, but not of the bond of the vow; for this, that it may be dissolved, requires a cause. Therefore a professed religious dispensed in this way would indeed validly contract matrimony, because the force of diriment impediment depends not simply on the vow, but on the solemnity of the vow, which in the present hypothesis would be taken away; nevertheless he would enter upon nuptials illicitly, as one still bound by the vow, although only simple.

Chapter II. On Religious Vocation

148. ○ It is certain that there is given a divine vocation, that is, that God by most benign providence calls some before others to a more excellent and more perfect state, and at the same time lavishes the gifts and graces for rightly executing and preserving it, especially as to the ecclesiastical and religious state. For since all things in the natural order are governed by God in the mode proper to each, therefore a fortiori in the supernatural order. On another ground, special gifts and graces are required for embracing and pursuing a more perfect state, which can be conceded by God alone, the supreme dispenser. It is established moreover from various places of Sacred Scripture. Thus concerning the Priesthood in particular the Apostle says, Heb. 5:4: "Nor does anyone take honor to himself, but he who is called by God, as Aaron...." Moreover the same thing must be said about religious life, which is a more perfect and much more difficult state.

149. Questions. - QUESTION 1°. Whether or how does one sin who, feeling himself called to Religion, does not comply with the divine vocation?

Resp. 1º Per se, strictly speaking, he sins in no way; because divine counsels per se impose no obligation, since in this precisely they differ from precepts.

Resp. 2º Yet he can scarcely be excused from some fault because of the danger of eternal salvation to which he commits himself. Indeed he would not be excused from grave sin who was persuaded that this one means of obtaining eternal salvation remained for him, namely that he flee from the dangers of the world.

But indeed, are those persons in a bad state who, morally certain about a divine vocation to Religion, strive to persuade themselves that they can obtain their salvation equally easily by remaining in the world, or by returning to it? It does not seem to be doubted that these persons expose themselves to a great risk of salvation; because by remaining in the world against the vocation of God, they deprive themselves of those special helps which God's providence had prepared for them in religion, and therefore they will with difficulty resist the temptations of the world. Nevertheless St. Ligorius does not dare to render a certain judgment about this.

150. ○ QUESTION 2º. How does one sin who, not called, nevertheless undertakes the more perfect state of Religion or of the Clericate?

Resp. He sins gravely, if he has clearly known the defect of vocation, both on account of the reverence due to sacred Orders and Religion, both on account of the injury brought upon God, and especially on account of the danger of salvation which he incurs, while he undertakes obligations which he will not be able morally to satisfy, as one lacking the special helps which are conceded by God only to those called. Nevertheless he will be excused from that fault if he has a firm will of fulfilling the obligations of the state undertaken.

151. ○ QUESTION 3º. Do parents or Superiors sin gravely who turn children or subjects away from the religious state?

Resp. 1º Affirmative, if they turn them away unjustly by threats, force, fraud, or importunate prayers; because they impede them from the attainment of a great good, to which they have a right [1].

[1]  They not only impede from the attainment of an immense good, but expose their children to the risk of eternal salvation.

Resp. 2º Affirmative, for the most part, even if they turn them away only by prayers and promises; because this cannot be without grave harm to them. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, who says that this opinion is altogether to be held against some. - Yet parents do not sin who oppose for a time the pious desires of younger children in order to test their constancy, or because of another just cause [2]. Nevertheless in this matter, in order to avoid hallucinations, they ought to stand by the counsels of the Confessor or of an upright and learned man.

[2]  That cause can be judged just on account of which not even the Superiors of the Order would easily admit the candidate. For the rest, even in testing the constancy of the younger ones, no small discretion is needed, lest namely the candidate's frailty turn him away from a vocation otherwise true.

QUESTION 4º. Do children sin by entering Religion when their parents are unwilling or unaware?

Resp. No, speaking per se, although in practice this ordinarily is not expedient, unless they deservedly fear unjust vexation or impediment. The reason is that unless parents oppose from a just cause, children are altogether free concerning the choice of a state of life. - Recall the things said concerning the fourth precept, tom. 1, n. 369.

152. ○ QUESTION 5º. What are the signs of a religious vocation?

Resp. Speaking generally, or according to ordinary providence, two things are required and suffice for proving a divine vocation, namely due aptitude and propensity of the will.

1º Aptitude is understood as suitability for the religious state in general, and in particular for the observance proper to such an Order. But it consists especially in right judgment, in a good disposition, in a soul submitted to the yoke of obedience, in relatively sufficient knowledge, and in lack of defects of body and soul which are repugnant to the reason of this life. 2º A natural [3] and constant inclination, which therefore is not subject to frequent changes, notwithstanding otherwise some past tergiversation arising from temptations of the devil or from some repugnance of nature. Yet it is not required that the inclination proceed from spontaneity or propensity more than from intimate persuasion of soul. Moreover that inclination ought to be right, namely to proceed from a pure intention, from the mere desire of attaining salvation more easily, of procuring the greater glory of God or even the salvation of souls, etc.

[3]  Understand natural here as a spontaneous propensity of soul, which arises almost from this, that the religious state is presented to the mind as congruous to one's proper disposition, and suitable for bringing about internal peace and happiness.

I said speaking generally or in ordinary providence; because there are more evident signs of vocation, namely 1º divine revelation, as St. Paul, St. Aloysius Gonzaga, St. Stanislaus Kostka, etc., were called; 2º singular inspiration, which consists in an internal motion by which someone is vehemently impelled to a more perfect life and, as it were, drawn.

Chapter III. On the Obligations of Vows

Article I. On the Vow of Poverty

153. ○ I. A Religious bound by a solemn vow of poverty, namely a Religious solemnly professed in an Order approved by the Holy See, is altogether incapable in particular or personally of any dominion over a temporal thing estimable by price [1], even with the permission of the Superior. This is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 25, ch. 2. - But the Community can acquire and possess goods, either by itself or through subjects, unless its constitutions stand in the way. Hence the well-known axiom of Canon Law: "Whatever a Monk acquires, he acquires not for himself, but for the Monastery."

[1]  Nevertheless the Apostolic See, as is established by several examples, has dispensed that Religious even solemnly professed could validly and licitly have and retain dominion of temporal goods. And, to pass over St. Francis Borgia, who, from a dispensation obtained from Paul III, emitted the solemn vows of the Society of Jesus in such a way that nevertheless only within a four-year period after profession did he abdicate the Duchy of Gandia and the remaining temporal goods from himself (cf. the Life of St. Francis Borgia written in Spanish by Alvaro Cienfuegos, bk. 3, ch. 8, § 2, and ch. 10, § 1), we have Responses of the Sacred Penitentiary, both that given for French nuns on 28 Nov. 1818, by which the faculty is imparted that, notwithstanding the solemn vow of poverty, "... they can retain the goods and revenues which they have acquired up to now" (see Carriere, De Iust. et Iur., p. 4, sect. 1, ch. 4, n. 214), and that given on 20 Nov. 1820 for the nuns of Belgium, to whom, although solemnly professed, by the express authority of the Holy See the faculty is attributed of acquiring, possessing, and administering goods, which they may use for honorable ends, etc. (see Bouix, Tract. De Regularibus, part 3, ch. 3).

But from these things it sufficiently appears that the incapacity of a solemnly professed religious for having and exercising dominion over temporal things must be traced back not to natural or divine law, but only to ecclesiastical law. Hence St. Ignatius de Loyola added to part 6, ch. 2, of the Constitutions of the Society of Jesus a Declaration in which the faculty, even after solemn profession, of acquiring and retaining dominion, which could be obtained from the Apostolic See, is expressly mentioned. "If someone," he says, "moved by his devotion and with holy intention to the greater glory of God, before his profession were to obtain from the Apostolic See the faculty that either he himself, or the house in which he emitted profession, could have the right of succeeding to an inheritance, ... he would not be judged contrary to this Constitution or its intention."

Nor indeed ought the reason of this doctrine to seem hidden. For this must be confessed, as daily practice in the Church teaches, that dominion of temporal things is indeed compatible with a simple vow of poverty. But what is added to the simple vow, namely the solemnity of the same vow, was introduced by ecclesiastical law, as the Apostolic Constitutions openly declare. Now if solemnity is superadded to a vow by ecclesiastical law alone, is it not manifest that the force of the same solemnity, and the measure of its effects, is defined by that power from which solemnity itself proceeds, and therefore depends on the judgment of the Supreme Legislator in the Church? Therefore from the very nature of the thing it is that a solemnly professed religious exists incapable or capable of dominion according to the judgment of the supreme authority, to whose wisdom it belongs to dispose all things according to the circumstances of times, places, and persons. Cf. Marc. Struggl (Th. Moral., tr. 6, q. 5, n. 33), who concludes: Thus Sanchez, in Decal., bk. 5, ch. 2, n. 9, Card. De Lugo, De Iust., disp. 3, n. 75, and others COMMONLY.

Therefore a professed Religious is altogether unfit to exercise any act of proprietorship concerning any thing, whether of the monastery, or of parents, or of outsiders; and therefore without the Superior's permission, either general or special, he can dispose of no thing, either licitly or validly, by acceptance, donation, sale, loan for use, loan for consumption, use, exchange, improvement, etc.

154. ○ II. A Religious bound by a simple vow of poverty can indeed have direct dominion of goods; but he can licitly dispose of nothing concerning them without particular or general permission of the Superior [2].

[2]  It is said, he cannot do so licitly; for indeed he would dispose validly, as is said below, q. 2.

This has force even if the Order was not approved by the Holy See, but only by the Bishop, because the efficacy of a simple vow is always the same; for the one vowing entirely despoils himself of the right of disposing of any thing without permission, or of preserving the use of the same thing, or of exercising any act of proprietorship, unless the constitutions of the Order or legitimate custom except something.

Besides sins against the vow of poverty, sins against the virtue of poverty also are not rarely given, although the vow remains uninjured; for example, if a Religious excessively fosters affection [3] for things which he keeps by permission of the Prelate, if he indulges conveniences more than is fair, if he asks superfluous things from Superiors, or keeps them after they have been obtained, and similar things.

[3]  As often as the affection is so depraved, and is carried so far, that even against the commanding will of God he wills or pursues something, certainly there will be sin. But in the remaining cases you will have a defect of further perfection, not however a sin; for sin is defined as a transgression of law.

155. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. What is the difference between the vow and the virtue of poverty?

Resp. The vow regards only external acts of proprietorship; but the virtue extends also to the internal affections of the heart [4]. For the object of the vow is to despoil the Religious externally of temporal goods. But the virtue has as its end entirely to cut away every inordinate affection of the heart toward earthly things. Therefore the vow of poverty is, as it were, a means to the virtue, which is the end to be obtained. This having been posited, no one does not see that the virtue of poverty extends much more broadly than the vow; for as often as someone infringes the vow, he at the same time injures the virtue, but not conversely.

[4]  These things seem less to cohere with what immediately preceded, where the vice was noted of retaining superfluous things even with the Superior's permission, of indulging conveniences, etc., which surely pertain to externals.

Add that account must be taken of the customs of each Order, which concede a greater or lesser measure of conveniences; and yet no one would have dared to turn these things into fault.

For the rest, Lugo rightly notes (De Iust. et Iur., disp. 3, n. 131) that if in some Order the vow of poverty is observed more severely, the subject who retains superfluous things even with the Superior's permission is not without fault against the vow of poverty, although he cannot be called a proprietor.

I said that the vow affects only external acts of proprietorship; nevertheless the vow could be violated by an internal act which regarded and attained an external act, namely by the desire of acting externally against the vow; since desire puts on all the malice and species of the external act, as was said in the Treatise on Sins, bk. 1, n. 468.

QUESTION 2º. Can a religious preserving direct dominion of goods VALIDLY dispose of these without permission?

Resp. Affirmative, because he is truly the owner, although on account of the vow of poverty he acts illicitly [5]. - Yet some deny, because, they say, Religious have themselves as wards, who cannot validly give their goods. But this opinion is of no weight at all.

[5]  That Religious of the Society of Jesus acting thus sin against the vow of poverty, Suarez also taught, although others falsely affixed to him the opposite opinion, as Lugo shows (De Iust., disp. 3, n. 78).

QUESTION 3º. To what does the direct dominion of a Religious not solemnly professed extend?

Resp. 1º To the temporal goods which he possessed before the vows; 2º to the fruits or revenues of the same goods; 3º to those things which come to him by law, without new acceptance, such as a paternal inheritance, legacies, etc.; 4º to all goods which he receives from parents, relatives, friends, etc., by permission of the Superiors. Yet if these are consumable by use, they must be applied according to custom to the common use of the monastery [6], at least speaking generally.

[6]  That some part from these things yields to the use of the monastery does not happen by force of the vow, but by custom; for, the vow preserved, they could be spent for other uses, for example, in alms, although the permission of the Superior ought always to intervene.

156. ○ QUESTION 4º. Can a religious, without the Superior's permission, keep his own manuscripts and transfer them to another?

Resp. Affirmative, according to the common opinion; for manuscripts, as offspring of the intellect, are held as something spiritual. Besides, they pertain to knowledge, which does not fall under the vow of poverty; but the stronger reason is that the common and received custom among Regulars bears this way. - St. Ligorius, n. 14. The Salmanticenses and others commonly hold the same also about Relics of the Saints.

QUESTION 5º. Does a Religious sin against the vow of poverty if he spends something from things conceded for a determined use on another use?

Resp. Affirmative. The reason is that in these things the Religious has only use of fact, and that precariously, as long as it will seem good to the Superior. But it is an act of proprietorship or dominion to dispose of some thing according to one's own judgment, and otherwise the will or permission of the Superior, unless something else is manifest, is restricted to the assigned use. - St. Ligorius, n. 19, and others commonly.

157. º QUESTION 6º. Can a Religious without permission give away what by living more sparingly he subtracts for himself from things conceded for use?

Resp. No, speaking generally. The reason is plain from the responses to the preceding question. - They except if a certain quantity is assigned to the Religious in such a way that neither is the Monastery held to provide anything else to him, nor is he himself held to render an account. St. Ligorius, n. 23, says that it is commonly permitted by authors that a Religious can bestow, on whom he wishes, his pittances which are provided to him in a limited way, such as eggs, meats, etc., unless the Superior has expressly prohibited this. - St. Antoninus. - Sylvius, etc.

QUESTION 7º. Does a Religious sin against the vow of poverty who accepts money from an outsider to be spent at will on pious works?

Resp. Affirmative. The reason is plain from what has been said; for by acting thus, the Religious would make an act of proprietorship, unless he had the permission of his Superior [7]. - But otherwise, if the pious works were determined by the donor; because then the Religious would be nothing except a channel, and as it were the mandatary of the donor. Hence a Religious does not sin against the vow of poverty who accepts from an outsider money to be disbursed to such a poor person, to such a Monastery, Church, such a pious cause, etc. Indeed he does not sin even if he himself without permission of the Superior asks money from an outsider to be handed over to another determinate person. Nevertheless if there is question of a matter of great moment, prudence persuades, and the right order of religious discipline requires, that a subject do nothing unless he has first obtained the assent of the Superior, even if he incurs no danger of violating poverty.

[7]  Sanchez (In Decal., bk. 7, ch. 30), to the question, "Whether, when one giving money to a religious so that he may distribute it to the poor does not designate the poor to whom it is to be distributed, nor designate the quantity to be bestowed on each poor person, but commits the choice of both or of either to the religious, ... the religious then sins against the vow of poverty by designating the poor person to whom the alms are conferred, or by designating the quantity of alms to be conferred?" responds (l.c., n. 4): "I cannot persuade myself that this is against the vow of poverty, and most learned men of our Society and externs consulted by me have approved my opinion. I am led by this, that ... the religious here does not retain or accept that money as his own, nor as owner, but so that, in the name of another, namely of the one handing it over, he may give it to the poor. Therefore he does not exercise any act of dominion or proprietorship.... Secondly, because not any possession and administration whatsoever of money is opposed to the vow of poverty, but when they are something of right, namely when the religious administers in his own name.... But in this event the religious administers not in his own name, but in another's. Thirdly, because in this dispensation these four things alone are found: reception of the money, faculty of choosing the poor, the choosing of them, distribution among them. But none of these is against the vow of poverty. Not reception of the money, because the religious does not receive it for himself..., but so that in the name of the testator he may distribute it to the poor.... Nor even the faculty of choosing the poor; for this is nothing else than the right of naming the poor..., which we proved above to be nothing of right, but of mere fact.... Nor the very choice of the poor; because if the right of choosing is not opposed, a fortiori neither is the choice itself, which is the exercise of that right. Nor finally the very distribution of money to the poor, because the religious does not distribute in his own name, but in the name of the one giving, nor is he himself judged to confer anything, but the giver, as is established from law unum de familia, ff. De Legat. 2.... Finally the solution of the arguments of the contrary party will confirm this part, which they do not prove." Thus Sanchez; but see the following note to n. 160.

158. ○ QUESTION 8º. Does a Religious sin against the vow of poverty who refuses those things which are offered to him by outsiders?

Resp. 1º No, if there is question of mere donations, alms, or gifts to which he has no right. The reason is that the vow of poverty does not oblige him to receive those things which he has not yet acquired, or to which neither he himself nor the Monastery has a strict right. Nevertheless if the Religious has no reason for refusing, he sins against charity by impeding the good of his Religion, but not against justice. - St. Ligorius, n. 20. - Lugo. - Sanchez, etc.

Resp. 2º Otherwise, if there is question of things already acquired, for example, of legacies, of payment owed for the labors of the Religious, or of gifts already accepted, etc. The reason is that the monastery immediately acquires the right of these according to the axiom: "Whatever a Monk acquires, he acquires not for himself but for the Monastery." - St. Ligorius, ibid.

159. ○ QUESTION 9º. What matter is to be judged grave in violation of the vow of poverty?

Resp. 1º In sins which are at the same time against Religion and justice, speaking generally, that matter must be held as grave which constitutes mortal sin in theft. - St. Ligorius, n. 24. - Lugo. - Sanchez, and others commonly.

Yet some Theologians say that that matter only is grave which is judged grave in the thefts of sons of a family, namely matter about twice greater than in thefts against outsiders. - Thus Elbel, n. 646. - But this does not seem to be admitted. The reason is that sons are in hope of the goods of the father of the family, but Religious are not. Moreover Superiors are more unwilling as to thefts of subjects than parents are about thefts of sons. Besides, graver detriments follow as to the soul in the former than in the latter [8]. - St. Ligorius, ibid. For the rest, in order that judgment may be made about the gravity of matter in thefts of this sort, it must be noted that monasteries of middling wealth are commonly equated with rather wealthy private owners. Hence the same measure as for those generally constitutes grave matter. But if they are very wealthy, a greater quantity is required. A greater quantity is also required if a Religious usurps things of the Monastery for his own use, or gives them to others of the same Community, than if he were to disburse the same things to outsiders, because thus they remain at home. Greater also in minute thefts, which besides, with a notable interval interposed, do not coalesce into grave matter. Greater again in edible things, as we said concerning servants, tom. 1, n. 608.

[8]  Nevertheless the reason can have force on the contrary, that the Superior, as to the substance of the thing taken secretly, is less unwilling as to members of the household than as to outsiders. But although the condition of a Religious and of a son is different, nevertheless in this there is something similar, that the goods of the monastery are possessed for the good of the subjects, not indeed for the convenience of the Superior. Finally, as to the detriments which seem to be feared, these depend chiefly on the use of the things taken secretly; for a son can consume things taken away in gaming and whoring, and a Religious can disburse them to the poor, and vice versa.

160. ○ Resp. 2º In sins committed against Religion alone, or against the vow alone, the difficulty increases, and the disagreement of Theologians is greater. Yet more commonly they require generally the same matter for mortal sin as in the preceding case where justice is violated, because the act of proprietorship seems to be of the same gravity. Nevertheless not improbably some grave Doctors require a greater quantity for grave sin. - Thus Elbel, n. 646. - Salmanticenses, ch. 6, n. 12.

But they commonly agree that a much greater value is required for sinning gravely when gifts are accepted from outsiders to be disbursed to others, because then the act of proprietorship is much less than if these things were retained for one's own use. St. Ligorius, n. 24, and others commonly. - Indeed some then require 60 argentei, or the value of about 30 francs, for sinning gravely. - Thus Diana. - Leander, etc., apud St. Ligorius, ibid. [9].

[9]  This opinion seems to carry much difficulty before itself. For either it is understood of money to be accepted and disbursed by a religious in his own name, or for his own use; and thus, since we have an act of proprietorship contrary to the vow of poverty, with the old Doctors it will deservedly seem too lax to require 60 argentei, or six Roman scudi, for gravity of fault, especially since the change in the value of money which has occurred in the course of time (see the things said about this argument in tom. 1, note to n. 607) would now require a much ampler quantity of money. Or it is understood of money accepted and disbursed in the name of another; and thus with Sanchez (see note to preceding n. 157) it will be licit to judge that no fault intervenes, even if there is question of a greater sum.

St. Alphonsus borrowed that opinion with its allegations from the Salmanticenses (De Restit., ch. 6, n. 47); yet all these, if they are compared with their Authors, are found to be brought forward beside the point. Namely, with Leander they allege Suarez, Palaus, and Diana. But these hand down the same doctrine as Sanchez.

Thus Suarez (De Relig., tr. 7, bk. 8, ch. 15, nn. 15 and 16): "When the owner concedes only the use of fact..., if the use yields to the convenience of the religious himself, or is properly given to him, it is against poverty to accept that without permission, not so much because of the dispensation as because of the acceptance of the thing, because namely something estimable by price is accepted without permission, and thus it is an acceptance of proprietorship. But indeed if the use neither yields to the convenience of the religious, nor does he accept it for himself, but only that the thing be given to another, so that he himself is only the medium or instrument of transferring the thing from one to another, then in reality there is no sin against poverty, because he neither accepts anything nor expends anything in his own name.... Hence I gather that as often as an indeterminate use of fact is conceded..., it is not against poverty..., if only the dispensation to be made to others in the name of another is accepted, although the particular application is committed to the judgment of the religious...." See also the same bk. 8, ch. 5, n. 31, where he establishes that administration formally and per se is not repugnant to poverty, because it is only something of fact and not of proper right, since things thus administered are held not as one's own but as another's. Hence he concludes: "Therefore administration as such has nothing on account of which it is excluded by the vow of poverty; therefore it is not matter of poverty, but can be matter of obedience," etc.

But Palaus (Tract. 16, disp. 3, punct. 22, n. 4): "If not goods of the Convent ... but things accepted from seculars you hand over to blood relatives, ... a distinction must be made: if you accept them absolutely, you sin not only against poverty, but also against justice against Religion, into which those goods by your acceptance have been incorporated. But if you do not wish to accept them, but make manifest to the giver that in his name you will give them to your blood relatives, you do not seem to violate justice or poverty: not justice, since the handing over happens from the will of the owner; not poverty, because you neither give nor hand over anything to your blood relatives, but the secular person provides the donation through your medium.... This holds true even if the secular person has not designated to whom the money is to be conceded, but has left this to your judgment; because the choice of persons alone belongs to you, which is not against poverty."

And Diana (tom. 7, tr. 3, res. 23, n. 2): "Note also here in passing that a Religious does not sin against poverty if without the Superior's permission he accepts money so that he himself may freely dispose of it in alms in the name of him who gave it. And for this opinion above I cited Sanchez and Faustus, to whom I now add Petrus de Ledesma and Francis Suarez." But he gives this reason (ibid., res. 27, n. 2), "because the vow of poverty obliges a Religious not to accept dominion and proprietorship of any thing while the Superior is unaware: but in our case this Religious does not accept dominion of that money, but only accepts it in the name of another, namely of the one handing it over, so that he may give it to the poor. Therefore."

Cf. also Card. De Lugo (De Iust., disp. 3, n. 155), and Pellizzarius (Manual. Regul., tr. 4, ch. 2, n. 236).

The VV. attack this Note and the preceding one subjected to n. 157 through fourteen columns (pp. 372-378). Therefore two things must be shown here against their objections: 1° that rightly and deservedly it is affirmed in the Note that the allegations of the Salmanticenses and of others are brought forward by St. Alphonsus beside the point; 2° that nothing solid is advanced by the VV. against the doctrine of Suarez, Sanchez, Palaus, Diana, Lugo, etc.

And as to the first, these are the words of St. Alphonsus (bk. 4, n. 24): "But if something is accepted from outsiders to be furnished to others, still more (namely, for gravity of matter) is required; for then Garcia with Palaus, Leander, Diana, etc., apud the Salmanticenses (tr. 13, ch. 6, n. 47), assign for grave matter a value greater than 60 argentei." And the VV. (p. 375) not only acknowledge, but contend, that in this place there is question of a Religious who disburses money accepted from an outsider, by this person's mandate, to the poor.

But the Salmanticenses in the cited place do not treat this question, and therefore neither do the Authors brought forward by them there pertain to our question. Therefore all those allegations are brought forward beside the point apud the Holy Doctor.

The minor is proved: 1° from the words of the Salmanticenses (l.c., n. 47), from which the Holy Doctor took his opinion: "But if from outsiders," they say, "something is received for giving or SPENDING, a greater quantity is still required that it be mortal.... Garcia, citing Leander, Palaus, Diana, and others, assigns as matter things of value greater than 60 argentei." But that which is generally received for giving AND SPENDING does not pertain to alms to be disbursed by force of the mandate of someone. Compare also the title of that Punctum V. Therefore these things do not make to the matter.

2° The matter is more clearly plain from the third preliminary observation there (n. 44): "We note thirdly, from the opinion of all Doctors, that a greater quantity is required that donation and acceptance from goods accepted from seculars be mortal than from common goods; and still greater if the donation is made to Religious of the same Convent than to outsiders." But a donation of a Religious is not what a Religious distributes in the name and by the mandate of another. Therefore there the question is not about our case.

3° But this is most luminously plain when the Salmanticenses, in that same place (l.c., n. 47) from which St. Alphonsus took, render the reason why a greater quantity is required for the gravity of matter if the donation is made to Religious of the same Convent than to outsiders. For after they had said that Garcia, Leander, Palaus, etc., assign as grave matter things of value greater than 60 argentei, they immediately add: "If, however, things are donated to another Religious of the same Convent, Suarez deservedly asserts that a greater quantity is required for grave fault, SINCE THAT THING STILL REMAINS WITHIN THE MONASTERY." And again below: "BECAUSE THAT THING STILL REMAINS WITHIN THE DOMINION OF THE CONVENT." Therefore the Salmanticenses treat of a thing to be disbursed, indeed accepted from outsiders, but which has already yielded into the dominion of the Convent. But whatever a Religious receives from an outsider to be disbursed to the poor in the name and by the mandate of that person by no means passes into the dominion of the Convent. Therefore the Salmanticenses do not there dispute about our controversy.

4° Finally, this very thing shines out from the fact that the Salmanticenses, where they touch our question, find no fault in the Religious, and have the same opinion as Suarez, Sanchez, etc. Thus they say (tr. 13, ch. 6, n. 15): "A Religious would not sin against the vow if he does not wish to accept things offered by another, but manifests to the giver that he will give them to others in his name; because then he himself does not give, but another, using him as minister and instrument, is the one who uses the money and makes the donation, as Sanchez holds, bk. 7, ch. 19, n. 74; Suarez, tom. 3, De Relig., bk. 4, ch. 15, n. 16; Palaus, punct. 22, n. 4; Diana, part 1, tr. 6, res. 29, and part 3, tr. 2, res. 65." Therefore it is most manifest that the question which the Salmanticenses discuss in n. 47, from which St. Alphonsus took, is altogether another and very different one from the present, and therefore the authority both of the Salmanticenses and of the Doctors alleged by them there is invoked beside the point by the Holy Doctor.

Let us now come to the other head, namely to the arguments which the VV. bring against the doctrine of Suarez. Namely, the VV. concede that a Regular does not sin against the vow of poverty when someone committing alms to be distributed to a Religious at the same time determines the poor to whom those things are to be handed over; but that he sins if the free choice of the poor is permitted to the judgment of the Religious. They soon add that the text of the Salmanticenses just set down is to be understood of persons determined by the one committing. To this last thing it must be answered: 1° this is asserted gratis, and therefore it is also denied gratis; 2° this must be denied altogether. The reason is plain; because the Salmanticenses must be understood in that sense which the Doctors exhibit, to whom they themselves remit the matter. But Suarez, Sanchez, Palaus, and Diana, as their texts brought forward in the Note prove, exempt each case from fault, nor do the Salmanticenses place any distinction between case and case, which otherwise would have been necessary there. Therefore.

For the rest, the VV., to strengthen their thesis against Suarez, namely that there is sin against the vow of poverty if in the case the free choice of the poor is left to the judgment of the Religious, bring forward 1° from a letter of St. Alphonsus the authority of Azor, Rodriguez, and Lohner, of whom St. Alphonsus also alleges the first two in Hom. Apost. (bk. 15, n. 7); 2° an argument from a threefold reason. A few things, which will suffice, to each.

Therefore 1° from Azor the VV. object these things (p. 1, bk. 12, ch. 9, q. 1): "It is of certain law that a Religious of the second kind cannot have peculium; for even usufruct, use, or administration from which the Abbot cannot remove the Monk by his nod and judgment, is repugnant to the solemn vow of poverty. For a Religious can have nothing proper. But use, or usufruct, or administration which someone has at his pleasure, subject to the power and will of no other, is something proper." - Resp. These things do not make to the matter. For Azor had set down beforehand (ibid.) that that use is understood so that a Religious by his own judgment can use the fruits of those goods and establish concerning them by his own nod what he wishes. But he who in our case receives money to be disbursed to the poor cannot establish concerning it by his own nod what he wishes. Therefore those things do not make to the matter. On the contrary, concerning our case Azor says elsewhere (l.c., ch. 10, q. 10): "Either something is given to a Religious so that in the name of him who gives he may disburse it for certain uses; and then that is not acquired for the monastery, since he who gives does not transfer dominion of the thing, but distributes it through the Religious for certain uses; and in this way money is given to Religious to be restored or to be disbursed for the uses of the poor."

2° From Alphonsus Rodriguez they bring forward these words (p. 3, tr. 3, ch. 15, n. 3): "It is repugnant to the vow of poverty not only to make oneself owner and proprietor of any thing without permission of the Superior," and yet these things are repugnant even with the Superior's permission, which cannot be given by the Superior, "but also to usurp its use and free administration and dispensation." - Resp. These things again do not make to the matter. For Rodriguez judges this when another gives money in such a way that he attributes the free faculty of spending and distributing it as he pleases (sicche mi lasci in liberta di spenderlo e distribuirlo a mio arbitrio, e come mi parra); wherefore the Religious could even buy a little dog with that money. On the contrary, concerning our case Rodriguez had premised (ibid.) that there is no sin against the vow of poverty if someone gives me money so that in his name I may give it to someone, or restore it, or bestow it upon certain poor persons. Therefore the authority of Alphonsus Rodriguez is alleged less faithfully.

3° Finally, Lohner indeed in his Opus Concionatorium seems to go into the opinion of the VV.; but the reason which he adds, namely that use of a thing independent of the Superior does not belong to anyone bound by the vow of poverty, either leaves uncertain in what hypothesis he says money is accepted by a Religious, or is judged plainly false by the Doctors, who, to one objecting that use of a thing is repugnant to the vow of poverty, would respond by distinguishing thus: use of right, I concede; use of fact, I deny. See Sanchez (Dec., bk. 7, ch. 30, n. 4), Azor (p. 1, bk. 12, ch. 12, q. 4), Ferraris (word Votum, art. 2, n. 116). Well does Sanchez say (bk. 6, ch. 11, n. 52): This choice is something of fact rather than of right, as is established from law Cum pater, 77, § 4, ff. de Legatis 2. For the rest, this is no wonder in a homiletic work. Those things of St. Alphonsus (bk. 2, n. 54) also make to this: "When I discharged the office of preacher, I also often tried forcefully to denounce this pernicious practice; but since here I discharge the office of a writer about moral science, I MUST SAY WHAT I THINK ACCORDING TO THE TRUTH."

Now to the arguments of the VV. against Suarez. But it must be premised that this doctrine is not Suarez's alone; indeed it is common among those weightiest Authors who have touched this question. And indeed, that most Writers of moral discipline do not have even a word about this question, although otherwise they pursue at length any modes whatsoever by which the vow of poverty can be injured, makes it abundantly plain that they had not even suspected that those are held by guilt of this kind who have undertaken alms to be distributed in the name of another to poor persons either determinate or indeterminate.

1º Therefore the VV. object (p. 377) that in the case there is had an act by which the Religious, by his free will without the Superior's permission, disposes of temporal goods. - Resp. I distinguish: he disposes by his free will, because this is a human act, I concede; he disposes according to his judgment of temporal goods, I deny; because merely as messenger he executes the certain will of another.

2º The VV. object (ibid.) that the Religious to whom free choice of persons is committed can enrich his own blood relatives by choosing them; which is estimable by price. - Resp. I deny the whole; for the hypothesis is concerning one who faithfully executes the will of the donor. But if the will of the donor is that something, whether much or little, be attributed also to the blood relatives of the Religious, the very same thing always returns, that the Religious merely acts the parts of a messenger. Thus Laymann (bk. 4, tr. 5, ch. 7, n. 16) in that same place which the VV. object: "A Religious does not sin against the vow of poverty ... if he has himself as the messenger of another, as for instance if in the above-said case he accepts money from a rich man so that he may give it, not in his own name, but in the name of that rich man, to a blood relative or poor person.... And in this sense the opinion of Sanchez is true, that a Religious does not sin against the vow of poverty if without the Superior's permission he accepts money, the faculty of choosing the poor to whom he distributes it having been left to him."

3º The VV. object (ibid.) that the parity which Suarez establishes between this Religious and a steward limps; because he who gives the money to be distributed is not the master of the Religious. - Resp. I deny that the office of messenger or almoner changes its nature, whether the executor of the office is a servant or not a servant. If it pleases, let it be said that in these circumstances the Religious serves another.

And enough concerning these things. For even at first glance it ought to seem burdensome to dwell on this question, when on this side indeed stand the weightiest Authors Suarez, Sanchez, Lugo, Palaus, Pellizzarius, Diana, Laymann, Tamburini (Dec., bk. 8, ch. 3, § 5, n. 5), Azor (p. 1, bk. 12, ch. 10, q. 10), Croix (bk. 4, n. 112), and the Salmanticenses (tr. 13, ch. 6, n. 15); but on the other side scarcely any words of uncertain sense could be brought forward from an ascetical or homiletic work.

Generally, however, a Religious does not sin gravely by secretly accepting some thing from the Community, for example, a book for his own use even for a long time, but not in perpetuity, unless he hides it in such a way that it cannot be found by Superiors; because then the Prelate is not judged unwilling as to the substance, but only as to the mode. As to things accepted or handed over as loan for consumption or loan for use without permission of the Prelate, speaking generally he will not sin gravely against the vow of poverty if he gives things for his own use or even other things to outsiders as loan for consumption or loan for use, provided he is certain of recovering them and does not therefore bring grave harm upon the Community, which for this reason, for example, lacks the use of a thing gravely necessary here and now. Much less gravely will he sin if he lends for consumption or use to other Religious of the same monastery things conceded for his own use. The reason is that although in these things he makes some act of proprietorship, nevertheless he does not sin gravely, according to the common interpretation of Theologians. - St. Ligorius, n. 27. - Laymann. - Sanchez, etc.

161. Resolutions. - 1º A Religious sins against the vow of poverty if without the consent of the Superior he accepts, retains, consumes, exchanges, gives to another, or lends for use anything at home or outside, even from those things which pertain to food or clothing. Likewise if without permission of the Superior he accepts money or other things as loan for consumption or for use from outsiders.

2º He sins against the vow of poverty also who spends things obtained for some use on another use, or culpably loses or destroys them.

3º He sins against the vow who eats or drinks apud outsiders without the faculty of the Prelate; because while he accepts something without permission, he posits an act of proprietorship. Nevertheless generally he does not seem by this to sin mortally [10]. - Lacroix, n. 105. - Suarez. - Sanchez, etc.

[10]  Indeed permission can be presumed without difficulty; and otherwise the Superior could perhaps be judged unwilling not so much by reason of the thing accepted by the subject as from another cause.

4º If a Religious accepts from outsiders a thing to be handed over to the Superior, he can very easily suppose presumed permission. But if he cannot suppose it, he seems to sin against poverty; nevertheless generally that sin will not exceed venial sin. - Lacroix, n. 118, etc.

5º He sins against the vow of poverty who keeps a thing accepted with permission for use beyond the limits of time fixed by the Superior; who applies it to another use with detriment of the same; who keeps a thing with the soul of an owner, namely with the intention of subtracting it from the free disposition of the Superior, for example, if he hides it lest it be seen; and indeed this one cannot be excused from this, that he had obtained permission previously.

6º He sins against the vow of poverty who without faculty of the Superior buys something even for the Community, because he acts as proprietor. Sometimes, however, he can presume permission, namely when he knows that this will be pleasing to the Superior and easy recourse to him is not open, for example, on a journey. But permission of this sort can more easily be presumed in matters of lesser moment.

7º A Religious making a journey cannot turn aside to other places outside the straight way to see curious things, unless perhaps the distance is brief and no expenses or very modest expenses must be made; but in a particular case, if a grave cause underlies, the permission of the Superior can deservedly be presumed. Otherwise he will sin both against poverty and also against obedience.

8º A Religious can accept no deposit properly so called without permission. The reason is 1º because according to the opinion of several he would make an act of proprietorship; 2º because a deposit is a contract; but a Religious without the faculty of the Superior can enter no contract concerning temporal things [11].

[11]  Concerning this matter Pellizzarius says (Manual. Regul., tr. 4, ch. 2, n. 232): "You will ask: Are religious prohibited by the vow of poverty from receiving money of outsiders in deposit without the permission of the Prelate? Resp., they are not prohibited if they receive it with the intention of returning it as often as the owner wishes; although this can be against obedience and religious decency if it is done secretly. Thus Diana from Suarez, Sanchez, and Faustus." And Laymann (bk. 4, tr. 5, ch. 7, n. 4): "To accept things in deposit, so that the depositor retains every right of dominion and possession and administration, is not repugnant to the vow of poverty; although in such a mode, for example, monies have been deposited apud a Religious so that he can use them after permission of the Superior has been sought and obtained; nevertheless such things are against the perfection of poverty, and for the most part against the prescription of the Rule." Lugo has the same things (De Iust., disp. 33, n. 6), who moreover (disp. 3, n. 219) warns that the Convent is not held to repair the damage when some thing deposited by an outsider apud a Religious was lost by his fault or taken away by thieves. Indeed not even if he accepted that deposit with permission of the Prelate, because the offense of a subject does not harm the Convent.

162. ○ 9º All gifts which are made to Religious solemnly professed are by that very fact acquired for the Monastery, not excepting legacies and inheritances, from the most known principle of Canon Law: "Whatever a Monk acquires, he acquires not for himself, but for the Monastery." This principle has force also as to other Religious within the limits of the vow of poverty, which does not take away from them the faculty of acquiring and possessing. Hence these are able to accept and acquire legacies and inheritances, although they cannot dispose of them without permission. As to the remaining donations, they come to the Monastery unless they are made specially in view of a private person and not insofar as Religious [12]. But then the Religious cannot accept without at least presumed permission, or under the condition of obtaining permission.

[12]  The Author says this concerning Religious not solemnly professed. For donations, even if they are made as to private persons, if they are made to solemnly professed persons, come to the monastery.

10º Manual works, whatever they are, which are made by Religious, pertain to the Community. Therefore private persons, although artisans, cannot dispose of them, nor can they receive any emolument from them [13]. The same must be said about honoraria which are attributed to Regulars for Masses or other spiritual ministries.

[13]  Yet sometimes Superiors are accustomed to indulge that the subject receive emolument from the wage of his labors and industry, and apply monies to his own uses. In this surely one must beware lest the devil, as not infrequent experience teaches, draw the unwary monk back from Religion to the world by these, as it were, nets or little cords.

11º Religious sin against the vow of poverty who do not apply equal care lest things conceded for their own use become worse. Say the same about those who, because of negligence, allow things committed to them by office to perish or suffer detriment.

163. ○ 12º It is not against the vow of poverty to accept something under the condition of obtaining permission, or even to give, provided the thing can be recovered if permission is denied, because the act is in reality suspended. - Lacroix, n. 108. - Lugo, etc.

13º For accepting licitly, or for making expenses, presumed permission suffices when the Superior cannot be approached and the occasion urges. But a thing accepted from presumed permission ought afterwards to be manifested to the Superior when he can be met, and the thing has not already been consumed. - Suarez. - Lacroix, nn. 109-114.

14º A fortiori tacit permission suffices for giving or accepting; indeed it has force even if the Superior can be approached, because tacit permission is judged to exist de facto: for example, because it is contained virtually in another permission, or is prudently gathered from circumstances, while presumed permission is not supposed to exist de facto, but only to be going to exist if it were sought. - Lacroix, n. 109. - Suarez, etc.

15º If a preceding Superior has given you permission of having some thing, it still has force even if he has departed from office. - Lugo. - Lacroix, n. 145.

16º If you have permission of giving something to Paul, and you give to Peter, you do not sin, unless the Superior gave permission for Paul because of a peculiar reason and would have denied it if you had sought this permission for Peter. - Lacroix, n. 119. - Pellizzarius, etc.

17º If Titius the Religious has permission of giving something to anyone whatsoever, Caius of the same Community by that very fact has the faculty of accepting, because to give and to accept are correlatives, and therefore permission for one is judged also to be for the other. - Sanchez. - Pellizzarius, etc.

These things concerning religious poverty in general. But one must attend to the particular constitutions of individual Orders, or to custom tolerated by Superiors; for in several Monasteries generally it is permitted to Religious to ask, accept, or procure for themselves several things necessary for food, clothing, books, and other things of this kind.

Article II. On the Vow of Chastity

164. ○ The vow of chastity must be judged much more excellent than the vow of poverty, since through it the Religious renounces not goods extrinsic to himself, but intrinsic ones, namely pleasures of the body and senses.

Its object comprehends two things, namely those which are already prohibited by natural and divine law, and also those which could licitly be done in legitimate matrimony. Therefore this is the efficacy of the vow of chastity, that what otherwise could be licit becomes illicit for a Religious; but those things which are prohibited to all, he himself ought to avoid from a double obligation, namely of chastity and Religion.

The simple vow of chastity constitutes only an impeding impediment of matrimony, and therefore makes matrimony illicit, but not invalid. But the solemn vow also diriments a subsequent marriage.

165. Questions. - QUESTION 1°. Are sins of luxury, even merely internal ones, opposed to the vow of chastity?

Resp. Affirmative. The reason is that a Religious by force of the vow of chastity is held to abstain from every voluntary venereal delectation, whether internal or external, so that if he injures chastity, he incurs a double guilt, namely of luxury and sacrilege. - St. Ligorius, n. 33.

According to some, the vow of chastity is violated only by external sins of luxury; because, they say, the Religious devotes to God only 1° external goods, of which he despoils himself by the vow of poverty; 2° the body, whose pleasures he renounces by the vow of chastity; 3° the soul, or mind and will, which he hands over to the Superior to be moderated by the vow of obedience. But the most common and true doctrine is that the vow of chastity is violated, and indeed gravely, even by merely internal sins; because the one vowing simply promises to God that he will abstain from every delectation without any distinction.

166. ○ QUESTION 2°. What is the gravity of sins committed against the vow of chastity?

Resp. This general rule must be established: the gravity of sin against the vow is exactly the same as against the sixth and ninth precepts of the Decalogue, namely the sin is mortal or venial against Religion according as it is mortal or venial against chastity. But smallness of matter is not to be admitted in sins of luxury sought or admitted, nor can the fault be light except from imperfect consent, according to the things said in tom. 1, n. 412.

167. ○ QUESTION 3°. Whether or what difference is there between the virtue and the vow of chastity?

Resp. 1º No difference is given by reason of the object, since the vow extends as broadly as the virtue itself. Nevertheless they differ in this, that in those things which are prohibited by the virtue, two sins are given if the vow is violated, while one sin is committed in that which is interdicted by the vow alone. For if someone bound by a simple vow of Religion were to contract matrimony, he would perpetrate one sin, namely against Religion, in the use of marriage [1]. Therefore sometimes the vow can be violated without the virtue itself being injured.

[1]  Say the same if, with the consent of the wife, the husband has received sacred Orders or has emitted solemn vows in a Religious Order. For if afterwards they were to use matrimony, they would bind themselves by the crime of sacrilege, yet they would not sin against the virtue of chastity.

Resp. 2º The virtue of chastity, besides the obligations which it imposes, also counsels mere counsels leading to greater perfection; while the vow affects only the matter of obligation.

But for the greater custody of chastity enclosure was introduced, by force of which Nuns cannot go out from the Monastery except with permission of the Pontiff or Bishop, which can be given only in extraordinary cases; but Religious cannot be absent from the house without the permission of the Prelate. Thus from the Constitution of Clement VIII, Nullus, etc. - Hence:

QUESTION 4º. What kind of sin is it to go out from the Monastery without permission?

Resp. 1º For Nuns dwelling within enclosure it will always be grave, since the Church prohibits it under a most grave penalty, namely of excommunication.

Resp. 2º For Religious it will be grave if it is done more often with scandal, or secretly at night; but only venial if someone goes out once or twice, or only sometimes during the day. - More things concerning enclosure and the penalties inflicted upon violators of it in the Treatise on Censures.

Article III. On the Vow of Obedience

The vow of obedience is the most excellent of all the vows of Religion, since through it the Religious offers [1] and consecrates wholly to God the goods most intrinsic and most excellent to himself, namely the will and the intellect itself. Hence it is said, 1 Kings 15:22: "Obedience is better than victims." And Prov. 21:28: "An obedient man will speak victory."

[1]  Nevertheless note the things which the Author shortly after adds, n. following, that the matter of the vow does not extend itself to the internal faculties, but to the external execution alone of the command.

168. Principles. - I. A Religious from the vow of obedience is held to all things which the Superior commands according to the rules and constitutions of the Order, either directly and expressly, or indirectly and implicitly. - St. Ligorius, n. 58. Nevertheless, that there be sin against the vow, it is required that the Superior truly command, and not only counsel; which indeed will be plain from the words, the manner of speaking, and the various circumstances of things.

II. The Superior has the right of commanding not only those things which are had explicitly in the rule or constitutions, such as abstinence, silence, etc., but also whatever things are implicitly contained in them, such as penalties against transgressors, and whatever pertains to the offices of the Community duly to be performed, or to its right administration. The reason is that a Religious binding himself to observing the special constitutions of the Order [2], obliges himself to all those things which have been wisely established or are prescribed for attaining this end.

[2]  This is not to be taken as if by vow a Religious binds himself to observing the Constitutions of the Order.

III. A Religious by force of his vow is not held to obey a Superior commanding a thing impossible, or evidently illicit, or gravely harmful to himself. - St. Ligorius, n. 47, etc. And surely he could not oblige himself to an impossible thing, since no one is held to the impossible; nor to a thing certainly illicit, since a vow cannot be a bond of iniquity; nor finally to a thing gravely harmful to himself, because this is alien to the mind of Religion, and heroic acts do not commonly and implicitly fall under the vow, just as they do not fall under a precept. Except, however, if there is question of offices to be fulfilled within the limits of religious life, for example, of caring for pestilent Religious, etc.

Hence a subject is not held to obey a Prelate ordering him to walk upon waters, etc.; but if examples are reported by which it is established that such obedience was approved by God and confirmed by miracles, it must be said that then the divine good pleasure by a singular and heavenly light was manifested both to the one commanding and to the one obeying.

169. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. What difference intervenes between the virtue and the vow of obedience?

Resp. The same as was indicated above, n. 155, concerning poverty; namely, the object of the vow is the external execution of the command of the Superior, while the virtue reaches even to internal submission and effects perfect obedience itself.

But by a Religious there are diligently to be avoided not only sins against the vow, but also sins against the virtue, which indeed is more frequently accustomed to be injured. For it happens, would that it were more rarely, that a subject obeys the command of the Prelate integrally indeed by external action, but with a reluctant, sad, and sick will. Then, although he satisfies the vow, nevertheless he recedes far from the virtue [3].

[3]  One must inspect what sort of affection is repugnant to obedience. For if it is natural and also consonant with a nature well instituted, and nevertheless does not retard or diminish the affection of obeying, it takes nothing away from the perfection of obedience, as the example of Christ the Lord suggests. But if the repugnance is from the inordination of nature or custom, then either, notwithstanding the contrary impulse, the man promptly obeys, and thus nothing is taken away from the perfection of virtue; indeed, because of the difficulty overcome, the act will seem in some way more perfect. But if the repugnance retards or diminishes the affection of the will otherwise executing the commands, then obedience indeed will be imperfect, insofar as the contrary affections are voluntary; but the account of fault will be taken not indeed from the imperfection of obedience, as if the grade of perfection in the will obeying fell under precept, but from the inordination of affection toward other things, by which it happens that one sins in another kind of virtue. Cf. Suarez (De Relig., tr. 10, bk. 4, ch. 15, n. 19).

Therefore a Religious disobedient to a Superior truly commanding commits a double sin, the one against the natural precept, which prescribes submission to a legitimate superior, and the other against the vow. Hence in pious congregations of men or women leading life in common under the same Rule without the bond of vows, the disobedient are not exempt from sin if they are rebellious against superiors, but they commit one sin.

170. ○ QUESTION 2º. How does the solemn vow of obedience differ from the simple vow?

Resp. 1º Dispensation can much more easily be obtained from a simple vow than from a solemn vow, which can be dissolved only by the Pope and from a most grave cause.

Resp. 2º A simple vow indeed renders illicit an obligation which is contracted by a subject without the consent of the Superior, yet it does not per se make it invalid, unless perhaps the Superior by force of power over the will of the subject wishes to irritate such an obligation. But the solemn vow so binds the will of the subject to the authority of the Superior by an absolute, perpetual, and irrevocable oblation that the Religious can validly contract no further obligation, neither natural nor civil [4].

[4]  Understand this as to those things which are subject to the power of the Superior. For if the subject, for example, promises someone a secret, or a secret is committed to him, he certainly contracts an obligation concerning which there is no authority for the Superior. But as to those things which can be matter of obedience, the subject can indeed contract an obligation, for example, of celebrating Mass according to the intention of another, yet conditioned, namely unless the Superior disposes otherwise.

QUESTION 3º. Is a Religious held to obey in doubt whether the thing prescribed is licit or not?

Resp. Affirmative, because then presumption favors the Superior. Moreover the opposite opinion would disturb order in Religious families. - St. Ligorius, n. 47, and others commonly.

171. ○ QUESTION 4º. When does a Religious sin gravely against the vow of obedience?

Resp. He sins gravely in the following cases, which rarely occur, namely: 1º when he refuses to obey in grave matter a Superior commanding in virtue of holy obedience, or in the name of Jesus Christ, or by other similar formulas, which are very rarely to be used by Superiors; 2º when he responds to the Superior commanding: "I do not wish to obey, I do not wish to do it, I will not do it," or something similar which smacks of formal contempt of the authority of the one commanding [5]; 3º when from disobedience there follows grave scandal of others, whether of subjects or seculars, or grave inconvenience either for the Community or for others, for example, for the salvation of souls, etc.

[5]  This has force even if the matter of the precept, viewed in itself, is not grave.

In other cases disobedience does not exceed venial sin; but since the aforesaid cases of mortal sin rarely occur, commonly the sins of Religious against obedience must be regarded as venial. - Much more rarely still will sins committed against the virtue alone become mortal.

172. ○ QUESTION 5º. To whom must obedience be given?

Resp. Obedience must be given not only to major Superiors, but also to inferiors, or ministers, or those placed over others who command from the mandate of superiors, since the authority which enjoins the command is the same [6].

[6]  These things are to be understood of the virtue of obedience; for a precept which constrains the subject by obligation of vow is usually reserved to the Superiors alone of the whole Convent or house, unless the special Constitutions of some Order dispose otherwise.

QUESTION 6º. How must obedience be given?

Resp. That the full perfection of obedience may stand, one must obey 1º from a supernatural motive, as the Apostle prescribes, Coloss. 3:22: "Not serving to the eye, as pleasing men.... Serve the Lord Christ." For otherwise obedience, even if it were immune from sin, would nevertheless lack all merit and would be merely material [7]. - 2º Cheerfully, or with joy and a willing soul; for God loves a cheerful giver, 2 Cor. 9:7. - 3º Promptly, that is, either immediately or at the prescribed time, and with due care, without sluggishness. - 4º Entirely, or by completing the whole prescribed work.

[7]  That one obey the Superior as Christ the Lord is not required for the formal account of the virtue of obedience (see Suarez, De Relig., tr. 10, bk. 4, ch. 14, nn. 2-3); nor again is it required for the account of merit that someone act from a supernatural motive, as has been shown elsewhere (see tom. 1, n. 32, qq. 6, 7, 8).

Chapter IV. On the Privileges of Regulars

173. ○ The privileges by which Religious rejoice are chiefly concerned with exemption from the jurisdiction of Bishops, the sacrament of Penance, reserved cases and censures, irregularities, certain vows and bonds, Mass and Communion, and some other things. - See St. Ligorius, bk. 1, at the end, Appendix 2, on Privileges; and in Hom. apost., tr. 20, ch. 4.

I. Concerning Exemption from Episcopal Jurisdiction

1º Regulars generally enjoy the privilege of exemption from the jurisdiction of Bishops, because regular Prelates in their monasteries and churches have jurisdiction quasi-episcopal [1].

[1]  These things do not render the reason, nor do they assign the cause of exemption, but merely express its effect. The cause is the will of the supreme Legislator, namely of the Roman Pontiff, who judged it to be for the ecclesiastical matter to have several persons immediately subject to himself, and therefore exempt from the jurisdiction of Ordinaries.

2º Therefore they are exempt from the visitation of the Bishop both as to persons and as to Monasteries and Churches. Except 1º Monasteries of Nuns not subject to Regulars, and also those subject to them as to the custody of enclosure, for taking care of which Bishops watch as delegates of the Apostolic See; 2º Churches of seculars whose Pastor is a Religious; 3º Churches of Regulars if they are parishes, yet only as to those things which regard the parish and the Pastor insofar as he discharges that office [2].

[2]  The rights of Bishops, as regards the visitation of Parochial Churches belonging to monasteries of Regulars, you have defined by the Constitution Firmandis of Benedict XIV, 6 Nov. 1744.

3º The privilege of exemption is enjoyed not only by the Professed and Conversi, but by Novices and tertiaries who dwell within the cloisters. Likewise, as to censures and sacraments, servants of Regulars who actually serve, and, as if of the family and perpetual table companions, reside within the cloisters of the Monasteries [3], no otherwise than the Conversi themselves. - Trent, sess. 24, ch. 11. - See St. Ligorius, bk. 1, at the end, Appendix on Privileges, n. 75.

[3]  Hence the true reason must be sought why these servants of Regulars, as St. Alphonsus also notes, bk. 6, n. 583, are not subject to episcopal reservations of sins or censures: namely, because they are exempt from the jurisdiction of the Bishop. And indeed by force of this principle, the solution becomes easy of a certain case which could seem very complex to some. Suppose, for instance, that some servant of this sort falls into a sin which the Bishop has reserved, and wishes to confess his sins to a secular Confessor, not however having faculty for reserved cases. I ask: will this confessor be able to absolve him? For if you deny it, how will you say with St. Alphonsus (l.c.) that he is not subject to episcopal reservation? But if you affirm it, how does the Confessor absolve from a sin over which he does not have jurisdiction? Perhaps finally will you say that reservation, which is a restriction of jurisdiction, affects not Confessors but penitents? Therefore solve the knot from this, that these servants are in the same condition as Religious as to this, whom they serve. Now just as a religious, when by faculty of his prelate he confesses to a secular priest or to one of another Order, is absolved by force of the jurisdiction which the Prelate indirectly communicates to the priest whom the subject has chosen for this, so also these servants, who likewise are subject to the jurisdiction of the Prelate. And since the regular Prelate does not restrict the jurisdiction indirectly communicated by himself as to that sin which the Bishop has reserved, the reason is manifest why the jurisdiction of the secular priest in absolving either a religious or a servant of religious is not restricted.

But this very thing plainly happens when someone confesses in a diocese not his own and brings a sin reserved in that diocese indeed, but not in the proper diocese of the penitent. For since both from the nature of the thing and from the common opinion of the Doctors, absolution is then conferred by force of jurisdiction indirectly communicated to that confessor by the Ordinary of the penitent, and since this Ordinary, as the hypothesis states, has not reserved a sin of this sort and therefore has not restricted jurisdiction as to it, the manifest reason is clear why in the case the Confessor can validly and licitly absolve him from the sin in whatever way reserved there, unless he came there in fraud of reservation, as will be said in its place.

II. Concerning the Sacrament of Penance

174. ○ 1º Regular Priests, by faculty of their Superior, can absolve Religious of the same Order without any approval of the Bishop of the place. Thus from the privileges conceded to them by law. - St. Ligorius, n. 140. Nevertheless Congregations which are not Religions properly so called are by no means comprehended by this privilege [4].

[4]  Sometimes, however, even these Congregations enjoy the same privilege, namely from a special indulgence of the Roman Pontiff.

2º Regulars living in a Convent ought to confess to Priests of the Order designated by the Superior, nor can they be validly absolved by any others either inside or outside the house without permission of the Superior [5]. Thus from the privilege conceded to Religion.

[5]  This permission of the Superior imports an indirect communication of jurisdiction, which is made to the priest to whom the subject will confess. But why a Religious cannot be validly absolved by any others whatsoever, besides the designated confessors, whether within or outside the Order, the reason is easily plain: namely, because all others lack jurisdiction for absolving him.

3º Yet it is customary to concede that during the time of Jubilee Regulars, even Nuns, can confess to any approved Priest without permission of the Superior. - St. Ligorius, n. 410 [6].

[6]  The clauses of the Constitution granting the jubilee must be diligently inspected. For several times the Apostolic See has elsewhere declared either that universally Religious, or at least certain ones of them by force of a singular disposition or privilege, are not comprehended by these concessions.

4º Regulars on a journey, if they have a suitable companion of the same Order, ought to confess to him. But if a suitable companion is lacking, they can confess to any Priest at least approved, whether regular or secular.

But can Regulars, when a suitable companion is lacking, confess to any Priest, even not approved, provided he is suitable? Some deny this, especially relying on the decision of the Sacred Congregation of the Council to the postulate of the Bishop of Hildesheim. But more probably one must affirm with St. Ligorius, Appendix on Privileges, n. 3, with the common opinion [7].

[7]  This common opinion of the Doctors rests on the Decree of Trent (sess. 23, ch. 15, De Reform.), which is of this sort: "The Holy Synod decrees that no one, even a Regular, can hear confessions of seculars, even of priests, nor be reputed suitable for this, unless he either has a parochial benefice, or by examination by the Bishops, if it seems necessary to them, or otherwise is judged suitable, obtains approval...." Therefore it expressly requires the necessity of approval only for receiving confessions of seculars. Therefore Regulars are not comprehended by this Decree, and thus remain under the old law. But that Capuchin Fathers can confess only to approved priests was specially established by Benedict XIV. For the rest, since Pontifical Constitutions grant Regulars the faculty that, if a companion from their own Order is lacking, they can be absolved by another Priest, whether Regular or secular, by that very fact jurisdiction is conferred on this priest who is chosen by the penitent.

But the Resolution of the Sacred Congregation to the Postulate of the Bishop of Hildesheim does not stand in the way, because there was question of Religious who, although they had at hand companions of their own Order, nevertheless wished to confess to any Priest, as by law is conceded to them on a journey when a suitable companion is lacking [8].

[8]  From the Acts of the Sacred Congregation (Thesaur. Resol. S. Congr. Conc., tom. 38, p. 111) it is established that the question proposed was concerning Regulars who, coming to the city several times per year and staying there for some days, were accustomed there to choose for themselves a secular presbyter not approved by the Bishop, although in the same city there were not lacking those who, from the proper family of each Order, could receive their Confessions, and of whom they could easily have supply (ibid., p. 113). Now, as is also noted in the Acts, the faculty conceded to Regulars, that while they were traveling or were outside their convents they could confess to any priests whatsoever, had this condition added (ibid., p. 116): "if they cannot have some suitable presbyter from the Professed of the Order," or if they cannot have a supply of priests because they do not have their own confessor. Therefore that the Sacred Congregation responded, not indeed to the general question, but to that special case on 18 Nov. 1769, that those confessions were not valid, pertains nothing to the controversy which the Author touches in this place.

III. Concerning Reserved Cases

175. ○ 1° As to subjects. They can absolve them 1° from all papal cases and censures, unless the Pontiff excepts certain ones, although reserved to the Bishop, such as the light striking of a Cleric; 2° from all papal cases in the same mode as Bishops can absolve their own diocesans; 3° from excommunication on account of striking even gravely and publicly inflicted on Clerics [9].

[9]  St. Alphonsus (bk. 7, n. 107) notes that by common law a Regular can be absolved by his Prelate, 1° if he has struck a companion of the same Order, unless the striking is enormous, or a hand has been laid on a Bishop or Abbot; 2° if he has struck a religious of another Order, provided also the sentence of the Prelate to whom the one struck is subject is applied; 3° that he cannot be absolved by his Prelate if he has struck a secular cleric, but that the Apostolic See must be approached for absolution, although he can be absolved by the Bishop if the striking was light. All these things are extended to a Novice who has bound himself by these crimes.

But St. Alphonsus adds with the common opinion that these things must be understood according to common law. For, he says, with privileges considered, Religious can indeed be absolved by their Prelates, even if the striking was enormous ... and this has force even if a Religious struck another of another Order, or a secular cleric, and even if the striking was public. But as to these privileges, St. Alphonsus remits the reader to some writers, among whom Palaus (De Censur., disp. 3, punct. 23, § 4, n. 10) alleges the Compendium of Privileges of the Society of Jesus, word Absolutio, where these things are had (n. 10): "If any live under the obedience and correction of the Society, they can be absolved by the Provost General and by others whom he deputes, from all sins committed before or after entrance into the Society, and from all censures and penalties inflicted by law or by man, except from these four which are contained in the Bull of Sixtus IV, namely relapse into heresy, schism, falsification of apostolic letters, and carrying of prohibited things to infidels. It is had by the Bull for the Preachers, given on the day before the Kalends of September 1474 under Pontiff Sixtus IV, beginning Regimini universalis..., and of the same Pontiff Sixtus IV for the Carmelites, 4 Kal. Dec. 1476, beginning Dum attenta..., and of Julius II for the same Preachers, 27 Feb. 1510, beginning Exponi Nobis..., where among the above excepted cases he adds conspiracy against the Roman Pontiff; but as to the remaining cases besides these five, he declared that the publication of the Bull Coenae and the derogations contained in it do not stand in the way."

For the rest, as to absolving religious subjects from cases of the Bull Coenae, there must not be passed over what Lucius Ferraris notes after others (word Absolutio, art. I, n. 37, and word Praelatus Regularis, n. 20), namely that the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, a word having been made with His Holiness Clement VIII, absolutely decreed that all Bulls and decrees derogatory of the privileges of Regulars, as to the faculty of absolving from cases reserved to the Pope, are to be understood only in order to seculars, but not in order to their own Regular subjects. But as to what he intimates (word Praelatus Regularis, n. 31), that certain authors assert that the Sacred Congregation declared that Regular Prelates cannot absolve from hidden heresy, he himself (ibid., nn. 25-29) openly shows that that Declaration of 19 Nov. 1628, which Mendo boasts of so much (Stater., disp. 1, q. 4, n. 56), and after him Dominicus Viva (on prop. 4 of Alexander VII, n. 2), pertains nothing here. See also those things which the same Ferraris has under word Absolutio, art. 1, from n. 29.

2º As to seculars. 1º They could absolve them, supposing the Bishop's approval for hearing confessions, from papal cases, excepting those which are contained in the Bull Coenae and five others, which are customarily called Clementine; 2º more probably they could absolve from cases reserved to the Bishop in law or from custom and which the Bishop himself did not reserve to himself. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

But these general faculties have been taken away by more recent law through the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, 15 Oct. 1869, in which, as to the faculty of absolving from cases reserved to the Apostolic See, these things are read: "But whatever privileges or faculties, whether by Our Predecessors or even by Us, have ever been conceded up to this time to any company, Order, Congregation, Society, Institute, even Regular of whatever species, even endowed with a peculiar title and even worthy of special mention, all these and every one of them We will by this Our Constitution to be revoked, suppressed, and abolished, as in fact We revoke, suppress, and abolish them," etc. Therefore both the things which Gury had written in this place, and the things which older Authors of many centuries have concerning this matter, pertain merely to the history of the past time [10].

[10]  Note nevertheless the Declaration which in the Instruction of the Holy Office of the Supreme Inquisition, given 1 Feb. 1871 to the questions of a certain Ordinary, is read thus: "By the Constitution (Apostolicae Sedis) the Most Holy Father by no means intends, not even in the least, to bring detriment to faculties of whatever kind which had been conceded by the Holy See before the promulgation of the same Constitution, whether these are quinquennial, or extraordinary, or regard the present Jubilee," namely that proclaimed on the occasion of the Ecumenical Vatican Council, "and he wills that they remain in their full vigor for the time prefixed in the said Constitutions or Indults enduring." These last words sufficiently indicate that temporary faculties, even those conceded to some company, or Order, or Institute, are not comprehended in the abrogation. Likewise, since in the cited words of the Constitution the abrogation is referred only to privileges or concessions attributed to a company, Order, Society, Institute, or Congregation, it is openly gathered that faculties which are personal remain in their force, namely those which had been conceded to some singular person.

But if from a concession of this sort there are some who have the faculty in papal cases, the question now returns whether they can absolve from cases reserved to the Bishop by law or custom, and which the Bishop himself has also reserved to himself anew. Now that those who enjoy the aforesaid faculty cannot absolve from papal cases which by law become episcopal, when perhaps Bishops in their edicts have also specially reserved those to themselves, St. Alphonsus (bk. 3, n. 397, and bk. 7, n. 99) seems to have taken from Viva (on prop. XII of Alexander VII, n. 13), although for it he alleges Cabassutius and Elbel. But others perhaps will in some way deny the supposition, namely that a Bishop can reserve to himself a sin, or cause, which the Supreme Pontiff has reserved to himself. For the reservation of a Superior so withdraws that cause from the power of the inferior prelate that the latter cannot even absolve from that sin, or certainly cannot absolve except by a power delegated to him and from mere permission of the Superior. But it seems absurd that he who does not even have the faculty of absolving from some sin nevertheless reserves it to himself, and indeed reserves it in such a way that not even those who received the faculty of absolving from the reserving Superior can absolve from it.

Suarez excellently treats this question (De Poenit., disp. 31, sect. 4, n. 26), writing these things among others: "By this very fact that the Supreme or higher Pastor reserves a sin to himself, he extracts it from the jurisdiction of all inferiors. Therefore inferiors have nothing which they can reserve to themselves. But if this is so, it rightly follows that, through the faculty of the same supreme Pastor, which is also communicated to the Mendicants, the reservation is sufficiently removed, because a Superior can concede jurisdiction even if the inferior is unwilling; and this is true not only from use, but also from the rigor of law."

Nor otherwise does Card. De Lugo speak (De Poenit., disp. 20, n. 151), who moreover recalls that this is positively interdicted to Bishops. Finally I add, he says, that what has been said, namely that a Bishop cannot VALIDLY reserve to himself a sin which the Supreme Pontiff had already reserved to himself, which is the same concerning any inferior Prelate with respect to a superior Prelate, has place also when the Bishop or inferior Prelate had first reserved some sin to himself. For if afterwards the Pope or superior Prelate reserves that same sin to himself, by that very fact the reservation of the Bishop or inferior Prelate ceases, because then also through the reservation of the Pope there is taken away from the Bishop the faculty of absolving from that sin; and therefore he cannot reserve it to himself anew, nor continue the reservation previously made.... Finally the Sacred Congregation of Cardinals by mandate of Clement VIII, in its decree edited in the year 1602 concerning reserved cases, prohibited that for the rest Bishops reserve to themselves cases accustomed to be read in the Bull Coenae, or others specially reserved to the Apostolic See.

IV. Concerning Irregularities and Impediments

1º With their own they can dispense 1º in all hidden irregularities from offense, with voluntary homicide excepted, as Bishops with diocesans; 2º in irregularities as to defect of soul on account of insanity, if its danger has ceased; as to defect of body, for example, as to defect of birth, which irregularity of itself ceases through religious profession, as to bigamy even true, and public defect of mildness.

2º With seculars. 1º They can dispense in all hidden irregularities from offense, as a Bishop; 2º they can dispense and commute vows and oaths, as a Bishop, but only in the internal forum; 3º they can dispense with spouses in the impediment of exacting the debt because of incest committed with a blood relative of the other spouse. - St. Ligorius, n. 109. - Moreover Religious can dispense in a vow of chastity with spouses in order to the use of matrimony, whether the vow was emitted before or after marriage had been entered.

V. Concerning Mass, Communion, and the Last Sacraments

176. ○ 1º Regulars can celebrate Mass one hour before dawn, that is, three hours before sunrise, but only in their own Churches, in which secular Priests also can do this from the same privilege, Gregory XIII; but after midday only one hour. For although from the privilege conceded by Eugene IV they formerly could celebrate even three hours after midday had elapsed, yet that privilege was revoked by St. Pius V.

2º They can administer the Eucharist in their Churches to all the faithful, except on the day of Easter [11].

[11]  At Rome Thursday in the Lord's Supper is also excepted.

3º They can administer paschal Communion, Extreme Unction, and Viaticum to their subjects, novices, and familiars [12]. - St. Ligorius, nn. 121, 122. - Nevertheless secular Congregations, excluding a special Apostolic Indult, such as for example was recently conceded to the Sulpicians, Marists, and Oratorians.

[12]  Understand familiars here as those who are perpetual table companions and live within the cloister. And hence the reason why Regulars can administer to them the sacraments about which there is speech. For as was said above, n. 173, by law these are exempt from the jurisdiction of the Bishop, and therefore of the pastor.

VI. Concerning Particular Cases

1º They can dispense, with cause, in ecclesiastical laws for their own subjects, as Bishops can, for example concerning the divine Office, fasting, abstinence, etc.; because they have quasi-episcopal jurisdiction.

2º Regular Superiors can permit subjects who are simply tonsured to preach in Churches (Gregory XIII).

3º Mendicant religious generally communicate among themselves [13] in their privileges, both as to persons and as to places. But they do not communicate them when they are wholly special, or odious, or contrary to their own state, so that they prejudice the common good or the observance of Religion.

[13]  Indeed Mendicants also participate in the privileges of Orders that are not Mendicant.

But it must be carefully observed that these privileges conceded to Religious families by Canon Law, or by the Holy See, belong only to Superiors, who communicate them to subjects according to their wisdom; and furthermore that the same are not extended to Orders not strictly religious, which are called secular Congregations [14].

[14]  Understand: unless by a special indult of the Apostolic See this also has been conceded to them.

Appendix. On the Current State of Regulars in France

Very many Monasteries, both of men and of women, were numbered in France as the eighteenth century was drawing to its end. But by the monstrous disturbance of all things which followed, all were dissolved. When the storm had quieted, many houses of Nuns were restored. Several others were founded under various forms sanctioned by the Bishop. Afterwards some Convents of men also were restored, and we now see them multiplied day by day. But several doubts have arisen, which must be weighed by us. Difficulties occur especially concerning Nuns. Hence:

177. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Do Nuns in France emit SOLEMN VOWS?

Resp. Negatively. For because of the difficulties of the times after the French disturbance, they preserved the faculty of possessing and acquiring goods, notwithstanding the vow of poverty. Thus it was declared several times by the Holy See. Therefore the vow of poverty which they emit is not solemn [1]. Therefore the other two also cannot be solemn; for according to the nature of solemn Profession and the laws of the Church, one vow cannot be solemn without another. Therefore the vow of chastity does not constitute a diriment impediment of marriage until it shall please the Supreme Pontiff to restore to Nuns the solemnity of vows, or to establish that a simple vow is a diriment impediment.

[1]  This conclusion does not follow necessarily from the premises. For the Apostolic See can dispense so that, although bound by the solemn vow of poverty, they can possess, as is clear from the Response of the Sacred Penitentiary immediately subjoined. See what was said above in the note to n. 155.

178. ○ Response of the Sacred Penitentiary directed to the Bishop of Limoges, in the year 1820.

The Sacred Penitentiary, after diligently weighing the things set forth, responded to the Venerable Father in Christ, the Bishop of Limoges: That a solemn vow is that which is accepted by the Church as such, and renders the one vowing incapable, perpetually and immutably (with ordinary law considered and pontifical dispensation excluded), of contracting marriage and of acquiring or retaining ownership of things, as Father Pirhing speaks, with the other treaters of the sacred Canons, in the 3rd of the Decretals, tit. 54, § 1. Since therefore (as the things premised by the Bishop-orator signify) now the Nuns of the Gauls, in order to accommodate themselves to civil laws, emit the vow of poverty in such a way that they by no means abdicate dominion over their things, but retain them as their own, and intend to dispose of the same, when there shall be need, according to the civil laws, therefore this vow of theirs, whether it be quinquennial or perpetual, certainly is not solemn, nor is it accepted as such by the Church. But if a vow of poverty of this kind is not solemn, neither can the remaining two vows of chastity and obedience be considered solemn; since according to the nature of solemn religious profession, and the discipline of the Church, one vow cannot be solemn without another.

179. ○ QUESTION 2°. Can Nuns in France nevertheless gain all the Indulgences of the Religion in which solemn vows are emitted elsewhere?

Resp. Affirmatively. This is clear from the following response of the Sacred Penitentiary directed to D.D. Bouvier.

Most Blessed Father,

The Bishop of Le Mans, prostrate at the feet of Your Holiness, humbly asks a response to the following doubts:

1° Whether Nuns suppressed at the time of the French disturbance, afterwards restored, but transferred from other dioceses into that of Le Mans, nevertheless are truly Nuns enjoying their ancient privileges?

2° Whether Convents of Nuns recently founded according to the proper rules of the approved institute, with the authority of the Bishop alone, enjoy the spiritual privileges of their Order and other communicated privileges?

Most of the Monasteries now existing in the Gauls were not restored or founded. The Sacred Penitentiary judged that it should be responded to the Venerable Father in Christ, the Bishop-orator: that Nuns who before the French disturbance emitted solemn religious Profession are true Religious, and that they, as also the other Sisters of the Monasteries of France, can gain all the Indulgences which were conceded to the Religion or institute of other Nuns emitting solemn vows, according to the respective institute or rule; and this by Indult of the Holy Father Pius VII, and again confirmed by the Most Holy Lord Pope Gregory XVI. Given at Rome, in the Sacred Penitentiary, on the 3rd day of February 1841.

180. ○ QUESTION 3°. Can a Bishop in France dispense Nuns from vows?

Resp. 1° Affirmatively, as to Nuns pertaining to an Order in which solemn vows were formerly emitted, at least for the vows of poverty and obedience. For from an Apostolic Indult the Bishop, with attention given to the present circumstances of the times, can dispense from those vows as one delegated by the Holy See. A fortiori he can dispense from the same vows pious Congregations sanctioned by him or by his predecessors, and not yet approved by the Holy See.

I said, at least for the vows of poverty and obedience: because the vow of chastity, even simple, if it has been perpetual and absolute, is reserved to the Pope, and can still be kept among seculars. Nevertheless the case must be excepted in which a woman, in vowing, did not wish explicitly or implicitly to oblige herself except insofar as she would remain in the Monastery, or wished to oblige herself at the judgment of the Bishop, or also if the constitutions of the Congregation seem to be understood in this way; because then that vow would not be absolute nor perpetual.

Resp. 2º Negatively, if there is question of recent Congregations which are governed by a Superiorissa General; but recourse must be had to the Holy See. For if the Bishop could dispense these Nuns from vows, various Bishops having Communities of the same Order in their diocese would enjoy the same faculty as to them, and a conflict of jurisdiction would follow from this. Hence Bishops cannot dispense from vows the Nuns called of the Sacred Heart, etc.

Nor can a Bishop release Nuns from the bond of vows, although they emit only simple vows and do not depend on a Superiorissa General, if this Congregation has been approved by the Holy See.

QUESTION 4º. Is the vow of entering Religion reserved to the Pope in France?

Resp. Negatively. This is clear from the response of the Sacred Penitentiary to the Most Illustrious D.D. Bouvier, Bishop of Le Mans, on the 2nd day of January 1836 [2].

[2]  This seems to be understood of the vow of entering a Congregation which, by reason of circumstances of time and place, is not held by the Holy See as a religious order properly so called.

181. ○ QUESTION 5º. Must the laws of enclosure, as to Monasteries of Nuns in France, be rigorously observed, and do those violating enclosure incur canonical penalties?

Resp. to the 1st. By common Law those laws do not urge rigorously. For since Nuns in France are not now held as properly Religious, by that very fact they are not subject to strict enclosure. Therefore enclosure is to be observed there only from the Rule, which remains the same, and also from the authority of the Bishops, who prescribe it. This is clear from the response of the Sacred Penitentiary to D. Gely, Canon of Nantes, on the 23rd day of January 1821. Nevertheless the law of enclosure in monasteries in which, by force of the constitutions, it ought to exist, cannot be cast aside without fault per se mortal; because it seems commonly to be apprehended so, and the Bishops are judged to wish to oblige so, since this discipline has always been held supremely necessary. Thus Bouvier, on the second precept of the Decalogue, at the end.

Resp. to the 2nd. From what has been said it must also be deduced that the spiritual penalties laid upon Nuns departing from the monastery, or upon outsiders entering their monastery, have no place in the present circumstances of things. - P. X. Gautrelet, Traite de l'etat religieux, t. 1, 2nd part, ch. 2.

182. ○ QUESTION 6º. Does the obligation of the divine Office urge for Nuns in France?

Resp. Negatively, per se or by reason of the law of the Church. For since Nuns in France, with attention given to the present circumstances of things, are to be numbered only among Congregations, they do not seem rigorously to be obliged per se to the divine Office under grave sin, unless from the constitutions of the Order they are gravely bound to it, which is very rare [3]. For although they may have pertained to an Order formerly (or even now elsewhere) approved by the Church for solemn Profession, now they no longer pertain to it. But the rigorous obligation of reciting the Hours does not urge except Religious women professed in an approved Order. Therefore, etc. Nor should the Church be judged to wish to impose so great an obligation upon those women whom it now does not acknowledge as strictly Religious. - P. X. Gautrelet, Traite de l'etat religieux, t. 2, c. 3, art. 2.

[3]  This ought to be all the rarer, because if they are not bound by ecclesiastical law, it does not appear how this grave obligation could flow from the Constitutions alone, or who imposed it or could impose it.

183. ○ This doctrine can be confirmed by the following response of the Holy See.

Postulate of the Bishop of Perigueux concerning the obligation of reciting the Breviary for Nuns in France.

Most Blessed Father,

The Bishop of Perigueux in the Gauls, prostrate at the feet of Your Holiness, most humbly asks from You the solution of the following doubt.

From several responses of the Sacred Penitentiary it is plain that Nuns in France are not truly and properly Nuns, but only congregations of pious women, and that their vows are not solemn. Hence it seems to many that those Nuns who by force of their Rule are held to the recitation of the divine Office, such as Carmelites, Poor Clares, Nuns of the Visitation of the Blessed Virgin Mary, etc., are not held to it under grave sin, since the gravity of this obligation seems not to reach any but Nuns emitting solemn vows. Others judge otherwise; because although they do not emit solemn vows, they seem to have taken upon themselves the obligations attached by law to the Rule which they have professed. In this variety of opinions, the Bishop-orator most humbly asks from Your Holiness:

Whether Nuns, with attention given to their condition in the Gauls, are held under grave sin to the recitation of the divine Office; or whether, since their vows are not solemn, they are not held to it more gravely than to any other point whatever of their Rule?

The Sacred Penitentiary, having maturely weighed the things set forth by the Venerable Father in Christ, the Bishop of Perigueux, judged that it should be responded, as it responds:

That Nuns bound by solemn vows are held under grave sin to recite the Office daily from custom already prescribed; but since concerning Nuns in the Gauls it has several times been responded that they neither emit solemn vows nor are Nuns strictly such, but only societies of pious women, therefore they are held by no other obligation than that which results from the respective constitutions. Given at Rome, in the Sacred Penitentiary, on the 26th day of November 1852.

184. ○ QUESTION 7º. Are the vows of Religious men in France now to be held as solemn?

Resp. Affirmatively. Thus the Collator of Le Puy (Conferences du Puy), P. Gautrelet, Traite de l'etat religieux, t. 1, c. 6, art. 3, etc., against some.

Proof. It must be admitted that vows of this kind can be given, unless it is shown that something now stands in the way, either from the civil power or from the ecclesiastical power; for if nothing stands in the way on either side, the integral right of emitting solemn vows conceded by the Church to strictly Religious Orders is preserved; but absolutely nothing stands in the way on either side. Therefore...

1º Nothing stands in the way on the part of the civil power. For 1º the civil law, whatever it may be, cannot affect the vow of poverty either directly, since it is a wholly spiritual thing, which by its nature cannot be subject to secular power; or indirectly, since religious poverty, in whatever manner it may have been promised, can in no way injure the political regime. 2º This is also clear from the absurdities which would follow from it. For if this were admitted, solemn vows could not be emitted in regions which are subject to infidel or heretical Princes, which nevertheless is contrary to the constant practice and doctrine of the Church; indeed religious Profession would be impossible in the whole Church if legislation of this kind were admitted everywhere. Moreover a Religious, for example of the Society of Jesus, frequently changing domicile, today would be Professed in Italy, and therefore incapable of dominion, but tomorrow in France he would not be, etc., etc. But these things cannot be said. Therefore, etc. 2º Nothing also stands in the way from the ecclesiastical power. For if anything stood in the way on this side, it would be some law, or Decree, from which the express will of the Supreme Pontiff derogating from the condition of Religious would be clear. But no Apostolic Constitution, no Decree, nor any Declaration of any Congregation can be brought forward from which such a will of the Supreme Pontiff would become known. Therefore... - Indeed from authentic testimony it is clear that the Religious of St. Benedict of Solesmes emit solemn vows; therefore such vows can be given and are in fact given. Therefore the power of the Church does not stand in the way of the efficacy of the solemnity of vows. - See the note of R. P. Gueranger, Abbot of the monastery of Solesmes, against the opposite opinion of D. Carriere, in the public sheet l'Ami de la Religion, t. 106, 7 September 1840.

185. ◦ It will be enough for us to report these few things: the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, to the proposed question: Whether license should be conceded to the Superior of the monastery of Solesmes to admit to solemn Profession all subjects living with him for 4 years? responded: Affirmatively, for those who emitted SIMPLE VOWS, and for those actually existing in the monastery who completed 18 months in the novitiate, at the judgment of the Superior with his Chapter..., when two years and a day have been completed from the public reception of the cappa, they shall emit Profession...

Therefore the vows of the Regulars of the aforesaid Order assisting at choir are solemn; therefore the same must be said of the Regulars of other Orders.

186. Objections. - Obj. 1º The civil law in reality stands in the way of solemn Profession; for the law establishes that all citizens are capable of entering into contracts and receiving successions. Therefore, etc.

Resp. 1º The civil law can in no way stand in the way, neither of solemn vows nor of perpetual vows; because the matter of a vow, since it is merely spiritual, cannot be touched by civil law, not even indirectly; for otherwise the civil power could annul the laws of the Church, which is repugnant. - See P. Gautrelet in the cited work, and P. de Ravignan, in the work on the Institute of the Society of Jesus. Hence Pius VI protested against the civil Constitution of the Gallican Clergy, by which it was declared that the Government in no way recognized the SOLEMN vows of Religious (Brief Quod aliquantum, 10 March 1791). And very recently Pius IX, among the usurpations which he detests in certain places of America, sets down this, namely that Religious families can admit no one to the pronouncing of solemn vows without the permission of the Government (Allocution in Consistory, 15 December 1856).

Resp. 2º The law must be regarded as having merely external effects, and thus all things are put in order. Moreover, the legal capacity for possessing, conceded to all citizens, is a right of nature; but private citizens can renounce this right. For who, for example, can be compelled to contract?

187. ○ Obj. 2º It is not permitted by law to renounce a succession not yet opened; therefore a Religious before Profession cannot renounce at least future goods, for example a paternal inheritance while the father is still living; but neither could he do this after solemn Profession, namely when the inheritance has been opened, since he has been made incapable of any disposition whatever. Therefore by this law solemn Profession is impossible.

Resp. 1º A Religious can always, even after solemn Profession has been made, with the consent of the Superior, accept inheritances or legacies for the monastery, as the statutes of Canon Law permit, although he can accept nothing for himself. Except a few Orders in which the constitutions specially stand in the way.

Resp. 2º A Religious before solemn profession, notwithstanding civil law, can dispose of future goods for others, for example for brothers. For by natural law he can renounce goods having true value here and now; but the hope of a future inheritance has true present value: therefore a Religious can validly renounce the hope, either by an internal act, or even by a testament drawn up before Profession, establishing that all goods pertaining to him at the time of death come to such and such persons, or to his natural heirs according to the course of civil law, and (with this understood) according to an intention predetermined before the emission of vows. But then the external declaration of this renunciation cannot be held as an act of ownership, but only as a manifestation of a disposition had beforehand.

188. ○ Obj. 3º The vows of all Nuns have been declared simple by the Holy See; therefore from analogy the same must also be said of the vows of Religious men.

Resp. 1º It is not true that all the vows of Nuns in France have been declared simple. For from the response of the Sacred Penitentiary related above n. 179, it is clear that Nuns who before the French disturbance had vowed solemnly were afterwards also true Religious. But from the various mentioned responses compared with one another, it is evidently plain that according to the manner of speaking of the Holy See the words: True Religious, and solemnly Professed, sound the same.

Resp. 2º From the fact that in various responses the Holy See speaks only of Nuns, it can deservedly be conjectured that Religious men are not comprehended in these Decrees. Indeed the Declaration approved by Gregory XVI expressly decrees that the decrees issued concerning this matter pertain only to Nuns.

Resp. 3º The condition of Religious men and Nuns in political disturbances is not the same. For the difference consists chiefly in this, that women can much more with difficulty provide for themselves, if they are cast out from the monastery, than men, most of whom are Priests, Missionaries, or professors of various sciences, etc. But the reason of disparity which seems to urge most of all is this, that the observance of perfect enclosure has become more difficult, since it is not acknowledged by the civil power, and consequently receives no protection from it. But enclosure for Nuns has a special connection with solemn Profession. This reason, however, is not valid for Religious men.

END OF THE TREATISE ON PARTICULAR STATES.

Treatise On the Sacraments in General

Since every part of Christian doctrine requires the Pastor's knowledge and diligence, so especially the discipline of the Sacraments, which both by God's command is necessary and is most abundant in utility, demands a singular faculty and industry of the Parish Priest, so that by an accurate and frequent perception of it the faithful may become such that the most excellent and most holy things may be imparted to them worthily and salutarily, and that Priests may not depart from that rule of the divine prohibition: Do not give what is holy to dogs, nor cast your pearls before swine. Catechism of the Council of Trent, part 2, on the Sacraments, c. 1, n. 1.

189. ○ Since there is such dignity and utility of the Sacraments for the sanctification of souls, for whom Christ the Lord did not hesitate to pour forth His Blood and to undergo the torment of the cross, it is especially helpful that preachers of the divine word frequently have discourse to the people concerning them, namely by explaining their institution, necessity, pre-eminent dignity, and wonderful efficacy, and by accurately teaching the faithful concerning the dispositions necessary for receiving abundant graces through them. - Hence the Council of Trent, sess. 24, c. 7, on Reform, has these words:

That the faithful people may approach the receiving of the Sacraments with greater reverence and devotion of soul, the holy Synod commands all Bishops that not only, when these are to be administered to the people by themselves, they first explain their force and use according to the capacity of those receiving them, but also that they take care that the same be piously and prudently observed by individual Parish Priests...; and also that during the solemnities of Masses, or the celebration of divine things, on individual feast or solemn days, they explain the sacred utterances and admonitions of salvation, and strive, useless questions having been put aside, to insert the same into the hearts of all, and to instruct them in the law of the Lord.

We must treat 1º of the nature and division; 2º of the matter and form; 3º of the Minister; 4º of the subject of the Sacraments.

Chapter I. On the Definition, Number, and Division of the Sacraments

190. ○ I. DEFINITION. A Sacrament is a sensible sign instituted by Christ to signify and confer grace.

Hence three things are necessarily required in every Sacrament, namely: 1° a sensible sign; 2° divine institution; 3° the force of producing the grace promised by Christ.

All Sacraments are perfected by three things: 1° by things as matter; 2° by words as form; 3° by the person of the Minister confecting the Sacrament with the intention of doing what the Church does. This is clear from the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union.

The Sacraments, besides sanctifying grace, produce grace which is called sacramental, that is, they confer helps for obtaining the special end for which each Sacrament was instituted, if the due conditions are not lacking. The Sacraments operate ex opere operato, that is by force of the divine institution, independently from the work of the one operating, namely of the Minister and of the subject of the Sacraments.

Hence the Sacraments are distinguished from sacramentals, which are certain sacred things or actions instituted by the Church, such as lustral water, blessings and consecrations, the Agnus Dei, etc.

191. ○ II. NUMBER. The Sacraments are seven, as is clear from Trent, sess. 7, Can. 1: If anyone shall say that the Sacraments of the new law were not all instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, or that they are more or fewer than seven, namely Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Order, and Matrimony, or even that any one of these seven is not truly and properly a Sacrament, let him be anathema.

III. Division. The Sacraments, according to various properties, are distinguished thus:

1° Necessary, or not necessary. Again the necessary are so either by necessity of means, or by necessity of precept. Necessary by necessity of means [1] are Baptism, which is the gate of the Church and of the kingdom of heaven, and Penance for those who have fallen into mortal sin after baptism; necessary by necessity of precept are all the others, with the last two excepted, which are not necessary for private persons, but only for the community.

[1]  In the strict sense that alone is necessary by necessity of means which not only has in itself the character of a means to the end which is intended, but furthermore is necessary in the very character of a means, because it cannot otherwise be supplied. You have this in those words of Paul (Heb. XI, 6): For he that comes to God must believe that He is, and is a rewarder to those who seek Him. For approach to God without the movement of a man (an adult) is impossible; and again such movement is impossible without knowledge of this kind. But in this sense baptism will be called necessary by necessity of means if you understand baptism either of water or of desire; otherwise, both about baptism and about Penance, this mode of speaking is used here in a broader sense.

2° Impressing, or not impressing, a character upon the soul. Baptism, Confirmation, and Order impress a character; the others do not impress one. Trent, sess. 7, Can. 9. 3° Formed, or unformed, according as they produce grace when they are received, or, an obstacle intervening, suspend their effect until the obstacle is removed [2].

[2]  That sacraments can be valid but unformed is certain doctrine. But whether it is to be attributed to all sacraments that, when the obstacle has been removed, they produce their effect, see St. Alphonsus, Lib. 6, n. 87.

4º Sacraments of the living or of the dead, according as they already suppose sanctifying grace, or first grace, and only increase it; or from their primary institution confer the same.

192. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Can the Sacraments of the dead confer second grace?

Resp. Affirmatively. This can be done in a twofold case: 1º when venial sins alone are subjected to the keys, which frequently happens; 2º when a penitent, guilty of mortal sin, approaches the Sacrament of Penance with perfect contrition; because perfect contrition with the vow of the Sacrament justifies a man even before reception of the same: then therefore the Sacrament confers not first but only second grace [3]...

[3]  The same thing can also happen with the sacrament of baptism, to which an adult can approach after already having obtained justification by an act of charity. And indeed it can reasonably be held, according to the doctrine of St. Thomas (1. 2, q. 89, art. 6), that this mode of justification happens not rarely among children among unbelievers: When the use of reason, he says, shall have begun in a child,... the first thing which then occurs to a man to be thought about is to deliberate concerning himself: and if indeed he has ordered himself to the due end, by grace he will obtain remission of original sin. Cajetan exhibits this ordering of oneself to the end thus (in the cited place): If he shall have judged an honorable good, confusedly, as that age is accustomed to do, to be something to be sought by himself, he has deliberated well concerning himself, placing his end in true beatitude, although imperfectly and inchoatively.

QUESTION 2º. Can the Sacraments of the living sometimes confer first grace?

Resp. Affirmatively, more probably, not indeed per se, as is clear from their institution, but per accidens, or by means of Charity infused by force of the Sacrament in a subject not placing an obstacle. For it can happen that someone guilty of mortal sin, ignorant of this in good faith, approaches a Sacrament of the living attrite; but in these circumstances the Sacrament of the living infuses grace into the soul, and therefore destroys sin. For the Sacraments always confer grace upon those not placing an obstacle, as is clear from Trent, sess. 7, Can. 6; but an obstacle is not placed by him who approaches attrite in good faith. Therefore, etc. - Thus commonly. - St. Thomas, part 3, qu. 72, art. 7. - Suarez. - St. Ligorius, n. 6 and 268, discoursing on the Eucharist: Sometimes, he says, per accidens it can confer even first grace, namely if someone, ignorant that he is in mortal sin, or believing that he has contrition, approaches Communion with attrition alone; then from attrite he is made contrite.

193. ○ QUESTION 3º. Is attrition required or sufficient, so that the Sacraments of the living may confer first grace?

Resp. Affirmatively to both: 1º it is indeed required, because first grace cannot be infused except through the destruction of mortal sin; but the destruction of mortal sin cannot be done without detestation of the same, namely without contrition or at least attrition; 2º it suffices, because from what has been said the Sacraments of the living can sometimes confer first grace: but this could not be done if attrition did not suffice, since the sinner would always approach the sacrament already justified by perfect contrition. - St. Ligorius, n. 6, etc.

QUESTION 4º. In what does the character of a Sacrament consist?

Resp. Although it is of faith that a character is impressed in Baptism, Confirmation, and Order, nevertheless Theologians do not agree in what precisely it consists. For us it will be enough to know, as the Council of Trent teaches, that the Character is a certain spiritual and indelible signet, preventing the Sacrament from being able to be repeated (Sess. 7, can. 9).

194. ○ QUESTION 5º. Is original sin destroyed in Baptism which is indeed valid, but unformed because of a defect of disposition in the baptized adult?

Resp. Negatively. The reason is that no sin dissolving one from the friendship of God is condoned except through reconciliation with God, that is, through justification. But this cannot be done unless first grace is infused; but this first grace is not infused if the dispositions are lacking. Therefore. But when the obstacle has been removed, either by perfect contrition with the vow of the Sacrament (namely of Penance), or by this Sacrament with attrition, the sacramental grace of Baptism revives, or the suspension ceases, and it destroys original sin and at the same time all actual sins committed before Baptism. But the Sacrament of Penance destroys sins committed after Baptism and the sin of fiction, or of the evil disposition with which the Sacrament of Baptism was received, at least insofar as this evil disposition persevered after Baptism. - See what is to be said, n. 232, Q. 2º.

195. ○ QUESTION 6º. What are the effects of sacramental grace proper to the individual Sacraments, besides sanctifying grace common to all?

Resp. 1º The effect of Baptismal grace is to remit every fault and punishment of fault, to illuminate the mind, to diminish concupiscence, and to make the soul fruitful for Christian works. But this habitual grace brings to the baptized person the right of obtaining helps by which he may attain these effects.

2º The effect of the grace of Confirmation is strength for constantly professing the Faith where there shall be need, and for defending it when opportunity has been given. And therefore it brings to the soul a right to helps by which it may accomplish this.

3º The effect of the grace of the Eucharist is to nourish the spiritual life, to increase grace, to generate disgust for worldly things, to draw one toward union with God, and therefore to bring a right to graces by which those communicating may be able to attain all these things.

4º The effect of the grace of Penance is to remit sins committed after baptism, and to confer strength for avoiding sins and for persevering in the state of grace, and a right to helps suitable for accomplishing these things. 5º The effect of the grace of Extreme Unction is to remove the remnants of sins, to alleviate the soul of the sick person, to strengthen confidence, to render the inconveniences of illness less troublesome [4], to bestow strength for repelling final temptations, and to confer a right to helps proportioned to these things.

[4]  Another effect proper to this sacrament can, indeed should, be added, namely restoration to former health.

6º The effect of the grace of Order is to render the Ministers of Christ fit for the sacred ministries, so that they may perform these with due piety, and to confer a right to helps suitable for these things.

7º The effect of the grace of Matrimony is to restrain disordered concupiscence, to bestow strength for sustaining the burdens of the conjugal state, for preserving conjugal fidelity, and for educating offspring in a Christian manner, and therefore to confer a right to helps necessary for fulfilling these things. - Common.

Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of the Sacraments

I. On the Nature and Union of Matter and Form

196. ○ DEFINITIONS. Matter is the sensible thing to be determined to the nature of a sacrament by the form. Hence matter is that which in the Sacrament is more indifferent, and has a less perfect signification; and therefore it must be determined by another thing for signifying.

Matter is twofold: one remote, and the other proximate. The former is the sensible thing itself which is employed in the Sacrament, or the thing about which the sacramental action is exercised. The latter is the very application or use of the remote matter in the sacramental action.

But form is the part of the Sacrament which determines the matter for effecting the sacrament, and which ordinarily consists in words pronounced by the Minister.

197. Principles. - I. Matter and form are altogether necessary for the validity of a Sacrament; therefore, with either one lacking, Sacraments cannot be confected. The reason is that a Sacrament cannot be confected except in that mode in which Christ instituted it, who alone is the author of the Sacraments. It is of faith. This is clear besides from dogmatic definitions, especially from the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union, etc.

II. In confecting a Sacrament outside a case of necessity, matter and form ought morally to be employed, as far as they can be had [1], certain. The reason is that, unless necessity urges, it is not permitted to use probability which does not remove the danger of invalidity.

[1]  To this pertains the first of the propositions proscribed by Innocent XI: It is not illicit in conferring sacraments to follow a probable opinion concerning the validity of the sacrament, the safer opinion having been left aside, unless law, agreement, or danger of incurring grave harm forbids it. Hence an opinion merely probable is not to be used in the conferral of baptism, of priestly Order, or of episcopal Order.

But the Author aptly adds, as far as it can be had; for where there is question, for example, of the disposition necessary for the sacrament of penance, scarcely anything else can be had concerning it than a certain prudent and probable judgment.

III. Matter and form must be united or applied by the same Minister and toward the same subject. The reason is that if one were to place the matter, and another the form, the words of the form would not be verified; for the Minister who, for example, would say: I baptize thee, while another poured the water, would pronounce what is false, since he himself would not baptize.

IV. [2] In order that a sacrament be valid, there must be between the matter and the form, for example between the pouring of water and the pronouncing of the words, so great a conjunction that according to the moral estimation of men, with the nature of each sacrament considered, one affects the other, that is, that the words are judged to fall upon such a thing and to constitute with it one total sign. St. Alphonsus (Lib. 6, n. 8) with Busembaum.

[2]  Those things are supplied which Gury seems to promise in the title of the paragraph, but in reality omitted.

From this: 1° In Baptism, Confirmation, Unction, and Order, such a conjunction is required that while the minister pronounces the words, he is morally judged also to wash, etc. Busembaum, ibid. [3].

[3]  Lugo (De Sacram., Disp. 2, n. 99), when about to explain how in the ordination of a Priest moral conjunction is had between the form and the first imposition of hands, which is done while no form is pronounced, discusses this matter thus: The imposition of hands is not so distant from the utterance of the form which afterwards follows, that they are not judged to have sufficient moral nearness; for there ought not to be physical coexistence, as is clear in Deacons, to whom the form is said to all at once, and afterwards they successively touch the book; wherefore if one hundred Deacons were ordained together, without doubt there would be great physical distance between the utterance of the form and the contact of the book with respect to the last; but nevertheless there is sufficient moral presence, because the same action is morally continued without moral interruption. So also after hands are imposed upon Priests, up to those words Receive power, etc., the same moral action is continued, by anointing them and preparing them so that they may more fittingly receive the grace of the Holy Spirit. But afterwards the matter is more explicated and another part of the same matter is applied together with the form: wherefore that distance, whatever it may be, is not so much between matter and form as between part and part of the matter, which certainly need not physically coexist with one another... Wherefore when it is a question of creating a Priest, that whole action by which insignia, vestments, instruments, and other things are solemnly given to him is judged to be one and the same action, just as the coronation of a Pontiff or of a King is drawn out for a long time, and divided into several actions, and interrupted by various solemnities, yet is reckoned the same action.

2º In Penance absolution can be deferred for a sufficiently long time, as in trials a sentence follows after examination of the cause. Busembaum, ibid. [4].

[4]  St. Alphonsus adds in this place (Lib. 6, n. 9): In this Sacrament such distance ought not to be so great as happens in a forensic trial. If these words merely indicated that it is not necessary that absolution be deferred as long as the sentences of judges sometimes are wont to be deferred in a forensic cause, they would express the most common and certain doctrine. But then the holy Doctor subjoins: But Croix, Lib. 6, n. 8, says with Tamburini, that a penitent is validly absolved after an hour from confession. From these words you might almost gather that according to the mind of the holy Doctor the due conjunction between matter and form is not preserved if such a delay intervenes as sometimes occurs in a forensic trial. And since here the question concerns that conjunction between those two parts of the sacrament which pertains to validity, the matter is certainly of grave moment. - Therefore the words of the holy Doctor are to be understood discreetly. For otherwise the most common opinion of all Doctors is that which Reiffenstuel expresses thus (Tr. 4, Dist. 1, Q. 2, n. 29): In the Sacrament of Penance a much greater distance can be admitted between the accusation of the penitent and the absolution of the priest: since this sacrament is performed by way of judgment; but in judgment accusation is presupposed to absolution, nor is it required that the sentence of the judge be conjoined in time with the accusation of the accused himself. And although all the Doctors use this reason, namely that this sacrament is performed by way of judgment, nevertheless there is found no trace of that limitation which St. Alphonsus suggests. Indeed the Salmanticenses (Tr. 1, Cap. 4, nn. 20 and 28) concede, and even contend, that the conjunction or moral coexistence is fittingly preserved if one who confessed on one day is absolved on another day. But Coninck (ad Q. 60, art. 6, n. 41) writes: In Confession absolution could be deferred for a sufficiently long time; just as in a trial absolution or condemnation is often wont to follow the examination of the cause after a long time. And Henriquez (Lib. 1, Cap. 9, n. 11): In the Sacrament of Penance, because it is a judgment, the matter, which is a human act, is called sufficiently present, although the confession of sins precedes the form by many days. Wherefore Roncaglia refers the reader to those things which are commonly handed down by the Doctors about deferring absolution for penitents. For thus he says (Tr. 16, C. 3, Q. 2, Resp. 2): But because Penance was instituted by way of judgment, in which it is not necessary that the sentence be altogether simultaneous with the confession of the crime, hence it is that absolution can be deferred after the confession has been heard, as will be said in its place. And in reality, whatever delay of absolution you may finally imagine, the two parts of the Sacrament will always have to be judged sufficiently conjoined, as often as it is morally understood that this one judgment is being performed. Thus well Suarez (In 3 Part, Tom. 3, Disp. 2, Sect. 2): In that sacrament that simultaneity suffices which is morally enough that the same judgment be understood to be performed and confirmed by the sentence.

But that which Croix reports from Tamburini (Lib. 6, P. 1, n. 8) is nothing. For Tamburini (De Sacr., Lib. 4, C. 1, § 1, n. 6) merely wishes to indicate the difference which is had concerning the conjunction of matter and form, if there is question of the Sacrament of Penance and of Extreme Unction. Namely, with two cases proposed, he says that an interval of one hour in no way stands in the way in the Sacrament of Penance, but does stand in the way if there is question of Extreme Unction.

3º In matrimony the consent of one can follow the consent of the other so long as this latter consent is judged morally to remain, as in other contracts. Busembaum, ibid.

II. On the Change of Matter and Form

198. ○ A twofold change is given both in matter and in form, namely substantial and accidental.

A substantial change will be in the matter if, according to the use and estimation of men, this cannot be called the same as that which was determined by Christ; but in the form, if the sense of the words intended by Christ is changed into another. But an accidental change is called one which concerns only the qualities of the thing, or which does not change the sense of the words. - St. Ligorius, n. 11.

199. Principles. - I. Every substantial change in the matter and form of a Sacrament invalidates the Sacrament, because it is no longer the rite instituted by Christ; and if it is voluntary, it constitutes grave sin, because it inflicts a grave injury upon the author of the rite.

II. No accidental change in the matter and form invalidates a Sacrament; nevertheless it induces grave or light sin, according as it is, or is not, notable.

The form of the Sacraments can be changed in many ways, namely by subtraction of a syllable or of words, addition, variation of language or of words, transposition of words, corruption of the same, for example by changing letters, and interruption. These are shown in the following little verses:

Do not take anything from the form, do not add anything, do not vary anything; Beware of transmuting, corrupting the words, delaying.

But the change will much more easily be substantial at the beginning than at the end of the words, because the sense will more easily be changed for hearers, for example in the name of the mother instead of of the father. In practice beware especially of precipitation.

III. On the Repetition of the Sacraments in Doubt Concerning the Valid Application of Matter and Form

200. ○ A threefold rule is to be established:

I. The Sacraments can be repeated whenever there is a prudent doubt concerning their validity. The reason is that if perhaps the Sacrament were not valid, those who approach to receive it would be deprived of its fruit. But that the prudent fear of so great an inconvenience is a sufficient reason why the Sacrament be repeated is clear from the very well-known axiom: The Sacraments are for men.

II. Sacraments generally cannot be repeated without grave sin when there is not present a prudent doubt concerning their validity. The reason is that they would be repeated without cause, and therefore a grave injury would be inflicted upon them.

III. Sacraments ought to be repeated whenever, upon a prudent doubt having arisen concerning their validity, charity, justice, and religion require it, namely whenever the nullity of the Sacrament, if perhaps it were present, would turn to the harm of neighbor and sometimes to the contempt or irreverence of Religion. But then they are to be repeated only conditionally, so that reverence for the Sacrament may be provided for. - Voit, n. 29 and following. - See St. Ligorius, n. 27 and following.

201. You will resolve. - The Sacraments that are more necessary, and that are conferred only once, namely Baptism and Order, are more readily to be repeated, even if a much greater probability militates for the validity of the sacrament against reasons doubtful or slenderly probable in the opposite direction. - Thus commonly.

2º Absolution is to be repeated with a penitent guilty of mortal sin if there is prudent doubt concerning the due pronouncing of the form. But if the penitent is not in the state of mortal sin [5], it will not be necessary to repeat the form, since Communion can be permitted to him even without absolution.

[5]  Perhaps you would say better: If the penitent has not brought necessary matter; for it certainly can happen that someone is in the state of grace, and nevertheless has matter which must necessarily be subjected to the keys, for example a grave fault omitted in the preceding confession from forgetfulness, which indeed had then been remitted indirectly, but nevertheless still needs absolution.

3º A Minister who lightly doubts, and does not know why he fears, or merely does not reflexively remember that he pronounced the words of the form, sins mortally per se if he repeats the form, or even repeats one word three or four times. The reason is that he changes the form, and introduces a new rite concerning the gravest action of all. Moreover he presents Christ, whom he represents, as speaking ridiculously. In practice, however, scrupulous persons who repeat the form are for the most part excused from mortal sin, indeed often even from venial sin, because, being too agitated by scruples, from perplexity or without advertence, they act thus foolishly. - Thus Voit, n. 27. - Elbel, n. 14. - Gobat, tract. 3, n. 94, etc.

4º If in Mass after consecration a doubt arises for you concerning the due pronouncing of the form, or concerning total omission, you ought and can repeat nothing, since otherwise you are not accustomed to omit these things: for one must judge from what commonly happens, unless, however, you doubt very probably, as the Rubric speaks. - See St. Ligorius, n. 224.

Chapter III. On the Minister of the Sacraments

The Minister of the Sacraments is he who, in the name of Christ, whose place he holds, performs the sacramental action.

We must treat 1° of the requisites in the Minister for conferring the Sacraments; 2° of the office of the Minister in the administration of the Sacraments.

Article I. On the Requisites for the Administration of the Sacraments, or on the Attention, Intention, Faith, and Probity of the Minister

§ I. On the Attention of the Minister

202. ○ DEFINITION. Attention is the application of the mind to those things which are being performed, or it is the act of the intellect by which a man considers that which he does.

Division. A twofold attention is distinguished: one internal, which consists in the advertence itself of the mind to that which is being done; another external, which excludes every action physically incompossible with internal attention. - See what was said above, n. 91; and t. 1, n. 544.

Principles. - I. For the validity of the conferral of the Sacraments no other attention is required except that which is found in every truly human act. Therefore the Sacraments can be validly ministered even by a distracted Minister, or one thinking at the same time about other affairs. The reason is that, in order that an act be and be considered human, not actual attention, but the procession of the act itself from an act of rational will is inspected. Moreover attention often does not depend on the will of man; but Christ could not require in the Minister of the Sacraments a condition that is sometimes impossible. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 11, and others commonly.

II. For the licit conferral of the Sacraments attention is required, so that every voluntary distraction be absent. The reason is that the reverence due to the Sacrament demands that it be treated diligently, and that the danger of erring be avoided. Nevertheless voluntary distraction, according to the common opinion of Theologians, ordinarily does not exceed venial sin, unless someone exposes himself to the danger of gravely erring in the form. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

They more probably and more commonly except the Eucharist, in the confection of which they judge every voluntary distraction, on account of the greatest dignity of the Sacrament, to be mortal sin. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - Nevertheless Lacroix, lib. 6, part 2, n. 443, Mazzotta, and others deny this not improbably.

§ II. On the Intention of the Minister

203. ○ DEFINITION. Intention is an act of the will tending toward some end, or an act of the will by which someone intends to do or omit something.

DIVISION. It is manifold, namely: 1º actual, virtual, habitual, and interpretative; 2º internal or true, or external, which regards only the external act; 3º determinate, or indeterminate or in the confused; 4º absolute, or conditioned. Recall the definitions given throughout, for example in the Treatise on Human Acts, where voluntary action is treated, tom. 1, n. 5.

Principles. - I. For the validity of a Sacrament there is required in the Minister some true and serious will at least of doing that which the Church does. - This is clear from the Council of Trent, sess. 7, Can. 11.

II. Nevertheless an actual intention is not required, but a virtual one suffices. The reason is that actual intention, although best and to be desired, is sometimes morally impossible; but virtual intention sufficiently flows into the action of the Minister, so that this action can be called truly human and deliberate. - Thus all.

III. A habitual intention does not suffice, nor an interpretative one. The reason is that for a human act some will is required, by force of which the act is placed. But neither habitual nor interpretative intention is of this kind: not the first, because it is neither actually elicited by the will, nor, although it was once elicited, does it endure in some effect or in a series of actions; not the second, because it is neither actually elicited, nor was it ever actually elicited, but would only be elicited if the mind were thinking about the thing to be done. - St. Ligorius, n. 16.

204. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Is internal intention required?

Resp. Affirmatively, because if the Minister intended only the external act, he would not have a true intention of doing what the Church does [1]. For the Church intends to place a sacramental rite: but he who proposes only to do the external rite does not intend this [2]. - St. Ligorius, n. 20.

[1]  Someone perhaps could deny this in truth; since even the Church does nothing else except that it places the external rite, as Christ the Lord commanded to be employed.

[2]  Nor nevertheless is it required that the minister explicitly intend to do a sacramental rite; otherwise, if someone either is ignorant or does not believe that by that action a sacramental rite is perfected, as for example Protestants do not believe that a sacrament is effected by matrimonial consent, he would not confer the sacrament validly; which is false. Therefore it ought to be enough that the minister wishes confusedly to do what Christians do.

But the condemned proposition which is subjoined perhaps does not fit the matter. For in this proposition there is question not of a mere defect of the required intention, but of a contrary intention.

This is also clear from the 28th proposition condemned by Alexander VIII, which sounds thus: Baptism conferred by a Minister is valid who observes the whole external rite and form of baptizing, but inwardly in his heart resolves within himself: I do not intend to do what the Church does.

QUESTION 2º. Is there required in the Minister an intention of doing what the Roman Church does?

Resp. Negatively, provided that he has the intention, at least implicit, of doing that which the true Church does, even if from error he should think his own heterodox church to be the true Church. - St. Ligorius, n. 21.

QUESTION 3º. Is there required in the Minister an intention of confecting a Sacrament?

Resp. Negatively, at least explicitly, provided this intention is not excluded. For it suffices that he intends in general and implicitly to do what the Church does. - St. Ligorius, n. 21, and others commonly.

205. ○ QUESTION 4º. Must the intention of the Minister be determined to certain matter and person?

Resp. Affirmatively. The reason is 1º as to the matter, because otherwise it would remain in a state of indifference: for it cannot be drawn out from that state and be determined to a Sacrament except through the minister's intention; 2º as to the person, because the effect of the Sacrament cannot be applied in general, but to some subject; otherwise no application would be made [3].

[3]  Namely the object or term of the action must be determined according to the nature of the thing of which there is question: for if, for example, you were to say, I give, but did not determine what, or to whom, you have an act void of all force.

QUESTION 5º. Is a Sacrament conferred with a conditioned intention valid?

Resp. 1º Negatively, if the condition added is concerning the future; because the condition suspends the intention of the Minister, and therefore prevents the form from being applied here and now to the matter; nor can it be applied afterwards, when the condition has been fulfilled, since the matter and form have already ceased to be present [4].

[4]  Matrimony, however, like all other contracts, can be celebrated under a condition concerning the future; when this has been fulfilled, they are perfected no otherwise than if they had been entered into purely and without condition from the beginning. Nor for that reason is the inconvenience to be feared of which the Author speaks. For since the consent is referred to the event of the condition, then in reality the contract is perfected, and therefore then the sacrament is made.

Resp. 2º Affirmatively, if the condition concerns the past or the present, and this in reality exists; because here and now the conditioned intention passes into an absolute intention: but if the condition is not fulfilled, then there is no intention, as being restricted to a condition not existing. - St. Ligorius, n. 26, and others commonly.

206. ○ QUESTION 6º. Is the conferral of Sacraments with a conditioned intention licit, in doubt whether they have been validly conferred?

Resp. 1º As to Sacraments impressing a character, it is certain that it is licit. This is clear from Canon Law, Decretals, c. 2, on Baptism, where this form is indicated in doubt concerning Baptism conferred: If thou art not yet baptized, I baptize thee, etc.

Resp. 2º Also as to the other Sacraments it is licit, if there is present a sufficient cause for placing the condition. The reason is that the Sacraments are for men, and by a conditioned conferral of the Sacrament provision is made, insofar as can be done, both for the good of those who receive the Sacrament, if perhaps they are capable of it, and also for the reverence of the Sacrament. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, nn. 27, 28, against some. But it is certain that in extreme necessity, where there is no matter present except doubtful matter, the Minister not only can, but also is held under grave obligation to minister the Sacrament under condition. - St. Ligorius, n. 29.

QUESTION 7º. Must the condition be expressed in words?

Resp. Negatively. The reason is that it suffices for reverence of the Sacrament if it is conceived in the mind. - Thus St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, tr. 14, n. 3. - Lacroix, n. 85, etc. Indeed according to Gobat, n. 272, there is not even need to have the condition explicitly and formally in the mind; but it is enough if it is had implicitly and virtually, as he has it who wishes to hear confessions according to the institution of Christ or the intention of the Church; because thus also the reverence due to the Sacrament is sufficiently preserved. Nevertheless it must be added orally where the Rubric prescribes this, as in conditional Baptism, especially if it is conferred publicly, lest, namely, the bystanders believe that Baptism is repeated absolutely. - St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, tr. 14, n. 3, etc. [5].

[5]  To this response, which otherwise is of St. Doctor Alphonsus, VV. (p. 928, n. 82) append, as a gloss, that which St. Alphonsus has thus in the seventeenth of the more recent Retractions: Whether it is licit to confer a sacrament under condition, without the condition being expressed orally, in Lib. 6, n. 29, was affirmed with Tournely, Roncaglia, Castro-Palao, and others most commonly. But because there are not lacking some authors, such as Gonet, Juenin, Contenson, Serry, etc., who hold (although little probably) that the validity of the Sacrament does not depend on the intention of the minister, but only on the conferral itself of the Sacrament seriously performed, it is safer to express the condition also in words.

Resp. 1º The most learned Father Haringer (in note to Lib. 6, n. 29) explains the words of the holy Doctor thus: The word safer placed here seems to signify nothing else than more advisable. Therefore the holy Doctor merely gives counsel; and to this counsel the words of Gury, who raises the question only about the necessity of expressing the condition, do not stand opposed. 2º The holy Doctor in the words described above seems to hint, although obscurely, at the doctrine of those who went into the celebrated opinion of Catharinus concerning the nature of the intention necessary for conferring the sacraments. I said, obscurely; because these Authors did not deny, indeed they expressly asserted for the validity of the sacraments, the necessity of some intention in the minister, as may be seen in Juenin (De Sacram., Dissert. 1, Q. 1, Cap. 2, art. 1). But if the matter thus stands, then that also remains sufficiently obscure: why, on account of that singular opinion of theirs, it should generally be expedient also to have expressed the condition orally.

§ III. On the Faith and Probity of the Minister

207. Principles. - I. For the validity of the Sacraments neither faith [1] nor probity, or the state of grace, is required in the minister. This is clear 1º from the practice and perpetual tradition of the Church, which never wished those baptized by heretics and the wicked to be rebaptized. It is clear 2º from the definition of the Church. - Trent, sess. 7, Can. 12, and Can. 4, on Baptism.

[1]  Understand faith here as perfect or Catholic. For some persuasion or notion, at least by which the minister knows that he is carrying out the rite of Christians, seems necessary for having a sufficient intention.

II. But for the licit administration of the Sacraments, faith and probity are required in the minister, at least if he has been consecrated for conferring Sacraments, and confects them solemnly, that is, with the entire rite prescribed by the Church. Therefore he who ministers Sacraments in mortal sin sins gravely; for a minister destitute of faith or wicked inflicts a grave injury upon God and Christ, by treating holy things unworthily and, so far as lies in him, by contaminating them. Moreover, since the Minister of the Sacraments represents Christ the primary Minister, who is the Holy of Holies, and bears His person, it is necessary that he also be holy.

208. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Does a Minister sin gravely who confers in mortal sin a Sacrament for which he has not been specially ordained or consecrated, for example if a woman ministers Baptism in the state of sin?

Resp. Negatively, probably, because the obligation in the Minister of having sanctity does not arise precisely from the sanctity itself of Christ and of the Sacrament according to itself, but from the consecration of the Minister in Order for conferring Sacraments. - Billuart, diss. 5, art. 4. - St. Thomas, 3 p., q. 64, art. 6; and in 4, Dist. 5, q. 2, art. 2; and many others. Nevertheless not a few others affirm; thus Collet, Lacroix, Lugo, etc. But St. Ligorius, n. 32, admits the probability of both opinions; nevertheless he inclines more toward the affirmative [2].

[2]  The second opinion affirming, says St. Alphonsus, seems more probable. But learn whether this opinion can be of use to confessors from the opinions of the Doctors which we have elsewhere described from the same St. Alphonsus (Vol. I, in note to n. 152).

 The opinions of the Doctors indicated in this little note, which St. Alphonsus adopts and inculcates (at the end of the moral system), are of this kind: Nothing ought to be condemned as mortal sin concerning which there is not evident reason, or manifest authority of Scripture (Gabriel Biel). And St. Antoninus: Unless for this there be express authority of Scripture or of a Canon of the Church, or evident reason. - And St. Raymond: Do not be prone to judge mortal sins where it is not clear to you through certain Scripture. Hence the argument: St. Alphonsus, after he had elsewhere taught that both opinions were probable, namely the one affirming and the one denying that grave fault is present in the case, later wrote by opining that the affirmative seems more probable. But a certain opinable greater probability does not suffice according to the holy Doctor, so that in practice the conscience of grave sin be imposed. Therefore that opinion cannot be of use to confessors.

VV. object (p. 927, note 2) that St. Alphonsus in the little work Confessore diretto per le genti di campagna absolutely wrote that spouses who contract in the state of sin commit two sacrileges, the one as ministers, the other as unworthily receiving the sacrament.

Resp. It is a canon that the more obscure places of any Writer are to be explained through the clearer ones. But the Moral Work (Lib. 6, n. 32) most clearly teaches us that as to the second sacrilege the holy Doctor affirms this merely opinably, and that he changed nothing in it, nor therefore departed from this opinion of his, although after that little work had been published he published the Moral Work several times over the course of twenty years. But if someone wishes to contend that the words of that little work are to be taken in a strict sense, this alone could be concluded: that those two places of the holy Doctor do not cohere with each other, and that the meanings of the little work are to be put after those of the Moral Work, since they are opposed to the certain principles of the same holy Doctor.

VV. add (l. c.) that St. Alphonsus attributed to the negative opinion only extrinsic probability, perhaps on account of the authority of St. Thomas, whose suffrage, however, they say, does not effect that it is sufficiently solid, since for the affirmative a notable excess and preponderance of intrinsic reason militates.

Resp. 1º I deny that, according to the mind of St. Alphonsus, that notable excess and preponderance of reason is present for the affirmative. For otherwise he would not have written so temperately and in a manner of one somewhat doubting, it seems more probable.

Resp. 2º St. Alphonsus indeed brings forth no new reason; but, no otherwise than others, he seeks reasons from the intrinsic nature of the thing. But that from the considered nature of the thing a reason so evident can be taken which suffices for certainly affirming mortal sin, or at least a reason so convincing that it removes solid probability from the opposite opinion, and nevertheless that concerning an intrinsic reason of this kind St. Thomas, Richardus, Sylvester, Cajetan, Dominic Soto, Suarez, Laymann, Coninck, Henriquez, Filliuccius, Reginaldus, Sa, the Salmanticenses, Dicastillus, Becanus, Valentia, Palaus, Escobar, Sporer, Reiffenstuel, Giribaldi, Roncaglia, Ferraris, Mezger, Illsung, Pettschacher, Babenstuber, Struggl, etc., etc., etc., were in some way blind - this will seem sufficiently difficult, indeed also very hard. Therefore whoever, with so many and such great Doctors preceding him, should doubt entirely concerning so great a solidity of the reason brought by St. Alphonsus, indeed should altogether deny it, certainly will not rightly be convicted of any imprudence or rashness.

QUESTION 2º. Does a Priest, or consecrated Minister, sin gravely, who indeed ministers a Sacrament in mortal sin, but not solemnly, for example Baptism without ceremonies in a case of necessity?

Resp. It is controverted, as in the preceding question, and the same authorities and reasons are brought forward for both sides. Hence it must probably be said that he does not sin gravely, because although he is per se consecrated for ministering sacraments, nevertheless he does not act as one consecrated or from office, but only as a layman from charity for helping a neighbor in necessity [3].

[3]  To this response of the Author, VV. (p. 929, n. 84) oppose these words from St. Alphonsus: The opinion (more probable) teaches that, speaking per se... a Priest ministering not solemnly sins gravely by ministering in mortal sin. The reason, etc. Lib. 6, n. 32.

Resp. St. Alphonsus did not write absolutely, more probable, but wrote by opining, it seems more probable; and in the same place he expressly writes absolutely concerning the opposite opinion: This opinion is indeed probable. But if, even according to the judgment of St. Alphonsus himself, it is probable that in the case there is no mortal sin, then according to the very firm principles of the same holy Doctor it is unlawful to impose upon penitents the conscience of mortal sin. Does not St. Alphonsus in the same place report that Concina (whom he himself calls very rigid) says the opinion which denies grave fault is true and common? And do not others agree with Concina, who are heard as no less rigid: Natalis Alexander, Contenson, Habert, Juenin, Collet, etc.? Besides, that, with due reverence preserved for the holy Doctor, his judgment in this question can be set aside neither imprudently nor rashly, has already been shown sufficiently and more than sufficiently in the preceding Note.

QUESTION 3º. Does a consecrated Minister, solemnly ministering in mortal sin, sin gravely if grave necessity urges?

Resp. Negatively, rigorously speaking, namely if the danger is so urgent that it is not permitted to him through time to elicit an act of contrition. But this hypothesis generally must be denied. Moreover a Minister is not to be excused from mortal sin who, conscious of grave fault, can foresee the case of necessity, as a Parish Priest and others who by office must minister the Sacraments, and therefore are held by a special obligation habitually to remain in the state of grace. - St. Ligorius, n. 35, and others commonly.

209. ○ QUESTION 4º. Does he sin who outside the celebration of Mass ministers the Eucharist in mortal sin?

Resp. Affirmatively, more probably. The reason is that he inflicts a grave injury upon the most holy Eucharist. For although he himself does not act as an efficient cause in confecting the Sacrament, nevertheless he is its dispenser, specially consecrated for this, and he discharges a ministry which immediately cooperates in the sanctification of the soul. - St. Ligorius, n. 35, and others commonly. Nevertheless Lugo, on the Sacraments, D. 8, n. 455, Salmanticenses, tr. 1, c. 7, n. 11, and others probably judge that he sins only venially [4].

[4]  VV. (p. 929, n. 85) oppose the words of St. Alphonsus (Quaest. Reform., n. 62): In the earlier book the negative opinion was called probable. But here we refute it.

Resp. Therefore the negative opinion could seem probable even to St. Alphonsus. Therefore it is not without reason. But the reasons which moved the holy Doctor to change his opinion were not unknown to others; nor nevertheless did they move those Doctors, the long line of whom the holy Doctor himself recounts (and to whom several others can be added), so that they did not either profess the negative opinion absolutely or call it probable; and no one will deny that among these even the very grave are numbered. What therefore will you finally define? Let the received canons be applied. Since therefore, by the judgment of grave Doctors, grave reasons militate for each side which move to prudent assent, we shall have on each side mere opinion. Yet this difference between the two opinions stands out: that the one suffices through reflex judgment for removing suspicion of grave fault; the other does not suffice for imposing the conscience of grave fault. Among those who, after weighing the reasons of each side, defined each to be probable, it will be helpful to have added the more recent Babenstuber (Tr. 8, Part 4, Disp. 2, art. 4, n. 9), Giribaldi (Tr. 4, De Euch., Cap. 6, Dub. 7, n. 31), Reuter (Part 4, Tr. 1, n. 27), and Struggl (Tr. 9, Q. 1, art. 3, n. 33).

QUESTION 5º. Do they sin who in mortal sin either mediately or immediately touch or carry the Most Holy Eucharist?

Resp. It is controverted. There is a threefold probable opinion:

I. The more probable OPINION affirms in each case, because they treat the most holy thing, or the Body of Christ, unworthily. St. Ligorius, n. 35, calls this opinion very probable.

II. The OPINION denies, because no administration of a Sacrament is present here, nor does the matter appear so grave that it induces mortal sin. - Thus Lacroix, n. 101. - Salmanticenses, c. 7, n. 1. - Busembaum. And St. Ligorius says that this is not improbable.

III. The OPINION distinguishes thus: Those touching the most holy Eucharist immediately in mortal sin do indeed sin gravely, but not those touching mediately. The reason is drawn from the very different degree of irreverence between the first case and the second [5]. Thus Billuart.

[5]  But if the opinion of Cardinal De Lugo, concerning which in the preceding q. 4, is not without its probability, this distinction is employed in vain.

210. ○ QUESTION 6º. Do those gravely sin who exercise other sacred functions in mortal sin?

Resp. Negatively; because all other exercises of Orders besides the confection and administration of the Sacraments do not seem to demand sanctity under grave obligation, since they are not proximately ordained to the sanctification of the soul. - Thus commonly and more probably. - Salmanticenses. - Mazzotta, and St. Ligorius, n. 37, says this is sufficiently probable.

QUESTION 7º. Is a Minister held to confess before the confection of a sacrament, if he is guilty of mortal sin?

Resp. 1º Affirmatively, if there is question of the celebration of Mass, and the supply of a Confessor is not lacking to him; because all the faithful who are to communicate must premise confession from the Decree of the Council of Trent, sess. 13, cap. 7.

Resp. 2º But negatively, more probably, if there is question of the other Sacraments; because he is obliged by no law to confession; and therefore it suffices that he elicit an act of contrition [6]. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 34. - Elbel. - Lacroix. - Lugo, etc., against certain others.

[6]  Except, however, if the defect of perfect contrition is clear to him.

211. ○ QUESTION 8º. Does he sin gravely who hears confession in mortal sin, but does not absolve?

Resp. Negatively, more probably, because a Confessor by hearing confession does not confect the Sacrament. - St. Ligorius, n. 56, and others commonly against some.

QUESTION 9º. How many sins does a Confessor commit by successively absolving several penitents in mortal sin?

Resp. There is a twofold opinion. For according to others he commits as many sins as persons whom he absolves; the reason is that the individual absolutions constitute so many distinct moral actions, so many complete judgments, and so many Sacraments conferred in the state of sin, and therefore so many sins. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 30, with others. Yet others think it is one sin. - Thus the Salmanticenses, on Censures, c. 1, n. 182, with others whom they allege; and Lugo, on Penance, D. 46, n. 558, calls that opinion probable [7].

[7]  VV. (p. 929, n. 86) observe that St. Alphonsus (Quaest. reform., n. 53) retracted what he had written before, namely: He commits one sin... if a Confessor in mortal sin successively absolves several confessing persons; but later he wrote (Lib. 5, n. 50, q. 6): More truly Concina... and others teach that as many sacrileges are committed as absolutions he imparts.

Resp. I concede the antecedent; I deny the consequence. Indeed we ought to defer this honor to the holy Doctor, that we never think that he blurted out anything inconsiderately and rashly. Therefore he put forward the prior judgment not without grave reason. Nevertheless, since afterwards he issued another judgment on the same matter, the question now is which judgment is to be preferred. But rather than assume for ourselves the office of judging concerning this question, it seems fitting that we inquire into the opinion of the wiser. But after inspecting the opinions of the Doctors whom St. Alphonsus himself also reports, we find that some stand for the prior judgment of the holy Doctor, others for the later. Therefore this controversy remains in the same condition as before, and furthermore ought to remain so; for St. Alphonsus brought forth no new reason by which the condition of the controversy can be said to have been changed. Therefore the probability which previously favored each opinion must in no way be said to have perished.

But here also that must be observed which we said in the Note to Q. 4: namely, through a reflex judgment we can indeed most safely use in practice the prior and milder judgment of St. Alphonsus; but to use the later and more severe one for imposing a grave obligation is still by no means lawful according to the principles of St. Alphonsus.

212. ○ QUESTION 10º. How many sins does he commit who in mortal sin ministers the Eucharist to several persons?

Resp. More probably only one; because he places one moral action: for the individual distributions are held by way of one, and constitute one administration and one banquet [8]. - St. Ligorius, n. 35.

[8]  Compare what was said above (n. 209, q. 4), where a twofold opinion was produced concerning the gravity of this fault.

Article II. On the Office of the Minister

1º As to the obligation of ministering the Sacraments; 2º as to the obligation of sometimes denying them; 3º as to the manner of conferring them.

§ I. On the Obligation of Ministering the Sacraments

213. Principles. - I. Those having care of souls are held under grave obligation from justice to minister the Sacraments to their subjects reasonably asking. For by undertaking the care of souls they obligated themselves to this by a tacit contract entered into with their subjects, from whom they receive support or at least honor.

Therefore they are held if the common precept of receiving those Sacraments urges, or if the private necessity or utility of the one asking demands administration, for example if the one asking foresees some danger, or is involved in temptation and needs the grace of the Sacrament, or if he wishes to exercise a devotion suitable to his state, or to gain an Indulgence, etc. - Scavini.

II. Others not having care of souls are not held to minister the Sacraments from justice; nevertheless sometimes they are held from charity, namely in grave necessity of neighbor. - St. Ligorius, n. 58.

214. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Who are considered to have care of souls?

Resp. All those who by office, or by special title of spiritual jurisdiction or delegation, ought to feed or care for some part of the fold of Christ. Therefore such are Bishops, Parish Priests, and whoever have subsidiary care of souls from commission or public office, as are Coadjutors or Vicars of Parish Priests. Likewise with respect to Regulars, their own Prelates or Superiors. - St. Ligorius, n. 58.

QUESTION 2º. What Sacraments are to be ministered in necessity, even with danger of death, whether by those having care of souls, or by others?

Resp. 1º Those who do not carry the care of souls are certainly held only to ministering the Sacraments absolutely necessary for salvation, namely Baptism and Penance, or Extreme Unction when someone can in no way confess. The reason is that they are held only from charity alone to succor neighbor in the gravest danger of salvation. But only the aforesaid Sacraments are necessary for salvation. Therefore, etc. - Thus most commonly the Theologians with St. Ligorius, n. 58, and lib. 2, n. 27.

Resp. 2º Even those carrying the care of souls are more probably held to ministering only the aforesaid Sacraments with any danger. The reason is that the other Sacraments are not of so great necessity that anyone is held to confer them with grave danger of life. - Thus St. Ligorius on the Eucharist, n. 233, relying on the declaration of Gregory XIII (12 Oct. 1576), and likewise on the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council approved by the same Pontiff. - Nevertheless those who carry the care of souls are held to expose life not only in extreme necessity, but also in grave necessity, while other Ministers are obliged to this only in extreme necessity. - St. Ligorius, lib. 2, n. 27. - Lacroix, lib. 3, part 1, n. 755 and following.

215. ○ QUESTION 3º. Is someone held to expose life for ministering the aforesaid Sacraments with only probability of success or necessity?

Resp. It seems it must be denied, because it is too hard to demand an act so heroic for helping neighbor unless there is present a morally certain hope either of success or of necessity. Hence you are not held certainly to expose life for baptizing or absolving someone, if you probably ought to perish before you can fulfill this, or if you probably presume that he is baptized, or is not in the state of mortal sin, or even can easily succor himself by an act of perfect contrition. - Collet, Decalogue, c. 4, and St. Ligorius, lib. 2, n. 27.

216. You will resolve. - 1º Those having care of souls sin gravely, not only if without reason they deny their ministry, but also if they often show themselves slow and difficult; because in this way they deter the faithful from the Sacraments, and the matter comes back to the same point as if they denied the Sacraments.

2º Nevertheless it is not mortal to deny the Sacrament of Penance or of the Eucharist to one or another, or to the same person once or again, asking apart from necessity; because the damage can easily be repaired, nor is the subject for this reason judged gravely unwilling.

3º If subjects ask irrationally, there is no sin. Hence a parish priest is not held daily to spend time with a scrupulous person or with little devout women, since so frequent confession is not expedient for these, nor do they have a strict right to so frequent absolution.

4º If a Parish Priest has suitable Vicars, he will not be held so rigorously to receive the confessions of subjects; nevertheless he ought to satisfy the faithful requiring him by name, unless either he is impeded, or the penitents are willingly going to approach another Confessor.

5º Generally speaking, those carrying the care of souls sin gravely who are unwilling to receive the confessions of subjects except on a few determined days within the month; because they are the cause why the faithful remain long in the state of sin and are kept away from receiving the Sacraments. - See St. Ligorius, n. 58, and elsewhere throughout.

See more where the individual Sacraments are treated; and recall what was said about the office of Parish Priests in the Treatise on states, n. 113 and following.

§ II. On the Obligation of Denying the Sacraments to the Unworthy Who Ask

217. General principle. - The Minister is held under grave obligation, speaking per se, to deny the Sacraments to the unworthy, because natural law obliges a dispenser to dispense the goods of the Lord faithfully and according to His will; but the certain will of Christ is that the Sacraments not be conferred on the unworthy, according to that saying of Matthew 7:6: Do not give what is holy to dogs, nor cast your pearls before swine.

218. Special rules. - Rule I. To a public sinner, whether asking secretly or publicly, the Sacrament must be denied; because there is no reason why an exception should be made to the general rule; indeed grave scandal of the faithful would follow from the concession of the Sacraments. - St. Thomas, p. 3, qu. 80, art. 6. - St. Ligorius, n. 44.

Rule II. To a hidden sinner asking secretly, the Sacrament must likewise be denied; because reverence toward the Sacrament and charity toward neighbor in these circumstances demand this. - St. Thomas, p. 3, qu. 80, art. 6. - St. Ligorius, n. 50. - Salmanticenses, etc.

Rule III. To a truly hidden sinner asking publicly, the Sacrament is not to be denied. The reason is deduced from the inconveniences which would follow from denial of the Sacrament; for scandals and disturbances would arise in the Church, and especially the faithful, brought into suspicion lest they be prohibited from the Sacraments, would withdraw from them. - Thus all with St. Thomas, p. 3, qu. 80, art. 6. St. Ligorius, ibid.

It is confirmed from the Roman Ritual, on the Eucharist, where these things are read: Hidden sinners, if they ask secretly and he (the Minister) has recognized them as not amended, he is to repel; but not if they ask publicly and he cannot pass them over without scandal.

219. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. When is a sinner considered PUBLIC OR NOTORIOUS, or HIDDEN; or as asking the Sacrament SECRETLY?

Resp. 1º That one is called a public sinner whose crime or very bad life is commonly known. But if his infamy has not yet come into common knowledge, yet is so known that it can no longer be hidden, he is called a notorious sinner [1]; but if danger is absent lest his wickedness become known, he is called a hidden sinner.

[1]  The Author here seems to include notoriety both of law and of fact. For if the discussion is only about the latter, notorious does not differ from public, and indeed in the broadest acceptance of this word. See Reiffenstuel, Lib. 5, Tit. 1, n. 245. But notoriety of law can occur without notoriety of fact; and then he is not known as a public sinner, for example one condemned for some hidden crime by the secret tribunal of the Holy Inquisition.

Resp. 2º A sinner asking secretly is called one who is found alone with the Minister or with a few others of whom deservedly no account is had, such as little boys, etc. Otherwise he is judged to ask publicly.

QUESTION 2º. Must the Sacrament be denied to an unworthy person asking publicly, whose crime is indeed notorious, but not yet public?

Resp. Negatively, according to the more probable opinion, because he cannot yet be called a public sinner; moreover the denial would be liable to various inconveniences. Indeed more probably the Sacrament would not have to be denied even if very many of those present knew the crime, since it is not simply public. - St. Ligorius, n. 45 [2].

[2]  The Author alleges St. Alphonsus; but in reality St. Alphonsus discusses another hypothesis. For Gury disputes about a crime which is notorious; but he defines notorious as that which can no longer be hidden. On the contrary St. Alphonsus treats of a sinner whose sin is not simply public, and public (Lib. 6, n. 44) he calls when the crime is notorious.

But to the question whether the sacrament is to be denied to a sinner whose sin is not simply public, but is known to most of those present, but not to all, he responds thus: There are three opinions. The first with Coninck (De Sacram., Q. 80, n. 29) affirms: because relatively to these the sin seems to be public. - The second with Suarez (In 3 Part, Disp. 67, Sect. 5, vers. Dico secundo) and Bonacina more probably denies; because the one asking still possesses reputation relatively to all who are ignorant of his crime. - The third with Diana and Croix (Lib. 6, p. 1, n. 139) says it must be denied if from those present only one or another upright man is ignorant, who is thought not likely to divulge it; and this is sufficiently probable according to what was said Lib. 5, n. 973. But Croix took this last resolution from Dicastillus (De Sacram., Tract. 1, Disp. 3, Dub. 12), and in it nothing is contained except a certain limitation of the opinion of Suarez. Besides, the last words of St. Alphonsus still more evidently show the difference of the question from Gury's question. For it is supposed that among the few present one or another is ignorant of the crime, who is upright, and who is thought likely to preserve the secret. Wherefore the holy Doctor refers the reader to that place where it is asked whether reputation is gravely injured if someone's crime is revealed to one or another upright man. But this condition is sought irrelevantly in the hypothesis of Gury, who supposes that the crime otherwise cannot be hidden.

220. ○ QUESTION 3º. Must the Sacrament be denied to a sinner when his crime is not public where he asks, but is public elsewhere?

Resp. Negatively, at least more probably; because on the one hand, by ministering the Sacraments to him there is no scandal of others, and on the other hand if it were denied, those inconveniences and harms would arise which come from a denial made to a hidden sinner. - St. Ligorius, n. 46, and others more commonly. But it must be said otherwise if knowledge of that crime will easily come into that place. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 4º. Is it licit to simulate the administration of a Sacrament, lest it be conferred on an unworthy person?

Resp. Theologians distinguish a twofold simulation: one formal, by which the Minister directly intends to deceive; but another material, by which someone does not directly intend to deceive, but is induced to simulate from another motive, for example if he is compelled by grave fear, etc.

I say: It is never licit, not even materially, to simulate a Sacrament. The reason is that every simulation is an injury and grave irreverence toward Christ, whom the Minister mocks by abusing sacred things instituted by Him. - This is also clear from the 29th proposition condemned by Innocent XI, which lies thus: Urgent grave fear is a cause for simulating the administration of Sacraments. But in this condemnation even material simulation is reproved, since in this proposition it is treated specially. - It is clear again from the authority of Innocent III, c. De celebrat. Missae, where it is said that he who fraudulently has presumed to simulate that he consecrates sins more gravely than if he celebrated in mortal sin, because he seems to mock God.

221. ○ QUESTION 5º. In what precisely does the simulation of a Sacrament consist?

Resp. Theologians do not agree. Some say that it consists generally in that which can lead those receiving or others into error. More probably, according to the common opinion, it consists in the fictive application of the form to the matter, or in the fictive pronouncing of the form; or only then does simulation seem to be present when that which essentially pertains to the thing which is simulated is fictively placed [3], so that neighbor is necessarily deceived. - Mazzotta, on the Minister, at the end.

[3]  You will say more clearly: when something fictively is placed which pertains to the essence of the sacrament. But this definition differs from the preceding one, which extends much more broadly; for by some fiction an opinion of a conferred sacrament can be induced, even when no form or matter has been applied.

222. Hence you will resolve. - 1º A Priest would sin most gravely who in Mass would pronounce the consecratory words over bread and wine while excluding the intention of consecrating. Nor can those be excused in good faith who, laboring under crass ignorance and celebrating in mortal sin, simulate consecration lest they become guilty of sacrilege, even if they altogether omit the words of consecration.

2º A Confessor would sin gravely who would pronounce the words of absolution without the mind of absolving, even if he did this in order more easily to extricate himself from an indisposed penitent who asks urgently for absolution, or even demands it by most grave threats. Several say that in this case a Confessor can say: I do not absolve thee... pronouncing the not so low that it is not heard by the penitent. St. Ligorius, n. 59, judges this not improbable; but the Confessor could then easily pronounce other words or prayers rather than the form of absolution; besides, this case seems almost chimerical.

3º But a Confessor does not simulate the Sacrament of Penance who recites prayers over an indisposed penitent, lest the bystanders notice that he is dismissed without absolution; for it is clear among all that penitents are often dismissed with only a blessing, and sometimes approach the sacred tribunal without the intention of confessing or of completing a confession. - St. Ligorius, n. 59, and others commonly.

4º A Priest sins gravely who gives an unconsecrated host as consecrated even to one knowing and consenting, as sometimes happens to miserable Priests with an accomplice who, for the sake of preserving reputation, approaches the sacred table. The reason is that in this way an unconsecrated host is exposed to the adoration both of those present and even of the knowingly receiving person himself with external reverence, which constitutes external and material idolatry, and therefore something intrinsically evil. - St. Ligorius, n. 61.

5º Nevertheless, according to the common opinion, those who, compelled by grave fear, simulate entering matrimony do not sin, at least not gravely. The reason is that, since voluntary consent is lacking, according to the now certain opinion which holds that the spouses are the ministers of this Sacrament, matter and form are lacking, and therefore there is no simulation of a Sacrament, but only simulation of a contract. From another side, the error could sufficiently be adverted to from the circumstances, and thus necessary deception would not be present.

§ III. On the Manner of Conferring the Sacraments

223. ○ It is not enough if the minister diligently observes those things which pertain to the matter and form; but he ought studiously to observe all the laws of the Holy Church concerning the administration of the Sacraments. Let him take care that all things be performed gravely, religiously, and with the edification of the faithful. Let him beware lest because of excessive speed, or custom of acting, or even defect of memory, he omit anything. It will generally be safer if in reciting the prayers he has the Ritual before his eyes.

224. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Whether the use of the Roman Ritual in the administration of the Sacraments is of precept?

Resp. Affirmatively. For more than once the Sacred Congregation of Rites declared that those books alone are to be employed, and in them only those blessings which are conformable to the Roman Ritual, and that no others are to be employed, provided it is not clear that they have been approved by this Sacred Congregation (S. C. Rit. 7 April 1832, and 23 May 1835. In Gardellini 4681).

Therefore it must be guarded against most carefully, lest formulas of blessings be employed which it is not clear have been approved by the Sacred Congregation of Rites. To this end it will be very useful to consult the recent edition of the Roman Ritual procured by the presses of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, with the Supplement or collection of new blessings which the Pontiff conceded and approved.

225. ○ Very recently, however, to this question proposed to the Sacred Congregation of Rites: Even if the Church of Le Mans may provide for itself concerning the Breviary and Missal again and again, as it pleases, whether a faculty of this sort is to be extended to the Pontifical, Ceremonial of Bishops, Martyrology, and Roman Ritual; namely, so that, with the Most Reverend Bishop tolerating, permitting, or even otherwise establishing something, Canons or other Priests can with uninjured conscience infringe or omit the preceptive rules of the aforesaid books, and thus the will of the Most Reverend Bishop in these cases is for them a sufficient dispensation? - the Sacred Congregation responded: Negatively and no further (S. C. Rit. 10 January 1852).

226. ○ QUESTION 2º. What sacred vestments are required for the administration of the Sacraments?

Resp. With the case of urgent necessity excluded, a stole and surplice are generally required. It is said, surplice; for however much a contrary use may prevail in many places, the rochet is not a sacred vestment to be employed in the administration of the Sacraments, and therefore for administering them the surplice must necessarily be used. Thus the Sacred Congregation of Rites, 10 January 1852, in the Le Mans case. But the stole ought not to be worn except in the confection of Sacraments and sacramentals, and in the act of preaching where the custom prevails, and also in certain other functions, as is prescribed in the Roman Ritual. But the use of wearing the stole as a sign of jurisdiction and preeminence is reproved as an abuse. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Rites, 10 September 1816, 11 September 1847, and 7 September 1850.

More concerning the manner of administering the Sacraments will be treated where the individual Sacraments are treated in particular.

Chapter IV. On the Subject of the Sacraments

227. ○ The subject of a Sacrament is called he who receives the Sacrament, and is capable of the effect of the Sacrament.

The subject of the Sacraments is only man as wayfarer; because, as is plain from Sacred Scripture and tradition, the Sacraments were instituted for wayfaring men alone. Yet not all men are capable of all the Sacraments. For neither women can receive the Sacrament of Order, nor children not yet using reason can receive the Sacraments of Penance and Extreme Unction.

The reason a priori why only wayfaring man is capable of the Sacraments is the will of Christ the Lord, the institutor of the Sacraments. But the reason of fittingness is that according to the order of present Providence, only wayfaring man is capable of first grace or an increase of grace; but of this kind are not the Blessed or souls detained in purgatory, for whom the measure of glory corresponding to the grace which they had in mortal life has already been determined. But the damned are much less capable of grace, as being already separated from God for eternity. With these things posited, we must treat of the requisites both for the valid and for the licit reception of the Sacraments.

Article I. On the Requisites for the Valid Reception of the Sacraments

228. Principles. - I. For receiving the sacraments validly, no probity, nor properly Faith, is required in the subject, if you except the Sacrament of Penance. This is clear from the practice of the Church, which never permitted heretics and wicked men duly baptized and ordained to be baptized or ordained again. It is also clear, as to Faith, from the express definition of the Council of Trent, sess. 7, Can. 13, on Baptism.

II. In infants or the perpetually insane, no disposition, nor intention, is required, so that they may validly receive the Sacraments of which they are capable, namely Baptism, Confirmation, Order, and Eucharist, which was once ministered to them. This is clear from the practice of the Church and the common opinion, etc.

III. In adults, for the valid reception of the Sacraments, some intention is required; because it is not fitting that an adult be sanctified unless he wills it. But for most Sacraments a habitual intention suffices, even sometimes only confused, or implicit, with the nature of each Sacrament considered; because the conferral of the Sacraments is a certain donation and benefit, for accepting which a habitual intention suffices. But it must be said otherwise of one conferring a Sacrament; because since he ought to act in a human manner, it is necessary that he have at least a virtual intention.

IV. For validly receiving the other Sacraments, reception of Baptism is pre-required; therefore an unbaptized man is in no way capable of the other Sacraments. The reason is that the other Sacraments were instituted for the Church alone; but through Baptism alone men become members of the Church. Therefore... etc. Thus Eugene IV defined in the Decree for the Armenians.

229. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Is attention required in an adult subject, so that he may validly receive a Sacrament?

Resp. Negatively, altogether. For intention suffices, as has already been explained, even in Sacraments which require a virtual intention; the reason is that a human act does not proceed from attention, but from the will or from intention. Moreover most Sacraments, as has been said, do not even require a virtual intention; therefore a fortiori they do not require attention on the part of the subject. Moreover attention is not required in the Minister for confecting a Sacrament, as is clear from what was said above, n. 96; therefore a fortiori it is not required in the subject. - Sporer, n. 157.

Hence penitents are sometimes troubled by scruples in vain from the fact that they suffered distractions while they were being absolved, or that they were absolved without noticing it.

230. ○ QUESTION 2º. What intention is required in adults for receiving the individual Sacraments?

Resp. 1º For Baptism to be validly received in adults, an intention at least habitual is required, which was previously expressed and never retracted. Nevertheless some say that an implicit will of Baptism suffices, such as would be in him who had the will of performing all things necessary for salvation. See St. Alphonsus, n. 81 [1].

[1]  La Croix (Lib. 6, Part 1, n. 288) says: It is probable that an implicit habitual intention suffices, according to what was said n. 168. Hence it is probable... that an intention suffices by which someone generally desires that the means necessary for salvation be applied to him, because Christ could have instituted baptism thus; and Suarez grants that extreme unction was instituted thus; but baptism is much more necessary for salvation. And again (in the cited place, n. 168): An implicit intention alone suffices, contained in contrition or attrition; hence according to them (namely the Doctors whose opinion he brings forward), a Jew or even a Heathen in danger of death could be baptized, if it were probably judged that he had at least attrition, because in this there is included the vow of observing all the precepts, and likewise of receiving all the means necessary for salvation, and therefore also of receiving baptism. For this opinion he brings forward nine Doctors, while for the opposite he enumerates only four. Nor ought it to be passed over here that the reasons which Lugo objects after Suarez (De Sacram., Disp. 9, nn. 129, 130) are in truth not of great weight.

2º For Confirmation a habitual will suffices, even implicit, or, as St. Ligorius says, interpretative. - Thus it can be conferred on a dying person destitute of senses. Yet this is foreign to the practice of the Church, because Confirmation is not necessary for salvation. - St. Ligorius, n. 81, etc. [2].

[2]  St. Alphonsus in this place does not treat of a dying person destitute of senses, but of those sleeping, drunk, or fallen into insanity, who previously had the intention of receiving the sacraments, and whom he teaches, with the most common opinion of the Doctors, validly to receive them. But if he adds with Suarez that sacraments are illicitly conferred on them, nevertheless he excepts: unless they are in probable danger of death; for otherwise the time is to be awaited when the one receiving becomes possessed of reason.

But concerning confirmation he has these things (n. 82): Thus also, by an interpretative or general will, the sacrament of confirmation can be conferred on a dying person destitute of senses, as Lugo, Sporer, Elbel, and Croix say with Con. (that is, Coninck, not Conc., as certain editions of St. Alphonsus have it: for how would Croix, much earlier than Concina, have alleged Concina?!), Arriaga, and Bernal. Aversa alone was the one who (In part. 3, q. 64, Sect. 9) wrote: It is not, however, in use that this sacrament be supplied to such a one destitute of senses: because it is not conferred except by a Bishop and with greater solemnity, and it is not of such necessity, nor per se instituted for the dying. And I would think that Blessed Alphonsus, who had seen this opinion mentioned at least in Croix (Lib. 6, part 1, n. 169), did not consider it worthy even of mention, both because use has the contrary, and because those reasons are truly of no moment.

3º For Penance an intention either actual, or at least virtual, is required; and therefore a habitual intention does not suffice [3]. - St. Ligorius, n. 82.

[3]  St. Alphonsus is not to be understood thus, as if either actual or virtual intention must then necessarily be present when the sacrament is perfected, that is, when absolution is conferred. For someone could have sought the sacrament before, which nevertheless is conferred on him much later when he is now destitute of senses. And if indeed you call habitual the intention which, once previously had, afterwards perseveres neither in itself nor by force in any effect, but only was not retracted, certainly in the aforesaid hypothesis you will be able to affirm that even a habitual intention suffices.

But the opinion of St. Alphonsus in reality looks to another thing, as the reason which he adds makes clear. It is required, he says, that there be an intention either actual, or at least virtual, since there are required there, for matter, acts of the penitent, which indeed cannot be had without a will at least virtual of receiving the sacrament... according to what is to be said n. 447. But in that place he does not treat of the intention necessary for receiving the sacrament, but raises the question whether sorrow must have been elicited with the intention of Confession. And he himself indeed adheres to the affirmative opinion rather than to the negative, although he confesses this latter to be absolutely more probable; concerning which matter it will be said in its place. Meanwhile it is manifest, according to this latter opinion, that someone can approach the sacrament not only with a virtual, but plainly with an actual intention, although he had not then ordered to confession the sorrow elicited before. From which things it is plain that the sense in which Blessed Alphonsus disputes concerning the intention necessary for the sacrament of Penance has no bearing on the present question concerning intention.

4º For Extreme Unction a habitual intention suffices, or an implicit, or interpretative one, as Theologians commonly say, and as is clear from the Roman Ritual, where it is said concerning it: This Sacrament is to be supplied to those destitute of senses who asked it before, or probably would have asked it. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

5º For Order certainly an interpretative intention in an adult does not suffice, because without explicit will no adult can undergo the most grave obligation of the clerical state. Nevertheless a habitual intention seems to suffice. But in practice an actual intention, or at least a virtual one, ought to be required. - St. Ligorius, n. 82. 6º For Matrimony an intention at least virtual is required, because Matrimony is perfected by contract, for which deliberation and full will are necessary. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

Article II. On the Requisites for the Licit Reception of the Sacraments

231. Principles. - I. For receiving the Sacraments of the living licitly and fruitfully, besides the intention of receiving them, the state of grace is pre-required. For these by their primary institution from Christ are ordered, not to conferring first grace, but its increase, since they already suppose first grace in the subject. Hence they sin gravely who knowingly receive the Sacraments of the living in the state of mortal sin, and indeed more gravely than those who unworthily minister or confect them. - St. Ligorius, n. 86. - But the state of grace is to be procured through confession if one must approach the Eucharist; or at least through perfect contrition if there is question of other Sacraments, as was said above about the Minister. But it is better, insofar as can be done, always to premise confession also to the reception of the other Sacraments.

II. For the Sacraments of the dead to be licitly received by adults, acts at least implicit of Faith and Hope are required, according to the words of the Apostle, Heb. 11:6: He that comes to God must believe that He is, and is a rewarder to those who seek Him. There is required besides an act of sorrow for sins, because no pardon of sins is given without retraction or sorrow for sins committed. But in the Sacrament of Penance these things are necessary also for validity, because they pertain to the disposition of the penitent. - Trent, sess. 14, on Penance, c. 4. - But attrition suffices, as will be said in its place. - St. Ligorius, n. 86.

232. Questions. - QUESTION 1º. Do Sacraments received validly but illicitly, when the obstacle has been removed, revive, or produce the graces proper to themselves [1]?

[1]  Here you have the question about sacraments which are to be held valid, but at the same time unformed. But in truth nothing compels that a question of this kind be restricted to those cases in which a man approaches the sacrament itself illicitly. For it can happen that the force of the sacrament finds an obstacle, although someone receives the sacrament in good faith, for example if, from inadvertence, an adult approaching baptism in no way sorrows for actual sins. Indeed this hypothesis is necessarily required, so that among such valid but unformed sacraments the Sacrament of Penance also can be numbered. For the absolution which has been imparted to one confessing in bad faith and sacrilegiously cannot be held valid, and therefore fit to exercise its force after the obstacle has been removed. See Cardinal De Lugo, De Sacram., Disp. 9, nn. 100-102, and De Poenit., Disp. 14, nn. 68, 74, 89.

Resp. Affirmatively, at least for most Sacraments. The reason is that it happens only per accidens that they do not produce their proper effects, namely on account of the obstacle; and therefore those effects indeed remain suspended while the obstacle remains; but when this has been removed, they ought to be applied to the soul. This is admitted as certain for Sacraments impressing a character. The same must probably be said also of the Sacrament of Extreme Unction and of Matrimony, which cannot be repeated during the same illness or the same marriage. - St. Ligorius, nn. 6 and 87.

QUESTION 2º. What disposition is required in the subject so that an unformed Sacrament may revive?

Resp. This general rule is commonly established: that disposition is required which was lacking, and whose absence caused the obstacle to the effect of the Sacrament; or precisely that must be placed which was necessarily required in the reception of the Sacrament. Hence per se attrition suffices for the reviviscence of Baptism and Extreme Unction [2]. But perfect contrition, or attrition with confession, is required for the other Sacraments, namely for Confirmation, Order, and Matrimony. Likewise, if Baptism was unformed because of the defect of Faith alone, it will revive by an act of Faith with attrition for the sin of infidelity. The reason is that just as the obstacle was introduced because of the lack of some required disposition, so it is removed by the placing of the same: for then no reason remains why the effect of the Sacrament should remain suspended. - Thus St. Thomas, 3 part, qu. 69, art. 10 (for Baptism). - Lugo, D. 9, n. 50 and following. - Lacroix, n. 207.

[2]  The same must be said, as is plain, about the sacrament of Penance, if it happens to have been valid, but because of a defect of sorrow for some sin to have been at the same time unformed. See Lugo, cited place in the preceding note.

233. ○ QUESTION 3º. Does attrition suffice so that unformed Baptism may revive, if the one receiving has committed other grave sins?

Resp. I deny, because sins committed after Baptism are necessary matter of the Sacrament of Penance, and therefore cannot be remitted except through that Sacrament, or through perfect contrition with the vow of the Sacrament of Penance included in it. - Lugo, D. 9, n. 55. - Lacroix, n. 207.

QUESTION 4º. Is it licit to ask a Sacrament from an unworthy minister?

Resp. 1º It is not licit without cause, because thus without reason an unworthy minister would be induced to sin gravely. But this is illicit per se, because charity demands that we impede the sin of neighbor which we can easily impede. - St. Ligorius, n. 89, and others commonly.

Resp. 2º But it is licit if the Sacrament cannot easily be sought from another Priest, nor can its reception easily be deferred; for no one is held with great inconvenience to yield from his own right in order to impede the free sin of another. Then the one asking the Sacrament simply permits sin, but is not the cause of the sin. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - But a sufficient cause would be, for example, the Paschal precept to be fulfilled, or if someone otherwise would have to remain long in the state of mortal sin, or be deprived of Communion, etc.

QUESTION 5º. Is it licit to ask a Sacrament from an excommunicated or heretical minister?

Resp. If the minister is excommunicated as one to be avoided, it is not licit except in extreme necessity; but if he is tolerated, it will be licit even without grave cause, because the Council of Constance conceded absolutely to the faithful that they can communicate with the tolerated. - St. Ligorius, n. 88. - See what is to be said in the Treatise on Censures.

Treatise On Baptism

We must treat: 1. of the nature, properties, and necessity of Baptism; 2. of the matter and form; 3. of the Minister; 4. of the subject and the accessory solemnities.

Chapter I. On the Nature, Properties, and Necessity of Baptism

234. ○ The word Baptismus or Baptisma signifies the same as immersion and washing; whence Baptism is also called a laver, because it wipes away sins.

Baptism is defined: The Sacrament of regeneration through water in the word. Thus the Roman Catechism; or: It is the first Sacrament of the new law, and most necessary for the spiritual regeneration of man, instituted by Christ.

From Baptism of water, which is called that of the stream, Baptism of the Spirit and of blood are distinguished, by which Baptism properly so called can be supplied, if this latter is impossible [1]. The former is an ardent desire of receiving Baptism of water, with full conversion to God, namely with contrition or perfect charity [2]. The latter is the shedding of blood, or death endured for the Faith, or for another Christian virtue. But Baptism of water alone is properly called Baptism in reality. Baptism of the Spirit and of blood are called Baptisms in vow.

[1] It is not at all necessary that Baptism of water be impossible. For even before Baptism of water, which otherwise is possible but is delayed, Baptism of the Spirit can have place.

[2] The desire here is to be understood not as explicit, which would presuppose some notion of real Baptism, but as implicit; and it signifies not so much a longing in the proper sense of the name, as a prompt will of doing all those things which are commanded by God. Since this prompt will is necessarily contained in an act of perfect contrition or charity, therefore this Baptism of the Spirit in reality consists in conversion to God through contrition or charity, which will contain the vow or purpose, either implicit or explicit, of receiving Baptism of water, according as the notion of this Baptism is, or is not, present to the mind of him who is thus converted to God.

235. ○ The chief effects of Baptism are numbered as three, namely:

1. the remission of original sin and of actual sins, if there are any, through the infusion of sanctifying grace; 2. the total remission of eternal and temporal punishment due to sins; 3. the impression of the character, by which the baptized person is marked as a son of God and coheir of Christ, and is rendered incapable of receiving Baptism again. As to the first, it is clear from Trent, sess. 5, in the Decree on original sin; as to the second, from Trent, ibid., and from the Council of Florence in the Decree for the Armenians; as to the third, from the Council of Florence, ibid., and from Trent, sess. 7, on Baptism.

Baptism, therefore, is as it were the gate of the Church and of the kingdom of heaven. Hence if anyone has not been validly baptized, he can validly receive no other Sacrament.

Baptism of water, in reality or in vow [3], by divine institution is altogether necessary for salvation by necessity of means. This is clear from the words of Christ, John 3.5: Unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God. And from Trent, sess. 7, can. 5, on Baptism: If anyone shall say that Baptism is free, that is, not necessary for salvation, let him be anathema.

[3] According to what was said in the preceding note, understand: in vow, either explicit or implicit.

Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of Baptism

Article I. On the Matter, Both Remote and Proximate, of Baptism

§ I. On the Remote Matter of Baptism

236. Principles. - I. The valid matter of Baptism is natural water alone, or elemental water, suitable for washing. It is of Faith. This is clear: 1. from the words of Christ, John 3.5: Unless a man be born again of water, etc. - It is clear: 2. from the Councils, especially from the Council of Florence in the Decree for the Armenians, and from Trent, sess. 7, can. 2, on Baptism: If anyone shall say that true and natural water is not of the necessity of Baptism, and therefore shall twist to some metaphor those words of our Lord Jesus Christ: Unless a man be born again of water and the Holy Spirit, let him be anathema.

II. The licit matter of Baptism, outside a case of necessity, is only blessed or consecrated water, and mixed with chrism according to the rite of the Church, at least for solemn Baptism. This is clear from Canon Law. See below, on the ceremonies of Baptism. But he certainly sins gravely by a sin of sacrilege who, without grave necessity, uses impure, turbid, or feculent water, although this matter is valid. - St. Ligorius, n. 102, etc.

III. In danger of death, if matter certainly valid cannot be had, doubtful matter must be used under this condition: If this matter is sufficient... Then even a slight probability concerning the value of the matter suffices, because in necessity one must come to the aid of the neighbor in the best way in which it can be done. But if one so baptized survives, when there is an abundance of matter certainly valid, he must again be baptized under this condition: If thou art not baptized, I baptize thee, etc. - Common.

237. Resolves. - 1. Valid matter is: 1. water of springs, wells, rivers, the sea, ponds, marshes, lakes, cisterns; 2. water resolved from ice, snow, or hail, because it preserves the same substance, although accidentally it has been changed as to color, taste, or smell; 3. sulphurous or mineral water, water collected from vapor, dew, or flowing in stormy weather from a wall, leaves, etc.; 4. turbid water, mixed with another substance, provided that water is the matter truly and certainly predominating, so that according to the use or estimation of men it can still be called water. - St. Ligorius, n. 103. - Elbel, n. 8, and others commonly.

2. Invalid matter is: 1. milk, blood, tears, sweat, saliva, spittle, urine; 2. wine, oil, beer, thick broth from fat, etc.; 3. mud, ink; 4. snow, ice, hoarfrost, and other similar things not yet resolved, because in this state they are not natural water [1].

[1]  Better, as the VV. observe (p. 929, n. 87), St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 104): It is doubted, 4. whether ice or snow not melted is suitable matter. Concina and Croix likewise deny it (lib. 6, p. 1, n. 262) with Tanner; but Aversa, cited by Croix, and Hurtado, Praepositus, and Puteanus, cited by Renzi, doubt; therefore they say that in necessity it can be used under condition.

3. Doubtful matter is: 1. very thin broth, lye, weak beer, water from dissolved salt; thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 103; 2. humor flowing from a vine and from other plants. - St.

Ligorius, n. 104.

§ II. On the Proximate Matter of Baptism

238. ○ The proximate matter of Baptism is washing, which can be done in three ways, namely by immersion, sprinkling, and pouring, according to the practice of the different Churches, so that by the moral judgment of men the baptized person is judged to have been washed. This is clear from the words of the form, and from the perpetual practice of the Church, as well as from Paul, Eph. 5.26: Cleansing by the laver of water in the word of life.

239. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether a child can be validly baptized in the mother's womb?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, more probably, if the child in the womb is reached by water through some intervening instrument; because, since the infant already exists as a wayfarer man, he can be validly baptized. Nor is it an obstacle that the child is still wrapped in the secundina, because this is considered as a kind of part of the infant. Nevertheless, he must be baptized under condition, because it is not certainly established whether Baptism conferred in this way is valid. Therefore, if the child is born, he must again be baptized under condition. - St. Ligorius, n. 107. More recently, however, the skill of physicians has introduced another method by which a child not yet brought forth into the light can be baptized more certainly. Namely, an instrument has been invented by which the secundina is cut; and thus water, by another instrument being applied, can arrive so as immediately to touch the very body of the fetus [1].

[1] Compare the things said in Vol. I, in the note to n. 401, where abortion is treated.

 Yet here the doubt must be satisfied which the VV. raise at this place (p. 929, in note): Since St. Alphonsus, they say, calls the validity of Baptism conferred on a child existing in the mother's womb only sufficiently probable, Father Ballerini certainly errs in the note to n. 401, tom. 1, when he says: According to those things which St. Alphonsus discusses in lib. 6, n. 107, after Benedict XIV, we can be altogether certain concerning the validity of Baptism thus conferred on infants enclosed in the womb.

Resp. This remained: that the VV. should give the reason for that word, ERRS. Indeed they would rightly have written so if in Father B.'s note it were said that the validity of Baptism thus conferred is handed down as certain both by St. Alphonsus and by Benedict XIV. But no such assertion is seen there; rather it is merely said that we can be certain according to those things which St. Alphonsus discusses after Benedict XIV. Now behold the easy and obvious reason for this affirmation. For, to prevent us from being able to be certain concerning the validity of this Baptism, two things especially stood in the way: one, that he who has not yet been born cannot be reborn; the other, that an infant in the womb cannot be washed, as St. Thomas objected. But the first difficulty St. Doctor Alphonsus has now solved so lucidly that he has utterly destroyed it. To this response it will be useful to have added this other reason (in Comitolius, lib. 1, q. 3, n. 1): If it is not a Sacrament, it is not one because birth from the womb is necessary; but that this is not necessary by essential necessity is clear from this: because a child enclosed in the womb of a dead mother is baptized after the mother has been cut open; which child cannot properly be called born. And an illustrious example stands forth in St. Raymond, to whom for this reason the surname NON-BORN was given. But as to the other difficulty, even if the matter could have seemed less certain to the St. Doctor, who merely intimates that the child can duly be washed in the womb, citing only the testimony of Benedict XIV after Comitolius, yet concerning that matter there can now be no further doubt. Hence, indeed, the argument which Comitolius (l.c.) also reports thus: Where nothing essential is lacking to Baptism, there it is necessary that there be true Baptism, since four essentials are considered in Baptism: matter, form, the minister with the intention of the Church, and the human supposit receiving the Sacrament. Here those four are found; therefore there can be no doubt concerning Baptism.

But, you will say, why did St. Alphonsus call this opinion merely sufficiently probable? Resp. Let it be permitted to conjecture that the St. Doctor thus moderated his judgment because what was being maintained concerning the necessary washing did not seem sufficiently certain to him. Hence (l.c.) he also has recourse to the doctrine of Sylvester and Vasquez, who say that an infant wrapped in the secundina is validly baptized; and he adds that this is judged probable by Laymann. And from these things it is clear how the state of the controversy, treated so clearly by St. Alphonsus, paved the way for us, so that what could seem to him only probable can now already be certainly established.

And from these things it is concluded that certainly in the state of the controversy as St. Alphonsus handles it, room is left for other questions concerning the dangers which would seem to have to be undergone by the mother, in order that the eternal salvation of the offspring may be provided for. But from this it cannot likewise be inferred that the same thing has place when the condition of the controversy has become different.

QUESTION 2. Whether Baptism is valid if the water touches only the clothes or the hair of the person to be baptized?

Resp. 1. If the water touches only the clothes, Baptism is certainly invalid, because thus no one would say that the man is washed; 2. however, it is more probably valid if the water touches the hair. But in practice the safer part must be followed. - St. Ligorius, n. 107, q. 3. - Hence, if the person to be baptized has hair, the Priest should either part his hair with the fingers of the left hand while he pours the water with the right, or baptize him on the forehead. - Scov.

QUESTION 3. Whether Baptism conferred on another part than on the head is valid?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, more probably, especially if Baptism is conferred on some more principal part, for example on the breast, shoulders, etc. Nevertheless, if necessity compelled this, afterwards, if it can be done, Baptism should be repeated under condition. - St. Ligorius, ibid., q. 4.

240. ○ QUESTION 4. Whether one or another drop of water suffices for baptizing?

Resp. The answer is negative, more probably, especially if the water does not flow, because that cannot be called washing, which is altogether required for Baptism. - Thus commonly. Nevertheless it seems to be doubtful matter, which in a case of necessity should be used. - St. Ligorius, n. 107, q. 6. - Elbel, n. 16. But they commonly say that the matter is then certain if the one baptizing, by movement of a moistened finger, washed a part of the body. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 5. Whether triple washing is required for Baptism?

Resp. 1. It is certainly not required for validity; for one washing suffices, so that someone is judged truly washed. - Thus all with St. Thomas, part 3, q. 66, art. 8.

Resp. 2. But it is required for liceity, and indeed under grave obligation, where this triple pouring of water is prescribed, as in the Roman Ritual. Yet these things seem to be understood of solemn Baptism.

Article II. On the Form of Baptism

241. ○ The form of Baptism is: I baptize thee in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Thus the Council of Trent defined, according to that saying, Matt. 28.19: Going therefore, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Among the Greeks, however, it is said: Let the servant of Christ be baptized in the name of the Father, etc. Or: The servant of Christ is baptized, etc. This form is valid from the instruction of Eugene IV to the Armenians; but it is licit only in the Greek Church.

Several Theologians, among whom is St. Alphonsus, judge that the omission of the word Amen at the end of the form of Baptism is venial, which word, however, is not found in the Roman Ritual. Therefore it is asked whether it is to be used or omitted? Resp. The Sacred Congregation of Rites: In the case the Roman Ritual is to be strictly observed (June 9, 1853, Cochinchina).

This form can be vitiated in many ways, either accidentally or substantially, as was said above in the Treatise on the Sacraments in general, n. 198.

The omission of the word I does not pertain to the essence of the form, nor would it exceed a venial sin. - St. Ligorius, n. 111. The same seems to have to be said, at least more probably, concerning the omission of the conjunction and, especially if it is omitted only once and is placed before the third person. The same also more probably concerning the word in, although several grave Theologians contradict. But the other words are altogether required for validity.

242. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the form of Baptism is valid if it is said: I baptize thee in the name of the Most Holy Trinity, or in the name of Christ?

Resp. to the first: No, at least more probably, because in such a form the several persons of the Holy Trinity are not sufficiently distinctly expressed; since the word Trinity signifies the persons only confusedly and implicitly; but Christ willed that they be distinctly expressed, as is clear from Matt., last chapter. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 111.

Resp. to the second: No, at least a fortiori, because the Trinity is in no way expressed through the phrase in the name of Christ. - Thus all, at least now after St. Thomas, 3 part, q. 66, art. 6; and it is clear from Canon Law in c. Si revera, 30, De Consecrat., dist. 4. - St. Ligorius, n. 112.

QUESTION 2. Whether Baptism is valid if there is added to the accustomed form: and in the name of the blessed Virgin Mary?

Resp. A distinction must be made: It is not valid if someone, doing this, intends to confer Baptism in the name of the blessed Virgin, namely by attributing to such names true efficacy in the value of Baptism. - But otherwise, if he does this from importunate devotion. - St. Ligorius, n. 111.

Chapter III. On the Minister of Baptism

The minister of Baptism is one thing as ordinary, and another as extraordinary. Again, the extraordinary Minister is twofold: namely the Minister of solemnity and of necessity.

243. Principles. - I. Every Priest, and only a Priest, by force of his ordination is the ordinary minister of Baptism. This is clear from various places of Canon Law and from the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union, as well as from the universal practice of the Church.

II. A Deacon is the extraordinary Minister and one of solemnity, that is, he is able to baptize solemnly, but only by delegation and for a grave cause. This is clear from Canon Law and from the Roman Pontifical, or from the instruction of the Bishop to Deacons in ordination, etc.

III. Any human being using reason, whether man or woman, whether Catholic or heretic, whether faithful or infidel, is an extraordinary Minister of Baptism, so that he can always validly baptize, and in necessity also licitly. This is drawn from the same sources as was said above in the first principle.

IV. Although every Priest by force of ordination has the power of baptizing, nevertheless he cannot licitly use it, even privately, outside a case of necessity, unless he has ordinary or delegated jurisdiction. This is clear from Canon Law and from the Roman Ritual on Baptism.

244. Resolves. - 1. Neither a Parish Priest nor a Bishop, without commission, licitly baptizes outside his own diocese or parish, or strangers within it. And therefore parents also sin who, without the license of their Prelate, bring their offspring to another to be baptized, since they violate the right of the Parish Priest. - St. Ligorius, n. 114.

2. Travelers or vagrants can be baptized in any Church which they have chosen. If by chance a woman gives birth in a village not her own, the offspring is to be baptized by the Parish Priest of that village, unless perhaps her own village is not far distant from there. - St. Ligorius, n. 114.

3. According to the more common and more probable opinion, all can receive Baptism and the other Sacraments from the Parish Priest of the place where they have already contracted quasi-domicile [1]. - St. Ligorius, n. 115.

[1] This doctrine is to be held not merely as more probable, but as certain.

4. But a stranger can be baptized with the license, either express or reasonably presumed, of his proper Priest. - St. Ligorius, n. 115.

5. Religious can baptize in a case of necessity, or with the same license of the Parish Priest and of their own Superior, since this is prohibited by no law. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

245. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What order must be observed among the Ministers of Baptism?

Resp. In the Roman Ritual it is thus had: If a Priest is present, he is to be preferred to a Deacon; a Deacon to a Subdeacon; a Cleric to a layman; and a man to a woman, unless, for the sake of modesty, it is becoming that a woman, rather than a man, baptize an infant not wholly brought forth, or unless the woman knew better the form and manner of baptizing. See St. Ligorius, n. 117.

QUESTION 2. Whether a layman sins mortally who, in necessity, with a Priest present, baptizes?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, with the common opinion. The reason is that then he truly usurps the right of the Priest, to whom by the power of Order the office of baptizing has been committed. Therefore the Priest himself also sins gravely if he yields the administration to a layman. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

246. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether a layman sins gravely by baptizing before a Deacon?

Resp. It is controverted. The first probable opinion affirms; because a Deacon by force of ordination is deputed to baptize, although from the actual practice of the Church he cannot baptize solemnly except for a grave cause and with the license of the Parish Priest.

The second equally probable opinion denies, because a Deacon baptizing in a case of necessity without commission does not baptize from office, but in the same way as an inferior Cleric or a layman. - St. Ligorius, ibid., says that both opinions are probable.

Chapter IV. On the Subject of Baptism

The subject of Baptism is every and only wayfarer human being not yet baptized.

247. Resolves. - 1. Infants are validly baptized, likewise those perpetually insane who have never used reason, and consequently are considered of the same condition as infants. But if they have at some time used reason, Baptism more probably is not valid unless before their insanity they had asked for it. Yet in practice these would have to be baptized under condition, both because it is not altogether established that they did not ask for Baptism, and also because according to many it is enough if someone had the will of receiving all things necessary for salvation. - On the Sacraments in general, n. 228.

2. If there is doubt whether an infant is alive, he is to be baptized under condition. Hence Theologians rightly judge generally that all abortive fetuses are always to be baptized under condition, if they are alive; especially since today the opinion flourishes, commonly received by experts, that the fetus is informed by the soul from the beginning of conception, or at least not long after [1].

[1] This opinion, midway between two opinions, one of which sets animation immediately from conception, the other at forty or even eighty days, seems to be the opinion of those who never knew or understood the reasons of either opposite opinion, and who therefore also cannot assign the reasons which impelled them to tread that middle way.

 St. Alphonsus writes (lib. 6, n. 124): Cardenas, Roncaglia, Mazzotta, and Croix, with other very grave Authors, judge very well that all abortive fetuses, if by some movement they give a sign of life, and it is not established that they are destitute of a soul, are always to be baptized under the condition if they are alive; especially since today there flourishes the opinion, received not without applause by experts, that fetuses are informed by the soul from the beginning of conception, or at least after some days. And in these words the St. Doctor seems to intimate that these fetuses are to be baptized both if they give a sign of life and even if they do not give a sign of life, provided at least that it is not established that they are destitute of a soul, that is, dead. And the reason is that it is established by experience that sometimes a sign of life does not appear unless microscopic instruments are applied.

But perhaps what the St. Doctor adds in the same place will be less pleasing to someone: Besides, Tournely rightly observes (that is, Collet), tom. 4, p. 363 (namely, On Baptism, chap. 7, art. 1, sect. 2, concl. 2), that a fleshy mass which has no disposition of organs ought not to be baptized, since it is everywhere received that the soul is not infused into the body before that body has been formed; and then, in order that it be baptized, it is required that it indicate some vital movement, as the Roman Ritual prescribes concerning the Baptism of little children. What Collet meant seems somewhat obscure. For he adds these things as though as an inference from those things which he had said about baptizing monsters. But it is not obscure that those things do not cohere with those things which St. Alphonsus had set forth beforehand. For the opinion concerning the soul of the fetus, whether from the beginning of conception or after some days, in no way coheres with the antiquated opinion concerning the animation of the fetus, which follows after the disposition of the organs, so that the body has been formed.

That a fleshy mass ought not to be baptized, Collet endeavors to prove thus: The Ritual of Paul V, to which in this matter more credence is to be given than to certain physicians fighting against the rest, whether physicians or philosophers, forbids that a fetus be baptized before signs of vital motion. But: 1. It is not to be thought that in the Ritual it is established that the animation of the fetus is to be determined according to time from Peripatetic opinions; 2. The sign of life of which the Ritual speaks seems to St. Alphonsus to be taken in this way: that it is not established that the fetus is already lifeless. Besides, Collet may have written those things in whatever way according to the more received opinions of his age; but in our age, since those opinions have become obsolete, surely neither right reason permits, nor does the practice of the Church allow, that ancient prejudices of that sort prescribe for us the manner of acting in that most grave business, in which the eternal salvation of souls is at stake.

3. He is validly baptized whom the Minister thinks to be another; indeed even if it is a female whom he thinks to be a male; because he intends to baptize the one present and not another.

4. Several are validly baptized at the same time with this form, I baptize you, provided that they are washed at the same time. But outside a case of necessity this is illicit.

248. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the children of infidels can licitly be baptized?

Resp. 1. The answer is affirmative in the following cases, namely: 1. if they have the use of reason and consent, even if the parents oppose; 2. if the parents have fallen away from the Faith, as heretics are; because the Church has the right to coerce parents; 3. if the children are soon to die, because necessity presses, and no danger at all is to be feared; 4. if one of the parents consents, while the other resists. - St. Ligorius, n. 127.

Resp. 2. The answer is negative in other cases, for example if both parents resist, and the children are going to remain in the power of the parents; the reason is the danger of perversion. This is clear from the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, 1703. And for Hebrews in particular it is clear from the Constitution of Julius III. - St. Ligorius, n. 132.

QUESTION 2. Whether Baptism can or must ever be repeated?

Resp. It can and must be repeated under condition, whenever there is some not contemptible doubt concerning its value; otherwise it cannot be repeated without grave sin, because the attempt to administer a Sacrament to an incapable subject is sacrilege. - Recall the things said above, n. 200.

249. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether exposed infants are to be baptized?

Resp. The answer is affirmative if those exposed infants have been exposed without testimony of Baptism having been conferred, unless from elsewhere it is established that they were duly baptized. But if they have been exposed with a note attesting that they have been baptized, it is controverted. The more common and truer opinion teaches that all these are to be baptized under condition. - St. Ligorius, n. 135.

QUESTION 4. Whether infants baptized either by midwives or by lay persons are to be rebaptized?

Resp. No, unless there is a probable suspicion of error in the Baptism conferred. Thus the very common and true opinion, says St. Ligorius, n. 156, where he commemorates the decision of the Sacred Congregation.

QUESTION 5. Whether those baptized by heretics must be rebaptized?

Resp. It is certain, of Faith, from Trent, that Baptism conferred by heretics is valid when all things required for the Sacrament are used. But Theologians commonly and deservedly think that all children baptized by Protestant ministers are to be rebaptized under condition, because there must be doubt about the matter, form, and intention of such ministers, who do not judge this Sacrament to be absolutely necessary. - St. Ligorius, n. 137 [2].

[2] To the doctrine on the subject of Baptism belong those things which St. Alphonsus hands down concerning monsters (lib. 6, n. 125): When, he says, it is doubted whether a monster is a man, it is to be baptized absolutely if the head is human, although the members are beast-like; but under condition if the head is beast-like and the members human; this, indeed, if it proceeded from intercourse of a man with a woman. For if it proceeded from a man with a beast (which I think incredible), then it should always be baptized under condition; otherwise, if from a woman and a brute; for then it should in no way be baptized, because it would not descend from Adam, since it was not conceived from virile seed. To these things observe that the last consequence would be legitimate if it is established that a fetus of this sort cannot be a participant in human nature. But if you suppose otherwise, the consequence is not valid; for from the fact that he could not be called a son of Adam, it would follow only that he does not have original sin, according to those things which St. Thomas also has, 1.2, q. 81, art. 4, and 2, dist. 31, q. 1, art. 2, ad 3, but not that he does not need sanctification, which can be from grace alone. St. Alphonsus continues: But if it has duplicated members of a man, and it is doubted whether it is one man or two, a double Baptism is to be conferred, one absolutely, the other under condition on that part in which the members appear more imperfect... Then he refers to the Roman Ritual, in which these things are had: But in baptizing monsters, if the case happens, great caution must be used; concerning this, if there is need, the Ordinary of the place or other experts are to be consulted, unless danger of death threatens. A monster which does not present the human species must not be baptized; but if there is doubt about this, let it be baptized under this condition: If thou art a man, I baptize thee, etc. But that concerning which there is doubt whether it is one person or several is not to be baptized until this is discerned; and it can be discerned if it has one or several heads, one or several breasts; for then there will be as many hearts and souls, and distinct men; and in that case each is to be baptized separately, by saying to each: I baptize thee, etc. But if danger of death threatens, and time does not suffice that each be baptized separately, the minister, pouring water on the heads of each, will be able to baptize all together by saying: I baptize you in the name, etc. But when it is not certain that there are two persons in the monster, as because it does not have two heads and two breasts well distinct, then first one must be baptized absolutely, and afterwards the other in this way: If thou art not baptized, I baptize thee, etc.

Chapter V. On the Accessory Solemnities of Baptism, Namely on Sponsors and Ceremonies

Article I. On Sponsors

Sponsors are, as it were, spiritual fathers, who lift the baptized person from the sacred font, and, in default of the parents, undertake care of him upon themselves.

250. Principles. - I. In solemn Baptism, under grave obligation, at least one sponsor must be used, whether the sponsor is a man or a woman; nor can more than two licitly be used. Thus the Council of Trent established, sess. 24, c. 2, on Reformation. But if the Parish Priest admitted more than two sponsors, he would sin gravely, because he would harm the precept of the Church imposed under grave obligation, lest relationships be multiplied. - St. Ligorius, n. 154, at the end.

II. That someone be truly a sponsor, the following conditions are required: 1. that he have the use of reason, and himself be baptized; 2. that he have been designated as sponsor by the parents or the Parish Priest; 3. that he touch the baptized person by himself, or at least through another; 4. that he have a true intention of carrying out the office of sponsor. - St. Ligorius, n. 146.

251. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What are the obligations of sponsors?

Resp. They are bound to fulfill the office of teacher in a case of necessity, or when the parents of the little spiritual child are lacking. Hence they are bound to instruct the baptized person concerning the Faith, morals, various obligations, etc. But they are freed from every obligation when they can prudently presume that the baptized person is diligently instructed by the parents. - St. Ligorius, n. 147.

From this, the Priest, after Baptism has been conferred, must admonish the sponsors concerning the obligations undertaken, and besides concerning the spiritual relationship contracted. - But concerning that relationship contracted through Baptism we shall speak where the impediments of matrimony are treated.

QUESTION 2. Whether in private Baptism a sponsor must necessarily be used?

Resp. No, because it does not seem to be required by the Church except for solemn Baptism. Nevertheless, even in private Baptism a sponsor can be used, and is more laudably used. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 147, who nevertheless, n. 149, more probably judges that then spiritual relationship is not contracted.

QUESTION 3. Whether sponsors can be two males or two females?

Resp. No, because Trent established that at most two sponsors can be used, namely a man and a woman. But it is probable that it is only venial if it is done thus. Nevertheless, several with Bonacina think it to be mortal. - This seems truer, says St. Ligorius, n. 155, if the sponsors were of different sex from the infant, because thus relationships would be multiplied, which Trent wished to prohibit; otherwise if they were of the same sex.

252. ○ QUESTION 4. Whether the sponsor of a male, if he is the only one, must be male, and of a female, female?

Resp. No, more probably; because Trent says: Whether a man or a woman; therefore a man or a woman can be used indiscriminately. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 5. Who are prohibited from being sponsors?

Resp. Validly indeed, but illicitly, the following are sponsors: 1. an Abbot and Monk, or a Religious and Nun of any Order; 2. spouses with respect to spouses, and parents with respect to children; 3. all who are of wicked morals and lost reputation, as heretics, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 156.

Article II. On the Ceremonies of Baptism

It is mortal to omit all the ceremonies of Baptism, or some notable one from them, because thus a grave precept of the Church is violated.

253. Resolves. - 1. Necessity being excluded, it is mortal to baptize without the anointing of Chrism, because this has a special and grave signification. - St. Ligorius, n. 141.

2. Outside a case of necessity it is mortal to baptize solemnly with water not consecrated, because an omission of this sort in the ceremonies of Baptism is very grave. More probably also the same must be said if private Baptism is in question [1], as the Salmanticenses, Roncaglia, and Diana judge. Nevertheless Lacroix, n. 263; Gobat; St. Ligorius, n. 102, and in Homo apostolicus, n. 8, hold the opposite opinion, and not improbably.

[1] It scarcely appears why this opinion is called by the Author more probable. Indeed the authors alleged by him are conveniently explained of solemn Baptism, as St. Alphonsus also interpreted them, and they do not make any word about private Baptism. Nay, in the Synod of Genoa held under His Eminence Cardinal Tadini (chap. 5, section 1, On Baptism) it was forbidden that anyone use consecrated water in Baptisms conferred privately. See Frassinetti, Comp. Theol. mor., note 90.

3. It is mortal to baptize without necessity outside the Church, unless proximate danger of death threatens, or there is some other great inconvenience. - St. Ligorius, n. 142.

4. It is mortal to omit the anointing with the oil of catechumens, or other similar things, because it is grave matter, at least from the end of the Church, just as the mixing of water with wine in the holy Sacrament of the Eucharist. - St. Ligorius, n. 144.

254. Questions. - QUESTION 1. If Baptism solemnly conferred is discovered to be invalid, whether the ceremonies also must be repeated?

Resp. It is controverted. There is a twofold probable opinion. Hence the ceremonies need not necessarily be repeated; nevertheless it is to be advised that they be repeated, if this can be done without scandal or infamy.

QUESTION 2. How is the prohibition of using old chrism, or chrism of another year, to be understood?

Resp. 1. It is to be taken rigorously when new chrism is had. Therefore a Priest would sin gravely who, disregarding recent chrism, used old.

Resp. 2. But in solemn Baptism it is permitted to use chrism of the preceding year until fresh consecrated chrism has been received. Therefore the anointing with chrism and oil must not be omitted for this reason, that oils recently blessed could not yet have been had, nor for that cause must Baptism be deferred to another time, however brief. - Thus against not a few, from the recent decision of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, given on September 19, 1859, in Cadurcensis.

But the blessing of the baptismal font on Holy Saturday must be done with chrism of the preceding year, unless the Parish Priest has been able to procure recent oils for himself; nor must the infusion of chrism and oil be omitted until another is received. - Thus from the decision of the Sacred Congregation of Rites just cited.

255. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether the interrogations which, from the Rubric of the Roman Ritual, are to be made to the sponsors, can be made in the vernacular language?

Resp. No; but all things must be done as they lie in the Roman Ritual. Thus very recently the Sacred Congregation of Rites, on August 12, 1854, in Lucionensis. - Besides, nothing prevents those things which pertain to the Sacrament of Baptism itself from being explained in the vernacular language. - Thus from the response of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office to the Vicar Apostolic of Siam, April 30, 1808.

Appendix. On the Caesarean Operation

In order to baptize an infant not yet born.

The operation or Caesarean section consists in this: that the uterus of the pregnant mother is opened, so that the fetus may be extracted. A twofold chief question occurs, namely whether or when it can be done, or must be done.

256. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether or when it can be done?

Resp. The following rules seem to have to be established:

Rule I. When the mother is dead, it is certain that the Caesarean operation can be done, and indeed immediately when her death is established. Yet the Prefect or Superior of the place must be admonished, and witnesses approved by him must be used both for recognizing the death, and for greater certainty of the matter, and especially lest the author of the operation be traduced as guilty of homicide. But the reason why it can be done is evident: for if anything stood in the way, it would be the danger of the mother; but from the hypothesis her death is certainly established; and from another side the life spiritual, indeed perhaps also temporal, of the infant can be saved. - See Gangiamila in the work whose title is Sacred Embryology.

Rule II. While the mother is living, the Caesarean operation can never licitly be done whenever there is danger, either proximate or probable, of the death of the mother to follow from it, although, if it is not done, the mother and the offspring will certainly perish. The reason is that this would be the same as directly killing the mother, which is never permitted. - Thus St. Thomas, 3 part, q. 68, art. 11, ad 3, where he says: A man ought not to kill the mother in order to baptize the child. - St. Ligorius, n. 106. - Hence the operation cannot be done when a very skilled surgeon is lacking, nor when the mother is so debilitated by disease that the operation, otherwise not dangerous, is going to induce proximate danger of death from the circumstances, etc.

257. ○ Rule III. While the mother is living, the Caesarean operation can licitly be done, with these circumstances posited, namely: 1. if she cannot give birth naturally, or is going to die before she gives birth, with the greatest danger of the infant's death before he can be baptized; 2. if, from the judgment of a skilled surgeon, proximate danger of the mother's death is absent. But such danger can be absent if the mother is robust, as is clear from innumerable examples and from the more common opinion of physicians and surgeons, whose art, especially in our times, has become much more advanced and perfect. - See Sacred Embryology, lib. 3, c. 9. - Elbel, n. 60, etc. - The reason is clear; for there is no danger, or at least it is very slight and remote, and therefore if perhaps death follows, it will seem to follow only per accidens.

258. ○ QUESTION 2. Whether or when it must be done?

Resp. 1. When the mother is dead, it is certainly to be done under grave obligation, even with the parents or relatives unwilling or resisting, if it can be done; because from the law of charity the eternal salvation of the infant must be procured with every care and labor. - Thus St. Thomas, ibid., where he adds: If, however, the mother has died while the offspring is living in the womb, she must be opened, that the child may be baptized. - Thus also the Roman Ritual establishes. This especially holds if the time of delivery is imminent, because, since the fetus is more robust, a greater hope of baptizing him shines forth.

The operation is not for that reason to be omitted if it is known that the mother has been pregnant for a short time; because it is clear from many examples that the animation of the fetus occurs a little after conception. - See Sacred Embryology, lib. 1, c. 7.

Moreover diligent care must be used that the region of the uterus of the deceased woman be kept warm until the operation has been done; otherwise the infant would more easily withdraw from life before he could be baptized.

259. Resp. 2. The operation is to be done even while the mother is living, if from the judgment of experts the infant cannot otherwise be baptized. But the mother is bound per se, and speaking speculatively under grave obligation, to suffer it, if it can be done without proximate danger of death. The reason is that anyone is bound to suffer a temporal inconvenience for preserving the spiritual and eternal life of the infant. This follows from the general law of charity. - Thus commonly with Elbel, n. 60. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - Sacred Embryology, lib. 3, c. 4.

I said: per se and speaking speculatively; for in practice the Confessor must take care not to urge the mother under grave obligation on account of the too great danger that, by denying consent, she die in the state of mortal sin; and thus, while he wishes to save the spiritual life of the infant, the mother herself be damned. Therefore it will be enough to exhort her to consent to the incision.

Besides, since it is clear that the fetus very often survives the deceased mother, great hope shines forth of baptizing him when she has died, and therefore a lesser obligation of incision presses.

The mother is not bound to undergo the operation if, with the operation omitted, she alone is judged to be going to perish; because no one is bound to preserve life by extraordinary and so arduous means. - But if there were only a slight hope of preserving the offspring, the mother indeed could undergo the operation, but would not be bound to do so, because charity does not press so much amid so great uncertainty of the outcome. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, ibid.

Besides, from the new art of physicians, the infant can be baptized in the mother's womb with moral certainty by the aid of some instrument, as was said above, without there being need to recur to the Caesarean operation [1].

[1] Compare the things said above (vol. I, note to n. 401), where abortion is treated, and the things which you have on the same argument in the note to n. 239 of this volume.

End of the Treatise on Baptism.

Treatise On Confirmation

260. ◦ Confirmation is defined: A Sacrament of the new law, by which, through an anointing with chrism, under a certain form of words, there is given to the baptized the fullness of the Holy Spirit, for firmly believing and for intrepidly confessing the Faith.

It is clear that Confirmation is a true Sacrament distinct from Baptism: 1. from the definition of the Church. For thus Eugene IV in the Decree of Faith: Through Baptism we are spiritually reborn; through Confirmation we are increased in grace and strengthened in faith. - See also Trent, sess. 7, can. 1, on Confirmation; 2. from the fact that there are found in it the three things essentially required and sufficient for every Sacrament, namely an exterior rite, the promise of grace, and the institution of Christ. For: 1. the exterior rite is had in the things and words, or in the matter and form; 2. the promise and conferral of grace is had in Acts 8.17, where it is said that Peter and John, sent to Samaria to confirm the faithful already baptized, laid their hands upon them, and they received the Holy Spirit; 3. the divine institution is sufficiently understood from the power itself by which the Apostles, after Baptism, conferred the Holy Spirit through the imposition of hands; for they could not do this from their own virtue.

But when this Sacrament was instituted is not established. More probably it was instituted after the resurrection, when Christ said to the Apostles (John 20.21): As the living Father sent me, so I send you, etc., by which words he conferred on them full episcopal power over the mystical body of the Church. According to others, Christ instituted the Sacrament of Confirmation at the supper, after the institution itself of the Eucharist.

We must treat: 1. of the matter and form of Confirmation; 2. of its Minister; 3. of the subject of the same.

Chapter I. On the Matter and Form of Confirmation

Article I. On the Matter of Confirmation

261. ○ I. The remote matter of Confirmation is chrism made from olive oil and balsam, and blessed by a Bishop. - Thus commonly, and it is clear from the Council of Florence in the Decree on the Sacraments. It can also be said that the partial remote matter is the hand of the Bishop formally as such, inasmuch, namely, as the imposition of the hand is the partial proximate matter, as will soon be said.

II. The proximate matter is the anointing with chrism applied to those to be confirmed by the Minister of this Sacrament through the imposition of the hand. This is clear from the Declaration of Benedict XIV, in the Encyclical Letter Ex quo primum, where he has these things: Therefore let this be said, which is beyond controversy: namely, that in the Latin Church the Sacrament of Confirmation is conferred by using sacred chrism, or olive oil mixed with balsam and blessed by a Bishop, and by the sign of the Cross being traced by the Minister of the Sacrament on the forehead of the recipient, while the same Minister pronounces the words of the form.

Therefore the proximate matter of Confirmation does not partially consist, as several formerly wished, in the general imposition of the hand made by the Bishop on all those to be confirmed. - See St. Ligorius, n. 164, at the end.

262. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether balsam is required by necessity of the Sacrament?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, more probably, as it seems, from the Decree of Eugene IV for the Armenians, where he says that the matter of Confirmation is chrism made from oil and balsam. But balsam of any region suffices, and in that quantity alone which is enough that it can give its odor; nor is it necessary that it be mixed with all the parts of the oil. - St. Ligorius, n. 162.

QUESTION 2. Whether the chrism must necessarily be blessed?

Resp. 1. The answer must be affirmative absolutely, if the discussion is about necessity of precept. - Thus all with St. Ligorius, n. 163.

Resp. 2. The answer seems to have to be affirmative even if the discussion is about necessity of the Sacrament. For the constant practice of the Church and the Decree of Eugene IV persuade this, in which it is read that the matter of Confirmation is blessed chrism. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, ibid. - But whether chrism must necessarily be blessed by a Bishop will be said below, where the Minister is treated.

263. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether the chrism must necessarily be of that year?

Resp. This is not required by necessity of the Sacrament, because whether it is old or new, the matter is not changed; but it is required from the precept of the Church. Hence a Bishop who confirmed with old chrism would sin gravely. For to this end new chrism is consecrated on the Lord's Supper, the old having been burned. - St. Ligorius, n. 163, and others commonly.

QUESTION 4. Whether for the value of the Sacrament the oil must necessarily be of olives?

Resp. The answer is affirmative. The reason is that this is properly called oil. Hence oil made from another matter, for example from nuts, is not valid matter, because it does not come simply under the name of oil. - Thus commonly with St. Thomas, p. 3, q. 72, art. 2. - St. Ligorius, n. 162.

264. ◦ QUESTION 5. How must the anointing be done?

Resp. It must be done with the right thumb of the Bishop, in the manner of a cross, on the forehead of the confirmed person. Nevertheless the anointing would be valid if it were done with another finger of the Bishop, and even if it were a finger of the left hand, because it would truly be done through the imposition of the episcopal hand. Yet the Bishop would sin who did this without necessity, because he would depart from the practice of the universal Church; although it does not appear that the inversion of the said ceremony reaches grave fault. - St. Ligorius, n. 165, and others.

QUESTION 6. Whether the anointing can validly be done by means of an instrument?

Resp. No. The reason is that the immediate imposition of the hand of the Minister would be lacking, which from what has been said is altogether required. Nor may you say that Extreme Unction is validly ministered by means of an instrument; for in that Sacrament the imposition of the hand is not required for validity, as it is in Confirmation. - St. Ligorius, n. 166, and others commonly.

Article II. On the Form of Confirmation

265. ◦ The form of the Sacrament of Confirmation consists in these words: I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and I confirm thee with the chrism of salvation, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. - Thus Eugene IV defined in the cited Decree. - It is also clear from the constant practice of the Church.

By the words I sign thee with the sign of the cross, it is signified that, as a soldier is accustomed to be adorned with the insignia of his leader, so a man through this Sacrament is signed exteriorly with the cross, and interiorly with an invisible character, as with the military sign of Christ. - By the words I confirm thee with the chrism of salvation, it is expressed that a man through this Sacrament is anointed like an athlete, exteriorly with chrism, but interiorly with the grace and strength of the Holy Spirit. - But by the remaining words, in the name of the Father, etc., there is expressed the principal cause conferring the fullness of spiritual strength, which is the Most Holy Trinity; and at the same time the principal mystery of the Christian Faith, which both is proposed to men in Baptism to be believed and in this Sacrament to be held and openly professed. - St. Thomas, q. 72, art. 4.

266. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Which words of this form are essential?

Resp. For validity the following are altogether essential: 1. the word confirm, unless it is supplied by another synonymous word; 2. the expression of the Most Holy Trinity, as in Baptism; 3. the word thee, by which the subject of the Sacrament is designated; 4. the words I sign thee with the sign of the cross, and also the words with the chrism of salvation. But to say I strengthen for I confirm, or of sanctification for of salvation, would be only an accidental change. - St. Ligorius, n. 168, with others commonly.

QUESTION 2. Whether the form used among the Greeks is valid: THE SEAL OF THE GIFT OF THE HOLY SPIRIT?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, with the common opinion of Theologians. For the sense is: by this sign the gifts of the Holy Spirit are given, with the verb omitted according to the custom of the Greeks. Otherwise one would have to say that the Greeks do not have the Sacrament of Confirmation, which is very hard. It is clear besides from the Declaration of Benedict XIV, in the encyclical letter Ex quo primum to the Bishops of the Greek rite, March 1, 1756. - In St. Ligorius, n. 164.

Chapter II. On the Minister of Confirmation

267. ○ I. The Bishop alone is the ordinary Minister of this Sacrament. Thus Innocent III and the Council of Trent declared, sess. 7, can. 3: If anyone shall say that the ordinary Minister of holy Confirmation is not the Bishop alone, but any simple Priest, let him be anathema.

II. A simple Priest can confirm as extraordinary Minister from the special delegation of the Supreme Pontiff. This is clear from the practice of the Church and from the Bull of Benedict XIV, Eo quamvis tempore. - See St. Ligorius, n. 170. - But the Priest must use chrism blessed by a Bishop. This is clear from the Decree of Eugene IV, where it is said that the matter of Confirmation is chrism blessed by a Bishop.

268. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the Pope is able to delegate also to a simple Priest the power of making chrism?

It is controverted. Not a few affirm with St. Ligorius, n. 163; but several others deny.

QUESTION 2. Whether a Bishop can confirm faithful who are not his subjects?

Resp. 1. As to validity, he can confirm all, as follows from the power of Order.

Resp. 2. As to liceity, he cannot confirm except those who are found in his diocese; and he would sin gravely by confirming even his own subjects in another diocese, because Confirmation is an exercise of jurisdiction of the external forum, which cannot be performed without the license of the Ordinary of the place.

But he can confirm strangers in his own diocese, because unless the contrary is established, the tacit consent of other Bishops is always presumed. - Thus more probably and more commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 173.

269. ○ QUESTION 3. When is a Bishop bound to confirm?

Resp. 1. He is bound to confirm those asking, whenever he conveniently can, if he cannot defer it to another proximate time.

Resp. 2. He is also bound at times to provide his subjects an opportunity of receiving this Sacrament. Hence he would sin gravely if for a long time he abstained from conferring Confirmation, for example for eight or ten years, and did not go around the diocese, at least through the principal places, unless he were excused by moral impossibility. - St. Ligorius, n. 175. - Lacroix, n. 388, and others commonly.

QUESTION 4. Whether a Bishop sins gravely by omitting to confirm a dying person asking for the Sacrament?

Resp. No, at least probably. The reason is that since this Sacrament is not necessary for salvation, the inconvenience of going to sick persons lying in their own homes excuses. It is also confirmed by common practice. - St. Ligorius, n. 175. - Lacroix, n. 390 [1].

[1] From those things which Lacroix brings forward in this place, you will gather that more probably a Bishop in the case does not sin gravely; but probably he is not bound even by light fault, when inconvenience excuses. But whether the common practice is that of not ministering when it can conveniently be done, I would not dare to say.

Chapter III. On the Subject of Confirmation

The subject of the Sacrament of Confirmation is every and only baptized human being not yet confirmed, although lacking the use of reason. For Confirmation perfects the spiritual life which is received in Baptism, and was instituted for all, as Baptism was.

Yet from the practice generally prevailing in the Church, children who have not yet attained the use of reason are not to be confirmed, unless a legitimate custom of places permits it, which flourishes, for example, among the Greeks and in Spain [1].

[1] Yet those things must be noted which Benedict XIV writes on this matter (De Synodo, lib. 7, chap. 10, n. 8). If a Bishop, he says, in his Constitutions were to say that he is prepared to confer the Sacrament of Confirmation on baptized children and infants, but constituted in danger of death; or were to order that children and infants be presented to him when he is going to minister the Sacrament of Confirmation in this or that place of his diocese, since easy access to them is not going to be possible for him later, either because of his increasing age, or because of their distance from the city, or because of the difficulty of the journey; certainly nothing in synodal Constitutions of this sort would seem to be reprehensible.... Yet the Bishop must note three things: first, that in his Constitution he say nothing by which he may seem to insinuate a necessity or precept of receiving the Sacrament of Confirmation at that age and state; secondly, that he administer the Sacrament with that dignity for which the Church wished to provide when it denied it to infants before they had attained the use of reason.... thirdly, finally, lest after he has said that he is ready to confer Confirmation on all children placed in danger, he willingly hasten to the more noble and to those pleasing to himself, and refuse to go to the poor or to others of the lowest common people; for this indeed would be done with acceptance of persons and with the scandal of many.

if, when they can approach Confirmation, they refuse and neglect it.

270. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether, or of what sort, is the obligation of receiving the Sacrament of Confirmation?

Resp. 1. There is no obligation by necessity of means. For even through Baptism alone there can be had the remission of sins and eternal life.

Resp. 2. According to St. Ligorius, there is an obligation under grave sin from divine precept, at least during the course of life and when a suitable occasion is given; and he proves this from the Declaration of Benedict XIV in the Bull Etsi pastoralis, on the rites and dogmas of the Greeks, where he says, section 3, n. 4: They are to be admonished by the Ordinaries of places that they are held by the guilt of grave sin Scavini notes, however, that the words of Benedict XIV do not conclude for all; because the Pontiff speaks only of those invalidly confirmed by Greek Presbyters, who therefore refused to approach Confirmation again, because they regarded the first as valid. Whence there was here a particular reason for obliging them to receive the Sacrament of Confirmation, namely, that they might thus retract their error [2].

[2] The VV. observe (p. 930, n. 89) that St. Alphonsus thought the same on this question not only in the works of Moral Theology, but also in the dogmatic work written in Italian; and they bring forward these words of the St. Doctor: Let it be noted here that the same Benedict XIV in the Bull Etsi pastoralis declared that those who refuse or neglect, when they can, to take Confirmation while they are among the Greeks, must be admonished by their Bishops concerning the grave sin which they commit. And certainly the same must be said of those who are among Latins. In these words it remains somewhat obscure what he means when he says, Those who, while they are among the Greeks, and below, Those who are among Latins. Indeed the question was about Italo-Greeks, namely about those Greeks who, refugees from their country occupied by the barbarous Turks, had betaken themselves to Italy or the adjacent Islands, and there, after they had fixed their seat, preserved the Greek rite in sacred things, as they preserve it even now.

But that what Gury says after Scavini concerning the sense of the Constitution of Benedict XIV is most true is manifestly clear to one reading the Constitution itself. For in section III, where the Sacrament of Confirmation is treated, the Pontiff first (n. 1) thus speaks concerning Confirmation invalidly conferred: Latin Bishops should confirm absolutely on the forehead infants, or others in their Dioceses (for those Greeks are subject to the Latin Bishop in whose Diocese they reside), baptized by Greek Presbyters; since neither by our Predecessors nor by Us has faculty been granted, or is granted, to Greek Presbyters in Italy and the adjacent Islands, that they confer the Sacrament of Confirmation on baptized infants; nay rather, as far back as the year 1595, by Clement VIII of happy memory, our Predecessor, it was expressly forbidden to Italo-Greek Presbyters that they confirm the baptized with Chrism. Then (n. IV), concerning those who had been invalidly confirmed by Greek Presbyters, he thus decrees: Although those confirmed by a simple Priest are not to be compelled to receive this Sacrament of Confirmation from a Bishop, if scandals could arise from such compulsion, since the Sacrament of Confirmation has no such necessity that without it someone cannot be saved; nevertheless they are to be admonished by the Ordinaries of places that they are held by the guilt of grave sin if, when they can approach Confirmation, they refuse and neglect it. Therefore it is manifest that here a general question is not being treated, but one concerning those who, invalidly confirmed, perhaps even to favor the presbyters who had wished to confirm them badly, were refusing to approach again.

There is added the fact that it is beyond the custom of the Apostolic See, and especially of Benedict XIV, abruptly to define a controversy against the most common opinion of the Doctors without any cause.

QUESTION 2. What is to be done in doubt whether someone has been confirmed?

Resp. He can be confirmed again under condition, as is clear from the things said in the Treatise on the Sacraments in general, n. 206. But someone is not bound to this if he truly and probably believes that he has received this Sacrament. - St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, n. 48.

271. ○ QUESTION 3. What dispositions are required in those to be confirmed?

Resp. There is required: 1. the baptismal character for the validity of the Sacrament, and besides, in an adult, the intention of receiving the Sacrament, as is clear from the things said on the Sacraments in general, n. 230.

2. The state of grace, because Confirmation is a Sacrament of the living. Wherefore he who is conscious of mortal sin must have recourse to the Sacrament of Penance, unless he is perfectly contrite. The general custom is that no one be confirmed unless he presents a schedule signed by the Parish Priest.

3. That the one to be confirmed be imbued with the rudiments of Christian doctrine, especially those things which are of necessity of means, and which pertain to the Sacraments of Penance and Confirmation. - Thus commonly.

QUESTION 4. Whether the one to be confirmed must be fasting?

Resp. No, with attention to present custom. For the canonical laws which prescribed fasting for receiving Confirmation have gone into desuetude. Therefore the practice of conferring this Sacrament in the evening time also has prevailed. - St. Ligorius, n. 184, at the end, and others.

End of the Treatise on Confirmation.

Treatise On the Eucharist

Venerable, wonderful, and supremely adorable is the Most Holy Eucharist; for it is, as it were, a compendium of all the mysteries which the divine wisdom and the infinite goodness and mercy of God devised and perfected for the salvation and sanctification of men, according to that saying of Psalm 110.4, 5: The merciful and compassionate Lord has made a memorial of his wonders; he has given food to those who fear him.

Hence St. Augustine exclaims, tract 26 on John: O Sacrament of piety! O sign of unity! O bond of charity! He who wishes to live has whence he may live. Let him approach, let him be incorporated, that he may be vivified.

The Eucharist can be considered either as Sacrament or as Sacrifice. Hence the present Treatise has two parts.

First Part. On the Eucharist as Sacrament

We must treat: 1. of the nature and efficacy; 2. of the matter and form; 3. of the Minister; 4. of the subject of the Eucharist.

Chapter I. On the Nature and Efficacy of the Eucharist

The Eucharist is defined: The Sacrament of the Body and Blood of Christ, under the species of bread and wine, for the spiritual refreshment of souls.

Or: A Sacrament of the new law instituted by Christ the Lord for the spiritual refreshment of the soul, in which the Body and Blood of Christ are truly, really, and substantially contained under the species of bread and wine. This is clear from the Council of Trent, sess. 13, ch. 2 and 3.

272. Matters To Be Established As Of Faith. - I. In the Sacrament of the Eucharist Christ is really present in body and soul, together with the divinity. This is clear: 1. from the words of the promise of the Most Holy Eucharist in John 6.52: The bread which I will give is my flesh for the life of the world, etc.; 2. from the words of institution of the Most Holy Eucharist at the last supper, Matt. 26.26: This is my body, etc.; 3. from the whole tradition, and also from the definition of the Church; for thus Trent, sess. 13, can. 1: If anyone shall deny that in the Sacrament of the most holy Eucharist there are contained truly, really, and substantially the Body and Blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and consequently the whole Christ, but shall say that he is in it only as in a sign, or figure, or virtue, let him be anathema.

II. In the Sacrament of the Eucharist the whole Christ is contained under each species, and, when separation has been made, in any part of the species, at least a sensible part, and indeed permanently.

Hence Christ is contained as much under either one species as under both; as much in the least part of either species, at least when separation has been made, as in a greater part or in the whole species.

Therefore the entire Body of Christ is had under the species of wine, no otherwise than under the species of bread. For although, by force of the words, the Body is placed under the species of bread, and the Blood under the species of wine, nevertheless the whole Body exists undivided under the individual species. The reason is that, since the Body of Christ is living, all its parts by force of natural concomitance are inseparable, since Christ rising from the dead now dieth no more, as the Apostle says, Rom. 6.9. The divinity also exists under each species because of the admirable hypostatic union by which the body and soul are joined to the person of the Word. Concerning all these things it is clear from Trent, sess. 13, ch. 3 and can. 1 and 3. - Likewise from the Decree of the Council of Florence to the Armenians.

III. In the Sacrament of the Eucharist there is true transubstantiation, or the real conversion of the whole substance of bread and wine into the Body and Blood of Christ, so that, when the consecration has been completed, nothing remains of the bread and wine, the species alone excepted. This is clear: 1. from Sacred Scripture, namely from the words of Christ: This is my body, etc.; for these words signify simply that the present matter is the body of Christ, nor would they be simply true if the substance of bread remained together with the body of Christ; 2. from the whole tradition, and from the definition of the Church in many Councils, especially in Trent, sess. 13, can. 2.

273. Questions. - QUESTION 1. How long does Christ remain really present in the Eucharist?

Resp. He remains as long as the species remain entire; but he ceases to be under them as soon as the species are corrupted in such a way that, according to the estimation of men, they no longer seem to be bread and wine. - Then, by the law established by God in the institution of this Sacrament, the same matter is substituted for the species which would succeed corrupted bread and wine. - St. Ligorius, n. 225. - Lacroix, n. 474.

QUESTION 2. How long are the sacred species judged to remain entire after reception of the Sacrament?

Resp. It is not established; some say after a minute, others after five minutes, others after half a quarter of an hour [1]. But they remain longer in a Priest, who in Mass communicates under each species and with a larger Host, than in a layman, who according to custom receives only a small Host. - St. Ligorius, ibid., etc.

[1] Concerning this matter it seems that no general rule at all can be handed down. shorter or longer delay is chiefly to be sought from the different digestive power of different men. Nor is it only ascertained that some have easier digestion, others more difficult digestion, but that the same man also, according to different circumstances, both internal, namely the habit of the body and especially of the stomach, and external, for example according to the temperature of the weather, digests foods now more quickly, now more slowly; and we know that not rarely it has happened that, after vomiting had been provoked after a longer space, for example of half an hour or even an hour, the sacramental species were returned almost entire.

274. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether the Eucharist is one Sacrament or a twofold Sacrament?

Resp. It is one Sacrament in species, although there are several signs. For although there is a physical plurality of sign, nevertheless there is moral unity; for the Sacrament of the Eucharist, although it is composed of the species of bread and wine physically distinct, nevertheless is ordered to one spiritual refreshment in species, as to the end and signified effect, just as material food and drink are ordered to a single bodily refreshment. Thus in Extreme Unction there are several anointings, and nevertheless one Sacrament is had, because those several anointings are ordered to one end and effect, namely to taking away the remains of sins. - Thus most commonly and certainly with St. Thomas, 3 part, q. 73, art. 2. - St. Ligorius, n. 194 and 199.

275. ○ QUESTION 4. What are the effects of the Sacrament of the Eucharist in the soul?

Resp. The principal effects are the following, namely: 1. the increase of sanctifying grace, which constitutes the principal effect of the Eucharist. For according to the words of Christ (John 6.56), My flesh is truly food, this Sacrament was instituted as spiritual nourishment; and nourishment supposes life in him who receives it; from this it happens that through this nourishment the very life of the soul, which chiefly consists in sanctifying grace, is strengthened and increased; 2. the attainment of eternal glory, for Christ promises this: If anyone shall eat of this bread, he shall live forever (John 6.52, etc.); 3. a most abundant bestowal of actual graces, which flow from habitual grace and infused habits; 4. the weakening of evil habits and correction of vices, especially of lust; 5. the remission of venial sins; this is clear from Trent, sess. 13, ch. 2, where the Eucharist is called the antidote by which we are freed from daily faults and preserved from mortal sins; 6. the remission of temporal punishment due to sin, not indeed of the whole, but according to the manner of devotion and fervor, as St. Thomas says, part 3, q. 79, art. 5; 7. special union with Christ and his members, as is clear from John 6.57: He who eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood abideth in me, and I in him; 8. preservation from future sins, both because, charity being increased through this food, the soul becomes stronger against corrupted nature, and because it is an efficacious memorial of the Lord's Passion, through which the demons were conquered. - St. Ligorius, n. 268 and 269, Homo apostolicus, n. 5.

QUESTION 5. Whether the Eucharist can ever delete mortal sin?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, more probably, not indeed per se, but per accidens and mediately through the infusion of grace, namely when someone, ignorant that he is in a state of mortal sin, approaches the Eucharist in good faith and with attrition concerning sins committed beforehand. Then nothing prevents the Sacrament from producing its effect; but it cannot produce the effect while mortal sin remains. Therefore it must indirectly remove that sin. - St. Ligorius, n. 268. - Recall the things said on the Sacraments in general, n. 192.

Chapter II. On the Matter and Form of the Eucharist

We must treat: 1. of the matter; 2. of the form of the Eucharist.

Article I. On the Matter of the Eucharist

I. On Remote Matter

276. Principles. - I. Bread and wine are the remote matter of the Sacrament of the Eucharist. This is clear: 1. from the institution itself of this Sacrament; for Christ at the last supper took bread and wine and consecrated them into his Body and Blood; 2. from the definition of the Church in the Lateran Council, ch. Firmiter; in the Council of Florence, in the Decree of Union; and in Trent, sess. 13, in almost all the chapters. - To all these is added the unanimous tradition of each Church, Latin and Greek.

II. Only wheaten bread and only wine from the vine are valid matter of the Sacrament of the Eucharist. This is clear from the Council of Florence in the Decree cited above, where it is said: The third is the Sacrament of the Eucharist, whose matter is WHEATEN BREAD and WINE FROM THE VINE. The perpetual tradition and practice of each Church, Latin and Greek, also agree.

277. ○ III. A very little water must be mixed with the wine, and this not by necessity of the Sacrament, but of ecclesiastical precept.

The first reason is drawn: 1. from the perpetual practice of the Church and the universal tradition of the Fathers; 2. from the Declaration of the Councils, and especially of Florence, which declares that the matter of the chalice is wine from the vine, to which a very little water must be mixed; and from the Council of Trent, sess. 22, ch. 7.

The second reason is drawn from the fact that Christ, in the institution of this Sacrament, designated only wine, and the Councils, in making mention of this mixture, speak only of precept, as Trent in the place cited; there is added the doctrine of the Catechism of the same Council, which, after it taught that this mixture cannot be omitted without mortal sin, adds: Yet if it (water) is lacking, the Sacrament can stand.

278. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether bread made from rye or secale is valid matter?

Resp. It is controverted. Some affirm, because rye, they say, seems to be of the same species as wheat, although it is of a different quality. - But others, much more commonly and more probably, deny; because rye bread is of a different species, nor is it commonly accustomed to be used by the rich. Therefore in practice this matter is prohibited under grave obligation. - See St. Ligorius, n. 200.

QUESTION 2. Whether bread made from far or spelt is valid matter?

Resp. It is likewise controverted, as concerning rye. Hence that matter also is to be held as doubtful, and therefore as gravely illicit. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others commonly. - Nevertheless it must be observed that in various regions there are given different species of true grain, which come under the name of spelt. Hence it seems that attention must be paid to the common estimation of men.

279. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether both unleavened and leavened bread are valid and licit matter of the Eucharist?

Resp. 1. As to validity, affirmatively. The reason is that each is true bread, and is also simply called bread in Scripture; and each is made from wheaten flour and natural water. This is also clear from the definition of the Church. For thus the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union: We define that in unleavened, or in leavened wheaten bread, the body of Christ is confected.

Resp. 2. As to liceity, Latins are bound under grave obligation to consecrate in unleavened bread, and Greeks in leavened bread, each according to the rite of his Church. This is clear: 1. from the practice of each Church; 2. from the Council of Florence in the cited Decree, where it is added: And priests ought to confect the very body of the Lord in either, namely each according to the custom of his Church, whether Western or Eastern.

QUESTION 4. Whether a Priest consecrating in souring wine sins gravely?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, although that wine is still valid matter of the Sacrament. Indeed a mortal sin is committed not only if the wine is near vinegar, but also if it certainly begins to sour and to be corrupted, because even thus grave irreverence seems to be inflicted on the Sacrament. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 207. - This is also clear from the Rubric, tit. 4, n. 2, where it is said thus: If the wine has begun to sour or to be corrupted, or has been somewhat sharp..., the Sacrament is confected, but the one confecting sins gravely.

Nevertheless Gobat, Sporer, and Lacroix probably say that, if other wine is lacking, it is permitted without scruple, as good men are accustomed, to use wine slightly souring, or not notably acid [1]. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - Hence the Rubric does not seem to be taken with so much rigor that it comprehends even all the first degrees of sharpness, but only those which proximately begin to constitute souring wine. - St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, appendix 3, exam. ordinand., n. 98.

[1] The preceding things will scarcely seem in reality to cohere with these. For if it is probably permitted to use wine slightly souring, how is whoever uses wine which begins to sour guilty of grave fault?

280. QUESTION 5. Whether frozen wine is valid matter?

Resp. It is controverted. The answer is affirmative, more probably. The reason is: 1. because it remains substantially wine, since it retains the same color, taste, and smell; 2. because from the Rubric of the Missal the species of wine frozen after consecration must be liquefied by applying heated cloths, and then consumed, since it is the true Sacrament (rubr. de defect., section 10, n. 11). Therefore it supposes that the species of frozen wine retains the Blood of Christ; therefore the sacred species are not substantially changed through freezing after consecration; therefore neither before. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 207, where he says that it is the truer opinion because of the reason drawn from the cited Rubric.

QUESTION 6. What quantity of water is to be mixed in the chalice?

Resp. A very small quantity of water suffices, as the Council of Florence says above, n. 277. Probably water can be poured up to an eighth part of the wine, indeed up to a fifth part according to Lugo, disp. 4, n. 58. Busembaum adds that it suffices that the water not exceed a third part. But in practice this last opinion is not to be admitted, although a third part does not corrupt the wine if it is generous. Generally, it must be counseled that the Priest not exceed eight or ten little drops. But if by chance he has poured in too great a quantity of water, some quantity of wine can again be added. - St. Ligorius, n. 210.

II. On Proximate Matter, or on the Use of the Matter Required in the Consecration Itself

281. Principles. - I. For valid consecration, besides suitable matter, it is required: 1. that the matter to be consecrated be physically present, because the demonstrative pronouns of the form, hoc, hic, necessarily require this; otherwise the form would be false, because that would be demonstrated as present which was not present; 2. that it be determined in the individual through the intention of the Minister, because just as the Minister does not consecrate unless he intends to consecrate, so also he does not consecrate this matter unless he determinately intends to consecrate it. Nevertheless actual determination is not required, but virtual determination suffices. - St. Ligorius, n. 211-214.

II. For licit consecration it is required: 1. that the Priest in no way depart from the use of the Church, especially as determined by the Rubrics of the Roman Missal; hence especially it is necessary that the matter to be consecrated be becoming and clean, because of the reverence due to so great a Sacrament;

2. that it be placed on the altar and on the corporal, indeed also on the sacred stone, according to Benedict XIV, On the Sacrifice of the Mass, sect. 2, n. 139; 3. that the ciborium or chalice to be consecrated be uncovered; 4. that it be done at the time of the canon prescribed by the Rubric. - See St. Ligorius, n. 218 and 219.

282. Resolves. - 1. Hosts hidden under others, or otherwise covered, are validly consecrated. Likewise wine is validly consecrated in a chalice covered with a veil, pall, or in any way whatever, because for the true presence of the matter it suffices that it can be demonstrated by the pronouns hoc or hic. - St. Ligorius, n. 212, etc., and others very commonly [2].

[2] Here the question is usually added: what must be done if unconsecrated particles are mixed with consecrated ones? Busembaum, cited by St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 216), intimates a twofold opinion, namely either the whole heap must be brought to the altar, so that the priest may intend to consecrate the unconsecrated ones, or rather he should consecrate the whole heap under condition, if they are not consecrated.

And St. Alphonsus follows the latter opinion, adding: And this is rather to be done, because in consecrating unconsecrated hosts the true determination of the matter is lacking, nor can the word hoc be verified, whence all the hosts must be consecrated under condition, that they may be validly consecrated. Thus Lugo, disp. 4, n. 136, the Salmanticenses, chap. 4, n. 129, with Laymann, Dicastillus, Aversa, Leander, Diana, etc.

It is displeasing that the St. Doctor, after the Salmanticenses, numbers Laymann and Aversa among the patrons of this opinion, who manifestly stand for the opposite. For thus Laymann (lib. 5, tr. 4, chap. 2, n. 12): The whole heap can and must be brought to the altar, so that the priest may intend to consecrate only those which have not received consecration. And Aversa (De Eucharistia, q. 2, sect. 2): If some unconsecrated hosts are mixed with other consecrated ones..., and the priest determines to consecrate that which is not consecrated, Lugo judges that it does not avail and does not suffice.... Yet it seems to avail and to suffice.

To these Marcus Struggl acceded (tr. 10, q. 1, art. 2, n. 52), saying: In such a case that whole heap of hosts is to be consecrated in another Mass with this intention: I will to consecrate this whole thing, according as it is consecrable. Thus Laymann, Tamburini, and several others. And indeed Tamburini has it thus (Method of Celebrating Mass, lib. 2, c. 1, section 3, n. 10): If through someone's carelessness it happens that consecrated particles are mixed with unconsecrated ones, let the whole heap be consecrated with the intention of consecrating those which have not been consecrated. Nor otherwise Kresslinger (appendix to Anacl., tr. 14, dist. 4, q. 4, add. 4): I answer that such a heap can still be consecrated in such a way that the intention of consecrating is borne toward the unconsecrated ones. Then he alleges five others, among whom also is Felix Potestas. From these it is sufficiently gathered that whoever embraces either of these opinions relies on sufficiently grave authority.

Yet this can seem singular: that Lugo, who can be held as the author of the opinion more approved by St. Alphonsus with the Salmanticenses, then doubts whether it is done licitly. But whether, he says, n. 139, one could licitly consecrate all under condition, so that that other unconsecrated one might not remain mixed in, I do not see a sufficient necessity for repeating the form under condition over all those consecrated hosts... Otherwise it would also be permitted to consecrate again under condition the chalice into which after consecration a drop of unconsecrated wine had by chance been poured; yet no one will admit this.

St. Alphonsus (l.c.), after the Salmanticenses, merely responds that this can be done licitly, as the Salmanticenses, Laymann, Dicastillus, Diana, and Leander say; nor do the Salmanticenses add anything else. But indeed, Laymann being omitted, whom we have said is cited to no purpose as thinking the contrary, Dicastillus certainly does not solve the difficulty. For Lugo (l.c.), to avoid the inconvenience and the difficulty of repeated consecration, although conditional, over particles which certainly are established to be consecrated, proposes that two of those particles be given to each person in Communion; for thus it would be certain that each person receives some consecrated host. But Dicastillus (De Eucharistia, disp. 4, n. 139) merely replies that this way indicated by Lugo is subject to several and grave inconveniences; and therefore that inconvenience is rather to be tolerated, namely of consecrating conditionally even particles certainly consecrated. But this response, as is clear, does not prove against Lugo that a consecration of this sort is not illicit. Hence there is nothing wonderful that others judged the different opinion of Laymann to be preferable, and did not defer much to the reason which Lugo had objected to this opinion. If the priest, says Lugo (l.c., n. 139), directed the words only to that host which was not consecrated, and wished to speak of that alone, then he would not have a conditional intention of consecrating, but an absolute one, which we have said is probably impossible, because the host of which the priest wishes to speak could not be designated in any way. But those who have followed the opinion of Laymann do not see that probable impossibility of designating the host. This indeed will appear much more easily if it is observed that the formula of consecration is not merely indicative, but effecting transubstantiation, so that the particles hoc or hic serve rather for determining than for indicating the matter to which the intention of the consecrating priest is borne; and this determination of matter in the case seems in reality to present no difficulty.

2. Consecration is valid if the Priest thinks that only one or two hosts to be consecrated are present, when there are several, whether placed by himself or by another; the reason is that the Priest is always presumed to will to consecrate whatever is becomingly consecrable. Hence if after consecration the celebrant notices that two hosts are joined together, let him consume each as consecrated according to the Rubric of the Missal. But if before consecration, after he has offered, he notices this, let him set the other aside, and after Mass let him himself or another consume it as blessed bread. - St. Ligorius, n. 216, and all others.

3. The same must be said if someone has brought several hosts to the altar to be consecrated, or before the Sacrifice has been admonished concerning hosts to be consecrated already placed on the altar, or has observed them being brought by another that they may be consecrated, even if while he consecrates he does not so expressly remember them, or even did not uncover them at the oblation, provided that they are present on the corporal; because the preceding intention virtually perseveres. - St. Ligorius, n. 216.

4. Hosts would not be consecrated if, the Priest being unaware, they were placed even on the corporal [3], because the Priest, being wholly unaware, did not have the intention of consecrating them.

[3] There will nevertheless be those who desire the coherence of this resolution with the principles on which the preceding second resolution rests.

5. If small hosts for communicating the people are brought to the Priest a little after the oblation has been made, he will be able licitly to consecrate them, the oblation being supplied mentally. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

283. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether a ciborium left outside the corporal through forgetfulness is to be judged consecrated?

Resp. It is controverted. The first probable opinion affirms. The reason is that the positive will of consecrating that ciborium in the beginning of the Mass, nor was that will retracted; therefore it persevered virtually at the time of consecration.

The second opinion denies. The reason is that that intention of consecrating outside the corporal would have been a grave sin, and therefore the Priest is not presumed to have had it [4].

[4] That reason supposes this general principle: that an intention of consecrating cannot be presumed in a priest whenever some circumstance, although unknown to the same priest, intervenes, which, if it were known by him, would deter him from consecrating, lest namely he act illicitly. But I think that no one has ever admitted, or ever will admit, a principle of this sort. And indeed it is illicit, and according to the opinion of the Doctors gravely illicit, to celebrate Mass in an unconsecrated chalice or on an unblessed corporal, or to consecrate matter which is valid indeed but illicit, for example leavened bread in the Latin Church. Now who would contend that, if such a chalice or corporal, or such matter, were presented to a priest who did not notice it, it cannot be presumed that he had the intention of celebrating illicitly, and therefore that he did not consecrate validly? I would add that certain persons undeservedly hand down the second opinion as common. See St. Alphonsus, lib. 5, n. 217. For easily not fewer Doctors could be alleged for the first opinion also.

 Against this brief Note the VV. wrote fifteen columns (pp. 379-386). Led by Roncaglia, however, they rest in the examples which are brought forward in the Note, of an unconsecrated chalice, or an unblessed corporal, or leavened bread, in which, as they reason, if indeed intention were lacking, there would follow a most grave and altogether to-be-avoided inconvenience of a sacrifice either altogether void or mutilated. In these circumstances, therefore, they say, the intention of completing the sacrifice always prevails. But this inconvenience is absent if it is only a question of particles which the consecration does not reach; with regard to these, therefore, the intention of avoiding a defect against the rubrics, which otherwise must always be presumed in the priest, must prevail over the intention of consecrating. Therefore particles placed outside the corporal are not to be held as consecrated.

Resp. That argumentation of Roncaglia shows itself to be too weak, since, although it could perhaps have some force by resting in those examples, nevertheless it loses all force if the examples are changed. And indeed suppose with Elbel (De Sacram., conf. 12, n. 49) that the priest did not uncover the pyx, or that the pyx was not consecrated, or that the pyx remained outside the corporal. Indeed, as Elbel observes in the cited place, in these circumstances the particles would per se be consecrated illicitly. But in the first two hypotheses the pyx was lying upon the altar or corporal; and in the third hypothesis the base of the pyx, by chance, while the priest wishes to move it nearer, remains under the corporal and therefore outside it. Meanwhile, however, the priest either is ignorant of those circumstances which per se would render the consecration illicit, or in no way notices them; and otherwise he renews the intention of consecrating the particles even within the canon; indeed in the third case he consecrates the particles with actual intention and with the pyx uncovered. I ask: shall we conclude, in that threefold hypothesis, that the particles are not to be held as consecrated, on this reason, namely, that apart from the absolute intention necessarily to be posited for completing the sacrifice, an intention of consecrating can never otherwise be presumed whenever some circumstance, however much unknown, would make the consecration illicit?

Namely, that one may judge suitably about these things, it is necessary that the different hypotheses be distinguished, which certainly permit or even require a different judgment. Indeed no one would deny that it can happen that, for example, a Priest admonished in the sacristy concerning particles to be consecrated then set his intention; nevertheless the particles must be judged not doubtfully but certainly unconsecrated if, for example, the cleric serving the Mass left the particles brought by himself in the epistle corner, enclosed in a wooden or paper box. And certainly the reason here will be given that that single aforesaid intention of the priest in no way extended itself to a consecration of this sort in those circumstances. But must it therefore be concluded that, if anything even slight from those things which are prescribed in the rubrics by chance and inadvertently falls away, there is always to be presumed in the priest an absence of intention, however much the same priest, acting in good faith, even has actual intention while consecrating, because, as they say, a more general intention is presumed in him never to consecrate in those circumstances in which someone conscious of the matter would not consecrate without some fault? If the matter stands thus, it would have to be said, as Reuter well observes (part 4, n. 155), that intention would be lacking in the one acting whenever he acts against a law invincibly unknown or not known here and now. For example, he adds, in one baptizing, ordaining, or contracting matrimony, intention would be lacking when the subject receiving the Sacrament did not have the disposition required for the fruit of the Sacrament, invincibly unknown to the one conferring it. But these things can in no way be admitted; and Reuter himself adds the reason, ibid., because grave inconveniences would follow from it, and therefore, from the will of Christ, the intention must nevertheless be present.

And indeed Reuter, l.c., says that these grave inconveniences do not follow from an intention of not consecrating hosts placed outside the corporal; and we shall think this most truly said if we suppose that a defect of this sort does not remain hidden, but is noticed at once. But suppose, I ask, that neither the priest nor others noticed the defect, and consequently that those particles are adored, placed in the tabernacle, and distributed to the faithful asking for Eucharistic bread, indeed even carried to the sick as Viaticum. Would less grave inconveniences occur? Therefore that most grave reason by which Reuter proved the falsity of that principle taken generally, namely that intention is lacking in the one acting whenever he acts against a law invincibly unknown, this reason, I say, manifestly retains all its force in our case also.

Rather, it seems that one must inquire whether and how the opinions of Doctors apparently dissenting in this question can be reconciled. Now it can contribute much to this if it is inspected whether the Authors dispute about the same hypothesis or about a different one. For who does not see that, even concerning a pyx situated outside the corporal, multiple hypotheses can be imagined? And indeed we can think of two from among these, extremely opposed, concerning which hardly, or not even hardly, does dissent seem possible. One is about a pyx which the priest does not notice to be situated outside the corporal, and which he at the same time consecrates with actual intention. For who could deny or doubt that the particles were validly consecrated? The other is about particles brought by the cleric, but then left by him through forgetfulness in the epistle corner, enclosed in a box, however much in the sacristy mention had been made with the priest about their being consecrated. For neither does anyone seem able to judge these consecrated.

Therefore doubt remains concerning the case when the priest is supposed to have had only virtual intention while consecrating, and nevertheless the particles have not been placed in a position so distant or less becoming that the conjecture about intention concerning them is plainly improbable. The solution of this question does not seem to be sought elsewhere than from the preceding actual intention of the priest being weighed, namely how far that intention is to be thought to have extended itself, and therefore how far the virtual intention also extended itself; for the virtual cannot extend more than the preceding actual intention; wherefore in reality the validity or invalidity of the consecration must be said to depend on this. But once that norm of measuring intention has been rejected, which is taken from the will of not doing whatever would per se be in any way illicit, it already seems to remain that we say that this virtual intention suffices for consecrating those particles concerning which the priest, not then noticing the improper position of the particles, could have had actual intention. Therefore if the particles have been placed there where the priest, not noticing that they are outside the corporal, nevertheless could think them sufficiently present, and therefore could have an actual intention of consecrating them, we shall say that the intention of consecrating them was not lacking; but otherwise, if the particles lie in such a place that the priest could not have judged them sufficiently present, and therefore could not have had actual intention of consecrating them.

And from these things it is now clear what must be said about all those Authors whom the VV. (pp. 380-384) collected with immense labor, that they might confirm that the opinion of St. Doctor Alphonsus can be called common. Namely it must be inspected about what hypothesis they speak. For if they treat those circumstances in which all must confess that the intention of the priest cannot be presumed, it is manifest that they are improperly objected against us. But if anyone further contends that the opinion which the Authors gave about a particular hypothesis must be transferred, as some general principle, to any other hypothesis whatever, let him have this paralogism for himself.

In practice that ciborium will have to be consecrated again under condition in another Mass. Those particles can also be consumed after both Communions, but before the purification. - St. Ligorius, n. 217.

QUESTION 2. Whether a ciborium placed indeed on the corporal, but which through forgetfulness remained closed at the time of consecration, is judged consecrated?

Resp. The answer is affirmative. The reason is: 1. because hosts in a closed ciborium certainly can be validly consecrated, as was said above; 2. because the Priest is always judged to have the absolute intention of consecrating whatever, with his knowledge, is upon the corporal, is becomingly consecrable, and is had by way of a continuous thing. - Thus Reuter, etc.

You will object: From the things said in the preceding question, a ciborium left outside the corporal probably is not consecrated, because the Priest is not judged to will to sin; by parity, in the present case for the same reason.

Resp. I deny the parity. For although the Church wills the ciborium to be opened for greater reverence, nevertheless since this irreverence does not seem notable, and this can happen more frequently, this precept does not urge so much as the precept of not consecrating outside the corporal. Reuter asserts that this is the common opinion of the Doctors.

284. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether drops of wine adhering to the chalice, either exteriorly or interiorly, are judged consecrated?

Resp. 1. Drops adhering exteriorly are never judged consecrated. The reason is that the intention of the Priest is deservedly presumed to be to consecrate that one thing which is licitly consecrable; but those little drops would be consecrated illicitly and irreverently and without any utility. Therefore... - Thus all. - St. Ligorius, n. 215.

Resp. 2. More probably neither are the drops adhering interiorly and altogether separated from the greater quantity judged consecrated. The reason is that it does not seem to be the intention of the Church, and therefore neither of the Priest, to consecrate anything except the wine which is potable by way of one thing and is found gathered together in the chalice. - Thus more commonly with Suarez, Laymann, etc., against others. - See St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 4. What sort of sin is it to consecrate a broken or stained host?

Resp. Scandal being excluded, it is only venial [5], unless the stain or fracture is enormous. If, however, some fracture or stain, even notable, is discovered in the host after the oblation, such a host will licitly be consecrated [6], because already through the oblation it has been somewhat dedicated and sanctified to God. - St. Ligorius, n. 204, and others commonly [7].

[5] St. Alphonsus (cited n. 204) says that it is venial if it is done without reasonable cause.

[6] St. Alphonsus limits: unless scandal of the people is feared.

[7] Here the question is usually added: whether the consecration of one species without the other is valid. And St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 196, dub. 3) distinguishes a twofold case: the first, if this happens by chance; the other, if the priest has a positive intention of consecrating only one species without the other. As to the first, however, he responds: No one doubts that it is valid if this happens by chance. But as to the other he responds: Lugo denies, De Eucharistia, disp. 19, n. 103, whom Renzi follows.... Others commonly affirm.

But this absurd opinion is attributed to John Lugo altogether undeservedly, for he writes most expressly, ibid., n. 104: All priests consecrating, whether by error or deliberately, one species without the other, validly consecrate. Now he who deliberately consecrates one species without the other certainly has the positive intention, as St. Alphonsus has it, of consecrating only one species without the other.

Certainly Lugo, after he had written, ibid., n. 102, that the opinion of those who said that the consecration of one species would be invalid is rejected by all, because it asserts this without any foundation against the truth of the words - since the consecration of either species is absolute, it immediately has its effect before the consecration of the other species - then adds concerning that opinion of theirs, ibid., n. 103: Besides, this opinion, if it is explained in the due manner, as perhaps it was understood by its Authors, is not absurd, but true. But he does not affirm this about the hypothesis of St. Alphonsus, namely if the priest has the positive intention of consecrating only one species without the other; rather, he affirms it about an altogether different hypothesis, namely of a priest consecrating, and indeed consecrating not one species only but both species, yet with the intention of offering sacrifice wholly and efficaciously excluded.

Namely Lugo explains how one must reason about the sacrifice of the Mass no otherwise than we are accustomed to speak about the sacrament of matrimony, namely that the sacrament of matrimony was so instituted by Christ the Lord that for the baptized the character of sacrament can in no way be separated from the character of matrimony; and by parity the character of sacrament in the Eucharist is so constituted that from the institution of Christ the Lord it has at the same time the character of sacrifice. Therefore, just as no matrimony can exist among Christians which is not a sacrament, so in no way can it happen that a consecration of the Eucharist is confected and at the same time does not have the character of sacrifice. From this, indeed, the consequence is that, just as the matrimony of one who would indeed wish to contract it, but at the same time would absolutely and efficaciously be unwilling to receive the sacrament, would be void and invalid, so also the consecration of each species would be invalid if the priest, pronouncing the form, should will absolutely and efficaciously to exclude the sacrifice by his intention.

Thus Lugo: I suppose that which our Theologians commonly suppose and teach, namely that Christ so instituted this Sacrament that he at the same time instituted it in the character of sacrifice, and did not will sacrifice to be made without Sacrament, nor Sacrament without sacrifice...; so that priests could neither consecrate outside sacrifice, nor offer sacrifice without consecration, as Suarez proves....

He applies this doctrine to the hypothesis of one consecrating one species in this way, l.c., n. 104: It is consequent that he who wishes to consecrate the host alone, and not to offer sacrifice, but by excluding the oblation of sacrifice, would do nothing, because he does not have power for consecrating except by way of sacrifice. Yet in fact all priests consecrating one species without the other, whether by error or deliberately, validly consecrate: because they do not altogether efficaciously exclude the intention of sacrificing, but will to consecrate in the better way in which they can, and therefore will at least implicitly, through the consecration of the host, for example, to begin the sacrifice in such a way that, as far as lies in them, it can be completed through the consecration of the chalice, if it is applied; whence then they already have some intention of offering partially in the consecration of the host. Besides, if a Priest... foreseeing that sacrifice cannot be offered without the consecration of each species, and foreseeing that both cannot be consecrated, should will to consecrate one, altogether excluding the intention of offering even partially, or of beginning the sacrifice through that consecration, by an altogether efficacious will in the manner explained, then we say that he would not consecrate, because the will of consecrating must be at least an implicit will of offering partially, or of beginning the oblation of the sacrifice; and in this sense the aforesaid opinion would be true.

Therefore Lugo does not say that the consecration of one species is invalid when someone only has the positive intention of consecrating one species without the other; for he affirms that it is valid, although he deliberately consecrates one species without the other. But he pronounces it invalid when in this very consecration of one species someone efficaciously excludes any will whatever, even partially, of beginning the sacrifice, or of offering partially, no otherwise than if someone efficaciously excluded the will of receiving the sacrament while he intends to contract matrimony. This efficacious will of the sacrament is judged excluded when someone is of such a mind that, if he knew that true matrimony could not be celebrated unless at the same time the sacrament is received, he then would be unwilling even to have the contract of matrimony itself.

Article II. On the Form of the Sacrament of the Eucharist

Just as in the Sacrament of the Eucharist the matter is twofold and distinct, so also the form of consecration is twofold, one of bread and the other of wine.

285. Principles. - I. The form for the consecration of bread consists in these words: Hoc est enim Corpus meum. But these words, or equivalent ones, are altogether essential to the form, if you except the word enim.

This is clear: 1. from the universal practice of the Church and from its precept in the Roman Missal; 2. from the Council of Florence in the Decree of Union, and from Trent, sess. 13, ch. 1; 3. from the divine institution itself, for Christ transubstantiated bread into his Body by pronouncing the aforesaid words.

II. The form for the consecration of wine is this: Hic est enim Calix sanguinis mei, novi et aeterni testamenti, mysterium Fidei, qui pro vobis et pro multis effundetur in remissionem peccatorum.

This likewise is clear: 1. from the practice and prescription of the Church; 2. from the various Evangelists, who, although they do not report altogether the same words, nevertheless agree perfectly as to this sense.

286. Resolves. - 1. The consecration is valid but illicit if the one consecrating says: Hic cibus est Corpus meum, hic calix est Sanguis meus. Likewise if you pronounce Colpus for Corpus [1], meus for meum, es for est, calis for calix, Sanguis for Sanguinis, etc. Hence it is deduced that he cannot be excused from venial sin who does not use due diligence for rightly pronouncing the words of consecration. - St. Ligorius, n. 221.

[1] Except unless the imperfect manner of pronouncing arises from a natural defect of the priest, to whom the pronunciation of some letter is difficult or impossible.

2. The consecration will be invalid if you say: Hic (adverbially) est Corpus meum, hoc Corpus est meum, or hic Sanguis est meus, because these words do not have the sense by which they signify that which they must operate. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

3. The consecration is doubtful if you say: Haec est Caro mea; illud est Corpus meum; ille est Sanguis meus. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

4. The words of the form must be pronounced in the person of Christ formally and assertively, or recitatively and at the same time significatively, but not historically only; namely, the words of Christ must be pronounced by applying their signification to the present matter, so that this may be transubstantiated into the Body and Blood of Christ. Nevertheless, a scruple is not to be had whether the words are pronounced in the due sense; for any Priest is presumed to have the intention of doing that which Christ did and instituted, and thus he sufficiently intends to pronounce the consecratory words in each aforesaid sense. - Elbel, n. 34. - St. Ligorius, on the Eucharist, n. 220..., etc.

287. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the omission of the word ENIM in the form of consecration is grave?

Resp. It is controverted. The first opinion probably denies, because that word is not found in the words uttered by Christ, and otherwise, as to the precept of the Church, it does not seem to constitute grave matter. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 220.

The second opinion affirms, and St. Ligorius says that this is not improbable. The reason is that in so grave a matter there does not seem to be light matter in any deliberate change. But this opinion seems to be of little account [2].

[2] When it is a question of imposing an obligation, or even of asserting the gravity of guilt, it is altogether useless to bring forward probabilities for that end. For no one is bound to use these probabilities as the norm of his own conscience, nor can a Confessor licitly use this norm with others. But this holds much more when those probabilities are besides uncertain, and because of defect of solid foundation appear limping or wavering. As to how cautiously one must proceed concerning the gravity of fault, compare the unanimous sense of the Doctors in the note to n. 152, vol. 1.

QUESTION 2. Whether in consecration those preceding words are required as essential: QUI PRIDIE QUAM PATERETUR, etc... SIMILI MODO, etc...?

Resp. No, with the common opinion, which St. Ligorius, n. 222, holds. - Lugo, etc. The reason is that these words are pronounced only historically, nor do they seem to have any sacramental efficacy. Nevertheless, if at some time, because of doubtful consecration, the form must be repeated, according to the Rubrics one will have to begin from the words: qui pridie, and simili modo [3]. - See St. Ligorius, n. 222.

[3] No one in reality asserted that those words, Qui pridie, etc., are required as pertaining to the essential form of consecration; Scotus, however, contended that they are necessary, because otherwise the essential words, Hoc est corpus meum, seem to be referred to the priest himself rather than to Christ.

Now the VV. (p. 931, n. 92), at this place of Father Gury, judged that readers should be warned that St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 222) wrote concerning the opinion of Scotus: I do not dare to call it improbable.

Resp. But it seemed otherwise to others. For concerning it Vasquez (In 3 Part., disp. 198, chap. 1, n. 3) says: Nevertheless this opinion of Scotus is deservedly rejected by all as improbable. And Suarez (In 3 Part., tom. 3, disp. 59, sect. 1): But this opinion is certainly improbable. And Coninck (q. 78, n. 25): It is repugnant to the common sense of the other Doctors, nor is there any reason for asserting this. And Lugo (De Eucharistia, disp. 4, n. 39): This opinion is rejected by all. But Escobar (lib. 20, sect. 2, probl. 33, n. 220): Deservedly almost all authors rise up against Scotus, whose foundation labors under manifest weakness. And these things, lest more be heaped up uselessly, can suffice.

QUESTION 3. Whether in the consecration of the chalice these words alone: HIC EST CALIX SANGUINIS MEI... are of the essence of the form?

Resp. The answer is affirmative. The reason is: 1. because the words of consecration of bread are these: Hoc est Corpus meum. Therefore by parity the words of consecration of wine are only these others: Hic est sanguis meus, or other equivalent ones. 2. Because those words alone of themselves express the presence of the blood of Christ under the species of wine. - Thus commonly against some. - See St. Ligorius, n. 223 [4].

[4] Here the VV. (p. 931, n. 92) report this judgment of St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 223): Each opinion is speculatively probable. But in practice it is certain that the priest would sin gravely if he did not pronounce all the words which are had in the consecration of the chalice; and if perhaps he had said only the first words, he certainly should repeat the whole form under condition... according to the rubric, tit. 16, n. 3.

To these things others perhaps will observe that there is certainly no ambiguity about those things which pertain to practice. But as to the statement that speculatively each opinion must be called probable, whoever greatly doubts this certainly cannot be reprehended. Compare Lugo (De Eucharistia, disp. 11, n. 61), where he deservedly says that the negative opinion of certain persons has most valid arguments against it. Compare also Suarez (disp. 60, sect. 1), saying that that opinion has against itself a most urgent argument.

QUESTION 4. Whether the form is valid if it is said: HOC ENIM CORPUS MEUM, with EST understood, as is frequently customary in the Latin language?

Resp. No. For although in continuous speech the substantive verb can easily be understood, nevertheless in the present case it cannot be done; both because there is not continuous speech, and especially because in the matter of which we are treating, the form has not only an assertory sense, as in common speech, but also a force effecting transubstantiation. - St. Ligorius, n. 223, and others very commonly.

Chapter III. On the Minister of the Eucharist

We must treat: 1. of the power of the Minister; 2. of the obligation of the same; 3. of the things required for ministering rightly; 4. of the manner of ministering the Holy Eucharist to the sick; 5. of the manner of preserving it.

Article I. On the Power of the Minister of the Eucharist

The Minister of the Eucharist is twofold, namely one of consecration, another of dispensation.

288. Principles. - I. Every Priest, and only a Priest, is the Minister for confecting the Eucharist. This is clear: 1. from Scripture; for Christ, instituting the Sacrament, said to all and only the Apostles reclining with him, and therefore to all and only those who would succeed them in the priesthood: Do this in commemoration of me, Luke 22.19; therefore all and only Priests received this power from Christ; 2. from the Council of Trent, sess. 22, can. 2, 3; 3. finally from the universal and perpetual tradition of the Church.

II. Only priests or presbyters are the ordinary Ministers of the dispensation of the Eucharist. This is clear: 1. from the Council of Trent, sess. 13, ch. 8, where it is said: It has always been the custom in the Church of God that laymen receive Communion from Priests, but that celebrating Priests communicate themselves; 2. from the universal practice of the Church.

289. ◦ III. Deacons, by force of their ordination, are extraordinary Ministers of the Eucharist, so that the dispensation of this Sacrament can be committed to them. This is clear: 1. from the practice of the earlier centuries, in which Deacons everywhere, from the commission of Bishops or Presbyters, whether general or particular, ministered the Eucharist; 2. from various Councils, for example the first general Council of Nicaea, the fourth of Carthage, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 237.

IV. By ordinary right only the Parish Priest, or his Superior, can dispense the Eucharist. For this jurisdiction is required, not indeed for the value of the act as in absolution, but for the due order of ministering. This is clear: 1. from the Councils, especially from the first of Carthage, can. 7, and from Milevis, can. 18, etc.; 2. from the universal practice of the Church. Hence he who without license at least presumed of the Parish Priest ministers the Eucharist violates his right in a grave matter, and therefore sins gravely. Nevertheless, when the Parish Priest grants to others license of celebrating in his Church, he is always judged also to grant license of ministering the Eucharist unless he expresses the contrary; this is also confirmed by common practice [1]. - St. Ligorius, n. 250 and following.

[1] Indeed custom has it that in whatever church a priest celebrates Mass, he can distribute the Eucharist to the faithful who desire to become participants of it.

Nevertheless license is not so easily to be presumed if it is a question of receiving the Eucharist from obligation. - See St. Ligorius, n. 235. Wherefore, as to Paschal Communion, custom must be observed [2]; likewise, to minister Viaticum outside a case of necessity without the license of the Parish Priest is illicit.

[2] Elsewhere (vol. I, n. 480) it was noted that by law and by the universal practice of the Church Paschal Communion is to be received in each one's own parish. But if somewhere any different custom flourishes, this certainly supposes the consent of those who have the right of disposing concerning these things.

290. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether, in order that a Deacon may minister, the necessity must be extreme?

Resp. No, with the common opinion; but grave necessity suffices, namely when there is no Priest present who can conveniently minister the Eucharist. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 236. - Lugo. - But for this the commission of the Bishop or Parish Priest is required.

QUESTION 2. Whether, or in what circumstances, Religious can minister the Most Holy Eucharist?

Resp. 1. They can always minister the Eucharist in their own Churches, either by themselves or through other Priests, except on Easter day [3]. Thus from the privileges of the Supreme Pontiffs, especially Paul III and Paul IV.

[3] At Rome Thursday in the Lord's Supper is also excepted.

Resp. 2. But they cannot minister the Eucharist: 1. in their own Churches on Easter day, as has just been said. Understand this if the discussion is about secular persons not serving the Monastery [4], even if they have already previously satisfied the precept of annual Communion in their own parish. Thus often the Sacred Congregation of the Council. Nevertheless some assert that there is a constant contrary custom, which builds up a right. - St. Ligorius, n. 240 [5]. 2. In other Churches, unless with the license at least [4] Those serving, who can receive Paschal Communion in the churches of Regulars, are not to be understood as just any persons whatever, but those who are permanent table-companions of the Regulars and dwell in the monasteries, or, as the Synod of Trent has it (sess. 24, c. 11), who actually serve and reside within their enclosures and houses, and live under their obedience.

[5] Thus indeed St. Alphonsus (l.c.): Roncaglia (tr. 18, c. 4, q. 2, r. 2) and Wigandt (tr. 12, exam. 4, n. 48) assert that in this there is a constant contrary custom which supplies jurisdiction. But this assertion in reality is Roncaglia's alone; for Wigandt merely says that modern practice does not disapprove this. But Roncaglia indeed calls as witnesses of that undisciplined assertion Cardinal De Lugo (De Eucharistia, disp. 18, n. 50) and Fagundez (De III Praec. Eccl., lib. 1, c. 5, n. 9). But neither of these has anything about such a constant custom; each says only this one thing, that that prohibition, lest Regulars distribute the Eucharist on Easter day, can probably be understood only of Communion by which the faithful satisfy the Paschal precept, but not of Communion which is made from devotion. But I called the assertion undisciplined; for since those Doctors attribute to Regulars the faculty of distributing the Eucharist on Easter day as not contrary to pontifical Constitutions, those things which Doctors are accustomed to dispute about custom conferring jurisdiction pertain nothing here.

Besides, the aforesaid interpretation of the Apostolic Constitutions shows itself to be sufficiently improbable. For when the Supreme Pontiffs conceded to Regulars the privilege that, even in Paschal time, except however on Easter day, they could distribute the Eucharist to the faithful, it is manifest that there was not given to them a faculty by which on the remaining days besides Easter day the faithful receiving the Eucharist from Regulars would satisfy the Paschal precept; rather, it was permitted that they could receive Communion from devotion. Therefore the exception of Easter day pertains also to Communion to be received from mere devotion, and not to Communion by which the ecclesiastical precept is satisfied. And since the Sacred Congregation of the Council has already defined this question several times in this way (see the resolutions cited in Benedict XIV, De Synod., lib. 9, chap. 16, n. 3), these things ought not further to return into controversy.

 The VV. warn (p. 951, n. 94, with note 1) that St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 240) only reports the judgment of others; but that his own opinion is to be taken from Homo apostolicus (tr. 12, n. 41), and thus the difficulty which Father Ballerini raises disappears.

Resp. 1. In the Note the difficulty was raised concerning the assertions of Roncaglia, and concerning St. Alphonsus it was merely noted that perhaps he had less to the point associated Wigandt with Roncaglia. But what is said in the Note concerning Roncaglia the VV. seem to have approved by their silence. Besides, whether the St. Doctor was merely reporting, or also thought that account should be taken of Roncaglia's assertions, was passed over altogether. Indeed the words of St. Alphonsus are these: Benedict XIV reports, De Synod., lib. 7, c. 42, that the Sacred Congregation declared that Regulars cannot on Easter day minister the Eucharist to those communicating from devotion. But Roncaglia and Wigandt assert that there is a constant contrary custom which supplies jurisdiction. Now this manner of speaking seems to belong to those who judge that the things reported in the first place are opposed by the things which they then add with the adversative particle but.

Resp. 2. As to what the VV. add, that the opinion of St. Alphonsus is to be drawn from Homo apostolicus, I, however, suspect that there will not be lacking those who think more tolerable the opinion which we have reported from the Moral work.

The words of St. Alphonsus (Hom. Ap., tr. 12, n. 41) are of this sort: Indeed in Benedict XIV there is a Decree of the Sacred Congregation, July 9, 1644, and confirmed on June 11, 1650, by which it was established that Bishops can forbid Regulars to minister the Eucharist on Easter day to secular persons, even if they themselves had satisfied the precept of the Church. And although on June 31, 1687, the same Sacred Congregation, at the instance of the parish priests of Louvain, who contended that the Fathers of the Society of Jesus could not minister the Eucharist through the whole Paschal time, gave response that they could minister, except on Easter day, nevertheless it must be understood with the prohibition of the Bishop presupposed. But you would call this opinion especially entangled. For, with regard to the context, those last words of the St. Doctor, with the prohibition of the Bishop presupposed, insinuate that Regulars cannot minister the Eucharist on Easter day only because the prohibition of the Bishop stands in the way, as though, namely, Regulars by their own right, unless the Bishop prohibits it, can minister the Eucharist on that day. But this can be admitted by no reason. And indeed Benedict XIV himself (De Synod., lib. 9, c. 16, n. 3) expressly recalls that in the privilege for Regulars concerning ministering the Eucharist granted by Paul IV and St. Pius V, the day alone of Easter of the Lord's resurrection is expressly excepted. And below he adds that the Sacred Congregation has often judged that on the solemn day of Easter alone Regulars are absolutely prohibited from presenting the Eucharist in their own Churches to secular persons, etc. And again, ibid., n. 5: In the Apostolic privileges the faculty is given to Regulars of ministering the sacred Eucharist in their own Churches to secular persons, the day of Easter of the Resurrection of the Lord being expressly and by name excepted. Therefore, even setting aside the Bishop's prohibition, it is in no way permitted to Regulars to present the Eucharist to secular persons on Easter day; for from the premises this is manifestly guarded by higher and more general law, namely Pontifical law. Indeed, if it is not lawful for Regulars to distribute the Eucharist to secular persons on Easter day, both because the privileges granted to them concerning the administration of this Sacrament expressly except this day, and because the Apostolic Constitutions expressly forbid them the administration of the Eucharist through that day, and finally because through multiple Decrees of the Sacred Congregation the prohibition of this administration has been declared and repeatedly confirmed, it is certainly sufficiently clear that this very thing is not in any way to be repeated from some supposed prohibition of the Bishop.

But you will say: 1. Does not Benedict XIV (De Synod., l.c., n. 5) have these things: But there would be no place for complaint of the Regulars if the Bishop forbade them to dare to minister the sacred Eucharist to any of the seculars on the solemn day of the Resurrection? 2. Does not the Decree of the Sacred Congregation, July 9, 1644, say that Bishops can forbid the same Regulars that they administer the said Sacrament of the Eucharist to secular persons on Easter day?

Resp. I concede the antecedent; I deny the consequence. Certainly no place would remain for the complaints of Regulars, since they ought to know that the administration of the Eucharist on that day is forbidden to them by so many Apostolic sanctions. Likewise the Bishop could certainly require and urge that what has been sanctioned by so many Apostolic Decrees be handed over to execution. But it does not follow from this that the administration of the Eucharist is lawful for Regulars if no prohibition of the Bishop has intervened.

Article II. On the Obligation of Dispensing the Eucharist

291. Principles. - I. A Parish Priest, or any Priest having care of souls, is bound from justice to minister the Eucharist to his subjects not only at Easter and in death, but also whenever they reasonably ask, yet a legitimate cause of impediment being excluded. The reason is that it belongs to the Parish Priest from a quasi-contract to provide not only that the faithful fulfill the precepts, but also that they not lack helps which greatly profit spiritual progress. - St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, n. 8.

II. Any Priest, whether secular or regular, is bound, when the Parish Priest is lacking, to minister the Eucharist to one about to die; otherwise in other cases. The reason of the first is that anyone from charity is bound to come to the aid of his neighbor placed in so great an extremity by this salutary and most efficacious remedy. The reason of the second is clear. For no obligation intervenes, whether from justice, since there is no contract, or from charity, since a case of necessity is not supposed to be present.

292. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the Parish Priest is bound also to seek out the sick who are not asking for the Eucharist, in order that he may minister it to them?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, at least if they are in grave danger of death. The reason is that it is the office of a good Pastor to take care that this so salutary remedy be supplied to his sheep constituted in so great a danger. It is besides gathered from Canon Law, title On the celebration of Masses.

QUESTION 2. Whether the Parish Priest is bound to minister the Eucharist to his subjects by himself?

Resp. No. For it suffices if he provides that whoever opportunely asks, or needs, is not deprived of the same. Therefore he can fulfill the obligation even through others. Nevertheless he must take care lest he seem idle and unconcerned if he habitually fulfills his duties through others.

QUESTION 3. Whether the Parish Priest sins gravely whenever he denies the Eucharist to one reasonably asking?

Resp. No. For if he rarely does this, for example toward one or another, scandal or grave sadness of the petitioner being excluded, he will sin only venially. The reason is that thus neither grave injury nor grave harm is inflicted, and if there is harm, it can easily be repaired. - Thus all. - Recall the things said on the Sacraments in general, n. 216.

QUESTION 4. Whether the Parish Priest is bound to minister the Eucharist even with danger of life, for example in time of plague or contagious disease?

Resp. No, very probably with St. Ligorius, n. 233. - See the things said, n. 214. Nevertheless certain persons affirm, relying on the doctrine of Benedict XIV, De Syn. dioec., lib. 13, c. 19.

293. ○ QUESTION 5. When is the Parish Priest judged to be excused from ministering the Eucharist to subjects asking?

Resp. He is legitimately excused: 1. when subjects, because of some circumstances, do not ask reasonably, for example if they ask before Mass when they can easily wait, etc.; 2. if the parish priest himself is impeded because of infirmity or other necessary occupations, etc. Nevertheless one must act cautiously, because in these matters the faithful can easily take scandal and be kept away from receiving the Sacraments more often. - Thus all.

Article III. On the Things Required for the Licit Dispensation of the Holy Eucharist

294. Principles. - I. Besides jurisdiction [1], it is required that the Minister be free from every excommunication, interdict, and suspension from Sacred things; for otherwise he would sin gravely and contract irregularity.

[1] We have already observed above, in the note to n. 289, that the custom has prevailed that any priest celebrating Mass in any church can minister the Eucharist to those asking.

II. It is required that the Minister be in the state of grace, because the most august and most holy Body of Christ ought not to be handled by impure hands. Hence the Priest sins as often as, being guilty of mortal sin, he distributes Communion, although probably he does not commit as many sins as there are persons communicating in the same distribution of the Eucharist. - St. Ligorius, n. 30 and following. - Nevertheless very grave Theologians, for example Lugo, De Sacramentis, disp. 8, n. 155, and others cited by St. Ligorius, lib. 6, n. 35, excuse from grave sin.

III. It is required that the Minister distribute the Eucharist by the customary rite of the Church. Hence, generally speaking, the administration of this Sacrament must be omitted when it cannot be done in the manner prescribed by the Roman Ritual or by the custom of the place. - See St. Ligorius, n. 241 and following.

295. Resolves. - 1. The Minister of the Eucharist must treat this most august Sacrament with great reverence, in whose presence the venerating Powers tremble and the whole heavenly Court suppliantly adores. But it is not enough that the Priest touch the holy Eucharist worthily and devoutly and minister it to the faithful; for if he is the Parish Priest, or his assistant, it belongs to him to take care that it be preserved in an honorable place, or in a becoming tabernacle. A notable omission of the care due for this can easily become mortal. - Elbel, n. 76. - St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, n. 81, and all others.

2. The Eucharist is not to be ministered except with a becoming habit, that is, with stole, surplice, and light.

3. According to the common opinion, he sins gravely who outside a case of necessity distributes Communion without any sacred vestment, because this is very indecent and against a grave precept of the Church. - St. Ligorius, n. 241. - Yet if only the stole is omitted, it seems to several and grave Theologians to be only venial, which seems sufficiently probable. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

4. It is reputed only venial to minister the Eucharist without light, or without the usual confession, Confiteor, etc., having been said beforehand. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 241. - Similarly, it is held only venial to transfer the Eucharist without sacred vestments from place to place, for example from one altar to another. - Reuter, n. 168. - Mazzotta.

296. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether a Priest laboring under infirmity in thumb and index finger can minister the Eucharist with other fingers?

Resp. It seems it must be denied, at least more probably, a case of most grave necessity being excluded [2]. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 244. - The reason is that although the whole hand is consecrated, nevertheless the index finger and thumb by the rite of the Church are specially destined for exercising this office.

[2] Here a most grave necessity seems to be required a little too severely. On this matter La Croix (lib. 6, p. 1, n. 480) writes thus: It is probable that a priest licitly distributes Communion with the latter fingers, if he cannot with the first because of gout of the hand or another impediment, as Toletus, Arriaga, Leander, and others with Gobat have it.... Because although only the first fingers are anointed, nevertheless the whole hand seems consecrated; hence Gobat infers that a priest who without cause touched the host with the last fingers would sin only venially.

QUESTION 2. What must be done if the Host falls to the ground?

Resp. The place into which the holy Host has fallen must immediately be covered with some clean thing and afterwards washed. If it falls onto the cloth or little linen cloth by which the hands of the communicant are covered, the place must be marked and afterwards washed in the same way. Thus the Rubric, which nevertheless according to the common opinion does not oblige under grave obligation; yet it would oblige gravely to wash the place into which the sacred species of wine had fallen, since it is imbibed; nevertheless there is no need to burn them [3]. - St. Ligorius, n. 250. - Lacroix, n. 484.

[3] Those last words: There is no need to burn them, although taken from St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 250), do not cease to be obscure. For to what does the word them refer? Therefore more clearly in La Croix (lib. 6, p. 1, n. 484), whom St. Alphonsus alleges here: Pasqualigus adds that there is no need to burn that into which the sacred blood has fallen, but that it is enough to wash it.

QUESTION 3. What must be done if the Host falls onto the face, beard, or garments of the communicant?

Resp. In the aforesaid cases purification is to be omitted, because it is better to avoid the astonishment, disturbance, or offense of the people than to observe the Rubric, which obliges only under light obligation. - St. Ligorius, n. 250, and others commonly.

QUESTION 4. What must be done if the Host falls into the bosom or within the garments of a woman?

Resp. The woman herself must extract the Host and hand it to the Priest, from whom afterwards she is to receive it into her mouth. - Thus Benedict XIV, On the Sacrifice of the Mass, sect. 2, n. 176. But the fingers of the woman are to be washed, and the ablution is to be thrown into the sacrarium. If the woman cannot easily extract the Host there, let her withdraw apart, for example into some chapel, or into the sacristy, etc.

297. ○ QUESTION 5. At what hour can Communion be dispensed?

Resp. Regularly it must be ministered at the hours at which it is permitted to celebrate Mass either from custom or from a special Indult. But commonly with St. Ligorius it is taught that it can be ministered at any hour of the day, except, however, the last part of the day, that is, toward night. The reason is that no prohibition exists concerning this matter. St. Ligorius, lib. VI, n. 259. - Nor does the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites given in the month of December 1816 stand in the way, permitting the administration of Communion from the time to the time in which Masses are celebrated in any Church on a day of great concourse. For that Decree is not exclusive, since the Sacred Congregation gave a response according to the petition, in which the matter was precisely about a day of great concourse for gaining a plenary Indulgence or Jubilee.

Here it must be added that, from a decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites in the year 1641, Communion is not to be given in the Mass of the Nativity of the Lord which is celebrated at midnight. In St. Ligorius, ibid. Nevertheless the faculty of permitting this is sometimes conceded by privilege; and very recently it was conceded to some Bishops of France by this law, that no danger of scandal be present.

298. ○ QUESTION 6. Whether Communion can be given outside Mass?

Resp. Generally speaking, it is to be given, as far as can be done, after the Communion of the Priest. Thus from the Roman Ritual [4]. Yet from received usage Communion can easily be given before or after Mass, or even at any other time at which Mass can be celebrated, as was said above. Indeed, where there is a great influx of communicants, it is expedient to defer Communion until the Sacrifice has been completed, lest those who are present at Mass be detained in Church longer than is fitting and be affected with weariness. Communion outside Mass is very easily to be conceded to the sick, children, old persons, and all those who, because of weakness of stomach, cannot prolong the fast [5]. Thus St. Ligorius, n. 249, with others commonly after Benedict XIV, On the Sacrifice of the Mass, sect. 2, n. 162. - Indeed because of present custom there now exists no precept of giving Communion only within Mass. - Thus Billuart, diss. 7, art. 4. - Nay rather, it must be held as certain that because of the custom which has prevailed everywhere, and which cannot be abrogated by Parish Priests, there exists no precept by force of which Communion must be distributed only within Mass. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Rites, December 7, 1844, in Januensis.

[4] The Roman Ritual does not treat of Communion to be ministered generally, but of Communion to be distributed by a priest celebrating Mass. And to this alone pertain those words: But the Communion of the people within Mass ought to be done immediately after the Communion of the celebrating priest (unless sometimes for a reasonable cause it is to be done after Mass), since the prayers which are said in Mass after Communion pertain not only to the priest, but also to other communicants. For otherwise the same Ritual prescribes in the prior place the manner which is to be observed outside Mass in imparting Communion.

[5] Add also those, and these are almost all, who, pressed by domestic cares or business, unless they are dispatched as quickly as possible, would often be forced to be deprived of the sacred table.

299. ○ QUESTION 7. Whether Communion can be given with black vestments immediately before or after a Mass of the dead [6]?

[6] In the preceding edition of the year 1866 we observed that the Rev. Fr. Aloysius Marchesi, Priest of the Congregation of the Mission and Consultor of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, very recently wrote an excellent Commentary on the argument of this and of the following question; in which, after the Decrees of the Sacred Congregation which are circulated had been brought forward and weighed with equal judgment and diligence, he judged that one must conclude: It is not against the rite, in Masses of the dead with black vestments, to minister Sacred Communion to the faithful, even from preconsecrated particles, by extracting the pyx from the repository. Communion can also be ministered in black vestments immediately after a Mass of the dead; but when grave necessity is given (I would think, when otherwise the faithful would be forced to lack sacred Communion) even immediately before the same Mass; yet in each case the blessing is to be omitted. But Masses of the dead are altogether to be celebrated in black vestments, so that violet cannot be used unless in the case in which, on November 2, the Sacrament of the Most Holy Eucharist is exposed for the public adoration of the faithful for the solemn prayer of the Forty Hours; but that the Sacred Congregation of Rites again responded to these things: Deferred.

Finally, on July 23 in the year 1868, Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX confirmed the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites issued on June 27 of the same year, by which an end is imposed on these questions. This Decree indeed we are pleased to transcribe here, and the more willingly because it also exhibits a certain history of the whole controversy. It is as follows.

After the more recent liturgical laws enacted by the Supreme Pontiffs Pius V, Clement VIII, Paul V, and Urban VIII, a grave controversy blazed up among Doctors and Rubricists: "Whether in Masses of the dead the tabernacle can be opened for refreshing the Faithful with Eucharistic bread." The Sacred Congregation of Rites, asked the first time, in one of Albenga, July 24, 1863, responded to the fourth: "It is not against the rite to minister Communion in a Requiem Mass, or after it with black vestments, the blessing being omitted, if it is administered after Mass." But the controversy not yet being composed, the Sacred Congregation of Rites from time to time gave responses in particular cases, without ever coming to a general Decree. Meanwhile, from the opinions of some Doctors, both the opinion spread that the holy Eucharist could be ministered to the faithful only with particles consecrated in the Mass for the dead, and in some places the custom prevailed of celebrating Masses of the dead in violet vestments, so that not only within Mass, but also before or after the same, satisfaction might be given to the piety of the faithful desiring to be refreshed by the sacred Eucharist. Wherefore, Bishops especially very often asking the Sacred Congregation of Rites to establish by a general Decree what must be done in this matter, the same Sacred Congregation on April 12 of the year 1823, in one of Palermo, declared that this grave question should be considered particularly and officially. This again obtained in the year 1837, in one of Modena, where to the third doubt: "Whether the custom which still endures of communicating in Masses of the dead with preconsecrated particles can be permitted, or etc.," the response was: Deferred, and let the rescript in the case of Palermo, April 12, 1823, be observed. Nevertheless, because of the circumstances of times and things, this special inquiry of this difficult business was delayed even to our age; since in the meeting gathered on September 16 of the year 1865, when there was a question concerning the use of violet color in Masses of the dead at an altar where the Most Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist is preserved, the response was given for the third time: "Deferred, and let it be proposed again together with another doubt, whether a Priest can open the ciborium for communicating the faithful with black vestments." Finally, with new prayers of sacred Prelates intervening on March 3 of the year 1866, in the Ordinary Assembly of the Sacred Congregation of Rites a Doubt was proposed, together with the opinion which another of the Consultors opened from office: "Whether a priest can open the ciborium for communicating the faithful in black vestments?" But the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Cardinal Fathers responded: Deferred, and let another Consultor write, and also the Assessor, all things bearing on the matter being resumed; with regard especially to opportunity. These opinions having been printed and communicated, both of the Most Reverend Assessor and of another specially deputed from the Masters of Apostolic Ceremonies, the Sacred Congregation of Rites was assembled in Ordinary Meeting on this day at the Vatican; where the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord Cardinal Nicholas Clarelli-Paracciani, in the place and stead of the absent Most Eminent and Most Reverend Cardinal Constantine Patrizi, Prefect, proposed the same Doubt, and the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Cardinal Fathers set over the protection of sacred Rites, the matter having been maturely and accurately weighed also as to opportunity, responded: Affirmatively, or that in Masses of the dead, with black vestments, Sacred Communion can be ministered to the faithful, even from preconsecrated particles, by extracting the pyx from the tabernacle. Likewise Communion can be ministered in black vestments immediately after a Mass of the dead; but when reasonable cause being given, also immediately before the same Mass; yet in each case the blessing is to be omitted. But Masses of the dead are altogether to be celebrated in black vestments, so that violet cannot be used unless in the case in which, on November 2, the Sacrament of the Most Holy Eucharist is exposed for the public adoration of the faithful for the solemn Prayer of the Forty Hours, as was guarded in the Decree of this Sacred Congregation on September 16 of the year 1801. And thus they decreed, and commanded that it be observed everywhere, if it should please Our Most Holy Lord, on June 27, 1868.

Then, a faithful report concerning the premises having been made by me, the Secretary, to Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX, His Holiness approved and confirmed the Decree of the Sacred Congregation on July 23 of the same year.

Resp. 1. It can be given after Mass if the Priest has not yet departed from the altar at which he celebrated; but then he does not give the blessing to those who communicated. - Thus from the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites confirmed by Our Most Holy Lord Pius IX, July 23, 1868.

Resp. 2. According to the same Decree, Communion can also be given before Mass if there is a reasonable cause, yet the blessing being omitted. But a reasonable cause is never lacking if there are some who then ask for Communion. For very often it happens that among those asking there are certain persons who otherwise would either depart without Communion, or, by staying longer, would necessarily undergo no light inconvenience either in domestic matters or in conducting business.

QUESTION 8. Whether Communion can be given with black vestments WITHIN a Mass OF REQUIEM?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, both if Communion is given with Hosts alone consecrated in the same Mass, and if it is given from preconsecrated ones which are preserved in the tabernacle. Thus the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites cited above.

300. ○ QUESTION 9. Whether Communion can be given with violet vestments, even before or after Mass?

Resp. This question could long be controverted, especially because of the Response which was reported of the Sacred Congregation of Rites in the cause of Orihuela (mistakenly in St. Alphonsus, lib. 6, n. 249, dub. 2, it is read Pritana) in the year 1670. But the aforesaid Decree of the Sacred Congregation also removed this doubt, by which it is established that in Masses of the dead violet vestments cannot be used, except in some Church on November 2, if the Sacrament of the Holy Eucharist is exposed for public adoration of the faithful for the solemn Prayer of the Forty Hours.

301. ○ QUESTION 10. How is Communion to be ministered outside Mass?

Resp. 1. If Communion is to be ministered immediately before or after Mass, one must act as in the Mass itself; but the priest, having returned to the altar, can say: O sacrum convivium, etc.; then he says: Domine exaudi, etc. - Dominus vobiscum, etc., with the Prayer for the time; finally, his fingers having been washed, and the sacred ciborium having been placed back in the tabernacle, he blesses those who communicated with the formula: The blessing of Almighty God, Father, etc., as in the Roman Ritual.

Resp. 2. If it is to be distributed at another time: 1. according to the Roman Ritual, two candles are to be lit. Yet if time presses and two candles cannot easily be lit, one will suffice. 2. The Priest, his hands washed, vested in surplice and stole of the color fitting the Office of that day, ministers, as above, and, having returned to the altar, proceeds with the rest, as above; then he gives the blessing with the right hand, but not with the pyx, except over the sick. But the versicles Domine exaudi, etc., Dominus vobiscum, etc., with the proper Prayer, are of precept. Sacred Congregation of Rites, September 24, 1842. - But prayers of this sort seem to have to be said in a voice at least moderately raised, since response is to be made to them by the minister.

302. ○ QUESTION 11. What must be done if a minister is lacking for the Priest: can a man about to communicate, or a woman, supply?

Resp. 1. Certainly any person about to communicate, if he is a man, can serve the Priest; or even the Priest himself can supply, by saying the Confiteor and responding Amen.

Resp. 2. A woman cannot supply, unless she is a Nun, who according to received custom answers within the cloister; then therefore the Priest himself must perform all things. Nor may you say that in necessity a woman can answer Mass, provided she stands at a distance; for in Mass the Priest alone could not answer all things. - Thus commonly. - Bouvier, On the Eucharist, c. 4, art. 2. - Gousset, n. 212.

QUESTION 12. Whether several particles, or one larger particle for the sake of devotion, etc., can be given to one communicant?

Resp. No. For this was expressly prohibited by a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, approved by Innocent XI on February 12, 1679. But the words of the Decree, in Benedict XIV, are these: Let Bishops, Parish Priests, or Confessors admonish that several Eucharistic forms or particles are not to be given to anyone, nor larger ones, but the customary ones.

303. ○ QUESTION 13. Whether particles can be broken if they are lacking; and what must be done if some remain over, and there is no tabernacle in which they may be placed?

Resp. to the first: The answer is affirmative from the common opinion and general practice, provided that a just cause is present, for example if another Mass is lacking or the faithful cannot wait. Indeed, when it had been requested from the Sacred Congregation of Rites whether the Rule of the Parisian Ritual expressed thus can be followed entirely: If, when Communion is to be given, a sufficient number of Hosts has not been found, some Hosts can be divided into several particles which are distributed to individuals, the Sacred Congregation responded: Let the custom be observed of dividing consecrated ones, if necessity is present. March 16, 1833, in Veronensis. Nevertheless the Priest must then divide the Hosts only into two or at most three parts, because otherwise Communion could scarcely be given with due reverence. - Lacroix, n. 508.

Resp. to the second: They are to be consumed by the celebrant before the ablutions, if this can easily be done. Otherwise they would have to be carried to the nearest tabernacle with the customary rite; nor is it to be committed that several Hosts be ministered to the faithful. - See below, n. 315.

QUESTION 14. Whether, when smaller Hosts are lacking, a Priest can take away a part of the larger Host to be consumed by himself, in order to communicate the faithful?

Resp. 1. The answer is affirmative in the case of Viaticum to be carried to one dying, by reason of urgent necessity. - Thus all. - 2. The answer is affirmative also if there would be one or another faithful person about to communicate who otherwise would have to wait for Communion not without inconvenience. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 217.

Article IV. On the Manner of Ministering the Eucharist to the Sick

304. The Roman Ritual establishes the following. - I. Let the Parish Priest forewarn that the room of the sick person be cleaned, and that in it a table be prepared, covered with a clean linen cloth, on which the Most Holy Sacrament may be decently placed. Let lights be prepared, two small vessels, one with wine to be handed to the sick person after Communion, that he may more easily swallow the holy Host, the other with water for washing the fingers of the Priest; besides, a clean linen cloth to be placed before the breast of the one communicating. Often a vessel of holy water is added, whenever it is not customary for it to be carried with the Most Holy Sacrament. Often also wine is not used.

II. The Eucharist must be carried from the Church to the private homes of the sick in becoming habit, a clean veil being placed over it, manifestly and honorably, with all reverence, always with a light and with a little bell continually rung going before. But the Priest, vested in surplice and stole, and having first placed on each shoulder a becoming oblong veil, should receive with both hands the vessel with the Most Holy Sacrament, to be carried before his breast, and then should enter under the baldachin or umbrella, if it can be had, and should proceed with head uncovered. But while going he says the Miserere and other Psalms, and on returning Praise the Lord from the heavens and other Psalms and Hymns; but these are only of counsel.

III. When the Priest has arrived at the house of the sick person, let him say: Peace to this house. Resp.: And to all dwelling in it. Then, the Most Holy Sacrament having been placed upon the table, he adores it; he sprinkles the sick person and the room with holy water, saying: Thou shalt sprinkle me, etc., and the other prayers placed in the Roman Ritual. Afterwards, the sick person having been questioned and exhorted, he presents the Most Holy Eucharist according to custom. But if Viaticum is in question, he does not say: The Body of the Lord, etc.; but: Receive, brother, the Viaticum of the Body of Our Lord Jesus Christ, etc., as in the Ritual.

IV. When death is imminent, most of the prayers, or even all, are omitted. The Priest, his fingers having been washed and the prayers completed, if particles remain, blesses the sick person with the ciborium, saying nothing. From the Roman Ritual, the ablutions must be given to the sick person. - The Priest, having returned to the Church, the ciborium having been placed upon the altar, recites the verse and prayer concerning the Most Holy Sacrament.

305. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the Eucharist can be carried to the sick at night?

Resp. No. For this is expressly prohibited, except in a case of necessity. For thus the Roman Ritual: But this Sacrament ought not to be carried at night, unless necessity urges. But when necessity urges, it must be carried at any hour of the night, but without noise and without the sound of the bell. But the cited words of the Ritual do not regard Communities which preserve the Most Holy Eucharist in a domestic Chapel, because the danger of irreverence, on account of which the law was made, is then absent.

QUESTION 2. Whether the Eucharist can be carried to the sick secretly?

Resp. No, generally speaking. This is clear from the Roman Ritual, where it is said: This holy Sacrament must be carried manifestly and honorably. Yet certain circumstances are excepted, for example places of heretics, where it cannot be carried manifestly. Likewise sometimes even in places of Catholics, if otherwise the holy Viaticum cannot be carried to the sick person without some inconvenience. Yet this ought not be done without the license of the Bishop, where he can be consulted.

306. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether a Priest, when necessity urges, can minister Viaticum without any sacred vestment?

Resp. The answer is affirmative. The reason is that it is not to be presumed that the Church, which is so benign a mother, wished those rites to be observed in the administration of Viaticum to the detriment of the dying. For the Sacraments were instituted primarily for the salvation of souls. - St. Ligorius, n. 241.

QUESTION 4. Whether, when necessity urges, it is permitted to run in carrying Viaticum?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, probably. The reason is that the urgent necessity of carrying Viaticum to a dying person can excuse from greater decorum in walking. - Thus St. Ligorius, n. 242. - Lacroix.

QUESTION 5. Whether it is permitted in time of plague to present the Eucharist by means of some instrument?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, probably, because so great a necessity seems to excuse from the customary rite of the Church. - St. Ligorius, n. 244.

307. ○ QUESTION 6. Whether it is permitted to carry the Eucharist with the head covered on the journey?

Resp. No, on account of the reverence due to the Sacrament. Therefore in carrying the Most Holy Sacrament to the sick, whether this is done by day or by night, neither under the pretext of any infirmity nor under another pretext can a biretta or even a small skullcap be used. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, March 5, 1633; January 23, 1695; January 23, 1700.

Wherefore a Priest laboring under catarrh or another infirmity must abstain from carrying the Most Holy Sacrament, or commit that office to another, or nevertheless proceed with uncovered head, unless the use of the skullcap has been granted to him by indult. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, May 23, 1846. Yet the use of the skullcap is not conceded with so much difficulty on a journey, although less within a city or town. According to several, the Bishop can concede license of carrying a skullcap on a journey; but the faculty of using a skullcap through the city or town is of apostolic right. - De Herdt, Practice of Sacred Liturgy, tom. 1, part 1, n. 50. The Holy See conceded dispensation from that law for the diocese of Cologne, especially in winter weather. November 3, 1862. - See Analecta Iuris Pontif., 53rd delivery, November and December 1862.

St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, tr. 15, n. 12, has these things: Pasqualigus says, probably, that the Bishop can dispense that Viaticum be carried with a skullcap on the head, when one must proceed far and through villages.

QUESTION 7. Whether a Priest can carry the Holy Eucharist sitting on a horse?

Resp. The answer is affirmative if it must be carried to a sick person far distant, or through an arduous journey, or if there is danger in delay. But the horse must be gentle, so that danger of fall and irreverence is absent. But it is never permitted to give the pyx to a layman to be carried, however much the priest is fatigued; but then he must carry it in a burse suspended from the neck. This is clear from the Roman Ritual on the Eucharist, and also from the decision of the Sacred Congregation of Rites. And previously: That Viaticum, because of distance of places, difficulty of journeys, and roughness of roads, may be carried by the Parish Priest riding, the Sacred Congregation of Rites grants, yet with the consent of the Bishop. January 23, 1740, in Laudensis. - See St. Ligorius, n. 242, 243.

308. ○ QUESTION 8. Whether the Eucharist can be carried several times to the sick who are not fasting, or by way of Viaticum?

Resp. The answer is affirmative, and not only if a new danger of death recurs, but also if the same danger endures. - Thus the common and true opinion, says St. Ligorius, n. 285. It is confirmed by the authority of Benedict XIV, who in De Syn., lib. 7, c. 12, testifies that no Theologian of any name denies this opinion; and he adds, ibid., n. 5: Let the Bishop intimate to Parish Priests that Viaticum can and ought to be administered again and a third time in the same infirmity, especially if the sick person asks; and if he wishes, let him decree a penalty against Parish Priests who refuse to carry the Eucharist again and a third time to sick persons devoutly asking, under false pretexts.

QUESTION 9. Whether the Eucharist can frequently be carried to those lying sick?

Resp. The answer is affirmative per se. Yet this depends on circumstances, namely on their particular dispositions and on the greater or lesser frequency with which they previously approached the Eucharistic table [1]. The Parish Priest must, as far as lies in him, exhort the sick to frequent Communion. - Gousset, n. 235.

[1] That someone, while he enjoyed good health, was accustomed to approach the Most Holy Eucharist less frequently would not indeed be a sufficient reason why more frequent Communion should seem to be denied to him when sick, if indeed he desires it.

QUESTION 10. What must a Priest do if, arriving at the sick person with the Most Holy Sacrament and hearing his confession, he finds him indisposed?

Resp. First the Confessor must strive, as best he can, to bring the penitent to better fruit. If the matter does not succeed, and for example the sick person does not promise either to break off the proximate occasion of sin, or to make grave and certainly owed restitution, he certainly cannot be absolved. But what about Communion? The penitent must earnestly be induced, after the confession has been completed, to declare publicly that he does not yet wish to receive the Holy Eucharist. But if he makes this declaration, the difficulty now vanishes; for it is clear that the Eucharist is not to be ministered to him. But if he refuses to declare this, and wishes to communicate, the Eucharist must be ministered to him, although indisposed, namely in order to preserve intact the seal of confession. - Gousset, n. 237, and others.

Article V. On the Manner of Preserving the Holy Eucharist

309. These Things Must Be Held. - I. In any parish and cathedral Church the Holy Eucharist must be kept, so that it can always be given to those asking opportunely. Thus expressly the Roman Ritual, etc. For by common right it can be preserved in Churches of Regulars emitting solemn vows. But in other Churches it cannot be preserved without the special license of the Pope. Thus the Sacred Congregations of the Council and of Bishops established, cited in Ferraris, word Eucharist, art. 1, n. 46.

II. The Eucharist is to be preserved in a clean tabernacle, well closed, and in a becoming pyx placed upon a corporal and covered with a white veil. Now the tabernacle in which the Most Holy Sacrament is kept must be covered with a conopaeum of silken cloth, or of wool or cotton. - Roman Ritual. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, July 21, 1855.

III. Nowhere is the Holy Eucharist to be preserved without a light, which must always burn. For thus it is established in the Roman Ritual: Several lamps before it (the tabernacle), or at least one, should perpetually shine day and night. Thus also it was defined through Decrees of the Sacred Congregation, which will that if the Church is too poor, a collector of alms be appointed, that sufficient oil may be had. - See Ferraris, word Eucharist, art. 1, n. 45.

310. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether other sacred things can be placed in the tabernacle?

Resp. No. This is clear from the Roman Ritual on the Eucharist. Hence neither Relics, nor Chrism, nor the Oil of the sick can be placed in it.

QUESTION 2. Whether the ciborium must be consecrated and silver?

Resp. to the first: It need not necessarily be consecrated, but it suffices that it be blessed. This is clear from the Roman Ritual, in which the blessing of the pyx is noted among those things which do not need anointing with Chrism. Likewise from the Roman Pontifical. - See St. Ligorius, n. 248, and below, n. 396.

Resp. to the second: Nothing is established by common law. And indeed it would seem to be equated with the chalice and paten, which ought to be of gold or silver, or at least of tin, if the Church is very poor. But it cannot be of bronze, nor of wood or glass, etc. (De Consecr., dist. 1, c. 45). Besides, if sacred vessels are not of gold, they ought to be gilded within.

QUESTION 3. Whether he sins gravely who neglects to preserve a light before the Most Holy Sacrament?

Resp. The answer is affirmative per se, if the time is notable. - Thus commonly the Theologians with St. Ligorius, n. 248. Indeed several authors say that the time is notable if this is done for a whole day. - Thus Busembaum, whose words St. Ligorius reports and implicitly approves, ibid.

311. ○ QUESTION 4. Whether olive oil is required for nourishing the lamp of the Church, or whether another oil from vegetables, for example from nuts, or from minerals, as petroleum, suffices?

Resp. Generally olive oil is to be used; but where it cannot be had, another oil from vegetables, as far as circumstances allow, can be permitted by the Bishop. This is clear from a recent decision of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, which is of this sort.

Certain Most Reverend Prelates of the Gauls, seriously weighing that in many Churches of their dioceses olive oil for nourishing at least one lamp day and night before the Sacrament of the Most Holy Eucharist can be procured with very great difficulty and only at great expense, asked that it be declared by the Apostolic See whether in the case, with attention to the difficulties and the poverty of the Churches, other oils which are had from vegetables can be substituted for olive oil, petroleum itself not excluded. Now the Sacred Congregation of Rites, although always solicitous that even in this part what has been introduced from the beginnings of the Church concerning the use of oil from olives be retained, on account of mystical significations, nevertheless judged that the reasons brought forward by the same Bishops should by no means be passed over in silence; and therefore, the vote of another of the Masters of Apostolic Ceremonies having first been sought, the undersigned Cardinal Prefect of the same Sacred Congregation proposed the whole matter in the ordinary Assembly held at the Vatican on this day. But the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Fathers set over the protection of the sacred Rites, after all things had been accurately weighed and most diligently examined, judged that response should be made: Generally olive oil is to be used; but where it cannot be had, it is to be remitted to the prudence of the Bishops that the lamps be nourished from other oils, as far as can be done vegetable oils. July 9, 1864.

Afterwards, a faithful report concerning the premises having been made to Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX by me, the undersigned Secretary, His Holiness held as ratified and confirmed the opinion of the Sacred Congregation. On the 14th of the same month and year.

From this response of the Sacred Congregation it also follows that petroleum is not excluded, and in urgent necessity can be permitted by the Bishop.

312. ○ QUESTION 5. What must be done concerning fragments of Hosts which are found?

Resp. 1. If the Priest finds fragments of his present Sacrifice, he must consume them, even after the ablutions, whether they are small or large, because they pertain to the same sacrifice. Thus from the Rubric of the Missal, tit. 7, n. 2. - But this must be observed not only immediately after Mass, but also if the Priest is in the sacristy, yet still clothed in sacred vestments. - Thus commonly St. Ligorius, n. 251, after Benedict XIV, On the Sacrifice of the Mass.

But if the Priest has already put off the sacred vestments, he must place the fragments in the tabernacle, if there is one, or reserve them for another Priest about to celebrate that same morning. If neither can be done, let him consume them himself. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

Resp. 2. But if the remains were consecrated in another Mass, they are not to be consumed after the ablutions, but must be placed in a becoming place. The reason is that the Rubric permits a Priest not fasting to consume only those remains which pertain to the same sacrifice. Yet if this cannot be done, and there is grave danger of irreverence, then let the Priest consume them. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

Resp. 3. If a layman finds fragments, let him warn a Priest as soon as possible, if one is near, or call him if he can be found. But the Priest, reverently collecting the fragment, will place it in the ciborium, or in a becoming and safe place if the tabernacle is lacking, so that it can be consumed in the next Mass. But if a Priest cannot be had, let the fragment be reverently collected by the layman himself in paper or a clean linen cloth, by means of a little thorn, and let it be placed within the corporal or in a becoming vessel until the Priest arrives.

313. ○ QUESTION 6. What must be done if there is found on the altar, or elsewhere, a Host certainly or doubtfully consecrated?

Resp. 1. If the Host is believed certainly consecrated, and from another source seems clean and recently consecrated, it is to be placed with the others in the ciborium. It can also be consumed by the celebrant before the ablutions. But if it is not clean, or if it has been extracted from a place not clean, or is not recently consecrated, it is not to be mixed with the others, but the celebrant will be able to consume it before the ablution; but if he experiences too great repugnance, he will place the Host separately in the tabernacle in a clean vessel until it is corrupted, and when corrupted it is to be thrown into the sacrarium. Thus from the Rubric of the Missal, tit. VII, On Defects.

Resp. 2. If it is doubtfully consecrated, it is to be consumed by the Priest in Mass before the ablutions; but if it provokes in him too great nausea, it is to be placed separately in the tabernacle until it has been corrupted, as was just said. - Thus the Rubric of the Missal [1].

[1] To these last words of Gury the VV. oppose (p. 932) that which St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 217) discusses on the occasion of hosts which are doubtfully consecrated. Tournely, that is, Collet, says, says the St. Doctor, that in practice those particles are to be consumed after the Blood; and I add, after the ablution, but before the purification, because the remains of the Blood are certainly the Sacrament; but those hosts... are doubtful.

Resp. When Gury says, before the ablutions, he certainly seems to have wished to denote both the purification and the ablution, which St. Alphonsus better distinguishes; although in the words of St. Alphonsus perhaps there occurs that which we are accustomed to call hysteron proteron; for first the Priest purifies himself, and then washes his fingers according to the rubric, which says, n. X: Upon the altar he extends the chalice to the minister at the Epistle corner, and while he pours wine, HE PURIFIES HIMSELF; then with wine and water HE WASHES his thumbs and index fingers over the chalice, etc. Wherefore we shall say that the Holy Doctor wished rather to say: and I add, after the purification, but before the ablution; but by no means after the ablution, but before the purification.

Moreover, the Rubrics seem to favor Gury's opinion rather than that of St. Alphonsus. For where they treat (On Defects, sec. III, n. 4, 5) of a priest who has consecrated a host either corrupted or not of wheat, they prescribe that if he has not consumed that former one (namely, corrupted or not of wheat), he should consume it after the reception of the Body and Blood. But nowhere in the Rubrics is it found that under the name of reception of the Body and Blood the purification also is comprehended.

QUESTION 7. What is to be done if the sick person has rejected the sacred species?

Resp. 1. If they are apparent, they must be carefully collected in a clean vessel, carried to the Church, and preserved in a safe and well-closed place until they are altogether corrupted, so that they can be cast into the sacrarium without irreverence.

Resp. 2. If they cannot be discerned, as being altogether mixed with filth, the mouth of the sick person is indeed to be wiped; but whatever has been rejected is to be collected with tow; then, the tow having been burned, the ashes are to be cast into the sacrarium. - Reuter, n. 169. Gousset, n. 232.

314. ○ QUESTION 8. Whether, or when, the ciborium is to be renewed?

Resp. 1. The ciborium certainly must sometimes be renewed, lest the consecrated species be corrupted. Indeed it must be renewed frequently, as the Roman Ritual prescribes.

Resp. 2. According to Benedict XIV the consecrated particles are to be renewed every eight days, or at least every fifteen days (On the Sacrifice of the Mass, appendix 3, sec. 6, n. 5). And this is the more common practice, although the Ceremonial of Bishops prescribes that the renewal of particles is to be made every eighth day.

315. ○ QUESTION 9. How is the ciborium to be renewed?

Resp. The renewal of the ciborium is to be made in the very Sacrifice of the Mass. The celebrant, after having consumed the most precious Blood, will consume the old Hosts, although they are many; and he can consume 20 or 30 Hosts in this way, according to Elbel, n. 77; indeed 50 or 60, according to Lacroix, n. 501. But it will rarely happen that there are more, because there should not be consecrated except as much as seems likely to be sufficient. But if at some time a much greater quantity of Hosts had to be consumed, the Priest can consume them divided among several Masses, or even several Priests celebrating successively can consume them.

But the smaller particles found in the ciborium the Priest will put into the chalice, and, wine having been poured over them, he will consume them, and he will place the new Hosts in the ciborium altogether empty. He can also pour wine into the ciborium in order to collect the smallest particles. Yet the wine is not to be drunk from the ciborium, but is to be poured back into the chalice. - Lacroix, n. 502. If the Priest through inadvertence had first taken the ablution, he could still purify the ciborium and consume the remains, because for the reception it is morally reckoned as one. - Thus Lacroix, n. 502. - Elbel, n. 77. - Tamburini, On Communion, c. 2, n. 34.

The particles to be consecrated ought to be fresh. It would be desirable that they not exceed fifteen days, or at most a month, from the time in which they were made. The negligence of Parish Priests and of others in this matter can constitute a grave sin. - Gardellini. - The custom of consecrating Hosts made three or six months earlier is an enormous abuse, altogether to be removed. But if the Parish Priest, his Vicars, or other Priests seem to tolerate an abuse of this kind, they cannot use those Hosts. - Sacred Congregation of Rites, December 16, 1826.

Chapter IV. On the Subject of the Eucharist

Only a baptized man can receive the Eucharist sacramentally; because only the baptized is capable of the Sacraments. Hence an infidel receiving the Eucharist would indeed receive it truly, but only materially, not sacramentally. But a baptized man who is indisposed does indeed receive sacramentally, but not spiritually, that is, he receives, but without fruit. But a baptized man who is disposed receives both sacramentally and spiritually, or with fruit. - Thus the Council of Trent, sess. 13, c. 8.

We must treat 1. of the obligation of receiving the Eucharist; 2. of the disposition required for receiving it worthily.

Article I. On the Obligation of Receiving the Eucharist

316. Principles. - I. The real reception of the Eucharist is necessary neither for children nor for adults by necessity of means for salvation. This is clear 1. from the universal practice of the Church, which gives Communion neither to little children, nor to adults hindered by infirmity, for example those inclined to vomiting, the frenzied, etc.; 2. from the definition of the Church for little children; and thence it is inferred also for adults [1]. For thus the Council of Trent, sess. 21, can. 4: If anyone shall say that for little children, before they have arrived at the years of discretion, the Communion of the Eucharist is necessary, let him be anathema.

[1] Yet this argument perhaps will seem less firm to someone; indeed, using the aphorism that the exception confirms the rule to the contrary, he will rather conclude that by the canon of Trent the necessity of the Eucharist is implied for adults; a necessity, I say, not indeed absolute, but insofar as we know that by the divine economy it has been so arranged that the ordinary means of preserving spiritual life is placed in the use of this spiritual nourishment, according to that saying of Christ the Lord (John 6): Unless you shall eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink his blood, you shall not have life in you. See below, n. 318.

II. The reception of the Eucharist is necessary by necessity of divine precept; it is drawn from the words of Christ, John 6:54: Unless you shall eat the Flesh of the Son of man, and drink his Blood, you shall not have life in you. It is also clear from the words of Christ, Luke 22:19: Do this in commemoration of me [2]. - St. Ligorius, n. 295.

[2] The Author (above, n. 288) had already warned that these words were said to all and only the Apostles reclining with Christ, and therefore to all and only those who would succeed them in the priesthood.

317. ○ III. The reception of the Eucharist is necessary also from a precept of the Church. It is proved from the Fourth Lateran Council, cap. Omnis, de poenit. et remiss., where it is said: Every faithful person of either sex, after he has arrived at the years of discretion, shall confess all his sins alone at least once a year to his own priest... receiving reverently at least at Easter the Sacrament of the Eucharist, unless perhaps by the counsel of his own Priest, for some reasonable cause, he should judge that he must abstain from a reception of this kind. It is also clear from Trent, sess. 13, can. 9.

IV. The reception of the Eucharist is not necessary under both species except for Priests alone in the act of celebrating Mass. It is proved from Trent, sess. 21, can. 1, where it says thus: If anyone shall say that, by God's precept or by necessity of salvation, all and individual Christians ought to receive both species of the most holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, let him be anathema. It is also clear from the universal practice of the Church, although in the earlier centuries it was different.

318. Questions. - QUESTION 1. At what time does the divine precept of communicating urge?

Resp. 1. It obliges per se in the article or proximate danger of death, and indeed under grave obligation. The reason is that the Eucharist was instituted as Viaticum, strengthening against the enemies of salvation. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 295.

Resp. 2. It obliges per se also several times in life. This is clear from the fact that the Eucharist was instituted in the manner of spiritual food, by which the soul may be nourished and strengthened; for food is to be taken more than once. It is also drawn from Sacred Scripture cited above, and from the Councils just adduced. Yet Christ did not determine how often one must approach this Sacrament, but left this to be established by His Church. But the Church established annual Communion in Easter time. Hence by Communion taken once in the year at that time the divine and ecclesiastical precept are satisfied at the same time. - St. Ligorius, n. 295.

Resp. 3. This precept obliges per accidens sometimes, and perhaps also several times in the year, if the Eucharist is necessary for overcoming some grave temptation. Yet this rarely happens, since other means can suffice for this, prayers, penances, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 295.

319. ◦ QUESTION 2. Whether one is bound to receive the sacred Viaticum when the danger of death is imminent, if a few days before he communicated from devotion?

Resp. It seems that the answer must be affirmative, at least more probably. The reason is that this precept, from the interpretation of the Church, urges in danger of death, that we may be fortified by this divine aid against spiritual enemies. Therefore it is not fulfilled by Communion made before the illness; because although someone has fulfilled the prescribed work, nevertheless he did not fulfill it at the time at which he was bound. - St. Ligorius, n. 285. - Billuart. - Salmanticenses, etc.

Yet several deny this with Lugo, disp. 15, n. 39. Their reason is that the precept of Communion has already been fulfilled in substance. - St. Ligorius says that this opinion is sufficiently probable, at least if the danger of death occurs naturally, because during that short preceding time it had already morally begun to be imminent, although it was unknown.

QUESTION 3. Whether one who communicated in the morning from devotion is bound, or is able, when danger of death urges, to receive Viaticum.

Resp. There is a threefold probable opinion according to Benedict XIV, On the Synod, lib. 7, c. 11.

The first opinion affirms that he is bound, because then Viaticum must be received in order to fulfill the divine precept, which, since it did not yet urge at the time when Communion was taken, therefore could not be fulfilled through that reception.

The second opinion says that he is not bound, but can communicate: 1. indeed, that he is not bound, because the time at which he communicated is morally the same, since it is the same day; 2. that he can, because although strictly he does not seem to be bound, nevertheless he is not therefore prohibited, since favors are to be enlarged.

The third opinion contends that he is neither bound nor able to communicate. The reason is that, since the precept obliges from the intention of the Church, the practice of the Church is that no one communicate twice in a day; nor is there a reason why this case should be excepted. - See St. Ligorius, n. 285. - Therefore in practice one must stand for liberty [3].

[3]  To these [authors] the VV. oppose (p. 932, n. 96) these things of St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 285, dub. 3): But moreover, the opinion of Lugo seems more probable to me, disp. 16, n. 53 and 54, who distinguishes between a natural and a violent disease, and says that if someone has been struck by a wound, or has fallen from a height, he can communicate (indeed, he is bound, according to our opinion), because here in reality he did not receive Viaticum while placed in the article of death; but otherwise if someone, already placed in sickness, communicated in the morning from devotion.

Resp. I concede the antecedent; and I deny the consequence. For the Holy Doctor had already premised (ibid.): Our Father Benedict XIV thinks all these three opinions probable (On the Synod, lib. 7, c. 12), saying thus: In so great a discrepancy of the opinions of Doctors, it will be free to the parish priest to embrace that opinion which has pleased him more. Now surely, if there is some probability in the other opinions, it does not perish because St. Doctor, in giving his opinion, wrote that one of them seemed to him more probable. Therefore it equally remains free to the parish priest to choose the opinion which he prefers.

I said, moreover: I concede the antecedent. For Lugo, whose opinion St. Alphonsus says that he prefers as more probable, rather than hold this opinion, altogether rejects it. For after bringing forward the opinion which grants that Communion can be given twice on the same day, he adds (On the Eucharist, disp. 16, n. 52): Therefore all Doctors teach the contrary opinion, either in common or even in particular, who, when they say that even he who communicated a little before can afterwards, when danger has arrived, communicate again, add the exception: Unless he communicated on the same day. Thus Suarez speaks, who adds that the contrary is not only against all Doctors, but also against the custom of the Church. Then, after bringing forward similar votes of others, he concludes: All others speak in the same way, with no one granting it for the same day; and from this common authority it does not seem easy to depart.

And indeed, after Lugo wrote these things (l.c., n. 53): If the discussion is about him who, already placed in sickness, communicated from devotion on that day, I do not see how Communion can be given again on the same day, he distinguishes another case, as St. Alphonsus has it, and writes (l.c., n. 54): But if the discussion is about him who was well in the morning, and, struck by a wound or suddenly seized by disease, dies in the evening, it could more apparently be said that he could communicate again; because in reality he had not yet received the Eucharist while placed in the article of death. These words St. Alphonsus transcribed as if they expressed the true opinion of Lugo.

In reality, however, there Lugo is merely proposing a difficulty which he undertakes to solve for himself. Hence he concludes that same paragraph by saying: The precept of receiving Viaticum does not oblige one to receive it when it cannot be received; but then it cannot be received on the same day because of the prohibition of the Church, because it is prohibited that anyone communicate several times on the same day.

Then Lugo proceeds to confirm the same opinion even to the end of the same section (n. 55 to 60); and especially (n. 57) he answers the reason which he had added in the difficulty objected to him. By Communion, he says, made a little before death, even without thought of danger or death, satisfaction has in reality been made for the precept of communicating at the end of life: just as in fact he satisfies it who, while well, knowing that he is to be killed tomorrow, communicates today.... Since therefore the danger is not increased from the fact that a man knows death to be imminent (for the danger is present in reality, although it is unknown), it must be admitted that even he for whom death was imminent on the same day in reality communicated in danger of death, although he was ignorant of it, and therefore satisfied the divine precept. Therefore the Church rightly did not dispense in the prohibition of communicating twice on the same day, since there was no necessity of a second Communion.

But to the principal foundation of the contrary opinion, which is taken from the obligation of the divine precept concerning receiving Viaticum, which ought to be preferred to the human precept prohibiting communicating twice on the same day, Lugo (ibid.) replies: The answer is easy: in that case satisfaction has already been made for the divine precept by the first Communion, as we said. Add that, even if satisfaction had not been made, the divine precept would not oblige one to receive again on the same day, while the contrary prohibition of the Church stands, just as it does not oblige one to celebrate without sacred vestments because of the prohibition of the Church. Hence Vasquez and others, who say that satisfaction had not yet been made for the divine precept, nevertheless do not concede that Communion ought or could be received again on the same day, but on the following day.

He also solves that which they object (ibid., n. 60), that this opinion is too rigid. I answer, he says, that the contrary opinion is more rigid, since it obliges under mortal sin to receive Communion again on the same day, on which the same sick person had already communicated. For what some say, following a middle way, that a second Communion can indeed be received, but ought not to be received from obligation, does not seem to be said with sufficient consistency. For if the precept of receiving Viaticum does not oblige, it does not appear from where that license of communicating several times against the universal prohibition is had, since it cannot be proved either from custom or from some law.

QUESTION 5. Whether in danger of death Communion is to be given to children who have not yet been admitted to the sacred Synaxis [4]?

[4] Doctors usually inquire in this place, not so much about children in danger of life, but generally about them, whether and when they are obliged by the precept of receiving the Eucharist.

The obvious and easy solution of this question will indeed seem to be available in this Decree of the Ecumenical Fourth Lateran Council under Innocent III (cap. Omnis utriusque sexus): Every faithful person of either sex, after he has arrived at the years of discretion, shall confess all his sins alone once a year to his own priest..., receiving reverently at least at Easter the sacrament of the Eucharist. And this all the more because, for establishing this obligation, there came also the Tridentine canon striking with anathema those who would deny it. For thus the Holy Synod (sess. 13, can. IX): If anyone shall deny that all and individual faithful of Christ of either sex, when they have arrived at the years of discretion, are bound each year, at least at Easter, to communicate according to the precept of Holy Mother Church, let him be anathema.

Therefore concerning the obligation, which no one denies to be grave, it is sufficiently clear. It remains to inquire when children are to be considered to have arrived at the years of discretion, and what discretion is to be required in the present matter. But this can be known under a twofold head.

First, indeed, from the sense of the Doctors. Among these, St. Thomas, who flourished a little after the Lateran Synod, wrote these things (3, q. 80, a. 9, ad 3): When children now begin to have some use of reason, so that they can conceive devotion for this sacrament, then this sacrament can be conferred upon them. In these words carefully notice those expressions: begin to have, and some use of reason. Nor should it move you that the Holy Doctor requires children to be capable of devotion. For already in the body of the article he had said that only some devotion is required. Some, he says, are said not to have the use of reason in two ways: in one way, because they have a weak use of reason, just as one who sees badly is said not to see; and because such persons can conceive some devotion for this sacrament, this sacrament is not to be denied to them. From these things it is also clear that some use of reason is the same as a weak use of reason. And indeed from the same St. Thomas the celebrated rule was drawn among very many writers, that children can then be made participants in this sacrament when they know how to distinguish bread from bread. For thus the Holy Doctor (In 4, dist. 9, q. 1, a. 5, q. 4): It must be said that to children lacking the use of reason, who cannot distinguish between spiritual and corporal food, the Eucharist is not to be given.... But to children already beginning to have discretion, even before perfect age... this can be given, if signs of discretion and devotion appear in them.

This very thing you find in Dominic Soto, where (In 4, dist. 12, art. 9, at the end) he writes: But what is the lawful age at which little children can receive this Sacrament? There is no more certain rule than when, by the judgment of prudent men and especially of the Confessor, it appears that the child has reached the fork of the Pythagorean letter Y, namely that he can distinguish between good and evil, and therefore between this food and other secular foods.

And lest more be brought forward here, let it be enough to have heard Martin Ledesma, who expressed the common opinion of all in this way (In S. Thom., q. 80, a. 9, dub. 6): I say from the consent of all that the Eucharist is to be given to all having the use of reason, however early they have that use of reason, even though that child still confusedly knows what he does.

And the Roman Catechism is added (On the Eucharist, n. 62), which at last excepts from the precept of receiving the Eucharist only those who lack the use of reason. But, it says, although this law, sanctioned by the authority of God and of the Church, pertains to all the faithful, nevertheless it must be taught that those are excepted who do not yet have the use of reason because of the weakness of age.

The other thing from which it may be known what the years of discretion are, let it be the common sense not only of Doctors but of all men. And indeed not only Doctors, but all men agree in this, that the use of reason or the years of discretion are required even in a child so that he may be considered capable, and in reality be capable, 1. of sinning mortally, 2. of validly pronouncing vows which induce a grave obligation, 3. of validly receiving the sacrament of Penance. And if indeed scarcely any controversy exists concerning these things, and finally only this one thing is guarded, that a certain rule, by which sufficient use of reason or discretion may be presumed, must be defined from things commonly occurring, and thus, for example, betrothals are to be considered valid from a child in his eighth year (that is, after the seventh year has been completed), unless it is proved that someone has obtained the use of reason later, contrary to the ordinary laws of nature; indeed it does not appear why we ought to hesitate so greatly where the sense of the law given in the Lateran and Tridentine Councils is at issue.

And in reality St. Antoninus defined concerning this matter without any hesitation, and declared that a child, when he was capable of sinning mortally, was subject to the law of receiving the Sacraments both of Penance and of the Eucharist. Thus he says (part 3, tit. 14, cap. 12, sec. 5): But when he is capable of deceit (the child), namely when he can sin mortally, then he is obliged to the precept of Confession and consequently of Communion, which are given together.

Whence then, you will say, comes the disagreement of certain Authors who, although they all equally venerate the Decrees of the Church, nevertheless as if depart from them, and prolong somewhat the time of approaching the Eucharist? I answer that this seems to have happened from three causes, which nevertheless you would vehemently doubt can be approved by all. And first indeed some, which perhaps you would say must be attributed to special circumstances of places or times, thought that some use of reason arrives much later than now generally happens. Hence St. Antoninus (part 2, tit. IX, cap. VIII, sec. 2), asking: What, according to the Lateran decree, is called the year of discretion, in which someone is bound to confess? and premising that the Gloss on the said chapter Omnis says that the year of discretion is when one is capable of deceit; Richard in 4 says the same; and another certain one holds the same, saying that one is capable of deceit when he has the use of reason and recognizes sin; the sign of which is that he gives ordered answers to one asking; but Hostiensis... says that children are bound to confess when they are capable of deceit and not otherwise; then he refutes those who said that the year of discretion is the eighth year, because, he says, in many persons in the eighth year the child does not yet have the use of reason. Hence he infers this: But it is certain that before the use of reason no one can sin nor is bound by laws; hence neither is such a one consequently bound to confess. But he adds his own opinion thus: And since each one is obliged by an equal precept to Communion as to Confession, as is clear from that Decretal itself, Blessed Thomas says in 4 Sent., that children around the eleventh or twelfth year, if signs of devotion appear in them, namely so that they know how to distinguish material bread from sacramental bread, can communicate: which he says because one is presumed already to have the use of reason, and not before. Into this place, perhaps from a less corrected codex of St. Thomas, an error crept in; for the text of St. Thomas (In 4, dist. 9, q. 1, art. 5, q. 4) does not have eleventh or twelfth, but tenth or eleventh, as, among others, Tabiena also read (word Communicate, n. 6), and Sylvester (word Eucharist III, n. 7). But this is little; for others (see Ledesma, l. sup. c.) judged that discretion of this kind was still lacking in children before the fourteenth year.

Another cause of this quasi-departure from the Lateran and Tridentine sanction we find in Soto; for although he somehow concedes (In 4, disp. 12, art. 9, at the end) that children are capable of the sacred Synaxis in the tenth year of age, and approves the opinion of Paludanus, who thinks them fit even in the ninth year (see Tabiena, word Communicate, n. 6), and even states that a very lively child in the eighth year cannot be prohibited from the sacred table, nevertheless, having established a certain general principle, that no one is obliged by the laws of the Church except in the twelfth year of age, he teaches that children are bound by neither the precept of Confession nor of Communion before this age. For thus he says (l.c., art. 11): But if you ask whether all Christians are obliged by this precept (namely, of the Lateran Synod), the first response is that children are not obliged up to the twelfth year, when they are bound by other ecclesiastical laws. For although a little before the dawn of reason they can receive it, nevertheless a greater age is required for obliging to the sacrament both of Penance and of the Eucharist. And after Soto, Valentia (tom. 4, disp. 6, q. 8, punct. 4) hands down the same thing thus: Certain things are to be noted here. The first is that before the twelfth year that precept of the Church does not oblige, as Soto well notes. For although even before that it happens to some to have that discretion of reason so that the Eucharist can indeed be given to them..., nevertheless before that time of age they do not have that discretion such that they are also bound to receive the Eucharist, or also to confess, says Soto. Yet he himself (l.c., punct. 2) had conceded that, speaking generally, children can be admitted to the Eucharist in the tenth year. But the time, he says, at which children can be admitted to the Eucharist is that when they begin to be strong with such use of reason that they can sufficiently distinguish this heavenly food from the rest. This ordinarily tends to happen around the tenth year of age, as Soto notes.

Finally, a third cause of thinking otherwise than the Lateran law seems to bear can be discerned in Suarez. For although he affirms that the opinion of Soto and Valentia is approved by him, namely that children can be fit for Communion, and yet are not therefore bound to it by law, nevertheless he does not seek the reason with Soto from some general principle concerning ecclesiastical laws not obliging before the twelfth year, but he uses other supports, to which perhaps in great part the confusion introduced into this question seems to be owed. It is better to hear him himself (On the Sacraments, disp. 70, sect. 1): Soto adds, and it is also approved by me, that not immediately when these children arrive at the age in which they can lawfully communicate are they bound to it, but after some time, for example after one or another year. Thus then he gives the reason for these things: For both the use of the Church seems to have declared this law thus; and it is consonant with reason that the Church not oblige as soon as it can, but grant the faculty of waiting for some time, either on account of the greater reverence of the Sacrament, or on account of the greater fruit of the receiver, or lest these children be exposed to the danger of transgression; and this will be done more safely if it is done by the counsel of the Confessor; for thus there will also be no discord from the words of the law.

Moreover, I said that it must be greatly doubted whether those three causes of delay can be approved. And as regards the first, even the few things which we touched upon above concerning defining the year of discretion more than sufficiently prove that the opinion of St. Antoninus in this matter is opposed to the common sense of all. And indeed from those things which are commonly handed down concerning the sufficiency of age and therefore of discretion in children, both for contracting obligations either of vow or of betrothals, and for sinning gravely and receiving the sacrament of Penance, an argument can be made a fortiori as regards the capacity of receiving the Eucharist. For who does not see that, for having that some sense of devotion, as St. Thomas says, which alone is required for receiving the Eucharist worthily, a much smaller discretion suffices than either for conceiving the affections necessary for validly receiving the sacrament of Penance, or for perceiving the force of a grave obligation in vows and betrothals?

But as regards Soto's opinion, which denies that children are bound by ecclesiastical laws before the twelfth year of age, this, as is clear, has the common opinion of Doctors against it. Concerning this matter Suarez also (On Penance, disp. 56, sect. 2, n. 3) has this: Some think that they (children) are not bound by this precept (of Confession); indeed Soto rather says that children before the twelfth year are not bound by this precept, for which he brings forward no reason.... But it must be said that every one who knows how to sin mortally is bound by this precept; hence, just as no certain age can be designated in which a man arrives at the use of reason and is able to discern between good and evil, but some use reason earlier, others later (which is to be discerned by the judgment of a prudent man), so no certain age can be prescribed in which a man begins to be bound by this precept. This is the common doctrine.... The Gloss and Canonists also agree on the said cap. Omnis utriusque sexus, and Soto too finally thinks the same, d. 18, q. 1, a. 3, at the end. It is proved from the words of the text: When he shall have arrived at the years of discretion; for years of discretion signify the age in which a man knows how to sin. Secondly, because these are bound by a precept of divine law; but this precept is the determination of that precept, as was said. Thirdly, these can be bound by other precepts of the Church, at least as to directive force, whatever Soto may say; for they are bound to hear Mass on feasts, and to abstain from flesh-meats on a prohibited day: why therefore will they not be bound by this precept, especially necessary? But what Suarez says, that Soto too finally agrees in this, pertains to defining the year of discretion and the obligation of confessing. For Soto has these things (l.c.): But concerning that word of the Decretal, After they shall have arrived at the years of discretion, there is no need to dispute. For it does not designate a certain time, such as twelve or fourteen years, as for contracting matrimony, but as soon as the child has been capable of deceit, namely if he has begun to discern between good and evil, and by the judgment of prudent men sins mortally. And the reason is clear: for since the necessity of the precept of Confession, both divine and human, arises from its necessity for salvation, as soon as a man incurs the necessity of salvation, he is also bound to Confession both once a year and in the article of death. Yet it is true that up to the twelfth year of age the Church would compel no one to Confession by censures, although it knows that even before that one can sin...; for from seven years, when infancy ends and childhood begins, they can sin. These last things agree with those which we brought forward above from him, namely that a lively child even in the eighth year can be capable of Communion.

Finally, to touch upon the opinion of Suarez, truly this could deservedly seem perhaps less reasonable than the preceding opinions of St. Antoninus and Soto. And indeed those opinions, after the principles established by them, at least cohere with themselves. But Suarez indeed admits with Soto that one or another year can be waited even when children could already before that lawfully approach to receive the Eucharist; yet he does not receive the reason brought forward by Soto, namely that children are not bound to observe ecclesiastical laws before the twelfth year; rather, he expressly rejects and refutes it. By what way therefore, or by what reason, does he exempt children, even according to his own opinion fit for Communion, from the obligation of Communion, which the Ecumenical Synods, Lateran and Tridentine, so manifestly proclaim? He has recourse, as we saw above, 1. to the use of the Church; 2. to the congruity of the matter; of which congruity he brings forward a threefold reason, namely 1. greater reverence, 2. greater fruit of the receiver, 3. danger of transgression.

Now, to begin from this last, if he judges that the Church did not wish to oblige children before the twelfth year because of the danger of transgression, namely because a less mature age will easily omit fulfilling the precept, why does he reject the doctrine of Soto, who for exactly this reason denied that that immature age is capable of obligation? Why does he oppose to the same Soto the obligations either of Confession, or of abstinence from flesh-meats, or of hearing Mass, by which he contends that children before the twelfth year are bound? Indeed, if the Church for this cause defers, as he thinks, the obligation of Communion, by stronger right other obligations would have to be deferred; for much more easily, as experience suggests, it will happen that children transgress the precept of hearing Mass on feast days, or of abstaining from flesh-meats.

But what is said about greater reverence is light. For either the child before the twelfth year is considered to furnish sufficient reverence, or he is not. If he does not furnish sufficient reverence, why does Suarez himself concede that even then he can approach to Communion? But if he presents sufficient reverence, why does he exempt him from this grave precept? With the course of age, he says, greater reverence will come. But this reason proves too much. For with equal right another will oppose that greater reverence will be present in the twentieth year than in the twelfth. Will it therefore be lawful, under the pretext of greater reverence, to defer Communion up to that age, the law of the Church being postponed? St. Thomas, as we said above, teaches that one capable of some devotion, not of greater devotion, is bound by the Decree of the Church; and, as Paludanus says (see Tabiena, word Communicate, n. 6), innocence compensates for ignorance in children.

But the reason sought from the greater fruit of the receiver, if Communion is deferred, in the first place labors under the same fault as the preceding reason, and proves too much. Moreover it limps also for this reason, that it somehow supposes that the greater fruit which perhaps is hoped for at a more adult age is hindered by the lesser fruit which is received earlier. But this of itself is altogether false. Finally, it is necessary to remember that the Eucharist is numbered among the Sacraments of the New Law, which confer both sanctifying and sacramental grace ex opere operato, whenever they do not find an obstacle in the one receiving. But although perhaps it can be conjectured that some greater fruit, which may come ex opere operantis, is to be expected from a less tender age, yet will not something more of an obstacle have to be feared from that very age in which the vices of corrupt nature begin to grow, whereas on the contrary the innocence of a more tender age, as the old Doctors used to say, compensates for ignorance? But besides, cause yourself to recall to memory the singular charisms of this Sacrament and its proper fruits (above, n. 275), and that from Christ's institution it is the nourishment and strength of spiritual life, and the antidote of sins and vices. Therefore, under the imagined pretext of some greater fruit, will it be better to have deprived childhood of these excellent and at the same time necessary aids, and of the most abundant supply of graces, by which its innocence may be preserved and fortified?

Finally, as to what is objected concerning common use, which is the interpreter of law: if indeed it is taken for the custom by which children are generally admitted to Confession before participation in the Eucharist, this is easily conceded; nor is a just reason for this custom lacking. Since by the consent of all it pertains especially to the Confessor to judge whether children are capable of deceit and therefore fit for the reception of the Sacraments, and at the same time in this way the danger is absent lest the sacrament be conferred on the incapable, certainly they are most wisely sent to Confession beforehand. But if it is understood as a custom of deferring Communion beyond that age at which the child is capable of it, you would better say that this is an abuse to be ascribed both to negligence and to the prejudged opinion of certain persons, rather than a custom of the Church.

And indeed Suarez himself (cited disp. 70, sect. 1) had premised these things: Almost all agree in this, that this obligation cannot be defined generally by the ages of men, or by the number of years.... Often before the twelfth year of age many are so capable of deceit, and so instructed in the things of faith, THAT WITHOUT DOUBT THEY ARE BOUND BY THIS PRECEPT. And then he adds that this happens also in the tenth year, that is, after the ninth has been completed. But if, as he himself admits, almost all Doctors agree (we shall of course except Soto, whom Suarez there also refutes) that the obligation is to be taken from age, to what purpose is the abuse of those who defer Communion further than age requires thrust upon us as a legitimate custom of the Church? He adds (ibid.) that it is consonant with reason that the Church not oblige as soon as it can. Indeed we would confess that these things were excellently said where the mind of the Church had to be conjectured from plainly uncertain indications. But after the Church, most manifestly opening its mind, not only could oblige to receiving the Eucharist, but in reality obliged all whoever had arrived at the years of discretion, and moreover struck with anathema those denying this obligation, what place of doubting concerning this, I ask, now remains? Or shall we say that the Church, when it obliged as soon as it scarcely could oblige, performed something less consonant with reason?

Nor is there any need to linger over certain persons who, after Suarez, recall here those words of the Lateran Decree: Unless perhaps by the counsel of his own priest, for some reasonable cause, he should judge that he must abstain for a time from reception of this kind:

as if indeed from these words there is made a free power for the confessor of exempting from the obligation those who otherwise are capable and are obliged. For certainly, to use the words of St. Antoninus (part 2, cap. 9, sec. 1), according as the Confessor can perceive from their confession concerning their greater or lesser use of reason, so he can and ought to counsel them or bind (namely oblige) them to Communion; where he also warns parents and schoolmasters (ibid.) that they ought well to exhort them if they see them to have good discretion, or to leave them to the judgment of their Confessors; and finally he adds that very grave thing also: But by drawing them back solely from this, that they are small, and because it is not according to the custom of the country that they communicate, however much they have the use of reason, they sin gravely. But it is one thing that it is deferred to the Confessor's judgment concerning sufficient use of reason; another thing that the Confessor can exempt from the obligation those who have attained the use of reason. But what the cited words of Innocent III have regard to is obvious; namely when, as Gonzalez notes (On the Decretals, lib. V, tit. 38, cap. VII), the Confessor defers absolution, that he may test whether the penitent's purpose is firm, or because he has judged it unjust to absolve him until the penitent avoids the proximate occasion of sin: in which cases a faithful person not communicating at Easter will in no way be guilty of the ecclesiastical precept, nor will he suffer the penalties imposed in the present law. And in like manner it is obvious that those words do not regard children; for since Innocent says, Unless perhaps... by the counsel of the Confessor he should judge that he must abstain, it is absurd to understand this concerning those children who are led in these matters not by their own judgment but by another's.

Moreover, once that anomalous opinion of Soto concerning children exempt from any ecclesiastical law before the twelfth year has been rejected, and the other little reasons by which Suarez contends that delay can be conceded to children who from the common opinion are obliged have been put aside, there remains the opinion in which, after St. Thomas, Doctors commonly agree, as St. Alphonsus also affirms (lib. 6, n. 301): that children ten years old are regularly both fit for participation in the Eucharist, and therefore capable of this obligation. Concerning this matter the same St. Alphonsus, after he reported from the Ninth Synod of Milan the admonition of St. Charles that Parish Priests should summon those who have reached the tenth year (note well: have reached, not completed), instruct them for knowledge of the Eucharist, and teach them with what reverence they should approach it, gives this reason why it was said regularly: For, he says, as the Doctors note, children can be obliged earlier who before such (namely, the tenth) age are seen to be more perspicacious. Hence Bonacina rightly reproves parish priests who indiscriminately do not admit to Communion except children constituted in a certain age.

320. ○ QUESTION 4. Whether the Eucharist can be given to a sick person who labors under a cough?

Resp. Affirmatively, because the danger that the sacred species be rejected together with phlegm is for the most part absent. And the reason is that the path by which spittle is expelled by coughing is not the esophagus, that is, the path by which food and drink are conveyed into the stomach, but is the rough artery, by which respiration extends even to the lungs. Yet if the cough is so continual that it prevents the host from being able to be transmitted into the stomach, then Communion must be abstained from. - Thus the Roman Ritual. - St. Ligorius, n. 292.

But when the sick person labors under continual vomiting, he cannot communicate unless perhaps he has been free from vomiting for at least six hours. But in doubt whether the sick person is going to vomit back the sacred particle, it must not be given to him. - St. Ligorius, n. 291.

Resp. 1. No, if they have not yet attained the use of reason. The reason is that this is against the present discipline of the Church.

Resp. 2. Affirmatively with respect to children who are in possession of reason. Indeed not only can Communion be given to them, but it also ought to be given. The reason is that on the one hand children placed in such danger are bound by divine precept to communicate; on the other hand the utility of the Eucharist then does not demand a greater disposition. Therefore Parish Priests err gravely who are unwilling to administer Viaticum of this kind to children. - St. Ligorius, n. 301. - Billuart, diss. 6, art. 1. - Gousset, n. 233.

321. ○ QUESTION 6. Whether Communion in danger of death is to be given to the insane, the semi-fatuous, the delirious, and those deprived of senses?

Resp. 1. Concerning the insane: 1. If they have been perpetually insane, Communion is never to be given to them. Thus from the Roman Ritual on the Eucharist. 2. If they often have lucid intervals, and have manifested a desire of communicating, Communion can be given to them; indeed it ought to be given, with the danger of irreverence removed. - St. Thomas, part 3, q. 80, art. 9. - Catechism of the Council of Trent. - St. Ligorius, n. 302.

Resp. 2. Concerning the semi-fatuous, Communion is to be given to them when they have sufficient discretion, so that they distinguish this heavenly food from others; but rarely, namely only in the article of death, and where the strict precept of communicating urges. - St. Ligorius, n. 303, and others commonly [5].

[5] I have found no one earlier than Henry Henriquez who teaches that to those who have sufficient discretion to distinguish the heavenly food from others, Communion is to be permitted only once a year. And Henriquez indeed, according to his own manner, alleges in a note a long series of Authors (Summa, lib. 8, cap. 42, n. 3) as if for that opinion. But they do unanimously affirm that the Eucharist is to be supplied to these semi-fatuous persons, among whom Henriquez also numbers Ethiopians; yet none of them grants only Easter Communion. And from this it seems to have happened that afterwards certain others adhered to this opinion as if commonly received; although Laymann, departing from them (lib. 5, tr. 4, cap. 5, n. 4), said that these are to be admitted to the Eucharist at least at Easter. Meanwhile, however, no solid reason for this doctrine is brought forward; and on the contrary John Sanchez rightly attacks Henriquez thus (Select Disputations, 26, n. 5): Nor do I know by what reason Henriquez thinks that frequency of Communion must be denied to the foolish (he means those whom Henriquez calls semi-fatuous), if he once concedes that it ought to be given at Easter: for if, when they communicate once, they commit no irreverence, neither will they commit it by communicating several times, since both the man receiving and the sacrament received are always one and the same. Nor can I imagine how by communicating today there arises anew an irreverence which did not arise yesterday by receiving the Eucharist, while the action is the same in species, the sacrament the same, and the man who receives is with the same use of reason today as he was yesterday. Does he approach irreverently the second time, who approaches with grace acquired from the first Communion?

Resp. 3. Concerning the delirious, Communion can be given to them if they are able to communicate, with the danger of irreverence removed. But the best practice is that beforehand a non-consecrated particle be given to the sick person, and so it may appear whether he can communicate becomingly. - St. Ligorius, n. 292.

Resp. 4. Concerning those deprived of senses: they are indeed dispensed from the precept, since they are capable of observing no law. But therefore the Pastor is not dispensed from the obligation of ministering the Eucharist to them, if before the loss of reason they were disposed. For the Sacraments operate ex opere operato in those who desired to receive them before they lost the use of reason. Yet except the case if danger of irreverence is present, or if it is feared that they are not able to swallow the Host. - Thus commonly. - Gousset, n. 232.

322. ○ QUESTION 7. Whether Communion is to be given to deaf-mutes, the possessed, and epileptics?

Resp. 1. Concerning deaf-mutes: Affirmatively, if from signs it is clear that they have discretion and are sufficiently instructed. But if they enjoy not just any sort, but some sufficient discretion, they will be able to communicate more often. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 303.

Resp. 2. Concerning the possessed, a distinction must be made: Communion is to be denied to them when they are not masters of themselves; otherwise it is to be granted. Indeed it is expedient that such persons communicate more often according to the prudence of the Confessor, since the Eucharist is a special remedy for driving away demons.

Resp. 3. Concerning epileptics: Communion cannot be given to them when they are in an actual paroxysm, on account of the proximate danger of irreverence; but at other times it is not to be denied. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 303.

323. ○ QUESTION 8. Whether Communion can be given to those condemned to capital punishment?

Resp. Affirmatively. Benedict XIV indeed teaches that the custom which is recognized respectively to exist in each place is to be followed, On the Synod, lib. 7, c. 11; but he calls the use of ministering the Most Holy Eucharist to them more conformable to Christian piety, and brings forward the testimony of St. Pius V concerning this matter. Several provincial Councils of Gaul, for example the Council of Soissons, Auch, etc., have very recently commended this pious use. Gousset, n. 230, most greatly urges this practice.

See those things which especially pertain to Easter Communion in the Treatise On the Precepts of the Church, n. 489 and following.

Article II. On the Dispositions Required in the Subject of the Eucharist: 1. as to the Soul, 2. as to the Body

sec. I. On the dispositions of the soul

324. Principles. - I. For receiving the Sacrament of the Eucharist there is required the state of grace, at least prudently judged to be present. Otherwise a most grave sacrilege is committed. The reason is clear from the nature of the thing, and also from the words of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 11:28: But let a man prove himself, and so let him eat of that Bread and drink of the Chalice. For he who eats and drinks unworthily, eats and drinks judgment to himself, not discerning the body of the Lord.

II. It is not sufficient that the state of grace be acquired by perfect contrition, but it is required that confession of mortal sins be premised and sacramental absolution be received, except in a case of necessity, namely either when there is lacking the supply of a Confessor, and Communion cannot be omitted without grave note or suspicion, or when a Priest must celebrate so that the people may assist at Mass on a feast day. - Trent, sess. 13, c. 7. - See St. Ligorius, n. 256 and following.

325. Questions. - QUESTION 1. When is the supply of a Confessor considered lacking?

Resp. It is considered lacking: 1. If no Confessor is present, and, the circumstances of weakness, age, business, distance, air, shortness of time, etc., having been considered, an absent one cannot be approached without grave difficulty.

2. If otherwise no Confessor is present except one ignorant of the language, or lacking jurisdiction, or one to whom you cannot confess without grave harm to yourself or another. Yet in these cases perfect contrition is required. But the supply of a Confessor is not considered lacking if the one to whom you are accustomed to confess is absent, but any approved one must be lacking. - St. Ligorius, n. 264.

But a cause excusing from confession for laymen occurs most rarely. Indeed it can more easily be present with respect to Priests; but they must certainly beware lest, deterred by a vain pretext or by shame and embarrassment, they imagine for themselves a chimerical impossibility.

QUESTION 2. What distance is required for the Priest to be considered lacking?

Resp. It cannot be rigorously determined, but depends on circumstances. Some require a distance of two leagues; others one league and a half or a quarter; others one league only. But besides the account of the journey, other reasons often press, for example infirmity or shortness of time. Thus a priest already about to celebrate can be excused from confession, even if the Confessor is 50 paces distant. - St. Ligorius, n. 264.

326. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether one who remembers a mortal sin which through inculpable forgetfulness he did not declare in confession is bound to confess it before Communion?

Resp. 1. Certainly no, if the penitent is already sitting at the sacred table, or there is present a grave cause of communicating, and he can confess again only with difficulty. The reason is that even if the precept of confession were present, it would not urge with so great an inconvenience. - Thus all.

Resp. 2. If the penitent can without inconvenience confess or omit Communion, it is controverted. More probably he is neither bound to confess nor to abstain from Communion, because the sin involuntarily omitted has certainly been remitted, although only indirectly; and therefore it in no way stands in the way of receiving Communion. Nor should you say that the Tridentine precept of confessing before Communion urges; for the penitent, since he has already been duly confessed and justified through the Sacrament of Penance, has been sufficiently proved even according to the mind of the Council of Trent. - St. Ligorius, n. 257, On the Eucharist. - Collet. - Pontas. - Gousset, n. 249, and others, against others who more commonly and not improbably held the opposite. - St. Ligorius inclines more to the former opinion, yet judges that the second is to be advised in practice [1], provided that some cause does not advise otherwise. - Homo apostolicus, n. 23.

[1] Do not understand this as if in practice you ought to teach with the second opinion that in the case there is present an obligation to confess again before Communion; the meaning of St. Alphonsus here is, namely, that it is more advisable to confess again; especially because the memory of the omitted fault may impede the tranquil peace of conscience, and that devotion which is especially conducive to tasting the sweetness of this divine food and receiving abundant fruit.

327. ○ QUESTION 4. Whether a Priest who celebrated, or a layman who communicated conscious of mortal sin, without confession, on account of urgent necessity, is bound to confess AS SOON AS POSSIBLE?

Resp. 1. With respect to the Priest, affirmatively. For thus expressly the Tridentine Council, ibid., c. 7: But if, necessity urging, a Priest has celebrated without previous confession, let him confess AS SOON AS POSSIBLE.

Resp. 2. With respect to the layman, no, more probably. The reason is that the Council of Trent speaks only of Priests, as is clear from the text. - Thus most commonly, says St. Ligorius, n. 268.

QUESTION 5. How is that precept imposed on Priests of confessing AS SOON AS POSSIBLE to be understood [2]?

[2] You have two propositions concerning this matter condemned by Alexander VII. For the thirty-eighth is: The mandate of Trent made to a priest sacrificing from necessity with mortal sin, of confessing as soon as possible, is a counsel, not a precept; but the thirty-ninth: That particle, As soon as possible, is understood when the priest will confess in his own time.

Resp. More probably it suffices if the Priest confesses within three days; because since this precept is only ecclesiastical, the word as soon as possible can be understood morally, as it is understood in other human laws, where that word, or another similar one, by common interpretation is extended to the space of three days. - St. Ligorius, n. 266, and others. - Yet a Priest cannot celebrate again before he has been confessed, because he was not excused from confession except because of the instant necessity. Hence if the same necessity of celebrating urges on the following day, and he can confess [3], he cannot put off confession to another day.

[3] But if the same necessity of celebrating urges on the following day, indeed also on the third thereafter, or even on the fourth, etc., day, and through those days also the supply of a Confessor is not present, the priest will be excused no otherwise than before.

328. ○ QUESTION 6. Whether a Priest celebrating after confession, in which he inculpably forgot some mortal sin, is bound to confess AS SOON AS POSSIBLE?

Resp. 1. No, if he remembers the sin after the celebration; because he did not celebrate conscious of that sin, as Trent speaks. - Thus commonly.

Resp. 2. No, more probably, even if he remembers the sin before the celebration; because since he has premised confession, although he forgot some grave sin, nevertheless he cannot be said to have celebrated conscious of mortal sin without previous confession. St. Ligorius, n. 267, says that this opinion is probable after Lacroix and others against Suarez, Lugo, etc.

QUESTION 7. Whether a Priest celebrating SACRILEGIOUSLY, when necessity is not urging, or if it is urging, when the supply of a Confessor is not lacking, is bound to confess AS SOON AS POSSIBLE?

Resp. No. The reason is that the precept of the Council of Trent is ordered only to striking fear into those who, under the pretext of necessity, defer confession, but not to those celebrating sacrilegiously, to whom a precept of this kind would very rarely be useful; for those who, with the divine precept contemned, dare to celebrate sacrilegiously, would certainly more easily contemn the precept of the Church. - Thus most commonly and more truly St. Ligorius, n. 266.

QUESTION 8. Whether affection for some venial sin impedes the whole fruit of Communion?

Resp. No. The reason is that the will can well experience pious movements toward God and the Sacrament, although it retains some lightly disordered affection for a particular thing; therefore one communicating with such an affection is not deprived of every fruit of the Eucharist. - St. Ligorius, n. 270, and others more commonly.

SEC. II. ON THE DISPOSITIONS OF THE BODY

A twofold disposition is required on the part of the body, namely 1. fasting; 2. decency.

POINT I. ON THE FAST REQUIRED FOR COMMUNION

329. Principles. - I. From the precept of the Church, for Communion there is required the natural fast, or total abstinence after midnight from any thing whatsoever, however small, which is taken by way of food and drink, yet with certain cases excepted. This is clear 1. from the universal custom of the Church and unanimous tradition; 2. from all Catechisms and Rituals approved by the Church; 3. from the Councils, and especially from the Council of Constance, sess. 13.

II. For breaking that fast, according to the common opinion, three conditions are required, namely: I. That what is taken be taken from outside [1]; because what does not come from outside, even if it is swallowed voluntarily, is not called eating; for things which are eaten come from without. Hence blood flowing from the mouth, tongue, gums, etc., does not break the fast. - St. Ligorius, n. 279. - Elbel, n. 91, etc.

[1] Add: and be conveyed into the stomach.

II. That something be taken by way of eating or drinking. The reason is that according to common sense the natural fast is broken only in this way. Hence whatever is drawn in by way of respiration or saliva in no way breaks the fast. Thus you remain fasting, although through respiration you have swallowed dust or a fly. - St. Thomas. - St. Ligorius, n. 280.

III. That the thing taken have the character of food or drink, that is, that it be something alterable in the stomach and apt for nutrition. The reason is that otherwise, according to the common way of conceiving, it is neither eating nor drinking. For no one is said to eat iron, glass, wood, etc. - Thus commonly the Theologians with St. Thomas, part 3, q. 80, art. 8. - St. Ligorius, n. 281.

330. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Whether the passing through of remains of food which adhere between the teeth breaks the fast?

Resp. 1. No, if it is involuntary, because it does not have the character of food. This is also clear from the Rubric of the Missal, On Defects, n. 3. - Thus all.

Resp. 2. If it is voluntary, it is controverted.

The first probable opinion denies it, because such remains are not taken by way of food, although deliberately, but by way of saliva. Thus St. Thomas, In 4, dist. 8, q. 1, art. 4, q. 2, ad 3. See also Rubric, tit. 9, n. 3.

The second opinion affirms it, because a passing through of this kind, since it is done deliberately, seems to be a new eating. - Thus Roncaglia, etc. St. Ligorius, n. 279, says that this opinion is more probable [2].

[2] Also for this second opinion those words from St. Thomas are usually alleged (3, q. 80, art. 8, ad 4): Yet remains of food remaining in the mouth, if they are swallowed accidentally, do not impede the reception of this sacrament, because they are not conveyed by way of food, but by way of saliva; and the same reason holds concerning remains of water or wine with which the mouth is washed, provided they are not conveyed in a great quantity, but mixed with saliva, which cannot be avoided. To these things Seraphinus Caponi writes: I would wish that he (St. Doctor) be rightly understood, and that there be most watchfully weighed that which he himself for this reason expressed very cautiously, namely the word mixed with saliva, and the word that it cannot be avoided.

Yet it must be admitted that it can be drawn otherwise from another place (In 4, dist. 8, q. 1, art. 4, q. 2, ad 3), in which he employs a different principle: The fast of nature, says the Holy Doctor, is said by privation of the act of eating.... But eating is said from the taking of exterior food, although it is terminated at the conveyance of food into the belly, and further at nutrition; and therefore things which are carried on within, without the taking of exterior food, do not seem to loose the fast of nature, nor to impede reception of the Eucharist, such as the swallowing of saliva; and similarly it seems concerning those things which remain within the teeth, and also concerning eructations. Now the principle here assumed is this, that in order to loose the fast there must be the taking of exterior food; which he denies to be present in the passing through of those remains. But this holds, as is clear, whether they are conveyed accidentally or not accidentally. This sense is clear also from the objection which the Holy Doctor solves there. For it is of this kind: If some remains of food remain in the mouth, someone is not impeded from the reception of the body of Christ; because this could happen to a priest even while he is in the very celebration of the sacrament.... Therefore neither should food put into the mouth impede reception of this sacrament, if taken in a small quantity. Now if the Holy Doctor had thought that the fast is loosed through those remains voluntarily conveyed into the stomach, he should have answered at least by distinguishing the antecedent, namely whether accidentally, etc.

Moreover, St. Alphonsus notes (lib. 6, n. 279) that the rubrics of the Missal (On Defects, n. 3) do not conflict with this opinion, where it is said thus: If remains of food remaining in the mouth are swallowed, they do not impede Communion, since they are not swallowed by way of food, but by way of saliva.

Yet the same St. Alphonsus rightly warns that even Doctors who judge that the fast is not loosed by those remains voluntarily conveyed nevertheless give the counsel that they be spat out, as, for example, Suarez (disp. 66, sect. 4, v. Thirdly); then he adds that in this one must not act scrupulously, as Suarez wisely warns. Hence, he adds, I gladly follow the opinion of Lugo (disp. 15, n. 36), that remains separated from the teeth, which are sensibly perceived on the tongue, should indeed be spat out; but there is not an obligation of applying diligence to extract those remains from the teeth, even if it is foreseen that they will be swallowed if they are not extracted.... For otherwise this obligation would be exposed to innumerable scruples and perplexities, to which the Church certainly is not presumed to have wished to oblige. Indeed Lugo (l.c.) adds: Nor ought we diligently to search for them once extracted from the teeth in the corners within the mouth, that they may be spat out; because to have ourselves omissively in these matters is not to eat, but to permit them to be conveyed with saliva or respiration. But those solicitous admonitions disclose sufficiently that this obligation of spitting out, whatever it may be, falls back into what Laymann (lib. 5, tr. 4, c. 7, n. 18) better calls decency. For you will not easily compose these things: on the one hand, that the fast is violated through those remains conveyed, and on the other, that almost no care is imposed lest they be conveyed. And since care at least to spit out what is sensibly perceived on the tongue can induce those innumerable scruples and anxieties, whether that thing in reality, or whether the whole thing, has been rejected; now help seems to have to be sought from the other opinion of St. Thomas, which, since it denies that the fast is loosed by those remains, exempts from any troublesome solicitude.

QUESTION 2. Whether little drops of water or broth tasted, mixed with saliva, break the fast if they are swallowed?

Resp. 1. No, if they are conveyed accidentally, beyond the intention, provided they are not in great quantity. The same must be said of little drops which are involuntarily conveyed when washing the mouth. The reason is that they are not taken by way of nutrition. This is also clear from the Rubric of the Missal, On Defects, n. 3.

Resp. 2. Affirmatively, if they are swallowed deliberately. The reason is that then nothing is lacking for them to have the character of food or drink [3]. - St. Ligorius, n. 279.

[3] Understand these things concerning him who deliberately wishes to swallow those little drops. For although it cannot be avoided, as St. Thomas says (3, q. 84, art. 8, ad 4), that the little drops drawn in be mixed with saliva, and the Church, to use the words of Cardinal de Lugo (On the Eucharist, disp. 15, n. 34), did not wish through this precept to prohibit us from swallowing saliva; for it would be a very harsh precept and smelling of Judaic superstition if one had to convey absolutely nothing with saliva...; for the most anxious diligence would be needed in spitting out a thousand times the water received once for washing the mouth, lest something remain with the saliva; nevertheless, for this reason the mixture with saliva does not change the nature of the act, namely of drinking, when the mind is studiously borne not to swallowing saliva but to conveying broth or water. Therefore the same matter (little drops mixed with saliva), and the same act of conveying, with the same advertence on both sides, will break or not break the fast, according as from the two mixed elements the conveyance of this one or of that one is studiously intended.

331. ○ QUESTION 3. Whether powder of tobacco taken through the nostrils looses the fast?

Resp. No, even if something is sent into the stomach. The reason is that although such matter is nutritive, nevertheless it is not taken by way of eating. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, n. 280.

QUESTION 4. Whether smoke of tobacco or the like looses the fast?

Resp. No, with the more common and more probable opinion, because smoke of tobacco is neither food nor drink, nor is it taken by eating or drinking; otherwise we would have to say that those also break the fast who in a kitchen draw in the smoke of foods both by mouth and by nostrils. And this holds even if the smoke is voluntarily sent into the stomach. - Thus St. Ligorius, ibid. - The same seems to have to be said of the juice or odor of camphor, which is drawn in by way of tobacco smoke (in French: cigarette de Raspail).

332. ○ QUESTION 5. Whether he looses the fast who takes a leaf of tobacco, or an aromatic, so that he may crush it with his teeth and spit out the phlegm?

Resp. No, probably, even if beyond the intention some small amount of juice inseparably mixed with saliva is swallowed; because if this is swallowed accidentally, it is conveyed not by way of food, but by way of saliva. But all agree that chewing of this kind before Communion is unbecoming; hence it does not seem to be excused from venial fault unless some reasonable cause intervenes. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

QUESTION 6. Whether he can communicate who positively doubts whether after midnight he took food or drink, or on the day itself swallowed something?

Resp. Affirmatively, more probably. The reason is that in the case it is not established that the fast has been violated, and therefore it is not established that Communion is forbidden; for the fact of a violated fast would have to be proved before the law prohibiting the Eucharist to one not fasting is invoked. - St. Ligorius, however, n. 282, with others admits this only for a negative doubt [4].

[4] Yet the reason added by the same St. Alphonsus equally proves the matter also in the case of a positive doubt, namely when there are probabilities on both sides. You are not bound, he says, to abstain from it (the Eucharist), as long as you are not certain, and so much the more if you have no probable reason that you have eaten; for then you remain in possession of your liberty. This is confirmed from lib. 1, n. 38, 39, to which place St. Alphonsus himself refers the reader. For here he distinguishes nothing between positive and negative doubt; and the reason added, that in that case the law prohibiting Communion does not seem certain and, as doubtful, does not oblige, according to the mind of St. Alphonsus, as is clear, holds for both doubts.

 To confirm these things, as it seems, the VV. (p. 932, n. 97) bring forward those things which St. Alphonsus has thus in Homo apostolicus (tr. 15, n. 35): Yet doubt whether he swallowed something after midnight does not impede Communion, as we said, tr. 1, n. 19; because, as we proved there, this precept is not positive, that one approach Communion fasting, but is negative, lest one communicate after the breaking of the fast; wherefore, whenever it is not certain concerning the breaking of the fast, the prohibition no longer possesses, but the liberty of the one wishing to communicate does. Then from the Moral Work (lib. 1, n. 39) the same VV. transcribe those things which St. Alphonsus had brought forward to the same matter from Eusebius Amort, with these words: He can communicate, because the condition of the possessor is better, as long as presumptions so strong are not given to the contrary that the one acting more probably believes that the twelfth hour has already sounded. And from this we shall think it happened that the VV. changed the state of the question. For the Holy Doctor (lib. 6, n. 282) raises the question thus only about a negative doubt: But whether in a negative doubt, whether midnight has passed or not, someone can communicate. But they make the question thus (l.c.) about a positive doubt: Whether he can communicate who positively doubts whether after midnight he took food or drink, etc.; and they silently passed over the doubt as it had been proposed by the Holy Doctor.

333. ○ QUESTION 7. Whether it is permitted to eat and drink immediately after Communion?

Resp. Formerly indeed after Communion the fast was prescribed until Sext. But this precept has long since been abrogated. Yet from decency some delay ought to be observed between the reception of this Sacrament and other foods, at least as long as the consecrated species still persevere in the stomach not yet plainly corrupted, unless nevertheless some reasonable cause is present for taking something immediately; otherwise such eating, on account of irreverence, is not excused from venial fault. - St. Ligorius, n. 287, and others commonly.

QUESTION 8. Whether it is illicit to spit after Communion?

Resp. No, per se, provided no fragment of the Host remains in the mouth. For there is no danger of irreverence toward the sacred species, since the path by which spittle flows together into the mouth is not the esophagus, or path of food and drink, but is the path of respiration. Yet all agree that it is fitting that communicants abstain from spitting for some interval of time. - St. Ligorius, n. 283.

QUESTION 9. When is it lawful to communicate someone not fasting?

Resp. One not fasting lawfully communicates: 1. in danger of death, from whatever cause it may arise; 2. in danger lest the Eucharist perish or be badly treated, for example by heretics or impious persons; 3. in proximate danger of grave scandal from omission of the Sacrifice or Communion; 4. in the necessity of completing the Sacrifice or Communion, for example if, instead of the species of wine, the Priest has taken water, etc. - St. Ligorius, n. 284 and following.

334. ○ QUESTION 10. Whether moral certitude of the danger of death is required, so that Viaticum can be ministered to one not fasting?

Resp. No, but a prudent doubt suffices, or probability of danger [5], especially when it is to be feared lest the sick person be seized by sudden death. Indeed, Parish Priests and parents or relatives of the sick who, from negligence or vain fear, so prolong the administration of sacred Viaticum that the sick risk departing without the Eucharist, must be gravely rebuked. - St. Ligorius, Homo apostolicus, n. 46.

[5] You will find this same doctrine handed down in other words among the Doctors, who either take the article and danger of death for one and the same, or, supposing the distinction between these two which had pleased some, teach that this exception from the common law holds not only in the article, but also in the danger of death. For a distinction of this kind is such that the article is when death is proximately imminent and is morally certain and almost inevitable; but the danger is when there is probable doubt, and death is frequently accustomed to occur in such a case. See Suarez, In 3 P., tom. IV, disp. 26, sect. 4, n. 2. - Lugo, On Penance, disp. 18, n. 20. - Sanchez, In Decal., lib. 2, cap. 13, n. 1. Now St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 561) judges that such danger or probable doubt is present even in a dangerous disease, namely one which of itself is adequate for bringing danger of death. Therefore as soon as it is sufficiently established that someone has been seized by a disease of this kind, so that the Eucharist may be supplied to him even not fasting, there is no need to defer up to the point when no or slight hope of life is left, but immediately such a sick person can and ought to be considered exempt from the common law of the Church. And skillfully, after other Doctors, St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 285, dub. 3, at the end) warns that one must not proceed scrupulously in this, since in the Council of Constance, sess. 13, the sick are simply excepted from the law of fasting. But the decree of the Council of Constance has itself thus: A sacrament of this kind ought not... to be received by the faithful when not fasting, except in a case of infirmity or of another necessity conceded or admitted by law or by the Church.

QUESTION 11. Whether it is ever lawful to give Communion to a sick person not fasting, and not lying dangerously ill [6], if the disease is long-lasting?

[6] Extend this to those who, although they are not lying ill with disease, nevertheless cannot preserve the natural fast for some hours.

Resp. It must be denied, with attention to the present practice of the Church, unless the disease is of such a kind that of itself it can induce danger of death. Yet some Theologians sometimes permit this, if the disease is long-lasting and the sick person is never able to communicate wholly fasting, provided it is done rarely, for example a few times in the year. - Thus Elbel, n. 90. - But the most common opinion of Theologians contradicts this with Suarez, who asserts that only the Pope can dispense in this law. In reality the Supreme Pontiff is accustomed to dispense rarely and only for a grave cause. But then there seems to be sufficient reason why the Eucharist sometimes can be administered to a sick person after midnight. And indeed according to very learned Theologians interrogated at Rome, there is no doubt in the case of annual or Easter Communion, which is prescribed not by merely ecclesiastical right, but also by divine right, because a divine command is more excellent than a human one.

335. ○ QUESTION 12. Whether it is lawful to minister Communion again to a sick person not fasting who has already been fortified with Viaticum?

Resp. Affirmatively. The reason is that this Sacrament is not given to the sick precisely for satisfying the precept, but as a defense against temptations which press more at the time of death. Wherefore this is lawful not only if a new danger recurs, but also if the same danger endures. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, n. 285. - Recall what was said above, n. 308.

QUESTION 13. By how much time ought one Communion to be distant from another if the sick person communicates not fasting?

Resp. The more common opinion teaches that they ought to be distant by about eight days. But not improbably several with St. Ligorius say that a sick person accustomed to communicate more often from devotion can receive Communion without fasting twice in the week [7]. But attention must be paid to the circumstances of places, persons, and particular statutes. Communion can more easily be conceded to sick religious, or to other pious persons living in a monastery, whether they are fasting or not, than to others; because then there is less preparation and less astonishment of the people, since the sacred Eucharist is not to be carried publicly through the streets.

[7] That a custom of communicating frequently from devotion can be held as a sufficient reason why the Eucharist can be supplied more often to one not fasting can indeed be admitted. But that this should be so restricted to these persons that it must be denied to others who were not accustomed to communicate more often, even if they desire and request it, what reason, I ask, proves this?

 To this place the VV. (p. 932, n. 98) note that St. Alphonsus (lib. 6, n. 285, dub. 1) spoke more liberally and brought forward the opinions of Doctors who think that even daily Communion can be conceded to the sick, although not fasting. Then in the note appended, the same VV. refer the reader to Homo apostolicus (tr. 15, n. 47), where the Holy Doctor, after bringing forward other opinions, adds: Not improbably Laymann, Escobar, Roncaglia, and Hurtado confidently say that Viaticum can be repeated even on the following day, when the sick person was accustomed to communicate often and when moral danger of death is imminent; indeed Castropalao, Armilla, Tamburini, and Dicastillo admit universally that it can be repeated on any day. And these things indeed come most opportunely to be mentioned, so that the difficulties of certain persons either too timid or too morose may be met.

They then add, VV. (l.c. in note), 1. that from the doctrine of St. Alphonsus it in no way follows, as Ballerini seems to hint, that Viaticum is to be denied to others similarly disposed who previously had not been accustomed to communicate so often. And 2. soon they add: Father Ballerini will easily concede that it does not commonly happen that someone can suddenly be admitted to daily Communion.

Resp. To the first: Father Ballerini in no way said or hinted that from the words or doctrines either of Gury or of St. Alphonsus (concerning whom there was not even a word there) that conclusion follows, but judged the warning not inopportune, lest perhaps someone too timid or morose (which can happen not at all improbably) draw the same conclusion.

To the second. Resp. 1. In the note the discussion is not about daily Communion, but about Communion however more frequent according to the Response of Father Gury. 2. Whether it commonly happens that someone can suddenly be admitted to more frequent or daily Communion is an irrelevant question, since in the note it is merely signified that from a preceding rarer use of the Eucharist it does not follow that it cannot be given more frequently to one who is sick. 3. That consideration also, whether he can be admitted SUDDENLY, etc., is irrelevant. For certainly, generally as to others, whether they should be admitted sooner or later to more frequent Communion will seem to have to be defined by the trial of some time. But as to men laboring under so grave an infirmity that Communion is given to them not fasting by way of Viaticum, is there room for asking whether they communicate more frequently suddenly or not suddenly?

Point II. On the Decency of the Body

336. Principles. - I. By natural right there is required that exterior habit and that composition of the body which exhibit the internal reverence and devotion of the mind. The reason is clear: for to this most august Sacrament there is owed not only internal but also external veneration, since Christ Himself, by means of the species, exists and is treated in it in a certain sensible way.

II. No stain at all of the body of itself impedes from Communion, since the Eucharist is only the food of the soul, nor is purity diminished by stains of the body, which contribute nothing to moral goodness or malice. - St. Ligorius, n. 271 and 275. - Yet decency and reverence owed to so great a Sacrament require that, if filth appearing externally can be removed, it be diligently removed.

III. There is no obligation of abstaining from Communion on account of hidden stains of the body, or even those externally apparent but indelible. - St. Ligorius, ibid. - Yet if external stains, here and now indelible, are very notable and ought to cease shortly, it will be becoming, where it can conveniently be done, to defer Communion. But when they last longer, there is no reason why someone should be deprived of heavenly nourishment. - Thus commonly.

337. Resolutions. - 1. Women ought to approach Holy Communion in holy adornment, breathing modesty; if any presented themselves to the sacred table very indecently, Communion would have to be denied to them, yet with due cautions for preventing scandals as far as can be done.

2. Leprosy, flux of blood, and similar things, which happen without the fault of the sufferer, do not of themselves prohibit from Communion, because those stains do not obstruct devotion, which is the disposition required for Communion. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

3. A Priest infected with leprosy or another infirmity exciting horror can celebrate, but not in public; for thus it is established from Canon Law. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

4. It is fitting from decency and Christian humility that soldiers about to communicate should approach the sacred table with their arms laid aside. Yet they are obliged to this by no law. - St.

Ligorius, ibid. - The same should be said of laymen wearing gloves (gants).

Appendix I. On Frequent Communion

338. By the name of frequent Communion, commonly with St. Ligorius, there are understood in the stricter sense those Communions which, beyond Sundays or feast days, are made on weekdays, even without previous confession.

No entirely certain rule concerning frequent Communion can be established. Therefore we shall indicate only certain things generally.

It is certain that frequent Communion, even daily Communion, has always been most desired in the Church. This is clear 1. from the common testimony of the Fathers, who always earnestly commended it to the faithful. It is clear 2. from the Council of Trent, sess. 22, c. 6, where it says: The holy Synod indeed would desire that at each Mass the faithful standing by should communicate not only by spiritual affection, but also by sacramental reception of the Eucharist, so that the fruit of this most holy Sacrifice might come to them. It is clear 3. from the Decree of Innocent XI in the year 1679, and also from the common testimony of Doctors. Therefore frequent Communion is greatly to be praised, and is to be earnestly urged upon the faithful by Parish Priests and also by Confessors. It is certain besides that days for receiving the sacred Eucharist cannot generally be established; nor are those to be barred from it who desire to approach frequently, unless they appear unworthy. Therefore this whole matter must be left to the judgment of Confessors, who, according to the purity of conscience and the fruit perceived from the sacred table, ought to prescribe that which they judge will profit each one more. - Thus from the same Decree of Innocent XI.

339. ○ It is useful to report the principal things which St. Ligorius has concerning this matter in the book The Practice of the Confessor (which is found toward the end of the larger Work):

> We speak here only of the manner in which Confessors ought to conduct themselves in conceding Communion to their penitents. In this, some err by too great indulgence, others by too great rigor. There is no doubt that it is an error, as Benedict XIV notes in his golden book On the Synod, to concede frequent Communion to those who often fall into grave sins, and are not solicitous about doing penance and about their amendment, or to those who approach > to Communion with affection for venial sins, without any desire of freeing themselves from them.
>
> It is indeed expedient to concede Communion to some who would be in danger of falling into mortal sins, that they may receive strength for resisting; but with respect to those persons who are not in such danger and, on the contrary, ordinarily commit deliberate venial sins, and in whom no amendment nor desire of amendment shines forth, it will be best not to permit them Communion more than once a week; indeed it may be expedient sometimes to forbid them Communion for an entire week, that they may conceive a greater horror of their defects and greater reverence toward this Sacrament.... (n. 149.)

340. ○

Certain Directors surely err, and depart greatly from the spirit of the Church, when, without any regard for need or progress, they indiscriminately deny frequent Communion, led by no other reason than because it is frequent. The Roman Catechism itself, explaining the desire of the Council of Trent that all those assisting at the Sacrifice communicate, teaches that it is the office of the Parish Priest diligently to exhort the faithful to Communion not only frequent but daily, with the obligation of instructing them that, just as the body, so also the soul, needs daily nourishment.... Moreover, in the Decree of Innocent XI it is imposed upon Bishops that they most diligently take care that Communion, even daily Communion, be denied to no one, and that, as is fitting, they seek to nourish this devotion in their subjects.

Certain more rigid spirits readily admit that daily Communion is indeed lawful; but they say that a due disposition is required for this. But we desire to know from them what they understand by this name, due disposition. If they understand a worthy disposition, who then should ever again approach the Eucharist? Jesus Christ alone worthily received the Eucharist, because God alone could worthily receive God. But if they understand a suitable disposition, it has already been said above that it is equitable to deny frequent Communion to those who have actual venial sins, or affection for them without a desire of amendment. But if then we speak of those who, affection even for venial sins now being removed [1], and the greater part of their depraved inclinations having been overcome [2], have a great desire of communicating, St. Francis de Sales says that these, with the previous counsel of their director, could rightly communicate daily. (n. 150.) > And although to abstain from Communion on some day is also a virtue, nevertheless Father Granada, in his Treatise on Communion, says that it is the common opinion of Doctors that it is better to approach Communion daily from love than to abstain from reverence. And St. Thomas confirms this, part 3, q. 80, art. 10, ad 3, saying: And therefore both pertain to reverence for this Sacrament: both that it be received daily, and that one sometimes abstain. Yet love and hope, to which Scripture always calls us, are preferred to fear. Indeed Father Barisonus rightly says that he who approaches the Eucharist with a desire of growing in divine love also exercises an act of reverence toward Jesus Christ; indeed, the former performs a positive act, whereas he who abstains performs only a negative act.... The Venerable Father Master Avila does not hesitate to say that those who condemn persons who approach the Eucharist more often perform the office of the devil. (n. 151.)

[1] Affection for venial sins is said to be removed, not indeed when someone no longer falls into venial sins; for this perfection belongs not to man journeying on earth, but to the blessed comprehensor in heaven; but when someone, although he sometimes falls into venial sins from infirmity, nevertheless is accustomed immediately to grieve and diligently to guard against a relapse.

[2] Here the words of the Council of Trent must be recalled to memory (sess. 5, Decree On Original Sin, n. 5): But that concupiscence or the tinder remains in the baptized, this holy Synod confesses and perceives; and since it has been left for combat, it cannot harm those who do not consent, but who manfully resist through the grace of Jesus Christ; indeed, he who shall have contended lawfully shall be crowned. Therefore, to have overcome depraved inclinations is not to have them extinguished, or not to feel their force, however vehement, but not to be led away by them to violating the law of God. Wherefore victory of this kind over depraved inclinations falls back into the preceding condition of a man who strives with all his strength to guard against at least fully deliberate venial faults. For this cannot be furnished by one who does not endeavor to deny himself, that is, his depraved inclinations, through continual and laborious combat against them.

341. °

> Moreover, considering the doctrines related, it seems that a Director cannot without scruple deny frequent, even daily, Communion to certain souls desiring it in order that they may advance in divine love; always, however, provided that, living alienated from affection for any venial fault, they moreover devote themselves much to mental prayer [3], endeavor to tend toward perfection, and no longer fall into sins, even venial sins, that are plainly voluntary.... Except, ordinarily speaking, one day in each week, as certain prudent Directors are accustomed to do; and except that time in which they wish to deprive their penitents of Communion in order to prove their obedience [4], or humility, or for some just cause.... (n. 152.)

[3] This condition is not to be required indiscriminately from all. And indeed it not rarely happens that you find souls distinguished by singular purity of conscience and constantly leading a life especially noble in innocence of morals, which nevertheless do not devote themselves to the exercise of mental prayer, either because they are occupied by other employments, or because God, wonderful in His Saints, does not draw all souls to Himself by the same way, and knows how to feed, direct, and fortify them with the heavenly light of His grace. See concerning this argument the excellent little work of the Reverend Joseph Frassinetti, entitled: The Pater Noster of St. Teresa of Jesus: A Treatise on Prayer by the Priest Giuseppe Frassinetti.

[4] This reason of proving obedience seems not to be entrusted everywhere nor indiscriminately to all, but at most sometimes, and indeed to men who have not only been exercised by long experience in the direction of souls and by intensive study in the spiritual way, but who moreover singularly excel in an abundance of divine light and in that heavenly gift which they call discernment of spirits. Otherwise, besides other inconveniences, effects plainly opposite to the intended purpose will very easily follow. Besides, is there lacking some other more suitable matter concerning which the virtue of obedience can be exercised?

But what in the present matter deservedly ought to seem altogether intolerable is that even women who perhaps exercise some power in monasteries or in some pious Congregation, either over nuns subject to them, or over girls who are educated in the same monasteries, or even merely frequent schools or sodalities there, do not hesitate rashly to usurp for themselves the faculty of conceding or denying access to Holy Communion. This abuse, introduced long ago into certain monasteries of Gaul by Jansenist frauds, I do not know how, in no small part, gradually and imperceptibly pervaded especially the more recent Congregations of women, so that women claim for themselves the governance of the spirit and a certain episcopate, as it were. And thus, while the government of souls is called by St. Gregory the art of arts; while decrees of Synods and pontifical Constitutions prescribe that the choicest men of the clergy, who excel in doctrine, prudence, maturity of judgment, gravity, experience in spiritual matters, etc., be appointed to the spiritual cultivation of this assembly, and therefore Bishops approve not all confessors, but a certain few as fit above others for that duty; while in Religious Orders only the most grave men, if there are any, and those distinguished by judgment and prudence, are chosen for the office of Spiritual Father; while even the Saints admonish that he who determines to enter upon the spiritual journey should so labor in taking a guide of the way that he select one out of thousands; while we all confess that in the theological disciplines that part which they call ascetical or mystical is held to be the most difficult, since it requires certain singular gifts of judgment, discretion, etc.; nevertheless we sometimes see this most grave and difficult office now almost wholly committed to the weakness and ignorance of the female intellect. And since weakness and poverty of mind, when some authority and power are added, are accustomed to be followed by a rashness the more audacious, hence one could see recalled into monasteries, as though by right of return, certain of those scenes which elsewhere in Jansenist history provoked us to laughter and at the same time to just indignation. You would have seen, namely, every effort brought to this, that nuns be withdrawn from the care, instruction, and direction of confessors, so that the whole governance of the spirit might be drawn from the venerable mother of all as from its sole fountain; to which end, even in the Constitutions themselves, one could perceive it most cunningly insinuated, under specious colors and by deceitful art, that the work of the Confessor should not be employed except for the absolution of sins, but that all other things should be reserved to the provident care of the spiritual mother; so that that part which is held to be especially arduous in ecclesiastical governance was now to be referred to women, concerning whom otherwise the Apostle prescribed (1 Tim. 2): Let a woman learn in silence with all subjection. But I permit not a woman to teach... but to be in silence.

Nevertheless, you would have said that very little except the matter of absolution remained reserved from these spiritual mothers. For to these mothers and mistresses the fullest account of the whole conscience was prescribed to be rendered. To this certainly pertained not only to disclose all movements of the soul, depraved inclinations, and temptations, but also lapses and sins. And, what surpasses all belief, while even in communities of Religious men which observe this law of rendering an account of conscience it is prudently guarded that some matter, if perhaps there has been sin in it, be reserved to sacramental confession to be made before the Superior himself, so that provision may be made for decency and shame; the levity and imprudence of women had progressed so far that even those things which pertain to vices contrary to chastity had to be narrated to female curiosity in familiar conversation, so much so that even in the Constitutions themselves, under the pretext obtained of teaching the manner in which this was to be furnished, the necessity of this narration appeared expressly inserted. Anyone easily sees how similar these abuses were to the confessions which the most celebrated Mondonville, as the history of the Jansenist Institute of the Holy Childhood relates, was accustomed to receive from her nuns.

Most wisely, therefore, the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, which did not permit even male religious, if they were merely laymen, the office or duty of spiritual direction, either of receiving an account of conscience even rendered in writing, or even merely of knowing the temptations of subjects (see Method of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars in Approving New Institutes, etc., pp. 30, 31), and which willed that this duty with respect to nuns be so proper to the Confessor that it did not approve an account of conscience to be rendered by them even to Directors or Superiors (ibid., pp. 28, 29), took care that abuses of this kind be removed from Congregations of women. First, therefore, it restricted the matter concerning which nuns are permitted to render some account to the moderator or Superior General to two heads, namely, to exterior or public transgressions of the Constitutions, and to progress in virtues (ibid., p. 26, n. 3, and p. 28, n. 16). Then it conceded this manifestation of conscience itself not obligatorily but only facultatively (ibid.); that is, it willed that there be no obligation of manifesting conscience even concerning those two heads, but permitted it to the free judgment of each. Finally, what is of greatest importance, it did not concede this absolutely, but always added that it permitted this for the present; by which it is openly signified that these things are tolerated meanwhile by way of a certain experiment. And this indeed was most prudently guarded, both because it is manifest that the moderator does not lack means and arts by which she may easily compel to that which is called facultative nuns who do not wish to have that offense, and because the argument concerning progress in virtues furnishes a very easy and almost necessary transition to defects against virtues, and thus the inconvenience of confessions concerning any sins whatsoever to be made by nuns to the moderator can perhaps return under an obvious pretext.

Moreover, from this spiritual governance and inspection of consciences committed to these moderators, behold that inconvenience from which the occasion of this Note was taken. For while the Constitutions of Religious Orders which prescribe an account of conscience to be rendered at the same time most severely prohibit Superiors from using the knowledge drawn from it in any way for external government, it could not be hoped that the female disposition would patiently bear this bridle. Hence that which pertains to the prudent judgment of the Confessor, namely what frequency of Holy Communion is suitable for each of the nuns, the president of the monastery, as moderator of consciences, seizes as her own office; and therefore whether this nun may approach Holy Communion once, that one three times, this one twice a week, another daily, is left to be determined by the decisive judgment of a petty woman.

But there arises from this also another most wicked abuse, which indeed it was natural to expect from so great a power given to a disposition not mistress of itself. For that which formerly, as the gravest punishment, by the canons of Synods and at the judgment of Bishops was sometimes accustomed to be inflicted for graver sins and more atrocious crimes, namely that offenders be barred from sacred Communion, the female mind, lacking judgment, uses as a weapon for avenging certain very slight faults, whether real or imagined. Nor is the president of the monastery accustomed to do this easily only with subject nuns, but, according to the proverb, the lesser ox learns to plow from the greater: individual mistresses of girls who are educated in monasteries also rashly assume this power for themselves; and where you would think that some light disobedience of a girl, or some annoyance caused to another pupil, or a violation of the law of silence could suitably be punished by withdrawing an apple or a sweetmeat or even part of breakfast, for these most slight heads they foolishly and cruelly withdraw the heavenly food of the Eucharist and the grace of the Sacrament.

Nor is this enough. For since the weakness of woman has now imbibed this opinion of her authority, that, according to the phrase of the Apostle (1 Cor. 4:1), she considers the dispensation of the mysteries of God entrusted to herself, and that the use of the Sacraments with respect to the girl pupils resides entirely in her own power and judgment, she exercises a blind tyranny not only with respect to the Eucharist, but also with respect to the Sacrament of Penance. And that which is unheard of in ecclesiastical discipline, that which nowhere was denied even to the most criminal malefactors, is forbidden to girls on account of some light fault, namely that they confess on the day on which the other pupils confess. These things, namely, and others of this kind had to happen when, the due grades and offices of each not being observed, the matter is brought to that place concerning which Sacred Scripture prophesied (Eccles. 10): There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, as though proceeding by error from the face of the prince: the fool set in high dignity, and the rich sitting below. I have seen servants upon horses, etc.

Nor indeed should anyone object here that certain Constitutions of nuns have been approved by the Apostolic See in which it is not only permitted, but even prescribed, that the fullest account of the whole conscience be rendered to the president of the monastery. What this argument is worth in a disciplinary matter, learn from similar examples, which you have innumerable at hand. Formerly Parish Priests could choose for themselves and their sheep a confessor from whatever priests they wished; but after the Council of Trent they cannot choose one unless approved by the Ordinary. Formerly Mendicant Regulars could receive the confessions of any faithful even when their Ordinaries were unwilling and resisting; but afterward it was established that they could not exercise this ministry unless approved by the Ordinaries of places. Formerly Bishops, after a process instituted by themselves concerning virtues and miracles, could grant and decree to someone the honors of the heavenly citizens; but afterward this was reserved to the Apostolic See. Formerly, when Sees were vacant, a chosen Bishop was handed over by the Metropolitan; but afterward the institution of Bishops had to be sought and awaited from the Apostolic See. Formerly nuns were not bound by the severe discipline of enclosure; but afterward solemn profession of vows is not permitted except where the strictness of enclosure can be observed. In a few words: the Apostolic See, according to its wisdom and the power handed down to it by Christ the Lord, uses now this, now another discipline according to diverse circumstances; but it pertains to the sheep of the Lord's flock, whoever they may be, not to judge concerning these things, but faithfully and most lovingly to obey the Shepherd.

And although some soul should sometimes fall into a voluntary venial sin from mere frailty, but soon afterward should grieve and propose amendment, if it should then desire Communion in order to receive strength from the Sacrament, lest it fall, and in order to advance in the way of perfection, for what reason should Communion be denied to it?...

342. ○

Moreover, that which St. Francis de Sales says on this subject must be noted (The Devout Life, c. 21): If they ask you why you communicate so frequently, answer them that two kinds of persons ought to communicate more often: the perfect, namely that they may be able to arrive at perfection; the strong, lest they become weak; the weak, that they may become strong; the sick, that they may be cured; those in good health, lest they become sick.... Those who are not involved in worldly affairs ought to communicate more often because they have the opportunity; but those who are detained by affairs of this kind, because they need Communion.... (n. 153.) > But if afterward it is recognized that, notwithstanding the frequency of Communion, the soul advances nothing in the way of perfection, nor amends itself from deliberate faults, even venial ones, as if it adheres to pleasures of the senses in seeing, hearing, eating, and dressing with some vanity, then certainly the use of Communion will advisedly have to be restricted, so that it may begin seriously to think about its amendment and to provide for its spiritual perfection. Moreover, it must be noted that, although in order that someone may approach Communion it is required that he approach with great devotion, nevertheless it is not necessary that this be the highest and sensible devotion.

343. ○

It suffices for the Director to discover in the innermost will of his penitent a certain alacrity for executing whatever things shall please God. He who would abstain from Communion because he did not feel in himself some great fervor, says the learned Gerson, would be compared to one who, being exceedingly cold, would be unwilling to approach the fire because he experiences no heat in himself. Hence Father Granada, with Cajetan, teaches that pusillanimous persons who omit Communion on account of a disordered fear of their unworthiness inflict great prejudice upon their own progress. Nor, says St. Lawrence Justinian, in order to continue Communions is it necessary that the soul feel, or openly discern in itself, an increase of fervor, since not rarely this Sacrament operates without our noticing it.... (n. 155.) [5].

[5] The little work of the Most Reverend de Segur, Holy Communion, is to be earnestly commended to the faithful; in it, by solid principles and reasoning most suitably accommodated to the common understanding of all, the sophistical little reasons by which certain pusillanimous persons deter themselves, and certain pseudo-ascetics deter others, from frequent participation in the Most Holy Eucharist are refuted.

344. From the things said, according to the mind of St. Ligorius and of others related by him, the doctrine concerning frequent Communion can thus be confined to a few general rules.

First Rule. - Monthly Communion is to be denied to no one sufficiently disposed; indeed it is especially to be recommended to all, even if they lead a life involved in worldly affairs; for otherwise it is very difficult to persevere long in divine grace because of innumerable occasions and the almost obliteration of eternal things. - Thus commonly.

Second Rule. - Weekly Communion is to be permitted, indeed recommended, to those who do not commit grave faults from habit; yet if they labor under several light vices and are in no way solicitous about amendment, it will sometimes be useful to forbid them Communion for some week, so that they may be aroused with some alacrity to cast away their vices [6]. - St. Ligorius, n. 149.

[6] Yet take care lest you be deceived by the principle which the Author also shortly afterward calls most false, namely, as though Communion ought to be regarded as the reward of virtue, since it is a means for acquiring virtue.

Third Rule. - Frequent Communion, or several times in the week, can be permitted or even recommended to those faithful who, although weak, observe the duties of a good Christian, desire both to love, worship, and pray to God, willingly devote some time daily to mental prayer when they can, and do not frequently fall into deliberate faults. - St. Ligorius, n. 150, 153.

Fourth Rule. - Daily Communion is to be conceded to those who lack affection even for light faults, have for the greater part overcome evil desires, and seriously endeavor to tend toward Christian perfection. Yet it is expedient, if cause is present, sometimes once, and at times even several times in the week, to withdraw Communion from them. - St. Ligorius, n. 150. - See Cases, tom. II, n. 13 and following.

Finally, it must be noted that authors opposing frequent Communion rest upon a most false principle. For they suppose Communion to be the reward of virtue; but according to the doctrine of the Holy Fathers, the Eucharist is a means of acquiring virtue.

Appendix II. On Spiritual Communion

345. Spiritual Communion is called a pious desire of receiving the Sacrament of the Eucharist when it cannot be received in reality. Hence for it there is required: 1. an act of Faith, by which the one about to communicate spiritually sets before himself Christ truly present in the Eucharist;

2. an act of the mind, by which he imagines to himself in his mind that he is now approaching the sacred table and receiving the Host from the hand of the Priest [1]; 3. an act of desire, by which he longs to receive Christ in the Sacrament and to be united with Him with his whole heart. This Communion was very much among the delights of the Saints, and is commended by the Council of Trent, sess. 13, c. 8. It is very useful to the pious faithful. For if God rewards a pious desire for any virtue, how much more the desire of possessing Him Himself! Therefore it must be diligently insinuated and most vehemently commended by Confessors to their faithful penitents. Spiritual Communion can be made at every time and in every place, both morning and evening. Yet the more opportune time is the time of Mass itself, namely when the Priest communicates; for then, since the most august Sacrament is exhibited to the eyes and represented more vividly to the mind, it will more ardently inflame hearts with divine love. - Scavini, etc.

[1] This imaginative representation is by no means necessary. For the chief part of this very useful and most sweet practice consists in this: that someone, turning over in his mind both those things which moved the immense charity of our Lord to prepare this heavenly banquet for us, and those things which invite and impel us to participate in it, should burst forth into an ardent desire of enjoying this table; and, dwelling upon an affection of this kind together with acts of faith, humility, and love, should ask with great confidence the most abundant benignity of the Lord and Savior that He deign mercifully to bestow even now that abundance of graces which He is accustomed to impart when, by His presence, He invisibly visits our soul. For otherwise imaginative representations do not come easily to all; and if perhaps they are languid, those affections also will languish and miserably wither in which the chief, indeed the whole, fruit of this pious exercise consists.

Second Part. On the Eucharist as Sacrifice

346. The Eucharist has not only the character of a Sacrament, but also of a Sacrifice. Concerning this matter the Roman Catechism, On the Eucharist, n. 71: But these two characters differ very greatly from one another. For the Sacrament is perfected by consecration; but the whole force of Sacrifice is in this, that it be offered. Wherefore, while the sacred Host is contained in the pyx or carried to the sick, it has the character of a Sacrament, not of a Sacrifice.

Then also, insofar as it is a Sacrament, it brings to those who receive the divine Host a cause of merit and all those benefits which were commemorated above. But insofar as it is a Sacrifice, it contains not only the efficacy of meriting, but also of making satisfaction; for as Christ the Lord in His Passion merited and made satisfaction for us, so those who offer this Sacrifice, whereby they communicate with us, merit the fruits of the Lord's Passion and make satisfaction.

The Eucharist, as a Sacrifice, is called Mass from the verb to send, because Christ there is the Victim sent by God; or, according to others, because at the end of the Sacrifice the people are dismissed, the Priest or Deacon saying: Go, the Mass is ended.

We must treat: 1. of the nature and efficacy of the Sacrifice of the Mass; 2. of the application of the Sacrifice of the Mass; 3. of the obligation of celebrating Mass; 4. of the time and place of celebration; 5. of the manner of celebrating.

Chapter I. On the Nature and Efficacy of the Sacrifice of the Mass

Sacrifice taken generally is thus commonly defined: An external oblation of a sensible thing, with its destruction or alteration, made to God alone through a lawful Minister in protestation of His supreme dominion [1].

[1] Perhaps not the generic notion of sacrifice, but the special definition of a holocaust is handed down in these words. But these things pertain better to Scholastic Theology.

347. Principles. - I. The Mass is the true Sacrifice of the New Law. For it is an oblation instituted by Christ, in which Christ Himself is mystically slain and is offered as a victim to God the Father in acknowledgment of His supreme dominion. This is also established from the definition of the Church in the Council of Trent, sess. 22, Can. 1: If anyone shall say that in the Mass a true and proper Sacrifice is not offered to God, or that what is offered is nothing other than Christ being given to us to eat, let him be anathema.

II. The Sacrifice of the Mass perfectly contains the characters of all the sacrifices of the Old Law. For it is: 1. Latreutic, insofar as it is offered especially to God in acknowledgment of His supreme dominion. 2. Eucharistic, insofar as it is offered to God in thanksgiving for benefits conferred by Him. 3. Propitiatory and satisfactory, or expiatory, insofar as it is offered to God for obtaining both pardon of sins and remission of the punishment due to them. 4. Finally, impetratory, insofar as it is offered to God for obtaining benefits from Him through the merits of Christ. This is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 22, Can. 3.

348. III. The unbloody Sacrifice of the Mass is assuredly the same as the bloody Sacrifice of the Cross, not only because the same victim is offered, but also because the same formal character of Sacrifice is present, namely, through the declaration of the supreme dominion which God has over life and death. Therefore, the Sacrifice of the Altar differs from the Sacrifice of the Cross not essentially, but only accidentally, namely, as regards the manner of offering. 1. For in the Sacrifice of the Cross a real death took place; but in this one only a mystical death. 2. The Redeemer offered the former by Himself upon the altar of the Cross; but He offers the latter through the ministry of priests. 3. The former was meritorious, because in it the price of our redemption was paid; but through the latter the merits of Christ are applied.

349. Questions. - QUESTION 1. In what does the essence of the Sacrifice of the Mass consist? [2]

[2] These matters contribute little to practice, except perhaps where the precept of hearing Mass is in question. But since scarcely more than probable opinions are adduced concerning them, hardly anything can be deduced from them even as regards that precept.

Reply. It is disputed. More probably, it consists in the consecration alone, because in the consecration alone are found all the things required to constitute a Sacrifice, namely, an oblation and the mystical destruction or immolation of the victim. - Thus more commonly. Nevertheless, not a few hold that the essence of the Sacrifice consists in the consecration and partly in the consumption, because in the consecration the victim is set forth, and in the consumption it is consumed. St. Lig., no. 305, regarded this opinion as the more probable.

QUESTION 2. For whom can the Sacrifice of the Mass be offered?

Reply 1. It is certain that this Sacrifice can be offered for all the faithful, living and dead, and also for sinners who are not excommunicated, but only as regards the fruit of impetration [3]. This is established from the Council of Trent. the gift of penance, and consequently forgives even great crimes and sins. It is manifest, however, that the Sacrifice is offered for sinners in order that this fruit may be received.

[3] Here perhaps the fruit of impetration is confused with the fruit of propitiation, which consists in this: that God, appeased by the Sacrifice, grants grace and Reply 2. More probably, it is lawful to celebrate Mass even for tolerated excommunicates, because although the Church grants them nothing, nevertheless the faithful are not prohibited from communicating with them even in divine things, as will be stated in the Treatise on Censures. The same is also to be held concerning infidels [4]. - St. Lig., no. 309.

[4] Benedict XIV (Const. In Superiori, March 8, 1755, sec. 27), speaking of the discipline of the Orientals, who make commemoration of the king in the sacred liturgy even though he is an infidel, has the following: If anyone should ask by what reasoning this can be tolerated, when it is certainly established that those kings for whom they pray and of whom they make commemoration in the liturgy are infidels, the Venerable Cardinal Bellarmine would answer him (as in fact he did answer...) that it is by no means forbidden by the nature of the matter, as the theologians say, to pray in the Mass even for infidels, since the Sacrifice of the Cross was offered for all. And indeed St. Thomas, In IV Sent., dist. 12, q. 2, art. 2, q. 2, ad 4, teaches that although St. Augustine wrote in the book On the Origin of the Soul that the Sacrifice is offered only for those who are members of Christ, nevertheless this opinion must be understood so as to include all those who either already are members of Christ or can become such. Therefore the same Cardinal adds that the whole matter must be measured according to the prohibition of the Church: it is certain from the nature of the matter, if there is no prohibition of the Church, that it is lawful to offer for men of this kind; he is speaking of infidels. And since a prohibition of this kind exists with regard to excommunicates, and thus with regard to heretics and schismatics, but not with regard to infidels, who are not bound by excommunication, he says that this is sufficient for commemoration of them to be made in the Mass, and even for the Sacrifice to be offered for them, according to the manifest tradition on this matter and the Apostolic Constitution. But someone will ask whether, if a king is an infidel, as in Greece, where the Turk rules, and in India and Japan and among the Chinese, where pagans reign, it is lawful for priests who are there expressly to offer for the king. I answer: I think it is lawful, provided that that king is not excommunicated, as heretical kings are, but is a pagan or heathen. For this tradition, and indeed the Constitution, is Apostolic, as we showed a little above. Nor, so far as I know, does any manifest prohibition of the Church exist. To these considerations the text of Tertullian, Ad Scapulam, ch. 2, which occurs as follows, may usefully be added: We sacrifice for the welfare of the emperor, but to our God and his, and as God has commanded, with pure prayer; for God, the Creator of the universe, has no need of anyone's honor or blood. But leaving assertions of this kind in their probability, etc. Thus far Benedict XIV.

Reply 3. It is not lawful to offer the Sacrifice in the name of the Church for excommunicates who are to be avoided, because this is specially prohibited by Canon Law, c. 2, De sententia excommunicationis. A priest may, however, lawfully offer Mass for them in his own name. - St. Lig., no. 308. - Lacroix, no. 33. - Suarez, etc.

350. QUESTION 3. How many kinds of fruit are there from the Sacrifice of the Mass?

Reply. The fruit of the Mass is distinguished under a twofold head, namely, on the part of the offerer and on the part of the victim.

I. On the part of the offerer. Since there is a twofold offerer, namely, Christ and the priest, there is therefore a twofold kind of fruit of the Mass on the part of the offerer. The first proceeds from Christ offering, and is called ex opere operato, because it is received in consideration of the merits of Christ and His promise.

The other proceeds from the priest offering, insofar as it is received in consideration of the merit and devotion of the celebrating priest, and is called the fruit ex opere operantis. Hence it follows that the Sacrifice offered by a holy priest, insofar as it is considered ex opere operato, does not profit more than if it were offered by an unworthy minister; because the Sacrifice, considered in this way, is the work of Christ, and its fruit flows solely from the merits of Christ. Therefore, in this sense it can rightly be said that the Mass of a bad priest is worth as much as the Mass of a good priest. But the contrary must be said if the merit ex opere operantis is considered; for the worthier the priest is and the greater the devotion with which he is endowed, the greater the fruit of the Mass becomes.

351. II. On the part of the victim. Under this head a threefold fruit of the Sacrifice is distinguished, namely, general, special, and most special.

1. The general fruit is that which corresponds to the Sacrifice insofar as it is a work performed by the priest as he acts in the name of the whole Church. And all the faithful, although the priest does not think of them, receive this fruit; but it is granted to them only by way of impetration [5], and not, as it seems, by way of satisfaction, because from the thousands of Sacrifices that are offered daily, every just person, even unknowingly, would obtain the remission of an immense punishment, which appears incredible. Those who are present at the Sacrifice, and a fortiori those who cooperate in it, for example, those serving the priest, etc., share in this general fruit in a more abundant or more special manner. But this fruit, as being ex opere operantis, is more abundant in proportion as the devotion and holiness of those assisting and cooperating are greater. Hence, although several persons hear Mass or serve at it, each will receive the whole fruit proportioned to his devotion, just as if he alone were hearing or serving at it.

[5] Here also understand impetration in such a way that it includes propitiation as well.

2. The special fruit is that which comes to him or to those to whom the priest specially applies the Sacrifice. They share ex opere operato in the Sacrifice insofar as it is impetratory and propitiatory; and indeed also, provided that nothing prevents it, insofar as it is satisfactory.

3. The most special fruit is that which comes to the offering priest insofar as he offers as a private person. For if every cooperator receives from the Sacrifice a fruit altogether special to himself, much more ought the priest who sacrifices to receive this fruit. Whether the priest can apply this fruit to others, however, is uncertain [6]. - St. Lig., no. 312.

[6] This, however, is certain: the priest cannot apply this most special fruit to another in such a way that he receives another stipend on that account; yet understand this unless it is done with the consent of the one giving the other stipend.

352. QUESTION 4. Is the value of the Sacrifice of the Mass infinite?

Reply 1. It is certainly infinite if it is considered in itself, or in the thing offered and in the excellence of the dignity of Christ offering. For Christ Himself in this Sacrifice is at once the victim and the principal offerer. Therefore, the Mass is the oblation of a victim of infinite price made by Christ as the primary offerer, Who has infinite merit.

Reply 2. It cannot be infinite with regard to its application made to individual men, or with regard to its effect or fruit. The reason is that creatures are not capable of receiving an infinite fruit; but the application can be greater or less according as the disposition or capacity of the one to whom it is applied is greater or less.

It is disputed, however, whether the application of the fruit of the Sacrifice is restricted to a certain degree or is made without a determinate limit according to the capacity of those for whom it is offered.

The first and much more probable opinion contends that the application is made without a determinate limit according to the capacity of the faithful for whom it is offered. And this is the opinion most commonly received today, says St. Lig., no. 312. The reason is that the value of the Sacrifice is infinite in itself; hence, of itself, it can be applied to innumerable men without being capable of exhaustion. Therefore, if the Sacrifice is offered for one hundred or one thousand persons, each one will receive as much fruit as the single person would receive for whom alone it was offered [7]. The second opinion holds that the fruit of the Mass is restricted to a certain degree. The reason adduced is that, although the Mass in itself and with regard to sufficiency is of infinite value, nevertheless its effect is limited and restricted to a certain quantity by the will of Christ, Who instituted this Sacrifice so that ex opere operato it would produce a certain effect, or a certain degree of satisfaction, independently of the disposition of men. Nevertheless, the patrons of this opinion concede that this degree of fruit can be increased ex opere operantis, that is, according to the greater devotion of the offering priest and of the person for whom it is offered [8]. For the rest, they assert entirely without grounds that a restriction of this kind was made by Christ.

[7] Although, according to this most common opinion of the more recent authors, a priest can apply one and the same Sacrifice for several persons, nevertheless it is not lawful for him to receive several stipends. For this has been prohibited by decrees of the Church; and St. Alphonsus (Lib. 6, no. 312) adds the reason: because the stipend is given for the support of the minister; therefore, as often as his support is furnished to the minister, the title for receiving another stipend is lacking. Indeed (as the same St. Alphonsus rightly warns), since the opposite opinion is not altogether lacking in at least some extrinsic probability, a priest who receives a stipend from one person ought not to apply the same Sacrifice for others except under the condition, namely, that nothing be withdrawn from the one furnishing the stipend. Nevertheless, the addition of this condition, which St. Alphonsus suggests for the sake of greater security, can and ought by no means to prevent the priest from also applying the same Sacrifice for others, or even from being able, through the application of the same Sacrifice, to satisfy some obligation to another which he contracted otherwise than by an accepted stipend, and therefore under a title other than that of justice. On this matter Cardinal de Lugo (De Eucharistia, disp. 19, no. 249) has the following: It does not appear why a priest would not satisfy his debt by conforming himself to that opinion which the adversaries admit to be probable; just as one who has promised a fast would satisfy by fasting in this or that manner, even if there were a question, under a probable opinion, whether that was a fast, provided nevertheless that it was probable that it was a fast. Therefore, one who has promised (from liberality) to apply a Mass for someone will satisfy by applying it with a probable application. For since elsewhere (vol. 1, no. 80), according to the most common opinion of the Doctors, it was established that one who has probably satisfied an obligation that is not from justice requiring equality is thereby freed from the obligation, so that he is bound to nothing further; and since the opinion that the same Sacrifice avails equally for others besides the one offering the stipend is now much more probable and most commonly received, the reason is evident why Cardinal de Lugo said that an obligation of Sacrifice arising under a title other than that of justice, for example, from a gratuitous and liberal promise, and furthermore from a debt of mere fidelity, can be satisfied in this manner. See also the following note.

[8] Moreover, these Doctors also concede that the diverse fruits of the Sacrifice, namely, the latreutic, eucharistic, impetratory, and satisfactory fruits, can validly be divided by the celebrant, or be applied to diverse persons. And they teach that this can even be done lawfully in a free Mass, that is, one which the celebrant is bound to offer for no one in particular.

But in a Mass that is owed solely from fidelity and a liberal promise, they consider that division altogether lawful if the Sacrifice of the Mass was liberally promised to diverse persons for diverse ends. The reason is that a liberal promise is to be interpreted so that it is as little burdensome as possible to the one promising, as is said in L. 99, Quidquid adstringendae, ff., De verborum obligationibus.

Finally, in a Mass owed solely from obedience, whether by command of a Superior or by a statute of an Order, it is lawful to divide the fruits that do not tend directly to the prescribed end. The reason is that, according to the common opinion of the Doctors from Cap. Intelligentia, De verborum significatione, the obligation of a law or precept is not to be extended beyond the end of the law. Hence, when a Superior or the statute of an Order prescribes a Mass precisely in honor of the Most Holy Trinity, or of some Saint, or in thanksgiving, the satisfactory fruit, and in the last case also the impetratory fruit, can be freely applied by the priest for another, as Gobat and Sporer, with others, teach on the authority of St. Francis Borgia, who, when he was Superior General of the Society of Jesus, wrote to his subjects in the year 1564 in these words: When Superiors enjoin Masses for purposes other than for the dead, it is clear that the application for freeing a soul remains free to the priest.

353. QUESTION 5. Does the Mass benefit the dead by an infallible promise of Christ?

Reply. Affirmatively. For the Mass is profitably offered for the dead, as is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 22, ch. 2 and Can. 3. Moreover, this cannot be done except by the promise of Christ, which is declared in Matt. 26:28: This is My Blood... which shall be shed for many unto the remission of sins. This is also established from the words of the form in the conferral of Orders: Receive the power to offer Sacrifice to God and to celebrate Masses both for the living and for the dead, in the name of the Lord. Amen. Nevertheless, temporal punishment is not remitted to the dead by a fixed law, but it profits them only by way of suffrage, according as it shall please God to accept it. - See Perrone, vol. 8, no. 282.

QUESTION 6. Does a Requiem Mass benefit the dead more than a Mass of the Saints?

Reply. Negatively, as regards the substance, or on the part of the Sacrifice; but affirmatively as regards the accidental elements, or on the part of the prayers, the deficiency of which devotion can supply. - St. Lig., no. 309, after St. Thomas, Suppl., q. 71, art. 9. It must be noted here that a Requiem Mass and a Mass in black vestments can be applied for a living person, provided that the one who gave the alms has not expressly declared the contrary. - S. C. of Rites, Nov. 29, 1856.

Chapter II. On the Application of the Sacrifice of the Mass

The application of the Sacrifice of the Mass is the intention by which the priest wills that the fruit of the Sacrifice pass to the benefit of a certain person.

354. Principles. - I. In order that a share of the general fruit may be received, the application of the priest is not necessary; it suffices that he will to celebrate according to the mind of the Church, for such an application is always implicitly included in the general intention of the celebrant. Likewise, in order that the most special fruit may come to the priest himself, it is not necessary that he will specially to apply it to himself; for this is always applied to him of itself. Indeed, there are some who think that this fruit is so proper to him that it cannot be applied to another.

II. The application of the priest is required, however, in order that the special or ministerial fruit may come to someone. For the priest, and he alone, bears the person of Christ; therefore, just as he alone offers the Sacrifice for others in the person of Christ, so also he alone applies its fruit.

III. Although the priest has promised the Mass to no one, he ought to make some application of the special fruit. The reason is: 1. Because in his ordination he received, by the institution of Christ, the power of effecting the Sacrifice and, consequently, of applying its fruit; but that power would remain useless if the priest did not use it. 2. Moreover, if no application is made, there is no reason why it should profit one person more than another; therefore, the unapplied fruit remains in the general treasury of the Church, and consequently becomes less useful. - Billuart, diss. 8, art. 4.

355. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must the application of the fruit of the Mass be actual?

Reply. Negatively; it suffices that it be habitual, namely, that once made it is not retracted. The reason is that this application is made by way of donation, and thus through an intention once possessed the priest has already donated the fruit of his Sacrifice; consequently, it is owed to the one to whom he donated it and, when the Mass is celebrated, it comes to that person unless the donation is revoked. - St. Lig., no. 335. It is expedient, however, to make the application of the Mass before it is begun. But if the priest has not done this either before the consecration or at least in the consecration of the second Species, he cannot afterward apply the Sacrifice specially to anyone. - St. Lig., ibid.

QUESTION 2. If a priest, forgetful of a prior intention, elicits a new one while celebrating, which is to be judged valid?

Reply. It cannot be determined in general. The priest should consider which intention was predominant in his mind [1]. For the rest, in practice it matters little; for since one or the other is certainly valid, it will be sufficient on another occasion to apply the Mass to the one to whom it was not applied.

[1] Lugo (De Sacramentis, disp. 8, nos. 121, 123) explains which intention prevails in this way: If today you wish tomorrow's Mass to be applied altogether for Peter, so that this application is from now on to be preferred to any application to be made through forgetfulness of it, but tomorrow you apply the Mass for another, today's application will not be judged revoked, because it was more universal and revocatory of tomorrow's application.... If each act of the will were equal, the later would prevail. For just as a later testament always prevails over an earlier one, even if, when he makes the later one, a man does not remember the earlier one made by him, so, if yesterday you applied today's Mass for Peter, and today, forgetful of that act of will, you apply it for Paul by an equally absolute and efficacious act of will, this later one seems to be preferred.

QUESTION 3. Must the intention of the celebrant be explicitly determinate?

Reply. Negatively. It suffices that it be determined implicitly. Thus the application is valid if you say: I offer this Sacrifice for the one who gave the stipend; for the one for whom the Superior wills the Mass to be said; for the one for whom the foundation requires it; for the greatest sinner; for a soul afflicted by a graver temptation; for the soul in Purgatory needing greater help, or more pleasing to God; for all the souls in Purgatory; for the one to whom I am bound to apply it; for the person or intention determined in writing or in the mind at the beginning of the week, etc. On the contrary, this application is not valid: I offer so that God may apply this Mass. - See Cases, vol. II, no. 325 et seq.

356. QUESTION 4. If a priest has accepted stipends from ten persons, does he satisfy his obligation by celebrating with a confused and indeterminate intention?

Reply. Entirely negatively, because an intention determined at least to a certain person is required; otherwise, there is no reason why the Mass should be applied to one rather than to another, and thus it would be applied to no one. - St. Lig., no. 335. Nevertheless, if he were to intend to apply each Mass to those ten persons, applying one tenth of each Mass to each, he would satisfy the obligation, because the fruit of the Sacrifice is divisible and there is allotted to each what is owed to him. For, by receiving a tenth part of the fruit in each of ten Masses, each one, when the tenth Mass has been offered, has already obtained the whole fruit owed to him [2]. - St. Lig., no. 335, with many others.

[2] The Author replies thus according to the opinion of those who teach that only a limited fruit is received from the Mass, namely, that which the divine disposition has determined; yet he himself had said above (no. 352) that this opinion rests upon no solid reason. But according to the more probable and most common opinion, of which there was discussion above (no. 352 with the note), each person would receive the whole fruit owed to him from each of the ten Masses. Therefore, when the tenth Mass had been offered in this manner, each would have received a fruit ten times greater than if one Mass had been applied for each individually.

357. QUESTION 5. How must the application be determined when stipends are given by many unknown persons, as commonly happens in pious pilgrimages?

Reply. The intention must be made for those who gave the earlier stipends. This is easily accomplished when the same priest is to satisfy all the obligations; nor does it hinder that he may happen to distribute a portion of the Masses to be celebrated to other priests, because he can distribute them in the same order in which he received them, and thus the application appears sufficiently determined. A greater difficulty seems to be present if a sacristan or another person has collected many stipends from diverse persons and distributes the commingled money to several priests, which is an ordinary and frequent case. For how, then, must the application of the Mass be made? I answer: nothing else must be done, nor can anything else morally be done, except that the application be made according to the temporal order in which the stipends were given by the faithful, in accordance with the axiom sometimes employed in a matter of justice: He who is prior in time is stronger in right. Indeed, it is not even necessary that the priest attend to this explicitly, since he is judged to will to act in this way, because natural equity demands it. Hence, if from a common fund, for example, from a box placed in the church, or from a distributor of Masses, you have received stipends for twenty Masses, no other care ought to rest upon you except that you say Mass twenty times according to the intention of the giver. The distributor himself is judged to have the same implicit intention, namely, successively to assign the stipends according to priority of time. The priest can, however, interrupt the aforesaid order by an express intention for some grave cause, for example, if some other Mass is urgent, or if he has received a larger stipend so that he should not delay the Mass, etc.

358. QUESTION 6. Is an application made for a living person whom you believe to be dead valid, if you were bound to celebrate for him only after he had died?

Reply. Entirely negatively. The reason is that the obligation bears upon making the application for the dead person in order to relieve his soul from the punishments of Purgatory; but that end is not obtained while the Sacrifice is offered for a living person. Hence, because of an error of this kind, the priest must suffer the loss of his stipend [3].

[3] The Author's resolution perhaps regards a chimerical case. Whatever may be said of the probability of the case, the resolution, if considered in itself, can deservedly appear somewhat too severe. The reason is that the satisfactory fruit of the Sacrifice can benefit even a living person and exempt him from the punishments of Purgatory. Moreover, a living person is capable of, and shares in, those fruits also of which the dead are not capable. And from this comes the practice of some who, solicitously seeking this assistance for themselves, endeavor to have all or a large part of the Masses determined by them offered in advance while they are among the living.

Chapter III. On the Obligation of Celebrating

This obligation can be considered under a threefold aspect: 1. By reason of the priesthood. 2. By reason of office. 3. By reason of a stipend.

Article I. On the Obligation of Celebrating by Reason of the Priesthood

359. I say: All priests, by reason of the priesthood, are bound by divine law under grave obligation to celebrate at some time. This is proved from the words of Christ, Luke 22:19: Do this in commemoration of Me. By these words, according to the testimony of the Council of Trent, Christ commanded the Apostles and their successors to offer the Sacrifice. Moreover, all priests receive in their ordination not only the power, but also the charge and office of sacrificing annexed to it. Hence the Apostle, Heb. 5:1: For every high priest taken from among men is ordained for men in the things that appertain to God, that he may offer up gifts and sacrifices. Moreover, in a grave matter everyone is gravely bound to discharge the charge he has undertaken. Therefore.... - Thus St. Thomas, part 3, q. 82, art. 10. - See St. Lig., no. 313.

360. Questions. - QUESTION 1. How often in his life or in a year is a priest bound to celebrate?

Reply. It is not clearly established. More probably, he does not seem bound to celebrate except three or four times in the year, namely, on the more solemn feasts. Indeed, it does not appear improbable that a priest has sufficiently fulfilled his office if, on whatever days they may be, he offers the Sacrifice three or four times in the year. - St. Lig., no. 313.

QUESTION 2. Is one who celebrates only four times in the year exempt from every sin?

Reply. Negatively. For he does not seem excusable from at least some venial sin. Thus commonly, according to the mind of the Council of Trent, sess. 25, ch. 14, De Reform., where it is said: Let the Bishop take care that they (the priests) celebrate Mass at least on Sundays and solemn feasts. Indeed, holy mother Church desires that a priest offer the Sacrifice every day, and devout priests are accustomed to omit it very rarely.

Hence St. Lig., no. 359, deservedly concludes: Wherefore, I would not know how to excuse from light fault that priest who could celebrate daily (one day of the week excepted out of reverence), and who, without any just cause, but solely from sloth, abstained from celebrating; for a priest celebrates not only for himself, but also for the good of the whole Church and of the Christian people, whose minister and intercessor he has been constituted, according to that saying of the Apostle: EVERY HIGH PRIEST taken from among men is ordained for men in the things that appertain to God, that he may offer up gifts and sacrifices for sins.

Deservedly, therefore, the author of the excellent work The Imitation of Christ says, bk. 4, ch. 5: When a priest celebrates, he honors God, gladdens the Angels, edifies the Church, assists the living, affords rest to the dead, and makes himself a partaker of all good things. Thus also St. Bonaventure, On Preparation for Mass, ch. 5: A priest who does not celebrate, so far as lies in him, deprives the Trinity of praise and glory, the Angels of joy, sinners of pardon, the just of assistance and grace, those existing in Purgatory of refreshment, the Church of Christ of a special benefit, and himself of medicine and remedy against daily sins and infirmities.

Article II. On the Obligation of Celebrating by Reason of Office

361. I say I: All pastors of souls are bound by natural and divine law to celebrate at some time for their sheep. The reason is that they ought to feed them. This is also established from the Council of Trent, sess. 23, ch. 1, De Reform., where it says: Since by divine precept it has been commanded to all to whom the care of souls is entrusted to know their sheep, to offer Sacrifice for them..., etc.

I say II: By ecclesiastical law, the same persons are bound to celebrate for their sheep on all Sundays and feast days on which the faithful ought to hear Mass. This is established from several decrees of the Church, but especially from the Constitution of Benedict XIV, Cum semper, of August 19, 1744. Not only secular parish priests but also regulars are bound to this; likewise those who are deputed, temporarily or removably, for example, because of the absence or infirmity of the parish priest, to supply his office, such as assistant parish priests. - Benedict XIV, Constitution cited. Indeed, a parish priest placed over two parishes is bound to apply two Masses when feast days recur, unless the union of the two parishes is plenary and extinctive, so that from two parish churches there has become altogether one through the extinction of the title of the other. - S. Congr. of the Council, March 11, 1774. This burden a fortiori rests upon Bishops after they have taken possession of the See, but not upon Vicars Capitular. - S. Congr. of Rites, Nov. 12, 1831. Missionaries and Vicars Apostolic, however, are by no means bound to apply Masses, although it is fitting to do so from charity. - S. Congr. for the Propagation of the Faith, April 1862 [1].

[1] Namely, a response had formerly proceeded from the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith as though missionaries were bound to this by a strict obligation of charity. But later, namely in the year 1862, that resolution was rejected by the Sacred Congregation itself. For the rest, the title of charity of which the Author speaks presses missionaries equally, as is evident, and all priests throughout the whole world. Hence the Author here indicates not an office proper to missionaries, but one common to all.

362. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can a very poor parish priest accept a stipend for a Mass to be celebrated on Sunday?

Reply. Negatively, of itself. This is established from the declaration of Benedict XIV in the aforesaid Constitution [2]. - St. Lig., no. 325.

[2] Nevertheless, in sec. 8 of the same Constitution Benedict XIV grants Bishops the faculty of dispensing so that needy parish priests may, even on feast days, receive an alms from some devout offerer and apply the Sacrifice for him, on this condition, however, that within the week, by applying a Mass for the people, they supply whatever was omitted on the feast days.

QUESTION 2. Is the obligation of celebrating Mass for the people personal?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that it rests upon the parish priest as pastor. Hence parish priests ought by themselves to apply Mass for the people on Sundays and feast days; nor is any custom to the contrary valid.

To a doubt proposed to the S. Congr. of the Council:

What is to be thought of the custom by force of which a parish priest on Sundays and feast days applies a private Mass for some devout benefactor and, being detained by no legitimate impediment, transfers to another priest the burden of celebrating Mass?

The Sacred Congregation replied: The custom in question is not to be regarded. Sept. 25, 1847, in Mechlinien. - See D. Bouix, Treatise on the Parish Priest, p. 590.

363. QUESTION 3. Does a parish priest satisfy the aforesaid obligation by a private Mass?

Reply. It seems that the answer must be altogether affirmative, because he fulfills the precept of the Church in reality; nor is he bound to celebrate a solemn Mass, or at some certain fixed hour, although the Bishop can prescribe that parish priests by themselves read or sing the more solemn Mass. - Thus D. Bouix, ibid., pp. 591-592.

Moreover, on Sundays and feast days the parish priest ought to celebrate Mass in his own church and not in another, notwithstanding any custom whatever to the contrary. - Thus S. Congr. of the Council, Sept. 15 and Nov. 17, 1629. - D. Bouix, Treatise on the Parish Priest, p. 591 [3].

[3] In some places, however, custom provides that if a solemn feast is celebrated in another church subject to the same parish priest, the honor of celebrating a sung Mass with a double stipend is reserved to him by a certain right.

QUESTION 4. If a parish priest has deputed a vicar to celebrate Mass for the people, must he give him a stipend?

Reply. Affirmatively, because it pertains to the parish priest to take care that the parochial Mass, or Mass for the people, is celebrated, nor is the vicar bound to be deprived of a stipend.

QUESTION 5. Is a parish priest or Bishop who is infirm, or prevented from celebrating by some other cause, bound on feast days to have another celebrate for the people?

Reply. The answer is affirmative, because that burden is not only personal, but at the same time real, just like the burden of preaching, which consequently can and ought to be fulfilled through another. - St. Lig., no. 327. - S. Congr. of Rites, May 11, 1720.

QUESTION 6. Is a parish priest who could not substitute another for himself to celebrate for the people on one or another day during the time of a Retreat (Retraite pastorale) afterward bound to apply as many Masses for the people?

Reply. Affirmatively, from the response of the S. Congr. of the Council to the Most Reverend Maupoint, Bishop of Saint-Denis (Bourbon), on Dec. 14, 1859.

364. QUESTION 7. Are pastors of souls bound to celebrate for the people on feasts suppressed by Pius VI?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that on those days the Church exempts the faithful only from the obligation of hearing Mass and abstaining from servile works; hence the obligation of the parish priest to celebrate for the people continues to bind, just as it bound before. This is established from various Declarations of the S. Penitentiary.

QUESTION 8. Which feasts were suppressed by Pius VI?

Reply. They are the following: the feasts of the Apostles, except the solemnity of SS. Peter and Paul; the two weekdays that follow Easter and Pentecost; the Finding of the Holy Cross; the feasts of St. Anne, St. Lawrence, St. Stephen, the Holy Innocents, St. Sylvester, St. Michael, and St. Joseph. - See what was said in vol. I, no. 476.

365. QUESTION 9. Are pastors of souls in France bound to celebrate Mass for their sheep on suppressed feast days whose solemnities were transferred to Sunday by the concession of Pius VII in the year 1802?

Reply. Affirmatively. This is established from various decisions of the Holy See, especially from the Declaration of the S. Congregation of the Council of Trent approved by Gregory XVI, in the response given to the Most Reverend Bouvier, Bishop of Le Mans, on June 14, 1841, as well as from the response to the Most Reverend Archbishop of Toulouse on August 6, 1842; and again from the decision of the Sacred Congregation on Sept. 25, 1847.

Therefore, in order that a parish priest may satisfy this obligation, it does not suffice for him to apply Mass for the people on the Sundays to which the solemnity of the Epiphany of Our Lord, Corpus Christi, SS. Peter and Paul the Apostles, the Patron of the place (but not the Titular of the church), and the Immaculate Conception is deferred or transferred, where by Apostolic Indult that feast is celebrated on the second Sunday of Advent; but in addition he is bound to apply Mass on the very day on which the Offices of the aforesaid feasts are commonly recited in the Church [4].

[4] With regard to transferred feast days, an exception must be made when the divine Office also has been transferred to Sunday together with the solemnity. Thus the Constitution of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX, May 3, 1858: But as regards transferred feast days, We make this one exception, namely, that when the divine Office has been transferred to Sunday together with the solemnity, only one Mass for the people is to be applied by parish priests, since the Mass, which is the principal part of the divine Office, must be judged to have been transferred together with the Office itself.

366. QUESTION 10. Is there any prescription or custom against the obligation of applying Mass for the people on suppressed or transferred feasts?

Reply. Negatively. This is openly established from the Declaration of the S. Congregation of the Council on Sept. 25, 1847, and especially from the Constitution of Pius IX, Amantissimi, May 3, 1858 [5].

[5] Concerning this obligation with regard to reduced feasts, Pius IX established the following: ... Wherefore, by these letters We declare, establish, and decree that parish priests and all others actually exercising the care of souls ought to celebrate and apply the most holy Sacrifice of the Mass for the people entrusted to them, both on all Sundays and other days that are still observed by precept, and also on those which, by the indulgence of this Apostolic See, have been removed and transferred from the number of feast days of precept, just as the curators of souls themselves were bound to do while the aforesaid Constitution of Urban VIII was in its full force, before the feast days of precept were reduced and transferred.

QUESTION 11. Which feasts were suppressed by Pius VII and transferred to Sunday for France?

Reply. They are the following: the Circumcision, the Epiphany, the solemnity of Corpus Christi, the Purification, the Annunciation, the Nativity, and the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the feasts of SS. Peter and Paul, and of the Patron of the Parish. - Recall what was said in vol. I, no. 476.

Article III. On the Obligation of Celebrating by Reason of a Stipend

367. Principles. - I. A stipend or alms may lawfully be accepted for a Mass which one is not bound to say for another. For a stipend is not given as the price or compensation for the Mass, but as a means for the support of the minister. This is also established from Sacred Scripture (1 Cor. 9:13): Know you not that they who work in the holy place eat the things that are of the holy place; and they that serve the altar partake with the altar?

II. Priests are bound in justice to celebrate Mass and determinately to apply it according to the intention of those who have given a stipend for this purpose. For an onerous agreement is entered into with them, which must be observed by the title of justice, just as in any other contract. Hence a priest who, either by himself or through another minister, omits to apply according to the intention of the one who gave the stipend is bound to restitution by strict right.

III. A priest cannot satisfy two stipends by one Mass, but must offer a distinct Sacrifice for each. The reason is: 1. Because it is not certainly established that a Mass offered for several persons profits each as much as it profits one person when applied for him alone, although this is far more probable. 2. Because in this way the priest, in receiving an honorarium, would exceed the measure of decent support [1]. 3. Because this same thing is established from proposition 8 condemned by Alexander VII, which is as follows: A priest can accept a doubled stipend for the same Mass by applying to the petitioner even a part of the most special fruit corresponding to the celebrant himself.

[1] According to this argument, this could have seemed sufficiently firm at the time when the amount of the stipend could appear proportionate to the decent support of a priest, that is, support becoming the condition of a priest.

368. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What is to be judged a just stipend for a celebrating priest? Reply. The amount of a just stipend cannot be determined universally. It is lawful to demand the stipend established by the Bishop or by custom. - St. Lig., no. 319. Regulars also are bound under grave obligation to conform themselves to this rule, according to a Decree of the Sacred Congregation cited by Benedict XIV, Instit. 56, no. 10. - St. Lig., no. 320. Indeed, at least with regard to manual alms, the Bishop can prohibit acceptance of a stipend smaller than the established rate. - Benedict XIV, ibid. [2]. Nevertheless, just as a smaller stipend can be accepted from charity or friendship, so also a larger one may lawfully be received from the liberality of the giver. Likewise, a priest can receive more for extraordinary labor, for example, for celebrating Mass at such an hour or in such an inconvenient place, etc.

[2] The decrees which Benedict XIV (Instruct. 56, no. 20) reports regard only perpetual obligations of Masses; and in them it is established that the Superiors of Regulars should not permit a larger or smaller sum of money to be fixed in the future for perpetual Masses. The rate established there by Innocent XIII, namely, sixty scudi annually, is not now observed and cannot be observed because of the changed value of money. The same occurs with regard to stipends for adventitious Masses, which at that time reached ten Roman asses at Rome and which the Sacred Congregation then decreed were not to be changed, as the same Benedict XIV relates (loc. cit., no. 23). But although a stipend twice as great is now given, who would say that it is adequate for the decent support of a priest? And it is indeed astonishing that some are now found so foolish as to clamor against the riches of clerics, when, because the value of money has now changed so greatly, we see that the wages both of laborers and craftsmen and of those devoted to public or private offices have been increased; but we know that the stipends established for the support of clerics have until now been fixed at that amount which, although it was adequate some centuries ago, now scarcely suffices for living a most straitened life!

QUESTION 2. Does a priest who, after accepting a stipend, delays celebrating Mass sin gravely?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that he violates a contract in a grave matter. This is also established from the Decrees of the S. Congregation of the Council of the year 1652. - St. Lig., no. 317.

369. QUESTION 3. What delay is judged grave?

Reply. It is disputed; certainly a delay that exceeds three months can be considered grave. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, against others who require an entire year. More probably, however, a priest who celebrates the promised Mass within two months does not sin gravely. But in Masses to be celebrated for persons recently deceased, a delay of one month is to be regarded as grave according to St. Ligorius, the Salmanticenses, Lugo, etc. Moreover, the statutes of Bishops must also be attended to. But certainly a priest sins gravely whenever he omits to celebrate, within the time suited to the circumstances, a Mass requested and promised for obtaining some pressing grace, and for that reason he is bound to restore the stipend received, even though he afterward celebrated.

For the rest, although burdens undertaken cannot be fulfilled within a short time, nevertheless, if the one giving the alms for the celebration of other Masses knows this and consents that they be celebrated only when the burdens already undertaken have been satisfied, this is not prohibited. - Thus the S. Congregation of the Council. - Cavalieri, vol. 5, p. 107, ad duodecimum.

QUESTION 4. Does a priest who omits to celebrate Mass sin gravely if the stipend accepted for it does not constitute grave matter?

Reply. It seems that the answer is affirmative, unless perhaps the stipend is so slight that the Mass appears to have been promised gratuitously. The reason is that the one who gave the stipend suffers notable spiritual detriment. Thus St. Lig. and others commonly, against others.

370. QUESTION 5. Whether and how does one who omits a Mass gratuitously promised sin?

Reply 1. He does not sin whenever there is no contract of a true promise, but the one promising manifests only a benevolent purpose.

Reply 2. More probably, he sins only venially when a true promise has intervened, because a simple promise does not bind under grave obligation unless, as Lugo says, the one promising expressly binds himself under grave obligation and in justice.

QUESTION 6. Can a priest satisfy several Masses gratuitously promised by one Mass?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that Masses promised gratuitously by no means induce the obligation of a contract properly so called, not even by the title of mere fidelity [3]. Moreover, it is much more probable that an application of the Sacrifice made for several persons profits each as much as it profits one alone. Besides, the reason of justice which requires that the safer part be chosen does not press here, for no remuneration is received. - Thus Elbel, De Contr., no. 337, etc.

[3] The Author here seems to suppose that the priest did not will to assume even the obligation of fidelity which is proper to every true promise, and thus that no contract whatever of a promise properly so called intervened.

QUESTION 7. Is a priest guilty of simony if he celebrates principally in consideration of the stipend?

Reply. Negatively, of itself, unless, namely, he regards the stipend as the true price of the celebration. Yet he cannot be excused from sin, since it is odious that anyone should abuse sacred ministry for the sake of making money. Nevertheless, a priest does not sin who secondarily celebrates in consideration of the remuneration to be received, especially if it is necessary for him. Nor is he stained by any fault if, after accepting a stipend, he is thereby determined to celebrate, although otherwise he would have omitted the Mass; for then he is moved not by reason of the stipend, but by the obligation to be fulfilled. Thus commonly.

371. QUESTION 8. Can a priest entrust a Mass to another to be celebrated while giving him a smaller stipend than he himself accepted?

Reply. Negatively. The reason is that, on account of the appearance of base gain, the S. Congregation of the Council prohibited this by a Decree approved by Urban VIII and confirmed by Innocent XII, in which the following is contained: The Church, wishing to remove every damnable gain, prohibits a priest who has undertaken to celebrate a Mass with a certain alms from entrusting the same Mass to another to be celebrated while retaining for himself a part of the alms for that Mass. Hence Alexander VII also condemned the following proposition expressed under no. 9: After the Decree of Urban, a priest to whom Masses to be celebrated are entrusted can satisfy through another by giving him a smaller stipend and retaining another part of the stipend for himself. Indeed, Benedict XIV, in the Encyclical Letter Quanta cura of June 30, 1741, condemns with the penalty of suspension incurred by the very fact and reserved to the Apostolic See a priest who, collecting stipends of a greater value for Masses to be celebrated according to the custom or statutes of places, arranges for the Masses to be celebrated there, or in places where smaller stipends are given, while retaining a part for himself. - See St. Lig., no. 321.

Except: 1. Unless the excess of the stipend was given in consideration of the person, friendship, poverty, gratitude, or kinship. 2. Or if the other priest remits the excess entirely of his own accord and without being asked. - St. Lig., ibid., etc., and others commonly.

372. QUESTION 9. Is one who retains part of the stipend bound to restitution?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is: 1. Because this is deduced from the condemned proposition of Alexander VII related above. For the proposition said that a priest who retained a part of the stipend could satisfy through another; therefore, it follows that the contradictory is true, namely, that he cannot satisfy. But satisfaction regards not only the moral goodness of the act, but also its justice; and one who does not satisfy an obligation of justice is bound to restitution. 2. Because a priest who divides the stipend acts against the will of the giver; for the will of the giver is not only that the Mass be celebrated, but that it be celebrated for such a stipend. For he does not wish gratuitously to give anything to one who does not celebrate. - Thus St. Lig., no. 322, saying that this opinion is to be held. It is disputed, however, to whom restitution ought to be made, namely, whether to the one giving the alms or to the celebrant. It seems it should be made rather to the celebrant. - St. Lig., ibid.

QUESTION 10. Can a priest to whom a generous stipend is offered for today's Mass, retaining it, ask another priest to celebrate in his place, while promising to celebrate on the following day for the person for whom that other priest was going to celebrate for the ordinary alms?

Reply. It is disputed. The first opinion denies it, as though this could not be excused from the appearance of base gain [4]. - Thus St. Lig., no. 322, dub. 4, who nevertheless adds that this does not seem to be condemned as a grave sin.

[4] For this opinion St. Alphonsus adduces nothing except the authority of Concina, who leaves the matter to the judgment of prudent men if the priest is poor - as though poverty could remove from sacred ministries the appearance of base gain! For the rest, the second opinion is not only far more probable because of the solidity of its reasons and the weight of authority, but is also confirmed by the most common practice of devout and prudent priests.

 The VV. found several things (pp. 386-388) to criticize in this little note. Nevertheless, they admit (p. 387) that this exchange of intentions is lawful in itself, even when the stipends are retained by both priests. Thus they say: We do not deny, nor does the Holy Doctor disapprove, that a priest can, speaking per se, exchange an intention with another, while each priest retains his own... stipend. And in fact occasions for requesting this of another priest are not so infrequent, as happens, for example, if you have accepted a stipend for a Mass to be celebrated on a certain day, and on that day it unexpectedly happens that you ought to celebrate Mass either for a sick person, or for a deceased person, or for a bridegroom and bride, etc. But since, as the VV. admit, St. Alphonsus finds nothing that can in itself be censured in an exchange of intentions of this kind, those things which the VV. object readily fall of themselves.

Concina (De Eucharistia, diss. 2, ch. 6, sec. 2, no. 16) speaks thus on this matter: Nor do I see how this can be excused from the appearance of base commerce. For this exchange of days and Masses tends to produce greater gain. The sole end of the exchange is commerce. The meaning is somewhat obscure, for the word mercimonium of itself signifies the same as merchandise. But the VV. bring assistance by interpreting appearance as semblance, and by understanding base commerce (p. 387) as base gain. Meanwhile, it is sufficiently astonishing that in former times no one saw this baseness until Concina at last brought some light into the world! The VV. note (loc. cit.) that few of the Authors have touched upon this question. But since both the VV. themselves and St. Alphonsus (as they themselves admit) found nothing to disapprove in this exchange of Masses, is it not evident that the matter was scarcely treated by anyone for this reason, namely, that there was no ground for calling its uprightness into doubt? But let us come more closely to the point.

Let it now pass that, as we have said, other causes are often present on account of which this exchange of intentions happens to be requested; nor, moreover, is it customary to inquire which priest accepted the larger stipend. But why, finally, is it base gain? Concina answers: because greater gain is sought; and the VV.: because he seeks another priest lest he lose a julius. But what if a priest wishes to preserve the larger stipend, which he thinks has been offered to him by divine providence, so that he may bring assistance to a sick person, or help a needy old woman, or buy a moral work of St. Alphonsus either for himself or to give to another priest? For, with St. Alphonsus approving, it is honorable to exchange an intention while retaining one's own stipend. But to will to use an honorable means for assisting the poor is also honorable. Where, then, is the baseness? But if the VV., with Concina, imagine that it is done inordinately, namely, for a less honorable end, then certainly the end of the agent accidentally adjoined will be called depraved, but not the work considered in itself.

The VV. add (loc. cit.): In the Note the weight of authority is vaunted, but which authorities these are is not indicated.

Reply. The fact that throughout so many centuries there existed only the most rigorous Concina (as St. Alphonsus says), who found here the guilt of base commerce, as he calls it, already proves more than sufficiently that against him stood both those who touched upon the question and those who, by the very fact that they raised no question about it, taught that none was to be raised. Did not St. Alphonsus also (as the VV. admit) find no guilt in this matter unless recourse is had to some inordinate end by which the priest might perhaps be moved? And does not the suffrage of all against Concina alone have some weight of authority?

The VV. insist (loc. cit.), saying that they wonder that in the Note it is remarked as less coherent that Concina excepted the case of a poor priest, as though poverty could remove the appearance of base gain. For, say the VV., if a poor priest does this, he acts not as moved by desire for gain, but in order to provide for necessity; and then the appearance of base gain is in fact removed.

Reply. This excuse of Concina confirms what was said above: that the act which, considered in itself, can be judged indifferent should not generally be presented as culpable, since it can become good or bad according to the diversity of the end.

For poverty alone cannot furnish a priest with an honorable end on account of which he may honorably judge that the stipend offered to him is to be preserved for his own uses. But that an act of this kind, honorable in itself, should be painted with those terms full of odium, gain and commerce, ought indeed to have been left to Concina's heated imagination; for verbal sallies of this kind are not to be regarded as theological reasons.

The VV. add (loc. cit.) that they do not know whence it was established that devout and prudent priests most commonly observe a practice disapproved by St. Alphonsus.

Reply. Whoever is not a stranger in this world plainly knows that occasions are not infrequent for exchanging an intention among priests so that the will of one offering a stipend for a Mass to be celebrated on a stated day may be satisfied. Yet when devout and prudent priests act thus, they do not observe a practice painted by Concina's fervid genius with the colors of base gain and commerce, but the practice which the VV. themselves testify was not disapproved by the Holy Doctor Alphonsus.

Finally, the VV. recall that in the year 1860 the S. Congregation of the Council replied concerning certain doubts about Mass stipends: Let the petitioner consult theologians, especially St. Alphonsus de Liguori and Benedict XIV, and conform himself to their opinions.

Reply 1. The present question is by no means found among the doubts proposed to the Sacred Congregation. Therefore, this does not pertain to the matter. 2. Do not the VV. themselves admit that this practice is not disapproved by St. Alphonsus?

The second opinion affirms it, with Lacroix, no. 134, and others.

373. QUESTION 11. How are Masses to be assessed for the saying of which a testator left a certain sum of money? Reply. They are to be assessed according to the custom of the place or the diocesan law in force for private Masses. But if the testator himself fixed the stipend below the custom of the place or the standard of the accepted rate, the number of Masses is to be reduced by the Ordinary according to due proportion. - Thus the S. Congregation established, as cited by St. Ligorius, no. 320. - Gousset, no. 295.

QUESTION 12. Can wealthy priests accept a stipend?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that every laborer, whether rich or poor, is worthy of his hire, as Christ Himself says, Luke 10:7, and according to the Apostle, 1 Cor. 9:13. Besides, if they could not accept a stipend, and on the other hand they are not bound to celebrate without a stipend, since there is no law obliging them to celebrate in this way, the faithful would often be unable to obtain Masses. This is established, moreover, from the practice of the universal Church. - St. Lig. and others commonly.

374. QUESTION 13. Can the editor of a religious periodical accept from a priest who is a subscriber a certain number of Masses to be celebrated in place of the annual subscription price?

Reply. Affirmatively. This is established from a Declaration of the S. Penitentiary. For when the editor of a certain religious periodical had asked the S. Penitentiary whether he could with a safe conscience give his periodical to priests on the condition that they celebrate a number of Masses corresponding to the price paid by others for the periodical, the S. Penitentiary, on Oct. 6, 1862, having maturely considered the aforesaid doubt, replied: Affirmatively, provided that the Masses are celebrated.

Consequently, it is not unlawful to give books on matters pertaining to Religion in return for Masses to be celebrated, provided that equality is preserved between the stipends of the Masses and the price of the works. For the same reasoning applies both to a periodical sheet published, for example, every month, and to complete works that are published and disseminated at one time.

375. QUESTION 14. Can a priest, for the dissemination of good books, buy them by means of a stipend equivalent to certain Masses to be celebrated by him, and afterward sell them at the current price in the book trade, so that he receives a notable profit from it?

Reply. Negatively, because any trading on the occasion of Masses to be celebrated is prohibited on account of the appearance of base gain [5]. This is also established from the response of the S. Penitentiary on Nov. 19, 1863. For when the following questions had been proposed: 1. Can a priest, under the pretext of disseminating religious books, with a safe conscience buy them and afterward sell them at the current price among booksellers, so that he gains twenty, thirty, or forty percent? 2. Can he accept Mass stipends for books sold, and gratuitously offer the buyer books proportionate to the profit received? 3. Can the same priest sell the aforesaid books to other priests who lack Mass stipends, with the obligation of celebrating Masses corresponding to the price of these books, so that he himself obtains a profit of thirty, forty, or fifty percent?

[5] According to the resolution of the preceding question, it is equivalent whether you pay a price for acquiring books or assign the stipends of Masses to be celebrated by you. Therefore, the circumstance of books which are acquired by assigning Mass stipends has no bearing here. The reason of baseness, therefore, is to be sought in the trading which is prohibited to clerics by the sacred canons.

 From this, when the doubt was proposed whether those act unlawfully who, for Masses celebrated, receive books or other merchandise in place of a stipend, every appearance of trading or base gain being excluded, the S. Congregation of the Council replied on Sept. 9, 1874: Negatively.

The S. Penitentiary, having maturely considered the aforesaid doubts, replied that every kind of trading or commerce relative to Masses to be celebrated is prohibited to priests by Canon Law, and especially by the Constitution Apostolicae servitutis of Benedict XIV. But if any doubt remains for the aforesaid priest, let him submit it to the S. Penitentiary [6].

[6]  The responses of the S. Congregation of the Council of Sept. 9, 1874, pertain here.

1. Does it savor of base commerce, and therefore is it to be disapproved and, if necessary, restrained by Bishops even with ecclesiastical penalties, when booksellers or merchants act in such a manner that, by employing public inducements and rewards, or in any other way, they collect alms for Masses and repay the priests to whom they entrust the celebration of them not with money but with books or other merchandise? The S. Congregation replied: Affirmatively.

2. Can this manner of acting be rendered honorable either because, without any diminution being made, as many Masses are entrusted for celebration by the aforesaid collectors as correspond to the alms collected, or because by it assistance is given to poor priests who lack Mass alms? The S. Congregation replied: Negatively.

3. Are collections and disbursements of alms of this kind also then to be disapproved and restrained by Bishops, as above, when the profit derived from the exchange of merchandise for alms is expended not for the collectors' own benefit, but for the use and increase of pious institutions and good works? The S. Congregation replied: Affirmatively.

4. Do those participate in base commerce, and therefore are they to be disapproved and also restrained, as above, who hand over to booksellers, merchants, and other collectors of them the alms for Masses received from the faithful or from pious places, whether or not they receive anything from them by way of reward? The S. Congregation replied: Affirmatively.

5. Do those participate in base commerce, and therefore are they to be disapproved and restrained, as above, who receive from the said booksellers and merchants books or other merchandise for Masses to be celebrated, whether at a reduced or full price? The S. Congregation replied: Affirmatively.

But then, you will say, how do these Resolutions, and especially this fifth one, cohere with those cited above (no. 374 and the Note), one of which proceeded from the S. Penitentiary and the other from the same S. Congregation of the Council, and indeed on the same day, Sept. 9, 1874?

Reply. The Responses cohere very well with one another when account is taken of the grave disadvantages which can be present or absent. For, as had to be noted in discussing these matters, first of all the intention of those who offer Mass stipends must not be neglected. Certainly, if the faithful offering Mass stipends granted the faculty that those Masses could be celebrated by priests who were going to subscribe to periodicals, there would be no doubt that the editors of the periodicals acted lawfully. For it belongs to those offering to prescribe not only the celebration, but also the time, place, and persons of the celebration; but only those who hand over adventitious Masses can grant the faculty that the sacred rites be performed by others without limitation of time or places. But it not rarely happens that even perpetual Masses, and Masses from distant regions as well, are handed over to the editors of periodicals. In that case, unless those who founded or bequeathed them permitted them to be offered at any time and place, those who transmit them altogether lack that faculty. Moreover, the mind of pious founders, whose devotion is generally directed toward some Sanctuary or Church, is not easily presumed unless it has been expressed. From these things it is evident how greatly unbecoming it is that editors of periodicals, by their own authority, entrust Masses for celebration to whomever, wherever, and whenever it pleases them, as though they were the owners of the alms and could disburse them at will. And this manner of acting will appear still more to be disapproved if it is observed that, in order to be able to satisfy those requesting them, these editors must necessarily gather for themselves not some small number of Masses, but an immense accumulation of them, contrary to the mind of Benedict XIV, who in the Apostolic Constitution beginning Quanta cura disapproves collections of Masses of this kind, since innumerable disadvantages can arise from them. Among these, this must be noted above all: it is impossible for so many obligations undertaken to be satisfied within a short time.

The response of the Sacred Congregation, which is related on page 258 concerning the Decree of the Bishop of Caltanissetta, ought to be read thus: THE DOUBT HAVING BEEN REFORMULATED - Whether, and how, a response is to be made to the Bishop of Caltanissetta in the case? - Negatively in all respects, to both.

For the Decree of the aforesaid Bishop, by which it was forbidden that Masses to be celebrated should be entrusted or accepted in exchange for books or journals, etc., had in view the averting of certain inconveniences, which the Sacred Congregation also disapproves.

Therefore, the Sacred Congregation did not wish to disapprove that Decree; but it gave the aforesaid Response to the twofold doubt proposed by the same Bishop, whether, those inconveniences having been removed, both those entrusting and those accepting Masses to be celebrated as above would act illicitly.

Indeed, to the doubt again proposed to the same Sacred Congregation: Whether, and how, editors or administrators of religious periodicals are to be disapproved who entrust Masses to priests for celebration, retaining from their alms a price corresponding to the periodicals themselves, in the case? In May of the current year 1875, the response was: Negatively, provided that nothing be withdrawn from the will of the founders or offerers concerning the amount of the stipend and the place and time of the celebration of the Masses; that every deliberate collection of alms for Masses be excluded; and that testimony of the completed celebration of the Masses be given to the one to whom it is due by right. In this Response of the Sacred Congregation, the disadvantages on account of which the same Sacred Congregation had otherwise disapproved this practice are indicated at the same time.

376. QUESTION 15. Can administrators of churches retain something for themselves from the alms for Masses for the expenses of altars, lights, etc.? Reply. Negatively, unless the churches have no other revenues; and then the value of the expenses which are necessary for the Sacrifice of the Mass itself must in no way be exceeded [7]. - Thus the S. Congregation of the Council established (as cited by Lacroix, no. 95, and St. Lig., no. 322). An archpriest, however, is not bound to furnish utensils to adventitious celebrants unless their expenses are paid. - Thus the S. Congregation on March 18, 1686. - St. Lig., no. 322.

[7] The Decree also adds the following: And nevertheless, even in that case care must be taken that, from the monies which remain after the expenses have been deducted as above, absolutely as many Masses be celebrated as were prescribed by those offering the alms.

QUESTION 16. Must one make restitution who, having accepted a stipend to celebrate Mass at a privileged altar, celebrates it at another altar?

Reply. It seems that the answer is negative; but he will be bound to gain a plenary indulgence applicable to the dead, such as the indulgences of the Way of the Cross, etc. For in this way a proportionate compensation is furnished. If, however, he accepted for this purpose a stipend larger than the ordinary one, he is bound to restore the excess. - Thus St. Lig., no. 229. - Elbel, no. 210. - Sporer, nos. 137 and 355.

But if anyone accepts a stipend to celebrate in a certain place, for example, at a miraculous Statue, or in a Chapel so that the people may hear Mass, or at a certain time, for example, on Saturday in honor of the Blessed Virgin, in such a way that the place and time are intended in themselves, he cannot retain the stipend unless he has said Mass at the prescribed time and place [8]. The reason is that otherwise the one giving the stipend is judged to be gravely unwilling. But it is otherwise if the time and place are not intended in themselves.

[8] This last clause will perhaps appear somewhat too severe; for the will of one who establishes agreements of this kind does not seem generally to be extended to that degree. This is also confirmed by the doctrine proposed in the following Question 18.

377. QUESTION 17. Must one who is bound by a stipend to celebrate at a privileged altar for a deceased person say a Requiem Mass when the rite permits it?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that this is required for gaining the indulgences. But on days on which Requiem Masses are prohibited, the priest gains the indulgences by saying the Mass of the day, as has been declared several times by the Sacred Congregation. Thus to the question: Whether those who celebrate at a privileged altar on individual days must always use black vestments on days not impeded, in order to obtain the indulgence of the privilege? The S. Congregation of Rites replied affirmatively on April 11, 1840 [9]. - St. Lig., no. 339.

[9] According to another response of the same Sacred Congregation, the priest, in order to gain the indulgence, must wait for a day on which he can celebrate a Requiem Mass, provided, however, that a day of this kind occurs within the same week.

QUESTION 18. Does one who is bound by a stipend to say a Requiem or votive Mass satisfy if he says another Mass?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that the Mass is the same as regards its substance; and if a just reason is present, there will be no sin. Hence, if the Rubrics do not permit a Requiem or votive Mass to be said on that day, the Mass of the day must be said, and in this way the obligation is truly satisfied. But one who does this without a legitimate reason cannot be excused from venial sin; nor is private devotion regarded as a sufficient reason. - Thus St. Lig., no. 328, etc.

QUESTION 19. Can a stipend be received for a Mass to be celebrated on the day of the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed?

Reply. Affirmatively. The reason is that not all priests are bound on this day to apply Mass for all the dead; indeed, neither are they obliged to celebrate. Therefore, they can apply Mass at will, either for all the dead dwelling in Purgatory or for some only. This is established from the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Aug. 4, 1663. This being so, nothing whatever prevents a stipend from being accepted for the Mass. - Thus commonly, St. Lig., no. 338 [10].

[10]  A question is commonly raised concerning a priest who applies the Mass for the one who first offers a stipend. On this matter St. Alphonsus writes (Lib. 6, no. 337): Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 13, no. 137) and Palaus (tr. 22, q. unica, punct. 6) say that the application of the Mass made for the first offerer is valid, but unlawful by reason of the prohibition of Clement VIII, which Paul V promulgated on Nov. 15, 1605, forbidding this custom as dangerous under several titles, liable to scandals of the faithful, and too greatly at variance with the ancient custom of the Church. But more probably, as Croix rightly says, bk. 6, part 2, no. 222, such an application will be not only unlawful, but often invalid, because it will often happen that the Mass is then said for a cause which does not yet exist, for example, if a stipend is offered for liberation from prison, from infirmity, etc. Since that cause is not now present, the effect of the Mass would have to remain suspended, which does not seem credible.

But on this matter La Croix deceived St. Alphonsus when he imagined Lugo to be contrary to him, although Lugo otherwise hands down the same doctrine as he. Behold the words of Lugo (loc. cit.): Concerning the application of the Mass under that condition (namely, for the one whom God already now foresees will offer the first stipend to him, etc.), there are two sufficiently common opinions, the one conceding that it is valid, the other denying it.... Diana with others follows the latter..., many of whom, however, do not speak of that case, but of the anticipated application of a Mass for the one who afterward will come first, without referring the condition to the knowledge of God already present. And indeed, if the former opinion is understood with a certain moderation, namely, that the priest applies today's Mass not indifferently for whoever will first come and offer a stipend, but for the first one whom God already sees will offer a stipend for a Mass to be said for some necessity already existing at that time, namely, for someone already now deceased, and not for a necessity which will arise afterward, then, speaking speculatively, there is nothing which prevents the validity of such an application, as the adversaries themselves seem to admit.

Moreover, this very thing is what, after Vasquez, Aversa, etc., neither Croix nor St. Alphonsus rejects, provided, namely, that the cause for which the stipend will later be offered already exists now. Indeed, since Lugo (loc. cit., nos. 138, 139) judges that even the case in which he himself thinks the application valid is included in that prohibition of Clement VIII, or rather of Paul V, and since he himself finds other disadvantages in an anticipated application of this kind, he can perhaps appear more severe even than St. Alphonsus, who, after Collet, seems in no way to disapprove this anticipated application (loc. cit., no. 337, at the end).

Appendix. For Priests of the Society of Jesus

378. I. A priest of the Society can accept a stipend neither for himself nor for another for the Masses which he says. The same is to be observed also concerning any other sacred ministries. This is established throughout the Institute of the Society. See especially the Epitome, new ed., p. 185. - Lacroix, bk. 4, p. 136.

II. If money is offered for Masses to a priest of the Society or to a Community, it can be admitted through the Superior, not indeed with an obligation, but with a promise of saying, under the title of gratitude, some Masses, or even one or another in individual years. Thus Castropalao. Burghaber, cent. 3, case 25, testifies that Mutius Vitelleschi, the General, so declared. - Lacroix, bk. 6, part 2, no. 146.

III. Likewise, money liberally offered can be accepted, and in turn Masses can be liberally promised, yet in such a way that the latter promise is not as though a compensation or reciprocal payment, as if for stipends, but the money is admitted under the title of alms alone, so that the offerer plainly understands that it cannot be accepted under another title and gives it himself under this same title of alms. - Lacroix, bk. 6, part 2, no. 146.

379. Hence you will resolve. - 1. A priest of the Society to whom money is offered for Masses to be said can tell the offerer that he will say the Masses gratuitously according to his intention, and in turn ask him to will liberally to apply the money offered to this or that pious cause. Thus the offerer will have a twofold fruit: namely, the ordinary fruit of the Mass, and then the fruit of cooperation in that pious cause. - Thus expressly Lacroix, ibid.

2. Titius, a priest of the Society, can say Masses according to the intention of Sempronius, a secular priest who accepted stipends for Masses to be said, when the latter can neither restore them, as having been consumed, nor satisfy for all the Masses; because in these circumstances Titius is judged to celebrate the Masses gratuitously from pure charity, as Lacroix, bk. 4, no. 138, gathers from a declaration of Claudius Aquaviva.

3. If Titius, a priest of the Society, does not indeed receive a stipend, but nevertheless disposes concerning it, for example, if he says to Caius: Give the stipend to this poor man, and I will say Mass according to your intention; or if he says to Sempronius: You accept the stipend, and I will say Mass in your place; he acts unlawfully, because while he thus disposes concerning the stipend through a contract facio ut des, he virtually accepts the stipend and gives it again to another. Each of these is contrary to the vow of poverty [1]. - Pellizzarius. - Lacroix, bk. 4, no. 138. - Sanchez, etc.

[1] Understand the first case in this way: that Titius imposes a strict obligation upon Caius by that agreement; for if he merely asks that Caius do this from liberality, we fall back upon what was defined in the first Resolution and is defined again in Resolution 5. But with regard to the second case, according to the opinion of Michael Vasquez, John Salas, and Castropalao against Sanchez (see Lacroix, bk. 4, no. 139), the reason for the unlawful disposition readily ceases when Titius, having been asked by Sempronius to celebrate some Mass, does this liberally, caring nothing and asking nothing about whether Sempronius has accepted stipends for those Masses or whether he retains them for himself, etc. Some are moved rather by this: by what title Sempronius retains stipends perhaps accepted. But this difficulty also, which otherwise does not at all touch the cause of Titius celebrating Masses gratuitously, has an easy solution. For the one giving the stipends requires this one thing from Sempronius: that he assume the burden of the Masses to be celebrated. But whether he satisfies either by himself or through another, and whether this other celebrates either after exacting a stipend or gratuitously, he does not care, unless perhaps he chose Sempronius to celebrate the Masses because, as the cited Lacroix says, he is believed to say them more devoutly.

4. If Paul, a man of the Society, supplies for a Chaplain bound by a foundation in singing Mass, he sins in no way, although the Chaplain receives his revenues, because Paul disposes concerning nothing. The same is to be said if he preaches, or otherwise exercises an office for someone who receives the customary honoraria from it. - Lacroix, bk. 4, no. 139.

380. 5. If Sempronius, a parish priest who has already accepted a stipend, asks Titius, a priest of the Society, to supply for him in saying Mass, Titius will lawfully supply, provided that he disposes concerning nothing of the stipend. - Lacroix, bk. 4, no. 139. - Vasquez. - Salas. - Castropalao, against Sanchez. The reason is that the stipend is not even virtually received by Titius, since he disposes concerning nothing of it, and it is altogether indifferent to the one who gave the stipend by whomsoever the Mass is said. This is confirmed: if Titius, being about to go to Paris, were gratuitously to carry letters in favor of Sempronius, for the carrying of which Sempronius had been hired for a wage, Titius certainly would not act against poverty, nor would he be judged to acquire the wage for himself and donate it to Sempronius. Therefore, it is similar in our case. - Lacroix, ibid.

You will say: Sempronius has no right or title to retain those stipends except by means of the Masses of Titius; therefore, Titius, by saying the Masses, confers upon him the right and title to retain the stipends, and consequently it is the same as if he accepted the stipends and gave them to Sempronius.

Reply. I deny the antecedent; for Sempronius has the right and title to retain them by force of the innominate contract do ut facias, by which he is bound to have the Masses said either by himself or through another. But he is relieved of this burden by Titius, who merely supplies the Masses as a condition without which Sempronius could not enjoy that right and title of retaining the stipends. - Lacroix, ibid.

You will say again: At least Decree VIII of Congregation XII stands in the way, prohibiting the General himself from applying the Masses which are celebrated according to his intention... by priests of the Society, according to the intention of any other person who could derive gain from it.

Reply. I deny the antecedent; for in positive matters an inference from the greater or from an equal does not hold. But reasons are present why these things are prohibited to the General but not to others, for example, the necessities of the Society, etc. Therefore, that Decree has no bearing with regard to others. - Lacroix, ibid.

QUESTION. What obligation exists in the Society with regard to Masses or prayers customarily enjoined?

Reply 1. Religious of the Society who do not discharge the prayers and Masses enjoined do not sin, speaking per se, because no precept is strictly imposed, nor is there any obligation other than from the Rule, which of itself does not bind under sin. - Suarez and others commonly. Nevertheless, Superiors will sin if through negligence they do not take care that persons be designated to celebrate Masses or pray, especially for benefactors and founders. Thus it was answered at Rome in the year 1604. But those who have the Masses which they themselves are to say said by others do not satisfy the Rule, because it is a personal burden. - Thus it was answered to the Province of the Rhine in the year 1634 [2]. Nevertheless, one satisfies by asking another to celebrate in his place today or this week, while he himself is to compensate on another day or in another week. Likewise, those satisfy who, foreseeing a difficulty for the following week, anticipate the Masses in the preceding week. - Lacroix, bk. 6, part 2, no. 168.

[2] The law in force in the Society is that responses of the Superior General to the requests of a certain Province, unless they are duly promulgated or communicated elsewhere, have force only for that Province to which they were given.

Reply 2. Masses enjoined for deceased members of the Society do not bind under mortal sin, whether they are determined by the general Constitutions of the Order, by particular Rules, or by the prescription of Superiors. The reason is that these have only the character of a simple command, unless a precept of obedience is added. - Thus according to the judgment of all, as Pellizzarius testifies, vol. 1, tr. 5, ch. 9, no. 12. - Lacroix, ibid., no. 169 [3].

[3] The Author transcribed these words literally from Lacroix, and Lacroix from Pellizzarius; but he presented the latter's text in a mutilated form. For Pellizzarius in that place gives this reason: Because the prescription of these suffrages commonly does not exceed the obligation of a simple Rule or of obedience, and consequently has the character of a simple ordinance. Then he adds that these things are gathered from Suarez (De Religione, tr. 10, bk. 8, ch. 2, no. 5), who therefore infers that these obligations do not bind under sin. Therefore, even an express obligation under venial sin is excluded, and only the obligation of the Rule remains, which of itself does not bind under sin.

Reply 3. Masses affixed to a time, for example, those which ought to be said every week or every month, if they could not be celebrated at that time because of an impediment or illness, do not necessarily have to be supplied afterward, but can be omitted. Thus it was answered to the Province of the Rhine in the year 1585. On the contrary, if they were omitted through negligence, they ought afterward to be supplied. - Thus it was answered to the Province of Toulouse in the year 1629. - Lacroix, ibid., no. 171.

Reply 4. If Masses or prayers are enjoined without a definite time, it is sufficient to say them within two or three months. - Thus it was answered to the Province of Naples in the year 1603. - Lacroix, ibid., no. 172.

Chapter IV. On the Time and Place of Celebration

Article I. On the Time of Celebration

381. Principles. - I. It is lawful to celebrate daily, and indeed this is praiseworthy, unless the unworthiness of the celebrant or a special prohibition of the Church stands in the way. The Church prohibits Mass from being celebrated on the day of Parasceve, or Friday of Holy Week; likewise, it prohibits several Masses from being offered in the same church on Thursday and Saturday of the same Week without necessity. This is established from various Decrees of the Congregation of Rites [1]. - St. Lig., no. 350.

[1] These Decrees provide that no private Mass be said in churches besides the conventual Mass. By these decrees, however, it is not prohibited that in churches of Regulars who lack a private oratory, another Mass be celebrated on Thursday of Holy Week for distributing Easter Communion to the sick. It is prescribed, however, that this be done with the doors closed.

It is not ordinarily lawful, apart from a special privilege, to celebrate before dawn or after midday, nor before the recitation of the Matins of the Office [2]. For it is thus stated in the Rubrics of the Missal: A private Mass can be said, at least after Matins and Lauds, at any hour from dawn until midday. It is lawful, however, to begin Mass before dawn, provided that it is not completed before dawn. It is likewise lawful to prolong the celebration beyond midday, provided that it is at least begun at midday; for the time of dawn and midday is to be understood not mathematically, but morally. - St. Lig., no. 341, and others.

[2] This clause from sec. XV regards not the hour of celebrating commonly prescribed for priests, but the order to be observed between the recitation of the Breviary and the celebration of Mass for canons who sing in choir. Therefore, it is added in the same place when the Mass must otherwise be celebrated after the recitation of Prime, or Terce, or Sext. But with regard to the other Rubric (sec. 1, De ritu servando, etc.), where it is said: The priest who is to celebrate Mass... after at least Matins together with Lauds has been completed, should devote himself somewhat to prayer, and should say the prayers placed below according to the opportunity of the time; it could be observed that, just as no one until now has judged a privilege necessary for omitting the prayers in question, so it could not absurdly be thought concerning the recitation of Matins by force of that context.

III. In like manner, a privilege of celebrating one hour before dawn or after midday ought to be understood as one hour before or after the time assigned to others who are not privileged; otherwise the privilege would be of little benefit. - Thus St. Lig., no. 346, and others commonly.

382. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does one who celebrates before dawn or after midday sin gravely?

Reply. Affirmatively, if he anticipates or prolongs by much the time established by the Church; but otherwise, if the change is slight. Indeed, if a just cause is present, he will be free from every fault. But what is to be regarded as a notable change is disputed. According to the more common and more probable opinion, it is not held grave unless the celebration is begun a full hour before or after the established time. - St. Lig., no. 346.

QUESTION 2. When is it lawful to anticipate the time of celebration?

Reply. 1. In necessity, for example, so that Viaticum may be administered to a dying person, in which case it would be lawful to celebrate even at midnight. 2. Where there is a reasonable custom, for example, so that artisans and servants may be able to hear Mass very early in the morning. 3. By force of a privilege granted by the Pope or Bishop [3]. - See St. Lig., no. 343 et seq.

[3] St. Alphonsus (Lib. 6, no. 344) adds other cases, namely: 1. After the solemn Mass on a feast, if the solemn Mass is prolonged to an hour or more after midday, and indeed probably even after two hours..., lest a large part of the people be deprived of Mass. 2. For the cause of a journey, for one hour after midday or before dawn. 3. Likewise on account of the funeral of some great person, or of a sermon, or of a public supplication.

QUESTION 3. What kind of sin is it to celebrate Mass before the recitation of Matins?

Reply. More probably, it is only a venial sin, because no grave disorder appears in this, unless it is done from contempt and habitually without any cause. But any reasonable cause excuses from every sin. - Thus St. Lig. with others commonly [4].

[4] St. Alphonsus (Lib. 6, no. 347) says that there are three opinions of the Doctors concerning this question. The second of them holds that there is no fault in this, because no law appears which prescribes it under fault; and the rubric is only of counsel, not of precept. See the preceding Note.

383. QUESTION 4. Is it lawful to celebrate more than once in a day?

Reply. Negatively, speaking generally, according to the present practice of the Church, although formerly it was not prohibited. This is established from various places of Canon Law and from the Decree of Benedict XIV of March 16, 1746.

Except: 1. The feast of the Nativity of the Lord, on which it is lawful to celebrate three Masses. 2. If a pastor, before the ablution, is informed that Communion is to be given to a sick person, and he has already consumed his own Host, and no other fasting priest can be found. Thus commonly. - St. Lig., no. 351.

QUESTION 5. When is it lawful to celebrate Mass twice in a day with the permission of the Bishop?

Reply. With the Bishop permitting, Mass can be celebrated twice by the same priest on Sundays and feast days of precept if a grave cause or some necessity requires it, but not on account of custom alone. - Benedict XIV, Const. Declarasti nobis, and Const. Consuluisti de celebratione Missae. But the abuse of celebrating twice in the same church in which several Masses had already been offered was reproved by the S. Congregation of Rites, and the response was: It is not expedient, and the abuse is to be eliminated. - May 22 and Sept. 11, 1841.

QUESTION 6. When is there judged to be a necessity of celebrating twice in a day? Reply. In three cases, according to the common opinion of theologians, namely: 1. When a parish priest has two parishes to govern, and the inhabitants of one cannot go to the church of the other, nor is there available another priest who could celebrate in either one. 2. When in the same parish some part of the people is too far distant from the church and could easily assemble in some chapel or in another church; it was answered to the Bishop of Langres in the year 1847 that it was sufficient for this if a certain community consisting of twenty persons were one mile distant from the church. - Revue des sciences ecclesiastiques, vol. 6, July 1862, pp. 93-94. 3. When the whole people cannot assemble in a parish church that is too small, and there is no other priest who can celebrate another Mass; for then the Bishop can permit the parish priest to offer Mass twice in the same church. - See Bouix, De Parocho, no. 470. - Likewise Revue des sciences ecclesiastiques, ibid.

QUESTION 7. Can one who celebrates two Masses accept a doubled stipend?

Reply. Negatively; and Pius IX strictly prohibited this. - Thus the S. Congregation of the Council, Sept. 25, 1858, in una Galliarum. But does the supplement to his allowance, which is generally given to a priest celebrating two Masses in consideration of his fatigue, have the character of a stipend?

The S. Congregation of the Council replied negatively in March 1861.

QUESTION 8. In this case would it be lawful to accept a double stipend on the condition that the second stipend be expended for a pious use?

Reply. Negatively, without an Indult of the Supreme Pontiff, which the Pontiff indeed refused to grant to the Archbishop of Cologne. - Thus the S. Congregation of the Council, March 21, 1863.

384. QUESTION 9. Is it lawful on the night of the Nativity of the Lord to celebrate all three Masses before dawn?

Reply. Negatively, without the permission of the Bishop for a just cause, or without an Apostolic indult. For the Rubric of the Missal expressly prohibits this, which reads thus: The first Mass is said in the night; the second at dawn; and the third in the day. This is also established from the Decree of the S. Congregation of Rites issued on Dec. 18, 1702, which reads thus: It is not lawful at midnight of the Nativity of the Lord successively to celebrate the other two Masses and to distribute Holy Communion. - St. Lig., no. 343.

QUESTION 10. For what length of time ought a Low Mass to last?

Reply. The general rule is that the Mass ought neither to be longer than half an hour, lest those present be affected with weariness, nor shorter than a third of an hour, because otherwise it cannot be celebrated becomingly. But you will not excuse from mortal sin a priest who, in offering Mass, does not reach a quarter of an hour, according to that couplet received by custom:

> If your Mass shall have been shorter than one quarter, You will be believed guilty of mortal fault.

St. Ligorius adduces the reason: because in so short a space he must necessarily commit two grave defects, the one of grave irreverence toward the Sacrament, the other of grave scandal toward the people. But it is to be desired, and earnestly commended to all priests, that in offering Mass they complete half an hour [5].

[5] On this matter St. Alphonsus speaks thus (Lib. 6, no. 400): Preachers cry out, writers rightly teaching cry out, that the completion of Mass in less than a quarter of an hour cannot be excused from grave fault; but how many are there who take care to avoid these things? Corruption of this kind ought to be pursued not with the pen, but with tears, while daily we see the greatest part of priests perform this tremendous Sacrifice worse than they treat temporal affairs of lighter moment, yawning in such a way that they seem to have no faith in so great a mystery.

385. QUESTION 11. How much time, after Mass has been completed, ought to be spent in giving thanks to God?

Reply. There is no altogether certain rule. But the more lenient require at least a quarter of an hour. - St. Lig. earnestly advises that at least half an hour be devoted to this pious exercise by a priest, who ought to furnish an example to the faithful [6]. On this matter, see St. Alphonsus (Lib. 6, no. 400).

[6] Thus St. Alphonsus (Prax. Confess., no. 156): Let the Confessor take care to suggest to the penitent that after Communion he remain in thanksgiving for the time that he can. Very few are the Directors who diligently do this, namely, inculcate in their penitents that they give thanks for some notable time after receiving the Eucharist; and the reason is that there are very few priests who, after the Sacrifice of the Mass, remain with Jesus Christ in thanksgiving, and therefore they are ashamed to suggest to others what they themselves do not do. Thanksgiving ordinarily ought to last for a full hour; let it be done at least for half an hour, in which the soul may exercise itself in loving and petitioning. St. Teresa says that after Communion Jesus exists in the soul as upon a throne of mercy, that He may bestow graces upon it, saying: What wilt thou that I do to thee? And elsewhere: After Communion let us not omit so excellent an opportunity for conducting business. His divine Majesty is not accustomed to repay hospitality badly if He is well received in the soul.

Article II. On the Place of Celebration

386. Principles. - I. It is not commonly lawful to celebrate except in a church, and one consecrated or at least blessed, which is not polluted, execrated, or interdicted. This is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 22, Decree De observandis et vitandis in celebratione Missae.

Concerning a polluted and execrated church, see Questions 2 and 3 below. But concerning an interdicted church, we shall speak toward the end of the Treatise on Censures, no. 1002 et seq.

II. A Bishop can no longer, as formerly, grant the faculty of celebrating in private houses or in a private Oratory. Council of Trent, sess. 22, in the Decree just cited. This is also established from the declaration of the S. Congregation of the Council, May 27, 1617, and Jan. 23, 1847, in which it is said: It is not lawful for any Bishop to grant licenses of this kind, not even for a transient act; this faculty is reserved to the Roman Pontiff alone (Revue des Sciences ecclesiastiques, Sept. 1862, vol. 6, p. 265). Hence it follows that the doctrine of St. Ligorius, somewhat more favorable to Bishops, must be moderated [1]. An exception is made, however, if grave and urgent causes are present, and only by way of a transient act. - S. Congregation of the Council just cited, May 27, 1617, and Dec. 20, 1856.

[1] But I do not know why St. Alphonsus is said to favor Bishops beyond what is right in this matter. For (Lib. 6, no. 359) he attributes to Bishops the faculty of dispensing only in a case of necessity or for a just cause and by way of a transient act, and he affirms this with very weighty and altogether numerous Doctors preceding him, so that he was able to conclude that this doctrine could be called common. Moreover, this is the very thing which the Author also proposes in this place.

III. A Bishop can, however, grant the faculty of offering Mass in public Oratories and of performing there the other sacred functions which are not strictly parochial. Nevertheless, he cannot permit the Most Holy Eucharist to be reserved there without an Indult of the Pontiff, unless an immemorial custom is present: thus the S. Congregation, April 27, 1709. Regulars who profess solemn vows, however, have the privilege of reserving the Most Holy Eucharist in their churches.

387. Questions. - QUESTION 1. In which Oratories can Bishops give permission to celebrate?

Reply. They can permit this to be done in every religious and pious place. A religious place is said to be one in which works of piety and mercy are exercised and which has been erected by the authority of the Bishop or of another ecclesiastical Prelate. Such are monasteries, any religious Communities, Seminaries, etc. But a pious place is called one which is constituted and deputed for works of piety and mercy, even if without the authority of the Bishop or an ecclesiastical Prelate. Hence any Hospitals and Orphanages ought to be regarded as pious places, in which the Bishop can therefore permit the erection of an Oratory, even if places of this kind were erected and constituted by the civil power [2]. - Thus the S. Congregation of the Council, March 27, 1847. - Recall what was said about private and public Oratories, vol. 1, no. 348.

[2] Add also Oratories which are erected in prisons, although prisons are not customarily called pious places.

388. QUESTION 2. How is a church polluted, and how must it be reconciled?

Reply to the first. A church is polluted or violated when certain base or indecent actions injurious to the sacred place are exercised in it, on account of which it is considered indecent that the immaculate Victim be offered there and the divine Offices celebrated until it is reconciled.

Therefore, a church is polluted: 1. By voluntary and unjust homicide [3]. 2. By the shedding of human blood from a blow or a gravely injurious wound. 3. By the voluntary emission of human semen [4]. 4. By the burial of an unbaptized person or infidel. Except, more probably, if he is a catechumen, because he is not regarded as an infidel. Likewise, if it is an infant whose parents are Christians, because then the parents desire Baptism for him. - Thus Pichler. - Gousset, no. 310, against others. 5. By the burial of a baptized person excommunicated by name; but not if he is indeed excommunicated but is not to be avoided. These things are established from Canon Law. - See St. Lig., no. 362. But in order that a church be regarded as polluted, these crimes must be notorious, so that they can in no way be concealed. They must also be perpetrated in the church itself, and not merely in the tower, roof, sacristy, or other rooms adjoining the church. - St. Lig., nos. 362 and 364.

[3] The VV. rightly observe (p. 933, no. 99) that it must be sought from Busembaum (Lib. 6, tr. 3, ch. 3, dub. 4, res. 1) how far unjust homicide extends in this place. Busembaum, from Lugo, speaks thus: A church, as also a cemetery, is violated or polluted... 1. By homicide committed in it which is mortally evil or injurious, at least to the immunity of the Church, such as even that which would otherwise be just by the sentence of a judge, unless, however, a disturber of the Republic could not otherwise be apprehended.

[4] Understand an emission unlawful either in itself or by reason of the sacred place. Therefore, it would not be polluted by marital intercourse when a just cause for having it was present, for example, to avoid incontinence. See what was said elsewhere, where Sacrilege was treated.

389. Reply to the second. 1. If the church was only blessed, it can be reconciled by a priest delegated by the Bishop, with the customary prayers and with water blessed by the Ordinary. If, however, such water could not easily be obtained, it could be blessed by the priest himself delegated to reconcile the church. - St. Lig., no. 363 [5].

[5] St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), as the VV. rightly observe (p. 933, no. 100), does not say that the water can be blessed by the priest himself if water blessed by the Ordinary cannot easily be obtained; but after other Authors he says absolutely: But the water can be blessed by the priest himself. Indeed, he adds, Benedict XIV, De Synodo, bk. 13, ch. 15, no. 2, says: If it (the church) was simply blessed, then the same Gregory IX (in Cap. Si Ecclesia, De Consecr. Eccl.) established that, without any delegation first obtained, a polluted church can be reconciled by a simple priest, using blessed water, which they call holy or lustral water.

2. But if that church was consecrated, it must be reconciled by the Bishop himself or by a priest delegated by the Pope, according to the rite of the Roman Pontifical. Nevertheless, if the divine Offices cannot be omitted without grave inconvenience, the Bishop, being detained by some impediment, can delegate a priest to bless the church with a simple blessing until he himself can consecrate it. - Cabassut, etc.

Private Oratories, however, although blessed and deputed for worship, are not regarded as capable of being polluted, and therefore do not need reconciliation.

390. QUESTION 3. How is a church execrated, or rendered fit for worship again? Reply 1. A church is execrated when it loses its blessing or consecration. It is regarded as execrated when it falls or is destroyed totally or for the greatest part, so that it must be rebuilt anew, at least for the greater part, or if all the plaster of the walls, or at least the greater part, is removed at the same time. - St. Lig., no. 368.

Reply 2. An execrated church must be blessed or consecrated again, according to the rite and form prescribed for the blessing or consecration of churches.

A fixed altar loses its consecration when the table or upper stone is removed from its support. - Thus the S. Congregation of Rites, May 15, 1819. Altars, whether portable or fixed, lose their consecration through the breaking of the sepulcher in which the sacred Relics are enclosed, or through the loss of those Relics. - S. Congregation of Rites, Sept. 23, 1848. Nor is it sufficient for other authentic Relics to be enclosed in them; rather, the altars must be consecrated anew. - Thus the S. Congregation of Rites, Dec. 7, 1844.

Finally, sacred vessels and other consecrated things are execrated when they lose their form and can no longer serve for their use.

From the things said, moreover, it is evident what the distinction is between the pollution of a church and its execration. When part of a church is polluted, the whole church is regarded as polluted, even together with the adjoining cemetery. On the contrary, when a church is execrated, the cemetery is not for that reason execrated, nor do fixed and intact altars lose their consecration.

Chapter V. On the Manner of Celebrating

Namely: 1. On the requisites for Mass. 2. On the Rubrics.

Article I. On the Requisites for Mass

391. These things are required: 1. A stone altar, fixed or portable, consecrated by the Bishop. 2. Three altar cloths made of linen or hemp. 3. Sacred vestments, that is, blessed by the Ordinary. 4. A consecrated chalice and paten. 5. A corporal of linen or hemp, blessed by the Ordinary. 6. A pall likewise of linen or hemp. 7. A linen purificator. 8. A Missal with a cushion. 9. A Crucifix, and not merely a cross. 10. Two lighted wax candles. 11. A burse, veil, hand towel, and glass cruets. 12. A male server.

The vestments to be blessed by the Ordinary are the amice, alb, maniple, stole, chasuble, and more probably also the cincture. The other paraments do not need a blessing. More probably, the pall must also be blessed together with the corporal; but the contrary is to be said concerning... the purificator, according to the decree of Sept. 7, 1816, apud Gardellini, IV, 4376. With regard to the altar cloths, see Question --. See St. Lig., from no. 376 to no. 389.

As regards candles, however, in private Masses it is not lawful to light more than two wax candles, unless a Bishop celebrates, or unless some extraordinary solemnity or the exposition of the Most Holy Sacrament requires a greater number. - De Herdt.

392. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must the altar cloths necessarily be blessed?

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is that this is prescribed in the Rubric; and whatever some may say, no sufficient reason appears for acting contrary to the Rubric, which lays down the following: Let the altar be covered with three cloths... blessed by the Bishop or by another having the faculty. To celebrate upon an unblessed cloth, however, does not exceed a venial fault; and therefore, when a reasonable cause urges, it is free from every fault, according to St. Lig., no. 375.

QUESTION 2. Is it mortal to celebrate without any sacred vestment, or without a stole, alb, chasuble, maniple, or cincture?

Reply 1. It is mortal to celebrate without any sacred vestment in every case and for any cause whatsoever. 2. Likewise, to celebrate without a chasuble or alb, or without both stole and maniple together. 3. It is probably not mortal to celebrate without a maniple, or without a blessed maniple. The same is true of celebrating without an amice, at least for those who do not use it to cover the head, but only the shoulders. The same must also be said of celebrating without a cincture [1]; hence a reasonable cause easily excuses from all these things.

[1] The Author seems to have taken these things from Busembaum (bk. 6, tr. 3, ch. 3, dub. 5, no. 3), who, after saying that Filliuccius concedes that, in a case of necessity, to celebrate without one or another of the minor vestments, for example, a stole or cincture, is not mortal, adds: See Diana, ... where, against Filliuccius and Henriquez, together with six others, he teaches it to be probable that, by reason of slightness of matter, one who, apart from scandal and contempt, omits one of these, namely, of the minor vestments, outside a case of necessity, can be excused from mortal sin. Now, since slightness of matter excuses from so great a sin, but not from every sin, Diana's opinion therefore comes to this: the omission of one of the minor vestments, apart from contempt and scandal, is a venial fault. But what Filliuccius concedes, namely, that in a case of necessity one does not sin mortally on this account, can, and indeed must, be understood as also excusing from venial sin. For it is not consonant with reason that a grave obligation should cease because of necessity, and nevertheless a light obligation remain. And those who, with Suarez (Disp. 82, sect. 3, dub. 1, at the end), maintain that grave men judge it not to be a mortal sin in a case of necessity to omit one or another of these vestments, especially the minor ones, such as the stole or cincture, seem to be understood in this way.

As regards, however, lightness of fault by reason of slightness of matter, St. Alphonsus also mentions the opinion of Escobar, who has the following (bk. 21, sect. 2, no. 485): I judge with the common opinion of the Doctors that the omission of any sacred vestment is sufficient matter for mortal sin.... Yet I acknowledge that the first opinion is sufficiently probable. For since the gravity of the obligation concerning this or that matter depends greatly upon the judgment of prudent men, and so many prudent men judge the obligation of wearing the cincture or maniple to be light, one can probably adhere to their judgment. The same Escobar reports the first opinion thus (loc. cit., no. 483): In every precept, especially a human one, slightness of matter excuses from mortal sin. Therefore, it will excuse in this precept, which is human and pertains not to the substance of the Sacrifice but to its adornment. And, after adducing the patrons of this opinion, he adds: These men consequently assert that to celebrate with an unblessed cincture or maniple is a venial sin by reason of slightness of matter. Lugo and Aversa judge this not improbable.

Finally, when Gury says at the end that a reasonable cause excuses from all these things, namely, from these venial faults, he seems to be understood as speaking of that necessity on account of which Suarez, as was said, likewise gave an excuse together with others. Indeed, Tamburini discusses this matter thus (Methodus celebrandi Missam, bk. 4, ch. 3, sec. 1, no. 4): The degree of necessity is not to be taken very strictly here. Therefore, the necessity of hearing and celebrating Mass on a feast day, fervor of devotion, and the temptation of an assailed will to be overcome by this remedy, and even, for a priest who is not wealthy, an opportunity of receiving an alms, will be more than sufficient, in the aforesaid slight matter, to excuse the celebrant even from venial sin. St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 377) does not disapprove this doctrine, but indeed presents it as probable.

Wherefore, this response of Gury agrees almost entirely with the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, which the VV. otherwise oppose (p. 955, no. 101). I said almost; for some disagreement appears only concerning the maniple. If in this matter it pleased Gury to follow the judgment of Suarez and of other grave Doctors, the VV. can certainly bear this with equanimity.

393. ○ QUESTION 3. Is the color of the vestments a matter of precept?

Reply. Affirmative, because all the Rubrics which concern the ceremonies accompanying the Mass are regarded as preceptive [2]. Nevertheless, this Rubric does not seem to bind under grave sin unless scandal is present, for example, if Mass were celebrated on Easter or another solemn day in black vestments. Hence a cause that is not very grave can excuse from this precept. - St. Lig., no. 378.

[2] St. Alphonsus indeed holds this general principle concerning the proper obligation of the Rubrics as the more probable opinion (bk. 6, no. 578, dub. 5); but, as we have said elsewhere, other Doctors deny this very principle. However that may be, a merely probable principle is not of such a kind that firmer conclusions can be deduced from it; here, therefore, we have a merely probable precept or obligation. Add, moreover, that St. Alphonsus himself (loc. cit.), in support of the opinion denying a strict obligation concerning the use of colors, adduces decidedly more Doctors than he does in support of the affirmative opinion. Moreover, the same St. Alphonsus, after Lacroix (bk. 6, part 2, no. 340), praises the opinion of Sporer, namely, that it is better on any day to celebrate Mass in any color than to omit it; hence, St. Alphonsus adds, Sporer rightly says that, a fortiori, every reasonable cause excuses. From this someone could conclude that, if you must celebrate a votive Mass in order to satisfy an obligation, but the rector of the church, in order to avoid an incongruous diversity of colors, as they are accustomed to object, refuses to give you suitable vestments, you can safely use the counsel of Sporer; especially because, although you hold that some precept has force here, the Author nevertheless also observes that a cause which is not very grave can excuse from it.

QUESTION 4. What colors are required in the vestments?

Reply. Vestments of white, red, green, violet, and black color are required. Vestments made from vitreous silken fabrics are entirely rejected. Thus the S. Congregation of Rites, Sept. 11, 1847, in Atrebatensi. Likewise rejected are vestments of various colors (in French, de toutes couleurs), which not a few persons maintain can be used on every feast because flowers of every color are intermingled in them. The S. Congregation of Rites prohibited these on Sept. 23, 1837; and thus they can represent only that color which is primary and predominant.

Vestments of yellow and blue color are entirely prohibited. - Thus the S. Congregation of Rites, Nov. 12, 1831. Vestments of cloth of gold (drap d'or) are permitted, however, and according to the usage of Rome they are employed for the colors white and red.

394. ○ QUESTION 5. Must the chalice and paten be consecrated under grave sin, or only under light sin; and from what material must they be fashioned?

Reply to the first. They must be consecrated under mortal sin, for the precept concerns a grave matter. - St. Lig., no. 379. - Gousset, no. 525.

Reply to the second. According to the present discipline, at least the cup of the chalice must be of gold, or of silver gilded within. In a case of necessity, however, a chalice of tin or copper could be used. The paten must be of gold, or of gilded silver.

QUESTION 6. Do the chalice and paten lose their consecration if the gilding is lost?

Reply. Affirmative [3]. Therefore, after being gilded anew, they need a new consecration. Thus from a recent Declaration of the S. Congregation of Rites, June 14, 1845. For when the Bishop of Liege asked whether a chalice and paten lose their consecration through being gilded anew, and thus need a new consecration, the S. Congregation replied: Affirmative, namely, that they lose it and need one according to the matters set forth. Thereby the controversy which previously existed is settled.

[3] By this absolute affirmation the Author does not seem to have wished so much to resolve the question concerning a chalice in the state in which its gilding has been lost, as concerning the state of that same chalice as it must again be perfected by the necessary regilding which it needs, namely, concerning the state into which it must necessarily pass. For otherwise it is sufficiently clear that the Doctors disagree among themselves on the question whether a chalice and paten, if their gilding is lost, remain by that very fact execrated; and the more common opinion is that which denies it. See St. Alph., bk. 6, no. 370, dub. 1 and 2.

It must be regarded as an abuse, however, for a Priest to wish to execrate the aforesaid sacred vessels before handing them to an artisan to be repaired or cast anew. Therefore, if there is need, they must be handed to him without the Priest attempting to execrate them either directly by hand or by means of some instrument. - Thus the S. Congregation of Rites in the general Decree of April 23, 1822.

395. ○ QUESTION 7. Must the alb, amice, altar cloths, corporal, purificator, and pall necessarily be of linen or hemp?

Reply. Affirmative as to all. Thus from the practice and precept of the Church. - Nevertheless, according to a general Decree of the S. Congregation of Rites, May 19, 1819, amices, albs, and altar cloths, if any made of cotton were possessed, could meanwhile be used until they were worn out; they were not, however, to be replaced except with ones of linen or hemp. It was prescribed, however, that, after the lapse of one month from the publication of the Decree, only corporals, palls, and purificators made of linen or hemp could be used.

396. ○ QUESTION 8. Must the pyx necessarily be consecrated?

Reply. Negative, according to the truer and common opinion. The reason is that in the Roman Ritual the blessing of a pyx is numbered among those things which do not require an anointing with chrism. - St. Lig., no. 384. In practice, however, according to the more probable opinion, it must be counseled that the pyx be blessed. For this is in conformity both with the Rubric and with reason.

The same must be said of the circle or lunule in which the consecrated Host is placed when it is exposed in the Monstrance. - St. Lig., no. 385.

QUESTION 9. What sin is it to celebrate with an unblessed corporal?

Reply. This cannot be excused from mortal sin unless a grave necessity of celebrating urges. In a case of necessity, however, one could even celebrate without a corporal. - Thus commonly. - St. Lig., no. 386. It is likewise mortal to use a very soiled corporal; but it is venial if it is not very soiled. Indeed, in a case of necessity, namely, if the precept of hearing Mass urges, there would be no sin. - St. Lig., no. 376.

397. ○ QUESTION 10. Is it mortal to celebrate without a pall, or with an unblessed pall?

Reply. It is controverted. The first probable opinion affirms it. The reason is that formerly the pall was the corporal itself with which the chalice was covered; hence, although it is now separate from the corporal, it is just as necessary as the corporal.

The second opinion, itself also probable, denies it. The reason is that today the same reason of reverence does not apply to the pall as to the corporal, which immediately touches the sacred Species. In a case of necessity, when a pall is lacking, the purificator or burse can be used to cover the chalice. - See St. Lig., no. 388.

QUESTION 11. Is it lawful to use a pall covered with silk cloth and interwoven with gold?

Reply. Affirmative. For although this is prohibited, nevertheless, at the request of several Bishops of France, it was conceded that it could be used. Hence, to the question: Notwithstanding the Decrees issued by the S. Congregation of Rites, is it lawful to use a pall covered on its upper part with silk cloth and interwoven with gold? the S. Congregation replied: It can be permitted, provided that the linen pall placed beneath covers the chalice, and the upper cloth is not black in color or bears any symbols of death. Jan. 10, 1852.

QUESTION 12. Must the purificator be blessed?

Reply. Negative, according to the more common and more probable opinion. The reason is that in the Ritual there is no proper blessing for a purificator, just as there is none for a veil or burse. Indeed, if a purificator cannot easily be obtained, it is probably lawful to celebrate without one, and in its place a clean small cloth can be used, which afterward must not be applied to profane use. - St. Lig., no. 589. - Suarez. - Gavantus, etc.

398. ○ QUESTION 13. What sin is it to celebrate without a server?

Reply. It is mortal according to all. Nevertheless, the Doctors commonly say that it is lawful to celebrate without a server when the necessity of administering Viaticum urges. Others likewise concede it so that the people may hear a Mass of precept. - Thus Lugo. - St. Lig., no. 319, etc. [4].

[4] Certain examples suggest, however, that the Roman Pontiff can dispense in this matter, and sometimes is accustomed to do so, even apart from the necessities noted in the text.

QUESTION 14. Can a Priest sometimes celebrate with a woman making the responses?

Reply. Affirmative, if necessity urges, especially among nuns, provided that the woman responds from a distance and does not directly serve at the altar by handing the cruets, etc.; for this could not be excused from mortal sin, because the Church entirely forbids women to serve the celebrant. - St. Lig., no. 392. - This is confirmed by a Decree of the S. Congregation, Aug. 26, 1836. For to a question of this kind: Can a Priest, after arranging beforehand in a convenient manner all the things which can be needed for the Sacrifice, so that women do not serve at the altar, use the service of a woman only for the responses? the Sacred Congregation of Rites replied: Affirmative, when necessity urges.

399. ○ QUESTION 15. Is it mortal to celebrate without a cross; and what kind of cross is required?

Reply to the first. Negative; for this does not appear to be grave. - Thus theologians commonly.

Reply to the second. The cross which is required in the celebration of Mass must not be small, but must rise above the candlesticks, so that the Priest and the people can easily and conveniently look upon it. Thus Benedict XIV, Constitution Accepimus, July 16, 1746. If a large statue of the Crucified is present on the altar at which Mass is celebrated, this suffices, and there is no need to add another cross in the midst of the candlesticks. - S. Congregation of Rites, June 16, 1683. - If Mass is celebrated at an altar where the Most Holy Sacrament is publicly exposed, the cross can be exposed or not exposed according to the custom of the place. - Thus Benedict XIV, On the Sacrifice of the Mass.

400. ○ QUESTION 16. What sin is it to celebrate without a light, and is it ever lawful?

Reply to the first. It is mortal to celebrate with no light at all. To celebrate with only one wax candle lighted, however, will be only venial. - From cap. Littera, sec. ult., de celebratione Missae. - St. Lig., no. 394.

Reply to the second. In one case alone it is lawful to perform the sacred rite without any light, namely, when the light is extinguished after the consecration has been completed and another cannot be obtained; for then the reason of completing the Sacrifice urges.

QUESTION 17. Is it lawful to celebrate with tallow candles, or with one wax light?

Reply to the first. Negative, except in a case of necessity; and there are some who condemn this as a mortal sin. - St. Lig., no. 594 [5].

[5] Pasqualigus, Gobat, and others say, with whom Suarez agrees when speaking of a light of oil, that it is not unlawful to celebrate with lights of oil or tallow, even from devotion alone, if others cannot be obtained. - Thus St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 394).

Reply to the second. Likewise negative, according to the more common and more probable opinion; but if it is done, it does not exceed a venial sin, and any reasonable cause will excuse from every fault. Therefore, when the other wax candle is lacking, the Priest can celebrate even from mere devotion. - St. Lig., ibid.

401. ○ QUESTION 18. Is it at least lawful to persist in the use of the new candles made from stearin (stearine)?

Reply. Negative. This is established from two Declarations of the S. Congregation of Rites, namely, Sept. 14, 1843, in Massiliensi; and Sept. 7, 1850, in Divion.

Article II. On the Rubrics

402. Priests must observe with the greatest care and solicitude the laws of the Church which concern the manner of celebrating Mass, since among all sacred things this is the most sacred of all, and therefore worthy of the greatest reverence. On this matter Clement XI should be heard, in his encyclical Letter to all the Bishops of the world, March 10, 1708:

With diligence and zeal greater than can be expressed, the Bishop must take care that the Sacrifice of the Mass, than which nothing more holy, nothing more divine can be conceived, be celebrated by Priests alone, not only with that purity which befits those who each day offer to God the Father the heavenly holocaust of the Only-begotten Son who assumed our mortality, but also that they diligently and devoutly observe the sacred ceremonies prescribed in the Rubrics. This is also necessarily required lest the Priest, placed between men and God to appease His anger, should provoke God all the more if he performs his office negligently and immodestly.

403. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Are all the Rubrics of the Mass preceptive?

Reply 1. According to the common opinion [1], all the Rubrics which are observed within the Mass are preceptive, since they concern so sacred a matter. They bind, however, under grave or light sin according to the gravity or lightness of the matter, as will be said below. - St. Lig., no. 399. Reply 2. The Rubrics which are observed outside the Mass, that is, before or after the sacred rite, are commonly regarded as merely directive [2], as, for example, the prayers for preparation or thanksgiving; for other prayers can be recited. There is controversy, however, concerning the prayers which according to the Rubric are to be recited while the vestments are put on; but it must be held with the common opinion, says St. Lig., no. 410, that their omission is venially culpable. Others, however, maintain with Suarez that this omission is free from every fault.

[1] It scarcely appears in fact why the Author calls this opinion common and adduces St. Alphonsus in its support. St. Alphonsus, as we have observed elsewhere, writes (bk. 6, no. 399) that there are four opinions of the Doctors concerning this question. The first says that all the rubrics are directive, and for this he adduces two authors. The second teaches that all the rubrics are preceptive, and for this he adduces eight. The third holds that some are preceptive and others, even those pertaining to the Mass, are directive, and for this he cites nine Authors. Finally, the fourth holds that those which are observed within the Mass are preceptive, while those which are observed outside it are directive, and for this he adduces three. Now, by joining the Authors of the second and fourth opinions, we have eleven; and by joining the Authors of the first and third, we likewise have eleven. How, then, is that called the common opinion which, taken according to all its parts, has only three patrons, but, taken according to its individual parts, has no more than its contrary?

They also derive this from the decree of St. Pius V: Mandating and strictly commanding each and all... by virtue of holy obedience, that, all other methods and rites from other Missals... being henceforth entirely omitted,... they chant and read Mass according to the rite, manner, and norm which is now delivered by Us through this Missal; nor in the celebration of Mass are they to presume to add or recite other ceremonies or prayers than those which are contained in this Missal. Now, 1. it is manifest that by these words merely the use of one Roman Missal is prescribed. 2. In the Missal, however, there are also things which are to be done or said outside the Mass; and nevertheless the Author, with St. Alphonsus, maintains that these rubrics are merely directive. 3. Indeed, St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 412) judges it probable that it is not forbidden to add one collect for some cause or devotion, although the decree seems to prohibit every addition. Let us therefore conclude that Pius V certainly prescribes that the things contained in the Roman Missal be observed, but as they are proposed in the Missal, namely, either as commanding or as merely directing; while additions are forbidden, not those which are taken from the same Roman Missal, but those which are taken from other Missals, as the words and context of St. Pius most clearly suggest.

[2] The VV. object here (p. 933, no. 103) that St. Alphonsus (Exam. Ordin., no. 112) judged only some of them to be directive according to the opinion of the Doctors; whence it must be concluded that others are therefore regarded as preceptive.

Reply. In order that rubrics of this kind may truly be regarded as preceptive, it must be certain that they are so, because merely probable precepts have no power to bind, as St. Alphonsus teaches as certain.

404. ○ QUESTION 2. Can an infirm Priest celebrate even though he is unable to observe all the Rubrics?

Reply. Affirmative, if he omits only a few and the lighter ones, especially if he celebrates privately. Indeed, several authors of grave authority permit an infirm celebrant even to use a staff if he needs it, etc. [3].

[3] St. Lig. reports and approves these things (no. 402): Lacroix (bk. 6, part 2, no. 402), with Vasquez, Dicastillo, and Gobat, says that one who could not celebrate without a staff could lawfully use it. And Gobat adds that, if someone were unable to celebrate unless he leaned with both arms upon the altar, he could lawfully celebrate thus in private, but not in public unless he did this from necessity. I think, however, that this does not exceed a venial sin, from which one who because of infirmity could not stand upright and wished to celebrate from his devotion seems able to be excused, provided that the astonishment of the people is avoided. Lacroix (no. 427) and Fr. Concina (p. 510, no. 4) also say that if someone cannot elevate the Host but can do the other things, he can celebrate privately, and even publicly if necessity is present and the people are forewarned; but I think it is sufficient merely to forewarn the people if someone celebrates from devotion.

QUESTION 3. Is the use of a small spoon for pouring water into the chalice lawful for all?

Reply. The Rubric must be observed [4]. - Thus the S. Congregation of Rites, Sept. 7, 1840, in Rupellen., ad 13.

[4] The Rubric says nothing about a spoon, but merely says that the cruet of water is to be blessed, and then that drops are to be poured into the chalice.

QUESTION 4. Can a Priest, while distributing the Most Holy Eucharist to the faithful, hold a paten under their chin with the same hand with which he holds the pyx?

Reply. Negative (S. Congregation of Rites, Aug. 12, 1864, in Lucionen.).

405. ○ QUESTION 5. What Mass must a Priest celebrating in another church say?

Reply. Here are the decisions of the S. Congregation of Rites on this matter:

1. The Decree in Varsavien., May 7, 1746, is to be observed, namely, that the Mass must agree with the Office which one has recited, provided that it accords with the color of the church in which he celebrates (Nov. 12, 1741). Otherwise, when the feast there is a double, Mass must be celebrated of the Saint whose Office that particular church celebrates (Sept. 4, 1746).

2. A Priest celebrating in another church cannot say a votive Mass with the color which agrees with the Office of that church, unless the rite of the aforesaid church permits it (Sept. 11, 1747).

3. In private Oratories the Mass must always agree with the Office of the celebrant (March 12, 1831).

406. ○ QUESTION 6. Is it lawful to add prayers beyond the prayers assigned or permitted by the Rubric?

Reply. Negative. Thus the S. Congregation of Rites declared, Aug. 12, 1854, in Lucionen. [5].

[5] St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, nos. 411-412), after establishing that one sins gravely if, with the intention of introducing a new rite, he adds new public prayers in the Mass, adds: But if several collects from the same Missal are added from importunate devotion..., this does not exceed a venial fault. Thus commonly.... Croix and Pasqualigus, however, say probably that, although it is better to observe the rubric, it is nevertheless not forbidden for some cause or devotion to add one collect.

QUESTION 7. In a daily Mass of the dead, is it lawful to substitute other prayers for those which are set down in the Missal?

Reply. In the last place the prayer Fidelium omnium must always be said (S. Congregation of Rites, Sept. 2, 1741, in Aquen.); and as regards the first prayer, the Order of the Missal is to be observed, that is, Deus qui inter apostolicos must always be said (S. Congregation of Rites, Aug. 27, 1836, in Veronen.). - The second prayer, Deus veniae largitor, however, can be varied, and another can be substituted for it, for example, for the one for whom the Mass is applied, etc.... (S. Congregation of Rites, Sept. 25, 1837, in Mutinen.).

407. ○ QUESTION 8. Is it ever lawful to interrupt Mass?

Reply 1. It is never lawful to interrupt Mass essentially, that is, in such a way that the Sacrifice which has been begun remains truncated, unless a most grave or extreme necessity urges, as in the case of an imminent fire or of an enemy rushing in to kill; for then the Priest, omitting the consecration of the chalice, could consume the Host already consecrated, or carry it away with him as he fled. But if he has completed both consecrations, let him consume both species immediately, if he can; or, if he cannot, let him carry them with him, to be consumed as quickly as possible in a nearby place. - St. Lig., no. 352 et seq.

Reply 2. It is lawful to interrupt accidentally, namely, by interposing something for a just cause before the Canon: 1. On account of a sermon after the Gospel, prayers to be recited for the dead, proclamations of banns to be made, or a procession to be received, etc. 2. For the sake of a Prince who arrives, or of a crowd of pilgrims on a feast day, if otherwise they cannot hear Mass. Then, if the oblation has not been made, the Priest can begin anew so that they may hear the whole Mass. 3. If the Priest remembers some impediment, for example, that he is not fasting, or is not in the state of grace, or is irregular, provided that the Mass can be broken off without scandal or disgrace. - St. Lig., ibid.

Reply 3. It is not lawful, however, to interrupt even accidentally once the Canon has been begun, and a fortiori after the consecration has been completed, except for a most grave cause, for example, if a dying person must be baptized or absolved. It is not lawful, however, to administer the other Sacraments between the consecration and Communion, because they are not of such great necessity. Nevertheless, Holy Viaticum could be administered to a dying person who was nearby, so that the Priest would not have to remove the sacred vestments. - St. Lig., ibid. - But for this it is also required that the celebrant not lose sight of the altar (S. Congregation of Rites, Dec. 19, 1829).

408. ○ QUESTION 9. What must be done if a Priest, overtaken by illness or death, is unable to complete Mass?

Reply 1. If the Priest fails before the consecration, nothing is to be done by another Priest, because the Sacrifice was not properly begun.

Reply 2. But if he fails after the consecration of even only one species, then another Priest who is fasting, if one is present, must supply; if no one fasting is present, another who is not fasting is to supply and complete the Mass, because the precept of securing the integrity of the Sacrifice urges more gravely. Indeed, even an irregular or excommunicated Priest would have to supply. Nevertheless, if another Priest could not be found immediately, after one hour had elapsed he probably would no longer have to be sought, because moral union would be lacking, and consequently it would not be considered the same Mass. But if the Priest, seized by illness while celebrating, is able to complete the Mass after some interruption, it is better that he himself, rather than another, complete it, even if he is not fasting. - St. Lig., no. 335.

409. ○ QUESTION 10. Can a Priest wearing a STOLE assist a Priest who is celebrating?

Reply. Negative. 1. If it is a private Mass, even of a new Priest celebrating for the first time. - Thus the S. Congregation of Rites, March 11, 1837. - 2. Likewise, if it is a solemn Mass (S. Congregation of Rites, March 15, 1721) [6]. Canons are excepted, however, when they celebrate solemnly in place of the Bishop, or when immemorial custom favors them. - Thus the S. Congregation of Rites on several occasions.

[6] The two decrees cited here appear to have less bearing upon the matter, and therefore are less suitable for confirming what the Author affirms.

Resolutions. - 1. It is unlawful to celebrate with the head covered. This is established from cap. Nullus, de Consecratione, dist. 1. And indeed, according to the common opinion, it is mortal to celebrate the whole Mass with the head covered; but to celebrate with a skullcap (calotte, berrettino) up to the Canon, apart from contempt and scandal, is only venial. Indeed, it is probably free even from venial fault if, even without a dispensation, it is done only up to the Canon for a reasonable cause and in a private place, or even in a public place if the reason is manifest to those present and the Priest cannot celebrate without notable inconvenience. It is unlawful, however, to celebrate the entire Mass with the head thus covered without apostolic permission. Thus expressly St. Lig., no. 397, after others. - Craisson, Manuale Iuris canonici, vol. 3, no. 3688.

2. By common law it is unlawful to celebrate with a wig (perruque), and this under penalty of suspension from divine Offices. Thus from a Decree of Innocent XI, in which Bishops and Apostolic Nuncios are furthermore prohibited from granting this permission. - St. Lig., no. 386. - But this prohibition has fallen into desuetude in many places, as in France, as is evident from the contrary custom. - Bouvier, On the Sacrifice of the Mass, ch. 7, art. 7. - Craisson, no. 3692.

3. A Priest who omits blessings, inclinations, genuflections, etc., is not excused from venial sin. Say the same of one who advertently does not genuflect to the ground, or contrary to the prescriptions of the Rubric changes the order of the blessings, or performs them too quickly. - Lacroix, etc.

4. It is a grave sin, unless slightness of matter excuses, to omit the parts of the Mass which are called ordinary, or which are always recited or performed. Hence the Doctors commonly say that it is mortal to omit the Confession together with the other things at the beginning of Mass, the Epistle, the Gospel, the principal Collects, the Offertory, the breaking of the Host, and its mingling with the Blood [7].

[7] These things are taken almost word for word from St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 404). But his statement that the Doctors commonly say that it is mortal, etc., must not be understood as though the common opinion asserted grave guilt in each individual thing which is then enumerated. For St. Alphonsus himself adds: Although you will not find all these things in all these authors. Thus, for example, Sporer, cited there, mentions only the whole Epistle with the Gradual and Alleluia, and then the whole Postcommunion.

5. It is mortal to omit any prayer in the Canon of the Mass, or so to change its words that the sense is altered, or to omit some word whose removal causes the remaining words to make no sense. - The same must be said if the Pater noster or Agnus Dei is omitted; the same of Libera nos; Domine, non sum dignus; and Quid retribuam; the same of the purification of the paten and chalice after consumption [8]. - St. Lig., no. 405. - The Salmanticenses.

[8] Here in reality you have only opinions for which two, three, or four authors are adduced; and indeed those who are eminent among them are not those to whom one must defer greatly. You have these authors in St. Alph. (bk. 6, no. 405).

410. ○ 6. It is venial to omit one of the three principal Collects. If the first prayer has been omitted, it is to be recited together with the Secret, as it seems, and not afterward [9]. But it will not be mortal to omit the other prayers which are added in the Mass besides it [10]. - St. Lig., no. 406.

[9] Suarez alone is adduced for this rule (in St. Alph., bk. 6, no. 405).

[10] In this context of the Author, the word it refers to the first prayer. But it is not so in St. Alphonsus, from whom the Author copies. For St. Alphonsus understands the first proper Collect.

7. To mutilate words or introduce syncopation, while preserving the sense and apart from scandal, is no more than venial. - St. Lig., no. 407.

8. To omit extraordinary parts, namely, those which are not said in every Mass, is only venial. - Thus commonly, unless so many parts are omitted that, taken together, they constitute notable matter. - Hence it will be only venial to omit the Gloria, Credo, Collects besides that proper to the Mass, the Tract, or special things concerning the Preface or the Communicantes [11]. - Thus commonly. - Likewise, to celebrate a votive Mass or a Mass de Requiem when this is not lawful according to the Rubrics is venial, unless it becomes mortal by reason of contempt or scandal, if, for example, you say a Mass de Requiem on the solemn feasts of Easter or the Nativity of the Lord. - St. Lig., no. 420.

[11] Sporer includes here the Sequences of certain feasts, and even the prophecies on the Ember Days, since they are very extraordinarily accidental parts of the Mass (Theologia Sacramentalis, part 2, ch. 6, sect. 4, no. 426).

9. The washing of the hands before Mass must be done at least under venial sin [12], and under grave sin if the hands are very dirty, because of the reverence due to the Sacrifice. - But to omit the washing after Mass will be no sin. - St. Lig., no. 409.

[12] This is the opinion of some.

10. Although it is no sin to omit the prayers before and after Mass, nevertheless, a Priest who approached the Sacrifice without any other preparation would not be free from some fault. - St. Lig.

11. A Priest would sin if, in the purification of the chalice, he used water alone, but only venially according to the common opinion. - Thus St. Lig., no. 408. - Lacroix, no. 423, etc. - Several also excuse a Priest from venial sin if he is an abstainer from wine. Thus Tamburini. - See more concerning the Rubrics and Ceremonies in the authors.

END OF THE TREATISE ON THE EUCHARIST.

Treatise On the Sacrament of Penance

411. How important this Treatise is, is evident to all, both because in necessity it surpasses the other parts of moral Theology, and because it contains, resumes, and explains their difficulties.

Without doubt, the Sacrament of regeneration is necessary, without which no one can enter into the kingdom of heaven; but of no less necessity for adults is the Sacrament by which we recover the spiritual life lost through sin. Indeed, Baptism is required only once in life, while Penance is necessary as often as a Christian man has fallen into mortal sin.

Hence Penance is rightly called by the Holy Fathers and Councils a second Baptism or the second plank after shipwreck. And indeed, what would the immense benefit of regeneration have profited most men if, after they had been stripped of the wedding garment by the most savage beast of sin, the compassionate and merciful Lord had not supplied a second or even a manifold redemption? They would surely have been delivered over to eternal death under diabolical tyranny. But the most clement God, with whom there is mercy and plenteous redemption, whose treasure of goodness is infinite and whose mercy is without number, continually extends His hand to the most wretched shipwrecked, and presents to us this second plank, by grasping which we may be saved from shipwreck again and again and without any numerical limit. It is therefore by the mercies of the Lord that we are not consumed, and we are always able to await the blessed hope. The penitential seat is therefore truly to be called a throne of grace and a tribunal of mercy.

In this Treatise especially, a certain diversity of opinions appears among Theologians. For some perhaps seem to have inclined more than is right toward rigor, but others toward benignity. We, however, faithfully following as usual the footsteps of our Leader and Teacher, St. Alphonsus de Liguori, shall endeavor, according to our measure, to walk the middle way, declining neither to the right of rigorism nor to the left of laxity [1]; mindful nevertheless of that principle of St. Antoninus, part 2, tit. 4, ch. 4: It is better to render an account to the Lord for excessive mercy than for excessive severity.

[1] You will indeed find no one who does not most firmly believe, and even wish others to be entirely persuaded, that he follows the safest and therefore the middle way between laxity and rigor. Indeed, there has not been lacking one who wished this very claim to be proclaimed on the title page of his work in capital letters, as, for example, Eusebius Amort, who prefixed this title to his moral work: D. Eusebius Amort's MORAL THEOLOGY, A MIDDLE WAY BETWEEN RIGOR AND LAXITY. And this declaration is indeed an indication of good will, which otherwise will doubtless receive its reward from divine bounty. But what else is it worth? For since the notion of rigor and laxity supposes certain boundaries from which there is a deviation either to the right or to the left, it will certainly be possible to define what is lax or rigid when, either by the authority of the Church or by some other indication, those boundaries, that is, the truth, are certainly established. But where that lamp which shows the certain way does not shine forth, where the path which alone is to be trodden as certainly the only right one is unknown, whence, I ask, do you know that these have turned aside to the right and those to the left? And while, thinking that you hold the middle, you lament that some have gone into laxity and others into rigor, could it not, on the contrary, have happened that you yourself have strayed from the right way, and consequently that one seems to you to have fallen into laxity because you have fallen into rigor, but another into rigor because you have fallen into some laxity? This one thing, therefore, seems to remain: that, each of us thinking modestly of his own judgment, we leave the office of affixing the marks of rigor or laxity to that judge whose office it is also to point out the right way by a certain judgment. But let that saying which is in the proverb be sacred to us: In doubtful things, liberty; in all things, charity; so that with great charity we permit to others that liberty which we judge should also be permitted to us, namely, that we not be called laxists when we ourselves do not admit, and do not judge should be imposed upon others, the yoke of a law or obligation which is not established by certain reason; nor again be called rigorists when we demonstrate that the force either of authority or of reason exempting from the obligation is not so firm, and therefore judge that the law must be observed.

We must treat: 1. of the essence of the Sacrament of Penance; 2. of its subject, or of the acts of the penitent; 3. of its Minister, or of the Confessor.

First Part. On the Essence of the Sacrament of Penance

Chapter I. On the Nature of Penance

412. Penance, considered generally, signifies the same as sorrow of soul, which anyone experiences after he has done or omitted something which he would wish not to have done or not to have omitted. But in the strict and proper sense, penance is sorrow of soul insofar as it is referred to God offended and hostile to us [1].

[1] Take care to distinguish properly the twofold sense in which an offense against God is the formal object now of charity, now of penance; otherwise you may perhaps fall into the false doctrine which finds penance only where there is contrition perfected by charity. Cardinal De Lugo speaks well concerning these things: It is one thing, and a far different one, to detest sin because it is opposed to God, or because it is an evil of God, at least extrinsically, and because it displeases God, which pertains to charity; but it is another thing to detest sin because it offends God, or because it provokes God and turns Him away from man, which pertains to this other virtue of Penance.... For even among men these two things are distinguished, and I can be unwilling to offend another lest I reasonably render him averse to me, although otherwise I have no friendship with him nor desire to have it; for friendship tends to avoid his evil because it is his evil; but this other virtue tends formally to avoid an offense, not because it is his evil, but rather because it is evil and dishonorable for me to have another reasonably averse to me (On Penance, disp. 2, no. 52).

But he had previously explained the object of Penance more clearly thus (ibid., nos. 50-51): Even among men another virtue inclines one to remove an offense, which prohibits giving someone a sufficient and reasonable cause of indignation and aversion..., and inclines one also to remove it when it has been committed, by offering sufficient satisfaction through acts of service, through a petition for pardon, and other similar things according to the magnitude of the offense; for when this satisfaction has been made, the offense is extinguished. For if the offended person were harsh in accepting satisfaction, prudent men would nevertheless no longer judge him to remain reasonably averse, but entirely unreasonably so.... This being supposed, we say that there is another similar virtue of man toward God, which inclines one to have peace with God, or to avoid an offense against God and to remove it by every means when it has been committed. Its formal object is the goodness of peace with God, or not to have God averse and indignant. But since God is offended by all sins, this virtue hates all of them under that formal aspect, because they are offenses against God; and it endeavors to remove all of them, so that it may again have God pacified and appeased. And therefore it is called a reconciliatory virtue, because it tends to this, that it may reconcile to us the God who is averse.... But that this virtue is Penance is proved from the fact that, etc. And in this sense indeed the Author is to be understood when he presently adds that Penance is a moral virtue which inclines to the detestation of sin insofar as it is an offense against God, namely, insofar as it renders God averse and indignant toward us.

I. Penance, as a virtue, is defined: A moral virtue inclining to the detestation of sin insofar as it is an offense against God, and to an efficacious purpose of avoiding it in the future and of satisfying divine justice.

Penance is necessary for the sinner by a necessity of means for salvation. For in the present economy it is repugnant that an impenitent sinner be received by God into friendship.

It is also necessary by a necessity of divine precept, as is clear from many testimonies of Sacred Scripture, for example, Luke 13.5: Unless you do penance, you shall all likewise perish, etc.

The effect of penance [2], however, is twofold: 1. the remission of sins, as is established from six hundred passages of Sacred Scripture; 2. the remission of eternal punishment. For a justified man cannot be liable to eternal punishment. This is also established from Trent, sess. 6, ch. 7.

[2] Understand this of perfect penance, namely, that which leads to those acts of service by which God Himself has revealed that, from His immense mercy, He is appeased and reconciled with sinful man.

II. Penance, as a Sacrament, is defined: A Sacrament of the new law instituted by Christ after the manner of a judgment, for remitting, through priestly absolution, to a contrite man who has confessed, sins committed after Baptism.

This Sacrament differs from the others especially in this, that it is administered after the manner of a judgment; for there is present the penitent, at once the accused, witness, and accuser; and the Priest, the judge pronouncing sentence.

413. Things to be established. - I. Penance is a true Sacrament of the new law.

This is established, 1. from theological reason; for in it are found all the things which constitute a true Sacrament, namely: 1. A sensible sign through confession, or certainly through the absolution of the Priest, etc. 2. The institution of Christ in a permanent manner, as is clear from the text John 20.23: Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained. 3. The promise of grace; this is clear from the remission of sins, since sins cannot be remitted without the infusion of grace.

This is established, 2. from constant tradition and the doctrine of the Fathers, to which is added the express definition of the Church; for thus Trent, sess. 14, can. 1: If anyone says that in the Catholic Church Penance is not truly and properly a Sacrament instituted by Christ our Lord for reconciling to God the faithful as often as they fall into sins after Baptism, let him be anathema. The same is clear from the Council of Florence in the Decree to the Armenians: The fourth Sacrament is Penance. - See what is to be said below concerning the necessity of confession, no. 464.

II. The Sacrament of Penance has the power of remitting all sins committed after Baptism.

This is established, 1. from Sacred Scripture; for Christ generally, without any distinction or restriction, gives the power of remitting sins: Whose sins you shall forgive.... Indeed, Matt. 16.19, Christ says to Peter: Whatsoever you shall loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven. And in ch. 18.18 He says to all the Apostles: Whatsoever you shall loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven.

This is established, 2. from tradition, from all the Fathers, and also from the definition of the Church in the Councils, especially in Trent, sess. 14, can. 1, cited above.

414. ○ III. The necessary parts of the Sacrament of Penance are: 1. contrition; 2. confession; 3. absolution; 4. satisfaction, insofar as it is to be accepted by the penitent. For the Sacrament of Penance was instituted after the manner of a reconciliatory judgment; but this cannot be had without a sorrowful confession of guilt and a disposition of soul to undergo the satisfaction imposed, and without the absolution of the Priest. - Satisfaction, however, insofar as it is to be imposed or fulfilled, is only an integral part of this Sacrament, because the primary effect, namely, grace and the remission of sins as to guilt and eternal punishment, can be had without satisfaction [3].

[3] This distinction, by which satisfaction is said at one time to be a necessary and even essential part of the Sacrament, namely, insofar as the purpose of fulfilling it is considered, and at another time only an integral part, insofar as its execution is considered, was introduced by some Authors so that they might better defend the acts of the penitent as being the matter from which, and thus as pertaining to the essence of the sign causing grace. For since satisfaction is commonly called an integral part by the Doctors (see Lugo, On Penance, disp. 12, no. 40), while the Council of Trent (sess. 14, ch. 3) numbers it together with contrition and confession as the quasi matter of this Sacrament, it seemed to follow therefrom that by the name of matter there was designated not merely an essential element of the Sacrament, but also the integral parts of Penance, as the Catechism of the Council of Trent in fact calls them (On Penance, sec. 21). Melchior Cano, a theologian at the Council of Trent, also employs this manner of speaking (Relectio de Poenitentia, part 6, q. 15), where without hesitation he writes: Contrition is not an essential part of this Sacrament, but an integral part. But not every integral part is necessary for the existence of the whole, as is clear of satisfaction, without which a true Sacrament exists. And Andrew Vega, another theologian of the Council of Trent, according to the testimony of Cardinal De Lugo (On Penance, disp. 14, no. 3), called that doctrine common.

Nevertheless, whatever this evasion may be worth with regard to satisfaction, it is not free from another difficulty. For in that opinion the matter of the Sacrament would not in fact be satisfaction, but the purpose of satisfaction, that is, the purpose of supplying the matter. Moreover, if that pertains to the matter of the Sacrament which the penitent must be prepared in the disposition of his soul, as the Author says, to perform, another could conclude by almost the same reasoning that the matter of the Sacrament is the Lenten fast, the hearing of Mass, and finally all things which divine or human law commands; for all these things must also be present in the purpose of the penitent.

Moreover, neither is it our intention, nor does the brevity of this Note permit, even lightly to touch upon those most intricate questions which are customarily disputed on both sides in the schools concerning the matter of this Sacrament. It is certainly very well known that the Council of Trent deliberately abstained from those formulas of words which might seem opposed to either opinion of the disputants. From this it is sufficiently clear that decretory force cannot reside in the arguments which some have attempted to elicit in support of either opinion from the doctrine both of that Council and of the Council of Florence, especially from the fact that the acts of the penitent are called by the name of matter or quasi matter, as though the word matter necessarily conveyed the notion of an element causing grace. This persuasion drove some so far that they sought some causality of grace even in sin (see Lugo, On Penance, disp. 12, nos. 22 and 37), because it also is the matter of this Sacrament. But this very thing is what others deny concerning the notion of matter; and very many Theologians - for I shall use the words of the Roman Theologian in his note to the Bibliotheca of Lucius Ferraris, s.v. Absolution, art. 2, no. 10 - establish the acts of the penitent not as the matter from which the Sacrament is made, but as that concerning which the Sacrament is occupied. They support this opinion with such reasons (see Maldonatus, On Penance, part 3, q. 3, ad Thesis 7) that even Cardinal De Lugo himself (On Penance, disp. 12, no. 29), although he fights for the opposite opinion with all his strength, nevertheless, pressed by the difficulties, was compelled to concede that the causality of the Sacrament could probably be attributed to absolution alone: Although the acts of the penitent, he says, are parts of the Sacrament, it is not required that all the parts of a Sacrament cause grace, but it is sufficient that the Sacrament cause it through some part of itself; but this Sacrament causes grace through the absolution of the Priest alone, in whom there is the power of the keys for absolving and destroying sins. Several seem to hold this opinion, whom Suarez adduces, disp. 18, sect. 2, no. 11, and he says that this is a probable solution. And in fact, in support of this opinion Suarez (loc. cit., nos. 1 and 12) adduces, together with Scotus, Major, Gabriel, Vega, Ferrariensis, Capreolus, and St. Bonaventure, even St. Thomas. He indeed contends that the last of these thought otherwise in the Summa (III, q. 86, art. 6) (ibid., no. 13); but others will perhaps gather from the reply to the first and to the last objection that the Holy Doctor there added more things indeed, but not contrary things. For since he speaks of acts caused by the grace which remits guilt, these certainly cannot be the cause of that same grace by which sins are remitted, since an effect cannot be prior to its cause. To those adduced by Suarez, not only can several others be added after Maldonatus, but the most grave Theologians, indeed those of the first rank, Francis de Vitoria, Melchior Cano, Dominic Soto, Francis Toledo, Vega, and, omitting others, Martin Navarrus, do not seem capable of being excluded, precisely because of the things which they wrote concerning the power of merely supposed contrition; for these things cannot in any way be reconciled with the opinion which regards the acts of the penitent as the matter from which.

But enough has now been said concerning these matters. They had to be intimated for this reason, lest, since it must be accepted that mere opinions of the school are being treated here, more than is right should afterward be attributed to doctrines which are mere consequences of these opinions; for conclusions cannot possess more force and firmness than the premises bear.

IV. The acts of the penitent required for the remission of sins are: 1. contrition; 2. confession; 3. satisfaction. This is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, can. 4: If anyone denies that for the entire and perfect remission of sins three acts are required in the penitent, AS IT WERE THE MATTER of the Sacrament of Penance, namely, contrition, confession, and satisfaction, which are called the three parts of Penance..., let him be anathema.

V. The Sacrament of Penance is necessary by a necessity of precept in actual reception, and by a necessity of means in desire, at least implicit, for remitting mortal sins committed after Baptism. Thus in the new law the supreme legislator, Christ the Lord, has established it according to divine goodness and providence.

Hence, for those stained by mortal sin committed after Baptism, the Sacrament of Penance is necessary for salvation at least by a necessity of precept; but penance or contrition [4], together with the desire for the Sacrament, or with a serious purpose, at least implicit, of confessing the sins when a suitable opportunity is given, is always necessary by a necessity of means.

[4] If contrition here is understood as that which is perfected by charity, it is always necessary for justification when there is no opportunity of confessing sins; for, as is said below, imperfect contrition is sufficient with the Sacrament.

415. Questions. - QUESTION 1. When was the Sacrament of Penance instituted?

Reply. It was instituted when Christ, after His Resurrection, breathed upon His disciples, saying: Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them..., etc. For then, as the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 1, declares, He conferred upon them the judicial power which before the Passion He had only promised. Hence Trent says that this Sacrament was instituted principally after the Resurrection.

416. ◦ QUESTION 2. Do sacramental and forensic judgments agree, and to what extent?

Reply. They partly agree and partly differ, as is clear from the form of each.

1. In sacramental judgment the procedure is as follows: 1. The whole matter is conducted between only two persons, namely, the judge and the accused. The penitent himself is the accused, accuser, and witness; but the Priest is the judge, who, after the cause is known, pronounces a sentence which God ratifies if the requisite conditions are not lacking. 2. The investigation of the cause and the pronouncement of the sentence are conducted entirely in secret. 3. The judge is bound to the strictest seal of silence concerning the crimes and the whole course of the cause.

2. In forensic judgment, however, the procedure is as follows: 1. Besides God and the judge, there are assessors who assist the judge by counsel. 2. There are accusers who convict the accused when he evades. 3. There are procurators and advocates who defend. 4. There are officers, attendants, and sometimes executioners, who execute the sentence.

Moreover, another essential difference is also found between the two judgments, namely, that forensic judgments tend to punish the accused and are vindicatory judgments; but sacramental judgment tends to absolve the accused, or to reconcile the sinner with God.

Chapter II. On the Matter of the Sacrament of Penance

417. As in the other Sacraments, so in the Sacrament of Penance, there is a twofold matter, one remote and the other proximate.

The remote matter consists of all sins committed after Baptism; these are called the matter concerning which, because absolution is occupied with destroying them. It is either necessary or merely sufficient and free.

The necessary remote matter consists of all mortal sins committed after Baptism and not yet directly remitted by the power of the keys, because by divine precept sins of this kind must be submitted to the keys. - But the sufficient and free matter consists of all venial sins [1]. It is called sufficient because any sins, even the least, can be the object of sacramental pardon. It is called free because there is no precept of submitting them to the keys. These things are established from the perpetual practice and tradition of the Church, and also from the definition of the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 5.

[1] Add all sins, whether mortal or venial, which have already at another time been duly submitted to the keys, as the Author presently has it (q. 1).

The proximate matter of the Sacrament of Penance consists of the three acts of the penitent, namely, contrition, confession, and satisfaction, which are called the quasi matter of this Sacrament because they are in the likeness of sensible matter which in the other Sacraments is subjected to the form [2]; for through these acts sins are presented to be destroyed by the words of the form. This is established especially from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, can. 4.

[2] St. Thomas teaches thus, however, that in the other Sacraments matter is subjected to the form in a different manner: A form of words is applied to sacramental signs in the other Sacraments for their sanctification, because they contain and cause grace; but exterior penance is not a sign causing grace, and therefore it is not necessary that it be sanctified through some form of words. But the words which are pronounced by the absolving Priest are immediately directed to him who subjects himself to the Sacrament; whence he himself is sanctified by the power of absolution and receives grace, but his confession is not sanctified so that he may receive grace from it, as was the case in Baptism concerning the sanctification of the water (In IV Sent., dist. 22, q. 2, art. 1, q. 1, ad 3). But I have said, in the note to no. 414, that the things which the Holy Doctor handed down in the Summa (III, q. 86, art. 6) do not appear contrary to these things. For although in the body of the article he says that the remission of guilt is in some manner an effect of the acts of penance, he nevertheless adds (ibid., ad 1) that this is to be understood of acts which are there as effects of operative grace, produced simultaneously with the remission of guilt. And more clearly (ibid., ad ult.): The act of the virtue of penance has it that without it the remission of guilt cannot take place, insofar as it is an inseparable effect of grace, through which guilt is principally remitted, which also operates in all the Sacraments. If, therefore, an act of this kind is an effect of the grace by which guilt is remitted, it certainly cannot, as something subsequent, be called the cause of the grace remitting guilt.

418. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Are sins already duly confessed and remitted through absolution sufficient matter for the Sacrament of Penance?

Reply. Affirmative. This is certain among all, says St. Lig., no. 427.

The reason is: 1. because a sin, although remitted, is always a sin committed; and just as contrition for the same sin can be repeated with fruit, so also can confession. It comes about only per accidens that the sin, since it has already been remitted, is not remitted, although per se, since it was committed, it is capable of remission. Nor does it stand in the way that the Sacrament then does not destroy this sin; for it suffices that it have its effect in first act, namely, that it provide grace destructive of sin, although per accidens in second act it does not destroy the sin. Moreover, the Sacrament will no more lack the other effects, namely, an increase of grace, remission of punishment, etc., than if someone, perfectly contrite, were submitting those sins to the keys for the first time.

2. Furthermore, a sentence already pronounced can be confirmed for greater security and for greater consolation and peace of soul, as is sometimes customary in civil matters; and if perhaps the sin submitted to the keys has not yet been remitted, it can then be remitted.

3. This is also established from the Declaration of Benedict XI in Canon Law, Extrav. I, de Privilegiis, ch. 4: Although, he says, it is not of necessity to confess the same sins again, nevertheless... we regard it as salutary that the confession of the same sins be repeated. It is established, moreover, from the constant practice of the faithful, with the approval of the Church [3].

[3] John XXII (Extrav. Vas electionis, de haereticis) condemns the opposite opinion as false and erroneous. See Croix, bk. 6, part 2, no. 589.

419. ○ QUESTION 2. Must an adult who is to be baptized conditionally because of doubt concerning a preceding Baptism confess sins already accused? Reply. Negative. The reason is that those sins have already been remitted through the Sacrament of Penance if the prior Baptism was valid; but if it was not valid, they are not matter for confession and will be remitted through the second Baptism. - Reuter, no. 118.

QUESTION 3. Must the aforesaid adult accuse sins not yet confessed, or committed since the last confession?

Reply. This was hitherto controverted among writers. The first probable opinion denied it, because, they said, given the probable invalidity of the prior Baptism, these sins are probably not matter capable of the Sacrament of Penance; therefore, they probably are not to be submitted to the keys either. For the obligation of confessing sins cannot follow except subsequently to Baptism duly conferred. Hence, if perhaps these sins are not remitted through the second Baptism, which is invalid because of the validity of the first, they can be remitted either through perfect contrition or indirectly through absolution with attrition. - Lacroix, no. 325, On Baptism, and others.

The second opinion, also probable, affirmed it, because the obligation of confessing sins urges whenever it is not established that they were committed before a valid Baptism. The Author therefore concluded that in practice confession was very much to be advised [4]. But now attend to the most recent response of the S. Congregation which was issued on this matter toward the end of the year 1868.

[4] This practice was furthermore presented in the preceding Edition as more conformable to the instruction which the Congregation of the Holy Office had given on another occasion, when it taught the order to be observed in reconciling these adults. This instruction indeed supposed confession, if not necessary, at least most opportune. Nevertheless, it was added that if the first opinion were in fact probable - which otherwise could seem consonant with the general principle that the obligation of Confession is not to be imposed when, morally speaking, as St. Alphonsus says, bk. 6, no. 505, it is not established - it should not have been permitted that one be urged to an unnecessary Confession to whom it appeared so hard that, perhaps overcome by the difficulty, he could be deterred from reconciliation.

But now, in favor of the second opinion, there has been added a Response of the S. Inquisition, Dec. 17, 1868. For to the Question proposed in the name of the Bishops of England, Must sacramental Confession be required of new converts in England, and must it be integral? the response to both parts of the doubt was: Affirmative; and the decree rendered on Thursday, June 14, 1715, was to be given.

That this response does not concern only the special circumstances of England is proved by the preceding response of the year 1715. For the following Doubt was proposed: whether full credence is to be given to Charles Wipperman of Rostock in the Duchy of Mecklenburg, a preacher and lecturer of quietistic Lutheran theology, superintendent and principal doctor of the sect of quietistic Lutherans, reconciled to the holy faith in the Holy Office of Parma, concerning certain errors detected in his Baptism; whether he is to be believed concerning the things which he relates; and, insofar as the reply is affirmative, that provision may likewise be made both for his salvation and for that of the others of that sect or region, especially if they are ignorant.

It is asked whether the said Wipperman is to be rebaptized; and, insofar as the reply is affirmative, whether absolutely or conditionally; and, insofar as the reply is affirmative, whether he is bound to confess all the sins of his past life; and, insofar as the reply is affirmative, whether the confession is to precede or follow the Baptism to be conferred conditionally.

The Most Holy Father, having heard the votes of the Most Eminent, said: Charles Ferdinand is to be rebaptized conditionally; and, after Baptism has been conferred, let him confess the sins of his past life and be absolved from them conditionally.

 Although this question appears to have nothing to do with the Vindiciae Alphonsianae, since St. Alphonsus the Doctor has not even one word concerning it, nevertheless, the VV. did not judge that they should remain silent concerning it, and they devote four columns to this argument (pp. 463-465), perhaps so that, from the example of this doctrine set forth in Gury's Compendium, which afterward appears less consonant with the preceding Decree, no one may wonder that in the moral Work of St. Alphonsus also certain opinions are approved which are found to have been condemned by preceding or subsequent Decrees of the Church.

What is now of interest is the conclusion, worthy of notice, which the VV. deduce from the Decree adduced. The Decree of the S. Inquisition, they say (p. 465), proves that a doubtful obligation of confession is not always to be regarded as nonexistent. But if the matter is thus, no more evident apology for Gury's Compendium could now be desired. For the VV., unless you say that their words are devoid of meaning, suppose that the obligation of Confession is in itself doubtful. But it cannot be called doubtful unless the opinion which denies the obligation is judged truly probable. Therefore, by the suffrage of the VV. themselves, Gury must now rightly be said to have written after Lacroix that the opinion which denies the obligation of integral Confession is probable!

But further. That a doubtful obligation is not to be regarded as nonexistent can be effected only by the force of some principle which establishes that in the case the safer side must necessarily be followed. But if the integrity of Confession is at issue, behold St. Alphonsus meets us, saying (Homo apostolicus, tr. 16, no. 29): No one is bound to doubtful laws.... Nor does it stand in the way to say here that in the matter of the Sacraments we cannot follow merely probable opinions; because this holds when the validity of the Sacrament is at issue, but otherwise concerning the integrity [of confession]. But the present question is whether confession, and indeed integral confession, is to be required of a neophyte.

But still further. The Decree of the S. Inquisition must here be taken either as a new law of merely ecclesiastical right or as a Declaration of divine right. Yet who would affirm that a new law was enacted by the Church in this case? Where was this law promulgated? It will therefore be a Declaration of divine right. But truly I do not know to whom it could occur to attribute to the S. Inquisition a declaration by force of which a doubtful obligation, with no higher principle supervening, cannot in itself be called nonexistent.

Accordingly, as it seems, the VV. would have devoted their efforts more wisely to bringing forward reasons by which it might be demonstrated, not that a doubtful obligation of Confession is not nonexistent, but rather that the obligation of confession in the case is not doubtful. But, what is to be regretted, they have provided none of these things.

However, we do indeed see certain reasons adduced in the petition which was presented to the Apostolic See concerning this question in the year 1868, and part of which the VV. also relate (loc. cit.). Yet you will perhaps not without reason suspect that those reasons pertain to the special circumstances of England. For it presented the following as necessary reasons for requiring of neophytes an integral confession of their whole life: There is the difficulty of converts in bringing the intellect into the obedience of faith itself, unless through humility and submission of soul, which Christ the Lord deigned to place in the Sacrament of Penance. There is also the impossibility of knowing, except through an integral manifestation of sins, whether the newly converted person is rightly disposed for Baptism itself and is willing, for example, to make restitution of reputation or goods (if he happens to be bound to it), to avoid the proximate occasion of sin, to withdraw from a marriage invalidly contracted, even if through a dispensation of the Holy See (as in the daily more frequent cases of a marriage contracted after a civil divorce) it cannot be convalidated. There is, moreover, the necessity of providing for his salvation through justification in the Sacrament of Penance, from the integrity of which no one once baptized in infancy can be exempted, regard being had especially to the diligence of the younger members of the English Clergy in faithfully observing the rite of baptizing, and consequently to the greater number of those concerning the validity of whose infant Baptism it is not lawful to doubt. But since it is certain that after several years the obligation of integral confession will lose its force if Theologians are able in practice to follow as safe the opinion of the aforesaid authors (who say with Lacroix, namely, that the obligation of confession in the case is doubtful), the Archbishop of Westminster and the Bishops of England earnestly petition, etc. Thus indeed reads the petition.

Now, if this alone is considered, namely, that such diligence is employed by the younger English Clergy in observing the rite of Baptism that it is not lawful to doubt the validity of infant Baptism, who does not now see that, whenever it is established that Baptism was duly conferred upon someone in this manner, the matter is thereby brought to this point: since scarcely any cause or necessity for repeating Baptism then appears, the integrity of sacramental confession is altogether necessary for justification from sins afterward committed? Nor should it be judged that the other reasons adduced lack their own force because of the circumstances of England. For although the reasons drawn from the necessity either of overcoming the difficulty in bringing the intellect into the obedience of faith, or of knowing whether the neophyte is rightly disposed for Baptism and bears a ready mind to fulfill whatever obligations may perhaps be present of restoring reputation or another's goods, of avoiding proximate occasions of sin, or of withdrawing from an illegitimate marriage which otherwise cannot be convalidated - although, I say, reasons of this kind, if considered in themselves, might generally appear of little efficacy for inferring the necessity of sacramental confession, all the more because they would induce the same necessity of confession even if the neophyte had been converted to the faith from Judaism, Mohammedanism, or idolatry; since such disposition of soul must be established in all neophytes whatsoever who approach Baptism; although, furthermore, if we adhere strictly to the Decree of the Inquisition, confession would appear to contribute little toward the aforesaid ends, namely, toward foreknowing the suitable dispositions of the neophyte for receiving Baptism, because according to the tenor of the Decree confession must not precede but follow Baptism; and, furthermore, even if it preceded, nevertheless, since the knowledge obtained through sacramental confession is certainly not of such a kind that it may be used in the external forum to determine whether or not the neophyte is rightly disposed to receive Baptism - nevertheless, it does not seem doubtful that the very special condition of affairs in England makes it impossible to meet those necessities except through sacramental confession. The same certainly can also be said of the very grave inconvenience which is touched upon in the last place, namely, of the danger that the obligation of confession would for this reason gradually lose its force. And certainly nowhere else has fear come upon theologians that, while they establish that one who has only doubtful or even doubtfully necessary matter is not bound to confession (see St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, nos. 473-474), and add that this matter may be passed over at pleasure if indeed he wishes to confess while presenting other matter, it would therefore come about in the course of time that the obligation of integral confession would entirely lose its force. Yet the words of the Postulation or petition attest as certain that this would have happened in England. Otherwise, no one certainly will be able to deny that, even if no Decree concerning these matters had been issued, nevertheless the manifest utility of this practice appears for this reason, that the Neophyte, vigorously denying himself in a sufficiently difficult matter according to the words of Christ, no differently, namely, than those who, having left all things, followed Christ, will afterward easily, after that victory over himself and strengthened by more abundant powers of grace, walk constantly in the way of the Lord, and indeed will run.

Moreover, since the Decree of the year 1715 related in the Note, upon which the more recent response of the year 1868 rests, referred not to England but to Germany, and nevertheless, as is read there: The Most Holy Father, having heard the votes of the Most Eminent, said: Charles Ferdinand is to be rebaptized conditionally; and, after his Baptism has been conferred, let him confess the sins of his past life and be absolved from them conditionally; it now sufficiently appears that the state of the question altogether required of the VV., not that they contend that a doubtful obligation in the case is not nonexistent, but certainly that they show that the obligation here cannot be called doubtful from an intrinsic reason. But concerning these things in their proper place.

420. ○ QUESTION 4. Should an adult who is to be baptized and absolved conditionally first be baptized or absolved?

Reply 1. Per se it is of little consequence. The reason is that if he has already been validly baptized, absolution will produce its effect whether it is conferred before or after conditional Baptism; but if the prior Baptism was invalid, there will be no effect of the Sacrament of Penance whether it is received before or after the second Baptism; for only one of the two Sacraments can have efficacy in the case.

Reply 2. From considerations of fittingness, it is better to follow the natural order, namely, first to baptize conditionally and then to absolve under condition. Nevertheless, it is expedient that confession be placed before Baptism for the better disposition of the one to be baptized, but that absolution be conferred immediately after Baptism. - Thus commonly in practice [5].

[5] If, however, the Response adduced above (in the preceding Note) in the case of Charles Wipperman has any force, the order which the Author calls natural will have to be followed.

421. ○ QUESTION 5. Is a sin accused only in general sometimes sufficient matter for the VALIDITY or LICEITY of confession [6]; for example, if someone says: I HAVE SINNED, or, I accuse myself OF ALL MY SINS?

[6] The question of liceity can be separated from the question of validity only with regard to the priest, who indeed can sometimes absolve validly and at the same time illicitly. For as regards the penitent, if he acts here in bad faith, the confession will be both illicit and invalid; but if he acts in good faith, the confession will not be illicit.

Moreover, in order to elucidate this question clearly, it is best to distinguish what is required and sufficient for the intrinsic essence of sacramental judgment, and what pertains to the necessity imposed by divine precept. If, therefore, only the essence of this judgment is considered, it can now be doubtful to no one that not merely the formulas adduced by the Author, I have sinned, I accuse myself of all my sins, etc., but also any other sign of penance suffices. Hence all agree that, for soldiers when battle is imminent, or sailors when shipwreck threatens, or the sick at the point of death, etc., to be validly absolved, it suffices that they furnish an indication of penance, for example, by grasping a hand, striking the breast, or in any other manner whatsoever.

The entire question, therefore, turns upon the obligation which the positive law of Christ imposes. But the solution will not be very difficult if it is sought from its native and proper source, namely, from the authentic interpretation of the same law which is found in the doctrine of the Council of Trent. And indeed, from the necessity of a judgment to be rendered by the priest with knowledge of the cause, the Holy Synod (sess. 14, ch. 5) certainly concludes that sins must be declared not merely in general, but individually in species; it concludes that not only all sins, but also those circumstances which change the species of the sin, must be explained in confession. Nevertheless, it never fails to add expressly that it affirms this concerning necessary matter, namely, mortal sins which have never been duly subjected to the keys. For as regards merely sufficient matter, it teaches that venial sins are laudably told by pious men in confession, but at the same time may be concealed without fault; and if the substance of this merely sufficient matter can be concealed, a fortiori its genus and species, and even circumstances which change the species within the slightness of the fault, can be concealed. Indeed, this doctrine shines forth so clearly set out there that, although some have raised many difficulties against the sufficiency of the confession of sin in common (see Lugo, De Poenitentia, disp. 17, from no. 6), not one has ever existed who thought that assistance against it could be sought from the doctrine of the same Synod.

The difficulties were drawn, namely, either from the fact that a confession of this kind gives no new knowledge to the confessor, since it manifests only that the person is a sinner in general, which the confessor already knew, since we are all sinners; or from the fact that a judge cannot judge prudently unless the cause is known in particular; or finally from the fact that in the case nothing appears to which absolution is directly terminated. After Cardinal de Lugo (loc. cit., no. 11 ff.) easily solves these objections even when necessary matter for confession in a case of necessity is at issue, he then extends the doctrine (ibid., no. 17) to the confession of venial sin in general. Hence it is plain that John de Dicastillo (De Sacr. Poenit., disp. 9, no. 760) rightly concluded from these things that not only in a case of necessity, but also speaking per se, the confession of venial sin in general (say the same of even grave sins remitted at another time through absolution) is in itself sufficient matter for absolution in one who has only venial sins. And Suarez agrees (De Poenit., disp. 23, sect. 2, no. 10), both because there is no precept of confessing venial sins in species, and because the confession of venial sin in species declares the conscience no more than if someone should say in general that he had sinned venially, nor does it vary the judgment of the confessor any more. But to what Suarez (ibid.) had added, that this is true speculatively, but that in practice the species must be declared so that the matter may be certain, Dicastillo excellently replies (loc. cit., no. 762): If this is true speculatively, it will also be true practically. For only then in a moral matter is something said to be true speculatively indeed but not practically, when that which is considered in speculation cannot be exhibited in practice without some variation occurring. But when it can be reduced to practice altogether unchanged in the manner in which it is considered in speculation, if it is true speculatively, it must also be judged true practically. Wherefore, since the confession of venial sin in general can be exhibited in practice in the manner which is judged sufficient speculatively, it must also be judged such practically. Otherwise, however, it scarcely appears what Suarez means when he requires certain matter. Is it not certain that there is a sin, or is it not certainly subjected to the keys? But if he wishes the matter to be certain insofar as the safer opinions must be followed in setting forth the circumstances of the sin, this is indeed asserted contrary to the common opinion of all and the common practice, which holds that the precept of confession is satisfied when the precept is probably fulfilled, according to what was said in vol. 1, no. 80.

These things had to be noted, not only so that the rights of truth might be preserved, but also because they can sometimes be usefully serviceable in practice, as will be evident from what is to be said in the resolutions.

 1. The VV. here object (p. 954, no. 104), as though opposed to this doctrine, the following doctrine of St. Alphonsus: Let the Confessor take care, if he wishes to absolve a penitent without sin, either to dispose him to sorrow especially for some light fault..., or to suggest to him that he confess some graver sin of his past life against some precept; for it suffices that he confess in general without number, so that he may have certain matter upon which absolution can rest.

Reply. Let all of it pass; and I deny the consequence. For we concede that this care of the Confessor is laudable, and likewise that the confession of some sin of one's past life against some precept suffices. But we deny either that the sorrow of the penitent cannot otherwise be established, or that certain matter is lacking for absolution if in the case the particular precept which was violated is not expressed.

2. The VV. relate (pp. 479-480, in the Note) that the doctrine handed down here had already been refuted in the periodical Nouvelle Revue theologique, Tournai, 1869, vol. 1, p. 67; and they refer the reader to it.

Reply. Let it be permitted also to us to refer both the illustrious VV. and others to the excellent little Work of the priest Stephen Apicella, entitled: Ai Confessori, studio sull'Assoluzione a darsi a chi nell'attual confessione non offre materia necessaria. Scafati: Tipogr. Pompeiana, 1874. There they will find the difficulties against our thesis very learnedly solved. Meanwhile, we shall weigh two drawn from it which the VV. put forward as the chief difficulties.

3. After the Tournai authors, therefore, the VV. object (p. 480, in the Note) that only through a logical fault is it deduced from the absolution which is given either to soldiers when battle is imminent or to the dying that a general accusation is valid and licit outside a case of necessity.

Reply. That it is deduced through a logical fault as regards validity, I deny; as regards liceity, let it pass. Namely, as is said in the Note, certain things pertain to the intrinsic essence of the Sacrament, namely, apt and sufficient matter, both proximate and remote, and the form; but certain other things pertain only to the necessity of precept, as, for example, the integrity of confession. Now, as regards the essence, it is false that elements which suffice in necessity do not suffice to effect the Sacrament outside necessity; for the essence is not mutable and of itself always retains the same intrinsic power. Therefore, as regards the sufficiency of the essential elements, an argument is logically made from a case of necessity to other cases.

Certainly, one would argue defectively from a case of necessity to other cases as regards things of mere precept, because one can be excused from observing laws in necessity, but not outside necessity. Yet an argument of this kind is falsely ascribed to us. For in the case we say that confession in general is licit, not because one is then excused from a law, but because the law itself requires nothing further.

4. The VV. add (loc. cit.) with the Tournai authors: The nature of the Sacrament, which is effected after the manner of a judgment, requires that the matter be altogether determined through a distinct accusation of sins.

Reply. It requires this according to the norm proposed by the Holy Council of Trent, I concede; otherwise, I deny. See what was said in the Note concerning the doctrine of the Council of Trent.

5. The VV. subjoin with the Tournai authors (loc. cit.): This manner of confessing, which otherwise savors of Protestant usage, favors the laxity and negligence both of the penitent and of the Confessor.

Reply. Objections of this kind, or perhaps better, taunts, savor little of the theological method. Accordingly, as regards Protestant usage, let them consult Bellarmine, Valencia, etc., etc., etc., and learn from them what Protestant usage means. As regards the rest, let it suffice to have replied that those who observe the norm proposed by the Holy Council of Trent cannot be accused either of laxity or of negligence.

6. The VV. insist with the Tournai authors: Even if the doctrine under discussion were probable, nevertheless it would not be lawful to use it, because Proposition 1 among those condemned by Innocent XI stands in the way: It is not illicit in conferring the Sacraments to follow a probable opinion concerning the validity of the Sacrament, with the safer opinion abandoned.

Reply. I deny the supposition, namely, that the validity of the Sacrament is at issue here. For when the essentials are observed, no doubt concerning the validity of the Sacrament remains. But, as has often been said, the essentials are observed here. The present question, therefore, concerns not the essence of the Sacrament but the matter of precept; wherefore what St. Alphonsus replies concerning questions of this kind applies here (Homo apostolicus, tr. 16, no. 29): Nor does it stand in the way to say here that in the matter of the Sacraments we cannot follow merely probable opinions, because this holds when the validity of the Sacrament is at issue; otherwise concerning integrity.

7. Finally, against the opinion of Suarez related in the Note, namely, that the confession of venial sin in species no more declares the conscience nor varies the judgment of the confessor, the VV. object that the judgment of the Confessor can be varied: 1. because he can deny absolution to one relapsing into venial sins; 2. because perhaps that which the penitent judges venial will sometimes be mortal; 3. because venial sins, for example in children, can be insufficiently certain.

Reply. Let all of it pass, and I deny the consequence, since it extends immensely more widely than the premises. For from the fact that sometimes per accidens it is useful to know some fault specifically, it is not lawful to conclude that this is always necessary; but it will belong to the prudence of the Confessor, whenever there is need, to inquire into the things pertinent to the matter. Moreover, from what the VV. observe, namely, that the fault which the penitent believes venial could perhaps be mortal, would this tedious method not bring the matter to the point that the confession of all venial sins would always be judged necessary? But what is the principal point, the VV. cannot be ignorant that this question chiefly concerns whether the specific confession of some sin is necessary when a generic confession of the sins of one's past life is added to the specific confession of light faults, with no sin specifically expressed. For as regards customary confessions of venial sins, the question must rather be called merely speculative, since it is altogether contrary to the custom of the faithful to accuse only venial faults generically. But it happens otherwise with that generic confession of the sins of one's past life. Now, it is manifest that, as regards this confession, the preceding observations of the VV. are not even minimally pertinent. And concerning this argument the cited little Work of the Rev. D. Apicella is worthy of being read. For, among other things, he shows by most apt reasons how vainly certain persons require in this general accusation the confession of some sin in species for the reason that the Confessor might exercise a suitable judgment.

Reply 1. As regards validity: 1. Affirmative, certainly in a case of necessity, or when the penitent, for example, a dying person, cannot accuse any sin in species. - Thus very commonly with St. Thomas. - 2. Affirmative, at least much more probably, even outside a case of necessity, if necessary matter, or matter to be declared in species, is lacking. The reason is that the essence of the Sacrament is not changed for varying cases. - Lacroix, no. 620. - Reuter, no. 303. - Lugo, disp. 17, no. 8.

Reply 2. As regards liceity also, affirmative, at least probably. The reason is that where mortal sins are lacking, there is no obligation to declare the other sins in species, since venial sins can be omitted altogether. For the Council of Trent determined absolutely nothing concerning this except that mortal sins alone are necessary matter for confession. Nevertheless, generally in practice it is expedient (as is also commonly done by all) to confess venial sins in species also, by reason of the direction to be given by the Confessor, etc. But as regards the general accusation of the sins of one's past life which pious penitents are accustomed to submit at the end of confession in order to render the matter of the Sacrament more certain, it is certainly sufficient if someone says: I accuse myself of the sins of my past life, or of my whole life.

422. ○ QUESTION 6. When a penitent presents only doubtful sufficient matter, is the Confessor bound to seek certain matter from his past life in order that he may absolve?

Reply 1. Affirmative, if he wishes to absolve, because otherwise the Sacrament would be exposed to danger of nullity. Except when a case occurs in which the penitent can be absolved conditionally, concerning which below.

Reply 2. Negative, if he does not wish to absolve, but to dismiss the penitent with only a blessing, because a penitent who does not bring certainly sufficient matter has no right to absolution. - Likewise, if the penitent appears to have doubtful sorrow concerning venial sins alone, the Confessor is not ordinarily bound to employ great diligence in order to move him to sorrow, although he does much better if he does so. - But it would have to be said otherwise if doubtful mortal sins were at issue, because of the danger to the penitent.

423. ○ QUESTION 7. Must a penitent who does not bring NECESSARY matter necessarily be absolved?

Reply. Negative per se, if the penitent does not ask for absolution; but even without absolution the reception of Holy Communion can be permitted to him, because, since he is in the state of grace, the Sacrament of Penance is not required to dispose him for it. Nevertheless, ordinarily it is expedient to absolve such a person, so that he may receive both an increase of sanctifying grace and sacramental graces, and an easier remission of venial sins and punishments, etc. - Lacroix, no. 1889, with others.

But if he has not received the Sacrament for a notable time, or if he needs special aids, for example, to overcome temptations, or if the penitent himself desires or requests it, he is to be absolved [7].

[7] Whenever it appears that a penitent has approached, even with merely sufficient matter, in order to receive the Sacrament, and is found disposed, it is scarcely possible to understand to what end certain persons mix together so many disputes about whether he is to be absolved or not, or when he is to be absolved and when not. For certainly it will have been free to the priest to hear the confession or not to hear it. But after he has heard the confession and has the penitent rightly disposed, what laws, I ask, give this power to the confessor, that at his own discretion he absolve or not absolve? And even if you set aside the right acquired by the penitent through confession (which certainly does not wholly depend upon the danger otherwise imminent, or upon the greater or lesser gravity of the matter), what sound reason can persuade the confessor, without any cause and according to his own judgment, to deprive a member of the faithful of the increase of sanctifying grace and of the other heavenly gifts which are the fruits of this Sacrament?

424. Resolutions. - 1. Venial sins, or mortal sins confessed at another time, according to their species, even generically expressed [8], are sufficient and licit matter for confession, apart from number and any circumstances whatsoever. The reason is that thus there is a confession of a determinate sin, at least of one in species; nor is there an obligation to add the number of venial sins or of mortal sins already remitted. For there is nothing in the form of absolution that requires the determination of some particular sin. - Reuter, no. 202.

[8] By generic species some also understand a subalternate genus of sin, as if you confess that you have sinned against justice, or religion, or faith. See Dicastillo, De Poenit., disp. 9, no. 743.

2. If someone does not accuse himself of any sin in particular and says, for example, I know nothing except that I must often have sinned like other men, let him be examined as children are usually examined. If nothing can be elicited since the last confession, let him be questioned about his past life: whether he has ever lied in his life; whether he has ever offended his parents, or been angry, or detracted from his neighbor, etc., etc.

3. With women, devout women, and others of this kind, who confess only confusedly and concerning very light matters, care must be taken that they add some fault from their past life, either in species or at least in general. Then you will endeavor to excite them to sorrow and purpose, and, having absolved them, will dismiss them in peace. - Elbel, no. 19.

4. For greater security and for receiving more certain fruit, penitents are to be advised that, besides doubtful sins or even daily light sins, they always append from those already confessed at least generically [9] another certain sin for which they are more vehemently sorry, lest perhaps the Sacrament be exposed to the danger of frustration. - Elbel, no. 19.

[9] It is most prudently intimated that the confessor should be content with generic confession. For it sometimes happens as a grave burden to the penitent that the confessor wishes to extort a confession of graver sins in species; nor is it a new thing that certain penitents, wearied by this most troublesome importunity of confessors, have afterward approached confession very rarely and only when compelled, as it were, by necessity.

5. But penitents who observe the aforesaid practice are to be admonished not to submit a sin of their past life to the keys again merely from a certain custom, especially if that sin is light, because there is a fear that they may not be sufficiently sorry and consequently may not attain the end of providing for the validity and fruit of the Sacrament [10].

[10] Nevertheless, for this reason the confessor ought not to vex himself or his penitents excessively. For if those are at issue who are accustomed with some care to avoid not only grave but also light sins, they are affected, so to speak, by a habitual hatred of sin, and very easily proceed to the act, although it can happen that sensible sorrow is less in them than in others who need a certain greater change of affections in order to detest sin.

6. According to all, confession in general suffices if the Confessor clearly knows the penitent from another source, for example, from a recent confession of his whole life, etc., and knows that he wishes to accuse himself of sins already known to the Confessor; for then it will suffice to say: I accuse myself of all my sins already known to you; or simply: of all the sins of my past life.

Chapter III. On the Form of the Sacrament of Penance

A twofold form of the Sacrament of Penance can be distinguished: one essential for the validity of the Sacrament, and the other merely preceptive or rubrical.

425. ○ I. The essential form consists in the words: I absolve thee from thy sins. This is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 3, where it says:

The Holy Synod teaches that the form of the Sacrament of Penance, in which its force principally consists, is placed in those words of the Minister: I ABSOLVE THEE, etc.; to which, according to the custom of holy Church, certain prayers are laudably added.

426. ○ II. The preceptive or rubrical form consists in those prayers which precede or follow the essential form. Thus it is contained in the Roman Ritual: May almighty God have mercy on thee and, thy sins having been forgiven, bring thee to everlasting life. Amen.

May the almighty and merciful Lord grant thee indulgence, absolution, and remission of thy sins. Amen.

May our Lord Jesus Christ absolve thee; and I, by His authority, absolve thee from every bond of excommunication (suspension) and interdict, insofar as I am able and thou hast need; then [1]: I absolve thee from thy sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

[1] This word, then, is marked in different type even in the Ritual; and this seems to indicate that it pertains not to those things which the priest must pronounce, but merely to designating their order.

And indeed, that this order be observed is required by the most well-known law which prescribes that penitents be absolved first from censures and afterward from sins.

There have nevertheless been some who thought that the contrary must be held by force of a certain Response of the S. Congregation of Rites. For when the doubt had been proposed, Whether in the form of absolution, before the words - I absolve thee from thy sins - the word - THEN - is to be said or omitted; the S. Congregation replied on February 27, 1847: Let the Decree in the Veronese case of March 11, 1837, be given. But this Decree is of the following kind: Nothing is to be changed. In order for anyone to conclude from this response that this word is to be pronounced by the absolving priest, he must certainly presuppose that the words Nothing is to be changed are synonymous with the words is to be said in the petition.

May the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, the merits of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of all the Saints, and whatever good thou shalt have done and evil thou shalt have endured, be unto thee for the remission of sins, an increase of grace, and the reward of everlasting life. Amen.

The hand is raised from the word Indulgence as far as the words Passion of the Lord; and the sign of the cross is made over the penitent while saying: In the name of the Father.... The word suspension is omitted for laymen. Moreover, it is a pious custom for the Confessor, before the confession, while blessing the penitent, to say: May the Lord be in thy heart and upon thy lips, that thou mayest rightly confess all thy sins, or to recite a similar prayer. - But this does not fall under obligation.

In practice the prayers May He have mercy and Indulgence can easily be omitted, as is established from the Roman Ritual. Indeed, according to the more common opinion, they can always be omitted without sin. They say the same also concerning the prayers which follow absolution; but since, according to a probable opinion, these elevate the good works of the penitent to the merit of sacramental satisfaction, it is fitting that they be omitted as rarely as possible. - But the words May our Lord... do not appear capable of being omitted without venial fault unless necessity presses, since the Roman Ritual says: In more frequent confessions it will suffice to say: May our Lord... as far as Passion of the Lord..., exclusively. - S. Congr. of Rites, February 27, 1847.

427. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is absolution valid if the Priest says only: I ABSOLVE; or, I ABSOLVE FROM THY SINS; or, I ABSOLVE THEE?

Reply to the first. Negative. The reason is that the word I absolve alone conveys no determinate sense and falls upon no subject; therefore, it cannot be a valid form.

Reply to the second. Affirmative, more probably, as it seems, at least speculatively. The reason is that by these words the subject is sufficiently determined; for the pronoun thee is sufficiently expressed in the word thy. - Thus Lugo, disp. 13, no. 26. - St. Lig., no. 430, as more probable, etc. Not a few deny it, however, and their opinion, as St. Liguori says (ibid.), must be followed as the safer.

Reply to the third. Affirmative, more probably, with the common opinion. The reason is that the whole effect of the Sacrament is expressed in these words, without the addition from thy sins. - Furthermore, this also appears to be established from the Catechism of the Council of Trent, On the Sacrament of Penance, no. 14, where it says only: But the form is: I ABSOLVE THEE. And nothing else is added there. - Roncaglia, Lugo, etc. - Nevertheless, some with Lacroix deny this not improbably, and in practice this opinion must be followed.

QUESTION 2. Is the deprecatory form valid; for example, May God absolve thee?

Reply. Negative, at least more probably, with St. Lig., no. 430; Lacroix, no. 639; and very commonly with others. The reason is that the Sacrament of Penance was instituted after the manner of a judgment; accordingly, Christ willed that the Priest, as judge, should render a sentence and express it. Therefore, sins must be remitted by the Priest himself as the minister of Christ; therefore, it does not suffice that he beseech God to remit them. Therefore, etc. Moreover, from the Council of Florence, the indicative form alone is prescribed as the true form of the Sacrament of Penance.

428. ○ QUESTION 3. Are the raising of the hand and the formation of the sign of the cross necessary in imparting absolution?

Reply 1. It is certain that they are not required for the validity of the Sacrament, because they pertain neither to the matter nor to the form. This is established from the Councils of Florence and Trent, and also from the unanimous consent of Theologians, at least after the Council of Trent.

Reply 2. Nor are they required under mortal sin for liceity, according to the common opinion against a few, because it is only a Rubric which does not appear grave. Indeed, several grave authors assert that this can be omitted without sin; thus Busembaum, related and implicitly approved by St. Lig., no. 425, and many others. At least the raising of the hand can be omitted without sin while the prayers which precede formal absolution are being recited.

QUESTION 4. Can a Priest validly absolve several persons with one form, saying: I ABSOLVE YOU FROM YOUR SINS?

Reply. Affirmative, because all things required for validity are found. And this can also be done licitly in a case of necessity, for example, in shipwreck, before battle, or in the battle itself, etc.; and such absolution would be multiple, not formally indeed, but virtually and equivalently, and there would be as many Sacraments as there were persons who were disposed through some confession and sufficient sorrow. - Lacroix, no. 645, and all others.

429. ○ QUESTION 5. What presence of the penitent is regarded as moral with respect to absolution?

Reply. It must be such that the words I absolve thee, according to the moral estimation of men, are judged to fall upon the penitent; but that presence is regarded as sufficiently moral within which men can and are accustomed to speak with an ordinary voice, although a louder one. Many extend it to twenty paces, especially if the penitent is not outside the sight of the Confessor. In necessity the penitent can and must be absolved whenever he is perceived by some sense. - Thus commonly with St. Lig., no. 429.

Hence: 1. one is to be absolved who is seen to fall from a roof, to fall into a river, or to be submerged in the sea, at least if he is not far distant from the Confessor. 2. If the Confessor, because of danger of infection or for another cause, cannot enter the room of a sick person, he must absolve him from the doorway. 3. If a penitent should withdraw from the Confessor without yet having been absolved, thinking himself absolved, he would have to be absolved if he were seen at a short distance or were certainly known to be present within a nearby crowd; nevertheless, he would have to be recalled if this could conveniently be done.

430. ○ QUESTION 6. By the words, I ABSOLVE THEE FROM THY SINS, can the Confessor validly absolve the penitent both from censures and from sins?

Reply. Affirmative, because these words, I absolve thee from thy sins, involve absolution from every bond arising from sins; and nothing prevents the Confessor from directing his intention toward absolution both from sins and from censures. - Thus commonly. - St. Lig., no. 430. - Lacroix, no. 1567, etc.

QUESTION 7. Is absolution valid if the Confessor absolves from sins before absolving from censures?

Reply. Affirmative, because a censure does not impede the validity of the Sacrament, but only its licit reception or administration. He would sin gravely, however, who absolved from sins before absolving from censures, because he would act against a grave prohibition of the Church. Except if excommunications are not at issue, but only suspensions and interdicts, because these censures do not of themselves deprive one of the reception of the Sacrament of Penance. - St. Lig., no. 430. - Lacroix and others commonly.

QUESTION 8. Is a stole required for the Sacrament of Penance?

Reply. Although the Rubric of the Ritual appears to be directive and not preceptive, nevertheless the Sacred Congregation of Rites commands the use of the stole for hearing confessions in a Church (September 11, 1847), in the Paduan case.

Appendix. On the Conditional Form

431. ○ I say I. It is certain that absolution imparted under a condition concerning the present or the past is valid in every case, provided that the other things required for the validity of the Sacrament are present; for the condition in no way changes the sense of the sacramental form, which it does not affect in any respect, but affects only the will of the Confessor, who does not intend to absolve unless the condition placed is fulfilled. But when this is fulfilled, the form becomes absolute; and consequently nothing is found which can prejudice its validity. - Thus St. Lig., no. 431, where he says that all agree concerning this. - Billuart, diss. 6, art. 10, sec. 7, where he asserts that it is the most common opinion. - Collet, De integr. conf., sec. 5. - Antoine, ch. 2, etc. Pontas, under the word Absolution, case 5, is to be numbered among the few adversaries, but he is rightly censured by Collet's annotator, ibid. [2].

[1] On the title above. Someone will perhaps wonder and ask why the Author, beyond both his own custom and that of others, treats more laboriously this argument which hitherto appeared to require lighter labor. But an obvious response presents itself: namely, where and when some new error begins to arise and creep forward, it certainly must be met at once, and the monster, before it grows up and increases in strength, must be utterly destroyed in its cradle by a thunderbolt-like stroke, as Horace says.

[2] The Author here alleges Writers who, according to the testimony of St. Alphonsus, are commonly regarded as more rigorous, namely, to indicate that this doctrine is so certain and manifest that not even the more rigorous thought they should depart from it. Nevertheless, this kind of argument is sometimes fallacious. For it could be shown by many examples that writers regarded as the most rigorous have not rarely declined into laxities which no one among the most benign ever admitted.

432. The adversaries generally distinguish between a condition of fact, for example, if thou art alive, and a condition of law, concerning which the Confessor must judge, for example, if thou art disposed. They permit conditional absolution in the former case because the conditions are not subjected to the judgment of the Confessor, but they reject it altogether in the latter. Hence:

They object 1. The form of the Sacrament of Penance must be judicial; but if the form is conditional, it is not judicial, for a judgment by its nature is absolute, so much so that the sentence of a civil judge who should perhaps say, I adjudge this to thee, if it is thine, is regarded as nothing. Therefore, etc.

Reply 1. I deny the minor. For the form of a judgment is by no means destroyed by adding a condition, even if the condition concerns the dispositions of the penitent. And indeed the Priest judges: 1. concerning the sins disclosed; 2. concerning the penance to be imposed; 3. concerning the probable dispositions of the penitent; 4. concerning the expediency of imparting absolution, although conditionally, on account of the greatest good of the penitent. Therefore, the matter of judgment is not lacking. Reply 2. There is no strict comparison between civil judgment and sacramental judgment; indeed, they differ in many respects, as is evident from what was said above, no. 416. But attend especially to this: the sentence of a civil judge always obtains its effect and is given to execution; whereas in the forum of Penance, whether the sentence is rendered absolutely or conditionally, its effect nevertheless always depends upon hidden conditions known to God alone. Wherefore, the sentence of the Confessor is conditional by its nature, even if it is rendered in the most absolute manner, since it remains entirely unknown to him whether the effect will follow.

433. ○ They object 2. In controversies concerning the validity of the Sacraments, the safer side must always be followed.

Reply 1. I deny the supposition, namely, that this question is subject to controversy, since the opinion of the adversaries possesses no probability, either intrinsic or extrinsic.

Reply 2. It is false that the safer side must always be followed in favor of the Sacrament; for since the Sacraments are for men, cases are given in which the Sacrament must be exposed to danger of nullity in order to assist men placed in spiritual necessity.

But two hypotheses can be imagined when necessity and a doubtful disposition of the penitent concur at the same time. The first is that absolution is simply to be denied; the second, that absolution is to be conceded in any manner whatsoever. Behold, a dying man of doubtful disposition stands before you. Come now! Declare what you will do. Will you allow this penitent to depart from the living without absolution? Will you thus escape the mark of cruelty? For if perhaps he is sufficiently disposed, although you doubt, do you not condemn one who ought to be saved? But if you absolve this penitent, how, I ask, will you absolve? With an absolute form, you say. Very well; but tell me, if you please, will you thereby render a firmer judgment concerning the dispositions of the penitent? Will you judge certainly disposed one whom you know to be doubtfully disposed? Proceed now, therefore: exclude as much as you wish both an oral and even a mental condition; will your sacramental sentence thereby be more certain? Therefore, whether you will or not, if you then absolve, you necessarily absolve conditionally and not otherwise. Indeed, a sacramental sentence in Penance is of itself and by its nature necessarily conditional, since it supposes in the penitent requisite conditions which can be lacking.

434. ○ I say II. It is likewise certain that conditional absolution is sometimes licit; for if it is valid, it must also be licit when necessity presses. - Thus very commonly do Theologians teach. - St. Lig., ibid. - Lacroix, bk. 6, part 1, no. 78. - Elbel, Sporer, the Salmanticenses, etc.

But the doctrine of some who hold that conditional absolution can be imparted for any slight cause and with no necessity pressing, even if the sufficient disposition of a penitent burdened also with mortal sins is doubted in any manner whatsoever, is to be rejected as plainly lax. For no one fails to see how many sacrileges a practice of this kind would induce. For the Confessor would no longer be a prudent dispenser of the Sacraments, but would cast pearls before swine; and by this facility of absolving he would cause penitents to waste away in their sins. - St. Lig., no. 432, etc.

But no more admissible is the doctrine of those who, with Collet and certain others, hold that absolution under condition is not to be imparted except in extreme necessity or in the extreme danger of life; for a doctrine of this kind is exceedingly harmful to penitents who can return to the Confessor only with difficulty and, if dismissed without absolution, incur the danger of eternal damnation.

In what necessity, therefore, absolution under condition can or must be imparted is to be established according to the common doctrine and practice by the following rules.

435. ○ First Rule. Absolution can and must be given under condition whenever, if conceded absolutely, it would expose the Sacrament to danger of nullity, and, if denied absolutely, it would expose the penitent to danger of grave spiritual harm.

Second Rule. Even if a necessity of this kind does not press, absolution can nevertheless be given under condition whenever, if conceded absolutely, it would expose the Sacrament to danger of nullity, and, if denied absolutely, it would deprive the penitent of some notable spiritual good, although not a necessary one.

Hence, with the due conditions observed, when necessity presses or a grave and proportionate cause is present, it is lawful to absolve conditionally in the following cases: 1. in doubt whether the penitent is living or dead; 2. in doubt concerning sufficient matter, for example, when the precept of annual confession presses [3], etc.; 3. in doubt concerning jurisdiction on the part of the Confessor; 4. in doubt whether the penitent was duly absolved; 5. in doubt concerning the use of reason in children, the insane, etc.; 6. in doubt whether the penitent is morally present; 7. in doubt whether a dying person deprived of his senses is capable of the Sacrament [4]; 8. in doubt concerning the disposition of the penitent, when not only extreme but even simply grave spiritual necessity presses. - St. Lig., no. 432. - See the cases to be resolved below, no. 639 [5].

[3] Let no one think from these things that the Author wished to teach in this place that even those who bring not only no necessary matter but not even certainly sufficient matter are bound by the precept of annual confession.

[4] This case refers to a twofold doubt, namely: 1. whether one who is found deprived of his senses is a Christian or not; 2. whether he is capable of absolution by reason of disposition.

[5]  The VV. object, as though opposed to the doctrine set forth here - namely, that it is lawful to absolve under condition also (no. 3) in doubt concerning jurisdiction on the part of the Confessor, and (no. 8) in doubt concerning the disposition of the penitent - the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, who (bk. 6, no. 432), as regards the first point, writes: But I would not admit this unless the penitent would have to lack absolution for a long time. But as regards the second: But I am unable to acquiesce in this doctrine as thus generally handed down; for I say that a sinner relapsing into mortal faults, who is not proved disposed by extraordinary signs, cannot be absolved under condition..., unless it is prudently feared that the sinner will not return again to confession and will waste away in his sins.

Reply. Gury does not propose these things absolutely, but, as he premises, when necessity presses or a grave and proportionate cause is present. But what the proportionate cause is he explains in the Resolutions (no. 439), to which he refers the reader. Moreover, in these Resolutions the reader will find those prudent limits which the VV. relate from St. Alphonsus as though to correct Gury's doctrine.

436. ○ Against the foregoing they object 1. That practice of absolving conditionally, especially those of doubtful disposition, is full of dangers, an encouragement of iniquities, etc.

Reply. I distinguish. That practice is full of dangers, etc., if it is employed indiscriminately, without discretion, and outside a case of necessity or grave utility, I concede; but if the rules handed down are observed, I deny.

They object 2. A penitent doubtfully absolved will proceed to receive the Eucharist and will communicate sacrilegiously; but this cannot be permitted. Therefore.

Reply 1. The Communion will not be sacrilegious, just as the confession is not sacrilegious; for the penitent is supposed to be acting in good faith. At most the Communion will be null, or will produce no fruits.

Reply 2. That Communion will not be useless; for it will easily excite in the communicant various acts and efforts of the virtues, at least some, toward loving God and fleeing evil. Indeed, according to the common opinion, even if the communicant is in the state of mortal sin, nevertheless, if he approaches Communion with attrition and in good faith, he will be restored to the state of grace. Nor will attrition be difficult for him; for approach to the sacred Table and the reception of the Body of Christ are accustomed most easily to arouse pious movements of sorrow and love in those communicating in good faith.

437. ○ They object 3. A penitent doubtfully absolved will no longer confess his sin, and if he was not truly disposed, he will die in sin.

Reply. That sin doubtfully absolved can be remitted: 1. through the reception of the Eucharist, as was just said; 2. indirectly with the others in the next confession, even if the penitent never again subjects his sin to the keys. Nor may you say that perhaps he will no longer approach the Sacrament of Penance; for this case, as rare, must be regarded as something per accidens. But the penitent would have been exposed to a much greater danger to salvation if he had been dismissed without absolution in that grave necessity which we always require for imparting such absolution.

They object 4. It is not lawful to use a probable opinion in the administration of the Sacraments, as is established from Proposition 1 condemned by Innocent XI. Therefore, it is not lawful to give an absolution that will be doubtfully valid.

Reply. I distinguish. Where both the validity of the Sacrament and the good of the person are endangered, I concede; otherwise, where necessity or another grave cause presses, I deny. - St. Lig., nos. 28, 57, and bk. 1, no. 59, and others commonly. In the condemned proposition, nothing is at issue except the essential parts of the Sacrament, namely, the validity of the matter and form insofar as they depend upon the minister. - Thus commonly with Goritia, table V, On Conscience. - But here the matter is supplied by the penitent and is consequently independent of the minister. Otherwise, penitents could for the most part not be absolved, since their dispositions are very often established only probably.

438. ○ They object 5. The practice of absolving conditionally must at least be restricted to the rarest cases of extreme necessity, namely, where a dying person is already deprived of his senses or where he is now on the point of dying; for it is his own fault, and a most grave fault, if he appears doubtfully disposed. - Thus the anonymous Author of the Letters against the excellent book of Cardinal Gousset entitled Justification of the Doctrine of St. Liguori.

Reply. Several false suppositions are found in the objection. For: 1. It is false that a penitent doubtfully disposed is certainly indisposed, at least per se; for there is a contradiction in the very terms. 2. It is false that the penitent is always at fault because he does not appear certainly disposed; for he can be sufficiently disposed without the Confessor knowing this certainly, since whenever he is not certainly indisposed, he can be truly disposed. 3. Grave reasons can be present for the salvation of the penitent on account of which absolution ought to be given rather than omitted, as was said above. Otherwise, there would sometimes be the greatest imprudence in the Confessor if he deferred absolution to extreme necessity, in which the penitent will scarcely, or perhaps hardly at all, be capable of the Sacrament. - See Gousset, Lettres a M. le Cure , Letter 8.

439. Resolutions. - 1. A penitent in mortal sin is to be absolved under condition whenever it is prudently doubted whether absolution was imparted or duly given, and certainty concerning this cannot easily be had. - Thus commonly do the Theologians teach.

2. All the dying concerning whose indisposition or incapacity there is no certainty are to be absolved under condition, as will be said more fully below where the integrity of confession and the minister are treated. - Thus also almost all.

3. Likewise, penitents of doubtful disposition who are in grave danger of death, for example, a woman in difficult childbirth, a sailor or anyone else about to undertake a long voyage, a soldier before battle, a sick person before a very laborious surgical operation, and a fortiori a criminal who is to suffer capital punishment, etc. - Thus commonly with St. Lig., no. 432.

4. Persons of weak understanding can be absolved under condition when there is doubt concerning their use of reason or sufficient disposition, serious diligence having first been employed to dispose them as far as possible, especially in the following cases: 1. if they are in danger of death; 2. if the precept of annual confession presses; 3. if they have confessed some mortal sin. The reason is that they are exposed to danger of proximate damnation if death presses, or because of the danger of remaining for a long time in mortal sin. On the other hand, there is no way or hope that, if absolution is delayed, they will shortly return disposed and be absolved more securely, as can perhaps be hoped concerning others. Indeed, they will be able to be absolved conditionally several times in the year, even if they bring only light sins, lest they be deprived so long of sacramental grace, or remain in mortal sin, if perhaps they are in it. - Thus St. Lig., no. 432. - Lacroix, no. 1797, and many others against others.

5. Those betrothed who are doubtfully disposed and are shortly to contract marriage can also probably be absolved under condition; because otherwise they will certainly profane that Sacrament, and, dejected in spirit because absolution was denied, they will not return to confess and will waste away in sins.

6. Pious penitents also can probably be absolved conditionally at times, when it is doubtful whether they submit sufficient matter to the keys. But it is much better that they furnish certain matter from their past life, and thus not be deprived of the grace of the Sacrament, according to what was said above, no. 424. - St. Lig., no. 442.

Part II. On the Subject of the Sacrament of Penance

Or on the Acts of the Penitent

Three are numbered, namely: 1. contrition; 2. confession; 3. satisfaction.

Chapter I. On Contrition

440. Contrition is sorrow of soul and detestation [1] for a sin committed, with the purpose of not sinning henceforth. Thus the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 4.

[1] The Doctors dispute, as can be seen in St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 435), whether contrition consists in sorrow or in detestation, and what order obtains between these two. But this matters little; nor is it to be feared that either one will be absent. For they mutually presuppose one another, and one is necessarily joined to the other. For, as St. Alphonsus says, he who detests his sin, that is, would wish that he had not sinned, necessarily grieves over it; and, in turn, he who grieves over a sin necessarily detests it. Moreover, detestation appears to extend more widely than sorrow. For sorrow properly can be referred to sins committed by oneself, whereas detestation can be referred to one's own sins and those of others, and both to past and to future sins.

The detestation of sin, in which contrition principally consists, regards the past; but the purpose is concerned with the future. This definition abstracts from the new law, under which contrition can have no efficacy without the desire of confession. The same Council of Trent adds a little below: with the desire of performing the remaining things ... which are required for rightly receiving this Sacrament (of Penance). Hence the definition of St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 1, art. 1, agrees: Sorrow undertaken for sins, with the purpose of confessing and making satisfaction.

Hence we must speak: 1. of contrition strictly so called; 2. of the purpose.

Article I. On Contrition

441. Contrition is distinguished as twofold: 1. Perfect contrition, which is the detestation of sin from the special motive of perfect charity, or of the goodness of God supremely loved for His own sake [1].

[1] Some have thought (see St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, no. 436, and Scavini, tr. 1, disp. 1, ch. 2, art. 1, sec. 1, q. 1) that for perfect contrition it is more probably not sufficient that it be elicited from the motive merely of some one divine attribute, but that it is required to proceed from the motive of the offense against the divine goodness, insofar as this goodness embraces all the perfections of God. They attribute this opinion to Cardinal de Lugo, Suarez, Vasquez, etc.

But the authority from which the entire strength of this opinion arises is altogether wanting. For the cited Doctors do not dispute whether the motive of contrition ought to be taken from the aggregate of the divine perfections rather than from some particular perfection of God, but whether the motive of another virtue besides charity suffices for perfect contrition; for example, if the sorrow is (as Suarez says, De Poenitentia, disp. 2, sect. 3, no. 4, and disp. 4, sect. 2, no. 15) from the motive of obedience, religion, penance, gratitude, etc.; because, as Lugo says (De Poenitentia, disp. 5, no. 3), the sin is against the precept of Him whom we are bound to obey, or against His worship, etc. The formal motive of these virtues, as is plain, is different from the motive of charity.

Moreover, since the formal object of charity is the supreme excellence and infinite perfection of God, on account of which He is to be loved above all things with an appreciative love, and since this infinite perfection and excellence of the supreme good shines forth in each of the attributes, Ripalda (De Virtutibus Theologicis, disp. 35, sect. 1) therefore rightly establishes, from the common opinion of the Theologians whom he cites (ibid., no. 4), this thesis: The formal object of charity is the divine goodness insofar as it is common and proper to the nature of God and to the attributes. St. Thomas expressed this more briefly (De Virtutibus, q. 2, art. 4, ad 5), saying that an object of this kind is the divine good.

Nor should it be passed over here that the objects of the other virtues which we have mentioned, namely, obedience, gratitude, religion, etc., if not a motive of perfect contrition, are certainly a most apt motive of imperfect contrition; indeed, by this path penitents can easily be drawn to the motive of perfect charity. For if, together with the motive of obedience, religion, justice, etc., there is added a consideration of the infinite excellence of God, to whom an injury was either inflicted, or obedience denied, or worship withheld, one will very easily arrive at the perfection of charity. These things ought to be ready at hand for the confessor, so that there may readily be available to him a means of advancing penitents to more perfect things at the opportune time.

 The VV. have written twenty-five columns to attack this Note (pp. 399-411). Nevertheless, they have scarcely, if at all, touched the hinge of the question. St. Alphonsus had written (bk. 6, no. 432): It is asked from what motive the act of perfect contrition ought to be elicited? And he replies: The first opinion, which several hold, says that it can be elicited from the motive of any offended divine attribute, of justice, wisdom, mercy, etc. And Suarez and Lugo rightly judge this probable. The reason is that he who loves the divine justice or mercy for God's sake already loves God ...; therefore, he who grieves over sin because of God's offended mercy or justice ... already grieves for God's sake.... But the second opinion, common and more probable, which Suarez, Vasquez (who calls the opposite erroneous), and Croix with Arriaga, Dicastillo, and others generally hold, teaches that contrition must altogether proceed from the sole motive of charity, namely, of the divine goodness offended, insofar as this embraces all the perfections of God.

Now, as regards the first opinion, it is false that either Suarez, Lugo, or Vasquez, in the cited places, discusses an act by which either justice or mercy, etc., is loved for God's sake; rather, they treat of sorrow elicited, not from any motive of charity, but from the motive of another virtue, not theological but moral, such as religion, justice, obedience, etc.; and they ask whether this sorrow is that perfect contrition which has the power of justifying.

Thus Vasquez (q. 85, art. 2, no. 45, which is the place cited by St. Alphonsus): I would judge erroneous the opinion of the more recent authors, who teach that the act of contrition ... is not the love of God, nor necessarily proceeds from the love of God, and NEVERTHELESS JUSTIFIES.... But concerning sorrow which is not the love of God and does not proceed from the love of God, he had premised (loc. cit., no. 35): Insofar as it is against the justice of God, it is hatred from THE SPECIAL VIRTUE OF PENANCE, and thus the hatred (of sin) under this aspect is a compensation for the offense from justice, such as ours can be found before God. Concerning this matter he adds below (ibid., no. 38): Nor does there appear to be another manner of justice on our part toward God than toward His precept, which OBEDIENCE supplies, ... or finally RELIGION in rendering, nevertheless, the worship due to God, which also is constituted by the Scholastics as a part of potential justice. Therefore, no trace is found here of the love of God from the motive of some attribute, of which St. Alphonsus speaks.

The holy Doctor then cites Lugo, De Poenitentia, disp. 5, no. 3. But neither does Lugo have a single word about that love of God from the motive of one attribute. Behold his words: Some Theologians teach that, for contrition, it suffices that the sorrow be either from the motive of charity (and this Lugo also admits with all the Doctors), or from the motive of obedience, or religion, or penance: namely, because sin displeases God, whom we love (and this is the motive of charity), or because it is against His precept, whom we ought to obey, or against His worship, or finally because it is against the right of God, which we are bound to observe, which they say is the motive of penance.... Father Suarez says that this opinion is probable, and that it once pleased him ..., although Father Suarez speaks only of sorrow arising from the motive of justice.... But to this sorrow from the motive either of obedience, religion, penance, or justice, in which Lugo finds nothing of that love on account of some divine attribute of which St. Alphonsus speaks, and which he indeed presents as moral virtues (no. 6), Lugo himself opposes the motive of charity, without, however, adding anything about a motive from all the perfections of God. Thus he says (no. 3): Yet other Theologians commonly teach that sorrow from the motive of the love of God is altogether required. And again (ibid., no. 10): It must altogether be said, with the common opinion, that contrition sufficient for justification must arise from the particular motive of charity, namely, of God loved above all things.

Nor do the things which he adduces from Suarez serve the purpose of St. Alphonsus any better. Speaking (De Poenitentia, disp. 4, sect. 2, no. 13) of the detestation of sin which is from the proper motive of justice, Suarez writes: It has seemed probable to some that this act, of itself and without formal love, suffices for the nature of contrition. And this opinion is indeed probable, and at one time simply pleased me. But now, the matter having been better considered, it seems that the contrary opinion is to be chosen. St. Alphonsus, as is evident from his words cited above, here understands the motive of justice as the divine attribute of justice which is the object of love. But nothing is more foreign to the opinion of Suarez; for he here understands justice as the virtue by which the sinner wishes to compensate God for the injury inflicted. Hence he writes (disp. 2, sect. 3, no. 4): Since this virtue of penance is a certain justice toward God, its object will be the divine right.

Dicastillo, whom St. Alphonsus nevertheless adduces for his purpose, presents the state of the question in no different manner. For Dicastillo says (De Poenitentia, tr. 8, disp. 2, no. 106): We now ask whether, in order that penance be perfect and sufficient (for the remission of sins), an act of love of God is required; and some deny this, thinking that perfect penance can exist without that love. For they think it sufficient that it be FROM THE MOTIVE OF OTHER VIRTUES; Suarez confesses that he at one time inclined to this opinion.... But he speaks of the motive according to which he thinks an act of the special virtue of penance is constituted. And other more recent authors think the same concerning other motives, especially according to the various opinions for establishing the motive of the special virtue of penance. Then, against these, he establishes this thesis (ibid., no. 112): It must altogether be asserted that penance is never contrition sufficient for the remission of sins outside the Sacrament without a formal act of love of God, and that this act belongs to the intrinsic nature of perfect contrition, which is distinguished from attrition. Therefore, it is not true, as St. Alphonsus supposes, that Dicastillo disputes whether merely some one divine attribute or rather the aggregate of all the perfections is the formal object of charity and therefore of perfect contrition, and that he defends the second opinion against the first.

Moreover, if it is asked by what means St. Alphonsus, with no one preceding him, gave a new face to the question ordinarily treated here, and attributed to the cited Doctors opinions about which they themselves had said nothing, and indeed had not even thought, one perhaps will not wander altogether from the truth who thinks that this happened to the holy Doctor merely because of a less skillful interpretation of the words of Croix, from whom he also borrowed the citations. For Croix had written (bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 722): This contrition (sufficient for justification without the Sacrament) must proceed from the motive of the goodness of God, and therefore be a hatred of sin because it is evil to God. St. Thomas, Arriaga, Dicastillo, and others most commonly teach this against a few who have said that this contrition can proceed from the motive of religion alone, or justice, or another virtue regarding God, apart from every punishment or reward, and therefore that it suffices to detest sin, for example, because it is against the worship of God, against the right of God, etc.; Suarez calls this opinion probable, and Aversa and Lugo defend it as probable; on the contrary, Arriaga says that it is not intrinsically probable, ... Vasquez calls it erroneous.

That St. Alphonsus took both the core of the question and the citations from this source is gathered not obscurely, not only from his words copied above, but also from the edition of the year 1748, where he writes (bk. 6, tr. 4, ch. 1, dub. 2, note A):

Question II. From what motive can contrition proceed? Some think that it can proceed from any offended divine attribute; but most commonly, says Croix, bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 722, with St. Thomas, Dicastillo, and others, contrition must proceed from the motive of the offended Goodness of God. Accordingly, the contrition which Croix had said, according to the opinion of a few, proceeds from the motive of religion, justice, or another virtue regarding God, the holy Doctor interpreted as contrition which proceeds from any offended divine attribute. He afterwards explained this more fully in the edition of the year 1757, saying that it is contrition which proceeds from the motive of any offended divine attribute, of justice, wisdom, mercy; and he gave the reason, as we saw above, because he who loves divine justice ... for God's sake already loves God; hence, he who grieves over sin on account of offended justice already grieves for God's sake. Everyone sees for himself how foreign these things are to the sense in which Croix, after Suarez, Lugo, Vasquez, Dicastillo, etc., spoke of contrition from the motive of justice or religion.

Lugo (loc. cit., no. 9) certainly indicates more aptly how contrition from the motive of other virtues can in some way be drawn to the motive of love of God, insofar as, he says, to love is said to be to will good to someone; for since through religion we will the worship of God, through penance we will not to offend Him, through obedience we will to fulfill His will, etc., all these things appear to contain love of God. He then rejects these things and establishes the contrary thesis (ibid., no. 10), which we related above. For these acts pertain not to theological but to moral virtues, and they furnish a motive not of perfect contrition but of attrition, no differently from sorrow from the motive of ingratitude toward the most beneficent God.

These things having been premised, the reply to the twenty-five columns of the VV. is easy. For: 1. what they heap together concerning the formal object of charity considered either adequately or inadequately has nothing to do with the argument of the Note which they undertake to attack; 2. from what has been said, it is sufficiently plain whether the citations of Vasquez, Suarez, and Lugo, whom St. Alphonsus cited, are pertinent.

2. Imperfect contrition, or attrition, which is the detestation of sin arising from another motive, for example, from consideration of the turpitude of sin, or from fear of hell, or from love of eternal beatitude. - Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 4.

Three things are to be explained here: 1. the necessity; 2. the qualities; 3. the efficacy of contrition.

§ I. On the Necessity of Contrition

442. Things to be established. I. Either perfect contrition with the desire of the Sacrament, or imperfect contrition with the Sacrament itself, is altogether necessary to the sinner by a necessity of means for obtaining justification and salvation.

1. It is established from Sacred Scripture, Matt. 3:2: Do penance, for the kingdom of heaven has drawn near. - Luke 13:3: Unless you shall have penance, you shall all likewise perish. - And ibid. 5: Unless you shall do penance, you shall all likewise perish. - Ecclus. 2:22: If we shall not do penance, we shall fall into the hands of the Lord and not into the hands of men. - Apoc. 2:5: Do penance and perform your first works; otherwise I come to you and will move your candlestick out of its place, unless you shall do penance. - Acts 3:19: Do penance, therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out.

2. It is established from the Councils, especially from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 4: At every time this movement of contrition has been necessary for obtaining pardon of sins. And sess. 6, ch. 6, where hatred and detestation for sin are numbered among the chief dispositions for justification.

443. II. Mortal sin being supposed, contrition is necessary by a necessity of precept, at least at some time in life. For this precept is gathered from the words of Sacred Scripture related above, from the words of St. John the Baptist at the beginning of his preaching, and especially from the words of Christ Himself in the Gospel. That contrition which is required for justification is understood to fall under the precept, namely, perfect contrition outside the Sacrament, or attrition with the Sacrament. - St. Lig., no. 337. - Billuart, diss. 4, art. 3, and all others.

III. The precept of contrition obliges sometimes per se, sometimes per accidens.

1. It obliges per se when a grave necessity of reconciling oneself with God presses, namely, in even probable danger of death, and this on account of the precept of attaining the ultimate end; likewise, when someone is in the state of sin, because of the proximate danger of dying in this wretched state [1], or of falling into graver sins [2].

[1] These things are not to be understood so generally as though a man were obliged to this immediately after sin; for that, as the Author himself teaches a little below, is contrary to the common opinion of Theologians after St. Thomas, and is excluded by the same reasons by which St. Thomas (In IV Sent., dist. 17, q. 3, art. 1, q. 4) rejects the necessity of confessing immediately after sin. Apart from the point of death, however, the more common opinion, as Palaus says (De Poenitentia, disp. un., punct. 3, no. 9), admits at least that delay which the precept of the Church concerning annual confession also admits (see Laymann, De Poenitentia, ch. 2, no. 6); and St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 473) attributes this doctrine even to St. Thomas.

[2] This obligation also of eliciting an act of contrition for warding off other sins is a mere opinion of certain authors. Therefore, the statement of Cardinal de Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 15, nos. 55-56) is to be observed: Because of the variety of opinions, we cannot impose upon him (namely, the penitent) a certain obligation.

On this argument, the things which Suarez has (De Poenitentia, disp. 15, sect. 6, nos. 7-8) and Cardinal de Lugo (loc. cit. and disp. 7, nos. 240, 242) are to be seen; from these it may be concluded either that no necessity of eliciting contrition for this reason is proved, or that its omission is not a sin distinct from that into which one falls because that means was omitted.

2. It obliges per accidens when another precept presses which cannot be fulfilled without contrition, especially in the following cases: namely, when the precept of annual confession presses; when the precept of an act of charity presses; when one guilty of grave sin is about to receive or administer a Sacrament; whenever the Sacrament of Penance is received, even for the sake of devotion. - St. Lig., ibid.

444. Questions. QUESTION 1. Does the precept of contrition oblige immediately after a mortal sin has been committed?

Reply. Negative, against a few of the ancients [3], because the precept of contrition is affirmative, namely, Do penance; but an affirmative precept does not oblige at every moment; therefore, the precept of contrition does not press immediately after a sin has been committed. Moreover, sins would thus be multiplied according to the number of instants of delay, which is contrary to the common sense of the faithful [4]. - St. Lig., no. 437. - Elbel, no. 54. - Billuart, etc.

[3] Nevertheless, this opinion is undeservedly attributed to most of them; for example, Alexander of Hales, Paludanus, and Thomas of Strasbourg indeed affirm that the penitent is bound to be contrite for committed sins always throughout his whole life, but they explain this so that he is bound to it negatively, that is, not again to take complacency in the sin when it occurs to his memory. Cajetan (Summa, s.v. Contritio) explains this opinion thus: From the fact that sins occur to the memory, just as one is not bound to confess, so neither is he bound to be contrite. For each is an affirmative precept, obliging at a time of necessity, which memory does not constitute; but he is bound always not to approve, not to take complacency, because these are negative precepts, which oblige always and at every time.

 It was indeed a remarkable achievement of Cardena that, against the common opinion, he gathered together (pt. 4, diss. 6, no. 47) both the authors just mentioned and several others, among whom scarcely, if at all, one is to be found who really pertains to the matter. He contends that this obligation of applying the means of justification immediately after sin arises from this (which no one either before or after him ever dreamed), because, as he says (no. 53), Christ commanded all men in the Gospel that they always watch and be ready for the hour of death to be expected, because they know neither the day nor the hour.

[4] This reason is to be understood with discretion. For the Doctors are not accustomed to say that one who, for example, culpably delays restitution or annual confession sins anew at every instant, but rather whenever, advertent to the obligation and able to fulfill it, he neglects it. Indeed, even this occurs only when the subsequent acts do not follow by virtue or efficacy of the preceding purpose. See On Sins, vol. 1, no. 166.

QUESTION 2. What delay of contrition induces a grave sin?

Reply. The Theologians do not agree. It is indeed commonly admitted that there is a grave delay of contrition independently of the precept of annual confession; but how great this delay must be in order to be judged grave cannot be determined with certainty. Some extend it to a year; others to six months; others, with St. Alphonsus, to a month. Yet no reason or authority favors this last opinion [5]. Indeed, St. Alphonsus himself adds, no. 437, that sinners, especially the uneducated, can for the most part, indeed almost always, be excused from this sin of delayed penance because of inadvertence [6].

[5]  For this monthly obligation of contrition the VV. produce a threefold argument from St. Alphonsus (p. 394, no. 106). 1. Because we are bound each month to elicit an act of charity, as the holy Doctor has it (bk. 2, no. 8, and Homo apostolicus, tr. 16, no. 10). 2. Because otherwise a man could with difficulty observe the divine commandments for a long time (bk. 2, no. 8). 3. To this is added the authority of St. Thomas, who cites St. Gregory the Great and says: Without justifying grace it is not possible for one to remain long without mortal sin.

Reply to 1. Elsewhere (vol. 1, no. 218, q. 2, in the Note) it was shown that an obligation of this kind is urged without foundation either of reason or authority, and indeed contrary to principles received by all.

To 2. Reply: If contrition were the only means of avoiding sins, let it pass; otherwise, I deny it. See Suarez, De Poenitentia, disp. 15, sect. 6, no. 7, and Lugo, De Poenitentia, disp. 15, nos. 51-52.

To 3. I reply by using the words of St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 437), who, after saying that he thinks one who, existing in mortal sin, delays penance for a notable time is in no way excused from mortal sin, then adds: But what this notable time is, the Doctors disagree greatly.... The Salmanticenses, Palaus with Laymann and Elbel, Lugo, Henno, etc., think that one who satisfies the annual confession is excused; and St. Thomas, in IV Sent., dist. 17, q. 3, art. 1, q. 4, appears to adhere to this opinion. Therefore, according to St. Alphonsus himself, the cited words of St. Thomas, with St. Thomas himself interpreting both himself and St. Gregory the Great, are to be understood of those who do not satisfy the obligation of annual confession.

Moreover, the things noted in vol. 1, loc. cit., must be recalled here also, namely, that a conscience of a grave obligation or grave guilt must not be introduced where this is not established by a certain reason; for this also is a most firm principle of St. Alphonsus himself.

[6] Cardinal de Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 15, no. 55) speaks thus on this matter: It is not necessary to question the penitent concerning this sin of omitting due penance throughout the whole year, whether per se from the precept of the virtue of penance, ... or per accidens for avoiding the danger of a new sin, nor even to admonish him in particular.... And this can be proved by the example of the precept of loving God, concerning which penitents are not questioned in particular whether they have loved God above all things, nor are they admonished concerning that obligation of fulfilling this precept at some time; both because from the very course of the confession it sufficiently appears how the penitent is disposed toward God, and because, on account of the variety of opinions, we cannot impose upon him a certain obligation. Indeed, he continues thus concerning the omission of the questioning and admonition: Such questioning or admonition appears useless, indeed harmful. For either the penitent is invincibly ignorant of that obligation; and then it is better to leave him in good faith than to bring him into bad faith, from which his scandal can prudently be feared. For very few among sinners of this kind will afterward, because of that knowledge, be moved to grieve over their sins before the end of the year; rather, they will add this also to their other sins by omitting the penance which they ought to have. But if the penitent knew such an obligation, he will be admonished about it in vain. Finally, he proposes an objection, in solving which he also touches upon the uncertainty of the obligation. You will say: nevertheless, it will be necessary to inquire concerning the omission ...; because if he knew the obligation, or was culpably ignorant of it, the omission was a sin, and consequently must be explained in confession. But to the contrary: neither under this heading is it necessary to inquire distinctly; for EVEN IF IT WERE CONCEDED THAT SUCH AN OBLIGATION EXISTS, nevertheless, the Confessor, having heard the confession of the penitent, from the sins which he committed throughout the whole year sufficiently understands that he did not satisfy the obligation, IF THERE WAS ANY, of grieving frequently over his sins.... Therefore, he would be questioned or admonished more distinctly in vain, especially in such matter CONCERNING WHICH THE CONFESSOR HIMSELF COULD NOT ESTABLISH ANYTHING CERTAIN FOR DETERMINING THE OBLIGATION for the following time (ibid., no. 56).

445. QUESTION 3. Is one who at the point of death receives the Sacrament of Penance with attrition bound, in addition, to elicit an act of perfect contrition?

Reply 1. He does not appear to be bound to an explicit act of contrition, since he is morally certain that he has been justified by attrition alone with the Sacrament. - Thus Lugo and others commonly, against some.

Reply 2. According to some, however, he is bound, for they say that the precept of perfect charity presses especially at the point of death. Whatever may be the case, it is expedient that the dying be excited, as far as can be done, both to an act of charity and to an act of perfect contrition. - St. Lig., no. 437 [7].

[7]  The VV. here produce (p. 935, no. 107) the things which St. Alphonsus has (bk. 6, no. 437): Each opinion, says the holy Doctor, is probable; but the first (the second here in Gury) is altogether to be counseled.... Indeed, I say that it is altogether to be followed by one who is at the actual point of death. For then everyone is bound to elicit an act of charity ..., which no one can satisfy if, when the memory of sin occurs, he does not detest the sin from the same motive of charity.

Reply. If each opinion, as the holy Doctor testifies, is probable, therefore the obligation of either one can by no means be imposed. For obligation is so called from binding. But a doubtful law does not bind, as the holy Doctor repeats a hundred times. Therefore, a merely probable law does not bind.

But what is added concerning the obligation of an act of charity at the point of death requires a distinction. For if the discussion concerns a man in the state of sin who has no other means of justification, it is conceded that there is an obligation of obtaining justification through contrition perfected by charity; otherwise, it is denied. See what is said concerning this argument in vol. 1, no. 219, resolution 2, in the Note.

QUESTION 4. For obtaining grace in the Sacrament, are explicit acts of Faith and Hope required in addition to sorrow?

Reply. Negative. The reason is that it cannot be proved by any probable argument that these acts are explicitly required [8]. Moreover, a penitent eliciting an act of sorrow also in some way explicitly and exercitively elicits these acts, although not reflexively; because he then without doubt exercitively believes and hopes that his sins are to be remitted through the Sacrament of Penance by virtue of the merits of Christ. - St. Lig., no. 439, and others commonly, against some.

[8] Some required these acts because they are expressly mentioned by the Council of Trent where the process of justification is described (sess. 6, ch. 6). This reason would also prove the necessity of hearing a preacher of the faith, since it is said there: conceiving faith from hearing; and, moreover, the insufficiency of sorrow perfected by charity without imperfect sorrow, because it is added there: they are struck by fear of divine justice!

Suarez speaks to the matter (De Poenitentia, disp. 4, sect. 2, no. 7): Finally, in sess. 6, ch. 6, the Council numbers several acts in the disposition of the sinner, all of which need not always concur formally, but it suffices that they concur virtually or implicitly, as an act of hope.

And yet there are confessors who, led by that prejudice, require penitents before the confession of sins to recite the customary formulas of the acts of the theological virtues, unless perhaps they even dismiss them so that they may first satisfy this supposed necessity. This is all the more remarkable because in the customary formula of the act of faith you will not find the things which the Council said must be believed, namely, that God through Christ will be propitious to him, etc.

446. QUESTION 5. Does one sin who confesses some venial sin without sorrow?

Reply. Negative, more probably, provided that sorrow concerning other sins, or at least one, is not lacking, and that the penitent does not knowingly submit the other sins as matter of absolution [9]. The reason is:

[9] Distinguish with Suarez (De Poenitentia, disp. 20, sect. 6, no. 7) a twofold manner in which someone can confess a venial sin without true attrition or a purpose of amendment. 1. If he discloses to the confessor this very defect of sorrow and purpose; then neither ought the priest to absolve from such a sin, nor, if the penitent is prudent, ought he to tell it for this end, namely, as matter of the Sacrament, since it cannot truly be such. Nevertheless, it can licitly be told either for the sake of humility, counsel, or incitement to true penance; but this manner has nothing to do with the present matter. 2. If he discloses the venial sin over which he does not grieve, like the others, as matter of absolution. Then, says Suarez, many think it a mortal sin.... But although it cannot be denied that it is some fault, nevertheless I do not judge it mortal, because the matter of such a fault is light; because the defect of that sorrow or purpose, of itself and by its nature, is not contrary to grace and justification, which is the primary effect of this Sacrament signified by the form ...; nor does it impede the remission of the other venial sins concerning which a true accusation capable of true absolution is made, notwithstanding the obstacle of some venial sin. See also Lugo, De Poenitentia, disp. 14, no. 48.

Moreover, even that light fault of which Suarez speaks will more often be absent, either because the penitent does not advert to this defect of sorrow or to the disorder of that defect, or because all displeasure is rarely absent, although it may not be sufficiently efficacious; in this matter it is often difficult to avoid deception.

1. for the validity of the Sacrament, it suffices that some certain matter be furnished, namely, that there be sorrow for some venial sin; for venial sins are not necessary matter of the Sacrament of Penance, and, moreover, since they do not deprive one of the grace and friendship of God, some can be remitted without the others; 2. because no injury is thereby inflicted upon the Sacrament if they are declared for a good end, all levity being excluded. Indeed, those venial sins for which one does not have at least certain sorrow are also very often usefully disclosed, namely, for a fuller manifestation and direction of conscience, for conceiving some confusion, etc. - See St. Lig., no. 449.

447. QUESTION 6. Must contrition precede confession?

Reply 1. It must certainly precede absolution, or at least coexist with it, as is plain. But speaking practically, it is required that sorrow at least precede absolution, because no penitent who feels himself indisposed can ask for or receive absolution.

Reply 2. For the validity of the Sacrament, sorrow need not necessarily precede the accusation. The reason is that all things required for the Sacrament are present, provided that sorrow precedes absolution; nor can a precept of placing sorrow before the confession of sins be proved. - Lugo, Suarez, and others most commonly. Moreover, when Theologians require a sorrowful confession, they appear to require nothing other than that the confession not be a mere narration of sins, but that it be a self-accusation ordered to obtaining absolution. - St. Lig., no. 445 [10].

[10] Thus St. Alphonsus: Laymann with others (namely, Coninck and Palaus) require the confession to be sorrowful, or sorrow to precede confession, only insofar as they demand that the confession not be a mere narration of sins but have the nature of sacramental confession; and for this it suffices that the confession be made with the intention of obtaining absolution, and that sorrow then be manifested at least by the petition or expectation of absolution. These last words meet Coninck's objection that sorrow must be sensible. Since various authors reply to this difficulty in various ways (see Lugo, disp. 14, nos. 14-18), as the words of St. Alphonsus indicate, perhaps another could also answer that there is no need at present for those subtleties if, according to what was said elsewhere (above, in the Note to no. 414), one prefers the opinion which holds the acts of the penitent merely as the matter circa quam, and therefore attributes to absolution alone that it is the efficacious sign of grace.

Moreover, Lugo writes thus concerning Coninck's opinion (De Poenitentia, loc. cit., no. 13): This opinion is singular and has all the other theologians against it.... It also has against it the practice of the faithful; for if they have perhaps confessed their sins without sorrow and afterward, moved by the exhortation of the confessor, are excited to have sorrow for their sins, they think they satisfy sufficiently if they then grieve before absolution. Indeed, confessors are accustomed especially then to move penitents to sorrow for this end (which is also the practice prescribed in the Roman Ritual), that they may dispose themselves to receive valid absolution; nor do they oblige them, after sorrow has then been conceived, to repeat the confession which was made without preceding sorrow. These things plainly show that the solicitude of certain confessors is to be banished to empty scruples: after they have excited the penitent to sorrow, they wish altogether to extort from him again some confession, at least in a few words, for example: I accuse myself of the sins narrated.

 And St. Alphonsus in fact has it thus (bk. 6, no. 445, at the end): But the Salmanticenses add that, merely for quieting scruples, Confessors are accustomed, if they doubt the internal indisposition of the penitent, to excite him to grieve over the sins explained a little before, which is done if it is said: I grieve over the sins narrated, and I accuse myself. The holy Doctor placed these words immediately after those read above in this Note, which the holy Doctor had said to show that in this question no discord exists among the Doctors except in words: Therefore, he says, these are not two opinions, but one.

Nevertheless, behold, the VV. (p. 935, no. 108) oppose the things which St. Alphonsus elsewhere has thus (Homo apostolicus, tr. 16, no. 20): Must sorrow precede confession? Laymann ... affirms it, both because sorrow must be sensible and cannot become such except by confession, and because confession ... must be sorrowful; otherwise it would be a simple narration of sins. But others more commonly deny it ..., and the Ritual favors them.... And they rightly reply to the first reason by saying that sorrow becomes sensible not only through confession, but also by other signs and words. But to the second reason they bring no convincing reply; hence, on account of it, I say that the first opinion is probable and therefore is to be followed in practice. They commonly agree ..., however, that it suffices if the penitent, after the act of sorrow, says: Again I accuse myself of all the sins confessed.

Reply. It does not sufficiently appear to what end the VV. produce these things. For in order that anyone may at times use the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, will it also be necessary that he undertake the burden of examining every little work of the holy Doctor? But where the opinions of the different Works of the holy Doctor do not appear to agree very well with one another, as in the present matter, by what means indeed will you avoid the complaints of the VV., who, whichever opinion of the holy Doctor you finally choose, do not hesitate to oppose to you the other, contrary one? And indeed, to the things which the VV. object from the Homo apostolicus, someone could reply according to the things which are taken from the Moral Work (bk. 6, no. 445), and therefore with St. Alphonsus as guide: I deny the antecedent, namely, that in either opinion confession cannot be called sorrowful; and consequently I deny the antecedent, namely, that the contrary opinion is probable; and therefore I deny the consequence, namely, that this opinion is to be followed and therefore, except perhaps for quieting an empty scruple, it is necessary to add: Again I accuse myself, etc. Why would this man be liable to the censure of the VV.? For even if he had chosen the opinion which is handed down in the Homo apostolicus, would it not have been ready at hand for the VV. to object the things read in the Moral Work?

But something more serious to be noticed in the present matter occurs. The opinions of St. Alphonsus which the VV. here object from the Homo apostolicus are also found in the Moral Work of the same holy Doctor published in earlier years, namely, both in the edition of the year 1748 (bk. 6, tr. 4, ch. 1, dub. 2, note A, q. III) and in the other of the year 1757 (bk. 6, no. 445); in that same year he published the work written in Italian under the title Istruzione e pratica per un Confessore, which work he then published in Latin in the year 1759 under the title Homo Apostolicus instructus, etc. But since these same opinions are not found in the later editions of the Moral Work, as is plain from the texts cited above from bk. 6, no. 445, it is manifest that the holy Doctor himself, his opinion having been changed, corrected that place. But if the matter is thus, by what right of equity, by what zeal for truth, or by what zeal for sound doctrine do the VV. now draw forth and oppose against one who proposes the doctrine refined and reformed by the holy Doctor himself those things which the same holy Doctor had rejected?

QUESTION 7. For what space of time does an act of sorrow morally endure for validly receiving the Sacrament?

Reply. This cannot be determined. According to the common opinion, it can endure for one or even several days, provided that it was elicited with the intention of making confession [11], and was not retracted by another sin. Moreover, penitents should be counseled to renew, immediately before confession, the act of contrition previously elicited, especially if afterward they turned their mind to other things for a notable delay. - St. Lig., no. 446 [12].

[11] What the Author indicates, that sorrow must be elicited with the intention of confession, has at most some probability. Indeed, even St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 447) could not deny that the opinion is more probable which teaches that sorrow is valid even if someone elicits it while then thinking nothing of the Sacrament, which he afterwards receives when the occasion is offered.

On this argument, compare Cardinal de Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 14, nos. 37-40), who not only excludes by most weighty reasons the necessity of that intention, but moreover notes that, according to Suarez and Reginald, who support the contrary opinion, it suffices that the preceding sorrow, even though elicited without an intention of confession, afterward moves one to confession or is in some way expressed in confession; these things, as is plain, fall entirely into the common opinion of Cardinal de Lugo.

But the little reason adduced to the contrary (in St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.), that through intention the matter must be ordered to the Sacrament, as ablution to Baptism and the touching of the instruments to Holy Orders, first supposes that sorrow is the matter of the Sacrament in the same sense as ablution in Baptism, namely, matter ex qua, which pertains to a mere opinion (see above, Note to no. 414); and then it is refuted by the very example of Holy Orders, for the Ordination of an infant is held valid, although he certainly cannot, through an intention of which he is incapable, order the touching of the instruments to the Sacrament.

Nor does the reason taken from Proposition I proscribed by Innocent XI press any more, both because of what was just said concerning the nature of the matter in this Sacrament, and because of the things which the Author noted above, no. 437, concerning this proposition.

 The VV. contend against this Note in fourteen columns (pp. 411-418). Let us touch briefly upon all these things, as the matter permits.

1. The VV. gather together several Writers (pp. 416-418) who either hold absolutely, or teach as more probable, that sorrow must be elicited with the intention of confession.

Reply. Against these, St. Alphonsus judged the opposite opinion more probable, as was noted. Therefore, let the VV. show the holy Doctor this honor: on account of him and with him, let them hold the reasons of those Authors as less solid.

2. The VV. complain (pp. 414-416) that the argument of St. Alphonsus was called a little reason, namely, that just as the minister, so the recipient must order the matter to the Sacrament. They then say that the contrary example of an infant, who is validly ordained without this intention, is sufficiently refuted by the common doctrine that no intention is required in infants for validly receiving the Sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, or even Orders, since the intention of Christ or of the Church supplies in them, as St. Alphonsus says (bk. 6, no. 80).

Reply. This refutation falls of itself because there is no parity at all. For the will to receive a Sacrament is one thing, and the will ordering sorrow to the Sacrament is another. The latter, as they themselves contend, belongs to constituting an essential element of the Sacrament; the former, however, is altogether extrinsic to the essential elements of the Sacrament, and sometimes a merely habitual or even merely interpretative intention suffices. But the Church certainly cannot supply that which pertains to the intrinsic essence of the Sacrament. Therefore, if the Ordination of an infant is valid, as it certainly is, although the infant is incapable of ordering the contact with the instruments to the Sacrament, it is manifestly plain that this ordering intention is not necessary. To this might also be referred what is commonly said concerning the fulfillment of sacramental satisfaction. For if all the parts must be ordered to the Sacrament through intention, this will therefore hold also with regard to satisfaction. But where is that coordinating intention present when even St. Alphonsus (bk. 1, no. 165) admits that sacramental penance is truly fulfilled even if someone, forgetful of the precept and therefore having no intention of fulfilling it, nevertheless performs the prescribed work?

3. The VV. insist (pp. 412-416) that in the case the condemnation of the Proposition concerning the use of probable matter when the safer has been abandoned presses, both because the opinion concerning sorrow to be elicited with the intention of confession is probable, and because the matter here concerns matter ex qua; and that the interpretation of the condemned Proposition brought forward by Gury must be rejected.

Reply. As regards the first: let them first bring forward other reasons by which some solid probability of the opinion concerning the necessity of that intention may be proved. For if the argument adduced by St. Alphonsus, which must be considered the strongest of all, does not have that force, as we saw, then certainly, until some other reason appears, it is lawful to hold that these reasons are lacking. And since it is very well known that extrinsic probability has force insofar as it is presumed to rest upon intrinsic probability, where intrinsic arguments are lacking, it profits little to multiply citations. Therefore, thus far that condemnation is urged in vain.

As regards the second, first the VV. (p. 415), after asserting that the doctrine which holds the acts of the penitent to be matter ex qua is most probable, infer from this that the opinion which establishes that sorrow must necessarily be ordered to confession is sufficiently probable; but there will certainly be one who adds to these words: I deny the consequence, as is plain from what has been said. But, this omitted, the VV. would certainly have acted more usefully if, instead of copying the text of Suarez and citing others who followed Suarez, they had devoted some labor to the things touched upon above (Note to no. 414) concerning this argument. It was indeed said there that it cannot be the purpose of our work to undertake the solution of this question in a brief Compendium. Nevertheless, we indicated certain difficulties which neither Suarez nor anyone else has yet satisfied, just as a suitable reply to the arguments produced by Maldonatus, cited there, is still desired. But what those two lights of Theology, Suarez and Lugo, appear not to have attained, it is very uncertain whether it is to be hoped from others. Moreover, since for the probability of any opinion it is required not only that it be supported by solid reasons, but also that it solidly satisfy the contrary reasons, shall we rightly be angry with those who perhaps still hold that opinion not only not most probable, but not even solidly probable?

As regards the third, finally, it is easily plain that the interpretation of the condemned Proposition which Gury has at no. 437 was mentioned only because it explains what these words of the condemned Proposition mean: In conferring the Sacraments. And since St. Alphonsus (bk. 1, no. 51), as the VV. themselves note, sufficiently shows that for this reason it is disputed among the Doctors whether the condemnation affects others besides the minister of the Sacrament, another reason now arises from this by which it is abundantly established that the condemnation of that proposition is objected with less efficacy, even if other reasons for this were not brought forward.

[12]  In this place also the VV. (p. 935, no. 109) oppose to the Author, who says that sorrow can endure for one or even several days, St. Alphonsus, who (Homo apostolicus, tr. 16, no. 20) affirms that whenever confession derives from sorrow for sins, sorrow always virtually endures for one or two days.

But St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 446) admits and approves the opinion of Roncaglia, who (De Poenitentia, ch. 3, q. 2, reply 2) teaches that sorrow suffices even if it preceded by several days.

448. QUESTION 8. Is a new act of sorrow required for receiving a new absolution when the penitent, immediately after absolution, confesses a mortal sin omitted through forgetfulness?

Reply. It is controverted. The FIRST OPINION, common and much more probable, denies it; because the prior contrition certainly endures, and, being universal, extended to all sins, even those omitted through forgetfulness; nor, moreover, is it required that contrition be explicitly ordered to the Sacrament. Furthermore, explicit sorrow appears to be sufficiently present in the very act of accusing that same sin. - Lugo. - Roncaglia. - Reuter, etc., with St. Lig., no. 448.

The SECOND OPINION affirms it; because the judgment was completed through absolution; therefore, if a new absolution is to be imparted, new proximate matter is required; and although sorrow endures in itself, nevertheless it does not endure in relation to the second absolution. - Bonacina, etc. Yet this opinion appears to rest upon a slight foundation [13].

[13] Cardinal de Lugo in fact denies (De Poenitentia, disp. 14, nos. 28-30) that some partial proximate matter cannot serve the same for two forms. But it was already said above that the ordering of sorrow to confession is not necessary. Moreover, it must be denied that such ordering is lacking here; for one who grieves over sins with the intention of confessing sufficiently orders the sorrow for each to the confession and absolution of the same. Add further that Vasquez, Bonacina, and Filliucci are wrongly cited for this second opinion (in St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, no. 448, from Croix, bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 711). For when these say that sorrow must be repeated, they do not dispute concerning sins omitted through forgetfulness, but concerning a repeated confession of the same sins. Therefore, neither authority nor any solid reason supports this opinion. But, on the contrary, the common practice stands for the first opinion, as Lugo says (loc. cit., no. 27); St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) calls this opinion common, and testifies that it is called morally certain by Roncaglia, most probable by Sporer with Elbel and many others, and finally indubitable among all by others. For although perhaps one or another confessor admonishes the penitent in the aforesaid case to renew sorrow, nevertheless all the others commonly do not do so. Dicastillo also testifies to this common practice of confessors (De Sacramentis, tr. 8, disp. 6, dub. 22, no. 160).

Two things must not be omitted here. The first is that, according to the common opinion, the foregoing doctrine holds not only in the case which is ordinarily more frequent, of some sin which one forgets in confession and then confesses immediately after absolution or a little afterward, but also in two other cases: both when a dying person, because of the danger of imminent death, must be absolved after one or another sin has been heard and the confession of the rest must then be continued; and when someone, his confession being divided (which case, however, will occur very rarely, as will be said in its place), is absolved by a Superior only from reserved sins and is then absolved by another from the nonreserved sins.

The second is that, according to several, not even the aforesaid opinion of Vasquez, Bonacina, and Filliucci concerning the necessity of repeating sorrow in a repeated confession of the same sins must necessarily be admitted. Cardinal de Lugo certainly thinks the complete contrary.

First, he indicates that this opinion of his agrees with the Doctors thus (loc. cit., no. 34): Although the Authors do not treat expressly of this sin, nevertheless, from the manner in which they speak, they appear to indicate this.... Indeed, Father John Salas, in his manuscript On Penance, q. 84, art. 10, after relating the opinion of certain recent authors who said that new sorrow, just as a new confession, is required for the validity of the second Sacrament, himself says that the contrary is truer, and that it suffices that the sensible parts, namely, the confession and in the confession itself the expression of sorrow, be new, etc. But he had disclosed his own mind thus (ibid., no. 31): If the things which we have adduced in confirmation of the first part are true, it does not appear why sometimes a confession and new absolution concerning even the same sins cannot be repeated by virtue of the preceding sorrow which still endures morally and virtually (namely, has not been retracted). And he concludes (next no. 32): The reason appears the same for either case.

But both John de la Cruz and Peter de Ledesma (in Diana, vol. 1, tr. 3, res. 88, no. 1) had preceded him; Diana moreover testifies that this doctrine is common. Dicastillo also joined these (in Diana, loc. cit.), whose thesis is this: It must be asserted that, not only when someone confesses a new sin which he had not told through forgetfulness, but when altogether the same sins are submitted to a new confession, old sorrow which still endures either physically or morally suffices. Indeed, it is due to the reasons adduced by Dicastillo that Diana, who had previously hesitated to adhere to this doctrine (see loc. cit., res. 89, no. 3), afterward embraced it absolutely. For after copying Dicastillo's arguments (loc. cit., res. 88, no. 4), he concludes: Thus far Dicastillo, to whom I now adhere absolutely. Then he adds that not only did another Salamancan doctor think the same (see ibid., res. 90, no. 2), but that, with Diana himself as author, Leander also passed to the same opinion; concerning him Diana writes (ibid., res. 95, no. 4): The same Leander (De Sacramentis, vol. 1, tr. 5, disp. 7, q. 4) teaches, citing even me and Cardinal Lugo, that when someone confesses the same sins from which he had already been directly absolved, he is not bound to have new sorrow for the same sins; because when the vocal confession is repeated, at least the sorrow of the preceding confession, which still endures morally and virtually, is virtually repeated. Finally, add to these Thomas Tamburini (Methodus Confessionis, bk. 1, ch. 2, sec. 5, no. 7), who praises Joseph de Ianuario for the same doctrine: Read, he says, Ianuarius (pt. 1, res. 30), who teaches that one who confesses sins otherwise duly confessed and absolved is not bound again to elicit an act of sorrow if the prior one endures habitually (that is, has not been retracted) or virtually.

Moreover, a doctrine of this kind neither ought nor can serve practice insofar as either confessors or penitents ought to be less solicitous about exciting sorrow even in the confession of sins which have already been duly expiated by the Sacrament. Far be this. Nevertheless, it can sometimes be useful, insofar as by its aid, as Diana says (loc. cit., res. 89, no. 2), confessors will quiet many scruples, especially those of persons who confess ordinary venial sins and with them some mortal sin otherwise confessed and absolved. For although it is not greatly to be feared that sorrow for past grave sins is lacking in one who otherwise brings only venial sins, and therefore manifests a soul averse from grave fault by constantly overcoming temptations, nevertheless scruples concerning a defect of sorrow not rarely hold certain persons anxious, especially if they happen to hear some preacher who, perhaps with less discreet zeal, declaims vehemently against repeated confessions of old faults without sorrow. The confessor will fittingly be able to restrain these anxieties both with other aids and also with the support of the present opinion.

Fifteen columns which the VV. oppose to this Note (pp. 418-426) must be answered here. First, they do not hesitate to deny that Vasquez, Filliucci, and Bonacina were cited wrongly by St. Alphonsus. For, they say (p. 420), Filliucci (tr. 6, no. 76) speaks in express words of forgotten sins, not of sins previously confessed.

Reply 1. They therefore concede that Vasquez, and likewise Bonacina, were cited wrongly by St. Alphonsus. 2. St. Alphonsus with Croix does not cite no. 76 from Filliucci, but no. 77, where the discussion is not of forgotten sins, but of sins previously confessed, and this most deliberately. For in no. 77, where the discussion concerns sins previously confessed, Filliucci says that new sorrow must be elicited; but not in no. 76, where forgotten sins are treated. Therefore, if they had cited no. 76, the citation would have been not only futile but also false. Hence an argument against the VV.: if Filliucci had thought that new sorrow had to be elicited even where forgotten sins were treated, he would not have been silent about it, just as he was not silent where sins previously confessed were treated. But he was silent. Therefore.

2. The VV. insist, saying that according to Filliucci (no. 76), in the confession of a forgotten sin a new Sacrament is effected. Therefore, Filliucci is not cited wrongly. Reply. The question now is not whether in the case a new Sacrament is effected, but whether, when a new Sacrament is effected, it is necessary to elicit another act of sorrow, or whether the preceding act suffices. Filliucci expressly says the former thing; concerning the latter, Filliucci has not even a word; indeed, as we have said, by his silence he denies it. Therefore, Filliucci also is cited wrongly.

3. Nevertheless, in order to show that the opinion which St. Alphonsus, as the VV. say (p. 419), rightly calls more probable is supported by grave authority, they produce eight authors, namely, Concina, Lacroix, Holzmann, Reiffenstuel, Billuart, Antoine, Reuter, and Voit. Reply. Six among these, indeed, call the contrary opinion, namely, that a renewal of sorrow is not necessary, more probable or certain. Is it thus shown, with authority considered, that St. Alphonsus rightly called his opinion more probable? But neither do the other two call the opinion of St. Alphonsus more probable. For Concina merely says: Follow the safer things in this highest affair. But the other, whom the VV. thought was Antoine, is in reality Philip of Carboneano, an unhappy annotator of a most unhappy Work; he writes: In practice new contrition is required, ... because the opposite is not altogether certain.

4. The VV. insist that the cited Authors at least implicitly held the opinion of St. Alphonsus as probable when they called their own more probable; but Croix and Holzmann expressly call it probable. Reply. As regards the first part, I deny it. For they produce, and could produce, not even one author who defended that opinion as probable; but since they did not think their own altogether certain, they therefore counseled that the opposite should be followed in practice so that one might proceed more safely. Thus, for example, Voit (vol. 2, no. 508): The opinion is most probable (the VV. omitted these words) that new sorrow need not necessarily be elicited.... Nevertheless, in practice it is better to elicit new sorrow, so that one may proceed more safely; these words sound rather like counsel. And Reuter (pt. 4, tr. 5, no. 282): Although this opinion appears morally certain (these words likewise are omitted by the VV.), nevertheless, because the opposite appears to some not altogether improbable ..., greater reverence for the Sacrament is to be counseled. These words likewise present counsel rather than doctrine.

But as regards Holzmann and Croix, Reply. Each of them rests upon citations of Vasquez, Bonacina, Amicus, and Mastrius, who establish the necessity of new sorrow not for our case, but concerning sins previously confessed, as we already said concerning the citations of St. Alphonsus. Therefore, they rest upon citations which do not pertain to the matter.

But as regards the intrinsic reasons, Holzmann says that the arguments which he himself had objected appeared to him to have been solved probably indeed, but not evidently. Yet it is easily replied to this that it is enough and more than enough that there be a solid solution of the objections; but he himself concedes that the solution is solid. But if something appears to him not sufficiently evident, it satisfies us that it has appeared sufficiently evident to other grave Doctors.

In this matter, indeed, this Author's manner of disputing can appear singular. For he asks (pt. 5, no. 511): Can one and the same contrition suffice for two or more Sacraments of Penance in number? Here he does not distinguish whether the second confession concerns a forgotten sin or a sin previously confessed. He then adds (and the VV. ought not to have omitted these things): It is replied that it can, if contrition still physically endures at the time of each confession; indeed, even if it endures only morally. The first part is common AND CERTAIN. Cardinal de Lugo, John Bosco, Lacroix, bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 707, and very many others hold the second against others to be cited below. But the Authors whom he cites below treat only of sins previously confessed; why, then, does he not conclude that this second part of the thesis does not touch the question of forgotten sins, and therefore that what he establishes concerning the first part holds concerning them, namely, that this doctrine is common and certain? But he himself (no. 512) says that the opinion is not certain even when the penitent returns after receiving absolution to confess a forgotten sin. Reply. Let it pass; but what, then, will you draw from this confusion of things? Yet one thing is sufficiently established. For he calls the doctrine concerning the sufficiency of one contrition for two or more Sacraments certain and common if contrition physically endures. Let us now omit asking what this physical endurance means with him and why it is required. For he himself had written a little before (no. 510): If yesterday you elicited sorrow with the purpose of confessing today, while you confess today you do not need new sorrow. For does sorrow then endure physically or morally? As regards the present matter, if according to his CERTAIN opinion one contrition suffices in the case for two or more absolutions, what force, then, will his objection have (no. 511), namely, that A new composite requires new parts; or that new contrition entitatively is necessary for a new Sacrament? Does he not expressly contend that it is certain and common that one suffices? How, then, does he attribute so much strength to these objections (no. 512) that because of them he thereafter wishes the doctrine which he himself contends is certain to be uncertain? But let us now dismiss Holzmann with this obscure heap of things which do not cohere with one another, and pass to Croix.

Besides those empty citations of which we have spoken, Croix produces this one argument, as though from reason (no. 711): There is, he says, almost the same reason concerning sins which someone has forgotten and concerning those which he has previously confessed. That is, since he treated both questions together (no. 707), he contends that the little reasons which he objects to himself where sins already confessed are treated also hold for the case of a forgotten sin; and he thinks that all the more force accrues to these little reasons because certain Authors (he adduces four or five) who deny that sorrow must be renewed where forgotten sins are treated nevertheless require new sorrow with regard to sins previously confessed. Reply. The argument can easily and with greater right be turned back upon Croix himself. And indeed (now omitting those who have nothing concerning forgotten sins, such as Vasquez, Bonacina, and John Sanchez), there are very many, as Holzmann admits, who deny that new sorrow is necessary with regard to a forgotten sin. But among these, those few do not find the reasons which they find valid with regard to a forgotten sin confessed immediately afterward sufficiently valid also with regard to sins previously confessed. Yet from the very fact that those who dissent with regard to sins previously confessed nevertheless agree with the others concerning the confession of a forgotten sin, can it not rather be and ought it not be concluded that the reasons adduced in the case of a forgotten sin are of such strength and such clarity that they have extorted assent even from those who dissent in the other question?

Let us conclude, therefore, that neither Holzmann nor Croix has produced anything either from authority or from intrinsic reason which confers any probability upon that opinion which is adduced against the common opinion.

Moreover, as we have already noted elsewhere, it was altogether to be desired that the VV. devote their labors to some advancement of science, namely, to the investigation of truth rather than to defending some cause in any manner whatsoever. Thus, in the present matter, when they offered the texts of Authors, they would not have concealed that Edmund Voit calls the opinion which they endeavor to attack most probable; they would not have concealed that the same appeared morally certain to Reuter; they would not have concealed that Holzmann calls the same certain and common.

But, moreover, why did they remain silent about the judgments of other Doctors? Indeed:

1. Dominic Viva (De Poenitentia, q. 3, art. 3, no. 8) writes: Forgotten sins which are disclosed immediately after absolution do not need new sorrow in order that absolution be conferred again concerning them, as the practice of the faithful shows. He then adds (ibid., no. 9): You will ask whether these opinions concerning sorrow ... after the first thesis was proscribed by Innocent XI are probable in practice? I reply that the opinions hitherto explained ... are probable in practice, ... because it is lawful to follow an opinion which is MORALLY CERTAIN. And again (on Prop. 1 of Innocent XI, no. 26): Whatever may be the case as to whether absolution can universally be repeated concerning the same sins when sorrow is not repeated, as many think ..., it nevertheless appears CERTAIN from the practice of the Church and of Confessors that it is not necessary that those who are reconciled immediately after absolution be admonished to repeat new sorrow.

2. Felix Potestas (De Poenitentia, ch. 18, no. 5080): One who has confessed before and is reconciled by confessing a forgotten sin, although he effects a new Sacrament, is not bound to elicit new sorrow.... This opinion is MORALLY CERTAIN to me.

3. Elbel (conf. 3, De Contritione, no. 75): If he submits a new sin immediately or shortly after absolution was received, most probably he is not only validly but also licitly absolved without new sorrow.... Therefore, Cardenas and Lacroix appear to condemn the practice of this opinion too scrupulously.

4. And Sporer (Theologia Sacramentalis, pt. 3, ch. 2, no. 298): When in Confession you have forgotten some mortal sin and, having remembered it a little after absolution was given, you confess it, although it is advisable and safest to renew sorrow, nevertheless it is not necessary that you have new sorrow concerning it. Thus ... COMMONLY. And again (no. 300): This is more certain: if, because of the imminent danger of death, you gave someone absolution before he confessed all his sins, you can absolve him from the others which he will narrate afterward, even though he does not elicit new sorrow concerning the rest. This resolution directly attacks the little reason customarily objected to the contrary, that new matter is required for a new Sacrament.

5. Marcus Struggl (tr. 11, q. 2, art. 2, no. 25): Learned and pious Confessors, when the penitent after the first absolution has been conferred proposes a mortal sin which he had previously forgotten, confer absolution upon him without being solicitous about new sorrow on the part of the penitent. And this opinion, although it treats of the validity of the Sacrament, is SAFE IN PRACTICE.

6. Martin Stoz (bk. 1, q. 1, art. 7, no. 52): I willingly admit that one who confessed a little before and again confesses sins which had escaped him ... is not bound to elicit new sorrow.

7. Mazzotta (tr. 6, disp. 1, q. 3, ch. 1, sec. 3, q. 3): The same sorrow can suffice ... if someone immediately after absolution adds a new forgotten sin and is absolved again either by the same or by another Confessor; and similarly, if someone is absolved when death is imminent before he has confessed integrally, and afterward ... completes his confession, he can again be absolved without new sorrow.

COMMONLY, and Moya says that it is INDUBITABLE among the Doctors. Nor does the cited proposition condemned by Innocent XI stand in the way, because this opinion is most probable, whatever Croix may have said.

8. Babenstuber (tr. 8, pt. 6, disp. 4, art. 3, no. 57): When someone has forgotten some sin in confession and then immediately or a little afterward confesses it, the Confessor must again impart absolution.... In this case neither the penitent nor the Confessor is accustomed to be solicitous about new sorrow. Thus the Theologians COMMONLY.

9. Roncaglia (tr. 19, ch. 3, q. 3), concerning this doctrine: These foundations appear SO SAFE to me that this opinion by no means appears to me subject to the censure of that condemned opinion according to which it was said that in confecting the Sacraments it is lawful to follow a probable opinion when the safer has been abandoned.

10. Giribaldi (tr. 7, ch. 5, dub. 8, no. 63): Although one or another (confessor) admonishes the penitent to renew sorrow, nevertheless others more commonly do not do so; and thus it can be observed in practice that when the penitent returns to tell forgotten sins, he is not compelled to elicit a new act of contrition.

11. Illsung (tr. 6, disp. 6, q. 3, art. 5, no. 43): When someone has forgotten one sin and, returning to the priest either immediately or a little afterward, confesses it ..., the confessor must impart absolution again; but in such a case commonly neither penitents nor confessors are solicitous about new sorrow. Therefore, new sorrow is not required.

12. Honoratus Fabri (tr. 9, ch. 2, no. 10): The same sorrow suffices for several absolutions, as when someone after absolution discloses some sin of which he had not previously remembered.

13. Tamburini (Methodus Confessionis, bk. 1, ch. 2, no. 9): If, after absolution has duly been conferred, the penitent remembers and brings forward something which he had forgotten to confess, ... it is not necessary that he grieve again.

14. Gobat (tr. 6, no. 165): When, having forgotten some sin in confession, you confess it a little after absolution has been given, it is not necessary that you have new sorrow concerning it. COMMONLY.

15. Escobar (bk. 14, sect. 2, nos. 116-118): Someone, while making confession, forgets one or another mortal sin and immediately after absolution remembers and discloses it: he ... does not need a new act of sorrow. But here he cites Vasquez and Bonacina as contrary without relevance, for, as we have said, they do not discuss this question but another, different one.

16. Dicastillo (tr. 8, disp. 6, dub. 12, no. 160): It must be asserted that, when someone confesses a new sin which he had not told through forgetfulness, ... old sorrow which remains either physically or morally suffices.... Ledesma follows this opinion and testifies that it is MORE COMMON. And again (no. 165): Our opinion can be confirmed from the practice of the Church and of Confessors, because there are few, if any, who are solicitous about admonishing the penitent to renew sorrow in reconciliations, as Lugo rightly noted.

17. Aversa (De Poenitentia, q. 9, sect. 1): It can be observed in practice that, when the penitent returns to tell forgotten sins, he is not compelled to elicit a new act of contrition.

18. Ferraris (s.v. Poenitentia, art. 2, no. 37): One who in confession has forgotten some mortal sin can confess it a little after absolution without having new sorrow. Gobat with Dicastillo testifies that this is COMMON.

19. And, lest we linger longer over these things, see Diana (vol. 1, tr. 3, res. 88), Mezger (tr. 18, disp. 46, art. 4, no. 7), Gabriel of St. Vincent (De Poenitentia, disp. 4, q. 2), the Salmanticenses (Theologia Scholastica, tr. 24, disp. 7, nos. 116 and 121), Ledesma, Salas, Henriquez, Arriaga, Platelius (in Mazzotta, loc. cit.), John de la Cruz, and Joseph de Ianuario (in Tamburini, loc. cit.), Perez and Bosco (in St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, no. 448), cited by the foregoing.

And indeed, take careful note that the above-praised Doctors hand down this doctrine absolutely and as to be observed in practice beyond controversy; and that most of them wrote after the propositions had been condemned by Innocent XI, and even made express mention of this condemnation. And since the authorities customarily opposed have altogether nothing to do with the matter, while the little reasons objected are solved without difficulty and indeed can very often be turned back by an argumentum ad hominem against those objecting them, it is manifest that this doctrine can also be held safest in practice.

But as regards the six columns in which the VV. detain the reader (pp. 423-426) concerning the other part of the Note, namely, concerning the renewal of sorrow for a sin previously confessed, it is truly not worth the effort to linger. They say they do not see how that doctrine can contribute to quieting the scruples of certain persons. But others have seen this; and perhaps the VV. themselves do not appear to have fully grasped the sense in which the opinion in the Note is said to be able to contribute to quieting scruples.

QUESTION 9. Can there be a Sacrament of Penance at once valid and unformed, because of a defect of sufficient disposition?

Reply. It is controverted. Some deny it with Billuart, diss. 7, art. 1. - Elbel, no. 81. Their reason is that in the Sacrament of Penance, contrition is the matter of the Sacrament; therefore, if it is insufficient, the Sacrament will be invalid. But if it is sufficient, the Sacrament is valid and at the same time formed, and therefore it immediately remits sins. - Others, however, and indeed grave Theologians, affirm it with Lugo, disp. 14, no. 65. - Lacroix, no. 672; and St. Lig., no. 444 [14], calls this more probable. The reason of those who affirm is that there can be a certain lower degree of disposition which suffices for the matter of the Sacrament but does not suffice for actual justification [15]. - Recall what was said On the Sacraments in General, nos. 191 and 232.

[14] This opinion, says Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 14, no. 68), is taught by St. Thomas ... and by the Thomists commonly, Capreolus, Paludanus, Cajetan, Soto, Cano, Ledesma, Sylvester, Richardus, whom Suarez adduces ..., who follows the same in part; and this is also commonly embraced by the more recent Thomists and Henriquez ... and Cardinal Toletus ..., and others whom Antoninus and Diana relate and follow ...; all of whom consequently teach that such a valid confession is not afterward to be repeated.

The same de Lugo relates the multiple cases in which one or another Theologian thought this could occur (ibid., no. 69); nevertheless, he appears to admit it in only two circumstances: 1. when someone guilty of two sins, through invincible forgetfulness, grieves over only one and confesses only this; 2. when someone through invincible ignorance believes that it is not a mortal sin to approach the Sacrament without sorrow for all sins, provided that sorrow is present for some one. See ibid., nos. 74 and 89.

[15] Yet this reason favors the cases which Cardinal de Lugo did not approve rather than those which he admitted.

§ II. On the Qualities of Contrition

449. The qualities necessarily required for the validity of contrition, both perfect and imperfect, are numbered as four, namely: 1. that it be internal; 2. supernatural; 3. supreme; 4. universal.

I. Internal or true, that is, truly conceived in the heart and soul, according to Joel 2:13: Rend your hearts, and not your garments. For contrition, according to the Council of Trent, is sorrow of the soul; and soul signifies the rational will.

II. Supernatural, that is, elicited through the help of grace and from a motive which is in some way referred to God [1]. For sorrow elicited from a merely human motive, for example, from fear of infamy, can contribute nothing toward obtaining justification.

[1] By this manner of speaking, the Author wished also to include moral rectitude, to which sin is opposed, according to the doctrine of the Council of Trent, which numbers the turpitude of sin also as an apt motive of sorrow.

It can be noted here that, just as for an action to be meritorious it is not necessary that someone act from a supernatural motive, that is, one known by the aid of faith (see vol. 1, no. 32, qq. 6 and 8), so Ripalda consequently concludes (De Fide, disp. 17, no. 209) that attrition disposing toward sacramental justification can be elicited under the direction of infused prudence or under the direction of knowledge which some affection of faith - namely, one seeking justification in the Sacrament - directs. For, as he himself says (no. 187), a disposition sufficient for sacramental justification can exist without theological faith strictly so called. For sorrow elicited by a moral virtue to which sin is opposed (namely, from the turpitude of sin according to Trent) suffices for sacramental justification. But we premised above that it is consonant with Sacred Scripture, the Councils, the Fathers, theological reasons, and the judgment of grave Theologians that salutary and supernatural acts of the moral virtues can exist without strict faith. We have already seen (loc. sup. cit.), in the Treatise On Human Acts, that this doctrine is that of St. Thomas. On the same matter, the things which the same Ripalda teaches in De Ente Supernaturali, last disp., nos. 458-460, and disp. 22, no. 100, are to be seen.

The suitable motives can be reduced to four: 1. fear of punishment; 2. hope of reward; 3. the turpitude of sin; 4. the goodness of God.

III. Supreme, namely, so that the sinner appreciatively detests his crime more than every other evil, and is prepared in soul rather to lose and suffer all things than to commit sin.

IV. Universal, namely, it must extend to all grave sins, either from one universal motive or from several particular motives which, at least taken together, extend to all mortal sins committed, even those not occurring to the memory. The reason is that no actual sin is remitted without sorrow; but one mortal sin cannot be remitted without another, since remission occurs through the infusion of grace, which cannot stand together with mortal sin.

450. Questions. QUESTION 1. Must contrition be supremely intense?

Reply. Negative. The reason is that intensity is something merely accidental. For the degree of sorrow, or the greater or lesser affection or effort, does not pertain to the essence of contrition, which can exist in its entirety without a degree of intensity of this kind. Besides, how would you know that this or that degree of intensity must be attained? Moreover, the intensity of sorrow is not always in our power. Hence, at times with respect to sensation we are moved more vehemently by a temporal evil than by an offense against God, although the will is ready rather to suffer all temporal evils than to offend God. Therefore, it suffices that it be appreciatively supreme, that is, that sin be held in hatred before other things by a serious judgment. - St. Lig., nos. 433-442 [2].

[2] Cardinal de Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 5, nos. 84-87), after concluding that the opinion which requires contrition to be supremely intense is rightly commonly rejected, and that the opinion which requires contrition to be at least more intense than the acts by which a man is affected toward other objects is likewise to be rejected as exposed to many fallacies and dangers, nevertheless adds: We do not deny that it is expedient for the sinner to endeavor to grieve with the highest intensity, both so that he may be more certain of his penance and so that he may satisfy more fully not only for the fault but also for the punishment; in this sense the Fathers who require the highest sorrow must be understood.

QUESTION 2. Is a FORMAL comparison required in the appreciation between various evils and sin, or God?

Reply. Negative. For it suffices that the sinner sincerely and truly detest his sins and be unwilling to sin any more. Indeed, Confessors act very imprudently who, in order to discover whether sorrow is supreme, propose to penitents certain very dangerous comparisons, for example: Would you rather be burned alive, or undergo all the torments of the martyrs, or eat poisonous reptiles, than sin again?

For such comparisons move the imagination more vividly, and when a strong temptation approaches, the true disposition which previously existed is easily lost. - St. Lig., no. 433. - Elbel, no. 79 [3].

[3] St. Alphonsus and Elbel are not alone in admonishing that these comparisons must be avoided; indeed, St. Alphonsus rightly says that this is common to all. This is common among all, he says (loc. cit.), with St. Thomas and St. Bonaventure, etc., in Croix, bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 731, namely, that an explicit comparison between sin and other evils is not expedient ..., and still less to choose hell, etc. Hence it is plain that certain formulas of contrition in which you may see comparisons of this kind - rather a thousand deaths, or even rather hell, etc. - are less to be approved. And this admonition can indeed be useful also to preachers. For if, after the affections of penance or charity have been excited, they imprudently leap to those comparisons, they will easily accomplish this: that the fervor kindled in the hearers quickly becomes lukewarm, indeed grows cold and perhaps is entirely extinguished. The special help of divine grace for undertaking and overcoming any arduous things can and ought certainly to be hoped for when the hour presses, but not whenever someone rashly commits himself to dangers through empty imaginings.

Navarrus (Manuale, ch. 10, no. 4) well calls comparisons of this kind harmful and superfluous temptations. And (ch. 1, no. 17) he thus notes their imprudence: No one ... is bound to compare specifically, judging within himself that he would rather suffer this and that kind of death and punishments than sin or have sinned. Indeed, this would be imprudence; just as the confessor would be imprudent who asks the penitent whether he would rather that his children or he himself had died than sinned; or whether he is prepared rather to die or lose his children than to admit a mortal sin.... For such a temptation is excessive.... Therefore, it suffices for the confessor that the penitent appears to have sufficient repentance for his sins.

Indeed, St. Thomas charges that custom not only with imprudence but with foolishness (Quodlibet 1, art. 9): One who is contrite is bound IN GENERAL to will to suffer any punishment rather than to sin.... But he is not bound IN PARTICULAR to descend to this punishment or that; indeed, he would act FOOLISHLY if someone should solicit himself or another concerning particular punishments of this kind. For it is manifest that, just as delightful things move more when considered in particular than in common, so terrible things terrify more if they are considered in particular; and there are some who do not fall under a lesser temptation who perhaps would fall under a greater one. Thus, someone hearing adultery is not incited to lust; but if through consideration he descends to each enticement, he is moved more. And similarly, someone would not refuse to suffer death for Christ; but if he should descend to considering each punishment, he would be drawn back more. And therefore, to descend to particulars in such things is to lead a man into temptation and to furnish an occasion of sin.

QUESTION 3. What duration of time is required for conceiving true and supreme contrition?

Reply. None per se, because duration does not pertain to the essence of the act but is merely accidental to it; therefore, it suffices that the act be substantially completed, which can occur even in a very brief moment. Nevertheless, it is safer to elicit a more intense and more prolonged act of contrition, lest perhaps from levity or excessive haste no act be conceived as to its substance. - St. Lig., no. 433, and others commonly.

451. QUESTION 4. Must contrition for venial sins possess the same four qualities?

Reply 1. It must necessarily possess the first three: 1. it must be internal, because contrition which is not elicited from the intimate heart is not true; 2. it must be supernatural, because, as was said [4], natural contrition cannot be a means to a supernatural effect; 3. it must also be supreme, or the sinner must detest venial sin more than all natural evils [5].

[4] In what sense this is to be understood, see above at no. 449.

[5] This is said most truly; and if someone grieves over a venial sin in such a way that, when a difficulty occurs, he is prepared to commit it again, for example, to lie in order to avoid discord or rebukes, he certainly does not grieve rightly. But if that temptation of which we spoke above (at q. 2) must be avoided both with regard to oneself and others, it must be avoided much more when only venial sins are treated; and the confessor would act most imprudently who, to explore the force of sorrow for venial sins, should ask whether the penitent would rather suffer all evils than relapse into one or another of his customary venial faults.

Reply 2. It need not necessarily be universal, either in the Sacrament or outside the Sacrament. The reason is that, since venial sin is not incompatible with sanctifying grace, one venial sin can be remitted without the others. - St. Lig., no. 449.

QUESTION 5. Does FEARFUL attrition, or attrition conceived from fear of hell, suffice for justification in the Sacrament of Penance?

Reply. Affirmative, provided that it is truly supernatural, absolutely efficacious, and servile only materially, not formally or servilely. The reason is: 1. because attrition of this kind is a true conversion to God and a true aversion from sin; 2. because this is clearly drawn from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 4, where it says that attrition conceived from fear of hell and punishments is honorable and disposes the sinner to obtain justification in the Sacrament of Penance [6].

[6] Concerning this doctrine, St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 440) most truly establishes thus against Merbes, Juvenin, Antoine, and any others of this kind: It is certain and common among the Doctors that perfect contrition is not required, but attrition suffices.

Nor should it move anyone that certain persons have represented this doctrine as new and first introduced by Melchior Cano (see Benedict XIV, De Synodo, bk. 7, ch. 13, no. 6, and Perrone, De Poenitentia, no. 90, in the note). For if, Juvenin, Louis Habert, Le Drou, Van Espen, Witasse, and others of this kind having been cast aside, they had approached Suarez with their own eyes, for example (De Poenitentia, disp. 20, sect. 1, no. 9), they would certainly have found St. Thomas, Scotus, Paludanus, Capreolus, Durandus, Adrian, St. Antoninus, Sylvester, etc., all older than Cano, cited for that doctrine.

But Joseph Benaglio, in a plainly excellent work entitled Dell'attrizione quasi materia e parte del Sacramento della Penitenza, ecc., Milan, 1846 (ch. 5, art. 11, vol. 2, p. 101), adduces many more Doctors for the same matter. He also makes plain (ch. 4, art. 7, and ch. 5, art. 13) that absolutely all the things gathered from the aforesaid Juvenin, Habert, etc., for the defense of the stated paradox in the cited place of the work De Dioecesana Synodo are wholly unstable, and moreover are wrongly attributed to John Morinus. For whatever may be the case concerning other opinions of this writer, as regards attrition he not only professed its sufficiency with the common opinion of the Theologians, but also vindicated the antiquity, and indeed the perpetuity, of the same doctrine.

And it is pleasing to adduce that place where he modestly reproves Dominic Soto, to whom the old doctrine of attrition, which becomes contrition in the Sacrament, had not appeared very satisfactory; for he employs principles which must never fail to be kept before one's eyes in these matters. Thus Morinus (Commentarius historicus De Poenitentia, bk. 1, ch. 13, no. 19): In these words of Dominic Soto two things appear to me hard and difficult to understand. The first is that the opinion which asserts that attrition becomes contrition in the Sacrament is true, but was nevertheless not recognized by the Fathers. If some new and sublime theological problem were treated, it would certainly be euparedecton (credible) that something had been discovered by distinguished Theologians and Philosophers which had escaped the ancients. But since the way and manner of recovering eternal salvation through the Sacrament of Penance is treated, can some new and easier manner of attaining salvation be discovered by a scholastic philosophical device than that which the Fathers, having received it from the Apostles, handed down to their successors? If the Fathers recognized contrition alone as necessary for attaining salvation through the Sacrament of Penance, the dullness of my mind does not grasp by what reason, or relying upon what authority, the Scholastics after at least twelve hundred years could prescribe a new and easier way than that which the Fathers handed down to us.... The second thing which appears hard to me is that the Fathers thought contrition alone necessary for Confession. For although the Ancients did not recognize the name Attrition, much less the axiom, Attrition becomes Contrition in the Sacrament, nevertheless they not only taught the thing itself signified by this axiom, but also commended it most highly as a principle and the foundation of all penitential discipline. Thus far Morinus.

Moreover, because the praised Benaglio allowed himself to depart entirely from the things read concerning this argument in Lambertini's work De Synodo, he rightly judged that the faculty to do so had been granted to him from the things which Benedict XIV himself declared at the end of the Preface prefixed to the latest editions in these words: Where neither our Predecessors the Roman Pontiffs nor We ourselves have defined anything by Apostolic authority either in the Bullarium or elsewhere, and generally in all matters to which no weight has accrued from the public authority of the Church, we do not intend to define anything or present it as though decretory. For this always was, and still is, Our mind: that, in proposing Our opinion, We defend it only insofar as it is recognized that sufficient strength and firmness are present in the reasons and authorities which impelled Us to embrace it; and with willing mind We subscribe to the doctrine ... of Melchior Cano, who ..., treating of books which are written by Supreme Pontiffs and published, says this: When they publish books concerning any matter, the Roman Pontiffs express their opinion as other learned men, not as judges of the Church pronouncing upon faith.* And after relating the history of Innocent IV, who wrote Commentaries on the books of the Decretals while he held the Pontificate, he adds: Nor indeed did Innocent ever arrogate this to himself, that whatever he had written in that Work should be held as a defined matter; rather, he readily allowed his opinions, which he had proposed as a private doctor, to be attacked by other doctors, as is plain from ... his life, and much more from the very ample liberty which later Canonists took for themselves in this matter, when they did not hesitate often to abandon opinions inserted by Innocent in his Commentaries and to pass entirely to others.

Moreover, attrition is called servilely servile when someone indeed grieves over sin and wishes to avoid it on account of the punishments which he knows are to be inflicted by God, but would still be prepared to sin if those punishments did not exist. But it is called simply servile when someone, on account of fear of punishments, abstains from sin, yet is not so disposed that he would wish to sin if those punishments did not exist. The former is evil, not insofar as it is fear of punishments, but because of the depraved disposition of the soul. - Scavini.

452. QUESTION 6. Does attrition from fear of the punishments of Purgatory suffice for venial sins?

Reply. Affirmative, according to the most common and morally certain opinion; because all the reasons adduced above for the sufficiency of attrition from fear of hell also hold here.

QUESTION 7. Does attrition from fear of the temporal punishments of this life to be undergone for sin, insofar as they are inflicted by God, suffice?

Reply. Affirmative, more probably, provided that it is supernatural [7]. The reason is:

[7] When supernatural attrition is required, the opinion of those who said that natural attrition suffices is excluded; that is (as Suarez indicates, De Poenitentia, disp. 20, sect. 2, no. 7), attrition elicited by the powers of nature alone, whether it is conceived from an eternal and honorable motive, such as fleeing the punishments of hell or the turpitude of sin, or from a temporal and indifferent motive, such as avoiding infamy or temporal loss, because these temporal harms also are given by God on account of our sins. Suarez then opposes to this false opinion (ibid., no. 8) the thesis that attrition must be elicited with the help of grace. See the same Suarez, disp. 4, sect. 1, nos. 3-4.

Moreover, although St. Alphonsus (no. 443) does not deny that this opinion is judged most probable by some and even morally certain by others (from Croix, from whom he took it, it could be added that others call the same altogether certain), nevertheless he notes three things to the contrary: 1. that Cardenas doubts whether it is morally certain; 2. that Cano, Pasqualigus, and Hurtadus, in Diana, held the contrary; 3. that the Council of Trent speaks copulatively of hell and punishments, and does not distinguish disjunctively between hell or punishments. Hence he concludes: Since the second (opinion) does not lack its own probability, at least extrinsic, I think it is better that it be observed in practice. Hence the Author also calls the opinion which he proposes only more probable.

But in reality these reasons of St. Alphonsus neither detract anything from the firmness of the doctrine which the Author relates from the common opinion of the Doctors, nor can confer any, even slight, probability upon the opposite.

As regards the first, therefore, it was said in the preceding edition, because of an inexact citation, that Cardenas was wrongly cited, inasmuch as, cohering badly with himself, he confused everything indiscriminately. Now, more aptly to the matter, Reply. Cardenas himself gives this reason why he doubted whether the affirmative opinion was morally certain (Crisis, pt. 4, on Prop. 1 of Innocent XI, disp. 2, q. 2, no. 69): because there are not lacking, he says, authors who deny that this manner of attrition is sufficient; and the affirmative opinion does not rest upon an infallibly certain foundation, but only upon a probable one. But: 1. it is false that these authors existed;

2. likewise, that a sufficient foundation of moral certainty is lacking is found false by the common judgment of the gravest Doctors. Therefore, that suffrage of Cardenas profits the cause nothing.

As regards the second, it is very well known that Cano (see Faure, Dubitationes Theologicae, dub. IV, sect. IV) and Hurtadus held the contrary opinion to that which St. Alphonsus says, so much so that Diana, to whom he refers, uses the very doctrine of Hurtadus to confirm the common opinion (see vol. 1, tr. 3, res. 108, no. 2). Diana does not even name Pasqualigus, nor does Pasqualigus, insofar as it was possible to know from inspection of his writings, have any word concerning this controversy. Therefore, the whole foundation upon which that extrinsic probability was built is altogether wanting. Moreover, St. Alphonsus did not produce these false citations from himself, but in good faith took them from Croix (bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 884); whether Croix himself noted them carelessly or unfortunately borrowed them from elsewhere matters little to us now.

As regards the third, finally, it is plain that this reason also is deprived of all efficacy; and, contrary to the common sense of all, it would prove of itself that fear of hell does not suffice for attrition unless fear of temporal evils also accompanied it.

But what St. Alphonsus intimates (ibid.), that in the context of the Council of Trent the word punishments signifies only the punishments of hell, manifestly contradicts the same context; for there immediately follows the example of the fear by which the Ninevites, struck by Jonah's preaching full of terrors, did penance. But Jonah's preaching full of terrors, according to Sacred Scripture (Jonah 3:4), was this: Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown.

 The twenty-eight columns which the VV. opposed to this Note (pp. 426-440) must now be answered. First (pp. 427-428), they note that the holy Doctor said the negative opinion must be observed more safely in practice because it does not lack its own probability, at least extrinsic. Therefore, since validity is at issue, Proposition 1 among those condemned by Innocent XI pertains here. Reply. Here again it must be denied that either intrinsic or extrinsic probability, even slight, supports this negative opinion; and this will be more apparent below. Therefore, that condemned Proposition has no place here.

The VV. then undertake (pp. 428-433) to vindicate the Authors whom St. Alphonsus cited for the negative: Pasqualigus, Hurtadus (the VV. add Diana, but neither the holy Doctor nor the Note has anything concerning the opinion of Diana), Cano, Cardenas, and Concina. Reply. It is difficult to know what the VV. mean when they write, They are vindicated. For: 1. they concede that Pasqualigus has not even one word concerning this matter, but was cited by St. Alphonsus because of a typographical error which had crept into the book of Croix, from which the holy Doctor took his citations. Does this produce probability for the opinion of St. Alphonsus? 2. The VV. themselves (p. 430) relate these words of Hurtadus, in Diana: Some teach, AND RIGHTLY, that attrition on account of a temporal evil with reference to God ... suffices for the effect of the Sacrament; St. Alphonsus, on the contrary, says that Hurtadus in Diana denies that this attrition suffices. Is the citation of St. Alphonsus thus vindicated as correct? 3. From Concina the VV. (p. 433) adduce this judgment: I consider this opinion (namely, the affirmative) not only false and lax, but contained in the Decree of Innocent XI. Reply. Excellent indeed! But does not St. Alphonsus say that this affirmative opinion appears to him more probable? Nor is this enough. Concina (Manuale, bk. 11, ch. 7, sec. 5), concerning the sufficiency of attrition which St. Alphonsus also defends as morally certain, judges thus: This boasted moral certainty is a falsity of fact clearer than midday light; it is a fiction, an imaginary and manifest chimera, condemned by Alexander VII. I now ask the VV.: Is this a patron of such a kind that his judgments can add or take away any probability from opinions? Hence let the VV. understand why no account was taken in the Note of the suffrage of Concina.

4. As regards Cano, we said in the Note that it is established from the things which Faure has that he is cited in vain. Thus briefly: Cano (Relectio De Poenitentia, pt. 6) has these words: If you ask when one who is attrite becomes contrite by virtue of the Sacrament, I reply that this first occurs, by whatever kind of attrition a man is attrite, if he thinks that he has performed what was necessary and is invincibly ignorant that he does not have a sufficient disposition. Moreover, ibid., among the species of attrition he also mentions that which proceeds from fear of infamy, or of any temporal evil, as when one detests sin and purposes to confess lest he be cast out of the Church or fined money, etc. Hence it is argued thus: Cano here teaches that attrition from a merely human motive suffices. Therefore, a fortiori, he admits that attrition from fear of punishments which elsewhere (pt. 3) he calls spiritual or supernatural suffices, punishments which require the help of God in order to be believed and which are known by the light of faith. The VV. object here that this doctrine is false. Reply. It is not asked here whether this doctrine of Cano is true or false, but what his doctrine is, and whether he was aptly cited by St. Alphonsus for the matter. See Dicastillo, De Poenitentia, tr. 8, disp. 6, no. 6, and Candidus, disp. 24, art. 11, no. IV.

5. Finally, what force the opinion of Cardenas has was stated in the Note and will be apparent from what is to be said.

The VV. add (pp. 437-438) an article with the title: The solid reasons favoring the negative opinion are set forth. Reply 1. If solid reasons had not been lacking, St. Alphonsus would not have said that at least extrinsic probability inheres in this opinion. For solid reasons also produce intrinsic probability. 2. All those reasons which the VV. gather from Croix come to this: that the force of the argument which the Doctors take against them from the Council of Trent may in some way, if possible, be broken. But this is by no means to adduce solid reasons for the thesis. Therefore, in that entire article no reason in reality is contained, either solid or less solid. Moreover, if Croix had had at hand some solid reason for the negative opinion, he certainly would not have written concerning the affirmative (bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 884): IT IS MOST PROBABLE that ... it suffices, etc.

And let these things suffice so that the truth of what had been said in the Note may be established, namely, that the reasons adduced by St. Alphonsus confer no probability, not even slight, upon the negative opinion. Two things now remain: 1. that the scruple which the doubt of Cardenas concerning the moral certainty of the affirmative opinion cast upon St. Alphonsus be removed; 2. that the weight of the citations which the VV. added (pp. 433-438) be weighed.

Therefore, to the scruples of Cardenas we shall oppose Cardinal Toletus, who (In S. Thomam, pt. 3, q. 85, art. 5), disputing concerning fear of punishment, and indeed, as he says, not only when one fears the punishment of hell, but the turpitude of sin and the loss of temporal goods, after establishing against Luther that this fear and detestation is good and useful, and that through it grace is given with the Sacrament, concludes: This doctrine is Catholic, and the contrary is heretical. To Toletus let Suarez be added, who writes (De Poenitentia, disp. 5, sect. 2, no. 15): This opinion is true. - Illsung, according to whom (tr. 6, disp. 6, q. 3, nos. 29 and 39): This conclusion is of faith. - Jerome Llamas, who (Methodus Curae, pt. 2, ch. 2, sec. 6) says that it is certain, and that it is heretical to deny it. - Seraphinus a Conceptione, who (De Poenitentia, bk. 1, disp. 3, dub. 2, nos. 461, 462, and 485) affirms that it is a Catholic truth. - Elbel, who (conf. 3, no. 59) calls this opinion most common and morally certain. - George Gobat, who writes (tr. 6, no. 47) that it must by no means be doubted that it is true and supernatural attrition, proportioned to obtaining the effect of the Sacrament. - Arriaga, who (in Croix, loc. cit.) defends the same doctrine as certain.

Paul de Palacio, who writes (In Cap. 16 S. Matthaei): The opinion is most certain. - Michel Augustinus, Canon Regular, who (Theologia Canonico-moralis, vol. 4, tr. 4, pt. 2, q. 1, punct. 1, sect. 2, no. 18) aptly refutes Cardenas as though this doctrine were contained within the limits of probability. - Aversa, who (De Poenitentia, disp. 2, sect. 14) says that it is most manifest from Sacred Scripture. - Holzmann, who (tr. 4, no. 532) says: This doctrine is pronounced morally certain by Fathers Gobat and Elbel, to whom I also assent. - And Martinonus too hands it down as certain (disp. 48, sect. 7, no. 82). - Likewise, James Granadus (Controversiae 7, De Poenitentia, tr. 2, disp. 8, sect. 1, no. 5) teaches it as certain. - Ithuriaga, whose words are these (Dissertatio Moralis XI, no. 19): This opinion is not merely probable, but true and morally certain, just as certain as the opinion concerning attrition conceived from fear of hell. - Dominic Viva, who (on Prop. 1 of Innocent XI, no. 26) affirms that we can licitly follow the same opinion as morally certain. - Mazzotta, who (tr. 6, disp. 1, q. 3, ch. 3, sec. 1, no. 2) says: This opinion is most probable by authority and reason, so that Gobat calls it indubitable and Arriaga altogether certain; wherefore it is not subject to Prop. 1 condemned by Innocent XI, whatever Croix may have said....

To these are to be added the very many who teach the same doctrine absolutely and without introducing any doubt, but as beyond controversy, and indeed hold it as handed down by the Council of Trent. Concerning this Ithuriaga says (loc. cit., no. 18): It is more certain than certain to me that the Council of Trent, in describing attrition which is conceived from fear of hell and punishments, used this manner of speaking lest it should appear to wish to restrict the things which it there teaches concerning attrition to attrition from fear of hell; therefore, I think these things must be extended to attrition which is conceived generally from fear of other punishments also.... Thus the example of the Ninevites also fits more suitably, etc. Thus also Ferraris (s.v. Poenitentia, art. 2, no. 13), Moya (disp. 5, q. 4, nos. 2-3), Giribaldi (tr. 6, ch. 3, dub. 7, no. 43, and tr. 7, ch. 4, dub. 5, no. 29), Dominic Soto (In IV Sent., disp. 17, q. 2, art. 5, and De Natura et Gratia, bk. 2, ch. 14), in which latter place he expressly teaches that this attrition is informed by grace, contrary to what some have attributed to him; Fagundez (De Secundo Ecclesiae Praecepto, bk. 2, ch. 4, no. 9); Navarrus (Enchiridion, ch. 1, no. 8, and ch. 2, no. 38); John Medina (q. 4); Villalobos (tr. 9, diff. 22); Stoz (bk. 1, ch. 2, q. 1, art. 5, no. 8); Reiffenstuel (De Poenitentia, dist. 6, q. 4, nos. 42-43); Escobar (Theologia Moralis, tr. 7, exam. 4, ch. 7, no. 35); Nicholas Muszka (De Sacramentis, sec. 2, no. 29); Marin (tr. 22, disp. 7, sect. 4, no. 55); Reginaldus (bk. 5, ch. 3, no. 28); Anthony of the Holy Ghost (Directorium Confessariorum, tr. 5, disp. 3, sect. 2, no. 69); Babenstuber (tr. 8, pt. 6, disp. 4, art. 3, no. 13); De Blanchis (disp. 6, pp. 267 and 271); Thomas Hurtadus (De Poenitentia, disp. 6, diff. 5); Francis Suarez (De Poenitentia, tr. 3, disp. 1, sect. 3, sec. 2, no. 92); Candidus (Disquisitiones Morales 24, art. 11, dub. 3, no. 5); Cardinal Brancatus (In IV Sent., De Poenitentia, disp. 9, art. 3, sec. 10); Crescentius Krisper (Theologia Scholastica Scotica, tr. 12, dist. 3, q. 1, no. 2); Mastrius (De Poenitentia, disp. 5, q. 6, no. 138, and Theologia Moralis, disp. 21, q. 2, no. 40); Voit (vol. 2, nos. 493 and 495); Honoratus Faber (De Poenitentia, ch. 1, no. 17); Clericatus (De Poenitentia, decis. 14, no. 5 ff.); Ulloa (disp. 6, ch. 1); Dicastillo (tr. 8, disp. 6, nos. 6-8); Sporer (pt. 3, ch. 2, nos. 227 and 259); Bonacina (De Sacramentis, disp. 5, q. 5, sect. 1, punct. 3, no. 1); Peter de Fay (De Poenitentia, q. 9, art. 1, disp. 3); Marchant (tr. 4, tit. 2, q. 4); Becanus (pt. 5, tr. 2, ch. 35, q. 1, no. 6); Maurus Berardusius (Summa Coronae, ch. 3); Roncaglia (tr. 19, ch. 1, q. 2, rule 1); Potestas (no. 5063); Ochagavia (De Poenitentia, tr. 1, no. 18). To these add Nugnus (in Candidus, loc. cit.), Madernus (in Giribaldi, loc. cit.), and Gaspar Hurtadus (in Escobar, loc. cit., and Diana, vol. 1, tr. 3, res. 108, no. 2).

To these add also those who call the same doctrine most probable, such as Tamburini (Methodus Confessionis, bk. 1, ch. 1, no. 11), Reuter (pt. 4, no. 283), Gormaz (De Poenitentia, sect. 5, no. 454), Mazzotta (loc. cit.), etc.

But now it comes to mind to ask: will all these things lose their force solely for this reason, that, as St. Alphonsus said, Cardenas doubts whether this opinion is morally certain? But from an inspection of that paragraph of the holy Doctor (bk. 6, no. 443), it sufficiently appears that he did not labor very extensively upon this question; but, apart from the fact that he employed the opinion of Concina, he had at hand no other apparatus except what he excerpted from Lacroix. Yet neither that apparatus for the holy Doctor, nor that paragraph of the holy Doctor for others, could have been equal to furnishing a full knowledge of this controversy. But let us come to the things which are objected.

Cardenas (Crisis, pt. 4, diss. 2, ch. 6, no. 70) regards it as of great moment that Lessius (In III Partem S. Thomae, q. 1, dub. 5, no. 18) said concerning the sufficiency of this attrition, this is sufficiently probable. But the VV. (p. 434) say that the same doctrine was called probable also by Diana (vol. 1, tr. 3, res. 108), and by Tanner (De Poenitentia, q. 6, dub. 4, no. 21), and indeed also by Lugo, who (disp. 5, no. 137) employs the word appears, which is the word of one opining. Therefore, they conclude (pp. 434-435), even the opposite opinion is judged probable by these, and by Tanner as more probable. Reply with Cardenas: I deny the consequence. Of two contradictory propositions, says Cardenas (tr. 1, disp. 2, ch. 2, no. 10), one can be probable without the other being probable; I maintain this conclusion as altogether certain. This conclusion is common among the Authors. For then each proposition will be probable when some equal authority or intrinsic reason militates on each side. But in the case neither any intrinsic reason nor any authority can be cited for the negative opinion. Therefore. And in fact, neither Lugo, Tanner, nor Diana adduces anything to the contrary. Concerning the Authors, some of whom Cardenas boasts of in vain, a little below. Meanwhile note that, concerning our thesis, Lugo does not say it appears, but I JUDGE.

The VV. insist and (pp. 437-438) adduce these words from Billuart (De Poenitentia, diss. 4, art. 1): Contrition must be supernatural.... Hence you will infer that one who grieves over sin ... because from it follows loss of reputation or temporal goods, and from similar natural motives, is insufficiently ... contrite; otherwise, if he grieves over sin ... as productive of the punishments of purgatory, hell, the loss of grace, glory, etc. Although the VV. attach no conclusion here, nevertheless in the Additional Summary (col. 83) they concluded thus: Billuart therefore does not admit attrition from fear of the temporal punishments of this life, even if they are considered as inflicted by God, ... because attrition of this kind is not supernatural. Reply 1. It is false, as is plain from the context, that Billuart there discusses loss of reputation, etc., as punishments considered to have been inflicted by God. It is therefore false that these are excluded there by Billuart. Reply 2. Nor ought they to be thought excluded because they are not expressly indicated in the latter part of the text. And here the manner of proceeding of the VV. is somewhat displeasing. Let the etc. in the text of Billuart be noted. In the VV. it does not appear whether it belongs to Billuart or to the VV.; but in the Additional Summary it is written in letters different from those of the text of Billuart, and thus you would believe that it does not belong to Billuart, but to the Writers indicating that they omit the rest. Yet in reality it belongs to Billuart. And since it must not be called idle, is the conjecture empty that the Author tacitly indicated there that he also intended temporal punishments as inflicted by God? But there is no need for conjectures; for Billuart himself afterward expressly sets forth his opinion thus (loc. cit., art. 4): To grieve over sin, ... charity being excluded, either because ... it produces temporal evil, or because it produces hell, or because it excludes glory, or because it is an evil and an offense against God, are so many modes of attrition. Therefore, Billuart does not confirm, as the VV. say (p. 433), the opinion of St. Alphonsus, but departs from it.

The VV. object (p. 438): Amort (tr. 13, sec. 2, q. 6) does not hold as sufficient sorrow from fear of temporal punishment, even if it is known by faith as sent by God, because this sorrow is not supernatural. Reply. Let all of it pass. Amort holds it as a merely natural motive even if someone grieves from fear of punishments in the other world (which words the VV. would have done better not to omit), and gives as the reason that this motive does not befit a son of God; immediately afterward, moreover (q. 7), he denies that attrition from fear of the punishments of hell suffices, because this fear indicates not the soul of a friend or son, but of a servant, and does not exclude the will to sin. But what weight, I ask, will finally appear to be attributable to the authority of a Writer who declines into these anomalies? Therefore, let the VV. have this man together with Concina for themselves.

The VV. insist (p. 435) that according to Coninck (De Poenitentia, disp. 4, dub. 5, no. 39), attrition of this kind can be suspect; these words of Coninck also somewhat disturbed Reuter. Reply. Did Coninck call it suspect as though it did not suffice per se? I deny it; for he expressly affirms that it is sufficient. Did he call it suspect because of an extrinsic motive which might be present per accidens? Let it pass. The same is said even of fear of hell, which per accidens can decline into servilely servile fear; much more can this hold with regard to attrition on account of the turpitude of sins, in which the quality of universality can more easily be lacking. But these things pertain not to the hinge of the question, but to opportune admonitions for those who explain catechesis to the people, that they may hand down the genuine notion of attrition.

Finally, to confirm, as they say, the opinion of St. Alphonsus, the VV. produce other authors (pp. 433-438), and especially Toletus, Vasquez, and Leonard Jansen. I said especially these, for the many things which they adduce from Suarez, Tamburini, Roncaglia, and Henno have nothing to do with the matter and serve merely to increase the bulk of the book.

As regards Toletus, therefore, we have already explained his opinion above, where he does not hesitate to call the attrition of which we speak sufficient and a Catholic doctrine, and the contrary heretical. But the things which the VV. (p. 433) produce from his Instructio Sacerdotum (bk. 3, ch. 4) prove either too much or nothing. For the VV. themselves relate the double reading of the place which they object. The first has it thus: The first attrition, if it is such that the penitent knows that he does not detest sin as it is an offense against God, BUT ONLY AS IT IS THE CAUSE OF SOME EVIL AND OF THE PUNISHMENT OF HELL, although this act is good, nevertheless does not suffice for the Sacrament. But these words prove too much, because they exclude even attrition conceived from fear of hell. But the other reading is: BUT ONLY AS IT IS THE CAUSE OF SOME TEMPORAL EVIL. These words, however, prove nothing, because they do not exclude temporal punishments which are understood by the light of faith as inflicted by God. And the VV. indeed prefer the first reading because, as they reason, not only the motive of temporal evil but also the motive of eternal evil is opposed to the motive of an offense against God; and thus they do not hesitate to affix to Toletus an error nearly heretical and certainly opposed to the words of Trent. But the canons of interpretation: 1. do not permit that these absurdities be attributed to so great a man (let the VV. see what the distinguished Father Haringer said concerning him in the catalogue of Writers); 2. nor do they permit that a doctrine be attributed to him which he elsewhere, as we saw, calls heretical. But the reason adduced by the VV. for preferring the first reading is not good: 1. because those words, not as it is an offense against God, would be required in either reading, since Toletus appends them so that this first species of attrition may be distinguished from the following ones, in which the detestation of sin is on account of the motive of offense against God; 2. Toletus premises that some attrition is sufficient. Therefore, he must aptly be said to have omitted mention of hell in the adduced text, which he had mentioned above, lest otherwise we say that Toletus has now excluded all species of attrition.

As regards the Vasquez who is objected, it must be denied that the temporal punishments which he rejects as insufficient for attrition are those concerning which we dispute here. For he thus writes concerning the fear which he rejects (In III Partem, q. 92, art. 1, dub. 3, no. 3): Just as fear which concerns temporal punishment is called worldly, which of itself is the principle of good as well as of evil, so also sorrow of this nature; hence, the reason which moves toward attrition must be higher. Hence thus: sorrow for sin which has as its object punishments known by the light of faith as sent by God for sins can neither be called worldly, nor is it the principle of good equally with evil. But Vasquez rejects this fear alone. Therefore. And this is confirmed. For he continues (ibid., no. 4): Cano teaches this opinion, that attrition, in order to be a disposition for this Sacrament, is not sorrow over sins on account of temporal punishment, Relectio de Poenitentia, pt. 6, sec. Altera quoque attritio. But this attrition of Cano is that which proceeds from fear of infamy, lest someone be cast out of the Church or fined money, etc., as we related above, and in one word is worldly fear. Therefore.

But the objection that Vasquez requires some eternal motive for attrition is empty; the VV. renew this difficulty with regard to Cano, who himself also admits fear from eternal punishments. Reply. Lugo wrote well (disp. 5, no. 137) that Vasquez did not please him, since he thus appeared to exclude the punishments of Purgatory. But it is not lawful to ascribe this absurd exclusion of the punishments of Purgatory either to Vasquez or to Cano. Hence Dicastillo (tr. 8, disp. 6, no. 8) denies that Vasquez dissents, since sorrow on account of temporal evil thus regarding God ... involves a formal reason in some manner eternal, and orderable to an eternal end. And Ithuriaga (Dissertatio XI, no. 22), on the same matter: We assign an eternal motive, namely, the vindicatory justice of God. And also Cardenas (pt. 3, tr. 4, disp. 71, no. 2): I premise that sorrow for sins which is elicited from fear of temporal evils insofar as they are inflicted by God as punishment for sin is not elicited from a human motive; for this motive is supernatural. Hence Diana (vol. 1, tr. 3, res. 108, no. 5) does not hesitate to associate Vasquez with Hurtadus as regards the punishments of Purgatory. And Candidus (loc. cit., no. IV), where he recalls fear of punishments to an eternal motive (under the enumeration of those punishments he includes, as we saw, even temporal punishments), also cites Cano among those who affirm that this attrition is supernatural, just as Thomas Hurtadus also cites him.

Moreover, as regards Cano, the matter can be finished briefly and beyond all doubt. For after he had premised generally (pt. 6): Not every attrition is sufficient for one approaching the Sacrament of Penance to obtain grace, he then numbers four kinds of attrition thus: First, when someone has conditional attrition, that is, one which arises from a velleity by which a man would wish to please God and be reconciled to Him. 2. Another attrition also is ... that which, for example, proceeds from fear of infamy, or ... lest he be cast out of the Church or fined money, etc. 3. Then also efficacious attrition from fear of supernatural punishments.... Finally, 4. Also attrition which proceeds from natural love of God above all things. Hence the reasoning is easy: it would be altogether absurd to imagine that Cano, a theologian at the Council of Trent, had no account of attrition which has for its object the punishments of Purgatory or the temporal punishments of this life, apprehended by faith as inflicted by God. Therefore, attrition conceived on account of these punishments must be recalled to some foregoing kind of attrition. But it can be recalled only to efficacious attrition from fear of supernatural punishments, which, as Cano adds, is a suitable disposition for the Sacrament. Therefore.

Finally, as regards Leonard Jansen, whose words the VV. relate (p. 436), he affirms that this attrition suffices speculatively but not practically, because Cano, Hurtadus, and Vasquez probably deny it, etc. The difficulty therefore rests upon three empty citations; it must therefore be answered: I deny the supposition. This Jansen adds: If someone with such sorrow has confessed in good faith, according to Tamburini, Lugo, Sporer, Lacroix, he is not bound to repeat the confession, because that sorrow is MOST PROBABLY sufficient. But the opposite pleases me more, because a certain law is not satisfied by an uncertain solution. Therefore, this Jansen does not judge that the law is satisfied even by a most probable solution; namely, this Jansen did not remember the condemned proposition: It is not lawful to follow an opinion even among probable opinions which is most probable.

But what is to be noted concerning Jansen is likewise to be noted concerning certain others who feared to call the sufficiency of this attrition certain, having been moved by empty citations. Thus, for example, Leander (De Poenitentia, disp. 7, q. 14) relates Suarez, Reginaldus, and Vasquez as contrary. Likewise, Thomas Hurtadus (De Sacramentis, disp. 6, sect. 2) cites Suarez and Reginaldus as contrary, while meanwhile he cites Cano and Soto for the common opinion. Thus Escobar (loc. cit.) presents Vega, whom Suarez (loc. cit.) rightly cites for himself, as contrary. But Mazzotta (loc. cit.) cites Cano against himself, and no differently than St. Alphonsus, because of a typographical error in Croix, adds Pasqualigus to Cano. Hence that statement of Cardenas (loc. cit.), that authors who deny the sufficiency, etc., are not lacking, which you then see copied by Tamburini and Reuter, who generally name certain authors. Marin (tr. 22, disp. 7, sect. 4, no. 55) aptly notes here that most of those who are adduced for the contrary side are found to dispute not about supernatural attrition, which is presently at issue, but about attrition conceived from merely human motives; this is manifestly apparent, for example, concerning Reginaldus and Suarez, whose places are adduced in which they reject sorrow from merely natural motives; therefore, they are objected here in vain.

1. because it appears established from the words of the Council of Trent, where it says: Attrition is conceived from fear of hell and punishments; for it distinguishes between the punishments of hell and other punishments; 2. because in fear of this kind all the conditions of true attrition can be present. - St. Lig., no. 443.

453. QUESTION 8. For obtaining justification in the Sacrament of Penance, is a beginning of love also required with attrition? Reply. Negative, if by a beginning of love is understood some degree of perfect charity by which God is loved above all things. The reason is that an act which essentially justifies outside the Sacrament is not necessarily prerequired for rightly receiving the Sacrament. But every act of charity, and therefore sorrow which suffices for the nature of contrition, however small it may be, blots out every fault, as St. Thomas says, Supplement, q. 5, art. 3. Therefore, etc. St. Lig., no. 440, says that this is morally certain.

It can, however, be conceded that some beginning of love is required insofar as attrition, in order to dispose toward the Sacrament, must exclude, as the holy Council speaks, the will to sin; but otherwise, as St. Thomas says (II-II, q. 17, art. 8), someone is introduced to loving God through this, that, fearing to be punished by Him, he ceases from sin, as Augustine says [8].

[8] In the same sense St. Thomas (ibid.) finds some beginning of charity in hope. For the entire cited text reads thus: In the way of generation hope is prior to charity. For just as someone is introduced to loving God through this, that, fearing to be punished by Him, he ceases from sin, as Augustine says; so also hope introduces one to charity insofar as someone, hoping to be rewarded by God, is kindled to love God and to observe His precepts. But in the penitent there must at least be hope of pardon, as the Council of Trent expressly declares. Yet, as is plain, charity is treated here, not as included in acts either of fear or attrition or hope, or as necessarily accompanying these acts, but as that which can arise from those affections.

There were others who imagined an inchoate charity of such a kind that it loved God, but not above all things. But this is a charity which prefers the creature to the Creator; because this altogether destroys the essence of the Purpose necessary for true penance, rather than disposing the penitent more aptly to receive the grace of justification, it renders him altogether unfit of itself for obtaining this benefit.

Finally, there are those who require that beginning of love or inchoate charity which is necessary for the true (as they say) conversion of the sinner to God. But unless they explain what this inchoate charity is, they assuredly sell us words empty of meaning. Meanwhile, let this be noted: that ambiguous phrase true conversion to God is an artifice which Juvenin employs in his condemned Institutions (loc. cit., sec. IV) to infer from it the necessity of love of God above all things, concerning which we spoke in the preceding note. Thus a true conversion to God can and must be admitted, which consists, as St. Thomas says, in the will to observe the precepts of God. But unless this will is supposed to proceed from the motives of mere attrition, we fall back again into that necessity of perfect charity or contrition which, otherwise, the Catholic schools do not admit, not as though the affection of the penitent positively excluded that perfect love, but insofar as he can be sufficiently aroused to the will to observe the law of God by other honorable motives.

Moreover, the reason why St. Alphonsus says that the thesis set forth is morally certain is manifest. For the question ultimately comes down to whether contrition perfected by charity is prerequired in the penitent. But that it is not prerequired is an opinion most commonly received in the schools after the Council of Trent as morally certain. Furthermore, the thesis directly and immediately attacks the opinion of certain men who maintained as necessary a certain charity that was indeed predominant (by which, namely, God is loved above all things), but which nevertheless would not suffice to justify a man, and thus could coexist with the state of mortal sin. Thus, for example, Gaspar Juvenin in his condemned Theological Institutions (pt. 8, diss. V, ch. 4, art. 2); who afterward (sec. V) does not hesitate to assert that this contrition conceived from merely inchoate charity of God above all things, in a case of necessity, suffices for the justification of the impious with the desire of the Sacrament alone; but that outside a case of necessity it does not suffice with the desire of the Sacrament alone for someone to receive sanctifying grace. These things, moreover, fall back into those paradoxes of Baius and Francis Sylvius of which we shall speak a little later (in the note to the following no. 454).

§ III. On the Efficacy of Contrition

454. Principles. - I. Perfect contrition of itself justifies a man, even outside the Sacrament of Penance [1]. 1. This is evident from reason; for contrition necessarily includes perfect charity; moreover, to love God perfectly is to be united with God; but union with God necessarily effects separation from sin, since one cannot embrace one extreme without withdrawing totally from the opposite extreme. Therefore.... 2. It is evident from Sacred Scripture. Prov. 8:18: I love those who love me. - John 14:21: He who loves me shall be loved by my Father, and I will love him, and will manifest myself to him. - 1 Pet. 4:8: Charity covers a multitude of sins.

[1] The contrary doctrine was condemned both in Propositions 31, 32, and 70 of Michael Baius, who contended that perfect charity could exist without the remission of sins and with liability to eternal damnation; and more expressly in Proposition 71, which is as follows: Through contrition, even when joined with perfect charity and with the entire desire of receiving the Sacrament, a crime is not remitted outside a case of necessity or martyrdom without the actual reception of the Sacraments. Bellarmine refuted this in De Poenitentia, bk. 2, ch. 13.

An opinion akin to this condemned doctrine is that of Francis Sylvius, who (In Supplementum S. Thomae, q. 5, art. 1) taught that contrition, although joined with perfect love of God above all things, does not always, nor frequently or ordinarily, have the remission of sins joined to it before the Sacrament is received. See Cardinal De Lugo, who (De Poenitentia, disp. 5, no. 98 ff.) refutes both this and other discordant opinions of this writer.

II. Perfect contrition does not remit mortal sins, or justify a man, except with the desire of confession; for sins cannot be remitted except through the means instituted by Christ; but the Sacrament of Penance in reality, or at least in desire, is the one means instituted by Christ for remitting sins committed after Baptism. Therefore, etc. [2]. This is evident, moreover, from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 4.

[2] In what sense these things are to be understood you have from Lugo (De Sacramento Eucharistiae, disp. 3, no. 3), where he discusses the desire of Baptism and of Penance thus: Contrition is called Baptism in desire, not indeed because it has its efficacy in relation to justification from actual Baptism itself, but because it includes in itself an implicit desire of receiving Baptism, if it can be done, just as also of fulfilling all the other precepts. In this sense also contrition is said to justify in relation to the keys, or in relation to the Sacrament of Penance, not because it receives the power of justifying from the Sacrament, but because, when it justifies outside the Sacrament, it has in itself the implicit desire of subjecting mortal sins to the keys, to which a man remains bound even after he has been justified through contrition.

III. Attrition, as a disposition prerequired, suffices for obtaining the pardon of sins in the Sacrament of Penance. For it is evident from the same Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 4, that attrition disposes toward justification in the Sacrament of Penance.

IV. Attrition, however, cannot justify a sinner outside the Sacrament. For justification consists in the perfect union of man with God; but one who is attrite, although he withdraws from creatures and begins the first steps of conversion toward God, is nevertheless not yet perfectly converted to Him and united through love. Nor does attrition justify in the Sacrament by its own power, but it is only a prerequired condition; the Sacrament itself, however, justifies through the infusion of grace: wherefore in the Sacrament the penitent is actually attrite and becomes habitually contrite [3].

[3] Since perfect contrition justifies by its own power and at the same time is a disposition toward the Sacrament, he who approaches the Sacrament perfectly contrite is therefore enriched with a twofold gift of sanctifying grace: first, namely, by the power of contrition, and then again by the power of the Sacrament. But when the Author, following the customary phrase of the schools, says that in the Sacrament the attrite becomes contrite, understand habitually contrite, namely through the infusion of sanctifying grace, which is conferred by the power of absolution and renders the man habitually converted to God.

455. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must the desire of confession be explicit in contrition?

Reply. Negative, with the common opinion, which Billuart, diss. 1, art. 4, sec. 2; the Salmanticenses, ch. 2, no. 23, hold. The reason is that, for remission, it suffices that someone be truly united with God with his whole heart through perfect contrition; for God, as is plain from what has been said, cannot reject a sinner approaching Him with his whole heart and from the most perfect motive; but it can sometimes happen that a sinner elicits an act of perfect contrition without thinking of confession, whether from inadvertence or natural forgetfulness, or from invincible ignorance [4]. Therefore, for the remission of sin through contrition, it is not essential that the desire of confession be explicit.

[4] That is, the desire or will of confession is necessary, no differently than the will to fulfill all the precepts of God is required for perfect contrition. But this desire or implicit will can be present even if someone does not actually think of certain precepts, or even invincibly is ignorant of them.

456. QUESTION 2. Does contrition remit not only guilt, but also the punishment due to guilt?

Reply 1. It certainly remits eternal punishment, because a man justified through contrition cannot remain liable to eternal damnation.

Reply 2. According to its greater or lesser intensity, it also remits a part of the temporal punishment due to mortal or venial sins which have been blotted out. Hence very intense perfect contrition can abolish even every punishment; but by its nature it does not necessarily have this efficacy. This is gathered from Trent, sess. 6, ch. 14 and canon 30. - Likewise from sess. 14, De Poenitentia, ch. 8 and canon 12.

457. QUESTION 3. Does attrition remit venial sins outside the Sacrament?

Reply. It is controverted. The affirmative seems more probable. The reason is: 1. because, according to the Council of Trent, venial sins can be remitted in various ways; therefore they are not remitted by perfect contrition alone; 2. because, in the opposite opinion, venial sins would not be remitted more easily than mortal sins; but this is opposed to common sense; 3. because the power of remitting venial sins is commonly attributed to the sacramentals; but it would be attributed to them falsely if contrition were required for blotting out those sins. - Thus Suarez, disp. 11, sect. 3; Lugo, disp. 9, no. 28; and many others.

Nevertheless, not a few deny it, because according to Trent, sess. 14, ch. 5, venial sins are usefully accused in confession; but they would not be usefully accused if they could be remitted by attrition: therefore, etc. But it is rightly replied that venial sins are usefully exposed in confession for other reasons also, namely, for remission of punishment, for the merit of humiliation, for the benefit of direction, etc.

QUESTION 4. Does contrition or attrition remit venial sins without the desire of the Sacrament?

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is that by divine institution the Sacrament is necessary only for mortal sins; therefore venial sins can be blotted out without the Sacrament of Penance; therefore no desire of this Sacrament is necessarily required for their remission. - Thus all.

Article II. On the Purpose

458. Definition. The purpose is the will not to sin hereafter.

Division. It is twofold: 1. explicit, or formal, by which someone, thinking of the future, resolves not to sin any more; 2. implicit, or virtual, which is included in contrition itself, without the future time being held before the eyes.

459. Principles. - I. A purpose at least implicit is altogether necessary for the remission of sin; because the purpose is a necessary consequence of contrition and is included in it at least virtually, as is evident from its nature and definition.

II. A true purpose must possess three conditions; namely, it is required that it be firm, efficacious, and universal.

1. Firm; namely, the penitent must have a sincere will not to relapse into sin, notwithstanding any inconvenience [1] or human fear; otherwise he would not wish to be converted to God totally and sincerely. The Confessor, however, ought not to put the mind of the penitent to the test by employing comparisons suited to disturb his imagination [2].

[1] It is useful to set down here what the gravest Authors judge that the confessor must be admonished concerning this matter.

Suarez (De Poenitentia, disp. 32, sect. 2, no. 2): The Doctors observe that the Confessor ought not to set before the penitent all the difficulties which can occur in avoiding sins; because he will place him in manifest danger not only of not having an efficacious purpose for the future, but also of sinning anew. It is sufficient, therefore, that, the foulness of sin, the goodness of God, and the danger of damnation, etc., having been proposed IN GENERAL, the penitent conceive a GENERAL purpose never again to sin mortally.

To this pertain those words of Cardinal Cajetan (Summa, V. Confessio, on the twelfth quality): Penitents, however, must not be cast into temptation by an overzealous confessor imprudently investigating whether... he intends to avoid mortal sins above everything avoidable, such as plundering, killing, etc.; for an interrogation of this sort would lead many into temptation.... Let him exhort him to the love of God above all things, and that from love of this kind he ought to grieve over the past and purpose avoidance for the future.... And thus he will kindle the heart of the penitent and will not place him in danger of temptation.

And Cardinal De Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 7, no. 199), recalling a certain weakness of spirit which does not have strength to burst forth into a generous act, adds: This weakness is not a new sin, as is evident in those penitents before whose eyes the Confessor ought not explicitly to place circumstances that are exceedingly difficult, so that concerning them, if they occur, they may explicitly purpose not to sin in them also. And below (ibid., no. 238), speaking of those who ardently pursue honor or bodily pleasure, who, although they have retracted their sins in confession with some remiss sorrow, afterward, when an occasion of honor or pleasure is given, easily relapse because of the vehemence of the affection which they corrected only confusedly and remissly, he adds: Indeed, neither do we dare to set distinctly before them in confession the temptations or dangers of sinning which can occur, so that concerning those things they may distinctly purpose; because we prudently fear that now they would not retract their former sins even confusedly.

Finally, to omit others, Laymann (De Poenitentia, ch. 4, no. 8) has these words: The Confessor does not act rightly if he compels the penitent to a special promise... concerning avoiding this or that sin in the future, except in a rare case, if, for example, the sin is very harmful to the commonwealth, etc.

[2] Compare what was said above in the note to no. 450, q. 2.

2. Efficacious; that is, the penitent must not only resolve firmly that he does not wish to sin any more, but must also employ the necessary means for avoiding sin and fleeing proximate occasions, etc., etc. - It suffices, however, that the purpose be efficacious affectively; that is, it suffices that the sinner be prepared in mind to employ the necessary means, because future amendment in fact is not of the essence of the purpose [3].

[3] By these things the Author warns that the doctrine of those who think that proof from works must be demanded beforehand is not to be admitted; concerning this he afterward expressly discusses in Question I.

3. Universal; or it must extend to all mortal sins, not only those which have been committed, but also those which could be committed. The reason is that a full and true conversion to God cannot be given without aversion from every mortal sin.

But as regards venial sins, for the validity of the Sacrament it is required and suffices that a firm and efficacious purpose be present of avoiding at least one of the venial sins.

460. Questions. - QUESTION 1. For the purpose to be firm, must it also be found constant?

Reply. Negative; at least this is not absolutely necessary. The reason is that the purpose affects the present will, which otherwise is variable by its nature. Hence the weakness of the purpose cannot of itself be inferred from a relapse after confession. - Thus commonly with St. Lig., no. 451; Lugo, disp. 14, no. 166, etc., against some.

I said: at least this is not absolutely necessary. For if the penitent relapses immediately and with almost no resistance, it can sometimes provide some indication, or at least a suspicion, that he lacked a truly firm purpose; for he who purposes firmly generally does not so easily forget his purpose, but is accustomed to persevere constantly for at least some time and to employ efforts to resist temptations or occasions of sin, and consequently ordinarily falls with greater difficulty and more rarely. - Thus St. Lig., no. 459, where he treats of the recidivist; Lugo, disp. 14, no. 160, etc.

461. QUESTION 2. Can the purpose of one who indeed has the intention not to sin, but nevertheless fears and in some way foresees that he will relapse, be judged firm? Reply. Affirmative, generally; for fear which arises from past frailty and the inconstancy of the human will does not impede a sincere will. Hence that penitent has a true purpose who, when questioned by the Confessor concerning the will not to sin, replies: I am frail; I fear a fall; nevertheless I do not now will or choose the fall; these are the words of Gerson in Croix (bk. 6, pt. 2, no. 1733) [4].

[4] Elsewhere Croix (loc. cit., no. 1822) writes thus: I showed in no. 1733 that, for a serious purpose even concerning mortal sins, it is not required that one believe a relapse will not follow; but it is sufficient that a serious will now be present, with which, for as long as it stands, a will to relapse cannot stand, although perhaps it is foreseen that it will be changed through frailty. Just as St. Peter was not therefore judged indisposed for Communion because Christ knew he would relapse, so neither is one who is habituated to sin to be judged indisposed for absolution, although it may be MORALLY known that he will relapse.

Sporer has things identical with these (De Poenitentia, no. 310): A firm purpose, he says, of the will merely not to sin hereafter is required, but not likewise necessarily a belief or certain persuasion on the part of the intellect, namely that the penitent certainly believe, or persuade himself in his mind, that he will sin no more, or will no more commit this or that sin, as the Doctors commonly note.... For someone can truly grieve over and detest sin, and truly and absolutely purpose that he will not sin hereafter...; although he greatly fears or even thinks, indeed certainly believes, that on account of the experienced inconstancy of his will and his frailty he will relapse again, that he will not avoid all mortal sins, or even this certain kind of sin.

Since these things are so, it scarcely appears why St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 451) says that he does not acquiesce in the opinion (which he does not deny is called common) both of other most weighty Doctors and also of Sporer, but that he prefers to think with Croix. For although Croix added these things (loc. cit.): If, however, the habituated sinner himself despairs of his amendment, he will have a true purpose with difficulty; hence before he is absolved, he ought to be disposed so that he hopes, not through his own strength but through the grace of God, with which, if he cooperates, he will be able, as innumerable examples of men similar to himself have taught; Sporer also had added these things (loc. cit.): Moreover, if the penitent, in view of his frailty and inveterate evil habit, judges it altogether impossible for him hereafter to abstain from some one or more mortal sins, he must efficaciously be led by the Confessor; and, with the efficacy of divine grace considered, he must altogether persuade himself that it is not impossible, and, trusting in divine grace alone and not in himself, conceive a firm purpose of abstaining hereafter, saying with the Apostle: I can do all things in Him who strengthens me.... But if he cannot do this, or rather does not wish to, although he truly can, then, as destitute of true contrition, despairing of the grace of God, and thus indisposed for justification and the Sacrament, he cannot be absolved through his own fault. See in La Croix (loc. cit., nos. 1823, 1824) the cavils resolved by which Juvenin and Genettus attacked the common doctrine.

As regards practice, the chief difficulty occurs when (as not rarely happens) a penitent, otherwise of good will but frightened by the difficulty of the matter, says that he cannot promise this or that, lest he afterward appear to break his word, or that he cannot trust himself, etc. This indeed occurs especially with those who have a habit of vainly using the names of God and the Saints, of cursing, or of becoming enraged on account of continual and at the same time necessary occasions, etc.

Furthermore, a penitent of this kind must not only be raised up by hope of divine assistance, but taught that this one thing is required of him: that here and now he have the will not to relapse, especially since it is uncertain whether his life will be prolonged any longer, etc.; no differently than the present will to perform the thing vowed suffices for the validity of a vow. And he must be confirmed by his own example: that he should not think that he had purposed less sincerely on other occasions merely because he afterward relapsed. But the principal effort of the Confessor ought to be directed to this: that he appear to require only those things which the penitent will admit without difficulty to be within his power.

He will attain this both by proposing means which the penitent may use, whether when assailed by temptation or when he enjoys peace; and also by inculcating that this alone is ultimately demanded of him: that he guard against faults which are committed knowingly or with full advertence. This indeed is accustomed to refresh and greatly raise the spirits of those who, when they labor under an evil habit of blaspheming, cursing, etc., think that something impossible is required of them if they are ordered not to break forth any more into words of this kind, etc.

 From this Note the VV. took an argument for filling six columns (pp. 440-443). But to what purpose? For they write (p. 442): We freely concede that the holy Doctor erred in an accidental matter. And again (ibid.): We spontaneously admit that certain other writers alleged for the first opinion are cited less correctly. And again (ibid.): The holy Doctor took those citations from the Salmanticenses, not sufficiently observing, etc. But why, therefore, do the same VV. fill the whole world with such bitter outcries and complaints against those who noticed and warned that the citations which appear in the holy Doctor sometimes do not correspond to the end for which they are adduced? Nevertheless, they judged that readers must be warned (ibid.) that nothing therefore can be objected to St. Alphonsus except that he cited less correctly certain authors whom he thought contrary to himself, but who rather agree with him; and it is manifest otherwise that this error makes no difference to the matter. But again, to what purpose are these things? They are, namely, the things of men in whose minds it is most deeply fixed that whatever at length may be noted concerning the writings of the holy Doctor tends not toward anyone's advancement in learning, but by deliberate design toward undermining the doctrines of St. Alphonsus himself. Hence that method of disputing of theirs, which aims at anything else rather than casting some light upon theological questions. But they ought not to have thought in this way concerning these matters. And after Divine Providence wished to use especially the work of St. Alphonsus so that, the ill-fated writings of Juvenin, Merbes, Collet, Habert, Witasse, Genettus, and others of the same sort, which were worn in the hands of both teachers and students, having been banished, the doctrines of the Catholic schools might be restored, assuredly it seemed that, not anger, but rather encouragement should be given to those who contributed some little work of their own to the common good for polishing more and more, and perfecting, the work of the holy Doctor and rendering it more useful.

The VV. censure (ibid.) the statement in the Note that St. Alphonsus does not deny that the first opinion is called common, as though those words insinuate either that it was judged common by St. Alphonsus, or by others besides Navarrus. - Reply. The obvious sense of the Note is that St. Alphonsus opposed nothing to the first opinion's having been called common. But whether it was called common by one or by several matters little. If the VV. desire others speaking thus, let them consult, for example, Potestas (no. 3073); let them consult Gobat (tr. 6, no. 189); here they will find this opinion called common. But in this matter there is no need for more; for St. Alphonsus also shows that it is common, since he found no other whom he could truly oppose except Concina, who (De Poenitentia, bk. 1, diss. 3, ch. 2, sec. 4, no. VIII) attacks it with most diffuse declamations. Moreover, since it is manifestly apparent that St. Alphonsus, in this question of such slight moment, merely employed the Salmanticenses and Concina together with Croix, and did not dwell upon it laboriously, we can indeed know from him what he himself judged concerning it; but what the common opinion of the Doctors really was must not be sought from him.

In practice, however, you will inspect the disposition and character of the penitent; for you will not rarely find sinners asserting that they will relapse, and therefore fearing that they do not have a sufficiently firm purpose, although they show nothing other than fear of relapsing and distrust of themselves. It must be inculcated upon penitents of this kind that the matter concerns not those things which perhaps are going to happen, but their present will, and confidence to be placed in divine assistance. - Thus commonly.

462. QUESTION 3. For rightly receiving the Sacrament of Penance, is an explicit purpose required?

Reply. According to St. Lig. (no. 450), there are three opinions. The first, which a certain few [5] hold, affirms absolutely; because, although sorrow necessarily includes a purpose, nevertheless an explicit one seems to be required by Trent, which says: With the purpose of not sinning hereafter [6].

[5] The Author rightly attributes this opinion to a few. For you indeed see Peter Lombard, St. Thomas, Alexander of Hales, Bl. Albert, Scotus, and Durandus alleged for it. But even Bellarmine himself (De Poenitentia, bk. 2, ch. 6) frankly admits that those older authors indeed asserted the necessity of some purpose, but did not distinguish between a formal and a virtual one. Therefore, they are alleged gratuitously for this opinion rather than for the other. Likewise, in St. Alphonsus (no. 450), Suarez, Cajetan, Bonacina, Henriquez, Valentia, Reginaldus, and Toletus are cited for the same opinion. But Suarez (De Poenitentia, disp. 20, sect. 4, no. 34) establishes the contradictory thesis; likewise Cajetan (Summa, V. Confessio, no. 12) and Bonacina (disp. 5, q. 5, sect. 1, punct. 3, no. 9) plainly teach the opposite; Henriquez, however (Summa, bk. 4, ch. 24, no. 2), expressly hands down the third opinion; and Valentia (disp. VII, q. 8, punct. 6) distinctly affirms that this express purpose is not required by a necessity of means for justification, but that sometimes a sinner can be justified with only an implicit purpose of this kind; and he says sometimes because, by a most singular opinion, he judged that an explicit one is necessary when the positive precept of penance urges: as though, namely, for fulfilling the precept of penance, the penance which suffices for justification did not suffice! Finally, Reginaldus and Toletus do not so prefer the first that they reject the other.

[6] Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 14, no. 53) shows that the argument which is taken for this opinion from the words of the Council of Trent is plainly weak; moreover, there (ibid.) he openly shows that the contrary is plainly proved from Tridentine doctrine.

The second opinion, which Cardenas calls morally certain, absolutely denies it. The reason is that sorrow, if elicited from a general motive, includes a plainly efficacious purpose. Otherwise, according to the Council of Trent, when attrition excludes the will to sin, it sufficiently disposes a man for obtaining grace in the Sacrament. Elbel, no. 87; Laymann, ch. 4, no. 6; the Salmanticenses, ch. 5, no. 54; Lugo, disp. 14, no. 51, who says that this opinion is common among the more recent authors.

The third opinion, which St. Liguori testifies is called common, teaches that, if the penitent thinks about his future life, he must formally purpose amendment [7]. It is otherwise if the penitent thinks nothing about the future. For if he thinks about the future, all agree that it can scarcely happen that a sincere penitent does not at the same time elicit an explicit and formal purpose [8].

[7] This obligation seems to be inculcated altogether uselessly. For if a thought of future life arises, the discussion of an obligation is made in vain; since, as Bellarmine says with others (De Poenitentia, bk. 2, ch. 6), it cannot happen that sorrow for sins committed be true in the mind without a purpose of avoiding future sins also immediately arising (in one thinking of future life). But if a thought about the future does not occur, the obligation, of which there is no advertence, is inculcated in vain.

[8] Yet this sometimes happens to the contrary in pious persons, especially those who diligently guard against even light but fully deliberate sins, and are accustomed immediately to grieve over some chance fall and soon restore themselves to the right way. For since the purpose of guarding against sins is not in them some new will which then supervenes while they dispose themselves for receiving the Sacrament of Penance, but is continually and habitually firm within them, it is therefore no wonder that perhaps they do not think again about confirming this will in some manner.

St. Liguori, however, interposes his own judgment concerning these things thus (ibid.): These latter two opinions are indeed more probable; but because the first is not without its own probability [9], in practice, before the fact, the safer is to be followed.

[9] Thus St. Alphonsus judged, moved, namely, by empty citations, concerning which we have just spoken.

Since, however, according to the testimony of St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), most even of those who are alleged for the first opinion agree that if you have confessed in good faith with true sorrow but without a formal purpose, you are not bound to repeat the confession, although he adds that he cannot acquiesce in these [10], it is now clear that, in this conclusion, which alone is of service to practice, all the opinions and the suffrage of all the Doctors finally agree. There is added the authority of the Roman Council under Benedict XIII, celebrated in the Lateran Basilica in the year of the universal Jubilee 1725. The Supreme Pontiff says (Tit. XXXII, ch. 3): We shall give instructions at once brief and clear pertaining to the use and worship of the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist, which are first to be received by children, at the end of this Council of Ours. But the Supreme Pontiff says that clear instructions are to be given, in order to meet the inconveniences of which it is read thus in the Appendix (no. 1): Although pastors do not fail substantially to supply the milk of Christian piety by instructing them (the children) in the same Doctrine, nevertheless some do it in so confused and inept a manner that they cause the children either not to understand it well, or at least to take it in an undigested manner and with difficulty. Therefore, there is no room for doubt that the principal points of Christian doctrine are handed down clearly there.

[10] Thus the holy Doctor: I say before the fact; for Croix, Viva, Elbel, Gobat, and Bonacina, with Bellarmine, Suarez, Vasquez, Reginaldus, Henriquez, say that if you have confessed in good faith with true sorrow but without a formal purpose, you are not bound to repeat the confession.... Nevertheless, neither can I acquiesce in this opinion; the reason is that, since the first opinion is sufficiently probable, the penitent who has perpetrated a grave and certain fault is bound to complete a confession of it which is not only probably but also certainly valid. But these things openly conflict with the doctrine which he himself hands down elsewhere (bk. 6, no. 505) in these words: Here it must diligently be noted that penitents are not to be compelled to repeat confessions UNLESS IT IS MORALLY CERTAIN THAT THEY WERE INVALID, as Croix, Gobat, etc., RIGHTLY SAY WITH THE COMMON OPINION, against Antoine, who holds no low place among the rigorous authors of our time. But in the case, rather than its being certain that the confession was invalid, on the contrary you will rightly say that it is morally certain that the confession was valid: for, as he himself admits, the Authors of the first, the second, and the third opinion agree in denying the necessity of repeating the confession. Moreover, they would not deny this necessity unless they judged the confession valid. Therefore morally all the Doctors affirm that the confession is valid. But the unanimous consensus of the Doctors, from a canon received by all, produces moral certainty. Therefore, etc.

Moreover, there seem to have been two causes why St. Alphonsus turned aside to that singular conclusion. For first, deceived by Croix, he ascribed that first opinion to several who do not hold it at all, as we have already seen (in the preceding note). Then he did not sufficiently observe that the patrons of that first opinion, however many they may finally be, while at the same time teaching with the others, as he admits, that the confession is not to be repeated, by no means judged that an explicit purpose was necessary by a necessity of means (as Valentia says), and that they therefore pertain rather to the third opinion; so much so that the first opinion, insofar as it is distinguished from the third, in reality scarcely has any patron, and accordingly some probability is attributed to it only from a false supposition.

 It may appear altogether incredible; nevertheless the matter is thus: the VV. filled fifty-four columns (four others, namely, being omitted, which, although they have a different subject, are inserted among them), pp. 443-472, concerning this argument, contending, namely, that St. Alphonsus rightly and deservedly establishes that a confession made without a formal and explicit purpose is not certainly valid and therefore must be repeated. We shall cover the matter in a few words. But let the fruit of this Note be that of which we spoke in the Monitum, vol. 1, so that this question also may now pass into the state of an adjudicated matter.

Let the argument therefore be this: Whoever teaches 1. that an explicit purpose is by no means of the essence of that contrition which, as Suarez says (De Poenitentia, disp. 4, sect. 3, no. 1), is the ultimate disposition toward grace; and 2. that detestation of sin without a formal purpose, as the same Suarez says (loc. cit., no. 6), is a sufficient disposition toward grace; and 3. that a virtual purpose included in sorrow suffices for the Sacrament to be valid, as the same Suarez says (ibid., disp. 20, sect. 4, no. 34); he assuredly holds that a confession made without a formal or explicit purpose, and only with a virtual or implicit purpose, is valid, and therefore does not necessarily have to be repeated. But this must be called the unanimous opinion of the Catholic school. Therefore.

Proof of the minor.

1. Suarez (disp. 4, sect. 3, no. 7): It is concluded that a formal purpose of not sinning hereafter is not of the essence and formal nature of contrition. And again (ibid., no. 6): The detestation of sin alone without a formal purpose can be a sufficient disposition toward grace. And again (disp. 20, sect. 4, no. 34): I judge that the Sacrament is valid, and that a virtual purpose included in sorrow suffices. Hence it is clear with what fruit the VV. fill seven columns with texts of Suarez (pp. 447-449). You will say: Suarez (disp. 4, sect. 3, no. 3) establishes that a formal purpose, speaking of itself, is necessary. Reply. Distinguish: He establishes that it is necessary for the validity of the Sacrament, I deny; for other extrinsic reasons, speaking of itself, let it pass; but the present question concerns the validity of the Sacrament.

2. Peter Soto, a theologian at the Council of Trent (De Sacramento Poenitentiae, lect. 17, final proposition): It is openly evident that complete sorrow, such as has been described, suffices: in which this purpose is included. It is therefore enough to have these things implicitly. - The VV. say (p. 447) that Peter Soto is attacked by Suarez (disp. 20, sect. 4, no. 32), because he said (dist. 17, q. 1, art. 2) that a confession is never feigned from a defect of purpose, provided the penitent confesses his defect. - Reply 1.

The man who has a work with distinctions, questions, and articles is not Peter Soto but Dominic. 2. If Suarez attacks Dominic Soto because the latter, as the same Suarez says, requires not even a virtual purpose, how do the VV. object Dominic Soto to us as requiring not only a virtual but even a formal purpose?

3. Vasquez (In III Partem, q. 86, art. 2, dub. 4, no. 3): For sin to be blotted out, a purpose of abstaining in the future suffices if it is virtual.... This opinion, in my judgment, is most true.

4. St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, tr. 4, ch. 1, dub. II, note A, ed. 1748): Here we think it worth the labor to note which opinions are morally certain.... They are: II. That a virtual purpose, or one implicit in sorrow conceived from a general motive, suffices. And again (ed. 1757, bk. 6, no. 540): Croix, Viva, and others commonly teach very well that if you have confessed in good faith with true sorrow but without a formal purpose, you are not bound to repeat the Confession. I ask: if the holy Doctor had then been taken up into heaven, would it have been lawful to follow this doctrine of his and of the others in common?

5. Collet (De Poenitentia, pt. 2, ch. 4, no. 230): If the (formal) purpose of a new life pertains to the essence of contrition, then, even when it is omitted without fault, the substance of contrition will be lacking; and thus the salvation of the penitent who, intent upon detesting sin above all things, has not thought about the future will be given up as lost. But this indeed appears absurd to me and ridiculous to other more learned men. Collet, moreover, as all know, cannot be numbered among lax authors.

6. Francis Sylvius (in Collet, loc. cit., no. 231): It must be said with Navarrus... that per accidens an implicit purpose suffices.... Hence if someone, occupied either in examining his conscience or in detesting his past life,... does not actually think, I wish to amend my life..., but goes in good faith to the Confessor..., such a confession of his is good.

7. Even the most rigorous Concina (Epitome Theologiae Christianae, bk. 11, ch. 8): It can nevertheless happen that the penitent is carried away by such vehement sorrow that he does not think about the purpose; but if he adverted to it, he would conceive the firmest resolution of not sinning hereafter. But now the discussion concerns those things which commonly happen. He has identical things elsewhere (De Poenitentia, diss. 3, ch. 1, no. 18). Since therefore a confession without a formal purpose is here asserted to be valid, to what purpose do the VV. number even Concina (p. 455) in the article whose title is: The authorities alleged by St. Alphonsus are vindicated?

8. Cardenas (pt. 4, diss. 2, no. 80): It is altogether certain beyond all probability that this virtual purpose suffices.... Since therefore it is certain that a virtual purpose of this kind suffices, that condemnation has no place here, namely, of the first proposition among those proscribed by Innocent XI.

9. Bonacina (De Poenitentia, disp. 5, q. 5, sect. 1, punct. 3, no. 9): Observe, however, that a virtual purpose suffices, by which one so detests sins that, if they occurred to his mind, he would elicit a firm purpose of guarding against them. - The VV. adduce Bonacina (pp. 451-452; loc. cit., punct. 8), where he says that each opinion is probable. - Reply 1. Which opinion he himself absolutely prefers is plain from his words adduced. Let the words which he has in the place alleged by the VV. (no. 2) be noted: The Sacrament received by one who in good faith detests sin and confesses it without a formal purpose does not seem to be judged invalid.

10. Laymann (bk. 5, tr. 6, ch. 1, no. 8): In the act of contrition there is included also the purpose, at least implicit, of observing God's commandments in the future, if life remains. - Nevertheless, for justification, an implicit desire or purpose of these Sacraments suffices. And more clearly (bk. 5, tr. 6, ch. 4, no. 6): Assertion VI. For justification outside and within the Sacrament, speaking of itself and necessarily, an express purpose of observing the commandments of God, or of abstaining from sins, is not required, but the implicit purpose which is virtually contained in the very detestation of sins suffices.

11. Viva (On Proposition 1 of Innocent XI, no. 26): Since it appears morally certain that in the Sacrament of Penance a formal purpose of not sinning hereafter is not required, but a virtual one suffices..., therefore we follow propositions of this kind which are most probable, the safer ones being omitted.

12. Resolution of Cases of the Diocese of Bologna, by command of Benedict XIV (p. 151): It must be said that the absence of a formal purpose does not render the confession invalid.

13. Felix Potestas (vol. 1, pt. 4, no. 3072), absolutely: For the validity of the Sacrament... a purpose of not sinning hereafter is required.... It suffices that the purpose be implicit and virtual.

14. Trullench (bk. 4, ch. 5, dub. 5, no. 5), absolutely: A virtual purpose suffices. Navarrus, Bonacina.

15. Andreucci (Memoriale Confessariorum, pt. 1, ch. 1, sec. 3, no. 2), absolutely: For the validity and effect of the Sacrament, it must be said that... the virtual purpose included in the sorrow and detestation itself suffices, if the sorrow arose from some universal motive.... Nor does this opinion seem in any way affected by the proscription of Proposition 1 condemned by Innocent XI.

16. Peter Catalani (pt. 3, De Poenitentia, q. 6, ch. 4, no. 16): The authors of the first opinion (which, namely, requires a formal purpose) do not deny that the Sacrament is valid if someone approaches it in good faith and detests his sins... with only a virtual purpose.

17. Reiffenstuel (tr. 14, dist. 6, q. 4, no. 49): The purpose of not sinning hereafter... regularly indeed must be formal and explicit.... Nevertheless, per accidens a virtual and implicit purpose can also suffice. Thus the common opinion. Hence argue: if a formal purpose pertained essentially to the validity of the Sacrament, its absence, although per accidens, would remove the validity, because it would remove the essence. But it does not. Therefore.

18. Holzmann (pt. 5, no. 501), absolutely: That per accidens at least a virtual and implicit purpose can suffice is the common opinion of the Doctors:... in which case he who has a virtual and implicit purpose... is judged sufficiently disposed to receive sacramental absolution; so that this principle holds: The tacit and the express have the same efficacy.

19. Fagundez (On the Second Precept of the Church, bk. 2, ch. 3, no. 14), absolutely: The common opinion teaches that a formal purpose is not required, but a virtual one suffices..., which is most especially true when, through inculpable inadvertence, the penitent does not remember this formal purpose.

20. Cuniliati (tr. 14, ch. 4, sec. 3, no. 6), absolutely: The purpose regularly ought to be explicit and formal.... I said regularly..., because if it is omitted merely from inadvertence, then it is judged implicitly contained in the sorrow.

21. Anthony of the Holy Ghost, Compendium Salmanticense, tr. 27, ch. 2, punct. 7, no. 79, absolutely: 1. Some purpose, at least virtual, is required for the validity of this Sacrament.... 2. A formal and express purpose is not essentially required for a valid Sacrament.

22. Emmanuel Rodriguez (Summa, vol. 1, ch. 48, no. 4), absolutely: The penance for sins which the sinner has without a formal purpose of avoiding them... is sufficient for that sinner to remain justified.

23. Dupasquier (Theologia Scotica, tr. 15, disp. 3, q. 2, concl. 3): Contrition ought to be with a formal purpose...; nevertheless, in some case a virtual and implicit one could suffice. It is the common opinion.... Otherwise, if someone detested his sins with his whole heart, not thinking about the future, and died in that state, he would be damned from the absence of such a formal purpose; but this is false, unfitting, and harsh.

24. Billuart (De Poenitentia, disp. 4, art. 1), absolutely: The purpose seems, speaking of itself, to have to be explicit.... Nevertheless, per accidens... an implicit or virtual one suffices.... The reason is that a formal purpose is not of the essence of contrition, and consequently is not an essential part of the Sacrament. The VV. also adduce the first part of this text (p. 456); but they ought not to have cut away the second, which decides the question against them.

25. Platelius (Cursus Theologicus, pt. 5, ch. 6, sec. 2, no. 646): The necessity of a formal purpose distinct from an efficacious detestation of sins, virtually containing the efficacious will not to sin hereafter, can be proved from no source; since this virtual purpose amply suffices for explaining the Councils which indefinitely require a purpose of amendment.

26. Filliuccius (tr. 7, ch. 7, no. 161), absolutely: If someone in good faith detests the sin which he confesses, and does not advert to a formal purpose for the future..., the confession will be valid, and then a virtual purpose suffices..., as Suarez proves from Medina and more firmly from the Councils of Florence and Trent.

27. Coninck (De Poenitentia, disp. 2, no. 58): A purpose of avoiding all sins in the future which is distinct from the preceding acts is not always necessarily required. For it can happen that, while someone elicits those prior acts (namely, of sorrow), he thinks nothing about avoiding sins in the future; in which case he will not be able to have a formal purpose concerning this, and nevertheless he will be justified.

28. Peter Marchant (Tribunal Poenitentiae, tr. 4, tit. 3, q. 4), to the question, Whether a formal purpose of not sinning hereafter is required for true contrition or attrition, replies: For true contrition or attrition a virtual purpose of not sinning hereafter and of observing the commandments suffices, nor is a formal one necessary.

29. Mastrius (Theologia Moralis, disp. 21, q. 2, no. 32), absolutely: In a case of natural forgetfulness... an express purpose of guarding against sins in the future is not necessary for justification, but a virtual and implicit one suffices.

30. Giribaldi (tr. 7, ch. 5, no. 75), absolutely: I reply that for the Sacrament of Penance a virtual purpose included in the very detestation, without a formal and express one, suffices. This is gathered from Trent.

31. John Medina (Codex de Poenitentia, tr. 1, q. 3, near the end), absolutely: It is sufficient if the penitent virtually purposes, according as the purpose is virtually contained in the act of penance.

32. Illsung (tr. 6, disp. 6, q. 3, art. 3, no. 34): The Council of Trent... approved imperfect contrition as a sufficient disposition toward justification through the Sacrament of Penance..., if it excludes the will to sin, without distinction whether that exclusion is made through a virtual purpose included in it or through a formal one...; nevertheless it sufficiently intimates that formal detestation is more required than a formal purpose.

33. The Salmanticenses (tr. 6, ch. 5, no. 54), absolutely: For the Sacrament of Penance a virtual purpose suffices, by which one so detests sinning that, if future sins occurred to the mind, he would elicit a firm purpose of guarding against them in the future.

34. Roncaglia (tr. 19, q. 2, ch. 1, q. 2, reply 2): If someone, with his whole mind occupied in detesting past sins, thought nothing about future amendment, and thus received the Sacrament of Penance without an explicit purpose, I would judge him to be justified by its power. The reason is that... the omission of an explicit purpose would not be from a defect of sorrow, but from a defect of advertence.

35. Wagemann (Synopsis Theologiae Moralis, pt. 3, tr. 2, ch. 4, no. 53): It is the more common opinion that a virtual purpose suffices.... This opinion can serve so that one who through forgetfulness omits a formal purpose and, after the Sacrament, discovers the defect, can rest satisfied.

36. Elbel (De Poenitentia, conf. 4, no. 86): For the validity of the Sacrament of Penance, a virtual purpose most probably suffices.... I said most probably for the validity, etc. For Stoz, with other most approved and classical authors, judges this opinion truly safe even in practice, and that through it the Sacrament is not exposed to danger, etc.

37. Marcus Struggl (tr. 11, q. 2, art. 2, no. 27), absolutely: For the validity of the Sacrament of Penance, speaking of itself, a formal purpose of a better life is not necessarily required as an act distinct from sorrow, but a virtual purpose identified with the universal sorrow suffices.

38. Honoratus Fabri (Theologia Moralis, tr. 9, ch. 2, no. 11): If attrition is from a universal motive extending to all mortal sins,... in that act of contrition there is included the purpose of not sinning in the future..., nor is anything else required by the Council. And again (ibid., no. 12): I reply that the virtual purpose which is included in the very detestation suffices.

39. Aversa (De Poenitentia, q. 2, sect. 12): It cannot be denied that that act of repentance can be elicited without a distinct act of purpose.... But in that case it must be admitted that the sinner is justified: for through that act he is turned away from sin... and virtually has the intention of not sinning any more.... Therefore, it ought not to be denied that he is justified. And again (q. 11, sect. 2): If the penitent confesses in good faith, neither thinking nor having been admonished by the Confessor about eliciting such a purpose, it will be sufficient if he has sufficient sorrow, which virtually includes such a purpose, so that he also receives the effect of grace.

40. Reuter (pt. 4, tr. 4, no. 290): Regularly speaking, it is also required that the purpose be formal and explicit.... I said: regularly speaking; for it is far more probable, indeed according to Gormaz, Cardenas, and others morally certain, that a virtual purpose contained in universal sorrow suffices. For the Council of Trent, etc.

41. Henriquez (bk. 4, ch. 24, no. 2), absolutely: It can happen that, from inadvertence, or because he remembers nothing about future life, the penitent has true love and contrition, with every virtual affection for sin excluded, and is justified without the aforesaid formal purpose, which is sufficiently included in the contrition of one who does not remember. Does Henriquez not therefore affirm most clearly that the Sacrament is thus valid? To what purpose, then, do the VV. consume an entire column (p. 455) so that his words may be taken in another sense?

42. Castropalaus (De Sacramentis, Poenitentia, punct. 1, no. 8), absolutely: In penance, a firm and absolute purpose of never sinning need not be made by an act distinct from detestation and sorrow; for he who seriously and perfectly detests and grieves over a sin committed has at least virtually the will never to commit sin again. Thereupon (punct. 2, no. 15) he adds: No sin, whether mortal or venial, is remitted without either a formal or a virtual purpose.

43. Mansi (Theologia Moralis, bk. 5, tr. 6, ch. 4, no. 6), absolutely: An implicit purpose of not sinning hereafter suffices for justification; it is virtually contained in the very detestation of sin.

44. John Pontas (V. Contritio, case IV), absolutely: It is indeed certain that for true contrition a firm purpose of not sinning hereafter is necessarily required.... But it is not required for the essence of contrition that that purpose be express and explicit.... It is therefore sufficient that that purpose be implicit and virtual.

45. Babenstuber (tr. 8, pt. 6, disp. 4, art. 1, no. 11), absolutely: Per accidens or extraordinarily, a virtual purpose suffices.... The reason is that it can happen that the penitent, when he grieves efficaciously over sins committed, thinks nothing about future sins and a life to be amended hereafter. In that event he has a virtual purpose included in the formal sorrow itself.... But such a virtual purpose then suffices, as the Doctors commonly agree, and in this case also the force of the tacit and the express is the same.

46. The Wurzburg theologians (De Sacramentis, Poenitentia, ch. 3, art. 5, no. 173), absolutely: I say: A formal purpose, speaking of itself, is necessary for contrition.... Nevertheless, per accidens a virtual one suffices. Council of Trent.

47. Ysambertus (De Sacramento Poenitentiae, disp. IX, art. 3): Let this be the proposition: The purpose of not sinning hereafter, likewise of confessing one's sins sacramentally and of making satisfaction, required in contrition, need not necessarily be formal and explicit, as though, when it is omitted as such, contrition were insufficient; but a virtual and implicit one can suffice.... Our aforesaid proposition is very common among the scholastics.... For in moral matters the virtual and the formal or express are equated.

48. Reginaldus (bk. 5, ch. 1, nos. 7-8): Whether it suffices that the purpose be virtual..., Bellarmine and Suarez relate diverse authors for each side.... Although the negative side is not altogether to be rejected,... nevertheless the affirmative seems to be followed in practice and recommended to the penitent. The VV. (p. 454) fill two solid columns with those things which Reginaldus (loc. cit.), following Bellarmine, pursues at length, so that, namely, he may prove that the affirmative opinion is to be recommended in practice. But the present question is not which opinion is to be recommended, but whether a virtual purpose suffices. Moreover, St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 540) numbers Reginaldus among those who deny that a confession made with a virtual purpose must be repeated. Do the VV. also undertake to refute the holy Doctor, and indeed in that article in which they strive to vindicate the authorities alleged by the holy Doctor? And in fact Reginaldus, enumerating the conditions of perfect sorrow, writes (ibid., no. 69): Fifth, that it exclude the will to sin and be with at least a virtual purpose of avoiding sins hereafter.

49. Lessius (In Additiones S. Thomae, q. 1, dub. 2, no. 6): I say secondly: This purpose must be formal and express if a man thinks about the manner of life to be led in the future. If, however, this thought does not occur, an implicit and virtual purpose included in serious sorrow for sins suffices.... For if virtual penance sometimes suffices, why does not a virtual purpose of amendment included in sorrow for sin also suffice?

50. Navarrus (Manuale, ch. 1, no. 1): Following the opinion of the ancients and the more recent authors..., we define that contrition is repentance... with a purpose of not sinning any more, at least virtually.... (no. 11) I said, at least virtually, because just as the act which suffices for virtual penance, so for the same reason that which is a virtual purpose of not sinning any more seems to suffice.... (no. 6): When I was asked, however, whether this... was to be held, namely... that a virtual purpose suffices, I replied affirmatively, provided he so repents that, if he adverted to future things, he would purpose never to repeat those things nor to admit future ones.

51. Mazzotta (tr. 6, disp. 1, q. 3, ch. 4, sec. 1, no. 3): You ask, Must the purpose be formal and express, or does a virtual and implicit one suffice? I reply that a virtual and implicit purpose in the act of sorrow also suffices, provided this sorrow is elicited from a universal motive.... This opinion is so received by Theologians and fortified by such firm reasons that its truth must not be doubted in practice.

52. Tamburini (Methodus Confessionis, bk. 1, ch. 1, no. 7): An explicit purpose of not sinning hereafter, although it is laudably added and, in the opinion of many, necessarily...; nevertheless, in the probable opinion of others an implicit one suffices, that is, that which is involved in the very act of detestation.... For no one wishes to commit what displeases him. Since he says merely that an explicit one is laudably added, it is plain that he by no means held it necessary.

53. Esparza (bk. 10, q. 88, art. 4): If it could in any way happen that the penitent conceived contrition... without a formal purpose of not sinning hereafter, he would without doubt obtain the true effect of the Sacrament.

54. Magister Candidus (De Confessione, disq. 24, art. 12, no. III): I say secondly: An implicit and virtual purpose, by which one so detests sins that, if future sins occurred to his mind, he would elicit a firm purpose and an absolute will of guarding against them in the future, is sufficient for the validity of the Sacrament and for obtaining its effect.

55. Voit (vol. 2, no. 511): Per accidens a virtual purpose sometimes suffices (for obtaining grace... in confession), which is included in serious sorrow, by virtue of which the penitent is so disposed that he does not wish to sin any more.... Thus it seems to be reconciled with our opinion and that of others, that a virtual purpose suffices.

56. Escobar (bk. 14, sect. 2, no. 157): A formal purpose does not seem to me so necessary.... Hence, if someone in good faith truly detests the sin which he confesses, and does not advert to a formal purpose, so that he does not sin in omitting it, the Sacrament will be valid, and a virtual purpose included in the sorrow will suffice.

57. Francis Anthony of Gorizia (Tabula 151): A virtual and implicit purpose included in the sorrow itself suffices, if in some case one were so carried away by bitter sorrow and vehement contrition that he thought nothing about ordering his life in the future.

58. Reding (Theologia Scholastica, De Poenitentia, q. 6, art. 2, controv. 3, no. 5): Thesis: From the definition of the Council of Trent it is not proved that the purpose of not sinning hereafter, required for the Sacrament of Penance, must be formal and explicit; but, speaking of itself, an implicit and virtual one suffices for the validity of this Sacrament, provided that it is universal.

59. Moya (tr. 3, De Poenitentia, disp. 5, q. 11, no. 4): The true opinion hands down that, both for the validity and for the effect of the Sacrament, a virtual purpose included in sorrow suffices, provided that the sorrow is such that it extends at least implicitly to all mortal sins.

60. Ulloa (disp. 5, ch. 3, no. 47): When you hear that detestation, sorrow, and purpose are required essentially and constitutively for the Sacrament of Penance, do not understand this determinately of those acts as formal, but either of formal or virtual acts. And again (no. 72): This purpose can be distinct or indistinct from the two preceding acts, or from either of them.

61. Paul Mezger (tr. 18, disp. 44, art. 2, sec. 1): Conclusion. In order that sorrow be efficacious and thus useful for the remission of sins, whether within or outside the Sacrament, the purpose of not sinning hereafter is necessary: ordinarily indeed a formal one; per accidens and extraordinarily, a virtual one.

62. Lucius Ferraris (V. Poenitentiae Sacramentum, art. 2, no. 40): The purpose of not sinning hereafter, although, speaking of itself, it ought to be formal and explicit,... nevertheless it also suffices that it be implicit and virtual. Scotus.

63. Sporer (Theologia Sacramentalis, pt. 3, ch. 2, no. 316), absolutely: For contrition even perfect, which justifies outside or within the Sacrament, a formal, express purpose of not sinning mortally hereafter is not per se universally necessary, but a virtual purpose always included in true formal contrition itself can also suffice.

64. Granadus (De Sacramentis, controv. 7, tr. 18, disp. 3, sect. 1, no. 6; in Diana, vol. 1, tr. 3, res. 109): I judge that for attrition a virtual purpose intrinsically enclosed in sorrow suffices.... Wherefore he who sincerely grieves over sins because of the punishments of hell is sufficiently disposed and approaches the Sacrament of Penance without another formal purpose of not sinning hereafter.

65. Villalobos (Summa, vol. 2, tr. 9, diff. 19, no. 8): When the penitent thinks about future sins, he is bound to have an actual purpose of avoiding them; otherwise he will have a virtual one; but this suffices much more if he does not think about future things.

66. Gobat (tr. 6, no. 205): That it can happen per accidens that the remission of sins is obtained without an express and formal purpose, either through attrition together with confession or through contrition even outside confession, is so received by the more recent theologians and fortified by such firm reasons that its truth must not be doubted in practice.

67. Gormaz (De Sacramentis, disp. 4, sect. 3, no. 223), absolutely: I assert secondly: For a true act of Penance and for the validity of the Sacrament of Penance, the purpose which is customarily called virtual suffices.... And again (no. 224): That act (of sorrow) without a formal purpose has the formality of the purpose required by Trent, and therefore is certainly sufficient... for constituting the Sacrament of Penance.

68. Valentia (vol. 4, disp. 7, q. 8, punct. 6, near the end): The things which Maior and Medina adduce... prove only that this express purpose is not required even by a necessity of means for justification; but that sometimes a sinner can be justified with only an implicit purpose of this kind, contained, namely, in the very detestation of past sin: that is, outside the time of the precept, or even at the time of the precept if someone is then prevented by a sudden occurrence from being able to think about the future. - Concerning Valentia the VV. spend three columns (pp. 457-458); and although they suppress the words related here, they do not deny that, according to the opinion of Valentia, the Sacrament is valid without a formal purpose even at the time of the precept. But if the VV. concede this, let them therefore also concede that Valentia is wrongly alleged for the opinion of St. Alphonsus, who contends that the confession in the case must be repeated.

69. Praepositus (De Poenitentia, q. 2, dub. 3): A formal purpose is not required, because true and efficacious sorrow is found even thus.

70. Meratius (De Poenitentia, q. 17, sect. 2): It is the common opinion of the more recent authors that a virtual and implicit purpose suffices.

71. Dicastillo (tr. 8, disp. 2, dub. 6, no. 141): It must be asserted that some purpose of not sinning is indeed necessary for the nature of perfect contrition; nevertheless, a purpose which is an act distinct from the act of penance itself is not necessary. And again (disp. 6, dub. 14, no. 212): That a virtual purpose contained in sorrow suffices... is now the common opinion in the School in this and the preceding century after Trent. And again (disp. 2, no. 144): Therefore, theologians do not so commonly teach the opposite as Lugo absolutely thinks, disp. 5, no. 97.

72. Toletus (bk. 3, ch. 4, no. 2): This purpose must be express; and this is more probable..., although some say that the first act suffices; but what we have said is safer. Moreover, he who says it is safer implicitly admits that the other also suffices of itself. This is confirmed from these words of the same Toletus (In III Partem S. Thomae, q. 85, art. 1): In the fact that a man is displeased with a sin committed, there is virtually included a certain purpose of not committing it any more.... Although, therefore, in such detestation there is no formal purpose, which also sometimes happens, nevertheless this purpose is virtually included in it.

Thereupon he attributes the same power for obtaining the effect to an implicit purpose as to an explicit one (ibid., q. 87, art. 1): Formal penance is not necessary, but an act of love, which nevertheless is virtual penance, suffices for blotting out a venial sin. Moreover, it ought to seem superfluous to doubt the opinion of Toletus concerning this, when it is established that, concerning a penitent who does not detest sin above everything detestable, and likewise concerning one who desires to have contrition which he does not have, he absolutely established (Summa, loc. cit., nos. 6-7) that such contrition, if the defect is not known to the penitent, suffices for receiving grace in the Sacrament.

73. Lugo (disp. 14, no. 52): Sometimes sorrow is of such a kind that the required purpose is virtually included in it; and then another formal purpose is not required for the validity of the Sacrament. And a little later (no. 53): The words of the Councils of Florence and Trent, which require with sorrow a purpose of not sinning..., are understood of a formal purpose or of a virtual one implicit in it. For there can be some sorrow... which does not bring with it such a universal purpose; therefore the Fathers explained that sorrow was not of just any kind, but with a purpose of not sinning, whether formal or virtual.

Let us break off the series, not as though as many and more witnesses were lacking, but 1. because we dwell in exile, violently torn away from libraries; 2. because those already produced here can suffice for showing the consensus of all the schools. But now let us compare these with those who are objected as though adversaries and whom we have collected by Bellarmine (De Poenitentia, bk. 4, ch. 6).

But (as St. Alphonsus himself, bk. 6, no. 450, distinctly testifies after others) Bellarmine judged that if you have confessed in good faith with true sorrow but without a formal purpose, you are not bound to repeat the confession (these are the words of St. Alphonsus). And since Bellarmine (loc. cit.) writes: The common path well-worn by the ancients has always seemed safer and more convenient to us, is it not openly deduced from this that those ancients held the same opinion as Bellarmine concerning the validity of the Sacrament received in this way? Moreover, let it now be omitted by what right Bellarmine contends that those ancients must be interpreted concerning a formal purpose rather than also a virtual one, while, for example, Mastrius, Ferraris, and Dupasquier (locc. citt.) relate and prove that Scotus distinctly taught the sufficiency of a virtual purpose; but is not the doctrine of those ancients also most well known concerning virtual penance included in an act of perfect charity, by virtue of which they professed that remission of sins is obtained? And if merely virtual penance, and therefore contrition, suffices, does it not appear a fortiori that this must be said of the purpose?

Bellarmine adds that the necessity of a formal purpose is more openly handed down by Adrian VI, Cajetan, Dominic Soto, and Cano. - Reply. I distinguish: For the validity of the Sacrament, I deny; otherwise, let it pass. And as regards Adrian, Suarez (disp. 4, sect. 3, no. 2) has these words: Adrian, in IV, q. 1, De Poenitentia, says that a purpose at least implicit is necessary, explaining what he had said absolutely in Quodlibet 5, art. 5 (which place Bellarmine alleges), that a purpose is required for contrition. Therefore Adrian must be removed from their number. As regards Soto, it is customary to say (and this is also read among the VV.) that the opinion concerning the sufficiency of a virtual purpose was called by him a pernicious error. Behold the passage of Soto (De Natura et Gratia, bk. 2, ch. 14): Nor indeed would I think it should be passed over in silence that certain of the Nominalists doubt whether, for the nature of contrition, a purpose of guarding against vices in the future is necessary. And they deny it because they find nothing in Sacred Scripture concerning a purpose of this kind. Concerning this, assuredly, if my slight judgment were of any weight, they ought to be condemned: not only because it is an error, but because it is pernicious. Is this the scholastic doctrine concerning a virtual purpose, such that this censure of Soto aptly agrees with it?

But (lest we dwell upon these things longer without profit) two things are to be noted concerning these three theologians. One is that they also profess the common doctrine concerning the efficacy of virtual penance. Thus, for example, Cajetan (Commentary on III, q. 87, art. 1): Virtual displeasure is called that which is not formally displeasure, but is formally another act, such as love of God, of such force that displeasure with sin is naturally to follow from it, so that, if the memory of sin then occurred, by virtue of that act a formal displeasure with sin would follow; and thus every act of love of God proceeding from charity can be called virtually a displeasure with mortal sin. Thereupon he adds below: If, by a special gift of God, virtual displeasure alone had been present, the concurrence of displeasure implicitly and virtually is sufficiently preserved (in justification). The other is that the doctrine concerning the sufficiency of merely supposed attrition was commonly approved (as is known) by Soto, Cajetan, and Cano; and, as we saw above, Suarez reproaches Soto for having thought that the absence of any purpose did not impede obtaining the grace of the Sacrament. Hence nothing is more alien, not merely from truth but even from probability, than that, according to their opinion, a confession which lacked a formal purpose must be repeated.

From these things, then, what conclusion will it finally be lawful to draw? Let the VV. keep Amort for themselves, who employs this magnificent argument for the necessity of an explicit purpose for justification (Theologia Moralis, tr. 13, sec. 8, q. 12): For justification the love of God is required; but the love of God is an explicit purpose of observing the commandments. Therefore. To this argument someone will rightly reply: I deny the major, because charity is not prerequired for receiving grace in the Sacrament; I deny the minor, because an act of love of God can be elicited with a merely implicit will to observe the commandments. Finally, I deny the consequent and the consequence, because it has against it the unanimous opinion of the Catholic school, as we have seen. Indeed, this unanimous doctrine of the Catholic school also effects this: that anyone can set aside the scruple by which the holy Doctor Alphonsus was moved to judge that, in the case, the confession must be repeated, without the note of temerity and with due reverence toward the holy Doctor preserved.

In these instructions, both imperfect sorrow or attrition and a merely implicit purpose are plainly equated as sufficient for obtaining the pardon of sins in the Sacrament. Indeed, we find expressed there with even less controversy that which pertains to an implicit purpose than that which pertains to attrition. For as regards the latter, it is intimated in the preceding question that it had not yet been defined by the Apostolic See whether it ought to be joined with some beginning of love; but concerning an implicit purpose you find nothing of this kind said there.

Moreover, in the Instruction for children approaching the Sacrament of Penance, which is seen appended at the end of the same Council, these things are found (pt. III, no. XXIX, p. 303):

Penitent. Does one who confesses without sorrow for sins and without the purpose of sinning no more receive forgiveness?

Confessor. If he does not have at least imperfect sorrow, that is, attrition, with the firm purpose, AT LEAST IMPLICIT, of never sinning again, certainly, if he confesses, the Confession is invalid, and he does not receive forgiveness of sins. Moreover, even now at Rome it is prescribed that these instructions be employed for children to be imbued with catechesis.

463. QUESTION 4. What purpose is required, or suffices, for venial sins?

Reply 1. For the validity of the Sacrament, it is required and suffices to have an efficacious purpose of avoiding at least one venial sin; because it suffices to grieve over even one for sufficient matter of the Sacrament [11]; therefore, a fortiori, an efficacious purpose of avoiding all the venial sins which are accused suffices.

[11] Compare Cardinal De Lugo (De Poenitentia, disp. 14, no. 141), who teaches that the opinion of those who think that sufficient sorrow can be present concerning one venial sin, even if no virtual sorrow, or certainly less sufficient sorrow, is present concerning other venial sins of the same species, is truer.

2. It suffices to purpose amendment concerning some class of venial sins, for example, concerning lies, by saying: I do not wish to lie any more.

3. It suffices to wish to avoid all deliberate sins, because these can be avoided; and semi-deliberate sins insofar as it can be done. - St. Lig., bk. 6, no. 449, dub. 2.

4. It suffices to wish firmly and efficaciously to diminish the frequency and multitude of venial sins, because, as was said concerning contrition, the purpose falls upon at least some one of them [12]. In practice, it is safer to elicit a purpose concerning certain determinate sins, especially the graver ones and chiefly those which are committed from habit, and to join to them some sin of one's former life. - Reuter, no. 295.

[12] To this pertain those words of St. Thomas (III, q. 87, art. 1, ad 1): Penance for mortal sins requires that a man purpose to abstain from each and every mortal sin. But for penance for venial sins it is required that a man purpose to abstain from individual sins, but not from all, because the frailty of human nature does not permit this; nevertheless, he must have the purpose of preparing himself to diminish venial sins; otherwise, there would be a danger of his falling away, since he would abandon the desire of advancing, or of removing the impediments to spiritual progress, which are venial sins.

When the faithful, including those who are regarded as pious and confess frequently, are seen to make no or almost no progress after innumerable confessions, it is permissible to conjecture that they conceive purposes which are too general and confused, and therefore sluggish and languid. - Elbel, no. 112.

Not rarely, moreover, penitents are found, women especially, who devote a long time to the examination of conscience, seek out the smallest faults with the greatest anxiety, and prolong their confessions beyond measure, and nevertheless are not very solicitous about sorrow and an efficacious purpose. These are to be seriously exhorted that, omitting the anxious care of declaring all venial sins in species and number, they subject to the keys with serious sorrow and a purpose of amendment only those which weigh more heavily upon the conscience and which especially are to be rooted out. Indeed, it is expedient that from these venial sins they select one principal sin upon which, above the rest, they diligently concentrate in detesting and amending it. - Sporer, no. 339; Elbel, no. 113; etc.

Chapter II. On Confession

Confession is the accusation of sins committed after Baptism, made to an approved Priest, in order to receive absolution.

Three things pertain here, namely: 1. necessity; 2. qualities; 3. repetition of confession.

Article I. On the Necessity of Confession

464. Principles. - I. Sacramental confession is necessary by divine law for all who after Baptism have fallen into mortal sin. This is evident: 1. from Sacred Scripture; for Christ says to the Apostles, John 20:22: Receive the Holy Ghost; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained. - And in Matt. 16:19 Christ said to Peter: Whatever you shall loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven. And at 18:18 He says to all the Apostles: Whatever you shall loose upon earth shall be loosed in heaven. Hence thus: Christ instituted the Apostles and Priests as judges and physicians, without whose sentence and cure no one gravely fallen after Baptism can be reconciled and healed; but they cannot discharge this twofold office when the cause is unknown: for how could Priests discern among sins, remitting some and retaining others, unless they could render a judgment concerning each? What reason would there be for pardoning some but denying pardon to others? To what end would that supreme power of the keys handed down by Christ to the Apostles and their successors tend? It would indeed be illusory if sinners were not bound to approach Priests and manifest their sins to them. Therefore, it is necessary that mortal sins committed after Baptism be subjected to the power of the keys or the judgment of Priests. Therefore confession is necessary by divine law.

This is evident: 2. from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, canon 7, in these words: If anyone says that in the Sacrament of Penance, for the remission of sins, it is not necessary by divine law to confess each and every mortal sin, etc., let him be anathema. - Add innumerable other decisions of Councils and Supreme Pontiffs.

This is evident: 3. from tradition and the argument of prescription. For confession has always been in use from the beginning of the Church, as is evident from innumerable testimonies of the Holy Fathers, which can be seen among authors treating Dogmatic Theology. Therefore, it was instituted as necessary by Christ and transmitted through the Apostles. This is evident according to the well-known Rule of St. Augustine, bk. 4, De Baptismo contra Donatistas, ch. 24: That which the universal Church holds, and which was not instituted by Councils but has always been retained, is most rightly believed to have been handed down by apostolic authority. Moreover, the confession of sins is a matter so arduous and difficult that it would never have been observed so perseveringly and universally for so many centuries unless it had been instituted as necessary by Christ.

465. II. Confession is also necessary by ecclesiastical law, at least once a year, for all the faithful who have sinned gravely. This is evident from the Councils, but especially from the Fourth Lateran Council under Innocent III, in these words: Every faithful person of either sex, after he has reached the years of discretion, shall alone faithfully confess all his sins at least once a year to his own Priest and endeavor, according to his own ability, to fulfill the penance enjoined upon him...; otherwise, while living, let him be barred from entrance into the Church, and when dying, let him lack Christian burial.

466. Questions. - QUESTION 1. When does the divine precept of confession bind?

Reply 1. It certainly binds of itself in danger, and all the more at the point of death, and sometimes in life. The reason for the first is that all positive precepts bind at least at the time of necessity; otherwise they would never bind and would be imposed in vain. The reason for the second is that affirmative precepts do not bind only in extreme necessity, but also when their fulfillment is reasonably judged necessary.

Reply 2. It often binds per accidens [1], namely: 1. when the Eucharist is to be received; 2. when the precept of being reconciled with God binds, or the state of grace is required, for example, for administering Sacraments, or for receiving those which are called the Sacraments of the living, and an act of perfect contrition cannot be elicited; 3. when a grave temptation presses which otherwise cannot be overcome.

[1] The discussion, as is plain, concerns only those who are bound by the bond of mortal guilt.

QUESTION 2. Does the divine precept of confession bind immediately when a sin has been committed; or at what time does it bind?

Reply 1. It does not bind immediately after sin. The reason is that such an obligation rests upon no certain foundation. - Thus commonly. - St. Lig., no. 674.

Reply 2. It cannot easily be determined how many times in life and at what precise time the divine precept binds. Whatever the case, there is no doubt that he satisfies who confesses even only once a year; because it is not established that the divine precept binds more frequently; according to many, Christ left the time of the obligation to be determined by the Church. (More concerning the necessity of confession in the Treatise on the Precepts of the Church, vol. 1, no. 476 ff.)

Article II. On the Qualities of Confession

467. Many qualities of confession are assigned by authors, which for the most part do not pertain to its validity; the chief, however, are contained in these little verses:

Let it be integral, simple, humble, discreet, faithful,

Vocal, sorrowful, pure, and prepared to obey.

1. Integral; that is, let it embrace all mortal sins not yet confessed, as will presently be said.

2. Simple; that is, not intermingled with impertinent discourses, nor painted with words, nor adorned with figures; but a naked, clear, and brief declaration of sins.

3. Humble; that is, it ought to be made with true humility of heart and body, namely, on bended knees unless infirmity excuses, and with head uncovered if a man confesses; humility ought also to appear in the tone of voice, so that the penitent relate his sins with shame, and not in the manner of a fable or a bare history.

4. Discreet; that is, it ought to be made in honorable and discreet words, especially in explaining sins against chastity; nor ought the sins or defects of others be manifested without necessity.

5. Faithful; that is, sincere, without a lie, especially in grave matter and matter necessary for the sacramental judgment. But fidelity or sincerity consists not only in sins being rightly declared, which pertains to integrity, but also in their not being exaggerated or supposed sins being added.

6. Vocal; that is, confession itself ought to be made by voice, and not by writing or by other signs, without necessity or a grave cause, for example, because of most vehement shame, because of an impediment of the tongue, etc. - St. Lig., nos. 492, 493.

Moreover, confession by writing is indeed valid of itself; nevertheless, confession and absolution by letters would be invalid. For the form consists in words, as Eugene IV defined in the Decree for the Armenians; moreover, the form must be applied to matter that is present. This is evident, moreover, from a proposition condemned by Clement VIII in the year 1602.

Whatever certain theologians may have said to the contrary, it is certain that confession made in writing is valid. Nor does the aforesaid Decree of Clement VIII stand in the way, because by it only a proposition concerning both a confession made in writing and absolution likewise given and sent in writing or through an intermediary is prohibited. Suarez disputed excellently and solidly concerning this in little works first brought to light by the Bishop of Bruges, D.D. Malou, of pious memory (Brussels, 1859). Lugo, Coninck, Viva, St. Lig., bk. 5, no. 489, and others also agree [1].

[1] The Decree of Clement VIII must be understood not only collectively, namely, when both confession and absolution were made and given in absence, but also divisively, namely, when confession is made in absence but absolution is given by a Priest who is present, and conversely, as Paul V declared on July 14, 1605, in the Congregation of the Holy Office.

7. Sorrowful, or accompanied by sorrow, as was said above concerning contrition, no. 442 ff.

8. Pure; namely, for an honorable end, or for obtaining the pardon of sins and sacramental graces, and not for moving the compassion of the Confessor, or for gaining his benevolence or esteem, etc. [2].

[2] Nevertheless, some secondary end, if it is not dishonorable, does not impede the primary end; and although it is by no means praiseworthy, it must not therefore immediately be pronounced that confessions of this kind are invalid.

9. Prepared to obey; that is, the penitent ought to be disposed to obey the admonitions of the Confessor as a judge [3] pronouncing sentence, for example, in fleeing occasions, employing remedies, making restitution, accepting penance, etc.

[3] The Confessor as judge does not give admonitions, as the Author teaches below, but takes cognizance of the case and, according to the merits of the case, either imparts absolution, denies it, or even defers it. But the things which the Author adds pertain to the Confessor as a doctor or teacher. Obedience, moreover, is owed to them, not because the Confessor commands, for he has authority to command only as regards enjoining satisfaction, but because those things are indicated to the penitent which some law, whether natural or positive, requires.

Among the aforesaid qualities of confession, the principal ones are integrity and contrition. Enough has now been said concerning the latter; but now the former must be discussed specifically.

On the Integrity of Confession

468. A twofold integrity is distinguished, one material, the other formal.

1. Material integrity consists in the accusation of all mortal sins which occur to the mind [4].

[4] Others say that material integrity is present when in reality all the sins which have been committed are expressed. But if anything falls from memory, they teach that formal integrity is then preserved. Thus, for example, Laymann (De Poenitentia, ch. 8, no. 5), whom the Author also seems to have followed below, no. 470, II, where he attributes the defect of material integrity to forgetfulness.

2. Formal integrity consists in the accusation of all mortal sins which someone, here and now, considering the circumstances, morally can or is bound to confess.

Hence whenever material integrity is present, formal integrity also is present; but not conversely. We shall speak: 1. of the necessity of integrity; 2. of causes excusing from it.

§ I. On the Necessity of Integrity

1. In general; 2. concerning doubtful sins; 3. concerning the circumstances of sins; 4. concerning forgotten sins.

Point I. On the Necessity of Integrity in General

469. I. All mortal sins committed after Baptism must be accused by divine law, insofar as it can morally be done.

This is evident: 1. from the very words of the institution of the Sacrament of Penance; for Christ the Lord says thus, John 20:22: Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained. Hence thus: By these words Christ conferred judicial power concerning the remission of sins upon both the Apostles and their successors. But He would have conferred this power upon them uselessly unless all sins were to be declared to them individually. For a judge can in no way exercise such power when the case is unknown, nor discern whether sins are to be remitted or retained. Therefore, from the very institution of confession in the form of a judgment, there follows the strict obligation of declaring all mortal sins as to number and species.

This is evident: 2. from the words of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 5: The universal Church has always understood that the complete confession of sins was instituted by the Lord and is necessary by divine law for all who have fallen gravely after Baptism; because our Lord Jesus Christ, when about to ascend from earth to heaven, left Priests as His own vicars, as presidents and judges, to whom all the mortal crimes into which the faithful of Christ had fallen were to be brought, so that, by the power of the keys, they might pronounce the sentence of remission or retention of sins. For it is evident that Priests could not have exercised this judgment when the cause was unknown, if penitents had declared their sins only in general and not rather in species and individually. From these things it is gathered that all mortal sins of which penitents have consciousness after a diligent examination of themselves must be recounted in confession, even if they are most secret. - And canon 7 defined thus: If anyone says that in the Sacrament of Penance, for the remission of sins, it is not necessary by divine law to confess each and every mortal sin which is remembered after due and diligent consideration, even secret sins and those which are against the last two Precepts of the Decalogue, and the circumstances which change the species of sin, let him be anathema.

470. II. Material integrity is not always necessary for the validity and fruit of confession; for sometimes it is morally impossible, whether from inculpable forgetfulness or from other causes; but God does not command impossibilities. Therefore, etc. This is evident also from the Council of Trent, loc. cit., in these words: But the remaining sins which do not occur to one thinking diligently are understood to be included universally in the same confession; for these we faithfully say with the Prophet: FROM MY HIDDEN SINS CLEANSE ME.

III. For the integrity of confession, a diligent examination, according to the capacity of the penitent, is prerequired concerning sins committed since the last valid confession; for he who is bound to the end is also bound to the necessary means. - See the Appendix on the examination of conscience, below, no. 507.

471. Resolutions. - 1. In the confession of mortal sins, we are bound to accuse not only the generic species of sins but also the lowest species; for these are properly called species, and Trent requires the accusation of all species.

2. He who cannot disclose the lowest species must manifest the higher or generic species; for example, if someone, knowing that he sinned against chastity, does not remember the specific sin, he must say that he sinned gravely against chastity.

3. He who knows that he sinned mortally but is ignorant of, or does not remember, even the generic species of his sin must say in general that he sinned gravely, but does not remember of what sin he is guilty.

4. He who cannot remember the certain number is bound to accuse the more probable number, or that which approaches nearer to the truth, adding the word about; because where certainty is lacking, he ought to accuse that which is more likely.

5. He who cannot give even a likely total of the sins is bound to say whether he sinned frequently or rarely; about how many times in a month, in a week, in a day, etc.

6. The Confessor cannot exempt from the obligation of confessing integrally because of a great concourse of penitents, for example, on some more solemn feast day. This is evident from what has been said and also from Proposition 39 condemned by Innocent XI, which is as follows: It is lawful to absolve sacramentally those who have confessed only by halves because of a great concourse of penitents, such as, for example, can occur on the day of some great feast or indulgence.

7. A defect of sincerity concerning even one mortal sin which is omitted constitutes a grave sin, because the divine precept of confession is violated in a grave matter.

472. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What number is judged to be comprehended in the word ABOUT?

Reply. This cannot be determined by an altogether certain rule; nevertheless, not every excess, nor a notable deficiency, is comprehended, but only a moderate one, greater or less in proportion to the number expressed. Theologians commonly determine it thus: a moderate excess or deficiency relative to about five sins will add or subtract one unit on either side; relative to about ten, two; relative to twenty, three or four; relative to forty, four or five; relative to one hundred [1], five or six.... And it will prudently be judged [2], in the first case, that the penitent sinned four, five, or six times; in the second, eight, nine, ten, eleven, or twelve times; and resolve similarly concerning the others. - See St. Lig., no. 466.

[1] But when it is believed that the number of sins has increased to these limits, the Doctors aptly warn (see St. Alph., bk. 6, no. 466) that the state of the penitent can be known better by inquiring about falls by days, weeks, months, etc., than if the Confessor should wish to form a judgment concerning the number, which will easily be fallacious.

[2] The Confessor would judge thus prudently when it was established that penitents use these calculations accurately. But penitents generally do not know those rules, and in an uncertain matter more often answer rashly. Otherwise, moreover, the Confessor cannot undertake the wearisome labor of always inquiring whether the penitent answers according to those rules. Therefore, the foregoing admonition of St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 466) must be kept before the eyes, namely, lest the Confessor think that some more exact judgment is to be sought or hoped for in these circumstances.

473. QUESTION 2. Must a notable excess be declared afterward if it is discovered after confession?

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is plain from what has been said; for since a notable excess is not comprehended in the number declared with the word about, the penitent does not satisfy the obligation of confession as regards that excess. Therefore.... - Thus all.

QUESTION 3. If someone has erred notably by exaggerating the number, must he afterward declare this also in confession?

Reply. Negative, if in good faith he expressed that notably larger number. The reason is that he fully and integrally satisfied the obligation of confession; for the true number was comprehended in the larger one, and therefore remitted. - Reuter, no. 313, and others commonly.

474. QUESTION 4. Is it always a mortal sin to lie in confession?

Reply. Of itself, a mortal sin is committed only when the lie concerns matter necessary for confession concealed without a just cause, or grave matter falsely supposed, namely, by accusing oneself of a grave sin not committed.

Therefore a lie concerning matters not pertaining to the confession or conscience of the penitent is not of itself mortal; because, as is supposed, it is neither gravely harmful to the penitent nor gravely injurious to the Sacrament, since it is not referred to it. - Thus commonly with St. Lig., Homo Apostolicus, no. 28; Billuart, against the few who say that every lie in confession is mortal.

475. QUESTION 5. Does it injure the integrity of confession if someone accuses himself of venial sins to his ordinary Confessor, but of mortal sins to another?

Reply 1. Negative, speaking of itself, provided he never receives absolution without having manifested all mortal sins to one Confessor and being absolved by the same. The reason is that the confession which embraces all mortal sins is integral, since venial sins need not necessarily be accused.

Reply 2. In practice, however, attention must be given to the circumstances of penitents and to the motives by which they are led. For those who sometimes confess graver sins to an unknown Confessor but submit lighter ones to their ordinary Confessor are not to be condemned if, from the shame with which they would be suffused before a Confessor known to them familiarly, they would expose themselves to the danger of confessing sacrilegiously [3]. - St. Lig., no. 474.

[3] Therefore, the Confessor should never inquire curiously about this, and much less vex with questions a penitent perhaps attempting to conceal it; nor, if he knows, should he show that it displeases him, but rather that he approves the use of the liberty which the Church most amply permits when she provides the faithful access to several confessors.

476. QUESTION 8. Does it injure integrity if someone feigns another voice so that he is not recognized by the Confessor?

Reply. Negative, of itself; for provided that he discloses all mortal sins, he makes an integral confession. Nor is it necessary that he be known by name to the Confessor; for it suffices that the Confessor intend to absolve the sinner who is present: but the intention of the Confessor is of itself always determined toward the penitent who is present. - Lacroix, De Sacramentis in Genere, no. 68.

Point II. On Doubtful Sins

Doubt here can chiefly concern: 1. the act of sin, or a sin committed; 2. the gravity of the sin, both on the part of the matter and on the part of consent; 3. the confession of a sin certainly committed.

477. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must mortal sins doubtfully committed necessarily be accused?

Reply. More probably, negative, if the doubt persists after a diligent examination has first been made; and this holds even if the doubt is truly positive, or there is a true probability that the sin was committed. The reason is that a doubtful law is at issue here, which consequently does not bind. And indeed, according to Trent, mortal sins of which one has consciousness must be accused; but one does not have consciousness of doubtful sins; for to have consciousness implies certain knowledge of the sin, since conscience is nothing other than knowledge of the heart and a judgment concerning a sin committed. Therefore. - St. Lig., no. 473; Sporer, no. 389; Roncaglia, ch. 2, De Integritate Confessionis, q. 7; Reuter, no. 305; and many others. - See St. Lig., no. 473.

Others nevertheless contradict this; because, as they say, it is gathered from the words of the Council of Trent that all mortal sins must be accused as they are in the conscience; and consequently, if they are doubtful in the conscience, they are also to be confessed as doubtful. - But it must be replied that the Council of Trent does not say that sins are to be accused as they are in the conscience, but those of which we have consciousness. In practice, however, an accusation of this kind is to be counseled, says St. Lig., no. 476.

Certain Theologians teach that negatively doubtful sins must be accused; but this is false; for no obligation can be given of confessing negatively doubtful sins, since a doubt of this kind rests upon no solid foundation and arises only from an empty suspicion or fear that a sin was committed, as frequently happens to the scrupulous or to timorous consciences.

478. QUESTION 2. Must sins of doubtful gravity be accused?

Reply. More probably, negative of itself, at least speculatively, even given a true probability of the gravity of the sin. The reason is the same as for the preceding question: for it is not established that a grave sin was committed, and consequently the obligation of confession cannot be established. - Thus the same authors against the same authors.

In practice, however, a twofold rule is to be followed: First Rule. In doubt whether the matter of the sin is grave, uneducated penitents ordinarily ought to accuse doubtful sins: 1. because they generally cannot form their conscience by themselves;

2. because they generally do not know how to distinguish venial sins from mortal sins. Nevertheless, except the scrupulous, who are not accustomed to commit mortal sins frequently. But instructed penitents are not bound to accuse sins of doubtful gravity, because they can form their conscience by themselves; nevertheless, they are ordinarily to be gently exhorted to accuse these also [1].

[1] It is useful to have explained these things, so that the Confessor, observing the dangers in which the penitent is placed, may both admonish him and be able to remove them.

Second Rule. In doubt concerning full consent or perfect advertence: 1. if penitents are of a timorous conscience and are not accustomed to sin gravely, they are in no way bound to confess doubtful sins, because the presumption derived from things ordinarily occurring favors them; indeed, they are often to be prevented from making this accusation if they seem prone to scruples [2]; 2. if penitents hold the middle way between a timorous and a lax conscience, they are indeed not to be obliged, but certainly are to be induced to declare the doubtful consent, because this profits the tranquility of conscience, etc.; 3. if penitents are of a lax conscience, they generally ought to declare doubtful sins, because the presumption is against them. - See St. Lig., no. 476.

[2] This observation seems to pertain to the doubt whether any fault was present rather than to the doubt whether the fault which intervened was mortal or only venial. For otherwise the scrupulous are not to be prevented from confessing venial sins when they are certainly established.

479. QUESTION 3. Must grave sins certainly committed, concerning which you nevertheless doubt whether you confessed them, necessarily be accused?

Reply 1. Affirmative, if the doubt is negative, namely, when no prudent reason is at hand for thinking that you have already confessed them. The reason is that the law of confessing is certain, nor does any reason suggest that this law has been satisfied, according to what was said concerning Conscience, vol. I, no. 41.

Reply 2. It is controverted, however, if the doubt is positive, that is, if a positive and grave reason suggests that the sin has already been declared. Some say that a sin of this kind must be declared, because the obligation of confession is certain but its fulfillment is doubtful. - Thus St. Lig., no. 477 [3]. - Others, however, very commonly deny it with Suarez, Lugo,

[3] The VV. object this passage of the holy Doctor (p. 936, no. 113), and add that in the Note placed thereunder St. Alphonsus wrote these things in Quaestiones Recentiores Reformatae, no. 16: Whether the penitent is bound to confess a mortal sin certainly committed if he only probably thinks that he has confessed it, Suarez, Lugo, the Salmanticenses, and others deny. But I say with Concina and others that he is bound to subject that sin to the keys, since the confession is doubtful and the obligation of Confession is certain.

Reply. Let it suffice to have summoned here also those things which Lugo writes (De Poenitentia, disp. 16, no. 58): ALL COMMONLY TEACH that someone is not bound to confess that sin which he probably judges that he... has already confessed. And again (ibid., no. 59): Nothing is more frequent among theologians than to excuse from repeating a confession one who has confessed... according to some probable opinion concerning its validity. Who, therefore, would be angry with him who prefers to follow the common doctrine of the Theologians?

Indeed, since St. Alphonsus also (bk. 6, no. 477), in the Roman edition of the year 1757 dedicated to Benedict XIV, released a penitent of this kind from repeating confession, as Suarez, Sanchez, Navarrus, Bonacina, Filliuccius, Roncaglia, Viva, Tamburini, Croix, Lugo, Escobar, Granadus, Fagundez, the Salmanticenses with Sylvester, Henriquez, etc., also COMMONLY say, who indeed would not adhere to St. Alphonsus when he follows those lights of theology, rather than adhere to St. Alphonsus when he follows Concina? For did Concina bring forward anything new? Indeed, since the matter concerns a certain general principle, shall we set aside the common sense of so many theologians in order to attribute to the judgment of the most rigorous Concina the privilege of a clearer understanding?

Lacroix, Bonacina, etc. - Recall what was said in the Treatise on Conscience, vol. I, no. 80, where the reason for the former opinion is shown to be both weak and also productive of grave inconveniences [4].

[4] Thus indeed as regards the obligation; for as regards practice no one will deny that it contributes very greatly to peace of conscience if the anxiety consequent upon doubts of this kind is laid aside through confession; unless, however, the contrary occurs, so that in this way anxiety is added to anxiety. This indeed sometimes happens to those who, after a general confession diligently made according to their capacity, begin to doubt whether they declared this or that sin. For after the Confessor has patiently heard them twice, three times, or four times, it is fitting that he forbid them to think back in any way upon their past life or add anything unless they are most certain that they never rightly confessed some grave sin. - See St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, no. 477.

480. QUESTION 4. Must one who has confessed some sin as doubtful repeat it if he afterward knows it as certain?

Reply. It is controverted. The FIRST OPINION, more probable and common [5], affirms. The reason is: 1. because we must accuse all certain sins of which we have consciousness; 2. because that sin was not accused as to its substance, for a certain accusation is not included in a doubtful one. - St. Lig., no. 478.

[5] This opinion could once have been called common, when, as Lugo writes (De Poenitentia, disp. 16, no. 92), certain learned men judged it probable that the penitent was not bound afterward to confess as certain what he had previously confessed as doubtful.... Among these was the Most Reverend Father Nicholas Ricchardius, Master of the Sacred Palace, with whom I discussed this matter privately; and he himself also replied privately that it seemed very probable to him that such an obligation was not present; which others also judged.

But it must be said otherwise concerning the following age, so much so that St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 478) alleges more Doctors for the opposite opinion than for his own, which he calls common. And indeed, as Cardenas, a man perhaps more attached than was fair to his own tenets, says sorrowfully and almost indignantly (disp. 51, no. 4): Scarcely had our Lugo opened this little crevice when the more recent authors, advancing in a body, regarded it as a most ample door through which they might safely enter into that opinion. And he immediately adds a catalogue of these Doctors, in which seven appear who were omitted by St. Alphonsus, who otherwise names ten others.

Moreover, to solve the arguments of Cardinal De Lugo, Cardenas was compelled, against the opinion of St. Alphonsus and indeed the common opinion, to affirm that even he who, uncertain about the number, had said that he sinned about ten times, more or less, is bound afterward to confess the certain number if it is discovered. Moreover, the reason brought forward by him for his opinion, namely that according to Trent that gravity of guilt must be expressed from which the punishment to be imposed according to equity may be judged, would already overthrow the doctrine which St. Alphonsus (in the same no. 478, at the end) calls most probable and most common, namely, that someone is not bound to confess again a sin which he now knows to be grave when nevertheless neither did the Confessor himself know it as grave when the confession was made.

 The VV. detain the reader for fourteen columns and more concerning this Note (pp. 472-479), and contend for two things: 1. that the affirmative opinion of the holy Doctor Alphonsus must truly be called common (p. 479); 2. that the strongest reasons militate for it (p. 478).

As regards the first, I reply that a twofold question must be distinguished here: one, namely, of law, and the other of fact. And as regards the question of law, it must be diligently noted that the validity of the Sacrament is not at issue here, but only material integrity. Therefore let the words of St. Alphonsus be recalled here (Homo Apostolicus, tr. 16, no. 29): No one is bound to doubtful laws.... Nor does it stand in the way to say here that in the matter of the Sacraments we cannot follow opinions which are only probable; because this proceeds when the validity of the Sacrament is at issue; it is otherwise concerning integrity. Hence the conclusion: since probability suffices to exempt from the obligation of confession in the case, but even a greater probability than the opposite does not suffice for imposing this obligation (see the opinion of St. Alphonsus in the Note to nos. 71-73, vol. 1), therefore in reality there stand against the affirmative opinion of St. Alphonsus not only all who depart from it, but also all who concede that the opinion which denies the aforesaid obligation is at least probable; and, on the contrary, those who call the affirmative opinion merely more probable do not sufficiently support it; indeed, these also will have to be said to stand for the negative if the argument which the VV. employ elsewhere, as we have seen, has any force, namely, that whoever admits some opinion to be merely more probable thereby concedes that the opposite is probable; which, nevertheless, we have said is not always true.

With these things premised, let us now approach the question of fact. Having counted the Authors both whom the holy Doctor Alphonsus alleges for his affirmative opinion and whom the VV. afterward added (pp. 474-478), we have thirty-seven. Having counted again those who are related for the opposite negative opinion by St. Alphonsus, Cardenas, Mendo, Giribaldi, etc., we have thirty-eight, and indeed with those omitted whom Lugo (disp. 16, no. 92) affirms that he consulted. Moreover, even if no account is taken of those whom the VV. produce for themselves, since nevertheless they judge that opinion only as more probable and thus rather stand against themselves, it may now be asked: Can an opinion be called common which has thirty-seven for itself but thirty-eight against itself? Is it not better to say with Wagemann (pt. 3, tr. 2, ch. 5, no. 58): It is debated with equal probability on each side? Nevertheless, an immense distinction (which must never be consigned to oblivion) stands out between the two opinions; namely, according even to the certain suffrage of St. Alphonsus, the probability of the negative opinion suffices for denying absolutely the obligation of Confession in the case; but St. Alphonsus also absolutely denies that the probability of the affirmative suffices for asserting the obligation. Therefore, if we judge this controversy by employing the extrinsic argument of authority, we must conclude, according to the certain principles of the holy Doctor Alphonsus, A doubtful law does not bind, etc., that the opinion of the same holy Doctor which says that the obligation of Confession is to be imposed in the case is no otherwise safe than it is safe to oblige the faithful to observe doubtful laws. It will be safe to offer counsel; it will not be safe to impose a precept. But, you will say, how then do so many call the affirmative opinion common, and indeed most common, as, for example, Voit, Scavini, and Frassinetti have it?

Reply. This phenomenon can be explained without difficulty. For although Lugo (disp. 16, no. 52) wrote that few had touched upon this question, Cardenas (disp. 51, no. 3) was nevertheless able to call these few all theologians; and from this Illsung, for example (De Sacramento Poenitentiae, q. 4, art. 5, no. 116), was able to call that opinion common. Several afterward copied this, paying less attention to what Cardenas (loc. cit., no. 4) had warned, namely that the more recent authors, as though advancing in a body, entered the little crevice opened by Lugo as if it were a most ample door. Nor, again, is it surprising that others, after Cardenas had said that all theologians thought thus, judged the same opinion even most common; which we then see copied by others also.

But let us come to the intrinsic reasons. The VV., as we have already premised, prefix this title to the second article (p. 478): The strongest reasons militating for the affirmative opinion are weighed.

Reply. Where are those strongest reasons if you omit that title? You will finally find this single one: Just as Cardenas, Billuart, and Cuniliati urge the obligation of repeating the confession, because by the precept of the Council we are bound to confess all sins of which we have consciousness, so also does St. Alphonsus. In the proposed case, the penitent now has consciousness of the sin which he formerly held as doubtful. Therefore he is bound to confess the same sin as certain. But Lugo had already replied to this reason (loc. cit., no. 87): We have seen that this argument proves that even a twenty-first sin afterward known as certain must be confessed by the penitent who confessed twenty, more or less, because that sin is now certain in the conscience of the penitent.

And in fact this is the rock upon which all the reasons customarily adduced for the same matter finally strike. Hence Dicastillo (tr. 8, disp. 9, no. 141), after weighing at great length the arguments on each side, concludes: Because of the efficacious argument by which it is proved that the same reasoning applies to a doubtful sin and to an uncertain number, I judge it more consonant with reason that such a number also must be explained if it is afterward known with certainty how great it determinately was, etc. But, says Lugo (loc. cit., no. 78), when a penitent unable to determine the certain number of sins confesses the likely number, for example, I committed perjury ten times, more or less: if he afterward remembers that he committed perjury twelve times, several and weighty Authors commonly teach that he need not confess it...; and St. Alphonsus also approves this doctrine (Homo Apostolicus, tr. 16, no. 34). And nevertheless, behold, Gobat (tr. 6, no. 443) protests that he could not find a difference between the two cases: Neither do I, he says, although I wearied myself long and greatly in investigating the difference, find any. Therefore, this reason, as they say, the strongest, proves either too much or nothing.

The VV. assume further (loc. cit.) that, according to St. Alphonsus, the reasoning is different because in the one case the error is not concerning the substance (but concerning the number), whereas in the other it is concerning the substance. - Lugo replies that, when you say, I committed perjury ten times, more or less, concerning the ninth, tenth, and eleventh perjury the error concerns the substance in precisely the same manner, namely, the fact.

The VV. object, moreover (loc. cit.), that the reason adduced by Cardenas is firm, because a greater number of sins increases liability and requires a greater punishment. - Reply. Against the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, this would prove that the number also which someone previously confessed as likely and afterward discovered as certain must be expressed in a repeated confession. But Illsung (tr. 6, disp. 6, q. 4, no. 116) adds against this reason of Cardenas: This reason seems to me to suppose something false, namely, that for this reason alone a negatively doubtful sin of a different species, or more than one or two of the same species, stated under negative doubt and afterward known, would have to be repeated, because a greater penance would have been enjoined for them. Notwithstanding this reason, many deny, and I with them (as also the holy Doctor Alphonsus), that merely aggravating circumstances are to be explained.

Finally, to what some object, that the negative opinion has against it both the doctrine of the ancients and the practice of the faithful, Wagemann replies (loc. cit.): The ancients did not examine the opinion expressly; they did not have before them the instruction of Trent; they relied upon the false principle: in doubt the safer part is to be chosen. The practice generally concerns a doubt improperly so called, or what is better, since in this way scruples also are disclosed; and a universal practice can scarcely be discovered.

The SECOND OPINION, sufficiently probable, denies it. The reason is deduced from what was said in no. 472: for just as, once a doubtful number of sins has been set forth with the word about, you are no longer bound to declare in confession the certain number which you afterward discovered, provided the excess is not notable; so neither are you bound to repeat in confession a sin which you accused as doubtful and afterward learned to be certain: for there is no difference between the two cases, since even in a doubtful number certain sins are declared as doubtful; nor must the species be disclosed more than the number of sins. Moreover, the doubtful sin was directly remitted, since it was remitted by virtue of the absolution to which, as it existed in the conscience, it was subjected. Therefore, it is not necessary to subject it again to the keys. - Thus Lugo, disp. 16, no. 78; Sporer, no. 397; Elbel, no. 274; Reuter, no. 332, etc.

481. ○ QUESTION 5. Can anyone, without confession first being made, approach Holy Communion with a doubtful or probable mortal sin?

Reply. Affirmative, rigorously speaking. The reason is that the Council of Trent requires confession before Communion only for those who are conscious of mortal sin. Hence a Priest who doubts whether he consented to an evil thought, or who judges probably that he did not consent to it, can celebrate, after first making an act of contrition, but without confession, even though he has access to a Confessor. - St. Lig., no. 475. - In practice, however, confession is to be counseled.

Point III. On the Circumstances of Sins

482. ○ Circumstances of various kinds are distinguished in sins:

1. Some change the species, namely, those which by reason of themselves add to the act a malice specifically distinct from that which the act has by reason of its object; thus the circumstance of a vow or of marriage adds to fornication the malice of sacrilege or adultery.

2. Others are aggravating only, but notably or lightly, according as within the same species they notably or lightly increase the malice of the sinful act by reason of duration, intensity, degree, manner, time, person, place, etc.

3. Others are diminishing, inasmuch as they render the malice of the sin less, for example, a defect of advertence, etc. - Recall what was said on Human Acts, no. 27.

483. Principles. - I. It is certain that circumstances which change the species must be accused [1]. The reason is that they constitute a new sin of themselves; and this is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 5, and canon 7.

[1] Understand this if the malice of a different species which the circumstance introduces is grave. For if it is light, for example, the light irreverence of one who steals another's hat in a Church, it is not necessary, according to what is established concerning venial sins, to express it in confession.

II. It is certain that lightly aggravating or diminishing circumstances need not necessarily be accused, although it is better to disclose them [2]. The reason is that venial sins are not necessary matter of the Sacrament of Penance.

[2] This must be understood with a grain of salt. Otherwise even the confession of persons otherwise pious, who are accustomed to bring forward a few venial sins, will be drawn out for at least half an hour while they endeavor diligently to disclose all the adjuncts by which their faults can be lightly aggravated or diminished.

III. It is also certain that circumstances must be expressed by reason of which a sin venial from its genus becomes mortal. Likewise, circumstances must be disclosed which so diminish a sin that what, apart from them, would have been mortal becomes by reason of them either no sin or only venial.

484. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must circumstances NOTABLY AGGRAVATING the malice of mortal sins within the same species necessarily be accused?

Reply. There is a twofold probable opinion [3].

[3] Carefully note that even the adversaries freely concede the probability of the opinion which denies. Therefore, according to the opinion of all, it is probable that no one is bound to this. This obligation therefore cannot be urged; even the rigorous Cabassutius admits this consequence here.

The FIRST OPINION, more common and more probable, denies it absolutely. The reason is: 1. because the Council of Trent requires nothing other than the confession of the number and species of sins, and therefore seems to exclude the obligation of confessing other circumstances. Add that otherwise both penitents and Confessors would always fluctuate amid perplexities, since it is difficult to distinguish which circumstances are notably aggravating; for no rule, at least generally, can be assigned by which they may be recognized, for example, with respect to duration, intensity, manner, etc. - Thus St. Lig., no. 467.

Some except circumstances which regard the quantity of the thing, as in theft [4]; but others with St. Liguori think that even this exception is not to be admitted of itself, provided the quantity is declared grave; for the reason is the same, because quantity does not change the species of the sin.

[4] The exception can better be stated: unless an extrinsic reason is added, for example, a reservation which concerns some determinate gravity of theft or degree of incest.

The SECOND OPINION affirms it. The reason is: 1. because the same reason holds for accusing aggravating circumstances as for accusing circumstances which change the species [5]; 2. because a sin increased by notably aggravating circumstances is equivalent to several sins [6]; 3. because if they were not accused, the Confessor could not impose a proportionate penance [7]. - Collet, sect. 3; Billuart, diss. 7, art. 2, sec. 3; Concina, ch. 6, and others.

[5] This is plainly false; because the Synod of Trent prescribes confession with regard to circumstances which change the species, but not with regard to others which are merely aggravating. If the reasons proved equally concerning both kinds of circumstances, the Council would have limited that entire doctrine to circumstances which change the species without cause; for it should have spoken of both in general, without limitation and distinction. Thus Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 115).

[6] This reason also is too weak, both because in many matters it would require this uselessly, and because no one has ever sought a multiplication of sins in the same act from the possible division of the matter.

[7] To this reason it can be replied that so exact an equality is not always required in imposing penance. Thus Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 120).

There are also those who object with these words of the Roman Catechism (De Poenit., no. 47): Nor indeed must grave sins alone be explained by recounting them, but also those things which surround each sin and greatly increase or diminish its wickedness.

But it can be answered that these words are explained there in such a way that it is not necessary to understand them of merely aggravating circumstances. And indeed: 1. it immediately adds: For certain circumstances are so grave that the character of mortal sin arises from them alone; wherefore all these things must always be confessed. But the character of mortal fault does not arise from a circumstance alone unless it changes either the moral or the theological species. - 2. This is confirmed by the fact that it prescribes the confession of greatly diminishing circumstances. For even the adversaries concede that this has force only when the diminution changes the theological species (see St. Alph., no. 468, at proof 3 from reason). - 3. The Catechism confirms its doctrine from the necessity of expressing the circumstance of a sacred person in homicide and of marriage in intercourse. But these pertain to circumstances which change the moral species. - 4. Finally, if it speaks of the gravity of theft, it cannot be proved that it is not there treating of a circumstance which changes the theological species; and what it says about one gold coin can fittingly be understood as an example of a circumstance which, regard being had to absolute quantity, makes the fault light and therefore introduces a different theological species.

Moreover, in practice the faithful are accustomed, ordinarily speaking, to declare the more notable circumstances; and this contributes both to greater peace of conscience and also to receiving more abundant fruit, both by reason of the humility in the confession itself and by reason of the more suitable direction which they receive [8].

[8] According to the opinion of all, however, except the case in which there is question of sins against the sixth precept. For beyond that which may perhaps be necessary for declaring the species of the sin, nothing further is to be inquired into or permitted to be narrated by the penitent. I said which may perhaps be necessary for declaring the species of the sin, etc.; for the Doctors also commonly warn that the grave danger of handling this filthy matter can sometimes require that even inquiry into the species be spared.

485. ○ QUESTION 2. Must the circumstance of a custom of sin necessarily be accused?

Reply. More probably, negative, speaking of itself. The reason is: 1. because nothing other than the number and species of sins must necessarily be declared; 2. because the custom need not necessarily be explained, whether under this name is understood an evil habit or the repetition of the same sin. For a custom taken as a habit induced by repeated evil acts, although it is a vice, is nevertheless not a sin [9]; while a custom taken as the repetition of the same sin already declared on other occasions does not cause the sin committed again, and to be confessed here and now, to be either graver on the part of the object [10] or different in its species. Except if the Confessor asks, as is established from Proposition 58 condemned by Innocent XI, which reads thus: We are not bound to confess to the Confessor, when he asks, a custom of some sin.

[9] There can nevertheless be a sin of negligence in employing the means necessary for correcting the vice; this voluntary negligence indeed causes even indeliberate acts, toward which an evil custom is of itself apt to impel, to be voluntary and imputable (see Note at no. 300, vol. I).

[10] This reason seems less pertinent; because even if some greater gravity accrued from this circumstance of custom, nevertheless it has already been said (see above, no. 484) that circumstances which merely aggravate within the same species need not necessarily be disclosed. This reason would nevertheless be pertinent when the circumstance of custom and at the same time of negligence in correcting it caused acts which of themselves were either semi-deliberate or even wholly indeliberate to assume grave guilt in their cause, that is, in the voluntary negligence (see preceding note).

I said speaking of itself, because sometimes it must be declared per accidens, so that the Confessor may judge the state of the penitent in relation to granting or denying absolution; this occurs when the penitent can prudently doubt his own disposition of soul, or can rightly fear that perhaps he is mistaken in this [11].

[11] Not only because of the circumstance of custom, but whenever a penitent notices either that he is certainly not rightly disposed to receive the grace of the sacrament, or that there is a prudent reason for a defect of that disposition, he is bound to disclose it to the Confessor, lest, namely, he receive the sacrament unworthily.

Moreover, in practice it is better to exhort penitents to disclose their custom of sinning to a Confessor who is not their ordinary one [12].

[12] The diligence by which penitents seek the aid of a Confessor for more efficaciously procuring the correction of vices is certainly always to be commended.

486. ○ QUESTION 3. Must the circumstance of the degree of incest committed with blood relatives or relatives by affinity be declared?

Reply 1. More probably, incest among blood relatives and relatives by affinity does not differ in species; therefore, the circumstance of consanguinity or affinity does not seem necessarily to be expressed. - St. Lig., Homo Apostolicus, tract 9, no. 7.

Reply 2. According to the more common opinion of the Doctors, the circumstance of relationship in the first degree of the direct line must be disclosed, namely, between father and daughter, mother and son, father-in-law and daughter-in-law [13]. Say the same concerning the circumstance of the first degree of consanguinity in the collateral line, namely, between brother and sister. Nevertheless, St. Lig., no. 18, calls the contrary opinion probable [14].

[13] For the same reason add also between a mother-in-law and son-in-law, etc.

[14] Suarez (De Poenit., disp. 22, sect. 3, no. 12): Concerning degrees of consanguinity, insofar as they are circumstances of incest... it is more probable that they do not change the species of the sin, as Cajetan teaches at length, 2.2, q. 154, art. 9, and tom. I, Opusc., last tract, reply 5; Soto; and Cano.

And Diana (tom. 1, tract 7, resol. 107), after adducing the opinion of those who admit a diversity of species in incest, adds (no. 2): But according to the opinion of St. Thomas, 2.2, q. 154, art. 9, and Cajetan there, because incest among blood relatives and relatives by affinity does not differ in species in the moral genus, and in the sacramental judgment it suffices that he who sinned with his sister say: I committed incest once or twice, without explaining the person related to him. And although incest with a daughter or mother is graver than with a sister or niece or the female cousin of one's wife, nevertheless, because this gravity increases the malice within the same species, it need not necessarily be confessed. And this opinion of St. Thomas pleases me more, which Filliucius calls probable in Quaest. Moral., tom. 2, tract 30, ch. 5, no. 97. Therefore it must be said with Nugno that diversity of degrees does not make a specific diversity in incest, but is an aggravating circumstance, which I probably think need not necessarily be explained in confession. And Gyptius teaches the same in express terms, as do, among our own, Fr. Megala and others.

Reply 3. More probably, however, the other degrees of consanguinity or affinity need not necessarily be declared. - Thus more commonly. - St. Lig., no. 469 and following.

QUESTION 4. Must the circumstance of the dignity of the person necessarily be accused, for example, if the sinner is a Superior, Magistrate, Priest, etc.?

Reply. More probably, negative of itself, that is, apart from the consideration of scandal, office, or a particular obligation. The reason is that the circumstance of the dignity of the person sinning does not of itself change the species of the sin, but at most aggravates the sin.

487. ○ QUESTION 5. Must the circumstance of a sin committed by a Confessor with a penitent necessarily be declared?

Reply. More probably, negative, provided it has no relation to confession. The reason is that by this sin no injury is done to the Sacrament, since it has no relation to confession [15]. - St. Lig., on the sixth precept, no. 451; Lugo, disp. 16, no. 451; Lacroix, etc.

[15] Some have thought that there is a certain spiritual relationship between Confessor and penitent, on account of which the sin contains some malice of incest. But this is commonly rejected (see Lugo, De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 359 and following). Nevertheless, it is readily evident that both such a penitent must altogether be deterred from confessing further to that priest and such a Confessor from admitting that penitent further to confession.

QUESTION 6. Must the circumstance of a sacred time necessarily be accused?

Reply. Negative. This is evident from the universal practice both of Confessors and of penitents; for it is established that neither are the former solicitous to ask about such a circumstance, nor are the latter accustomed to declare it. Therefore, the circumstance of sacred time does not seem to require explanation, unless certain things are specially prohibited out of reverence for the time, for example, that one should not present public games, comedies, or theatrical spectacles on Good Friday. - St. Lig., bk. 3, no. 273; Lugo, no. 520; and others commonly.

488. ○ QUESTION 7. Does he satisfy the integrity of confession who accuses a recent sin as though committed long ago?

Reply 1. Affirmative of itself, because the circumstance of time pertains in no way to confession. Hence a penitent satisfies the obligation of confession who mingles new sins with old ones, or who, when making a general confession, does not distinguish from the others the mortal sins committed since the last confession, even if he does this deliberately to conceal the time at which he committed the sins. - Thus the Doctors commonly. - See Lugo, disp. 16, no. 53 [16]; Tamburini, Methodus Confessionis, bk. 2, ch. 1.

[16] Cardinal De Lugo (disp. 16, no. 47), after adducing the opposite opinion of some, adds: Others more correctly deny an obligation in the penitent to explain that he had not confessed those sins previously. Thus Bonacina, Homobonus, Diana, Sanchez, Suarez, etc. The reason... is that the sin is the same, whether he confessed it previously or not, unless perhaps the change of time brings with it a circumstance different in species.... But when the sin is the same, there is no reason why the circumstance of time must be explained. Since, therefore, the sin is the same whether he confessed it previously or not, and that circumstance in no way varies the sin, there is no reason why it must necessarily be explained. But, resolving the arguments of the contrary opinion (no. 54), he adds these things: Nor does it hinder that the penitent says that he wishes to make a general confession; for by this he does not say that he wishes to confess only old sins, but that he wishes also to comprehend those; for a general confession embraces all sins up to this hour. Nor does it matter that the Confessor understands it to be an old sin, for the penitent did not say this; and therefore the intention of absolving is not regulated by the private estimation of the Confessor, but he intends to absolve from the sins which the penitent brought to judgment, whatever they may be.... Finally, it does not matter that the penitent seems implicitly to indicate that they are old sins; for he truly has the intention of speaking about new sins and wishes to speak about them, although he desires not to be understood in this respect by the Confessor.

Reply 2. But if the penitent lies about the time, for example, if he denies that he sinned today and declares the sin as though committed at another definite and remote time, the Doctors more commonly think that he does not satisfy his obligation. The reason is that the act which the penitent placed today is not the act placed a year ago. Hence he lies in two ways, namely, by concealing the sin committed today and by accusing a sin committed at another time. - Thus Tamburini in the place cited.

There are nevertheless Theologians who think this lie light. - See Lugo, ibid. [17].

[17] Lugo aptly observes (loc. cit., no. 54) that this case differs from the preceding. Therefore, he says, it is not the same thing to speak obscurely and expressly to deny; because in the first case the words truly signify that which he wishes to confess, and therefore he presents a true sin; but in the second case the words cannot signify the true sin, but a false one. And I said false because, as the patrons of the contrary opinion object, in this way you seem in reality both to accuse a sin which you did not commit and to conceal that which you did commit.

Nevertheless, insofar as this argument is urged to deny the sufficiency of this confession, Lugo himself (ibid., no. 53) calls it merely probable. And indeed, as Tamburini observes (Exped. Conf., bk. 2, ch. 1, no. 6), a disorder of this kind, by which you seem to accuse a sin never committed and to conceal one truly committed, occurs equally from other circumstances also which are falsely added, as even the adversaries freely admit. Thus, for example, if you say that you killed Paul when you killed Andrew; or that you sinned with a stranger when you sinned with an inhabitant; or that you stole from Lucius when you stole from Caius; or that you detracted from someone at home when you detracted from him on the road or in the theater; or that you read a heretical book by Melanchthon when the book was by Osiander; or that you struck a Capuchin when you struck a Carmelite. That these lies do not hinder sufficient integrity of confession is also evident from the fact that, if they happened to be uttered inadvertently, no one compels the penitent to correct the error in the following confession. And to this pertains what the Author says, that this lie is thought light by certain Theologians.

Moreover, scarcely any use of these opinions bears upon practice, unless perhaps the Confessor, with one who undertakes to confess the sins of his whole life, thinks it superfluous from the adjuncts to inquire whether he had previously confessed this or that sin. For otherwise the faithful, ignorant of theological subtleties, are never accustomed to use these artifices. Indeed, even for those acquainted with these doctrines it would not always be lawful, whether because of a circumstance which changes the species at a different time, or because of the reservation of cases which can be present according as the sin was or was not previously absolved and duly confessed, or because of the adjuncts of a proximate occasion or evil custom which require the particular care of the Confessor.

489. ○ QUESTION 8. Must the external act of sin necessarily be accused?

Reply. Affirmative, because in the moral genus it is one and the same thing with the internal act, and these two constitute one whole. Moreover, the external act is directly prohibited by divine law, for example, You shall not kill. Besides, without declaration of the external act the Confessor generally could not discharge his office as is fitting with regard to providing admonitions, etc. This is established also from the universal custom of the faithful, which explains the law in this sense.

490. ○ QUESTION 9. Must the effect of a sin necessarily be expressed in confession?

Reply. The Doctors disagree; but the opinion which denies it has always seemed truer to me, says Lugo, disp. 16, no. 440, who draws the reason from the distinction between the external act of the sin and the effect of the sin thus (ibid., no. 449): The more common reason for this difference is that the external act, which is denominated free from the actual liberty of the internal act, is truly and properly a sin; but the effect which afterward followed, in sleep for example, is not properly a sin, as we have said, but the effect of a sin. But in confession all and only sins must be explained; therefore, the external act must be explained when it is actually free, but not the effect which afterward followed... because there cannot be an actual sin in him who is not actually sinning; nor can he actually sin who does not actually act; but he who sleeps while his enemy dies from poison does nothing at that time; therefore, he does not sin at that time. Thus far Lugo [18]; see the rest in him, and you will not regret it.

[18] Here there is question merely of obligation, just as in the question whether sins doubtfully committed or merely aggravating circumstances must be expressed in confession. And since in the present controversy also the obligation must be called entirely doubtful, as the disagreement of the Doctors proves, by the general principle the obligation of expressing the effect of a sin in confession neither ought nor can be imposed upon anyone. To this pertain the things which St. Alphonsus (Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, no. 29) has concerning the question of the necessity of expressing merely aggravating circumstances: Such a law, he says, is doubtful; and no one is bound to doubtful laws, as has been shown. Nor does it hinder to say here that in the matter of the Sacraments we cannot follow merely probable opinions; because this applies when there is question of the validity of the sacrament; otherwise with respect to integrity.

491. ○ QUESTION 10. Must a penitent declare the different persons with whom he sinned?

Reply. Negative of itself. - Thus Bonacina, disp. 5, q. 5, sect. 2, point 2, sec. 3, diff. 3, no. 14; Tamburini, In Decalogum, bk. 7, ch. 7; Lacroix, no. 1040; and others commonly.

The reason is that it suffices for the number and species of sins to be declared; but sins do not change species merely because they were committed with several persons. Hence he who fornicated with three different persons, or three times with the same person, satisfies by saying that he fornicated three times; nor is he bound of his own accord to say whether his accomplice was one or several, or whether they were prostitutes or others. - Nevertheless, if the Confessor asks about this, the penitent is bound to answer, because it is expedient that the Confessor know whether perhaps there is a proximate occasion of sinning, as is likely if the sin was committed several times with the same person.

492. ○ QUESTION 11. Must one bound by a vow of chastity, when sinning with another similarly bound, declare both circumstances?

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is that there are two entirely distinct sins there, namely, a sin against one's own vow and a sin of cooperating with the other in violating that person's vow. Precisely the same must be said of a married man having relations with another man's wife; for he commits a twofold adultery. - Lacroix, no. 4063; Lugo, disp. 16, no. 258; Salmanticenses, ch. 6, no. 63, etc.

QUESTION 12. Must a Priest or Religious sinning against chastity disclose his condition, or only the circumstance of the vow of chastity?

Reply. It is controverted. It probably suffices that each manifest the circumstance of the vow, because the species of the obligation does not seem to be changed by the special condition either of Priest or Religious [19]. - Lugo, disp. 16, no. 149; Lacroix, etc., against some.

[19] The vow of each is solemn; therefore the sin of each pertains to the same species of personal sacrilege. There can therefore be place for controversy only when one is bound by a solemn vow but the other by a simple vow, the violation of which more probably is not reduced to the species of sacrilege strictly so called. But enough was said elsewhere concerning these things, where the vow was treated (vol. I, no. 286).

493. ○ QUESTION 13. Must the relationship of persons be declared in sins of hatred?

Reply 1. Affirmative, if there is question of a closer relationship because of the strict bond of the virtue of piety. Hence grave hatred toward parents, children, grandparents, grandchildren, relatives by affinity in the first degree [20], godfathers, godchildren, one's spouse, and brothers and sisters must be declared. - Lugo, disp. 16, no. 303 and following; and others commonly. Reply 2. More probably, negative, however, if there is question of remote relationship, namely, among other blood relatives [21] or relatives by affinity. - Lugo, ibid., and others, against others who think that the circumstance of relationship even in the fourth degree of consanguinity must be declared.

[20] The virtue of piety properly exercises its office toward blood relatives, but not toward relatives by affinity. See St. Thomas (2.2, q. 101, art. 1) and Cardinal De Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, nos. 303-308), who make no mention of relatives by affinity.

[21] In sins against other relatives or more remote blood relations, that is, apart from parents and brothers, although a circumstance of this kind aggravates and increases the malice, it nevertheless does not introduce a different species which must necessarily be explained in confession. Thus Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 308). But he says that this circumstance need not necessarily be explained because this malice, although of a different species, is nevertheless not judged grave.

Point IV. On Forgotten Sins

494. ○ Sins omitted through inculpable forgetfulness must be accused if they return to the memory of the penitent [1]. For by divine precept all sins committed after Baptism must be declared in sacramental confession; nor can present forgetfulness excuse from so great an obligation even for the future. This is established from Proposition 11 condemned by Alexander VII, to be reported below at no. 497.

[1] This must be understood, as is evident of itself, with regard to necessary matter of confession, namely, sins certainly grave.

495. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must sins omitted through forgetfulness or another just cause be accused AS SOON AS POSSIBLE?

Reply. More probably, negative. For an obligation of this kind is to be understood morally, especially since these sins have already been blotted out and consequently there is no danger to the soul in delay. - Thus more commonly. - Sporer; Laymann; etc.

Indeed, according to several grave Theologians, the penitent can probably defer the confession of these sins until he is again bound to confess by virtue of another obligation. Thus it could be deferred for several months and even until the time of annual confession. - Thus Bonacina, disp. 5, q. 5, sect. 2, point 4, no. 32. Nevertheless, no other confession can intervene while those sins are omitted. The reason is that it pertains to the integrity of confession to declare in the present accusation all mortal sins not yet accused which occur to the memory, or of which one has consciousness, as Trent says, sess. 14, ch. 5. Moreover, according to Suarez, De Poenit., disp. 22, sect. 1, no. 1: Those sins are in the present consciousness which, having been committed after Baptism, have not been duly subjected to the keys through another confession [2].

[2] In fact, it does not appear whether the words of Suarez pertain here. For he gives as the reason (ibid., no. 6), with St. Thomas, that one sin cannot be remitted without another. But here the question concerns sins already remitted.

QUESTION 2. Must sins omitted through forgetfulness be accused before Communion if they first occur to the mind?

Reply. More probably, negative, even if the penitent can confess without inconvenience. - Recall what was said in the Treatise on the Eucharist, no. 326.

QUESTION 3. Is a penitent who remembers a forgotten sin, but cannot (or does not wish to) confess, bound to elicit an act of contrition before Communion?

Reply. Negative, with St. Lig., no. 257; Lugo, De Eucharistia, disp. 14, no. 122; and with others commonly against certain others. The reason is that no foundation appears for why this contrition should be required. For it is not required by precept, because this is nowhere found prescribed; nor from a necessity of purification, because the sin has already been indirectly blotted out through the preceding confession and consequently does not need remission.

496. ◦ QUESTION 4. Must a penitent who accuses a grave sin omitted in the preceding confession through forgetfulness or another legitimate cause, and already indirectly remitted, necessarily be absolved again?

Reply. Affirmative, with the most common opinion. The reason is that by the institution of Christ all mortal sins must be subjected to the keys so that they may be directly remitted. For although they have already been remitted, they were nevertheless not remitted by virtue of the Sacrament, or by virtue of absolution, but only by virtue of the grace infused through the sacrament, and concomitantly with the other sins. - Sporer, no. 627; Collat. Andeg., 35, q. 3; etc., against the few who are not to be heard.

Although the Confessor can omit absolution with penitents who are accustomed to return to the same Confessor, since they will be directly absolved in another confession, it is nevertheless better to impart absolution to all when this can easily be done, for the consolation and tranquility of soul of the penitent, and also on account of the fruit to be received from the Sacrament. Add the danger that the penitent may no longer be able to approach the same Confessor.

§ II. On Causes Excusing from Integrity in General, and Especially with Regard to the Dying

Point I. On Causes Excusing from Integrity in General

497. Principles. - I. Causes are sometimes given which excuse from the material integrity of confession, because sometimes that integrity is physically or morally impossible.

II. In order that someone may be judged excused from the material integrity of confession by reason of moral inability, although the sins occur to his mind, these conditions must be observed: 1. that only those sins be omitted which cannot be declared, or from the manifestation of which would follow a most grave extrinsic inconvenience, whether spiritual or temporal, to the penitent, the Confessor, or some third person; 2. that another Confessor cannot be found to whom an integral confession may be made without such inconvenience; 3. that confession be necessary here and now [1]. - St. Lig., no. 487.

[1] From the common opinion of the Doctors, this necessity is judged to be present: 1. if the precept of annual confession or Communion must be fulfilled; 2. if reception of the Eucharist or celebration of Mass cannot be omitted without reproach or scandal; 3. if otherwise someone must long be deprived of the benefit of the sacraments; 4. indeed, as Suarez adds (De Poenit., disp. 23, sect. 2, no. 7), if otherwise someone would be deprived of the great utility which the sacrament of itself brings.

III. A difficulty intrinsic to confession itself never excuses, however grave it may be. The reason is that confession by its nature is essentially laborious, and therefore, if a grave difficulty, for example, great repugnance or shame or the loss of one's own reputation before the Confessor, excused from integrity, the faithful would generally be excused from accusing mortal sins, and consequently the institution of the Sacrament of Penance would in great part collapse. Moreover, the Church could not reserve atrocious crimes, because that creates no slight inconvenience for penitents.

IV. When the cause excusing from material integrity ceases, the divine precept of confessing all omitted mortal sins again urges; for when an impediment occurs, the obligation of confession does not cease simply, but is only suspended. Therefore, when the excusing cause ceases, the obligation of the law fully revives; and since the precept of confession is not affixed to a time or circumstance but concerns the whole of life, sins not yet accused must afterward, if it can be done, necessarily be accused. This is established moreover from Proposition 11 condemned by Alexander VII, which is as follows: We are not bound in the following confession to express sins omitted or forgotten in confession because of an imminent danger of death or because of another cause.

498. Resolutions. - The following chiefly excuse from the material integrity of confession:

1. Extreme sickness, that is, when a dying person can express only one or another sin, or, already deprived of the use of speech, shows penitence by some sign only and asks for absolution.

2. A defect of speech; thus the mute are exempted from integrity when they cannot confess integrally either in writing [2] or by signs; likewise travelers wholly or almost wholly ignorant of the language of the region in which they confess.

[2] The Author himself (below, no. 503, q. 7), with most of the Doctors, denies that there is ever an obligation of confessing in writing.

3. A lack of time, for example, if soldiers must proceed immediately to battle. The mere multitude of penitents does not excuse, however, as was said above.

4. Danger to the life of the penitent, the Confessor, or a third person; for example, if enemies arrive, or if many are in danger of shipwreck or contagion. Indeed, sometimes, in the extreme danger of many, all can be absolved by one pronouncement of the form, I absolve you, etc., after some general sign of contrition and confession has been exhibited.

5. Danger to reputation, for example, if a Priest about to celebrate at once, and needing a general confession, could not confess integrally because those present would suspect the matter.

6. Danger of revelation or violation of the seal; for example, if a Confessor cannot confess integrally without revealing sins heard in confession, etc.; or if a penitent for a grave cause fears that the Confessor may violate the law of the seal. But this latter case, if indeed it should ever be said to occur, is exceedingly rare.

7. Danger of scandal or a fall, both on the part of the penitent and on the part of the Confessor; for example, if a woman knew with certainty the very great frailty of the Confessor, etc. - St. Lig., no. 479 and following.

499. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is there an obligation of confessing a mortal sin which cannot be explained without disclosing the accomplice?

Reply. More probably, affirmative, with the more common opinion. The reason is: 1. because no legitimate excuse is given by which the precept of integrity may be derogated from; for it cannot be said that the positive precept is restricted by the natural precept of not defaming one's neighbor, since the precept of charity [3] prohibits only that the crime of another be manifested without cause; but here there is a cause, and indeed a grave one, namely, procuring the integrity of confession and the direction of conscience; 2. the accomplice, by committing the sin, loses every right to reputation which he could have before the Confessor in relation to the confession of this sin, and he himself implicitly and freely consents to this injury to his reputation when he sins [4]. - St. Lig., no. 489, with many others.

[3] The obligation that the reputation of another not be injured through the revelation of a hidden crime seems to be derived from the virtue of justice rather than charity.

[4] Cardinal De Lugo, after showing (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 395) that the reason for this opinion, namely, that to be defamed before one Confessor is not a grave harm, is less firm - which, he says, supposes another false opinion which I attacked in the Treatise on Justice and Right - judges the same concerning this very thing and the reasons adduced by the Author (ibid., no. 397). Others, he says, prove it because the penitent uses his own right in confessing his own sin, and the accomplice exposed himself to this danger of disclosure, since he knew the obligation which everyone has of confessing his sin integrally. But all these and similar things contain a begging of the question and suppose what is to be proved. For the question concerns this very thing, whether the penitent has a right to defame the accomplice, and consequently whether, in doing so, he uses his own right. Hence it is falsely supposed that the accomplice exposed himself to this harm. For if the penitent does not have the right, or if this is not proved from elsewhere, he did not expose himself to any such danger.

Nor does the argument which Lugo, after rejecting the foregoing, endeavored to make sufficient (loc. cit., no. 398) seem any firmer, namely, that since the good of an integral confession is of such a kind and so great that on account of it Christ obliges the penitent to manifest his own crimes and to undergo infamy, it follows that for the sake of that same good He permitted the manifestation of another's crime. For the case of one's own reputation and that of another's reputation is so disparate that, according to the opinion of all and therefore even according to his opinion, I am bound, if I can, to seek another Confessor to whom the accomplice is unknown, but I am by no means bound to seek a Confessor to whom I myself am unknown.

There is added the fact that the weight of extrinsic Authority, considering both the number and the eminent name of the Doctors (see the same Lugo, loc. cit., no. 393), appears no lighter in favor of the opposite opinion, which expressly denies the obligation of an integral confession from which the accomplice would be disclosed. Therefore, a sufficient reason by which someone may be compelled to confess a circumstance of this kind seems wholly lacking.

But although equal probability may seem to favor each of these two opinions, the case of each is nevertheless not equal. For the mere probability of the opinion which exacts integrity even with the disclosure of the accomplice is, by the general canon, unequal to inducing a certain obligation. But no reason other than this very obligation is present which could excuse from preserving the accomplice's reputation. Therefore, other inconveniences being excluded, the integral obligation of keeping that circumstance silent seems to remain whenever infamy to another would follow from its confession.

I said, other inconveniences being excluded; for, as the Author also intimates, if the penitent for a special cause needs direction and the counsel of a Confessor, because, for example, he has in the accomplice a proximate occasion of sinning, but no other Confessor is present either to whom the person of the accomplice is unknown or who, because the circumstances of the penitent are unknown to him, is qualified to furnish suitable counsels, he certainly will not be bound to undergo some grave danger to his own soul in order to protect the reputation of another. Nevertheless, it will certainly rarely happen that direction of this kind is so necessary and so urgent that no delay can be interposed while counsel is sought.

Nevertheless, not a few others probably deny it, teaching that another Confessor who does not know the accomplice is to be sought [5]; and if one cannot be had, the circumstance from which the accomplice would be discovered can, indeed must, be omitted until another Confessor is found. - Thus Busembaum, Diana, Navarre, Mazzotta, Medina, Elbel, etc.

[5] The obligation of seeking another Confessor to whom the accomplice is unknown, when this can conveniently be done, is maintained most commonly even by those Doctors whose opinion the Author reports in the first place; and only a few have affirmed that this is merely a counsel, whose opinion is rejected by all, as may be seen in St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 489) and Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 392). Therefore, the controversy among the Doctors does not concern whether it is lawful to confess a sin with injury to the reputation of the accomplice when this inconvenience can easily be avoided by employing another Confessor, but rather whether, when another Confessor to whom the accomplice is unknown is lacking, the circumstance which would disclose the accomplice is to be passed over in silence, as is evident from what was said in the preceding note.

500. ○ QUESTION 2. What causes excuse from seeking another Confessor to whom the accomplice is unknown, as the patrons of the second opinion require [6]?

[6] According to the mind of the Doctors, as we said in the preceding notes, the question ought rather to be proposed thus: What causes excuse from seeking a Confessor to whom the accomplice is unknown, according, namely, to those who deny that the circumstance of the accomplice can ever be kept silent? For this is the difference between the two opinions: although each obliges the penitent, for preserving the reputation of the accomplice, to seek a Confessor to whom the accomplice is unknown, nevertheless, if such a Confessor is lacking, some say that the circumstance by which the reputation of the neighbor would be injured must be kept silent, while others contend that it must be expressed so that the integrity of confession may be preserved. These latter are the ones who judge that, because of the causes here mentioned by the Author, the reputation of the accomplice can be set aside; for the others admit those same causes as sufficient, not indeed that the crime of the neighbor may lawfully be revealed, but insofar as in those circumstances it is lawful to approach the Sacrament of Penance even without the integrity of confession being preserved, namely, reserving the circumstance of the accomplice for a confession in which there is no danger of injuring the reputation of another. - See St. Alph., no. 490.

Reply. 1. If danger of death or the precept of annual confession urges; 2. if it would be grave for the penitent to omit confession or Communion; 3. if someone would disclose his conscience to another Confessor only with difficulty; 4. if someone otherwise would have to remain in sin even for one day; 5. if someone otherwise would be deprived of the benefit of some extraordinary indulgence; 6. if by approaching a Confessor to whom the accomplice is known, better direction or notably greater consolation would be obtained.

Hence, by reason of seeking counsel, alleviating sorrow, etc., mothers and wives who manifest to a Confessor the sins of their sons or husbands [7] are often excused, even though he knows them. For it would be too hard that they should be bound to seek another Confessor. Therefore, in general there is not held to be a grave obligation of approaching another Confessor for the sake of concealing the accomplice, unless perhaps there is question of a very grave crime. - St. Lig., no. 490, etc.

[7] The present question is by no means customarily raised concerning causes of this kind, which are judged of the lightest moment. For these things generally occur in families and, besides, are not usually secret. Suppose rather a wife who must confess adultery committed with her husband's brother, and one indeed initiated into holy orders.

501. ○ QUESTION 3. Is it lawful for the Confessor himself to ask the name of the accomplice, for example, for correction, etc.?

Reply. Negative, at least generally speaking, because this both induces one to detract from one's neighbor without a just cause [8] and renders the Sacrament of Penance odious. This is established from the Bull Ubi primum of Benedict XIV, in which the Pontiff, speaking of Confessors who demand the name of the accomplice under the penalty of denying absolution, declares that they sin gravely and incur suspension from hearing confessions, but only ferendae sententiae [9].

[8] If, according to the common opinion of the Doctors, a penitent is bound to seek another Confessor lest he betray the accomplice in the sin, indeed, according to the judgment of several, is excused for this reason from confessing a circumstance otherwise necessarily to be expressed, it is plainly evident that it is much less lawful for Confessors spontaneously to ask the penitent for the name of the accomplice.

[9] Four Constitutions of Benedict XIV exist concerning this matter. The first was given on July 7, 1745, to the Bishops of the Portuguese dominion, in which he designates and condemns the practice of asking the name of the accomplice. It begins: Suprema omnium Ecclesiarum sollicitudo. - The second was given on June 2, 1746; in it he confirms the former, establishes penalties against delinquents, and determines the order of proceeding in cases of this kind. It begins: Ubi primum. - The third was given on September 28 of the same year, 1746; in this he extends to the whole Church, or rather declares to be extended and in force, those things which he had decreed for the Portuguese dominion. It begins: Ad eradicandum pravum zizanii semen. - The fourth, finally, was given on December 9, 1749, in which he adds certain things to the second concerning the manner of proceeding in cases of this kind.

The condemned practice is designated thus in the first Constitution: It has come... to our ears that certain... confessors, allowing themselves to be seduced by a false appearance of zeal, but straying far from zeal according to knowledge, have begun to maintain and introduce a certain perverse and pernicious practice in hearing... confessions...; namely, that if perhaps they should encounter penitents having a companion in crime, they would indiscriminately ask those penitents for the name of such a companion or accomplice; and they would not merely endeavor by persuasion to induce them to reveal it to them, but, what is more detestable, having also announced the denial of sacramental absolution unless they revealed it, they would utterly force and compel them; indeed, they would also demand that not only the name of that same accomplice, but in addition the place of residence, be designated to them. They did not hesitate both to color this intolerable imprudence with the specious pretext of procuring the correction of the accomplice and gathering other goods, and to defend it by certain borrowed opinions of the Doctors; although in reality, by following false and erroneous opinions of this kind, OR BY APPLYING TRUE AND SOUND ONES BADLY, they were bringing ruin upon their own souls and those of their penitents, and furthermore were rendering themselves guilty before God... of several grave harms which they ought to have foreseen would easily follow therefrom. And indeed, it is known by unhappy experience that many harms of this kind have already followed; nor could it happen otherwise than that on this account disparaging talk and scandals, and hatred not only of the Ministers but even of the sacred Ministry itself, and an immense disturbance of minds among the faithful people, should arise.

But the penalties according to the Constitution Ubi primum are: 1. the penalty of excommunication incurred by the fact itself and reserved to the Roman Pontiff against anyone who in the future should dare to teach that a practice of this kind, as it is set forth and reproved in the related Brief, is lawful, or should presume to write or speak in defense of the same condemned practice, or rashly to attack or twist into other meanings or interpret those things which are decreed against the same practice in the said Brief. - 2. But against those who, in conformity with the aforesaid reprobated practice, should presume to question penitents who confess to them in the tribunal of penance some sin or crime in which they had a companion or companions, concerning the name of the companion or accomplice, the place of residence, or other adjuncts or circumstances of this kind concerning a more express and more individual disclosure of the same accomplice, denying sacramental absolution to that penitent if he refused to disclose it, it is decreed that, beyond the incurring of mortal sin, they are to be subjected to suspension from the office of hearing confessions and also to other graver penalties; these, as is evident, are ferendae sententiae. But these penalties remain in their force even after the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, in which the excommunication imposed by Benedict XIV is confirmed.

Since, however, in the same Constitution this case is committed to the tribunal of the Holy Office, these things are added concerning the obligation of denouncing delinquents: But whoever shall have known that any other person has transgressed in any of the aforesaid ways shall be bound to denounce him to the same Holy Office within the term of days customarily fixed in the Edicts of the Holy Office for an inquisition of this kind (in the edict a month is fixed); otherwise they shall incur the penalties customarily inflicted by the same edicts upon those who do not denounce (this penalty was a reserved excommunication, now removed by the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis).

Nevertheless, the penitent who is involved in the case is exempted from this obligation of denouncing in the following manner: Nevertheless, for just causes, we will and do exempt from an obligation of this kind to denounce the very person of the penitent alone in his own case, that is, in the case in which, while confessing his own sin, he is compelled by the Confessor to manifest to him the name of the accomplice in the same sin....

But the case is then said to pertain to the tribunal of the Holy Office only when an evil persuasion concerning the condemned doctrine is added; for otherwise it will pertain to the Ordinary. But if, he says, it should happen that the act of a confessor wrongly asking the name of the accomplice and denying absolution unless it be disclosed to him is of such a kind that, although imprudent and evil, it was nevertheless a simple and bare act, that is, destitute of those circumstances which render him suspect of an evil belief or of an evil adherence to the practice... reproved in the said Brief as lawful, then a delict of this kind... shall not be subject to the cognizance... of the Holy Office; but to take cognizance of it and to punish the delinquent confessor by suspension from hearing confessions or by other canonical and legitimate penalties according to the character of the delict shall pertain wholly to the Ordinaries of the places in their respective Dioceses.

Finally, since in the second Constitution it was prescribed that a denunciation was to be made to the tribunal of the Holy Office only when there was an underlying suspicion of evil doctrine, in the fourth Constitution it is defined that this is always to be observed, whether the priest is thought to have transgressed because of adherence to the reprobated practice or suspicion of an erroneous opinion, or merely through imprudence without the aforesaid circumstances; namely, that in the tribunal of the Holy Office itself an examination concerning the pertinence of the case should be made and sentence passed, whether the case is to be left to the Holy Office or the accused is to be judged by the Bishop.

Moreover, concerning this fourth Constitution a doubt troubled some, namely, whether it was issued for the dominion of Portugal alone, or also for other places. For: 1. the Synopsis of the Bull has thus: To the Holy Inquisition in the kingdoms of Portugal and the Algarves is adjudged cognizance of the pertinence of cases against Confessors, etc. And in fact it treats there only (see secs. 1, 2) of controversies stirred up in Portugal and of the Bishops of that region, so that the Pontiff seems to have wished entirely to provide for them. - 2. In the Constitution itself mention is indeed made of two Constitutions which had been issued for those kingdoms; but no mention is made of the third, by which it was declared that the condemnation both of the evil practice and of the doctrine pertained to the whole Church. - 3. Since in the third there is prescribed that manner of promulgation which is proper to Decrees pertaining to all provinces, namely, that copies be affixed publicly at Rome to the doors of the Basilicas, etc., in this fourth, as also in the first and second, there is no mention of this promulgation. - But on the other side the reason for issuing the Constitution seems to make against this, and it appears to have force also for other places. For it is of this kind (sec. 6): Since the same delict was established to be referred in certain circumstances to the tribunal of the Holy Office, but in others to the Ordinary, certain persons zealous for ecclesiastical peace suggested that in the execution of a method of this kind an approach to new disturbances would be opened, because there would be no one who could pronounce judgment in a case of disagreement; whence it came about that, the fear of a denunciation to be made to the same Office of the Inquisition having been removed in some circumstances, that could certainly be said to have been taken away which especially restrained men from so pernicious a... delict.

502. ○ QUESTION 4. Is it so forbidden by the aforesaid letters of Benedict XIV to ask the name of the accomplice that in no case is this lawful?

Reply. Negative. 1. Because Benedict XIV himself supposes cases in which this is lawful according to true, as he says, and sound opinions; 2. because sometimes the penitent must necessarily reveal the accomplice, and yet can accomplish this only through the Confessor. - See Lugo, De Poenit., disp. 17, nos. 427-432 [10].

[10] To the true and sound opinions which Benedict XIV affirms certain men were accustomed to abuse in the Constitution Suprema pertains that which Cardinal De Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 432) establishes thus: The Confessor can see that, from concealment of the accomplice, most grave harms are imminent, which the penitent is altogether bound to prevent; again he sees that the penitent cannot accomplish this by himself immediately, nor has another through whom he can do it, other than the Confessor himself; in which case it is certain that the penitent is bound to choose that sole means; but if he is unwilling, he is no longer fit to receive absolution. See in the same Lugo (ibid., no. 433) the example of a Regular Prelate who can sometimes for this reason oblige a subject to reveal an accomplice.

St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 491), from the opinion of Fr. Philip de Carboneano (in the note or appendix to Antoine, De Poenit., ch. 1, art. 2, q. 6), adds that Confessors certainly can and are bound, for preserving the integrity of confession, to inquire into necessary circumstances, namely, those which either change the species or must be inquired into so that provision may be made for the penitent's conscience; for example, if the Confessor asks whether the person of the accomplice is in the first or second degree, whether bound by a vow, whether she is a maidservant, whether she lives in the same house, even though he thereby comes to know the accomplice. These things can certainly be admitted insofar as something must necessarily be known so that provision may be made for the salvation of the penitent; although even in this it seems necessary to take care lest inquiry descend further than is necessary into particular adjuncts, for example, whether she is a maidservant. But as regards knowing the species of the sin - to omit for the moment that the degree of relationship in incest more probably does not change the species, while the circumstance of a vow is too unusual to require inquiry, especially since, if present, it is usually disclosed spontaneously - it is useful to remember the obligation by which, according to all, a penitent is bound to seek another Confessor lest he betray his accomplice in sin, and that for the same reason, according to the opinion of the gravest Doctors (see the notes above at nos. 495 and 500), those circumstances can lawfully be kept silent at that time. Therefore, if the questions, as is supposed in the case, would easily lead to betraying the accomplice, it can hardly be admitted that the Confessor must, or even can, employ them.

QUESTION 5. Is there an obligation of confessing a sin which cannot be declared without defaming another who was the occasion of the sin, for example, if someone killed his sister who was pregnant through a crime?

Reply. It is controverted, as in the nearly similar case discussed above in the first question. Lugo with others affirms it. Suarez with several others denies it. Therefore, equal probability stands on each side [11].

[11] If it is probable that a circumstance of this kind can be kept silent, we have already said (above, in the note at no. 500) that the right of another to preserve his reputation prevails.

503. ○ QUESTION 6. Are those who are both deaf and mute bound to confess, and if so, how?

Reply. The mute and deaf are bound to confess in some manner, at least by signs, unless they are so ignorant and dull that nothing can be elicited from them. The reason is that the precept of confession regards all the faithful who can manifest their sins in some manner.

Hence: 1. Mute persons sufficiently instructed are bound to confess integrally, at least by signs, if these are understood by the Confessor; but if they are less instructed or can be understood by the Confessor only with difficulty, it will suffice for them to manifest only one or another sin, or to signify in general that they are sinners and wish to avoid sin.

2. Deaf persons who have the use of speech are bound on their part to confess the sins which occur to their memory; but the Confessor is not bound to question them in order to procure the integrity of confession, because of the excessive difficulty of questioning [12]. in doubt greater provision must always be made for the sacramental seal than for integrity; and therefore the Confessor should ask neither about the number nor about circumstances, etc., and in imposing satisfaction should enjoin something light, lest a suspicion of grave fault be introduced. Nor perhaps is it expedient to summon women at untimely hours, when no one else is in the church, both because an accidental danger of revelation is not absent and because it is altogether better to provide for propriety.

[12] Add also the danger of revelation. The same must also be said concerning the hard of hearing; if their confession must be heard in a church, as is generally necessary with women,

QUESTION 7. Are mute persons who know how to write bound to confess in writing in order to procure the integrity of confession?

Reply. The more common opinion denies it, both because of the danger of revelation, because writing is an extraordinary means which has never been regarded in the Church as prescribed, and also because, as Diana says, such a manner of confession is of itself public, since writing is of itself public. - Diana, tom. 4, tract 3, resol. 72, no. 2 [13]. It can nevertheless be permitted; but care must be taken that the writing is immediately destroyed.

[13]  The VV. lament (p. 936, no. 115, with the Note) that Gury has, The more common opinion denies it, etc., when St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 479) wrote to the contrary: The more common opinion affirms it.

Reply 1. First it would have to be examined whether certain Authors are rightly alleged for one opinion or the other. Thus, for example, for the affirmative you may see Toletus cited, who nevertheless writes in express words (bk. 3, ch. 6, no. 5): Fourth, it can be made in writing, so that the penitent writes and the Confessor reads, which could occur in the case of a mute person or another impeded person; and it is a true confession, although the penitent is not bound to this, because it is of itself public. For that which is committed to writing is of itself permanent. In the same way, certain Authors can be seen cited by some for the affirmative and by others for the negative.

2. Since a sufficiently long series of Authors can easily be brought forward for each opinion, it is not surprising that some have called the affirmative opinion more common, while others called the negative more common, according as these Authors rather than those came before their eyes.

3. But what is most important: since those who hold the affirmative opinion defend it only as more probable, and generally do not deny the probability of the opposite, as regards practice, namely, imposing an obligation of confession through writing, it is scarcely, or not even scarcely, lawful to attribute any weight to the affirmative opinion.

4. This ought to have all the more force if you consider what the Authors who hold the affirmative suggest so that it may be done rightly. Suarez, for example, after saying (De Poenit., disp. 36, sect. 6, no. 7) that this opinion seemed more probable to him, adds these ways of carrying it out: Cajetan employs the method that the penitent can write all the species of sins on one sheet and the various numbers on another, and afterward in confession indicate by a sign the sin and the number. Peter Soto employs another, that he not write beforehand, but in the presence of the Priest, and immediately tear it up. For what Dominic Soto says, that the priest could snatch the paper from his hands and publish it, is of no moment; for he could also disclose a confession made by voice, etc. This observation of Suarez perhaps will not be approved by all; for it is one thing that the priest can reveal something in words, and another that by producing the writing of the penitent he can prove the things said. Moreover, who could affirm that obligations of this kind, and merely probable ones indeed, can be imposed?

The VV. add (loc. cit.) that a most valid reason stands for the affirmative. - Reply. Others will rightly doubt concerning this most valid reason, which the VV. leave unstated. For it is established by fact that no one until now has perceived such a reason which settles the controversy. The reason commonly brought forward is that he who is bound to the end is bound to the means. But, they say, for many writing remains the sole means of fulfilling the precept. Therefore. But, omitting now the common reply, namely, that no one is bound to extraordinary means of this kind, an answer ad hominem may be given. Why, I ask, do they not oblige a man of failing memory to use writing, lest he fulfill the precept of confession only by halves? Why does this not hold here also: he who is bound to the end is bound also to the means?

504. ○ QUESTION 8. Are those ignorant of the language of the place in which they wish to confess bound to confess, and if so, how?

Reply. Those ignorant of the language of the place in which they are staying, and lacking a Confessor by whom they can be understood, are bound, when the precept of annual confession urges and at the point of death, to confess in some manner, at least by general signs. The reason is that the divine and ecclesiastical precept urges. For although they cannot confess materially and integrally, they are nevertheless bound to that which they can do. - St. Lig., no. 479, etc.

QUESTION 9. Are those ignorant of the language bound to confess through an interpreter if they can?

Reply. Negative, because to confess through an interpreter is a most grave burden and exposed to many dangers, for example, revelation, mockery, etc. Except if, in danger of death, a penitent ignorant of the language doubts concerning perfect contrition, because in that case confession would be a means altogether necessary for salvation [14]. - St. Lig., ibid.

[14] It was not St. Alphonsus, but Busembaum, who had written that no one is bound to confess through an interpreter, unless perhaps in danger of death, in which it suffices to confess some lesser sins. To this St. Alphonsus adds (no. 479): But even at the time of death it is probable that he is not bound. He then adds from Viva: Unless the sick man is doubtful concerning contrition, as Viva, q. 4, art. 3, no. 10. It nevertheless suffices then to state one venial sin, Salmanticenses... and Viva. But this exception of Viva pertains to the now antiquated opinion which holds the validity of the sacrament doubtful even at the point of death unless some specific sin is subjected to the keys; especially since the necessity of an interpreter seems altogether excluded by those words of the Lateran Council (ch. Omnis utriusque, 12, De Poenit. et Remiss.): Let him alone confess his sins..., etc.; likewise by the words of the Council of Trent (sess. 14, ch. 5) concerning the manner of confessing secretly to the Priest alone; to which is added the Response of the Sacred Congregation of February 28, 1633 (in Scavini, tract 10, disp. 1, ch. 2, art. 2), declaring that a penitent who does not wish to use an interpreter can and must be absolved. And indeed, immediately afterward the Author establishes from the common opinion that all things required for the sacrament and for formally integral Confession are present even if the penitent asks for absolution only by some sign.

Point II. On the Confession and Absolution of the Dying

505. ○ I. Every dying person who in some manner confesses by voice or sign, or asks for absolution, can and must be absolved, and indeed absolutely. The reason is that all things required for the Sacrament and for formally integral confession are present. - St. Lig., no. 480, and others commonly.

II. Every dying person in whom attrition and confession can in some manner be presumed with however slight a probability can and must be absolved, at least conditionally; because in a case of extreme necessity it is lawful even in the administration of the Sacraments to use an opinion which is only slightly founded. - St. Lig., no. 482, and others more commonly against others.

III. A dying person who altogether refuses the Sacrament of Penance, or who can in no way be presumed to have attrition, can in no manner be absolved [1]. The reason is most clearly evident.

[1] No one will deny that he who can in no way be judged disposed ought not and cannot be absolved. But since a disposition can be presumed even in one who is deprived of his senses in the very act of sinning, as the Author, after others, has in the Resolutions, it is scarcely apparent when it will happen that a dying person can in no manner be presumed to have attrition.

506. Resolutions. - 1. All dying persons not yet deprived of their senses, who consent to absolution and obey the commands of the Confessor, are to be absolved: absolutely, if they ask for confession of their own accord or propose to confess with a willing mind; but conditionally, if they are only with difficulty induced to some confession, or if there is prudent doubt concerning their sufficient disposition. - Thus commonly.

2. At least conditionally, all dying persons deprived of their senses who, before the loss of their senses, expressly showed a desire for confession, for example, by ordering a Priest to be summoned, etc., are to be absolved. The reason is that they are judged truly to confess through the testimony of those present; for a confession as though through an interpreter then seems to be made. This is established from the Councils and from the Roman Ritual. - St. Lig., no. 481.

3. Under condition, all dying persons altogether deprived of their senses who lived as Christians are to be absolved, even if at that time they gave no sign either of sorrow or of a desire for confession. The reason is that sorrow and a desire for absolution can be presumed in them. - St. Lig., no. 482; Lacroix, no. 1162; Elbel, no. 208; Collet, ch. 6, etc.

4. Other dying persons deprived of their senses who lived in a less Christian manner are also to be absolved conditionally, because even in them penitence and a desire for confession can still in some manner be presumed [2]. - Collet, ibid.; Lacroix, ibid.

[2] These things accord with the doctrine which we read in St. Augustine (De Adulterinis Coniugiis, bk. 1, ch. 26, no. 33): To catechumens placed at the end of this life, if they have been so oppressed by sickness or some accident that, although they still live, they cannot ask that Baptism be given to them... let that which is their already known will in the Christian faith profit them, so that they may be baptized in the manner in which infants, whose will has not yet appeared, are baptized.... Even if his will is uncertain, it is much better to give to one unwilling than to deny to one willing, when it does not appear whether he wills or does not will. These last words sufficiently indicate that there is question also of those concerning whom it is by no means clear whether they are disposed, because they can provide no sign of their will. And that these things have force also concerning the Sacrament of Penance, the same holy Doctor (ibid., ch. 28, no. 35) teaches in these words: I think that not only other catechumens, but also those themselves who, joined to the marriages of living persons, retain adulterous unions, although we do not admit them to Baptism when sound in body, nevertheless, if they lie in a desperate condition and repent within themselves, and cannot answer for themselves, I think they are to be baptized, so that this sin also may be washed away with the others by the laver of regeneration. For who knows whether perhaps they had resolved to be detained by the allurements of adulterous flesh until Baptism?... But the case of Baptism is the same as that of reconciliation, if perhaps the danger of ending life has overtaken the penitent. For Mother Church ought not to wish even them to depart from this life without a pledge of peace. In this text the words repent within themselves, which are read in certain codices and editions, refer to the penitence which is conjectured, not to that which betrays itself by some sign, as the context itself proclaims.

Moreover, there is a twofold reason by which the foregoing opinion of the holy Doctor, insofar as he teaches that either Baptism or reconciliation is to be given to a man who manifests his present will by no indication, can and customarily is reconciled with the common doctrine concerning the Sacrament of Penance. For while the Doctors commonly agree that absolution, at least under condition, is not to be denied to dying persons of this kind, nevertheless Viva with certain others (in St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, no. 482), according to the opinion which holds that the acts of the penitent are the matter from which of the sacrament and therefore must in some manner be sensible, contends that the dying person can be absolved insofar as any of his movements, sighs, labored breathing, rolling of the eyes, etc., are to be accepted as signs by which he asks for absolution and which in so great a necessity suffice for granting absolution under condition. But others, according to a different opinion attributed to the Scotistic school, reply (in the same St. Alph., loc. cit.) that it does not hinder that the sick person cannot provide a sign of his will; for the acts of the penitent are only the matter about which, that is, the disposition for the sacrament, which need not necessarily be sensible. Concerning each of these opinions we have already said some things above (in the note at no. 417). These things, as is evident, contribute nothing to practice, because in practice the patrons of each opinion contend that absolution is to be given. Nevertheless, if it is asked which side is moved by the more solid reason to define that in these circumstances the dying person can and must be absolved, perhaps one will only with difficulty grant the palm to the first opinion. First, in the former opinion this will rightly seem hard, that if the dying person exhibits absolutely no external movement, as sometimes happens, absolution can in no way be imparted according to its principles, since sensible matter is lacking. Then, although each opinion is equal in this, that it must equally employ conjectures in presuming the disposition of the sick person, nevertheless, the probability required concerning the validity of the sacrament shines forth much greater in the latter opinion than in the former. For the probability of the opinion which holds the acts of the penitent as the matter about which, and therefore does not require an external sign of disposition from the penitent for the essence of the sacrament, far exceeds the probability by which a movement of the finger, a rolling of the eyes, or the labored breathing of the sick person must be accepted, according to the former opinion, as signs of one asking for absolution; this probability is called slight by these very Authors (in St. Alph., loc. cit.), and in reality can be so slight that it easily slips from the hands, indeed even from the eyes.

5. A dying person deprived of his senses in the very act of sin, for example, in a duel, adultery, theft, etc., can probably be absolved under condition, because even he can be sufficiently disposed. This especially has place for one who perhaps was led to the sin by fear, human respect, etc. - St. Lig., no. 483; Elbel, no. 211; and others probably.

Appendix I. On the Examination of Conscience

507. Principles. - I. A penitent, speaking per se, is bound under grave sin to make a diligent examination of mortal sins before confession. This follows from the precept of procuring, insofar as it can be done, even the material integrity of confession. For since he is bound to confess the number and species of sins, by that very fact he is bound to recall them to memory insofar as he can with moral diligence, and therefore to make a diligent examination; because he who is bound to the end is also bound to the means necessary for it. This is established also from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 5, where it is said that all mortal sins of which penitents have consciousness AFTER A DILIGENT EXAMINATION OF THEMSELVES must be recounted in confession....

II. Diligence in the examination must be serious, or as great as is customarily employed in serious matters of great importance [1]. The reason is evident; for there is question of the grave precept of confession. This is established also from the words of the Council of Trent just cited: after a diligent examination of themselves.

[1] As regards those who are accustomed to be excessively anxious about the sufficiency of their examination, the things which Lugo has from the common doctrine are pertinent (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 590): It is certain, he says, that the penitent himself is not bound to a most exact examination of his sins, but to a human one, that is, one of such a kind that this sacrament is not rendered too grave and burdensome.... Hence it is not a good rule if you say...: if this man were to think for another hour about his sins, he would remember some sin which he does not remember, or could calculate the number of sins better; therefore, he is bound to think for another hour still. But the reason is the same, because attention must not be given only to an exact and integral confession of sins, but very great attention must also be given to the human condition, lest on that account the Sacrament be rendered grave and odious, or cause be given to shameless and ignorant heretics to call it the torture chamber of conscience.

III. Nevertheless, equal diligence is not required of all. For those who confess frequently need a lesser examination than those who confess rarely [2]; but those who are involved in worldly affairs need a greater examination than those who lead a private life. Likewise, country people and the uneducated cannot employ that accurate diligence which the intelligent and learned can. - Billuart, ibid., and others commonly.

[2] Concerning these things, however, note the wise admonition of Cardinal De Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, no. 594): Finally, it must also be noted that he who has more sins is to be questioned more lightly and less exactly concerning each than he who has fewer. The reason is gathered from what has been said; because, since only human diligence and examination is required, and this is that which does not of itself generate disgust and weariness with this Sacrament, it follows that less distinct knowledge is required from one who, because of... the multitude of sins... could with greater difficulty render an exact account. For to one who must confess the sins of his whole life, which he spent in every kind of sin, that examination would be most difficult and of itself apt to render confession odious and excessively grave to him, which would not be difficult but easy for another making a monthly confession. And this is the reason why from a prostitute, a concubinary, and similar persons we seek the number of sins less exactly and distinctly than if, for example, he had persisted in that sin only for a month or a week; because, namely, the diligence which would suffice for distinctly confessing the sins of one week, if the same were employed for examining a long time, would introduce such difficulty and trouble as the precept of integral confession does not oblige one to, because it would render the precept itself and confession excessively troublesome and grave.

508. Resolutions. - 1. He who, from grave negligence in the examination of conscience, omits some mortal sin, sins mortally per se [3] and is bound to repeat the confession as invalid. Yet in a defect of examination there can be slightness of matter, even if a grave sin is thereby omitted, for example, because of some inadvertence; and then the confession is certainly valid.

[3] Note the words of itself; because grave negligence in this matter, considered in itself, truly cannot be excused from grave guilt. But it must also be recalled here that which all teach: advertence to the gravity of the fault is required for a grave sin. It is therefore necessary that someone have known that at that time he was sinning gravely by negligence. Since this is not very frequent, because that would be equivalent to advertently consenting to a sacrilegious confession, it can be gathered therefrom that the necessity of repeating confessions for this reason rarely occurs.

2. He who is morally certain that he has not committed mortal sins since the last confession is not bound to a rigorous examination before confession, except insofar as is required for supplying sufficient matter for the Sacrament. In practice, however, pious penitents are to be counseled to devote themselves to an examination of conscience for at least five minutes, or about half a quarter-hour, namely, for recognizing and uprooting venial defects.

3. Entirely moderate diligence in examination is required in the timorous, because the conscience would not remain silent if anything gravely culpable lay hidden within; indeed, in the scrupulous an inquiry is to be omitted and sometimes altogether forbidden as useless and often harmful; for if they had sinned gravely, they would always have the sin before their eyes. - Thus commonly.

4. Generally, he satisfies who reflects upon where he was on each day, what affairs he transacted, in what he failed amid those circumstances by thought, affection, word and deed, or omission; how he conducted himself at home, in church, and in conversation with his neighbor [4]. Nor is it necessary that, retracing the same footsteps, he search them again and again. - Reuter.

[4] This manner of examining the conscience can rightly seem not merely sufficient but rather exquisite and most diligent.

5. An examination as accurate as for the healthy is not required for the sick; indeed, sometimes none is to be exacted from them because of weakness of the head. Nor should they readily be indulged when they say that they defer confession from day to day as though they had not yet sufficiently examined their conscience; but, insofar as their condition permits, they are to be examined briefly by the Confessor himself through the precepts of the Decalogue and of the Church; for it is better to restore even those who have confessed imperfectly to the state of grace by absolution than, by deferring the Sacraments of the Church, to expose them to the danger of damnation. - Elbel, no. 153.

509. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is a penitent who fears that sins may fall from his memory bound to write them down and read what has been written?

Reply. Negative. The reason is that no one is bound to procure the integrity of confession through extraordinary means and through such exquisite diligence. Moreover, this is foreign to the common practice of the timorous. - St. Lig., no. 471, etc. [5].

[5] Add the danger, by no means infrequent as experience testifies, of losing papers of this kind, and hence also scandals by no means light and contempt of the Sacrament.

QUESTION 2. What order is to be followed in the examination of conscience?

Reply 1. With respect to the matter: if someone has not confessed for a long time, it is expedient that he run through in order the precepts of God and the Church, the capital sins [6], and the special obligations of his state; otherwise, it suffices to attend to evil habits, to the more customary sins, or summarily to sins against God, one's neighbor, and oneself.

[6] Whenever the order of the precepts of God and the Church is observed, an examination according to the order of the capital sins, or better, capital vices, will scarcely furnish any further necessary matter for confession; and unless there is question of penitents diligently instructed, an examination of this kind is accustomed to produce no moderate confusion rather than utility, and to induce useless repetitions; for the capital vices scarcely ever introduce sins which do not bear before them a transgression of divine or human law.

Reply 2. With respect to the manner: 1. divine light is humbly to be sought; 2. an examination of conscience is to be made; 3. then the baseness of sins and the gravity of the divine offense are to be considered especially, and thus one must devote oneself to eliciting sorrow and a purpose of amendment.

510. ◦ QUESTION 3. What is to be done by the Confessor if penitents approach without having sufficiently examined their conscience?

Reply 1. If they are instructed, they can kindly be dismissed so that they may examine their conscience more accurately and return, at least if there is question of lengthy and involved confessions. The reason is that it is almost impossible for someone suddenly questioned to remember everything. - St. Lig., no. 471, and others commonly. Except, however, unless the circumstances counsel otherwise.

Reply 2. If they are uneducated or little instructed in spiritual matters, they are not readily to be dismissed so that they may examine their conscience, at least if they have employed some diligence. The reason is that the Confessor will easily supply for these persons. For by a few questions he himself will obtain more than they, left to themselves, would accomplish by a long examination, although they tried to recall all their sins to memory. Moreover, it is to be feared that perhaps, terrified by the difficulty, they will not return again to confess [7].

[7] Thus the Roman Catechism (De Poenit., no. 60): There are others who, either because they are accustomed to confess their sins rarely or because they have employed no care and thought into searching out their crimes, and when they have come to confession they know neither how to proceed nor sufficiently where the beginning of this duty is to be taken. These certainly must be rebuked more sharply, where the circumstances permit, and first of all taught that, before anyone approaches the priest, every effort must be made that he be moved by contrition for his sins; but that this can in no way be accomplished unless, by remembering them, he endeavors to recognize them individually. Wherefore, if the priest recognizes men of this kind as wholly unprepared, let him dismiss them from himself with most humane words, and exhort them to take some time for thinking about their sins and then to return. But if perhaps they affirm that they have devoted every effort to this matter, since the priest must greatly fear lest, once dismissed, they no longer return, they are to be heard, especially if they display some desire of amending their life and can be induced to accuse their negligence, which they promise to compensate for at another time by accurate meditation. And most worthy of attention are the things which immediately follow: In this, however, great caution must be employed. For if, after hearing the confession, he judges that neither diligence in enumerating sins nor sorrow in detesting them was wholly lacking in the penitent, he can be absolved; but if he notices that both are wanting in him, he shall be his adviser and counselor that he employ greater care, as was said before, in examining his conscience; and having treated the man as kindly as he can, he shall dismiss him.

Article III. On the Repetition of Confession

511. Principles. - I. Every confession of mortal sins which is certainly invalid must necessarily be repeated. For all mortal sins must of themselves be subjected to the keys.

II. But a valid confession, even if it lacks integrity, need not necessarily be repeated; only the defect must be supplied. The reason is that the sins already declared were directly remitted by virtue of absolution. Therefore, there remains only the obligation of subjecting to absolution the omitted sins, which had been remitted only indirectly and concomitantly. - Thus all. - St. Lig., nos. 502, 504.

III. The repetition of an invalid confession must be made in its entirety if the penitent approaches a new Confessor, because otherwise he can perform here the role neither of judge nor of physician; but it is otherwise if he confesses to the same Confessor who still remembers the preceding confession in some manner. For then it suffices if he accuses himself summarily of the sins already accused, for example: I accuse myself of the sins already declared in such a confession. For this is sufficient that the sins invalidly declared be accused sacramentally, nor is it necessary for the Confessor, in order to fulfill his office, to hear the confession again. - Thus commonly. - St. Liguori, no. 502; Elbel, no. 253; Lacroix, no. 1216; Lugo, disp. 16, no. 638; Billuart, diss. 7, art. 2; and others against certain authors who require an integral repetition of the confession.

IV. A confession need not necessarily be repeated unless its invalidity is morally certain. The reason is: 1. because when an act has certainly been placed, if a doubt arises whether it was rightly placed, that rule of law obtains: One must stand for the validity of the act; 2. because the obligation of the divine law concerning making confession has already probably been satisfied. - St. Lig., no. 505; Lacroix, no. 1221; Elbel, no. 263; Mazzotta, etc.

512. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Must an invalid confession be repeated in its entirety before the same Confessor if he remembers the sins accused only IN A CONFUSED MANNER, or has even entirely forgotten them?

Reply to the first. More probably, negative, even if the confession was invalid on the part of the penitent; a general repetition will suffice. The reason is that, for faults already accused, a general repetition joined with the knowledge previously possessed by the Confessor suffices for sacramental judgment, since the Confessor has already judged concerning each sin. - Thus commonly with St. Lig., no. 502.

Reply to the second. More probably, negative also, even if the Confessor in no way remembers that invalid confession; consequently it will suffice for the penitent to manifest his state so that the Confessor may have at least a confused knowledge of it. The reason follows from what has just been said. For if in the preceding case some confused memory of the state of the penitent suffices for the Confessor, it ought also to suffice in the present case, since the same reason applies in each. - St. Lig., ibid., and the others cited above, against others. Indeed, according to Suarez, it suffices that the Confessor remember that the penitent was disposed and accepted penance [1]. - Suarez, disp. 22, sect. 6; thus also Lugo, De Poenit., disp. 16, sect. 15, no. 636; V. Casus, no. 679.

[1] This last clause seems to pertain, rather than to the penitent who confessed invalidly, to him whose absolution had been deferred.

513. ○ QUESTION 2. Must a confession made with doubtful contrition be repeated?

Reply. Negative of itself; the reason is evident from what has been said. Nevertheless, in practice careful attention must be given to the condition of the penitent. For if the penitent is a man sufficiently prudent and grave in his ordinary actions or in his confessions, there is at least a probability, indeed also a legitimate presumption, of the validity of the confession; consequently he is not to be urged to repeat it. But if he is supposed to be a frivolous man and inconsiderate in most of his actions, counsel to repeat the confession must be given to him [2]. - Thus commonly. - Elbel, De Contritione, no. 74.

[2] The Author knowingly says counsel, from the general rule premised, namely, that there is no certain obligation of repeating the confession unless the invalidity of the preceding confession is morally certain.

 The VV. object here (p. 937, no. 116) those things which St. Alphonsus has in Homo Apostolicus (tract 15, no. 34), where the holy Doctor asks whether one who doubts whether or not he is in grace can receive Communion.

Reply. Those things do not pertain to the matter; for neither does the holy Doctor inquire there concerning a doubtful state of grace because of doubtful contrition, nor do those things which the holy Doctor has concerning this argument in bk. 6, nos. 432 and 475 require the confession necessarily to be repeated.

The things which the holy Doctor (bk. 6, no. 505) establishes thus as a general principle certainly pertain to the matter: Moreover, it must be carefully noted here that penitents are not to be compelled to repeat confessions unless it is morally certain that they were invalid, as Croix, Gobat, Holzmann, Mazzotta, and Elbel with Filliuccius and THE COMMON OPINION against Antoine rightly say.

And what the VV. (pp. 460-461) endeavor to object, that this common doctrine of St. Alphonsus and the Doctors has place where the doubt concerning the validity of the confession turns upon the ground of integrity, but not upon the ground of sufficient disposition, is exploded by St. Alphonsus himself, who in the same place discusses the use of this rule concerning recidivists. For the doubt concerning the validity of confession with regard to recidivists is derived not from doubtful integrity, but from doubtful disposition.

QUESTION 3. Are recidivists to be compelled to repeat preceding confessions?

Reply. Negative of itself. The reason is that a new fall is not of itself a certain argument that the recidivist previously lacked disposition. Sometimes, however, from the circumstances it can prudently be judged that some recidivist confessed invalidly [3]. - St. Lig., no. 505.

[3] Do you see the open way to exacting repetitions of confessions against the certain doctrine which had been established above in the fourth principle? From the context it is clearly inferred that the confession must be repeated if it is prudently judged that the recidivist confessed invalidly. But does a prudent judgment of this kind provide that moral certainty which was previously required for this in the fourth principle? The Author, in the first part of the reply, wished to depart from the doctrine which Louis Habert, the obstinate leader of the Jansenist faction (see the Note below at no. 633), inculcated with certain others, namely, that a confession is to be judged invalid when the penitent did not afterward produce worthy fruits of penitence; wherefore he required that these fruits precede absolution. But in the last part he thought that he was showing obedience to St. Alphonsus, in whom (loc. cit.) that passage of Habert is read. Yet this manner of tempering that opinion, while it does not avoid the inconveniences of the Jansenist principle, also overturns the principle placed fourth. Therefore, so that all things may cohere, let the mention of that prudent judgment be omitted, and let it be said that sometimes it can be sufficiently established that someone confessed invalidly; and it is manifest that this can occur both with a recidivist and with one who is not a recidivist.

 And in these things let the VV. also have their reply, who (p. 937, no. 117) object here with the same words of Habert related by St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 505).

514. ○ QUESTION 4. Must all the sins which were previously narrated to the Confessor merely historically, outside confession, be explicitly repeated?

Reply 1. Negative, if the Confessor still remembers them; for then it suffices if the penitent confesses them generally, saying: I accuse myself of all those things which I have already narrated to you. The reason is that through the summary confession those sins are sacramentally subjected to the Confessor as judge in relation to absolution; and the Confessor here and now judges sacramentally concerning all of them, since he remembers them.

Reply 2. Affirmative, if the Confessor does not clearly and distinctly remember all of them, even if he remembers them confusedly or in part. The reason is evident from what has been said [4]. - Thus St. Lig., no. 502, and others commonly [5].

[4] Indeed, from what was said above at no. 511, Principle III, the contrary seems to be proved. For it is there established that sins previously declared non-sacramentally are sufficiently declared sacramentally through a summary confession, even if the Confessor does not retain a distinct memory of those sins.

[5] On the contrary, Cardinal De Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 16, nos. 637-638) presents the opposite opinion as common. And to the reason by which St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 502, doubt 1, at the end) indicates himself to be moved, namely, that since the preceding confession was not made to a judge, it does not seem that account is to be taken of it, but a distinct sacramental confession is to be made anew, since the prior one was not sacramental, he replies: To the contrary, however, is the common authority and practice. For almost all the Doctors universally say that afterward that confused memory suffices, from whatever source the defect of the prior confession proceeded.... The same usage appears when someone outside confession narrated some sins to a priest who was his friend for the sake of seeking counsel, and afterward confesses to the same priest, accusing himself briefly of all those things which he had said outside confession. In this case also there is not now in the priest so exact and distinct a knowledge as there would be if the penitent now accused himself distinctly; and indeed that prior narration had in no way been sacramental, nor an accusation made to a judge, but a narration made to a friend. It must therefore be admitted that even a prior non-sacramental narration persisting in a memory not altogether distinct can in some manner be made sacramental by a subsequent accusation, so that it can serve for the sacrament. Not that the prior narration truly becomes a sacramental accusation, but insofar as the subsequent accusation, referred to the memory which the Confessor has of those sins previously heard distinctly, is sufficient knowledge of the kind desired in the Confessor. Thus Lugo from the common opinion, who then aptly resolves the doubts of those who think otherwise.

 Through ten columns (pp. 480-484) the VV. not only censure this brief Note, but at the same time undertake to attack Cardinal De Lugo, whom they moreover represent almost as a liar, or at least as carried away by empty fantasies. Let us dispatch the matter in a few words.

Therefore, as regards the present question and Lugo's opinion, they write thus (p. 483): The opinion which Lugo defends must be called common neither before nor afterward. Not before, because he first proposed it; not afterward, because no one, so far as we know, followed it except Aversa; and if perhaps others also did, they are certainly few. These words are referred to that which is transcribed from Lugo in the Note: The same usage appears when someone outside confession narrated to a priest who was his friend, etc.

Reply. Suarez (De Poenit., disp. 22, sect. 6, no. 5) has these things: If the repetition of Confession is made to the same priest who still retains a sufficient memory of the sins, it will not be necessary to state each individually, but to subject all in one word, supplying the defect. The reason is that, the prior narration being supposed, that one word is equivalent to a distinct confession, because it sufficiently makes all the sins present to the knowledge of the confessor. JUST AS, if the priest knows all the sins outside confession, they can be stated to him in confession by one word, namely, by accusing oneself of all those things which the other knows. AND IN THESE THINGS THE AUTHORS AGREE. But Suarez preceded Lugo; therefore, Lugo did not first propose this opinion. 2. Suarez adds that the Authors agree in these things; therefore Lugo said not falsely but most truly: The same usage, that is, common usage, holds, etc.

Likewise Aegidius Coninck (disp. 4, no. 45): A confession made without sufficient sorrow... avails for this, that the Confessor receives a perfect knowledge of the state of the penitent, so that afterward the latter can sufficiently confess all his sins in a few words by saying that he is sorry for the sins already narrated and desires to be absolved from them; and these words alone then have the true character of confession which is a part of the Sacrament. JUST AS, if someone had narrated all his sins for the sake of seeking counsel and afterward, sorrowing for them, wished to confess, it would suffice for him to say that he is sorry for the sins already stated and asks to be absolved from them. Moreover, Coninck also is earlier than Lugo.

That this doctrine was common also after Lugo, we have, for example, from Illsung (De Poenit., disp. 6, no. 152), who writes these things: In the second case, namely, when the Confessor has not so forgotten the sins that he does not retain at least a confused memory, the Doctors COMMONLY deny that anything by way of repetition must be done or exacted, and add that it suffices provided the penitent in general accuses himself of the sins stated before, if the prior confession was not a judicial accusation but, for example, ONLY A REQUEST FOR COUNSEL, or if it was made to one not having due jurisdiction; for then those sins over which jurisdiction was not given would likewise have to be repeated in general. THUS THE DOCTORS COMMONLY, whom Vasquez, Palao, Tanner, and Lugo report and follow; because through a generic repetition and approval of the specific confession, the prior distinct narration of sins is made judicial and sacramental. Therefore, others besides Aversa, and indeed not a few but most of the Doctors, handed down the same doctrine as Lugo.

We have the same from Dicastillo, who likewise appeals to the common opinion (tract 8, disp. 8, no. 120). Thus he: COMMON USAGE HAS, AND MOST OF THE DOCTORS ADMIT, that afterward that confused memory suffices, from whatever source the defect of the prior confession proceeded. And after bringing forward the example of one who had confessed to a priest not having jurisdiction, he adds: So also, if someone disclosed his sins to a priest who was a friend, not for the sake of confessing but of seeking counsel, and afterward, on that or another day, desires to be absolved from them, it suffices that he accuse himself briefly of those things which he had disclosed, even though knowledge or memory not wholly distinct still persists in the priest. Therefore, in these and similar cases that prior knowledge, as newly approved and referred by the penitent to sacramental confession, is judged in some manner sacramental.

And let these things, without bringing forward more, suffice to establish that this doctrine is not vainly called common in the Note, and that Cardinal De Lugo is censured gratuitously by the VV. as though he had called common that opinion which, otherwise, as the VV. say, he himself first proposed and scarcely any few followed.

The VV. insist (pp. 482-483) that what Lugo says is excessive, namely, that the Doctors almost universally teach that a confused recollection of sins suffices when the confession was invalid because of a defect of jurisdiction on the part of the Confessor, since not only Suarez but also Coninck and other grave Doctors defended the negative opinion.

I reply that this is not the case in which Suarez and the others deny that a confused recollection of sins suffices. Indeed, the words of Suarez brought forward above refer to such a confused recollection of sins, which he says suffices. But these embrace also the case of a confession made to a priest not having jurisdiction. Therefore.

Proof of the Major. For Suarez (ibid.) premises these things there: It remains that we explain how the confession of sins is to be repeated IN THESE CASES, namely, whether it is necessary to narrate them again distinctly and expressly, or to state in one word the defect of the prior confession and that he subjects again to the keys all those things which someone confessed badly. And we saw the answer above, that a distinct confession is required if it is made to another priest; it is not required if it is made to the same priest.

Proof of the Minor, namely, that among these cases is comprehended a confession made to a priest not having jurisdiction. For, enumerating these cases (ibid., no. 4), he says: The fifth heading is from a defect of jurisdiction in the minister. Therefore, this is not the case concerning which Suarez denies that a confused recollection suffices.

The case, therefore, in which Suarez denies that a confused recollection suffices is when, as he says (ibid., no. 6), the priest is the same but the sins HAVE ALREADY FALLEN FROM MEMORY. For after bringing forward three opinions of others, he explains his own thus (ibid., no. 7): But to me... it occurs that a different distinction is to be made. For either the confession was invalid by reason of itself, namely, because on its own part it had an essential defect either of sorrow or integrity, or of jurisdiction on the part of the Confessor; and then I judge that the confession must be repeated altogether and distinctly IF IT HAS FALLEN FROM MEMORY. The reason is that the prior confession was not matter of confession nor a true sacramental accusation;... but since it cannot be made with one confused word because of the reason given, it must necessarily be made distinctly. But what is that reason given on account of which the confession cannot be made with one confused word? Because, as he has in the preceding no. 6, the prior confession can effect nothing, since it remains neither in itself nor in memory; whence no word confusedly stated can then be equivalent to a distinct confession, because it is helped in no way by the preceding confession. Therefore, Suarez in the former case affirms that one confused word suffices because he supposes that at least some confused recollection of the sins remains in the memory of the Confessor; but he denies that it suffices in the latter case because he supposes that no knowledge or memory of the sins, not even confused, remains in the Confessor. Since, therefore, the hypothesis in Suarez differs from that in Lugo, there is no reason why one should be opposed to the other.

Nevertheless, it does not seem that it must be denied that the words of Suarez brought forward, by which he exacts a distinct confession, were accepted somewhat more broadly by Lugo, as though they have force even when the Confessor retains some memory of the sins; wherefore Lugo (loc. cit., no. 633) opposes the common practice both of the penitent who concealed a sin and soon returns and confesses his defect, and of the Confessor who, lacking jurisdiction over certain reserved sins, suspends absolution until the following day. For in neither case is a distinct confession imposed again.

But the VV. cannot rightly conclude therefrom that the doctrine of Suarez is in reality one thing and that of Lugo another. For in the hypothesis of a Confessor who retains no memory of the sins, Lugo agrees in the same judgment as Suarez. For he says thus (loc. cit., no. 641): Therefore, it does not suffice that the Confessor once had distinct knowledge of the sins if that past distinct knowledge afterward in no way directs, either mediately or immediately, toward forming the judgment; but distinct knowledge is required which directs the Confessor toward judging at least through a confused memory of itself. Therefore, if that past distinct knowledge in no way directs because the Confessor has now altogether forgotten and is directed only by the confused knowledge which the penitent now gives, it is of no service whatever that distinct knowledge preceded. Whence in that case... if that prior knowledge had not been given to a judge, because either he was not yet a priest or was not a legitimate judge, and nevertheless afterward he absolves with that confused knowledge which he receives anew, that absolution must be judged in the same way as that which is given to a dying person who does not confess his sins distinctly but gives similar confused knowledge, who certainly remains bound afterward to confess his sins distinctly. Thus it will be in that case, because the Confessor truly did not receive distinct knowledge from which he might exercise his office; and therefore, although he absolves validly, a distinct confession must afterward be repeated.

From these things it is sufficiently evident that the VV. vainly sought in Suarez, with Coninck or others, adversaries whom they might oppose to Lugo's doctrine.

Finally, the VV. censure (p. 483) that in the Note it is said that the reason by which St. Alphonsus indicates himself to have been moved to follow the opposite opinion after Croix is this: that since the preceding confession was not made to a judge, it does not seem that account is to be taken of it..., since that prior confession was not sacramental. And they add: But you will seek these words in vain in the holy Doctor.

Reply. In the Note it is said that this is the reason by which the holy Doctor seems to have been moved; but it is not said that these are the words of the holy Doctor. The words of the holy Doctor are these (loc. cit.): The reason is that no sacramental confession was then present. Moreover, since the holy Doctor had indicated a little before that confession is not sacramental from a twofold cause, either because it was sacrilegious or because it was made to one who was not a judge; but now this can be understood only in the second sense, because there is question of one who by a mere narration, for example, for the sake of seeking counsel, told his sins to the Confessor; plainly, in order that the reason of St. Alphonsus might be truly reported in the Note, the matter itself required that the reason also be indicated why that prior knowledge could not of itself be judged sacramental. Is not the genuine mind of the holy Doctor thus expressed? It is, namely, the reason which the holy Doctor borrowed from that unfortunate paragraph of Lacroix, just as he took from Croix himself that historical falsehood, as is manifest from what has been said, namely, that Lugo's opinion concerning this question is singular, into which Aversa almost alone went after Lugo; which the VV. also repeat.

QUESTION 5. Must a confession be repeated if the Confessor, before absolution, forgot the sins accused?

Reply. Negative, if the Confessor remembers, at least confusedly, the state of the penitent; for he absolves upon certain and sufficiently perceived matter, and moreover he judged sacramentally concerning the individual sins while they were being explained to him. Otherwise an intolerable burden would be imposed upon both the Confessor and the penitent. - St. Lig., no. 502.

515. ○ QUESTION 6. Is the penitent bound to unfold the whole confession again if he notices that the Confessor, because of sleep, did not perceive certain sins and he does not know which ones?

Reply. Affirmative, if the confession was brief, because he can prudently doubt concerning each sin whether it was understood by the Confessor or not. But it is otherwise if the confession was lengthy and only a few things seem not to have been perceived, because then he can prudently presume that each was understood; nor does it appear likely that Christ imposed the precept of integrity with so great a burden. Nevertheless, if the doubt concerned only one or another sin, it would have to be repeated. - St. Lig., no. 499.

516. Resolutions. - 1. A Confessor hearing the confession of a countryman who confessed badly in previous years will satisfy his office by questioning him only about the last year, if, because of the uniform manner of life, he can at the same time form a judgment concerning the preceding years. The same must be said if, having heard the confession of one year, the Confessor detects a defect in the preceding confessions and from this last confession has sufficient knowledge of the preceding sins; nevertheless, it is required that the penitent accuse himself in a general manner concerning the other years. - St. Lig., no. 504.

2. If someone confessed to a Priest lacking jurisdiction, he will be bound to repeat the confession if he afterward discovers the defect [6].

[6] Understand this if he confesses to another priest; for if the confession is to be made with the same priest who, for example, had previously been suspended from hearing confessions, the principles established above will have force.

3. If the Confessor did not recognize a grave sin as grave, or judged a mortal sin to be venial, there is not for that reason an obligation of repeating it, provided the penitent explained the fact rightly and faithfully; because for the validity of the Sacrament and the direct remission of the sin it is not necessary that the Confessor judge this to be mortal; indeed, he often cannot discern it. - St. Lig., no. 500, and others commonly.

4. A penitent who fears that he confessed invalidly for a long time is bound to repeat nothing, especially if he is of a timorous conscience [7] and has been accustomed to employ sufficient diligence [8] in confessions. The reason is that the presumption stands for the validity of the confessions. It is otherwise if there stands against the penitent a presumption so grave that it is equivalent to moral certainty.

[7] Whether the penitent is of a timorous or less timorous conscience, the rule of Principle IV must remain fixed, that no one is to be obliged to repeat confessions unless moral certainty concerning their invalidity is present. The foregoing distinction contributes in some manner to a judgment or to conjectures; but conjectures do not produce certainty.

[8] This sufficiency is not excluded by light negligence which does not exceed a venial fault, as was said above (no. 508, resolution 1).

Appendix II. On General Confession

A general confession is a repetition of several confessions. It can be a repetition of the confessions of one's whole life, or of some period, for example, of one year or of several years. Briefly, it must be said: 1. concerning the necessity or suitability of general confession; 2. concerning the method of making it.

I. On the Necessity or Suitability of General Confession

A general confession can be either necessary, or useful only, or useless, or even harmful. Hence the following rules must be established.

517. First Rule. A general confession is to be judged necessary whenever the preceding confessions were morally certain to have been invalid or sacrilegious, either on the part of the penitent because of a defect of contrition or integrity, or on the part of the Confessor lacking jurisdiction; but in other cases it can never be prescribed. The reason for each is evident from what was said above concerning the repetition of confession.

Second Rule. It can be counseled when, although the invalidity of the preceding confessions is not established, nevertheless a grave doubt concerning this can be had [1].

[1] The end of this counsel is not that eternal salvation be provided for, but that anxieties which are enemies of the peace of souls, diminish vigor in the exercise of good works, and especially bring troublesome distress at the point of death, may be removed.

Third Rule. A general confession, although not necessary, is to be permitted, or even prudently counseled, when, after the circumstances have been considered, the penitent will obtain notable spiritual fruit from it, for example, by reason of humility, devotion, fervor, knowledge of himself, manifestation of conscience for more perfect direction, or greater purity of soul, for obtaining divine helps more efficaciously, etc. [2]; because the Confessor ought, from charity, to promote the greater spiritual good of the penitent when he can easily do so.

[2] You have the principal fruits excellently expressed in the third meditation of the first week of the Exercises of St. Ignatius, namely: 1. that we may feel an intimate knowledge and detestation of our crimes; 2. that, recognizing and abhorring the perverse order of our past life, we may apply ourselves to our amendment; 3. that, having inspected the wickedness and frauds of our enemies, we may guard ourselves against them.

Fourth Rule. In other cases it is to be prohibited as useless, and even harmful, when other inconveniences besides a loss of time are prudently to be feared, namely, scruples, anxieties, disturbance of conscience, etc.; for if so great a burden for the Confessor and penitent is not to be undertaken without hope of notable fruit, much less is it to be undertaken with fear of notable harm.

518. Resolutions. - 1. A general confession is readily to be permitted, indeed counseled, at the principal epochs of the Christian life, namely, before first Communion, before the choice or assumption of a particular state of life, for example, before the Priesthood, religious Profession, or even before matrimony; likewise when someone resolves to lead a more perfect life.

2. Besides the confession made at the time of first Communion, generally speaking, another general confession of one's whole life is readily to be permitted; but a second would be conceded only with the greatest difficulty when the former was made sufficiently accurately, in good faith, and with good will, unless perhaps it was made at a youthful age, for example, before twenty years of age. Hence penitents who ask the Confessor for permission to make a general confession are to be asked for what cause they request it, whether they have already confessed generally at another time, from what time, and how often; and from the replies the Confessor will judge whether this confession is expedient or not.

3. A partial general confession, namely, of one year, or from the time of the last general confession, according to the custom observed among most religious families, is readily to be permitted to devout persons. Likewise, pious penitents can sometimes be permitted to repeat summarily, in a few words, the principal sins of their life; nevertheless, attend to the various circumstances of persons.

4. Above all, however, Confessors ought to beware lest they compel penitents too readily to a general confession; and those are greatly to be rebuked who exact this from all new penitents under the pretext of necessity, or by reason of direction, etc. [3].

[3] Confessors of this kind plainly show themselves destitute of judgment when they indiscriminately enjoin a general confession upon all who, by ill fortune, approach them; nor do they understand that the consciences of penitents are thereby sometimes most gravely disturbed, and that scandal is not rarely given to them, just as though Confessors, abusing the sacred ministry, were to exact without cause, with grave burden and trouble to penitents, a narration of their whole life in order to satisfy their own curiosity.

5. A general confession is not to be permitted even when there is doubt concerning the validity of preceding confessions, where notable inconveniences are to be feared from it by reason of scruples, disturbance of conscience, etc.; because grave and certain inconveniences are not to be undergone on account of a doubtful obligation.

6. A general confession is never to be permitted to the scrupulous or fearful; because if one is permitted, as soon as this is completed, they will wish to make another, and after the second they will also ask with importunate entreaties to undertake a third, with the greatest detriment to the soul, etc. For it is established by experience that a general confession generates many more scruples than it destroys.

II. On the Manner of Making a General Confession

A general confession can be made in many ways; but, generally speaking, it will be more expedient if it is made according to the following rules.

519. ○ First Rule. Before confession: the Confessor ought to endeavor to know explicitly the state of the penitent and the various circumstances from which he can be directed toward questioning prudently and fruitfully. Hence:

1. Let him examine whether there is question of a necessary confession or not; for if it is necessary, the penitent will have to be heard, questioned, and assisted with much greater diligence and care. But if it is not necessary, the penitent must be warned expressly: 1. that diligence of this kind is not required, indeed that he is free to withhold whatever sins he wishes; 2. that he ought not afterward to be anxious because through forgetfulness he omitted more or fewer of them [4].

[4] Unless the penitent has been firmly persuaded of these two things, it is better to omit the general confession, which certainly would produce no fruit and, on the contrary, would be a perpetual fountain of anxieties.

2. Let him inquire prudently concerning the condition of the penitent, his age, occupations or offices, and his family: namely, whether he still has parents, brothers, or sisters; and whether he lives with them or has lived with them for a long time, etc.

3. Let him ask from what time the penitent has confessed; whether he was absolved; whether here and now he is entangled in some evil habit or evil affection of mind; whether he has frequently approached the Sacraments; whether he confessed piously or sacrilegiously; whether he ever concealed sins; at what time; for how long; whether he afterward confessed them, or repeated the sacrilegious confessions.

These preliminary items of knowledge will be of very great service to the Confessor; he will press these questions more or less according to the character of the one confessing and the nature of the replies. Second Rule. As regards the order of confession: the accusation and questions in the confession itself ought to be made in a definite order, lest all things be mixed together, to the disturbance of the one confessing and with danger of a defect of integrity, etc. But the shorter and easier way is for the declaration of sins to be made according to the order of the commandments of God, of the Church, and of the special obligations of each one's proper state.

Third Rule. As regards the manner of confession: if the penitent is sufficiently instructed, let the Confessor kindly induce him to disclose his sins according to the aforesaid order, promising that he will assist him and, as often as there is need, question him so that all things may be rightly completed.

But if the penitent is uneducated, let the Confessor assume almost the whole burden of the confession himself; let him question him in order concerning all things that penitents of the same condition are accustomed to commit, and after each sin let him inquire from the penitent whether he knows of anything to be added. Before he begins the questions, however, let him carefully admonish the one confessing that he has nothing to fear concerning the difficulty of disclosing his sins: Be at peace and of good courage, he shall say, I shall make your confession; I assuredly know all the sins which you could have committed: I shall disclose all of them to you; your part alone will be to reply clearly and sincerely to my questions and to conceive true sorrow for your sins. - Thus Salvatori, Practical Instruction for New Confessors [5].

[5] There is indicated a wholly excellent little work whose title is: Practical Instruction for New Confessors... A Most Useful Little Work Also for Catechists of Uneducated People, Written by Father Filippo Maria Salvatori, S.J., etc. It was published at Rome about the beginning of this century and afterward reprinted several times, and finally again at Rome by the press of Monaldi in the year 1848. In this last edition, however, through the alteration of one little word, perhaps by a typographical error, a corruption crept in, and indeed in a sufficiently grave matter, plainly repugnant to the meaning of the Author. For where he had written concerning a sinner (Part 2, sec. 1, no. 6): If he is truly penitent and gives PRUDENT signs of this repentance of his, he must be absolved, etc., this new edition substituted (p. 143): If he is truly penitent and gives EVIDENT signs of this repentance of his, etc. This is plainly beside the point. For since evidence adds to certitude that force of light which, as it were, dazzles the eyes of the mind and compels assent, who, I ask, among the Doctors requires it as a prerequisite in order that he may think it lawful for himself to absolve the penitent? Indeed, what certitude, much less evidence, I ask, does the matter itself admit? And the mind of the Author, in this matter assuredly consonant with the most common opinion of all, was manifest from those things which are read a little afterward in the same edition (p. 150): I suppose here that the penitent has given you all the signs by which you can form a PRUDENT judgment that he speaks sincerely. In this case you fail in a duty of justice by deferring absolution for him, because the penitent, as soon as he gives you PRUDENT arguments of a true conversion of heart, has a strict right to be absolved. These things indeed suggest that this corruption of the text is in fact to be ascribed to the ignorance of the typesetters.

It is also to be lamented that this Roman edition was printed neither according to the third Roman edition of the year 1803, which had been enlarged by the Author himself with certain additions of grave importance, nor according to the Novarese edition of the year 1836, which reproduced that Roman edition and added a lucid confirmation from the Encyclical of Leo XII, dated January 8, 1826, but according to the Venetian edition of the year 1803, which lacks these additions; indeed, it even presents this Venetian edition mutilated, namely, with the testimonies of most grave men who commended the little work by their authority omitted. Most of all, however, the omission of the paragraphs which hold the fourth and fifth places in the second part is to be lamented, for they confirm the practice proposed by the Author through the doctrines and examples of the Saints, the unanimous consent of the graver Doctors, and the authority of the Roman Catechism. Therefore, it is to be desired that, if some new edition of this precious little work is to be prepared, which indeed the difficulty of finding any copy of it ought to recommend, it be reproduced not from some mutilated copy, but from an integral and perfect one.

Appendix III. Norm for a General Confession

to be conducted by questions

520. ○ First let the penitent state what he knows, unless he prefers to be questioned immediately. Before all else the penitent is to be asked whether he is joined in matrimony or not. Then:

I. Any sacrilegious confession? Did you ever not dare to say something? How often? Did you receive Holy Communion in such a state? At Easter time [1]? How often? Did you culpably fail to fulfill penance?

[1] Experience teaches that the guilt of this circumstance is commonly not noticed by the faithful, but is spontaneously disclosed by the penitent who notices it.

II. Concerning the theological virtues: Did you sometimes elicit an act of Faith, Hope, and Charity [2]? Do you know the principal mysteries necessary to be known, namely, that God exists and is the rewarder of good and evil; the mysteries of the Most Holy Trinity, the Incarnation, and the Death of Jesus Christ? Did you perhaps deny the faith? Did you doubt some truth of Religion, or deny it? Did you speak against Religion? Did you read, sell, or lend prohibited books?

[2] Dominic Viva (on Proposition 1 among those condemned by Alexander VII, no. 8) mentions as a most well-known thing that the faithful never accuse themselves of the transgression of precepts obliging to acts of the theological virtues, nor are they accustomed to be questioned about this by Confessors. And those words of John De Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 15, no. 55) pertain here: Concerning this sin of omission of the penitence due throughout the year, whether of itself from the precept of the virtue of penitence... or accidentally..., it is not necessary to question the penitent, nor even to admonish him in particular.... And this can be proved by the example of the precept of loving God, concerning which penitents are also not questioned in particular..., nor are they admonished concerning the obligation of fulfilling that precept at some time; both because from the very course of the confession it is sufficiently apparent how the penitent stands toward God, and because, on account of the variety of opinions, we cannot impose upon him a certain obligation.

Did you perhaps despair? Why? Let the Confessor inspire hope: because the good God, if He had wished to condemn you, would not have brought you here today.... Did you presume [3]? Did you neglect the precepts of God and the Church out of human respect [4]?

[3] This sin of presumption will occur very rarely in confessions. For it is not usually noticed if perhaps some presumption is present at some time.

[4] This circumstance of human respect adds nothing that pertains to sacramental confession, and can of itself be reduced to a certain fear.

Did you give scandal, evil counsels, or examples to your neighbor?

Did you seek occasions of sinning?

III. Concerning the commandments of God: First: superstition? divination? vain observance? magic? idolatry? a habit of never or scarcely ever praying [5]?

[5] Elsewhere (Vol. I, no. 260) it was observed that it can be determined with the greatest difficulty what the obligation of praying is and how great it is.

Second: an oath? a vow? blasphemy?

Third: working on Sunday or a feast day? omission of Mass or hearing it badly?

Fourth: disobedience toward parents, masters, or one's Pastor? murmurings? insults? blows? wishing death upon them?

Toward children, servants, or other subjects: education? instruction? care of their salvation, proximate occasions of sin? vigilance concerning duties of religion? scandal? anger?

Fifth: injuries inflicted upon one's neighbor in body or soul? hatred? desires of revenge? cursing? quarrels? blows? homicide? a duel? abortion? abuse of marriage? But questioning here and concerning the following commandment is to be done sparingly, cautiously, chastely.

Sixth and Ninth: thoughts? morose delectation? desires? what kind? with what kinds of persons? Words? Did you utter or willingly listen to immodest words, jokes, songs...? Works? with yourself? by touches? pollutions? by sight? with others? with unmarried persons? with married persons? with relatives? with persons bound by vow [6]? with persons of the same sex? Are you still here and now in a proximate occasion? Wives can be asked whether they were obedient to their husbands in all lawful things.

[6] Since this occurs rarely and, if perhaps it has occurred, the penitent spontaneously discloses it, while otherwise a question of this kind could perhaps produce astonishment and something in the nature of scandal, inquiry concerning this circumstance does not seem to be proposed.

Seventh and Tenth: damage? theft? fraud? wages owed to workers withheld, defrauded, or diminished? restitution? petty thefts?

Eighth: harmful lies? rash judgments [7]? detraction? calumny? reparation of reputation and of further damage perhaps inflicted.

[7] Judgments, or rather suspicions, often arise; but they very rarely reach grave fault, namely, because of inadvertence, because of the imperfection of the judgment, or even because the reasons for suspecting or judging are such that neither the suspicions nor the judgments can be called rash. See Vol. I, no. 465.

IV. Concerning the precepts of the Church: fasting? abstinence from meat on prohibited days? confession? Easter Communion?

V. Concerning the capital sins: drunkenness? pride? sloth? envy? anger? avarice?

VI. Concerning the duties of one's state: husband; wife; master; civil magistrate; advocate; merchant, as to weight and measure.

N.B. At the end let him ask whether anything else still keeps the penitent anxious.

Chapter III. On Satisfaction

We must treat: 1. of the imposition of penance; 2. of the fulfillment of penance.

Article I. On the Imposition of Penance

521. Principles. - I. The Confessor is bound to impose penance upon every penitent who can perform it. The reason is clear: 1. because satisfaction is an integral part of the Sacrament of Penance; but the Confessor, as minister of the Sacrament, is bound, insofar as lies in him, to procure its integrity, even accidental integrity; otherwise he would not be a faithful dispenser; 2. because the nature of judgment [1] and judicial power require some punishment of offenses. It is also established from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 8. - See St. Lig., no. 506; Homo Apostolicus, no. 47.

[1] This reason does not seem sufficiently firm, because a judgment is completed also by a sentence in which the judge decrees that punishment is not to be imposed. Just as in a human judgment the judgment does not remain imperfect from a defect of punishment when the accused is not judged worthy of punishment, so neither does this judgment and sacrament remain imperfect from a defect of punishment and satisfaction when the penitent is not judged worthy of punishment. Thus Lugo, where he weighs the force of the argument a priori (De Poenit., disp. 25, no. 52).

II. The Confessor is bound to enjoin both vindicatory and medicinal penances that are fitting and salutary, that is, in some manner proportioned to the number and gravity of the sins, and also to the strength and dispositions of the penitent. The reason is evident from the nature of the matter, since sacramental satisfaction is ordained to the vindication of sins, which are more or less grave and likewise more or fewer, and also to guarding against new faults. It is established from Trent, sess. 14, ch. 8, where it says thus: Therefore, the priests of the Lord ought, according as the spirit and prudence shall suggest, to enjoin salutary and fitting satisfactions according to the character of the crimes and the ability of the penitents; lest, if perhaps they connive at sins and deal too indulgently with penitents by enjoining certain very light works for very grave offenses, they be made participants in the sins of others. Let them have before their eyes, however, that the satisfaction which they impose be not only for the preservation of a new life and a medicine for infirmity, but also for the vindication and chastisement of past sins.

522. Questions. - QUESTION 1. How great is the obligation of imposing penance?

Reply 1. This obligation is grave of its kind. The reason is that the obligation concerns a grave matter, although one can sin only venially against it from smallness of matter. - Lugo, disp. 25, no. 49. Hence the Confessor can also sin gravely if, without an excusing cause, he were to impose the lightest penances for grave faults [2]. - Thus commonly. - St. Lig., no. 506.

[2] The second part of this reply pertains better to Question 3 below, where the measure of the satisfaction to be imposed is treated; for the present question, as is evident from Reply 2, turns generally upon the gravity of the obligation of enjoining some satisfaction.

From this obligation, says Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 25, no. 47), it is established that certain cases are excepted. The first is when the penitent is incapable, as when he is near death, especially if he already lacks his senses and cannot perceive the penance imposed.... The second case is when the Confessor understands from the confession and other circumstances that the penitent has made full satisfaction for the punishment due; and although it can rarely or never be established that this is so, Peter de Soto nevertheless adds that it suffices that he probably appear to have made satisfaction. The third case, similar to this, which others add, is when, apart from satisfaction, a remedy of perfect remission is imminent, for example, if martyrdom is imminent; others extend this to the gaining of a plenary Indulgence, at least one which is morally certain. The fourth case is when, on account of his frailty, it is believed that the penitent will accept no penance; for sometimes it will be necessary to condescend to his weakness in order to avoid graver evils; nevertheless, it will never happen that he will not accept some penance, at least a light one.

And in this sense, namely, concerning some light satisfaction, that which Scotus has (In IV Sent., dist. 15, q. 1, art. 3) is to be understood: If he is altogether unwilling to receive any penance imposed by the priest, but nevertheless says that he has displeasure concerning the sin committed and a firm purpose of not relapsing, he is to be absolved and is not to be rejected, lest he fall into despair; and the punishment which ought to be performed for the sins is to be announced to him, and he is to endeavor to fulfill it in himself or in an equivalent manner without its imposition; otherwise he will pay in full in purgatory.

Concerning this case Cardinal Cajetan says (Summa, s.v. Satisfaction): The third case in which the imposition of satisfaction can be omitted is the indisposition of the penitent, because he wishes to perform no penance here but offers himself to undergo it in purgatory. For such a one seems to be absolved and left to purgatory for making satisfaction, if the case is possible, because no one would refuse at least once to sign himself with the sign of the cross.

 The VV. (p. 938, note 1) have these things: St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 516) writes that Suarez and Bonacina, after the Council of Trent, call rash the opinion of Navarre and Cajetan, etc., who said that the penitent can refuse penance in order that he may satisfy for it in purgatory. Then they add: Hence it can seem wonderful that the distinguished Ballerini, in the note at no. 522, revives the same opinion anew.

Reply. Father Ballerini, as is evident to one reading the Note, revives no opinion; indeed, he contends to the contrary that Scotus and Cajetan are to be understood in that sense in which Cardinal De Lugo proposes the fourth case, namely, concerning him who, on account of his frailty, is believed to be willing to accept no penance, although in practice it never happens that he will not accept some penance, at least a light one.

And indeed, in the text cited, Cajetan says that the case is scarcely possible, because no one would refuse at least once to sign himself with the sign of the cross.

Nor does Navarre hold otherwise, who writes (Manual, ch. 26, no. 20): But I consider it altogether useless to dispute concerning the truth of this limitation, since there is no penitent so stony-hearted who confesses in good faith and is unwilling to accept even the smallest penance.

The same is read in Sporer, who indicates in addition that the mind of Scotus is no other. Provided (he says, part 3, ch. 3, no. 548) that he is willing to undergo some penance, even the lightest, for example, some Our Fathers and Hail Marys, a striking of the breast, etc. For one refusing a very light penance of this kind, especially for grave sins, would deservedly be judged not rightly disposed, nor seriously sorrowful for the sins committed, and therefore simply to be repelled from the benefit of absolution, as Scotus also notes in IV Sent., dist. 19, at the question proposed.

Reply 2. As regards venial sins, there is controversy. Some affirm that the obligation is grave, because the injunction of satisfaction pertains to the rite of this sacrament; and since this rite was instituted by Christ, it is to be regarded as a grave matter. But others say that it is light, because a grave obligation of enjoining penance for light faults alone cannot be proved, since no grave disorder appears in this. Each opinion is probable, as St. Lig. says, Homo Apostolicus, no. 47 [3].

[3] Since some excepted from this obligation the occasion of a Jubilee, or even of any plenary indulgence, as though this exempted one from the obligation of rendering satisfaction, Benedict XIV (Const. Inter praeteritas, sec. 65) judged that these things should be admonished: Only one thing remained, that we should speak concerning the imposition of penance which is not to be omitted by the Confessor, since the penitent who had gained an indulgence was said not to be bound to fulfill it. But since a reason of this kind seemed too lax to us, in the Instruction mentioned at no. XXVI we declared our mind, establishing that a salutary penance is to be enjoined by the Confessor upon the penitent, even if the latter is prepared to receive the jubilee, from which assuredly arises the obligation of the penitent to fulfill it.

523. ○ QUESTION 2. When is penance to be imposed?

Reply. Generally speaking, it is to be imposed before absolution. The reason is that the order of judgment is thus preserved, which requires that the accused promise satisfaction before he is absolved. But if the Confessor through forgetfulness did not enjoin penance before absolution, he ought to impose it after absolution. Nevertheless, it is not grave to impose penance after absolution; indeed, it is probably free from every fault if it is presumed that the penitent will accept the work enjoined upon him [4]. - St. Lig., no. 514; the Salmanticenses, etc.

[4] It matters nothing whether it is imposed before or after absolution; the preparation of the penitent for it suffices. Cajetan (Summa, s.v. Satisfaction).

QUESTION 3. How much penance is to be imposed upon sinners?

Reply. The quantity of penance cannot be determined universally, but is left to the prudence and judgment of the Confessor. Nevertheless, regularly and of itself, he ought to impose a grave penance for mortal sins. Thus from the Council of Trent, as above, no. 524. - St. Lig., no. 508.

524. ○ QUESTION 4. What penance is of itself considered grave for one or another mortal sin?

Reply. A penance is to be considered grave, at least from the present practice of the Church, which corresponds to a work that is enjoined under grave obligation by the Church, or which would of itself oblige under grave obligation if it were commanded.

Hence a grave penance, and one sufficient for an ordinary grave sin, will be to hear Mass, to fast, to recite the Rosary, even of only five decades, the Little Office of the Blessed Virgin, the Litany of the Saints, and other similar things [5]; but a penance would not be considered grave if only the Psalm Miserere were imposed. - St. Lig., no. 545.

[5] What the Author asserts, that hearing Mass, reciting the Rosary, etc., suffices for one or another grave sin, is not to be understood such that Rosaries, etc., ought to be multiplied in arithmetical proportion to the number of grave sins.

QUESTION 5. For what cause can a lighter penance be imposed?

Reply 1. If the penitent is very weak and infirm in body; concerning which matter the Roman Ritual says thus: Let the Priest remember that a grave and laborious penance is not to be enjoined upon the sick, but only that is to be prescribed which they may perform at an opportune time if they recover. But if the sick person is placed in danger of death, he can then be absolved without any penance, although it is always expedient to impose some penance upon him. Homo Apostolicus, no. 49. 2. If there is a prudent fear that he will not fulfill a greater penance, or that because of a graver penance he will be turned away from confession [6]. 3. If probably a greater penance would be more harmful to him than profitable. 4. If the penitent appears very contrite. 5. If there is a time for gaining a plenary indulgence, especially a Jubilee. - St. Lig., no. 508.

[6] The constant experience of all times has plainly brought it about that Doctors of every age and school agree in this opinion with marvelous concord; even Antoine himself, who otherwise is deservedly numbered, as St. Alphonsus says (bk. 6, no. 509), among the more rigorous writers, yielded to it.

To the point, St. Thomas says (Supplement, q. 18, art. 4, corpus): Just as medicines determined in the medical art are not suited to all, but are to be varied according to the judgment of the physician, who follows not his own will but the science of medicine, so satisfactions as punishments... are suited to all, but are to be varied according to the judgment of the priest regulated by divine instinct. Therefore, just as a physician sometimes prudently does not give an efficacious medicine which would suffice for curing the disease, lest a greater danger arise on account of the weakness of nature, so a priest moved by divine instinct does not always enjoin the whole punishment which is due to the sin, lest some weak person despair because of its magnitude and wholly withdraw from penance. The holy Doctor illustrates these thoughts by another example (Quodlibet 3, q. 13, art. 28): Moreover, it seems sufficiently fitting that the priest not burden the penitent with a grave weight of satisfaction; because just as a small fire is easily extinguished by much wood placed upon it, so it could happen that a small affection of contrition recently aroused in the penitent would be extinguished because of the grave burden of satisfaction, with the sinner falling into utter despair. The disciple of St. Thomas, Cardinal Cajetan, expressed these things more briefly thus (Summa, s.v. Satisfaction): But to penitents who are weakly disposed, let a small satisfaction be given according to the weakness of their soul, and let the small fire be nourished by straw placed upon it and not suffocated by great pieces of wood placed above it. But St. John Chrysostom had preceded him (On 2 Corinthians, hom. 44): For just as, if you place upon the shoulders of a youth a bundle which he cannot carry, it is necessary that he either cast away the bundle or be crushed under the weight, so also for a man upon whom you impose a grave weight of penance, it is necessary either that he reject his penance or, undertaking it when he cannot bear it, be scandalized and sin still more.

You may see many other things in St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), who also reports this notable saying from Gerson: It is safer, with a small penance which is willingly undertaken and will probably be fulfilled, to lead those who have confessed to purgatory than, by commanding a great one which will not be fulfilled, to cast them headlong into hell. St. Alphonsus adduces two parallel sayings from St. Antoninus (ibid.): If the priest cannot rejoice in his complete purification, let him at least rejoice that he sends him, freed from hell, to purgatory. Therefore, as Hostiensis says, the Confessor ought in no way to permit a despairing sinner to depart from him, but rather let him impose upon him one Our Father and another light thing, although he speaks of one who has committed great sins, and let the other good things which he shall have done, and the evils which he shall have endured, be for him as penance.... Yet understand this sanely, namely, that if he is otherwise penitent and says that he is prepared to do what he ought, but says that he cannot bear the burden of penance, then, on account of this, however much he has sinned, he ought not to be dismissed without absolution, lest he despair.

St. Thomas suggests another expedient (Quodlibet 3, art. 18), namely, that the strength and spirit of the penitent be explored: Just as the priest can enjoin satisfaction upon the penitent according to the judgment of another, so also according to the judgment of the penitent himself; as if you say: do this if you can, and if you cannot, do this. And it seems similar when the priest says: Whatever good you shall have done, let it be for you unto the remission of sins. And here pertains the admonition of St. Charles Borromeo in his Instruction to Confessors, cited by St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.): Let him impose such a penance as he judges can be performed by the penitent. Therefore, sometimes, if he shall see that it is expedient, let him ask him whether he can perform, or doubts that he can perform, the penance enjoined upon him; otherwise he shall change or lessen it. And in this manner, as St. Alphonsus (ibid.) observes, what is suggested in the Roman Ritual will be observed, namely, that in these matters account also be taken of the dispositions of penitents: Let the Confessor, says the Ritual, enjoin a salutary and fitting satisfaction, according as the spirit and prudence shall suggest, account being taken of the state, condition, sex, and dispositions of the penitents. What satisfaction is understood here as salutary and fitting is explained thus by Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 25, no. 60): It ought to be salutary and fitting; that is, in the first place attention must be given to the spiritual utility of the penitent, lest snares be cast before him so that he commit new sins. From this heading especially the present practice, in which light penances are imposed for the gravest sins, can be excused; for this is often done on account of the spiritual infirmity of penitents, who would be scandalized by graver penances and either flee confession or certainly approach unskilled confessors who do not know how to cure them.

525. ○ QUESTION 6. Can a penance be imposed under the condition of relapse?

Reply. Affirmative; but it is expedient that, in addition, some other satisfaction be imposed for the sins committed [7]. - St. Lig., no. 524.

[7] A penance imposed under the condition of relapse, if it alone is enjoined, becomes a disjunctive penance; namely, it is enjoined that the penitent either, in place of penance, employ an effort by which he resists the temptation, or otherwise pay a certain punishment. On this argument see Diana (vol. 1, tract 6, resol. 19), who adduces Sanchez denying that penitents are bound to accept it, Suarez affirming the contrary, and finally others saying that the Confessor cannot oblige him to it, but that the penitent is bound to fulfill it if he accepts it.

QUESTION 7. Can a public penance be imposed?

Reply. Negative, if there is question of hidden sins. - Thus the Roman Ritual. But it is otherwise for public sins. Nevertheless, if public penance is not so necessary, the Confessor ought not to impose it upon one refusing it, since his salvation can otherwise be obtained and the scandal repaired [8]. - St. Lig., no. 512.

[8] Certainly there is no discussion here of the satisfaction which the ancient discipline of the Church exacted from the faithful on account of certain crimes; for that custom has become obsolete in the Church, nor did its imposition pertain to the minister of sacramental confession. Therefore, there remains the case of some enormous scandal which ought to be repaired; and some adduce the example of a man who ought publicly to restore the honor which he publicly injured. Nevertheless, this example seems less pertinent to the matter, because if perhaps the penitent is bound to this by the natural law itself, it will not be free for the Confessor to enjoin or not enjoin it upon him. But the same must be said whenever a scandal given requires public reparation; for the penitent will be bound to this even if it is not enjoined by the Confessor as sacramental satisfaction. Besides, public scandals of this kind can generally be repaired otherwise, for example, if someone publicly approaches the Sacraments, devoutly visits churches, hears Mass, enrolls in a pious confraternity, etc. And if public reparation of this kind is not necessary, the Doctors, according to the testimony of St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 512), commonly agree that it is not to be imposed upon one who resists.

QUESTION 8. Can a work otherwise owed be imposed as penance?

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is that, since that work is satisfactory, it can well be elevated through the keys to the merit of sacramental satisfaction. - St. Lig., no. 513, and others commonly [9].

[9] The common doctrine holds that, through the imposition of a work otherwise commanded, that part can be supplied which cannot be hoped for from other works because of the frailty of the penitent. But it is readily evident that, by parity of reason, this holds for those whose condition and circumstances scarcely permit fitting satisfaction to be rendered either through fasting, alms, or prayers, however much they may be of good will; for charity can counsel the Confessor to furnish them this means suited to paying punishments in this life. Moreover, even if a sufficiently fitting satisfaction has been imposed upon the penitent, nothing prevents the Confessor, especially where the penitent signifies that he desires it, from adding this aid for making more abundant satisfaction.

526. Resolutions. - 1. Perpetual penances are never to be imposed, both because they are accustomed to induce danger of forgetfulness or excessive anxiety and because, if such penances are imposed upon the same penitent by various Confessors, he will be bound by innumerable bonds at once and for his whole life. Indeed, ordinarily not even penances for a long time, for example, for a year or for five months, are to be imposed. - St. Lig., Homo Apostolicus, no. 52; Lacroix, etc.

2. Those satisfactions which can expose the penitent to the mockery of others are never to be imposed, for example, that he recite five Our Fathers in the middle of the church with arms extended, etc. Much less are penances to be imposed which cannot be fulfilled without a revelation of the confession easily following.

3. Nor are fasts to be imposed upon children, countrymen, or workmen wearied by continual labor; nor upon sons and daughters of a household who, by fasting, would cause astonishment to their parents or even offend them. Nor are pilgrimages, prolonged prayers, or generally alms to be enjoined upon women placed under the authority of a husband, just as neither upon the poor who procure their livelihood by continual labor.

4. Penances involving many diverse works are not to be imposed, because they could not be retained in memory; nor, at least ordinarily, are penances too repugnant to nature, for example, to make the sign of the cross with the tongue upon the ground, to visit enemies, etc. It is also generally imposed imprudently [10] upon children that they ask pardon of parents, or of others, for disobedience, irreverence, or petty thefts; because these penances often render confession odious and are very often omitted, etc.

[10] The fruit of this imprudence will not rarely be found to have been this: that children, not daring either to ask a change of penance from the Confessor or to ask pardon from parents or others, and much less afterward daring to confess the sin of omitted penance, began a series of sacrilegious confessions and prolonged it for many years with sacrilegious Communion added.

Article II. On the Fulfillment of Penance

527. Principles. - I. The penitent is bound to accept and fulfill a reasonable penance sacramentally enjoined; because, from what has been said, the Confessor is bound to impose a penance, and indeed one proportioned in some manner to the sins. But if a penance ought to be imposed and accepted, by that very fact it must also be fulfilled by reason of the obedience owed to the Confessor. It is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 8. - St. Lig., no. 516; Homo Apostolicus, no. 55.

II. The penitent is bound under grave obligation to fulfill a grave penance imposed for grave sins, because grave matter of itself obliges under grave obligation. - Thus all. More probably, however, he is bound only under light obligation to a light penance imposed for light faults, because light matter is not capable of a grave obligation. - Thus more commonly with St. Lig., no. 517, against certain authors.

III. The penitent ought to fulfill the penance at the time designated by the Confessor, or as soon as he conveniently can; and if the penance obliges under grave obligation, he will sin gravely if through grave negligence he defers it for a long time [1]. The reason is that it is of itself grave to defer a notable debt for a long time. Whenever the penance was not fulfilled at the appointed time, the burden of performing it always remains, because the time is intended only accessorily. - St. Lig., no. 525.

[1] See what is to be said below, no. 530, Question 6.

528. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does a penance which is indeed grave in itself, but imposed for venial sins alone, oblige under grave obligation?

Reply. More probably, negative. The reason is that then satisfaction, insofar as it is grave, is not necessary. Hence, just as the Confessor was not bound, indeed was not able, to command it under grave obligation, so neither is the penitent bound to fulfill it under grave obligation. - St. Lig., no. 517 [2].

[2]  The VV. (p. 397, no. 118), as though by way of supplement to this reply of Gury, adduce those things which St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 517) reports and approves from Roncaglia, namely, that if those venial sins should accidentally dispose the penitent greatly toward mortal sin, the Confessor could then impose a grave penance upon him in order to remove him from the danger of sinning mortally; and then the penitent, if he wishes to be absolved, will be bound to accept and fulfill it.

But Suarez had written much better and more accurately concerning a case of this kind thus (De Poenit., disp. 38, sect. 7, no. 7): If, for the sake of cure and medicine, the Confessor judges this expedient, he will be able to do it, and the penitent will be bound to obey; because then there is question rather of a fitting disposition for the remission of sins than of satisfaction for temporal punishment. Hence that precept laid down by the Confessor is not so much a new imposition as a declaration of some obligation which the penitent has of himself, so that there can be moral certainty concerning his disposition and purpose of avoiding sins; and at most the priest then seems to determine the manner or means. In this, if there are several sufficient means, he can accommodate himself to the will of the penitent, so that he may choose the medicine; because this suffices FOR HIS CURE, FOR WHICH ALONE the priest has right and power in that act, as was declared. Wherefore, that which St. Alphonsus adds to Roncaglia's opinion, namely, that the penitent, if he wishes to be absolved, will be bound to accept and fulfill that grave satisfaction, must indeed be maintained if this is the sole means of cure; otherwise, if several sufficient means are at hand, because, as Suarez says, the priest has right and power for the cure alone. This observation occurs all the more opportunely because St. Alphonsus also rejects the doctrine of Roncaglia, who (On the Sacrament of Penance, q. 4, ch. 2, reply 2) deduces the power of imposing a grave penance for venial sins generally from another false principle.

QUESTION 2. Can the Confessor impose for grave faults a penance which is indeed GRAVE, but obliges LIGHTLY?

Reply. Affirmative, because any legislator can command grave matter under a light obligation; nevertheless, this is generally not expedient. - Suarez with the common opinion, cited by St. Lig., no. 518 [3].

[3] St. Alphonsus would prefer that at least something be enjoined under grave obligation, with which something else, even graver, could then be imposed under light obligation. But he himself does not deny that the opposite opinion is the more common; and from this very fact it is argued that the argument which he attempts to elicit from the Council of Trent for his opinion is less firm.

QUESTION 3. Is the penitent bound UNDER GRAVE OBLIGATION to fulfill the CIRCUMSTANCES added to the penance, for example, to pray ON BENDED KNEES, etc.?

Reply. The solution depends upon the greater or lesser affliction of the flesh which the circumstance brings, either of itself or in relation to the penitent. - St. Lig., no. 517. This can also depend upon the intention of the Confessor, which either he himself has expressly manifested or the penitent can presume [4].

[4] A rule of this kind, which reserves to the penitent the office of presuming, etc., is perhaps too difficult, because most are incapable of judging concerning these things.

529. ○ QUESTION 4. Does one satisfy who fulfills penance while in mortal sin?

Reply. Affirmative, with the common opinion. The reason is that, for satisfying the precept, it suffices to place the work of satisfaction enjoined, even though the end of the precept is not obtained. - St. Lig., no. 522.

QUESTION 5. Does one sin who fulfills penance while in mortal sin?

Reply 1. It is certain that he does not sin gravely. - Thus commonly the Theologians.

Reply 2. According to some, he sins venially. The reason is that one who voluntarily places an obstacle to an effect, even a partial effect, of the Sacrament does not seem capable of being excused from some fault. Nevertheless, several grave Theologians probably hold with Lugo that he is exempt from every fault, because there is no fault in placing an obstacle solely to the remission of punishments [5]. - St. Lig., no. 523.

[5] This ought to hold especially when the penance must be prolonged over several days. For who would say that the penitent is bound to recover grace in order that he may fulfill the penance? Otherwise, as the Salmanticenses note (De Poenit., ch. 10, no. 70), the penitent would sin both by fulfilling the penance and by not fulfilling it: by fulfilling it, indeed, because he fulfills it in the state of sin; by not fulfilling it, because he would omit it. And this second opinion is indeed all the more probable in the opinion of those who say that the effect of satisfaction is obtained in the case when the obstacle is afterward removed.

 Here also, as often elsewhere, the VV. (p. 938, note 2) observe that in earlier editions of Father Gury it read: more probably he sins venially.

Reply. Gury seems previously to have followed St. Alphonsus, who says (bk. 6, no. 523): Others more probably hold that he sins venially. Afterward, however, he altered the opinion somewhat, perhaps moved by the reasons of the Salmanticenses, who add to the reason adduced here in the Note: Indeed, it would have to be said that one existing in mortal sin who has not yet fulfilled penance is bound first to justify himself and afterward to fulfill the penance; all of which things do not seem to have been received into common usage. But did not St. Alphonsus also alter his opinion somewhat here? For in the edition of the year 1748 (bk. 6, tract 4, doubt IV, art. 1, note E) he has merely these things: Indeed, the Salmanticenses, Lugo, and Dicastillo probably teach that it is not even venial to fulfill penance in mortal sin.

Besides, since the VV. consider it worthwhile to mention wherever Father Gury in preceding Editions preferred another opinion, as being one which pleases the VV. more, let them not therefore take it badly that others do the very same with St. Alphonsus and prefer the earlier, unchanged opinion of the same Doctor to his opinion afterward changed, as being one which they judge more plausible.

530. ○ QUESTION 6. What delay of penance is a grave fault?

Reply 1. If the penance was light, a delay, however great it may be, will never be grave, since from what has been said the omission of the penance itself more probably does not exceed a light fault.

Reply 2. If the penance is grave and imposed for grave sins, a delay of two or three months is more probably to be regarded as grave when it is medicinal or there is danger of forgetfulness. Besides, no general rule concerning this can be established [6]. - St. Lig., no. 524.

[6] No one doubts that penitents are to be counseled to fulfill satisfaction as soon as they conveniently can. But if it is asked when delay incurs guilt, especially grave guilt, it can scarcely be believed how much the Doctors disagree among themselves, so that you have as many diverse opinions as you have intermediate periods of time between eight days and a year, and indeed in such a manner that, while eight days are established by some as a limit beyond which delay can already be condemned as grave guilt (see St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, no. 521), others judge a delay of a whole year free from fault (see Diana, vol. 1, tract 6, resols. 44 and 45, coordinated ed.). Nor does the distinction of a medicinal penance press greatly. For if you suppose that the infirmity is cured by other remedies, the obligation which the medicinal character would infer ceases.

Whence, then, so great a variety of opinions? Assuredly from the fact that some solid reason for concluding anything more certain is altogether lacking. But this is most certain according to the opinion of all: nothing is to be condemned as mortal unless a manifest and evident reason advises it. Therefore, whatever may be said concerning eight days, fifteen days, a month, two months, etc., pertains to private opinions which wholly lack the force of impressing upon the conscience that there is grave sin.

 And let the VV. also bear this with an equitable mind, who (p. 938, no. 121) oppose the opinions of St. Alphonsus also to this passage of the Author. For whatever probability they may finally please to attribute to these opinions, this obedience above all must be rendered religiously to the holy Doctor: that we also most religiously preserve, both in words and deeds, the rules which he establishes with all the Doctors, and which we have more than once recalled elsewhere, concerning the assertion of the gravity of a sin.

And as regards delay, even when the Confessor has prescribed a time, behold the Salmanticenses, cited by St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), condemning of mortal sin one who defers an enjoined Communion for four days; against whom St. Alphonsus places the more common opinion, which considers a delay of six or eight days light. But others will perhaps reply that it is not to be presumed that the Confessor wished to entangle the penitent in these snares, so that for any delay whatever he might become guilty of mortal fault; nor would the Confessor act otherwise than imprudently if, recognizing from the character of the penitent that negligence of this kind would probably occur, he imposed these bonds under grave obligation. For, from those things which were said above in the note at nos. 522 and 523, injunctions of this kind would have to be called not salutary, but deadly. For otherwise, what sort of disposition, I ask, would there be in men who know not how to prescribe medicines unless they destine to eternal despair in hell the miserable sick man who perhaps does not observe the commands to the letter?

QUESTION 7. If the penitent has forgotten the penance enjoined, is he bound to repeat the confession in order to receive another penance?

Reply. More probably, negative. The reason is that fulfillment of the penance once enjoined has been rendered impossible through forgetfulness, even culpable forgetfulness. But no one is bound to the impossible. - Thus St. Lig., no. 520, and others commonly.

If, however, the penitent prudently presumes that the Confessor still remembers the penance enjoined, he ought, if he conveniently can, to approach him so that he may learn again from him what that penance is.

531. ○ QUESTION 8. Who can commute a penance?

Reply 1. It can never be commuted by the penitent himself, not even into something better, although a vow can be changed by the one vowing it into a manifestly better work. The reason is that a penance cannot be elevated to the merit of sacramental satisfaction unless it was imposed by the Minister himself of the Sacrament of Penance.

Reply 2. It can be commuted: 1. by the Confessor who imposed it, because a legislator can change his own law; 2. by any other Confessor, because any other Confessor can be judge of the same cause if the penitent submits himself to his tribunal; for a successor in the same authority can do whatever his predecessor could.

Nevertheless, it seems that an exception must be made if the penance was imposed by the Superior himself for reserved cases, because an inferior cannot change the sentence of a Superior, unless, however, a grave cause is present or the consent of the Superior can readily be presumed. - St. Lig., nos. 528 and 529.

For a commutation to be made licitly, however, a just cause is required, such as: 1. if the penance seems difficult; 2. if it is foreseen that the penitent will not fulfill it because of repugnance, frailty, forgetfulness, etc. - St. Lig., no. 528.

532. ○ QUESTION 9. Is the penitent bound to repeat the confession in order to obtain a commutation of penance?

Reply 1. If he approaches the same Confessor, it will not be necessary to repeat it when the Confessor remembers, even in some confused manner, the state of conscience of the penitent [7].

[7] In the present case this recollection is required altogether without cause. For even if no memory of the state of the penitent is retained, it is nevertheless apparent what can fittingly be substituted for the burden which had otherwise been judged fitting for the state of the penitent. Therefore, a fitting satisfaction can be enjoined even without that recollection.

Reply 2. If he approaches another Confessor, or even the same one who no longer remembers the sins, it suffices that he confess summarily, so that the Confessor may acquire a confused knowledge of his state [8]. - Thus St. Lig., no. 529, and others commonly against certain authors.

[8] No one doubts that a summary Confession suffices; but it is not necessary if the same Confessor is approached. But if another is approached, you have from Reply 3 below what is to be established.

Reply 3. More probably, this summary confession is required if the Confessor does not know, at least in a confused manner, the state of the penitent. The reason is that the Confessor cannot commute the penance except in sacramental judgment; but he cannot exercise this judgment unless the penitent discloses to him the state of his conscience. - Lacroix, Elbel, etc.

Nevertheless, St. Lig. with others probably denies this, because there is not question of rendering judgment concerning faults remitted in the preceding confession, where judgment concerning them has already been formed, but only of commuting the penance. For this, however, knowledge of the former penance and awareness of the frailty or difficulty in fulfilling it suffices, so that a new penance in some manner equivalent may be imposed [9].

[9] If the commutation ought to be made because of the infirmity or frailty of the penitent, you will not easily attain it through the substitution of an equivalent.

533. ○ QUESTION 10. Can the Confessor commute a penance outside confession?

Reply 1. Negative, if the Confessor is a different one. The reason is that the Confessor has no power except in sacramental judgment.

Reply 2. If the Confessor is the one who imposed the penance, he can change it immediately after absolution, before the penitent departs; but not afterward, at least more probably. The reason is that for this it is required and suffices that the preceding judgment of the Confessor morally persevere, which does not seem to have place if the penitent approaches the Confessor outside the tribunal of Penance. Therefore, etc. - Thus St. Lig., no. 529, where he says that this is the truer and more common opinion with Suarez, the Salmanticenses, etc. But others say that the commutation of penance can be made by the same Confessor outside confession within the space of one day [10], because it then still seems to be morally united with the preceding sacramental judgment. For just as a longer interval does not prevent either sorrow, confession, or even the fulfillment of satisfaction from being morally united with absolution, so also can judgment be made concerning the change of penance. - Lugo, disp., no. 112; Voit, no. 632.

[10] Cardinal De Lugo, whose opinion is explained here, nowhere restricted the matter to the space of one day. And if this commutation can indeed be as distant from confession as sorrow from confession, confession from absolution, or finally satisfaction from absolution, it readily appears that this measure of one day is inserted here beside the point.

534. Resolutions. - 1. The penitent is not bound to fulfill the penance when the confession was invalid, because the sacramental sentence of the judge was null, and consequently there is no Sacrament whose integrity must be completed; otherwise satisfaction would have to be made twice for the same sins. For the same reason, the same is to be said of a penance imposed without absolution. - Collet, Reuter, and others commonly. Except: 1. if the penance is medicinal, and therefore necessary by reason of medicine [11]; 2. if the penitent approaches several times to complete the same confession, and meanwhile the Confessor, as is often customary, imposes some penance on each occasion, so that a lesser penance may remain to be imposed at the end.

[11] In this hypothesis the work enjoined will be necessary, not because it was enjoined by the Confessor, but because it was imposed by the natural law. For this, however, it is further required that the work be the sole means by which someone can avoid sin.

2. Not only does one who omits the penance sin gravely, but also one who omits a part of it notable in relation to the entire penance, or even a part which would be grave considered in itself.

3. Universally, in judging the gravity of an omission, attention must be given to whether the matter or circumstance omitted contributes much or little to the end of the precept, whether the substance of the precept has been fulfilled, etc. Thus one fulfills the substance of the precept and sins only venially if, standing or in his room, he recites the Rosary which, by command of the Confessor, ought to have been recited on bended knees or before an image of the Blessed Virgin. But it is otherwise if the penitent was commanded, for example, to pray with arms extended; for this is a notable mortification, the omission of which can be regarded as grave.

4. Prayers imposed as penance can be recited even while someone is meanwhile hearing a Mass of precept, unless, however, something else was established by the Confessor. - St. Lig., no. 525, against a few. They could also be recited alternately with companions when, from the usage of the Church or the practice of the faithful, the prayers are customarily recited as in choir, for example, the Rosary, etc.

5. The penitent cannot make satisfaction through another, unless, however, this is done with the consent of the Confessor; because satisfaction is, as it were, the matter of this sacrament and an integral part [12]. Therefore, satisfaction must necessarily be placed by the penitent himself. This is also established from proposition 15 condemned by Alexander VII, which is of this kind: A penitent can by his own authority substitute another for himself who may fulfill the penance in his place.

[12] If this is done with the consent of the Confessor, you have the work enjoined, or satisfaction, and therefore the integral part of the sacrament, in the care by which the penitent moves another to perform something. But the condemned proposition which is appended in the text strikes him who by his own authority, and not him who with the Confessor as author, substitutes another for himself.

6. If the Confessor has imposed as penance that two Masses be heard on the same day, they seem to have to be heard successively and not at the same time; for we reasonably presume that the Confessor intended this. - St. Lig., Homo Apostolicus, no. 57; Lacroix and others commonly.

7. A penitent upon whom a more difficult penance is enjoined ought to warn the Confessor concerning the impossibility or excessive difficulty of fulfilling it; and if the Confessor does not acquiesce, he can approach another. But if the penance does not appear so grave, the penitent is bound to accept it and cannot withdraw without some fault [13].

[13] There will namely be present at least the vice of sloth.

8. If a penitent, having accepted a penance from one Confessor, repeats the confession before another in order that he may obtain a milder penance, or even for another cause, he is by no means freed from the former penance unless he makes mention of the preceding confession and the penance accepted. The reason is that, on the part of the Confessor, a positive act of the will by which the prior obligation is revoked is required for commuting a penance. - Thus commonly Lugo, Lacroix, etc.

Appendix. On Penances More Usefully Imposed

I. Works of Piety

535. ○ 1. Vocal prayers: the Our Father, Hail Mary, Creed, Litany of the Blessed Virgin, the Rosary or its third part; morning and evening prayers.

2. Mental prayers, discreetly and according to the capacity of the penitent; for the uneducated, some thought concerning hell, death, or the Passion of Christ, in the morning or evening, for example, for the length of one Hail Mary.

3. Acts of Faith, Hope, Charity, contrition, confidence in God, conformity to the divine will, and a purpose of not sinning..., so many times [1]..., for example, morning and evening, especially in temptations or dejection of mind.

[1] These and other things of this kind seem to be matter for counsel rather than for any obligation, because they are easily delivered to forgetfulness and consequently give place to anxieties. The same is also to be said of the things which the Author proposes in the following number.

4. An offering of oneself to God first thing in the morning; the sign of the cross; various aspirations or ejaculatory prayers to Christ, to the Heart of Jesus, to the Blessed Virgin, or to the Guardian Angel. Ordinarily these are not to be multiplied.

5. The exercise of the Way of the Cross, especially when it is made in common; novena prayers in honor of the Blessed Virgin or some Saint.

6. Hearing sermons or catechism; attendance at the Offices of the Church, for example, solemn Mass, Vespers, etc.; or at spiritual exercises, the pious exercise of the Marian Month, or other things of this kind, at least several times.

7. A general examination of conscience in the evening, at least for a short time; likewise a particular examination concerning some defect or some evil habit, with a firm purpose of amendment [2].

[2] These things are generally too difficult and exacting, unless perhaps there is question of persons already accustomed to this or that exercise.

8. A visit to any Church or Altar, or to some particular one, in order to pray for something there or to ask for the grace of sinning no more.

9. Pious reading, for example, for a quarter of an hour on Sunday, or one or another chapter, for example, of the Imitation of Christ, the Lives of the Saints, or another pious book, etc.

10. Frequenting the Sacraments on such a day, or at such a time, or so many times. Here the Confessor should act cautiously and should not impose upon those who confess rarely the obligation of approaching the tribunal of penance once or twice a month for a year; but he should not enjoin this except for one, and perhaps another, occasion, and only upon penitents who willingly accept it [3].

[3] Add: and who offer a prudent hope concerning the future execution of the purpose.

II. Works of Mortification

1. Fasting, either complete according to the laws of the Church or partial according to the physical and moral strength of the penitent. Nevertheless, a penance of this kind is not to be imposed except rarely and only upon those who will willingly accept it.

2. Some subtraction of food which can in no way harm the health of the body or the duties or labors of the penitent, for example, half of the customary breakfast on Friday, Saturday, or the vigil of some feast, etc.

3. Abstinence from wine or intoxicating liquor on such a day or at such a time, or not exceeding a certain quantity.

4. Some subtraction of ordinary sleep, especially by rising earlier in the morning, or at a determined hour as a remedy for sloth, or even for guarding against impure temptations.

5. Praying on bended knees or with arms extended in the form of a cross [4]; kissing the ground for the sake of humility; making brief pilgrimages.

[4] But a prayer of this kind ought to be brief, namely, lest it harm health.

6. Sometimes offering to God illnesses, diseases, or other miseries of life that occur, by bearing them patiently [5].

[5] These things also are matter rather for counsel and exhortation. The last particular, however, is enjoined altogether less prudently, because it furnishes an occasion of sinning in many ways; moreover, even setting this aside, it will remain too obscure and uncertain how far this obligation extends and what certain matter of it exists.

7. Sometimes depriving oneself even of an honorable recreation, for example, a walk [6]; repressing excessive curiosity in hearing or seeing; not lingering so long at the door or windows of the house. This is especially fitting for girls excessively devoted to vanity.

[6] Say rather, the solace of the theater or another spectacle. For a walk is not only honorable but useful for health.

8. Chastising the body moderately by a discreet mortification, some scourging, or an uncomfortable posture. But these things are to be enjoined most rarely [7]; indeed, they are to be permitted with great discretion.

[7] Among those things which ought to be enjoined most rarely, Cardinal De Lugo also numbers abstinence from receiving the Most Holy Eucharist, adding further that this is fitting only when, on account of a defect of reverence and disposition, it is better that someone be kept from it. Thus he: We have shown that the frequent use of Communion is not a thing so determinately good that it cannot sometimes and in some circumstances be better to abstain than to approach, even if there is no consciousness of mortal sin.... Since, therefore, the Confessor can command honorable works and works of virtue as penance, there does not seem to be doubt, speaking in general and of possibility, that he can sometimes command the penitent to abstain from Communion on such a day; namely, when it is established that it is then better to abstain than to approach, which can prudently be gathered from the state of the penitent and a defect of reverence and disposition. Provided, however, that this omission of Communion is not an occasion for others to judge that it was imposed as a penance by the Confessor, lest perhaps in this way the penitent be compelled to manifest his confession. Regularly, however, it is not expedient to impose such a penance, although in a most rare case it cannot be denied that it can be usefully imposed.

III. Medicinal Penances

536. Since, generally speaking, contraries are cured by contraries, the following penances can be enjoined, or only counseled, yet with discretion, attention being given especially to the character and greater good of the penitents.

1. Upon penitents who pray rarely and badly, let brief prayers be imposed, to be performed morning or evening for about a week. Upon the tepid, pious readings or ejaculatory prayers to be made several times a day, yet few in number and for only a few days, lest they be omitted through forgetfulness or distress the penitent. Upon those tempted against Faith and Hope, acts of Faith, Hope, or confidence, or the recitation of the Apostles' Creed, etc.

2. Upon blasphemers, external reverence toward God and the Cross; for example, reverently kissing the Crucifix or sacred images, or saying devoutly: Blessed be the name of the Lord. Praised be Jesus Christ.

3. Upon lovers of the world and its pomps, some meditation concerning the vanity of worldly things, for example, when they rise in the morning or go to bed, or a renewal of the promises made in Baptism.

4. Upon those who often omit Mass, some supererogatory Mass to be heard, for example, two on Sunday, or one on a weekday; or some visit to the Most Holy Sacrament to be made several times, etc.

5. Upon those who preserve hatred, some work of charity toward their neighbor, for example, greeting or speaking to an enemy, yet prudently; prayer and an act of charity for one's neighbor in general, and also especially for enemies; recitation of the Lord's Prayer for them, especially of these words: Forgive us our debts, as we also forgive our debtors.

6. Upon the lustful, some mortification or subtraction of conveniences, especially flight from occasions [8], prayer, frequenting the Sacraments, frequent renewal of a firm purpose, remembrance of the last things, etc.

[8] Understand this concerning occasions at least somewhat remote, for the natural law commands that proximate occasions be avoided.

7. Upon thieves and the avaricious, some alms according to their means, even if at times a single as were to be spent upon the poor or upon the Church. Grave alms, however, are never to be imposed unless they are willingly accepted.

8. Upon the proud, certain offices of humility, for example, kissing the ground, visiting the poor or kindly assisting them, treating them humanely, or eliciting various acts of humility, for example, saying with the publican: Lord, be merciful to me a sinner.

9. Upon gluttons and drunkards, some subtraction of foods; abstinence from food and drink outside the customary meals; abstinence from wine on such a day; or a prohibition against exceeding such a quantity of wine at meals, etc.

Add also the works of mortification which were indicated in the preceding section.

Part III. On the Minister of Penance

We must treat: 1. of the power of the Minister; 2. of his office.

Chapter I. On the Power of the Minister

How wondrous is the power of the Priest, not only sacrificing at the altar, but also sitting in the tribunal of Penance! Surely there is no more excellent dignity on earth, no more sublime ministry, no degree more eminent than that to which the faculty of forgiving sins is granted. Who is this, who even forgives sins? the unbelieving Jews cried, Luke 7:49. And again: Who can forgive sins but God alone? Luke 5:12. And now man also forgives sins, and indeed by a power proper to him, although divinely received! For the priest does not exercise a bare ministry, as the Council of Trent defined; but he bears the person of Christ Himself when he erects a tribunal and pronounces the sentence of absolution: He has given us the ministry of reconciliation! 2 Cor. 5:18.

537. Three things are required for the adequate power of the Minister of Penance, namely: 1. the power of Order; 2. the power of jurisdiction; 3. approval.

I. The power of Order is required, that is, that which belongs to the Minister by force of ordination and is intrinsically annexed to the priestly character. The reason is that to Priests alone it was said by Christ: Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them. John 20:22. - It is established elsewhere by manifold definition of the Church.

II. The power of jurisdiction is required, that is, the power by which the Priest as judge can render sentence upon certain persons as his subjects. It is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 7.

III. Approval is required for hearing confessions both licitly and validly, or a public judgment concerning the fitness of the Priest for hearing confessions. - Trent, sess. 23, ch. 15, On Reformation.

We must treat: 1. of approval; 2. of jurisdiction; 3. of the reservation of cases.

Article I. On Approval

Approval can be defined: A juridical judgment of a Prelate concerning the fitness of a Priest for hearing confessions.

Hence, for granting approval, an examination is not required essentially; for a prudent judgment concerning fitness can be had even without an examination when this is established from another source. But this judgment ought to be adequate, namely, both on the part of the intellect as regards knowledge and prudence, and on the part of the will as regards holiness of morals fitting for a vicar of Christ in this ministry [1].

[1] Nevertheless, these things do not pertain to the essence. Wherefore the Ordinary would indeed approve illicitly, but validly, one who perhaps lacks these qualities.

538. I say I. Approval is required for hearing confessions both licitly and validly [2]. It is established from Trent, sess. 23, ch. 15, On Reformation, where it is established thus: No Priest, even a regular, can hear the confessions of secular persons, even Priests, nor be regarded as fit for it, unless he either has a parochial benefice, or is judged fit by the Bishops through an examination, if this shall seem necessary to them, or otherwise, and obtains approval, which is to be given gratuitously.

[2] This holds with regard to churches using the Latin rite, but not likewise with regard to Eastern churches. Indeed, Verricelli (De Apost. Mission., tit. XV, q. 223) observes that not even missionaries of the Latin rite need the permission of a Greek Catholic Bishop for hearing confessions. It is sufficient, he says, if before the Greek Bishop they reverently exhibit the letters of their Mission or priestly Order; for this suffices so that, once permission to celebrate has been granted, they may also hear confessions. It is proved because Latin Priests ought not to be of a worse condition among Greek Bishops than Greek Priests. But an itinerant Greek Priest arriving from elsewhere, after showing the letters of his Priesthood and obtaining from the Greek Bishop permission to celebrate, can at once both celebrate and hear confessions, because among the Greeks there is no priest who cannot hear confessions, but in ordination itself he receives the faculty and jurisdiction of absolving. Therefore, the same is likewise to be said of a Latin Priest, to whom, by the very fact that the Greek Bishop gives the faculty to celebrate, he is considered also to give the faculty of hearing confessions. Indeed, if the Greek Bishop does not take care to see the dimissorial letters of itinerant Greek Priests and permits them, without any express permission having been given, both to minister the Sacrament of Penance and to celebrate, the same seems to be said of a Latin missionary Priest. Nevertheless, the missionary must ask permission from the Vicar of the Latin Catholic Bishop, if one is present there.

539. I say II. The Bishop alone, or one who has quasi-episcopal jurisdiction, can approve. The reason is that it pertains to the Prelates of the Church alone to judge concerning the fitness of Ministers to be deputed for hearing confessions. This is also established from the Council of Trent cited above. But the Bishop can approve either by himself or through another delegated by him, because approval is an act of jurisdiction, and ordinary jurisdiction can be delegated. - St. Lig., nos. 550, 558.

It must further be observed that, according to the present discipline of the Church, jurisdiction also is accustomed to be conferred upon Priests by the Prelate together with approval, exempt Regulars being excepted [3]; and therefore, in common usage, jurisdiction is also comprehended under the name of approval. Formerly, however, namely, before the Council of Trent, when the approval of the Bishop was not necessary, jurisdiction was commonly granted by Pastors; this faculty now scarcely has exercise among pastors, since a priest can now scarcely be found who has not already received jurisdiction from the Bishop together with approval.

[3] Do not understand these words as though a Bishop cannot grant jurisdiction to Regulars. It is only indicated that Regulars do not need the delegation of the Bishop, since they have jurisdiction, as will be said below, delegated by the Apostolic See through their own prelates.

540. Questions. - QUESTION 1. From which Bishop is approval to be obtained?

Reply. Approval ought to be granted by the Bishop of the diocese in which confessions are to be heard; hence the approval either of the Bishop of the penitents or of the Bishop of the Priests does not suffice. It is established from the Bull of Innocent XII of the year 1700, where it was decreed: Confessors, both secular and regular, whoever they may be, can in no way hear penitents without the approval of the Bishop of the place in which the penitents themselves dwell; nor for this does approval obtained once or several times from other Ordinaries of other dioceses avail, even if the penitents are subjects of those Ordinaries who had approved such Confessors. Then the Pontiff declares that otherwise the confessions will be null and the Confessors suspended. Benedict XIV confirmed this Constitution by the Bull which begins Apostolica. - See St. Lig., no. 548 [4].

[4] Since the Council of Trent had not expressly explained by which Ordinary Confessors were to be approved, the Doctors departed into three diverse opinions, as can also be seen in St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 548). For some said that approval was to be sought from the Ordinary of the priest, since he alone would have jurisdiction over him; others, however, from the Ordinary of the penitent, because he had the right of inspecting to whom he committed his sheep; and finally others from the Ordinary of the diocese where the confession is made.

And indeed, to the first of these opinions, which otherwise most grave Doctors had embraced as the more probable, is owed that opinion which was the author of so many dissensions: that Regulars, once they had obtained approval from some Ordinary, could thereafter hear confessions in any other diocese without the approval of the Ordinaries, since they thought neither another approval from them nor a delegation of jurisdiction, which they had from the Apostolic See, to be necessary for themselves. Against them came the Constitution Cum sicut of Urban VIII, September 12, 1628, in which the privilege formerly granted also to certain Religious, that they could hear sacramental confessions even if they had not been examined and approved for this by the diocesan Bishops, is abolished. And with regard to all Religious there also followed the Constitution Superna of Clement X, which in section 4 decrees that Religious approved by a Bishop to hear the confessions of secular persons in his diocese cannot hear them in another diocese without the approval of the diocesan Bishop, although the penitents are subjects of that Bishop by whom the Religious themselves had already been approved.

And since by this Constitution of Clement X the question did not seem to be removed (see Lacroix, bk. 6, part II, no. 1516), because both it and the preceding one of Urban VIII established this concerning Regulars alone, hence there was the new Constitution of Innocent XII, from which the Author reports certain things, which also comprehends secular confessors and decrees that the Bull of the Holy Crusade introduced no new law and contained no privilege with regard to the approval of Confessors against the form of the Council of Trent..., so that Confessors, both secular and Regular, whoever they may be, etc., as in the passage transcribed by the Author. And since certain authors, such as, for example, the Salmanticenses (On Privileges, ch. 4, no. 11) contended that the Constitution of Innocent XII, which treated of the Bull of the Crusade, was not necessarily extended to other privileges of choosing a Confessor for oneself, for example, those which are granted through a Jubilee. Therefore Benedict XIV (Const. Apostolica indulta, August 5, 1744) established and declared that those things which his Predecessors, the Roman Pontiffs Innocent XII, Innocent XIII, and Benedict XIII, had decreed concerning the understanding and use of the indult of the Bull of the Crusade, ought equally to have force and obtain also in the remaining indults of the same kind. From all these things it is manifestly evident that the first and second of the opinions recounted above are now to be regarded as obsolete.

541. ○ QUESTION 2. Can someone absolve his own subject in another diocese without the approval of the Ordinary?

Reply 1. Affirmative, if he has truly personal or ordinary jurisdiction over him. The reason is that whoever, by reason of his office, has ordinary jurisdiction is considered approved by the law itself to hear his own subjects everywhere; nor is ordinary jurisdiction, provided it is exercised without judicial solemnity, confined to a place, but unless it is specially restricted, it can be exercised everywhere. - Thus commonly with St. Lig., no. 548; Reuter, no. 348; Lacroix, no. 1516; and others against a few. Hence a Bishop and a Pastor can absolve their subjects outside the parish and diocese without the approval of the Bishop of the place.

Reply 2. Negative, if only delegated jurisdiction over the penitent is possessed, because this is of itself considered merely territorial, not personal, and therefore does not follow the delegate outside the territory. - Thus the same authors.

QUESTION 3. Does presumed approval suffice?

Reply. Negative. The reason is that, from the Council of Trent, approval actually and absolutely existing and already obtained is required. But for approval of this kind, actual consent declared by some sign is required. Indeed, it is not lawful to begin hearing confessions before that consent, requested by letter, has been received, even though it appears certain that it will be obtained. - Thus commonly. - St. Lig., no. 570.

Much less is a ratification of approval valid even when prudently presumed, because ratification has place only in acts whose validity can be suspended into the future; but the validity of a present absolution cannot be suspended, for the validity of the Sacraments cannot depend upon a future action [5]. - St. Lig., ibid.

[5] Compare, however, those things which were said above (no. 232) concerning sacraments which are valid but unformed.

542. ○ QUESTION 4. Can a Bishop validly and licitly limit approval with regard to a certain time, place, and persons?

Reply 1. Affirmative as regards validity, even without cause. The reason is that it is an act wholly dependent upon the will of the Bishop as Superior. Hence, just as he can validly refuse approval, so he can grant it only with a restriction. This is also established from proposition 13 condemned by Alexander VII: He satisfies the precept of annual confession who confesses to a regular presented to the Bishop, but unjustly rejected. Therefore a denial of approval, even an unjust one, is valid; therefore much more a restriction. It is also established from the Council of Trent, sess. 23, ch. 15, where it is said: Unless he obtains approval. But one who obtains it with a restriction simply does not obtain it for the excluded cases.... Therefore, etc. - St. Lig., no. 542; Lugo, disp. 21, no. 51.

Reply 2. As regards liceity, distinguish. The Bishop can indeed restrict or even altogether deny approval for a just cause, as is evident, because the necessity of approval was introduced for this end, that the fit be separated from the unfit. It is otherwise, however, if he does this without a just cause.

QUESTION 5. What are just causes for limiting approval as to time, etc.?

Reply. They are for the most part the following: 1. if there is now a necessity of having several Confessors which will afterward cease; 2. if the one to be approved indeed has sufficient knowledge, but greater knowledge is rightly desired for perpetual approval; 3. if it is prudently feared that, after once obtaining perpetual approval, he will neglect study; 4. for testing how he conducts himself in hearing confessions, namely, whether he applies general principles well, etc.

543. ○ QUESTION 6. Can a Bishop validly and licitly revoke approval once granted?

Reply 1. Affirmative by reason of validity, even without a just cause. The reason is: 1. because such a revocation is made in a matter so subject to the Bishop that it can proceed only from him; 2. because approval, even unjustly revoked, no longer exists, or cannot be said simply to be possessed or obtained. - Thus commonly with St. Lig., no. 551; Billuart, diss. 6, art. 5.

Reply 2. By reason of liceity, distinguish. 1. The Bishop can indeed revoke approval, even when granted without limitation, for just causes; for this follows from the necessity of approval, which demands that whoever ceases to be fit be removed from office. 2. He cannot, however, revoke approval without a just cause. For, from what has been said, the Bishop cannot deny approval without cause; therefore, much less can he revoke without cause one already granted, since according to the saying: More shamefully is a guest cast out than not admitted. - St. Lig., etc.

544. ◦ QUESTION 7. Can a Bishop approve an extern Priest?

Reply. A Bishop can approve any fit person actually existing in his diocese, even if only passing through. It is established from universal practice and the common opinion of the Theologians against a few who require for this a quasi-domicile, or at least a domicile of habitation in the diocese of the approving Bishop [6]. The reason is that a delegation or mandate can be committed to anyone, provided he is capable. It is established further from the practice which is universally observed in the Church. - Recall the Decree of Innocent XII related above, no. 540.

[6] This, namely, was a consequence of the opinion which established that approval for hearing confessions was to be required from the proper Ordinary of the priest. And since by law no one becomes a subject of any Ordinary except by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile, the Doctors therefore required one or the other of these in order that someone could be approved by a Bishop. But since that opinion has now become obsolete, its consequence also remains obsolete. That certain writers repeat this now obsolete doctrine and think that approval can be granted only to subjects who are such by the law of domicile, quasi-domicile, or at least habitation seems to be attributed merely to the not infrequent custom by which some are readily borne toward transcribing the opinions of the ancients without in any way examining their reason.

Meanwhile observe that certain Doctors indeed require for the validity of approval that the priest can be called a subject of the approving Ordinary. But they consider him a subject as soon as he sets foot in the diocese, even if no will of remaining there is present. Thus Lugo: I infer eighthly that a Religious approved by some Bishop while he is staying in his episcopate, whether as a guest or with domicile, although after changing domicile, or returning to his own domicile if he was a guest, he no longer remains a subject of that Bishop...; nevertheless, if he afterward returns to the same episcopate, he recovers the approval... and by virtue of it can hear confessions without a new approval, because he again becomes a subject of the same Bishop by whom, or by whose predecessor, he was approved (De Poenit., disp. 21, no. 44). Moreover, subject in this place means a priest in a restricted sense, that is, merely in relation to hearing confessions. Thus the same Lugo (ibid., no. 35): His Ordinary in relation to hearing the confessions of this diocese is that one alone to whom he is subjected in relation to this office and by whom, if he sins in this matter, he can be punished as by his own judge and Ordinary in this class of causes. And from this that which he himself had premised (ibid., no. 33) is well reconciled with these things: When Bishops give permission to hear confessions even to foreign and visiting priests, they do not attend to or ask whether they were previously approved or whether they came with the intention of remaining, but only whether they are or are not sufficient. Thus Lugo; and if the first of the three opinions presented above, in the note at no. 440, is understood with him in such a way that anyone who becomes subject to the Ordinary in relation to hearing confessions is called a subject, and only for as long as he remains in the same diocese, it is manifest that this opinion is very well reconciled with the third, which is to be maintained from the apostolic Constitutions.

Article II. On Jurisdiction

Jurisdiction, taken generally, is a certain moral power of governing subjects. Ecclesiastical jurisdiction is twofold: one kind is in the external forum, and is the power of making laws, inflicting punishments, etc.; the other is in the internal forum, and is the power of absolving or binding in the tribunal of Penance.

We shall treat chiefly of the latter. It is also twofold, namely: 1. ordinary, which belongs to someone by reason of an office having the care of souls annexed to it; 2. delegated, which is given to another by one having ordinary jurisdiction.

545. Principles. - I. The power of jurisdiction is necessary for hearing confessions, nor does the power of Order suffice. The reason is that absolution is a judicial sentence which cannot be rendered except upon subjects. Subjects must therefore be assigned to the Confessor; but this pertains to him who has authority over those subjects. Moreover, this is altogether required for the right governance of the Church. For there would be the greatest inconvenience if the faculty of absolving were independent of those to whom it was said by Christ: Whatever you shall bind shall be bound...; whatever you shall loose shall be loosed. But it is established especially from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 7: Since, therefore, the nature and character of a judgment demand that sentence be rendered upon subjects alone, it has always been held as certain in the Church of God, and this Synod confirms as most true, that the absolution which a Priest pronounces upon one over whom he has neither ordinary nor subdelegated jurisdiction ought to be of no moment.

546. ○ II. Ordinary jurisdiction belongs: 1. to the Pope for the whole Church in each forum, for to him it was said by Christ in the person of Peter, Matt. 16:19: I will give you the keys of the kingdom of heaven. And whatever you shall bind upon earth shall be bound also in heaven; and whatever you shall loose upon earth shall be loosed also in heaven; 2. to the Bishop for his diocese, likewise in each forum, since it is committed to him so that he may rule and direct it; 3. to Pastors for their subjects in the internal forum; 4. to Abbots and Prelates of Regulars for their subjects.

III. Ordinary jurisdiction can be delegated, or exercised through another. The reason is that delegation is an act proper to ordinary power. Jurisdiction for hearing confessions, however, cannot be delegated except to a Priest approved by the Bishop, as is established from the things said above concerning approval. With regard to Pastors, the faculty of delegating has become almost useless, since Bishops, to whom it pertains to approve confessors, are accustomed to confer jurisdiction together with approval upon secular Priests, as was said in the note at no. 529.

IV. Delegated jurisdiction is granted by the Church to every Priest in a case of extreme necessity, or at the point of death [1]. It is established from the Council of Trent, sess. 14, ch. 7.

[1] This rule is somewhat stricter if the Author wishes to indicate when jurisdiction is delegated by the Church. See Question 2 below, where mention occurs of jurisdiction delegated apart from extreme necessity or the point of death.

V. Delegated jurisdiction for hearing confessions expires through revocation made by the Superior or through the lapse of the time fixed; likewise by the death of the one delegating or his cessation from office, if it was given for some particular person and judgment has not yet begun, or even if it was given generally but with the clause at the discretion of the grantor, at our pleasure, or another similar clause. - St. Liguori, nos. 558, 559; Scavini.

547. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can delegated jurisdiction be subdelegated?

Reply. Generally speaking, negative, namely, unless there is added a special grant of the one delegating; and then it is considered to be subdelegated in the name of the one delegating. The reason is that the delegate has only that power which is granted to him; but only the power of exercising jurisdiction is granted to him, not of committing it to another, unless something else is expressed. Therefore, etc. Except if someone is substituted in the place of an ordinary Pastor with universal delegation, for example, in place of a deceased Pastor; or if someone is delegated for the whole class of causes. - St. Lig., no. 566, and others commonly.

548. ○ QUESTION 2. Does the Church supply jurisdiction when penitents invincibly do not know of its defect?

Reply. It must first be observed that a defect of jurisdiction can occur in diverse circumstances. For an error can be either common among the faithful or private to some person alone. Again, a Priest lacking jurisdiction can have a colored title, or only a presumed title. A colored title is a title indeed false in itself, but truly conferred by a Superior, and therefore bearing the appearance of a true title, although from some cause it labors under a hidden defect of nullity. Thus a Priest who is simoniacally appointed Pastor obtains an invalid title from Canon law; and if he was constituted in the parish by a legitimate Bishop [2], he has a colored title. A merely presumed title, however, is one which is believed by the faithful to be present, although it does not exist. These things being established:

[2] It could happen that a merely colored title was possessed in the Bishop who institutes the pastor, for example, if he had occupied the see with a hidden vice of simony. To this pertains the third case in Statuimus 107, cause 1, q. 1, namely, that of one who is ordained non-simoniacally by a simoniac.

I say 1. The Church certainly supplies if the error is common among the faithful and is at the same time joined with a colored title. The reason is drawn from the common interpretation of the Theologians, resting upon diverse passages of law. For, as they say, the Church, as a pious mother, is deservedly considered to supply jurisdiction for the good of souls when she can do so [3]. - St. Lig., no. 572.

[3] This holds equally whether someone has ordinary or delegated jurisdiction. It holds, moreover, even if the Confessor knows that he does not have jurisdiction, for example, one who knows that the time of his approval has elapsed, or that by force of a sentence secretly intimated to him he has been suspended from hearing confessions.

I say 2. More probably, the Church also supplies if there is common error without a colored title, but with only a presumed or factual title. For the same reason presses as in the preceding case, since in this hypothesis also innumerable souls could perish. - Thus Suarez, Lugo, Lessius, Billuart, Bonacina, Diana, Henriquez, Pontius, etc.; and St. Lig., Viva, Elbel, Sporer, Roncaglia, Gobat, Holzmann, Herinx, Cardenas, Gousset, etc., consider this probable. Certain others contradict it, however, for example, Busembaum, Navarre, Sylvester, Cajetan, Ugolino, Covarruvias, etc.

I say 3. The Church is not considered to supply jurisdiction if the error is private, for example, if it is that of one or a few. The reason is that the Church is not considered to supply except by reason of the common good, namely, after the manner of a general provider or governor who attends only to the general good of society and leaves the good of private persons to the care of particular providers. - Thus the Theologians most commonly against a few.

549. ○ QUESTION 3. Is it lawful to absolve with doubtful jurisdiction?

Reply. Negative, unless some necessity urges. St. Alphonsus, no. 571, thinks that a necessity of this kind is present: 1. if the precept of annual confession urges; 2. if the penitent must celebrate Mass or receive Communion and otherwise would incur a mark of infamy; 3. if the priest is bound to celebrate from obligation.

QUESTION 4. Is it lawful to absolve with probable jurisdiction?

Reply. With St. Alphonsus, bk. 6, no. 573: The common opinion [4] teaches that it is lawful to absolve with probable jurisdiction, provided the opinion is truly probable, supported by grave reason and authority. Thus Sanchez, Lugo, who considers it most safe, etc.; and Sanchez, Tamburini, Cardenas, Dicastillo, Illsung, Gormaz, Stoz, etc., cited by Croix, bk. 6, part 1, no. 117, call it morally certain.

[4] Of the three opinions which St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) reviews concerning this matter, he places this one second. The first, which he attributes to Concina, Antoine, and Elizalde, denies that it is lawful, because from proposition 1 condemned by Innocent XI it is not lawful in the administration of the Sacraments to use a probable opinion, lest the sacrament be exposed to the danger of frustration. He wholly rejects this opinion (ibid.), however, and observes with Viva, Wigandt, and Gonet that the Proposition speaks of opinions concerning those things in which the Church can do nothing..., but not concerning jurisdiction, which can well be supplied by the Church; and it is presumed with moral certitude to be supplied in this case for the good of souls. To this pertain those words of Croix (bk. 6, part 1, no. 117): Whenever there is a probable opinion for jurisdiction..., it is the most common opinion with Suarez, Koninck, Filliuccius, Reginald, Lessius, Bonacina, Diana, and Aversa that even then the Church supplies..., if perhaps jurisdiction is absent. And Sanchez, Verricelli, Dicastillo, Tamburini, Cardenas, Arsdekin, Sporer, Gormaz, Stoz, and Laurentius say that this is safe in practice or morally certain.

 The VV., who devote no fewer than thirty-two columns (pp. 485-501) to attacking those things which are said here concerning this question, object first (p. 487) against this Note: 1. Concina vigorously maintains that it can by no means be presumed that the Church supplies; 2. the older authors cited by John Sanchez thought that the Church does not supply; 3. certain authors cited by the Salmanticenses deny that it is lawful to absolve if another endowed with certain jurisdiction is present; 4. not a few authors cited by Tamburini deny that the absolution is valid.

Reply. These things attack not the Note but directly the opinion of the holy Doctor Alphonsus; wherefore someone will not easily understand to what, finally, Vindications of the holy Doctor of this kind tend. But to the individual points:

To 1. Reply. Let it pass. If it thus pleases the VV., let them prefer vigorous Concina even to St. Alphonsus; we shall never fail to prefer the holy Doctor to Concina.

To 2. I deny the whole. The question which John Sanchez (disp. 44, no. 10), Garcia cited by Sanchez (De Benef., vol. 1, part 5, ch. 8, nos. 87 and 132), and Guttierez, Zerola, Sorbo, Rodriguez, Veia, Aegidius, and Vasquez cited by Garcia (In III Part., q. 93, art. 3, dub. 4) treat is this: Whether one approved by one Bishop is considered approved for any diocese whatever. Therefore, these things do not pertain to the matter. But further: the VV. themselves (loc. cit.) add that Garcia brought forward declarations of the Cardinals in aid of himself, which is most true, namely, concerning that question. For otherwise, how do the VV. not hesitate to reproach the holy Doctor Alphonsus also for handing down as certain this doctrine also, which the Sacred Congregations of Cardinals rejected? And here it must be added that John Sanchez (disp. 44, no. 4) handed down most expressly and without any limitation the doctrine which we propose here.

To 3. These things also are against St. Alphonsus, who, for example, adduces John de Salas for himself, and indeed deservedly, contrary to how the Salmanticenses cite him.

To 4. Do not the VV. see Lugo and Suarez numbered among those not few Authors? And do the things which we have before our eyes agree that we should believe that, according to the opinion of Lugo and Suarez, absolution in the case is to be considered invalid? Let us conclude: this method of plundering citations here and there, without adding whether they are brought forward well or badly, or to what end and in what sense by the Authors, contributes to nothing other than casting darkness over questions; and this certainly is not the office of those who wish to benefit science by their labors.

See the reasons in the same St. Alphonsus, who concludes from them thus: This custom therefore being established as certain, it is certain that it is lawful to administer the sacrament with probable jurisdiction; although he rightly observes that the Confessor, in absolving, would not absolve with only a probable opinion, but with one morally certain, not by direct certitude, but by reflex certitude.

St. Alphonsus proposes thus another opinion which he says that he follows, which, namely, teaches, as he says, that it is indeed lawful to administer this sacrament of penance with probable jurisdiction, but only when there is a cause of grave necessity or great utility, as Elbel [5] and Wigandt say, or a reasonable cause, as Suarez [6] and Sporer say. The reason for this limitation is that, although the Church in that case can well be considered to supply jurisdiction for the good of souls, nevertheless, when no just cause is present, she is not presumed to will to connive at the mere liberty of priests [7].

[5] Elbel (Conf., XII, no. 311) does not require a cause of grave necessity, but a just and grave cause. He followed, namely, his own Marchant, whom he cites.

[6] Suarez has nothing of this kind.

 Here the VV., after filling two columns with texts of Suarez (p. 489), conclude: Since Suarez calls more certain, or at least more probable, the opinion that it is not lawful to administer the sacrament with probable jurisdiction and to expose it to the danger of frustration unless some grave or reasonable cause urges, etc.

Reply. I deny the whole. For Suarez (disp. 26, sect. 6, no. 9) has nothing of this kind, and concludes the disputation concerning this matter thus: Finally, if all these things are joined together, they produce sufficient moral certitude, so that it is therefore lawful to use a probable opinion in the use of this jurisdiction. But he introduces mention of a grave or reasonable cause only when he adds counsel, for he continues: Nevertheless, I would always admonish both ministers and penitents to use the more certain or at least the more probable way, unless some grave or reasonable cause urges. Where, then, is that assertion that the more probable opinion is that it is not lawful unless, etc.?

[7] St. Alphonsus was the first, as it seems, who distinctly proposed this limitation of the preceding or second opinion, as he himself calls it, as a certain third opinion diverse from the second.

But if the matter is considered theoretically, this opinion, by the very fact that it is regarded as opposed to the second, ought perhaps to appear weaker. For if the preceding opinion, by his own admission, is common, indeed most common, and is held and called most safe and morally certain by Theologians of the first rank, what weight indeed can be given to the opposite opinion, which Marchant, with no one preceding him, introduced (vol. 1, tract 2, tit. 3, q. 4), and which Sporer (De Poenit., no. 718) finally fortified only by the aid of three false citations, namely, those of Francis Bardi, John Sanchez, and George Gobat, with a fourth likewise false citation of Suarez added in St. Alphonsus, who taught nothing of this kind?

And indeed, the weakness of this cause arises and is revealed from that same principle which is the foundation of the former most common opinion, namely, from the custom, in the words of St. Alphonsus, of almost all confessors of absolving with probable jurisdiction. Suarez testifies to this custom thus (De Poenit., disp. 26, sect. 6, no. 6): Nevertheless, it is arduous, and it seems to be CONTRARY EVEN TO THE CUSTOM OF GOD-FEARING MEN, to oblige all men to this, namely, that, if it can be had, a minister having certain and undoubted jurisdiction be chosen.

Cardinal De Lugo also testifies to the same custom thus (De Poenit., disp. 19, no. 34): THE PRACTICE OF PLAINLY ALL CONFESSORS has this, that they embrace probable opinions concerning absolution from censures by virtue of the Bull of the Crusade, a Jubilee, or another faculty; and thus they absolve, not imposing that before death they cause themselves to be absolved again by another who has certain power.... Since, therefore, from this common practice of all there follows a manifest danger for all penitents who, thinking themselves already absolved, no longer take care concerning absolution from that censure and would remain incapable of sacramental absolution, it must be admitted that the Church, on account of this common error, confers jurisdiction for preventing those harms, or certainly that those opinions upon which that danger is founded are not true.

But St. Alphonsus himself (cited no. 573) also has these things concerning a universal custom of this kind: In the Church there is a universal custom of almost all confessors of absolving with probable jurisdiction, as Suarez, Lugo, Cardenas, Arriaga, Diana, Croix, and all the other authors cited for this opinion commonly testify. But the common opinion of the Doctors establishes moral certitude concerning the aforesaid custom.

Moreover, behold the argument which St. Alphonsus himself draws from this (ibid.): This custom therefore being established as certain, it is certain that it is lawful to administer the sacrament with probable jurisdiction, since the custom itself furnishes jurisdiction, as Suarez, Navarre, Barbosa, Cardenas, Quaranta, and Pellizzarius teach; and they prove it from Canon law, etc. Suarez employs the same argument more briefly thus (loc. cit., no. 7): And it is confirmed from the universal custom of the Church, which is a sufficient sign of jurisdiction, as was said above. But it is the universal practice of the Church that priests safely use jurisdiction of this kind, namely, probable jurisdiction, in the administration of this sacrament.

This common and certain doctrine having therefore been established beforehand, whatever Sporer and Elbel, after their Marchant, constructed readily collapses of itself, as though, namely, the Church does not will to grant jurisdiction unless some cause of necessity or utility devised by them compels the use of probable jurisdiction, etc. For from the premises, jurisdiction follows the universal custom. But the universal custom, such as is presented to us by the most common opinion and such as already existed even before Marchant was born (as is evident from the testimony of Lessius, Suarez, Sanchez, etc.), never required that grave cause of necessity or great utility for the licit use of probable jurisdiction. Therefore Sporer and Elbel groundlessly introduced the fear that, if causes of this kind should perhaps be lacking, the sacrament would be exposed to the danger of frustration through defect of jurisdiction, and that consequently the use of probable jurisdiction would for this reason become illicit. But Marchant seems to have been driven astray by confusion between doubtful and probable jurisdiction; nor does he seem sufficiently to have observed that probable jurisdiction requires that a person, not rashly, but prudently, relying upon solid reason, judge that jurisdiction is not lacking to him.

There is added the reason which Suarez (loc. cit.) supplies. It pertains (he says) to the fitting and prudent governance of the Church that she not permit so necessary a Sacrament frequently to be uncertain and doubtful, however much it may exist under a probable opinion. To the same point likewise pertains what Croix has (bk. 6, part 1, no. 119), saying: It is certain that Christ instituted the Sacraments in such a way that He did not will their administration or reception to be morally impossible and odious to the faithful who would administer or receive them. Therefore it is certain that an administration or reception subject to excessive scruples or difficulties is not according to the institution of Christ; therefore, if there is no other way of avoiding such an administration or reception except that someone act according to an opinion that is merely probable, it is lawful to act according to it. And from this there is a twofold argument against that theory of Marchant. For who denies that the most common opinion, which does not require the condition introduced by Marchant, is more than probable? Therefore it pertains to the prudent and fitting governance of the Church (as Suarez says), and the institution of Christ requires (as Croix has it), that it be lawful to act according to it. Again: who does not see that the administration of the sacraments becomes subject to innumerable scruples and difficulties when, lest it be exposed to the danger of frustration, the degree either of necessity or of utility which is required for the use of probable jurisdiction according to this theory must also be weighed? But it pertains to the fitting and prudent governance of the Church that so necessary a sacrament not frequently be uncertain and doubtful; nor does the institution of Christ permit the administration of the sacrament in this way to become odious and subject to scruples and difficulties both for those administering and for those receiving it. Therefore.

And these things indeed, as I have said, if the matter is considered theoretically. For as regards practice, although with St. Alphonsus one might prefer that probable jurisdiction not be used unless some reasonable cause requires it, what George Gobat observes (Theol. Experim., bk. 7, no. 120) is most true, namely, that a cause of this kind is never absent. For probable opinions concerning jurisdiction generally turn upon faculties to absolve granted either by force of privileges, or by the indult of the Bull of the Crusade, or on the occasion of some Jubilee, etc. Hence this case generally occurs when (as the same Gobat says), after you have begun in good faith to hear a penitent, a doubt arises for you concerning one or another sin; and consequently when, unless you use this doctrine, the penitent would be compelled to repeat the confession before another. But, as is known, the burden of confessing the same sins twice has always seemed most grave to the Doctors, so much so that for this reason they excuse one from confession before Holy Communion, or at least from the integrity of confession. Therefore, even if you wish to follow the opinion of these few, a grave cause, indeed one graver than those which St. Alphonsus after Sporer considers reasonable and sufficient, will never be lacking to you.

 Finally, the VV. took it most ill that this third opinion of St. Alphonsus should therefore be called less firm, as though Marchant first introduced it, and indeed contrary to a doctrine which otherwise the holy Doctor himself acknowledges to have been held in the Schools as common, indeed as most common and most safe, and even as morally certain.

Accordingly, 1. they deny (pp. 490-492) that this opinion was first introduced by Marchant. 2. They deny that the citations by which Sporer fortified it are to be regarded as false. 3. They deny that the second opinion is to be regarded as most common, indeed even as common, when Marchant's limitation, and consequently St. Alphonsus's, is excluded. 4. Finally (pp. 494-496), they endeavor to strengthen St. Alphonsus's opinion by the opinions of certain Authors.

Reply to 1. In order to prove that St. Alphonsus's opinion did not first proceed from Marchant, the VV. cite Suarez, Reginald, and Coninck. But these citations conclude nothing. For 1. Suarez merely suggests counsel; he does not assert any necessity. See the preceding Note. 2. The same must be said of Reginald, who (bk. 1, no. 103), citing Suarez, merely intimates with him that it is fitting that one having certain jurisdiction be preferred to one having doubtful or less probable jurisdiction. 3. Coninck, however (De Poenit., disp. 8, nos. 41-44), disputes about jurisdiction that is strictly doubtful; but he does not touch in the least the question concerning jurisdiction which the Church supplies when a Confessor uses probable jurisdiction. And these things are manifest from the fact that at the end (no. 47, note 2) he warns that in the case the sins are to be repeated with a Confessor having certain jurisdiction. Therefore the credit for that new opinion introduced by Marchant must be reserved entirely to Marchant.

Reply to 2. The VV. produce two authors (p. 491) as though rightly cited by Sporer, namely, John Sanchez and Gobat. But 1. what they bring forward from John Sanchez has nothing to do with the matter, as was already shown in the preceding note. 2. Gobat (bk. 7, no. 114) acknowledges that he was led to regard the contrary opinion as probable by the number and weight of the Authors. But most of those authors are, of course, those whom we have already said were produced by John Sanchez (see the preceding Note) for an entirely different question, and therefore irrelevantly here. Therefore. Moreover, Gobat finally concludes (no. 117): Whence it follows that he does not sin in particular who absolves from a case which some, contrary to others, probably judge not to be reserved. Therefore Gobat too is wrongly produced as an adherent of Marchant.

Reply to 3. Cardenas, a contemporary of Marchant, wrote (disp. 2, no. 160): The most common opinion among the Doctors is that the Church supplies a defect of jurisdiction if perhaps that defect occurs while the Confessor uses a truly probable opinion. Therefore that doctrine was already most common before Marchant wrote. Therefore Marchant's opinion departed from a doctrine already most common.

Nor is this enough. Cardenas continues in the same place (no. 165), saying: It is the practice and custom IN THE WHOLE CHURCH that Confessors absolve on the basis of a... probable opinion concerning jurisdiction. To prove this he adduces (no. 166) these words from Suarez: It is THE UNIVERSAL PRACTICE OF THE CHURCH that priests safely use jurisdiction of this kind (probable jurisdiction) in the administration of this Sacrament; then (no. 167) these words from Lugo: This is the practice of all the faithful, and OF THE WHOLE CHURCH; then (no. 168) these words from Arriaga: Since, therefore, it is the custom of THE UNIVERSAL CHURCH safely to use jurisdiction probably presumed, the Church is considered tacitly to approve it; then (no. 169) these words from Diana: It is evident from the common opinion of the Doctors, and Confessors everywhere absolve with a probable opinion; and after he adds the testimony of Bonacina, he finally concludes (no. 171): And in this same manner ALMOST ALL THE THEOLOGIANS commonly speak. Whence thus: the most common doctrine and universal practice of the Church existed before Marchant introduced that opinion of his. Therefore, even apart from Marchant's limitation, that opinion is to be regarded and called altogether most common.

Therefore the more recent opinion of Marchant, and of St. Alphonsus after Marchant, has against it the most common opinion of almost all theologians and the practice of the universal Church.

Reply to 4. That pitiable band of Authors who later followed the footsteps of Marchant and Sporer detracts so much the less from the unanimous consent of the Schools, the more evidently it contradicts itself in giving the reason for that new limitation. Their reason, which St. Alphonsus also adduces (loc. cit.), is this: that the Church is not presumed, when no just cause is present, to will to connive at the mere liberty of priests. These words, according to Holzmann, Marchant, Sporer, Henno, etc., whom St. Alphonsus cites, signify that the Church then does not supply jurisdiction if the Confessor's opinion is false, and consequently that in the case the sacrament is exposed to the danger of frustration. But that general principle, namely, that the Church does not supply jurisdiction lest she connive at the Confessor's liberty, is considered utterly false by those same Authors when (as was observed in the Note with Suarez and Croix) harm to souls would follow from it. Hence Henno (De Poenit., disp. 8, q. 5, concl. 3), to the objection that the Church does not approve what she prohibits, therefore she does not give jurisdiction to him whom she prohibits from absolving, replies: She does not approve it as lawful, I concede; as valid, in favor of one invincibly deceived, I deny. And again: We will that the Church indeed sometimes supply the defect in favor of penitents, but never for the benefit of a putative or probable confessor. And again: Although the confessor knowingly doing this would sin, nevertheless the confession of the penitents would be valid. Hence St. Alphonsus also (bk. 6, no. 272): This reason by no means proves the point; for, granted that the Church denied jurisdiction of this kind to impious priests, it would not thereby be prevented that they... disseminate their errors; and conversely the faithful, on account of the invalidity of their confessions, would be exposed to an evident danger of perdition. Therefore, by the admission of these Authors themselves, it is false that the sacrament is exposed to the danger of frustration through defect of jurisdiction. Otherwise, surely no one would say that a priest sins who in the case follows an opinion which, as is manifest from the foregoing, is most probable, most common, most safe, and morally certain.

And let these things suffice for resolving the doubts of the VV. concerning the central point of the controversy; for to pursue every lesser matter with which the VV. fill those thirty-two columns must be regarded as useless labor and as bringing mere weariness to readers. They object, for example, that Marchant, contrary to what is said in the Note, properly distinguishes probable jurisdiction from doubtful jurisdiction. Reply: I deny the whole. For Marchant (loc. cit., q. 6), under the title of jurisdiction DOUBTFUL IN PRACTICE, treats of a priest who is perplexed in a practical doubt concerning jurisdiction. Hence he gives the example of a scrupulous priest who finds a man situated in danger of death and meanwhile remains doubtful in practice whether he has jurisdiction and can absolve him, and cannot resolve himself toward either side with respect to acting. These things, as is evident, do not pertain to the matter.

What pertains more to the matter is to observe that Marchant and his followers consider the use of probable jurisdiction lawful in nearly the same cases in which they consider lawful the use of jurisdiction that is strictly doubtful. Since among these cases they also mention danger of death, they truly seem then to have forgotten the doctrine of the Council of Trent, according to which any priest can absolve any penitents from any sins and censures. Moreover, the fact that these Authors require nearly the same causes for the licit use of probable and doubtful jurisdiction perhaps indicates that the conditions of this controversy had not been sufficiently perceived by them in every respect.

550. ○ QUESTION 5. Does a Vicar General have ordinary jurisdiction, so that he can delegate others to hear confessions?

Reply. The more common and true opinion affirms against a few. The reason is that the Vicar General, although appointed by the Bishop, does not have jurisdiction from the Bishop himself, but from the canon by which he is declared to constitute as it were one person with the Bishop. - St. Lig., no. 558.

QUESTION 6. Can heretics and excommunicated persons who are to be avoided [8] validly absolve in danger of death when another Priest is lacking?

[8] It is proper here to understand also suspended, interdicted, and irregular priests, those degraded, schismatics, notorious heretics, and even apostates from the faith to Mohammedanism, for example, etc.

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is that all Priests can absolve at the point of death, as is established from Trent, sess. 14, ch. 7 [9], according to the things said in Principle IV. - See St. Lig., no. 560.

[9] Thus the Tridentine Synod: It has always been observed in the same Church of God that there is no reservation at the point of death; and therefore all priests can absolve any penitents from any sins and censures.

With regard specifically to excommunicated persons, Cardinal Albitius (De Inconst. in fid., etc., ch. 18, no. 39) relates that a great controversy arose at Rome, some objecting for the negative opinion a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council which Fagnanus relates (In C. Quoniam, De Constit., no. 28). But although (Albitius says) the books and registers of the decrees of the Congregation of the Holy Council of Trent were sought with the greatest diligence, the said declaration could not be found. It must therefore be said that the aforesaid declaration was not made, or, if it was made, that it was expunged from the aforesaid books as contrary to the common opinion of the Theologians who wrote after the Council. And I know also that in the year 1682, during the Pontificate of our Lord Innocent XI, this opinion was debated in the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office; and since some of the Cardinals followed the opinion of St. Thomas, it was brought back to the balance. The matter having been reported to the Most Holy Father, His Holiness in his prudence ordered that there be no debate over the said opinion and that it no longer be called into doubt.

St. Alphonsus, in the earlier editions of his Work (see the Bassano edition with the fictitious date Rome, 1757), since he had not yet learned what Albitius related, wrote concerning this matter (bk. 6, no. 560): The second opinion TO BE FOLLOWED denies it, and St. Thomas holds this, etc.; where he also presses the aforesaid Declaration mentioned by Fagnanus. He afterward learned from Collet the things which we have related from Albitius, and added them to the same paragraph together with the decree of Innocent XI; moreover, in the later list of retractations (no. 19) he retracted that former opinion. Nevertheless, he did not delete the word to be followed (through forgetfulness, as is evident). It has been useful to warn of this, lest anyone, reading only the beginning of that paragraph 560, as is the custom of those concerned merely with knowing the Author's opinion, wrongly embrace that opinion as though it were St. Alphonsus's.

The decree of Innocent XI is confirmed by the Constitution Apostolici muneris of Benedict XIV, where, declaring valid the absolution imparted by a Priest to an accomplice in a shameful sin, he draws the reason from the cited decree of the Tridentine Synod; this matter will recur later.

551. ○ QUESTION 7. Can a simple Priest absolve not only at the point of death, but also in danger of death?

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is that the necessity of the penitent is almost the same in danger as at the point of death. Moreover, it is established from Canon law that the point and danger of death are taken as the same. - St. Lig.

Danger of this kind is considered present: 1. in a dangerous illness; 2. in time of plague; 3. in a difficult childbirth; 4. in a grave surgical operation; 5. before a very dangerous voyage; 6. in battle, or in other similar circumstances. - St. Lig., no. 561.

QUESTION 8. Can a simple priest absolve a dying person even when an approved Confessor is present? Reply. The Doctors disagree among themselves; and St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 562), after weighing the reasons for each opinion, finally gives his judgment in these words: Nevertheless, notwithstanding these things (namely, the arguments adduced by him for the affirmative opinion), I think that the first opinion (namely, the negative) should not be departed from, on account of the authority of the Roman Ritual (De Sacr. Poenit., near the beginning), where it is thus said: But if danger of death threatens, and an approved (note this) Confessor is lacking, any Priest can absolve from any censures and sins. Simple Priests can therefore absolve if an approved Confessor is lacking; therefore they cannot if an approved Confessor is present. Thus St. Liguori, who otherwise, although he called his own opinion most common, nevertheless expressly cites sixteen Doctors, and others tacitly, for the opposite affirmative opinion; to them nine others can easily be added from Lugo (De Poenit., disp. 18, no. 23), Diana (vol. 5, tract 8, res. 26, no. 3), Barbosa (De Off. et Potest. Ep., part 2, alleg. 25, no. 79), and the Salmanticenses (De Poenit., ch. 11, no. 29) [10]. Moreover, those who follow the affirmative opinion do not deny the probability of the negative; and likewise those who prefer the negative freely concede the probability of the affirmative, either implicitly, when they call their own opinion merely more probable, or even explicitly, as do Lezana and Stephen of St. Paul cited by the Salmanticenses (loc. cit.), and Viva, Sporer, Elbel, and Cardinal De Lugo cited by St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.). Of these the last, that is, Lugo, surely a most weighty author, thus gives his judgment concerning it (De Poenit., disp. 18, no. 23) against Aloysius Turrianus, who had called this opinion improbable: Whence it is established that Luis Turrianus went too far in censuring this opinion by saying that this opinion is improbable.... Certainly it cannot be denied that an opinion held by so many and such weighty Doctors is probable, especially since it is founded upon the words of Trent, which cannot easily be explained by the adversaries [11].

[10] Thus at least twenty-five Doctors can be produced who follow the opposite opinion. This agreement of Doctors proves that the argument sought from the Roman Ritual in this matter is not of invincible strength. For it cannot be supposed that this text was unknown to so many Doctors; yet those who adhered rather to the negative opinion considered the affirmative no less probable on that account. And indeed, although there are several things also in the Roman Ritual which pertain to defined doctrines, nevertheless some things are found concerning which freedom of disputing in the Schools is granted by the Church to the Doctors. Indeed, although Cardinal De Lugo gathered arguments sought from every side by which he might fortify that same negative opinion which he had adopted, he does not mention this reason at all.

 Against these few lines the VV. oppose no fewer than twelve columns (pp. 501-506). But to what end? They contend for two points, namely: 1. that St. Alphonsus rightly and deservedly called most common the opinion which he follows, although at least twenty-five Authors can be cited for the opposite; 2. that the principal argument for the same opinion is very rightly sought by the holy Doctor from the Roman Ritual.

Reply. As regards the first, let it suffice to observe two things briefly. And 1. indeed I truly fear that this manner of disputing by the VV. may perhaps recall to the minds of readers that saying (Deut. 25:13): You shall not have diverse weights in your bag.

And indeed let the reply be recalled here which the VV. made to those objecting that St. Alphonsus had against him the most common opinion of the Doctors when, namely (see above, no. 549, Question 4, with the Notes), he condemns with Marchant the use of probable jurisdiction unless some necessity or grave cause urges. The VV. replied in these words (p. 490): But in truth the opinion that this is lawful (namely, to absolve with probable jurisdiction) indiscriminately, without any necessity or reasonable cause, is by no means common, and much less most common, as will be evident from the following Article. But what, finally, do they bring forward in that Article of such great weight that the opposite opinion cannot be called most common, or even common? Besides Marchant, Sporer, and Elbel cited by St. Alphonsus, they themselves add the names Collet, Gonet, Henno, Holzmann, Billuart, Amort, Cuniliati, and Croix; for it has already been shown (loc. cit.) that Suarez, Reginald, Gobat, Coninck, and John Sanchez are vainly drawn by them to that side. But if that small band of authors could sufficiently enable the VV. to deny that an opinion should be called most common, or even common, which otherwise most weighty Doctors (as we saw loc. cit.) testified to be most common and vigorous in the universal practice of confessors, what reason is there for their now contending that an opinion should be called most common against which not a few, but at least twenty-five Authors stand, and which one author, as it seems, St. Alphonsus, called most common? Would anyone by an altogether less equitable right invoke here the saying: You shall not have diverse weights?

The VV. insist (p. 503) that it must be observed before all else that Doctors are not to be counted arithmetically, but weighed, and that the negative opinion (that of St. Alphonsus) is held and defended by almost all the more illustrious Doctors.

Reply. To say nothing now concerning this very recent canon according to which an opinion is or is not to be regarded as common or most common, will not that saying again recur to the minds of readers: Weight and weight, measure and measure? For did that very small band of Authors, which they themselves opposed to the most common opinion of the Doctors, consist of the more illustrious Doctors, or did they not rather oppose it to an immense company of the more illustrious?

Moreover, to add the second point here, as we said, it was not without cause written in the Note that AT LEAST twenty-five stand for the opposite opinion; for these were collected only from St. Alphonsus, Lugo, etc., and others could easily be added. But to settle the matter more briefly, it will be useful to learn from the testimonies of the Authors what, finally, is the true state of this controversy. Behold Reiffenstuel writing thus (tract 4, dist. 4, no. 33): MANY deny it... nevertheless MANY other Doctors consider the opposite probable. And Stoz (bk. 2, q. 2, no. 52): But MANY of the ancients and VERY MANY of the more recent teach the contrary opinion (from which, namely, St. Alphonsus departs). And Clericatus (De Poenit., decis. 37, no. 28): There are on each side probable opinions because of the reason and the MULTITUDE OF DOCTORS CONTENDING FOR EACH. Do these things leave room for either of those opinions to be called most common?

But now to the second head, namely, the force of the argument which St. Alphonsus takes from the Roman Ritual for his opinion. The VV. indeed (pp. 504-505) are wholly occupied in seeking the reason why no one used this argument, although so many Authors of every age touch upon this question; and they give as the reason that some wrote before the publication of that Ritual by command of Paul V, while others did not see that the same argument had been proposed by anyone.

Reply. It ought indeed to seem grievous to dwell upon these absurdities. First, does not St. Alphonsus urge that the things said in the Ritual concerning the absolution of a dying person had been established according to the approved usage of antiquity? Why, then, do the VV. present those things as unknown to Theologians before the edition published under Paul V? Moreover, does not St. Alphonsus add in the same place another argument taken from the Catechism of the Council of Trent? Will the VV. also grant that this catechism was a monument hidden from the eyes of all theologians? Rather than portray all theologians as though blind, or as strangers in a matter most familiar, let us both judge and acknowledge what the thing itself proclaims: neither did those who preferred the opinion afterward adopted by St. Alphonsus find anything in these monuments which they thought could bring any support to the cause defended by them; nor, again, did those who stood for the opposite opinion perceive in the same monuments any difficulty from which they judged that their own opinion had to be extricated.

Moreover, a fitting reason is not lacking why both the Ritual and the Catechism said that in those circumstances a simple priest can hear a confession and impart absolution if the proper priest or another approved priest is lacking. They indicate, namely, when a simple priest may exercise that ministry not only validly but also without any notoriety or astonishment among the faithful. For who does not know that it is altogether foreign to the custom of the faithful, who are generally ignorant of these matters, that they should employ as confessor one whom they know has not yet been deputed to that ministry? Does not Benedict XIV also excuse from the crime of an accomplice the priest who hears the confession of an accomplice for this reason, that another not yet approved cannot be summoned without astonishment? There was therefore a reason why that circumstance should be indicated, namely, when a simple priest could not be called by others to hear a confession, or present himself, without notoriety and astonishment. This astonishment, indeed, has already begun to cease, after the scarcity of priests has caused pastors who somewhere have no other assistant except one not yet approved not rarely to be accustomed to employ him to assist the sick and consequently to absolve them sacramentally at the opportune time.

To what was said in the Note, that those who hold the negative opinion do not deny the probability of the affirmative, the VV. object (p. 505) that very few among the older authors are found to do so, while the more recent assert it only insofar as a grave cause is present.

Reply. St. Alphonsus also mentions Viva, Sporer, Elbel, and Lugo, whose most lucid words Gury also related in the text: Certainly it cannot be denied that an opinion held by so many and such weighty Authors is probable, especially since it is founded upon the words of Trent, which cannot easily be explained by the adversaries. And in these words indeed you have solid foundations of probability, namely, the grave weight of authority (so many and such weighty Authors) and a firm reason (the words of Trent, which cannot easily be explained by the adversaries). Moreover, are not two others cited by the Salmanticenses, Lezana and Stephen of St. Paul, added to those four? Do not the VV. themselves add (loc. cit.) Palaus and Trullench? Furthermore, Reiffenstuel, Clericatus, and Stoz have been cited above on this same matter. To these can also be added Caspensis (in Mastrius, disp. 21, q. 9, art. 1, no. 204), Babenstuber, who (part 6, disp. 6, art. 1, no. 8) calls it very probable, Giraldi, who (tract 7, ch. 13, no. 18) writes: It cannot be denied to be very probable, Marchant, who (tract 2, tit. 1, q. 3, concl. 5) says: I would not wish to derogate from this opinion so as to deny that it is probable, Catalani, who (part 3, q. 6, ch. 13, no. 8) writes: I do not deny the probability of the affirmative opinion, and Mendo, who (Epit., word Confessio, no. 12) consents to the same. To these add also those who (as the VV. themselves say) call the negative opinion merely more probable. Therefore, lest we inquire further in vain, do not these things suffice so that it can truly be said that even those who prefer the negative opinion do not deny the probability of the opposite?

[11] The same Lugo, with regard to the negative opinion which he himself otherwise prefers, observes (loc. cit., no. 25) that the principal foundation for it is taken by some (in fact most of them) from the end of the concession, which was to come to the aid of the necessity of the faithful; this certainly seems to cease when an approved Confessor is present. This reason, however (he continues), in my judgment would not suffice to separate the universality of the words (namely, of the Council of Trent) and the absolute concession which the first opinion (namely, the affirmative) brings forward for itself. For the necessity of the faithful could have moved it to grant the faculty with that whole breadth.

He himself, however, seemed to find a firmer foundation in this, that the Synod had said that this had always been observed in the Church: as though, namely, it had not always been the custom in the Church that, when a Prelate was present, an inferior priest could absolve a dying person from reserved sins. But, with due respect to so great a man, these things seem directly to conflict with the words of the Synod itself, which expressly testifies (sess. 14, ch. 7) that it has always been observed in the same Church of God that THERE IS NO RESERVATION AT THE POINT OF DEATH. But where there is no reservation, the question who has the faculty over reserved sins is plainly superfluous.

It must be observed, moreover, that before the Tridentine Synod the approval of the Ordinary was by no means necessary for hearing confessions. This alone, therefore, was required: that jurisdiction be conferred by the Bishop or Pastor, either directly, when some priest was designated to hear confessions, or indirectly, when the faithful were given the faculty of choosing some priest as Confessor. Hence, since according to the testimony of the Tridentine Synod it had always been observed in the Church of God that at the point of death any priest could absolve any penitents from any sins and censures, the matter comes to this: jurisdiction was considered to be granted to any priest in that case, and consequently the penitent could choose any priest. But, as we have said, no approval of the Ordinary was then necessary, and consequently there could be no distinction between approved and unapproved priests. Therefore the hypothesis is empty by which it is imagined that, from the custom of those times, an approved priest was to have been preferred to an unapproved one at the point of death.

552. ○ QUESTION 9. Can a Pastor summon a Pastor of the same or of a different diocese to hear confessions in his parish?

Reply 1. As regards a Pastor of the same diocese, although by force of his office he has special jurisdiction only for his own parish, nevertheless, by an almost universal custom, he can hear confessions throughout the whole diocese also, unless the Bishop decrees otherwise. The proper customs of places, however, must be consulted.

Reply 2. As regards a Pastor of a different diocese, diverse opinions are given, as Benedict XIV says (Instit. 86, no. 7). Those who affirm argue from Trent that a parochial benefice serves for universal approval. Others deny it; their opinion, St. Lig. says (no. 544), receives strength from a Reply of the Sacred Congregation of the Council dated December 31, 1707. - Benedict XIV admits the first opinion in those places where such a custom exists.

553. ○ QUESTION 10. Can a Priest approved by the Bishop hear the confessions of the faithful without the permission of the Pastor?

Reply 1. As regards liceity, negative, if confessions are heard in a Church subject to the Pastor. The reason is that due order altogether requires that, since the Pastor is the immediate Superior in his Church, permission to exercise sacred ministries there be sought from him. The Pastor's permission is not required, however, for hearing confessions in a chapel of regulars or nuns; the permission of the local Superior or Superioress suffices. Reply 2. As regards validity, it is certain according to all that the permission of the Pastor is not required outside the case of annual confession. Indeed, it is not required even for annual confession, at least of itself, or by common law. This is established from the common doctrine of the Theologians against certain persons, and also from the present custom and universal practice of the Church, as Benedict XIV testifies, Instit. 18. But if somewhere this custom does not prevail, the confessions are nevertheless to be regarded as valid unless the Bishop expressly contradicts it; for if he is silent, he seems to consent to the universal custom of the Church [12]. - Gousset, no. 478.

[12] John XXII (C. Vas electionis, Extrav. De haereticis) condemned also this article of John of Pouilly, Doctor of Paris: The decree Omnis utriusque sexus remaining in force in a General Council, the Roman Pontiff cannot bring it about that parishioners are not bound to confess all their sins once a year to their proper priest.

Launoy revived the condemned error; and when this opinion, hostile to peace, had begun to infect pastors in France, Clement VIII in the year 1592 issued this decree (in Benedict XIV, Inst. 18, no. 7): We decree that both the said Friars... and the other aforesaid privileged persons to whom this has been granted by the Apostolic See, provided they are fit and approved by the Ordinary, may lawfully confess their sins, even at the Lenten and Paschal seasons and at any other time....

And Clement X (Const. Superna, sect. 4, no. 5) decrees and declares that Regulars once approved can, in the diocese of the approving Bishop, at any time of the year, even the Paschal season, hear the confessions even of any sick persons without any permission of the pastors or the Bishop...; and that those who have confessed to the said simply approved Religious at the Paschal season have satisfied the Constitution which begins Omnis utriusque sexus, with regard to confession alone.

As regards the hypothesis mentioned by the Author, however, of a Bishop contradicting it, there exists in Pignatelli and Pitonius (De Confess., no. 36) a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation dated April 5, 1584, expressed in these words: The decree of a Bishop in which it is stated that no Confessor, even one approved by the Ordinary, may hear the confessions of anyone during the Paschal season without the permission of the proper pastor is in no way to be observed.

554. ○ QUESTION 11. Does a delegate validly and licitly absolve after the expiration of the term of a delegation to be renewed annually, for example, if a crowd of penitents should come together for some great solemnity?

Reply 1. Of itself he absolves invalidly, that is, by reason of jurisdiction, because in fact he has none. Nevertheless, more probably he absolves validly by reason of common error, on account of which the Church is considered to supply for the good of souls.

Reply 2. Of itself the Priest sins gravely if he knowingly does this. The reason is that he exercises the office of Confessor without legitimate authority; and although the Church then supplies, he is nevertheless guilty because he improperly compels her to supply.

QUESTION 12. Can a Priest approved in some place hear the confessions of travelers arriving there? Reply 1. Affirmative absolutely as regards Regular Confessors, who have this special privilege from the Holy Apostolic See. - See the Constitution Superna of Clement X [13].

[13] And in the Constitution Inter cunctas of Paul III to the Fathers of the Society of Jesus: Those of you who are priests may hear the confessions of any of Christ's faithful of either sex coming to you from anywhere, etc.; this privilege is established to be common also to the other Mendicant Regulars.

Reply 2. Affirmative also as regards secular Priests. The reason is that such is the custom, having force from the tacit consent of the Ordinaries, which is equivalent to present ratification. - Thus more commonly the Theologians and Canonists. - See St. Lig., no. 569.

555. ○ QUESTION 13. Can a Bishop under pain of invalidity prohibit his diocesans from going outside the diocese to confess?

Reply 1. Negative, if they go outside the diocese to confess to Regular Confessors, who have the privilege of hearing the confessions of all the faithful coming from anywhere. - Suarez, De Relig., tract 10, bk. 9, ch. 2, no. 8; Reiffenstuel, tract 14, dist. 8, q. 1, no. 11; Laymann, bk. 5, tract 6, ch. 10.

It is confirmed by a Declaration of the Sacred Congregation in Fagnanus, on the chapter Omnis utriusque sexus, no. 79, where it has this: The Sacred Congregation declared that Regulars within the diocese of the approving Bishop can also absolve penitents of another diocese, since they have jurisdiction from the Pope..., whose jurisdiction is not restricted to the limits of any territory, but the whole world is his diocese.

Reply 2. Affirmative, if they confess in another diocese to secular Priests. The reason is that, as Fagnanus says, by common law no Priest can absolve a penitent not subject to him, even in that diocese in which he is approved; nor can the tacit consent of the Bishop of the penitents be supposed in the case, since by hypothesis he is unwilling [14].

[14] In this sense Palaus, Lugo, the Salmanticenses, Bonacina, Suarez, Vasquez, etc., are to be understood, whom St. Alphonsus (bk. 6, no. 569) cites as limiting the faculty granted to travelers of confessing to any approved priest of the place in which they are found by this condition: provided that they do not deliberately depart from their own domicile in order to confess elsewhere. And since those Doctors speak in this sense, what St. Alphonsus with Tamburini and Mazzotta urges against them cannot be admitted, that it is a general rule of law that no one is considered to act fraudulently who uses his own right. For there is no right of confessing outside the diocese against the will of one's proper Ordinary; nor can a contrary custom be introduced, because of that Constitution (C. Si Episcopus 2, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI): Nor can it be introduced by any custom that someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, may choose for himself a confessor who can loose or bind him.

The Doctors give this most lucid reason for that Constitution: a custom of this kind is repugnant to divine law, which establishes that no one can be loosed or bound except by his proper judge. Thus Suarez (De Poenit., disp. 27, sect. 3, no. 5): It is replied that to choose a confessor without the permission of one's proper Bishop is repugnant to divine law; and therefore the Pontiff (Boniface VIII) signified in that text (C. Si Episcopus) that custom cannot prescribe against this law; in which this custom differs greatly from any other human law. You have the same from Dominic Soto (In IV, dist. 18, q. 4, art. 2, concl. 1), Vasquez (In III Part., q. 93, art. 2, dub. 2, nos. 5-6), and, omitting others, from Melchior Cano, who (Relect. De Poenit., part 6) completes the matter briefly thus: It must be held as established that the precept of confessing to one's proper priest is divine.... Therefore without a commission of this kind (delegation of the Ordinary) an alien priest is not the minister of this sacrament; and consequently by divine law we are bound to confess to our proper priest. For a confession which is made to another by the faculty of the proper priest is considered to be made to the proper priest. And hence he repeats that it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone may choose for himself a confessor apart from the permission of his Superior, etc., as the cited chapter Si Episcopus has it. For, as Cano adds, If it were only of positive law, some custom could prevail. And (note well) he concludes: All the scholastic Authors agree in this opinion, and therefore Blessed Thomas, etc.

 The interpretation of St. Alphonsus's mind which is appended at the end of this Note ought surely not to have seemed gratuitous. For the text of the holy Doctor (bk. 6, no. 569) has thus: The Doctors commonly teach that travelers, in view of custom and the tacit consent of the Bishops, can confess to any approved priest in the place where they are found. Thus Palaus, Lugo, Concina, the Salmanticenses, Bonacina, with Suarez, Vasquez, etc. The aforesaid Authors nevertheless limit this: provided that the travelers themselves do not deliberately depart from their own domicile in order to confess elsewhere. But Tamburini, Renzi, and Mazzotta, with Pontius, Filliucius, and others, say more truly that the aforesaid limitation need not necessarily be observed, from that general rule of law that no one is considered to act fraudulently who uses his own right; nor, moreover, is it established from elsewhere that the Ordinaries have ever given any sign of their dissent in the aforesaid case. As though he said: The common opinion is that travelers, in view of the consent of the Bishops and custom, can confess, etc. But it in no way appears that this consent is lacking even if travelers deliberately depart in order to confess elsewhere. Therefore the aforesaid limitation of the Doctors need not necessarily be observed, etc. Therefore a sense foreign to St. Alphonsus's words was not gratuitously attributed to him in the Note.

This one thing perhaps remained: that in the Note itself it should have been indicated more expressly that the holy Doctor does not altogether seem to have grasped the sense of the aforesaid limitation among the Authors cited, as though, namely, they considered invalid the confession of a traveler confessing outside the diocese even when no indication of dissent by the Ordinaries appears. For an abnormal opinion of this kind is entirely foreign to their mind; and therefore it was said in the Note that they are to be understood as speaking of those confessing outside the diocese against the will of their proper Ordinary. That point was omitted because it was already sufficiently clear from the entire context of the Note.

But behold, the VV. protest (p. 508) that these are not the sentiments of the holy Doctor; for (they say) those words, the Ordinaries have never given any sign of their dissent, are not those of St. Alphonsus, but of Tamburini, whose opinion the holy Doctor adduces.

Reply. I, however, would never consider it lawful for me to write these things concerning St. Alphonsus. For if we believe the VV. here, the quoted words are so far from being attributed to St. Alphonsus that the holy Doctor rather rejects them, as expressing an opinion rejected by him. But who, I ask, could so deny trust to his own eyes as to admit these things? Is there even the slightest indication in the cited text of the holy Doctor that he does not admit, but rather rejects, that final part of the opinion? Indeed, does he not adopt the entire opinion of those Authors as his own (they say more truly, he says), and oppose it to the preceding opinion, which imposed the limitation rejected by him? All the more because he does not there report the words or text of Tamburini, as the VV. suppose to the contrary, but expresses in his own words the sentiments which are common both to Tamburini and Mazzotta and Filliucius, and even to Pontius (in Tamburini, bk. 5, ch. 4, sect. 3, nos. 11 and 12), all of whom expressly suppose that the consent of the Ordinaries is not lacking.

But the reason which moved the VV. here to distort the opinion of the holy Doctor in this way is not obscure. For elsewhere, as we shall see, the holy Doctor has certain things which in the case exclude the consent of the Ordinaries, and therefore directly contradict the obvious sense of the text cited above, which supposes the consent of the Ordinaries to be necessary.

Nor, however, do the VV. thus sufficiently consult the honor of the holy Doctor. For either they contend that even in the cited text the holy Doctor wished, against the common opinion of the Doctors, to exclude the necessity of the consent of the Ordinaries; and besides the fact that they openly do violence to the words of the holy Doctor, they furthermore represent St. Alphonsus as a man who, in order to exclude the necessity of consent of this kind, irrelevantly and altogether incongruously objects against the adversaries that doctrine of the Authors which professes that consent to be altogether necessary. Or they concede, as the context requires, that the holy Doctor, with the Authors whose doctrine he adopts, supposes the consent of the Ordinaries to be necessary; and thus the charge of contradiction cannot be avoided in any way.

1. But now let us approach the principal point of the controversy. Although the VV. could produce no text of St. Alphonsus in which the holy Doctor affirms that absolution is valid if someone, against the will of his proper Ordinary, seeks it from a Confessor outside the Diocese, they nevertheless bring forward another passage of the holy Doctor (p. 511) from which they might deduce this, namely, where St. Alphonsus denies that absolution is imparted to visitors from the consent of their Ordinaries. For the holy Doctor has thus (bk. 6, no. 588): Travelers, according to the present custom..., namely, because they are absolved everywhere by any approved confessor, are today no longer absolved by the will of their Bishops, but by the will of the Church, which, by approving such a custom, has granted the faculty that they be regarded as inhabitants of the place where they confess. And indeed from this principle laid down that consequence follows of itself. For the confession made to an alien priest would therefore be considered invalid because, if the proper Ordinary absolutely resists, he assuredly does not communicate jurisdiction to the alien priest. But that principle of St. Alphonsus supposes that jurisdiction is possessed from elsewhere, and not from the proper Ordinary of the penitent. Therefore the reason why that confession should be considered invalid ceases.

To defend this new opinion of St. Alphonsus, the VV. attempt to establish three things: 1. that St. Alphonsus rightly relies upon custom; 2. that the Constitution of Boniface VIII cited above in the Note presents no obstacle; 3. that it is falsely affirmed that jurisdiction must be given by the Superior of the person who is to be absolved.

Since this concerns the supreme principles by which the whole economy of interior jurisdiction, or jurisdiction of the internal forum, is governed, it is fitting to dwell somewhat more laboriously upon these matters, and at least in part to supply those things which were otherwise omitted for the sake of brevity. See the Note at no. 573 in the edition of 1869.

2. And to begin with the last point, upon which all the others in reality depend, the VV. (p. 526) do not hesitate to place this title over their article (art. 1, q. 13): The distinguished Professor improperly asserts as an axiom the doctrine held among all, that jurisdiction must be given by the Superior of the person who is to be absolved.

Reply. If, in order to defend this new theory of St. Alphonsus, it is necessary to deny the doctrine that jurisdiction must be given by the Superior of the person who is to be absolved, this indeed ought to be sufficient for judging in what place this new theory can and ought to be held.

And indeed jurisdiction is defined as power over subjects; but he is called a Superior who has this power ordinarily, that is, by reason of Office, and can give or delegate it to others. I ask: since no one gives or can give what he does not have, who besides the Superior can give that power or jurisdiction?

3. Nor indeed is there question here of mere tenets of the School. It is a decree of the Council of Florence: The minister of this sacrament is a priest having authority to absolve, either ordinary or by commission of a Superior. How, then, will an authority to absolve now be thrust upon us which is neither ordinary nor committed by a Superior?

4. It is a decree of the Council of Trent (sess. 14, ch. 7): Since the nature and character of a judgment demand that sentence be rendered upon subjects alone, it has always been held as certain in the Church of God that the absolution which a priest pronounces upon one over whom he has neither ordinary nor subdelegated jurisdiction ought to be of no moment. Whence thus: it is essential that sentence be rendered upon subjects alone; otherwise absolution is of no moment. But he has no subjects who has no jurisdiction, either ordinary or subdelegated, that is, committed by a Superior. How, therefore, will anyone infer a jurisdiction for absolving which is neither ordinary nor handed down by a Superior?

5. Since, moreover, this (as the Tridentine Synod has it) has always been held as certain in the Church of God, hence that saying of Innocent III in the Lateran Council (chapter Utriusque sexus 12, De Poenit. et Remiss.): If anyone, however, for a just cause wishes to confess his sins to an alien priest, let him first seek and obtain permission from his proper priest, since otherwise the latter cannot absolve or bind him. And since by the name proper priest here can be meant only one who has ordinary power, because only one who possesses ordinary jurisdiction can give permission, that is, delegate jurisdiction (with respect to each of the faithful, however, three persons subordinated to one another possess this ordinary power, namely, the proper Pastor, the proper Bishop, and the Roman Pontiff), therefore it is necessary that whoever does not have ordinary jurisdiction, who is here called an alien priest, obtain it from one having ordinary jurisdiction, that is, from a Superior. How, then, can anyone produce a jurisdiction which some priest has not received from the Superior to whom the subject belongs?

6. Nor is there reason for anyone to remain uncertain concerning the sense of those words, let him first seek permission, etc. For permission to confess to an alien priest, just as also the faculty of choosing a confessor, or the faculty of subjecting oneself to an alien priest, or to commit one's subject to another, and other modes of speaking of this kind, signify, as is most well known, the delegation of jurisdiction. St. Bonaventure (In IV, dist. 17, part 3, art. 1, q. 2) expressed it in these words: To commit to another one's own right and the power of absolving. St. Thomas, however: To commit those things which belong to jurisdiction, as he has (Suppl., q. 8, art. 6, ad 1): Someone can use the jurisdiction of another by the latter's will, because those things which belong to jurisdiction can be committed.

7. The aforesaid forms of speaking refer to a twofold manner of granting jurisdiction, namely, directly and indirectly. For, as Suarez says (De Poenit., disp. 28, beginning), jurisdiction can be granted or delegated in two ways: first, directly, by granting jurisdiction to a priest...; secondly, on the part of the penitent, when someone is granted the faculty of choosing a confessor, not as though jurisdiction were given to the penitent to whom permission is granted, but, as the same author has it (sect. 1, no. 2), it is only a power to choose or designate such a person; and when he has been designated, the Pontiff or ecclesiastical Prelate who gave such a faculty confers jurisdiction upon him. It must therefore be held as settled and certain that the formulas to give permission to confess to an alien priest, or to choose an alien priest, and other similar formulas, signify delegation or the conferral of jurisdiction upon that priest to whom the subject will confess.

8. From this it follows that there is no need that the priest who is chosen in the case already have jurisdiction from elsewhere. For the jurisdiction required for absolving this penitent is conferred upon him by the very fact that he is chosen. Francis de Vitoria expressed this clearly thus (Sum., no. 150): It is asked whether one who has authority to choose a confessor... can choose a simple priest not yet appointed to hear confessions. I reply absolutely... that without any scruple he can choose any priest, as Cajetan also says.... The reason is that in this alone does a priest having jurisdiction differ from one not having it: the former has matter, while the latter does not; and nothing else is lacking to the latter for being able to absolve except matter upon which he may exercise the power which he received when he was ordained. Since, therefore, one receiving (the faculty of choosing) is given the power of subjecting himself to whomever he wills, the priest thus chosen now has matter and jurisdiction concerning him; hence nothing is lacking to him. This doctrine is afterward called common among the Doctors by the same Author.

Concerning this matter, among others, Suarez also says (De Poenit., disp. 28, sect. 3, no. 5): I say first: before the Council of Trent, a Pastor by force of common law could validly and licitly commit his jurisdiction to any priest who according to natural or divine law was fit to minister this sacrament, even if he did not have any other jurisdiction or the approval of the Bishop. And again (ibid., no. 6): I say secondly: according to the ancient law, by a general faculty given for choosing a confessor, any priest fit by divine law could be chosen, without any other condition or approval required by human law. From where, however, did jurisdiction come in the case to the priest chosen, unless from the Superior who gave permission to choose?

Nor indeed is the condition of things different after Trent. For the difference consists only in this, that now the priest who is chosen needs the approval of the Ordinary in whose territory he hears the confession. Nevertheless he needs jurisdiction, which in the case is from the choice of the penitent. Hence Melchior Cano (Relect. de Poenit., part 6): An approved priest can be chosen even if otherwise he has no subjects and no jurisdiction whatever.

Let the conclusion therefore finally be this: It is a doctrine defined in the Ecumenical Councils of Florence, Trent, and Lateran that an absolution conferred by another besides the proper Superior is invalid apart from a commission or permission obtained from that same Superior. But a commission or permission of this kind signifies the direct or indirect communication of jurisdiction. Therefore every absolution imparted without jurisdiction conferred by the penitent's Superior is invalid.

9. Hence, when treating of confession to be made outside the diocese, both Theologians and Canonists, all alike, both older and more recent, always mention, and indeed inculcate, the necessity of permission, commission, or consent of the Superiors or proper Ordinaries.

Of the older authors Cardinal Turrecremata will suffice, who writes thus (In Cap. Omnis De Poenit., no. 6): A penitent desiring to confess to an alien priest... must seek permission from his own proper priest or from a Superior. It is evident, because the alien priest, without a commission made to him by one of them, has no power. This is evident from the chapter Omnis utriusque, etc.

As regards the more recent, Azor (part 2, bk. 3, ch. 12, q. 10), to the question whether the rector of one parish can hear the confessions of a parishioner of another, replies: By no means, unless with the express or tacit consent of that Rector to whom that parishioner is subject; for jurisdiction is required for hearing the sacred confession of penance. Do you see how consent here signifies the conferral of jurisdiction?

Valentia (vol. 4, disp. 7, q. 10, punct. 2): It is noted here by the Doctors that one must ALWAYS seek permission from that confessor to whose care a person is otherwise committed, so that he may confess to another. And after citing the chapter Omnis utriusque, he adds: Where it is prescribed that if anyone for a just cause wishes to confess to an alien priest, he is not to do so except with the permission of his proper priest.

Becanus (De Sacram., ch. 38, q. 7, no. 2): It is prescribed that each person confess to his proper priest, or to an alien priest with the consent of his proper priest.... In this sense Trent defined... that the absolution which a priest pronounces upon one over whom he has neither ordinary nor subdelegated jurisdiction is of no moment. Do you see how consent is equivalent to delegation of jurisdiction?

Laymann (De Poenit., ch. 10, nos. 9-10) teaches concerning travelers that they can be absolved by the tacit will of the Ordinaries.

And Roncaglia (De Poenit., q. 7, ch. 2, q. 2): The power of absolving... subjects of another Bishop is founded upon the tacit consent of the Prelates..., so that their proper subjects may be absolved even outside the diocese.

And the Salmanticenses (De Poenit., ch. 11, no. 53) likewise establish that travelers can be absolved in view of custom and the tacit consent of their Pastors.

And Filliucius (tract 7, ch. 9) not only establishes (no. 195) that travelers can confess by the tacit permission of the pastors, but clearly explains (nos. 227-228) that, when someone is given the faculty of choosing a confessor, once the choice has been made, Christ THROUGH THE PASTORS gives jurisdiction to that confessor.

And Palaus (tract 3, disp. 6, part 7, sect. 2, no. 6): Although the Ordinary of the place can minister the sacrament of penance to outsiders and travelers..., he has this from the concession of their proper Ordinary. He repeats this (tract 23, part 13, no. 12).

And Esparza (bk. 10, q. 93, art. 3): The order of Hierarchy in the Church of God demands that each Ordinary have jurisdiction of the forum, even the interior forum, contained within the limits of his diocese, in such a way that no one can validly involve himself with regard to juridical acts concerning the sheep of another, or concerning subjects belonging to another in spiritual matters, EXCEPT BY HIS CONSENT AND DELEGATION.

And lest we gather more here with useless labor, see those things which appear below in the Note at no. 573, where the words of Amort testify concerning the unanimous and constant doctrine of the Church, and where also the texts of the Canonists Pichler and Fagnanus are brought forward. To these can be added Schmalzgrueber (bk. 5, tit. 38, no. 38), and Wiestner, who (bk. 5, tit. 38, no. 57) gives as the reason that sacramental absolution is a judicial act or sentence.... But the nature and character of a judgment demand that sentence be rendered upon subjects alone, since no one can be bound or absolved by one who is not his judge; and Pirhing, who (bk. 1, tit. 31, no. 147) therefore denies that the confessions of visitors can be heard without the express or tacit consent of their proper pastor, since absolution is a judicial act which can be exercised neither licitly nor validly upon one over whom the priest has neither ordinary nor delegated jurisdiction.

10. And worthy of attention are the words by which the same Pirhing expresses the same doctrine thus (bk. 5, tit. 38, no. 35): Nor can a diocesan without the consent of his Ordinary subject himself to the jurisdiction of a pastor who is not his own. There are, of course, some who think that the question can be resolved in the contrary sense by asserting that a visitor becomes the subject of another by the very fact that through confession he subjects himself to that priest, although a stranger. These persons scarcely observe that, according to the meaning of the Doctors, to confer jurisdiction is the same as to assign subjects to someone. What, however, is more absurd than that jurisdiction should be conferred by the penitent merely because he presents himself as subject to the priest? The Theologians do not so speak. Hence Melchior Cano (Relect. de Poenit., part 6) aptly observes that only one who has the faculty from his proper priest presents himself as subject to the confessor whom he chooses. We saw the same noted by Francis de Vitoria above, no. 8: only to one receiving the faculty of choosing is given the power of subjecting himself to whomever he wills. Hence Engel also (Man. Paroch., part 3, ch. 2, no. 6) warned that someone can subject himself to an alien priest only insofar as his proper Ordinary can give that subject permission to submit himself to the jurisdiction of another.

11. Moreover, nothing shows more clearly how far the necessity of the consent of the Ordinary extends, so that by reason of jurisdiction a confession with an alien priest may be valid, than the doctrine of the Authors whom we cited in the Note, who deny validity if the consent of the Superior is lacking.

Thus Lugo briefly (disp. 19, no. 7): Those who travel and make a journey can now, by the tacit will of their Pastors, confess even to that Pastor whom they find in the place where they are, provided nevertheless that they did not deliberately depart from their domicile in order, on the occasion of the journey, to confess to another.

And Suarez (disp. 25, sect. 2, no. 9): It must be observed that good faith is necessary here; for if someone undertook the journey solely for this, that he might have an occasion of confessing to another and not to his proper priest, that would no longer be necessity, but will, and would not be according to the intention of the pastors or according to the custom of the Church; and therefore the confession would not be valid.

And Palaus (tract 23, punct. 13, no. 12): If you were to undertake the journey solely for this, that you might confess to another and avoid confession to be made to your proper pastor, you could not use the aforesaid privilege and faculty; since... they are not possessed from the tacit consent of the proper pastor, and you do not conform yourself to the intention of the Church.

And Bonacina (De Poenit., disp. 5, q. 7, punct. 2, no. 6): Therefore he who undertakes a journey solely for this end, that he may avoid his proper pastor and confess to another, cannot validly confess before the pastor or priest of the place to which he comes, as Coninck, Vasquez, Suarez, Reginald, and other more recent authors well observe.

Moreover, it has already been observed above that these Authors suppose the consent of the proper pastor to be lacking in the case, which Palaus expressly intimates; and therefore, as we saw, Tamburini, Mazzotta, Filliucius, etc., who are customarily cited against them, suppose on the contrary that consent is not lacking.

12. But nothing shows the state of this controversy better than an examination of the reasons by which the new theory is defended. And indeed St. Alphonsus proposed thus (bk. 6, no. 588) that thesis which the VV. also endeavor to defend: Travelers today are no longer absolved by the will of their Bishops.

Let us ask: Did the holy Doctor produce even one author, or could he produce one, for that thesis? Did he confirm it by any argument?

But the VV. also established this thesis, as we have seen: The doctrine that jurisdiction must be given by the Superior of the person who is to be absolved is improperly asserted as an axiom held among all. Again let us ask here: Did they produce even one author, or could they produce one, for a thesis of this kind?

But, you will say, the VV. confirm the thesis by reason. Reply. They indeed bring forward a reason (p. 525), but such a reason as openly makes clear that every solid reason is entirely lacking to them. For they argue thus: From the Constitution of Innocent XII, confirmed by Benedict XIV, Confessors, both secular and regular, whoever they may be..., can in no way hear confessions without the approval of the Bishop of the place in which the penitents themselves reside and choose confessors.... Nor for this does approval once or several times obtained from other Ordinaries of other dioceses avail, even if the penitents were subjects of those Ordinaries who had approved the confessors. But, as Gury says, Bishops now confer jurisdiction together with approval..., and hence by common usage jurisdiction also is called approval. Therefore no Bishop can delegate confessors in another diocese to absolve his own diocesans from sins....

Reply. There will be someone, it seems, who judges that the connection between the premises and the conclusion of this argument is wanting. Accordingly, he will think the reply should be: I concede the Major; I concede the Minor, or let it pass; I deny the Consequent and the Consequence. Another, however, after conceding the Major, will distinguish the Minor thus: Bishops now confer jurisdiction together with approval. Distinguish: they confer it upon those who need it, let it pass; upon those also who do not need it, such as Regulars, subdistinguish: as though it were necessary to them for the ministry of absolving, I deny, because Regulars have jurisdiction not from the Bishop who approves them, but from the Apostolic See; by way of superabundance, let it pass. But another will distinguish the Minor in yet another way thus: Bishops now confer jurisdiction together with approval. Distinguish: jurisdiction over their own subjects, I concede, or let it pass; jurisdiction over those who are not their subjects, such as visitors from another diocese, I deny. For Bishops have no jurisdiction over those who are not their subjects; therefore they cannot give it to others, because no one gives what he does not have.

Accordingly Reiffenstuel (tract 14, dist. 1, q. 1, no. 15), in order to prove that exempt Regulars receive jurisdiction not from the Bishop who otherwise approves them, but from the Apostolic See, argues thus: There is added the reason that the Bishop of the place cannot give so extensive a jurisdiction of hearing the confessions of all the faithful coming from anywhere and of absolving them.... And Laymann, in order to prove that Regulars also need the consent or commission of their own Prelates, writes thus (bk. 5, tract 6, ch. 10, no. 19): Ludovicus Miranda well warns that Priests of Mendicant Orders, in order to obtain the said faculty, need, in addition to the approval of the Bishop, the consent of the Prelate or Chapter according to the custom of each Order; since the Bishop cannot give so extensive a jurisdiction of hearing the confessions of all the faithful coming from anywhere and of absolving them...; but Confessors of the Mendicant Orders receive it from the Supreme Pontiff with dependence upon the consent and will of their Prelates.

13. Therefore, to remove the confusion introduced here by the VV., let those things which pertain to approval and those which pertain to jurisdiction be properly distinguished. The approval of the Bishop in whose territory the confession is made is in a certain manner a condition by which a priest becomes capable of receiving and exercising jurisdiction, from whomever having ordinary jurisdiction it may finally be delegated to him. For it is not necessary that the same priest be approved by all those who may wish to delegate jurisdiction to him. Thus a Regular Prelate, granting to a religious subject the faculty of confessing to secular priests approved by the Ordinary of the place, himself, and not the Bishop, delegates jurisdiction to them; but the Bishop, and not he himself, approves them. Thus a priest deputed by a Regular Prelate to hear the confessions of Nuns exempt from the jurisdiction of the Bishop has jurisdiction not from the Bishop, but from the Regular Prelate; nevertheless he must have approval not from the Regular Prelate, but from the Bishop. And the same thing, in a word, occurs when there is question of those exempt from the Bishop's jurisdiction who nevertheless must choose one approved by the Bishop of the place. And since there is a twofold class of exempt persons, or non-subjects - some are such by reason of Privilege, although they have domicile in the Bishop's territory, as, for example, Regulars; others, however, are such by their nature, or by separation of territory, such as subjects of another diocese - the same rule applies to all of them. Hence that statement of Suarez (De Relig., tract 10, bk. 9, ch. 2, no. 9): Whence it is established that a confessor (from the Mendicants) residing here and approved by the Prelate of this diocese alone can hear the confessions of all who come here to him, even from other episcopates, although such a confessor does not have approval from their Bishops....

Let us conclude, therefore, that the thesis proposed in the Note and opposed by the VV. - namely, that it is to be held as an axiom that jurisdiction must be given by the Superior of the person who is to be absolved - has in its favor the manifest doctrine of the Church defined in Ecumenical Councils, and at the same time the unanimous opinion of the Catholic School; but that the opposite thesis is supported by no aid of authority or reason, not even in appearance.

13. Now to that which the VV. add in defense of that new doctrine. As we saw above, no. 1, they establish two things, namely: 1. that St. Alphonsus rightly relies upon custom; 2. that the Constitution of Boniface VIII cited in the Note presents no obstacle. Yet while the VV. unfold these things, they sufficiently show that they have perceived themselves to be in difficulty.

14. They set forth the first point thus (p. 511): St. Alphonsus rightly teaches that, from a universal custom approved by the Church, Travelers can confess to any confessor approved in the place, even a secular one, provided they do not go into another diocese in fraud of reservation. But someone will reply: Let the whole pass; for these things do not attack the contrary thesis, which denies absolution to be valid only when someone confesses outside the diocese against the resistance and will of his proper Ordinary. But the VV. say nothing there concerning this.

The VV. proceed, bringing forward the words of Filliucius and Tamburini, concerning whom we spoke at the beginning of this Note. But another will reply that these things also do not strike the contrary thesis. For Filliucius and Tamburini suppose that the Ordinary of the penitent does not dissent; Gury, on the contrary, supposes that the Ordinary resists. Therefore these things do not pertain to the matter; indeed, they suggest the opposite.

But behold, after these things the VV. add as a consequence that St. Alphonsus deservedly asserted that travelers today are no longer absolved by the will of their Bishops, nor is it now any longer asked whether some Bishop has given a sign of dissent. But another will reply: From which of the premises does a consequence of this kind flow?

To confirm these things, the VV. add (pp. 510 and 512) that Bonacina denies that one is validly absolved who confesses elsewhere in order to avoid his proper pastor, while Mazzotta adds that he is validly absolved from the tacit consent of the Ordinaries, or rather of the Pope. But another will reply: Do these things prove that absolution is valid if someone goes to confess to an alien priest against the resistance of his proper Pastor? Do they not rather establish the opposite? Moreover, as regards Mazzotta and Bonacina altogether irrelevantly introducing mention of the Pope here, it must be replied briefly: 1. nothing is extracted from this by which it is proved that absolution imparted by an alien priest is valid when the proper Ordinary resists; 2. this anomaly of recurring to the Pope is to be numbered among those confusions of which there is discussion below in the Note at no. 573, question 5.

15. The VV. themselves describe thus the custom upon which they say St. Alphonsus relied when he denies that travelers today are absolved by the will of their Bishops: In his time, and indeed long before, confessors not only in some places, provinces, or kingdoms, but throughout the whole world, indiscriminately received any penitents who came to them and treated them in the same manner as inhabitants, not inquiring whether they were travelers, or, if they learned this accidentally, whether their Bishop consented and did not object, nor investigating with what intention they had undertaken the journey.... And the Church approved this universal custom; for the Supreme Pontiffs never reproved in the least the same practice prevailing even at Rome under their eyes. But no one denies that a universal custom approved by the Church has the force of law, and indeed the same force as a written law. And therefore it is no longer asked whether any Bishop has given a sign of dissent, for no Bishop has power to contradict a universal law, whether written or unwritten. This, moreover, is the custom to which the VV. afterward say (p. 512) that the Constitution of Boniface VIII presents no obstacle.

16. Let it now be passed over whether all the things pertaining to the practice just described by the VV. can be proved. For someone could ask, for example, whether satisfaction is made to the law which forbids the absolution of those who go into another diocese in fraud of reservation when confessors, as the VV. say, indiscriminately receive any penitents who come to them and treat them in the same manner as inhabitants, not inquiring whether they are travelers, or, if they learn this accidentally, whether their Bishop consents and does not object, nor investigating with what intention they have undertaken the journey. These matters will be treated more suitably elsewhere.

As regards the present matter, it is of the greatest importance accurately to know the nature both of the custom which the VV. describe and contend to have been approved, and of the custom which Boniface VIII, in chapter Si Episcopus 2, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI, defines cannot be introduced. For from this comparison it will be evident whether the definition of Boniface VIII is rightly or wrongly objected against a new theory of this kind.

17. And indeed it can be said to be by no means obscure what is meant by the custom of which Boniface VIII speaks. Nor can it be introduced by any custom (he says) that someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, may choose for himself a confessor who can loose or bind him. These words clearly refer to the Definition of the Lateran Council (in chapter Omnis utriusque) which establishes these things: If anyone, however, for a just cause wishes to confess his sins to an alien priest, let him first seek and obtain permission from his proper priest, since otherwise the latter cannot absolve or bind him. By that canon, therefore, Boniface defines that no custom can be introduced contrary to the practice concerning which the Lateran Council issued a definition. But, as we saw above, nos. 4-8, the definition of the Lateran Council has this purpose: that no one can validly confess to another besides his Superior unless that other receives delegated jurisdiction from the same Superior; for this is signified when permission is said to be given. Therefore the definition of Boniface signifies that no custom can be introduced by virtue of which someone can validly confess to another besides his Superior unless that Superior, by giving permission, has delegated his jurisdiction to him.

Concerning the permission which the Lateran Synod defines to be necessary, Cajetan says, for example (Sum., word Absolutio, 2): Permission is given in two ways. Either explicitly: when the Pastor says to the people in common, Let each person go to confess to whom he wills; or he says specially to someone, Confess to whom you will; AND THIS IS NOTHING OTHER THAN TO GIVE PERMISSION TO CHOOSE A CONFESSOR FOR HIMSELF. Or implicitly. And this happens first by permitting subjects to travel; for in this permission to travel, permission to confess is believed to be implicitly enclosed, because confession ought to be a companion of travelers.... Secondly, by knowing and remaining silent; as when the Bishop knows that it is customary for his Canons or Pastors to absolve one another, and remains silent. For although it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone may choose a confessor for himself, as is said in chapter Si Episcopus, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI, nevertheless, from the fact that the Bishop knows and remains silent, he is bound to provide them with a Confessor; and TACIT EPISCOPAL PERMISSION GIVES FORCE TO ABSOLUTIONS, and custom concurs only as a witness of implicit permission. And because of implicit permission of this kind, travelers without the permission of the Pastor can confess at Easter... wherever they find themselves, as those who have permission, etc.

Likewise St. Antoninus (part 3, tit. 17, ch. 4): The Doctors agree in this, that travelers and merchants and other wayfarers, if they do not have permission (at least tacit and implicit) from their Pastors or Bishops..., cannot be absolved by others. But if they set out with their permission, by that very fact they have interpretative permission to confess, since they cannot worthily travel without confession. And lest more be brought forward here, let it suffice to observe that the unanimous opinion of the Doctors (see above, no. 9) which requires at least the tacit consent of the Ordinary pertains to this point.

18. But now let it be examined what kind of custom the VV. defend as legitimate and approved. And 1. this custom signifies (above, no. 14) that travelers are not absolved by the will of their Bishops; therefore, by no consent or permission of the Bishops, neither express nor tacit, neither explicit nor implicit. 2. This custom signifies (above, no. 15) that it makes no difference whether the Bishop of the traveler consents or objects. Therefore the permission of the proper Ordinary is altogether irrelevant in this matter. 3. Therefore, according to this custom, it is not asked whether the Bishop has given a sign of dissent, because the Bishop has no power to contradict this custom by virtue of which subjects can, apart from any permission of his, confess outside the diocese to whomever they please (above, no. 15).

Since these things are so, would you suppose that they agree with the definition of the Lateran Council, confirmed by the Councils of Florence and Trent, namely, that no one should confess to an alien priest unless he obtains permission from his proper priest, with the reason added that otherwise the alien priest cannot absolve him? And since the Apostolic See in chapter Si Episcopus through Boniface VIII defined that it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, may choose for himself a confessor who can absolve him; and, on the contrary, the VV. contend that a custom is legitimate by which someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, and indeed even against his resisting will, can choose a confessor who can absolve him; how can anyone affirm that this definition of the Church is vainly objected against their theory? Indeed, since a new theory of this kind manifestly conflicts with the definition of Boniface, the matter seems now to have been brought to this: either this new theory, namely, that travelers are absolved by virtue of the custom which they describe, is to be regarded as false, or the definition of Boniface VIII, namely, that a custom of this kind cannot be introduced, is to be judged false.

19. But, as had already been observed in the Note, the definition of Boniface VIII which denies that a custom of this kind can be introduced is by no means a decree of some merely ecclesiastical law against which a contrary custom could be introduced in the course of time. Why? Because the practice against which he denies that any custom can prevail - namely, the decree of the Ecumenical Councils of Lateran, Florence, and Trent - is not some decree of ecclesiastical law, but an institution of divine law.

And it is surely remarkable that the VV. thought no account should be taken of the words of Suarez which were read thus in the Note: It is replied that to choose a confessor without the permission of one's proper Bishop is repugnant to DIVINE LAW; and therefore the Pontiff (Boniface VIII) signified in that text (chapter Si Episcopus) that custom cannot prescribe against this law. And, moreover, was it not added in the Note itself that, according to the testimony of Melchior Cano, all the scholastic Authors, and therefore St. Thomas, etc., agree in this very point?

20. Nor is the reason obscure why this institution and practice must be said to be of divine law, not human law. For who does not know that it is a divine institution of Christ the Lord that the sacrament of penance be administered after the manner of a judgment? Hence the Tridentine Synod argued thus (sess. 14, ch. 7): Since the nature and character of a judgment demand that sentence be rendered upon subjects alone, it has always been held as certain in the Church of God that the absolution which a priest pronounces upon one over whom he has neither ordinary nor subdelegated jurisdiction ought to be of no moment. And since the Church testifies that she can do nothing concerning those things which were established by Christ the Author of the Church, while any custom can have force only from the authority of the Church through legal consent, it is manifest that a custom which exceeds the power of the Church can never be introduced; and such plainly is that custom introduced by the VV.

Dominic Soto, a Tridentine Theologian, speaks aptly and exactly to the matter (In IV, dist. 18, q. 4, art. 2, concl. 1): It is necessary for Confession, and required for its essence, that it be made to one's proper priest, or to one to whom he has committed it. Hence concerning the Canon of the Lateran Council he adds: It would never have restricted confession to one's proper priest unless it understood this to be of divine law and therefore always observed in the Church.... Hence Boniface (chapter Si Episcopus) says: It cannot be introduced by any custom that someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, may choose for himself a confessor who can loose or bind him. But that which is abrogated by no custom is divine or natural law. And hence the same reasoning: for the Church can do nothing concerning the essence of a sacrament; therefore she cannot approve a custom which destroys the essence of the sacrament.

To this point pertain also those words of Vasquez (In III Part., q. 93, art. 2, dub. 2, nos. 5-6): Since it was said above that it cannot be introduced by custom that someone may confess to an alien priest without the permission or consent of his proper priest, as is stated in chapter Si Episcopus, we prove from this that it is of divine law, since the contrary cannot be introduced by custom.... Whence it is gathered that to confess to one's proper priest is not of human law (let the reason be carefully observed), because a contrary custom could be introduced not only with the consent of the Pontiff who had enacted the law, but also with the tacit consent of an inferior.... Since it is of divine law to confess (to an alien priest) with the consent of him (namely, the Ordinary) or of the Superior, prescription cannot be made against it; otherwise, if it were not of divine law.

21. It is useful, however, to have examined carefully what parts custom has in this matter. From this it will be openly evident how those two things are amicably reconciled: namely, both that the Doctors, when treating of the confessions of visitors, commonly appeal to custom, and that it is nevertheless preserved that it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, may choose a Confessor by whom he can be absolved.

Cajetan proposed the matter briefly and at the same time most clearly (see above, no. 17), where, treating of the implicit permission to confess which the Ordinary grants even to travelers by tacit consent, he concludes: Tacit episcopal permission gives force to absolutions; and custom concurs only as a witness of implicit permission. Therefore custom does not grant jurisdiction, but is an indication of the tacit consent, or implicit permission, of the Ordinary, from which there follows the delegation of jurisdiction to the chosen confessor.

22. Suarez explains these things more fully thus (disp. 27, sect. 3, no. 4): It is always necessary that some sufficient indication of the consent of the Superior intervene, and custom can assist in signifying it. This is rightly declared by the example (and this is the example which, cited above, no. 17, we already saw also in Cajetan) of priests who by custom are accustomed to choose a confessor; for because they are accustomed to confess frequently, it was burdensome for the pastors to hear them all, and therefore they readily consented that they confess among themselves to one another. This consent, not revoked, is as it were continued by custom, and the custom itself is an indication of that consent. Yet because permission always depends upon the will of the Superior, and exemption from at least this tacit consent of the Superior would be contrary to divine law, Suarez therefore adds (loc. cit., no. 6): From which I infer that this faculty (namely, of choosing a confessor) obtained by custom is such that it always depends upon the will of the proper priest, so that, notwithstanding the custom, it is always in his power to revoke it if he wishes; because such a custom formally and directly would be contrary to divine law, since by force of it a subject could choose a confessor while the proper priest objected.

Let the reader, I ask, compare these words of Suarez with those which were transcribed from the VV. above, no. 17, and judge with an equitable mind what is to be thought of the same VV. when they fill five columns (pp. 512-514) with texts of Suarez in order to prove that the cited definition of Boniface VIII presents no obstacle to them.

23. In the same manner as Cajetan and Suarez, Valentia proposes the doctrine of the Church thus (vol. 4, disp. 7, q. 10, punct. 2): It must be noted here (he says) that custom... has force so that someone acquires jurisdiction to hear confessions for this reason alone: because when he obtains it with the Superior knowing and remaining silent, by that very fact the tacit consent of the Superior is also considered to intervene. From which... it is understood that chapter Si Episcopus, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI, where it is said that it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone may choose a confessor without the permission of his Superior, does not conflict with those things which we have said concerning custom. For the things which we have thus far said must be understood of a custom with which at least the tacit faculty of a Superior who knows and does not prohibit concurs.... But that chapter speaks of bare custom to which at least the tacit consent of the Superior is not added; as if perhaps it were established that the custom itself displeased the Superior. For then jurisdiction can by no means be acquired through it. And thus John Medina and Soto rightly reply to this chapter. And again let the reader compare these things with those which we related from the VV. above, no. 17.

Nor otherwise John Marini (Theol. Spec. et Moral., tract 22, disp. 10, sect. 1, no. 17): Prelates are considered to confer jurisdiction upon those chosen (as confessors) when they see and remain silent; and therefore this jurisdiction does not flow from custom, but from the legitimate concession of the Prelate, and is continued by force of such a concession not revoked by successors. Whence custom, properly speaking, does not give the faculty of choosing a confessor, but is a sign of the concession made by force of the persevering tacit consent of the Superior. From these things it is deduced that the Prelate by whose tacit consent the custom is continued can, at his pleasure, by expressing a contrary will, abrogate and entirely abolish it, and that the preceding custom cannot prevail in any way.

And Filliucius (tract 7, ch. 9, no. 233): I ask to whom the faculty of choosing a Confessor has been granted from custom alone. I reply and say first that custom taken by itself cannot grant the faculty of choosing a confessor without the permission of one's proper priest. The reason is that this would be contrary to divine law.... It can, however, be a sufficient sign of a faculty granted by the pastors and never revoked, but persevering through tacit consent.

24. Augustine Michel, Canon Regular, also lucidly proposes this doctrine of the Church in his Theology published at Augsburg in 1712 and dedicated to Cardinal Sacripante. There (tract 4, part 2, q. 2, sect. 2, nos. 26-29), treating of diverse modes of delegating jurisdiction, he discusses among these also indirect delegation by force of the custom of hearing the confessions of travelers thus: Although according to common law (travelers) ought to seek permission from the Pastor, by general custom demonstrating the universal faculty of the Ordinaries they have the right to confess even without it not only to privileged Regulars (who, namely, have jurisdiction from the Supreme Pontiff for all Christ's faithful), but to any other priest appointed in the place of the journey, provided that they travel in good faith and not in fraud of avoiding the Ordinary. He then objects to himself (ibid., no. 29): But you will say: in chapter Si Episcopus 2, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI, Boniface VIII expressly defines that it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, may choose for himself a confessor who can loose or bind him. And he replies (ibid.): I reply that we met this objection by the words "demonstrating the universal faculty of the Ordinaries," by which we attribute this permission not so much to custom as to the will of the Ordinaries, yet in such a way that general custom is the witness of this will.

25. Reginald, so greatly praised by St. Francis de Sales, must also be heard. He (bk. 1, no. 77) sets forth the common doctrine of the Church concerning travelers thus: The fourth proposition is that travelers who determine previously to retain their domicile, if they are absent from their domiciles with the permission of their Pastors or Bishops, are to be considered to have tacit permission to confess to an alien priest, as was said above, no. 68, concerning travelers.... Because their Superiors also... are deservedly considered to give them tacit permission to confess, as providing through others for their subjects, whom they cannot provide for by themselves in their absence, concerning those things necessary for the sustenance of the spiritual life.

But as regards the custom of confessing elsewhere to an alien priest, the same Reginald says thus (loc. cit., no. 74): As regards custom, it, as Cajetan rightly observes, word Absolutio, 3, does not give jurisdiction. For this is sufficiently established from the fact that in chapter Si Episcopus, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI, it is said that it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone, apart from the permission of his Superior, may choose for himself a confessor who can loose or bind him. Therefore custom is only a witness of tacit permission sufficiently granted by the proper priest and not revoked, but, as the continuation of the custom shows, continued with his tacit consent. There is added the fact that to delegate jurisdiction belongs to the Superior having ordinary jurisdiction, not to his subjects whose custom it is.

Treating this more fully, Suarez infers from it that jurisdiction obtained by custom always depends upon the will of the priest, so that, notwithstanding the custom, it is always in his power to revoke it if he wishes.

26. Space does not permit more things to be brought forward. But those things are not to be omitted which Coninck has, where (disp. 8, dub. 5, no. 32) he asks whether jurisdiction can be obtained by custom. For it seems (he says) that this can be done from chapter Cum contingat 13, De foro compet.; but what is said in chapter 2, De Poenit. in VI, stands to the contrary: Nor can it be introduced by any custom, etc.

He then adds the following Conclusions. Conclusion I (no. 33): He who does not have jurisdiction cannot acquire it unless either ordinary jurisdiction is given to him, or another jurisdiction is delegated to him by one who can do so.

Conclusion II. In order that someone validly delegate jurisdiction to another, he must know what he is doing and will to do it at least implicitly..., and express this will sufficiently by some external sign, so that it can become known to the other.

Conclusion III (no. 37): Custom never gives jurisdiction when it is employed without the knowledge of those who can give it.

Conclusion IV (no. 38): A custom which is exercised with the Superior openly knowing and not contradicting when he easily can gives jurisdiction not by reason of itself, but by reason of the tacit consent and approval of that Superior.

From this he deduces these two corollaries (no. 39): From which it is evident, 1. that it can happen that this custom begins at first through invalid confessions because of a defect of jurisdiction, before the failure of the Superiors to prohibit is a sufficient sign that they consent; and afterward brings it about that subsequent confessions are valid, after that failure to prohibit is a sufficient sign of consent.

It is evident, 2. that jurisdiction acquired by custom always depends upon the will of the Superiors by whose authority or tacit consent it was introduced. Therefore both they themselves and their successors can always revoke it.

27. Therefore, to conclude at last, what must be held in this matter, and indeed not as some opinion of the School but as certain doctrine of the Church, resting upon the nature and essence of this sacrament as the Ecumenical Councils and the Apostolic See have proposed and solemnly defined it, is reduced to these heads: 1. It is necessary that jurisdiction for absolving a visitor be delegated by one who has ordinary jurisdiction, and indeed ordinary jurisdiction over that visitor. 2. The custom by which visitors are accustomed to confess outside their own diocese does not confer, nor can confer, this jurisdiction. 3. Jurisdiction is acquired from the approval or consent, whether express or tacit, or from the permission, whether explicit or implicit, of the Ordinary or proper priest of the visitors. 4. This approval or consent signifies a delegation of jurisdiction made to the confessor whom the visitor chooses. 5. A sufficient indication of this consent is the custom which is observed with the proper priest knowing and remaining silent. 6. The delegation of jurisdiction so depends upon this consent that it is within the power and will of the proper pastor to revoke that consent, and therefore both to abrogate the custom and entirely to remove jurisdiction for absolving his subject. All these things ought to be beyond controversy. Do the things which the VV. assert above, nos. 15 and 18, agree with them?

28. Nor indeed is it to be thought that the not infrequent assertion of Theologians or Canonists that jurisdiction can be acquired by custom is opposed to these things. Cajetan explains thus the different sense in which this is customarily affirmed (word Absolutio, 2, at the end): A prescriptive custom not of choosing a confessor, but of having the care of souls, brings it about that Cardinals have care of their household, and that with their permission members of their household can confess to whomever they will; in like manner anyone else having a care of this kind can by himself or through another impart the benefit of absolution, for jurisdiction of this kind no less than others can be possessed through prescriptive custom.

On the same matter Henry Pirhing speaks thus (bk. 5, tit. 38, no. 36): A subject or parishioner cannot by force of custom acquire the power of choosing a confessor for himself without the permission of his Superior, not even through a custom of the longest time or even immemorial custom (chapter 2, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI), nor prescribe such a right.... A Prelate, however, or another constituted in dignity, for example, an Archdeacon, can prescribe, or by legitimately prescribed custom acquire the care of souls over the parishioners of another, and thus become their proper priest and hear their confessions. Hence, when in the cited chapter Si Episcopus 2, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI, it is said that it cannot be introduced by any custom that someone without the permission of his proper pastor may choose another confessor for himself, it is to be understood unless a priest through long-standing custom acquires jurisdiction to absolve the subjects or parishioners of another. Therefore what the Doctors are accustomed to dispute concerning jurisdiction acquired by custom has nothing to do with our matter.

28. Finally, we shall add this one thing here, so that it may be established what is to be thought concerning the antiquity which someone might perhaps vaunt of the custom by virtue of which, long before the times of St. Alphonsus, confessors not only in some places, provinces, or kingdoms, but throughout the whole world, indiscriminately received any penitents who came to them and treated them in the same manner as inhabitants, not inquiring whether they were travelers, or, if they learned this accidentally, whether their Bishop consented and did not object, nor investigating with what intention they had undertaken the journey.... And therefore it is no longer asked whether any Bishop has given a sign of dissent, because no Bishop has power to contradict a universal law, whether written or unwritten. Would it not by these words be sufficiently declared that, in administering the sacrament of Penance, it is altogether irrelevant, and therefore nothing is to be inquired or cared about, whether sacramental judgment is exercised concerning persons in some way subject, or in no way subject?

But in the dogmatic Constitution of Pius VI which begins Auctorem fidei, these words are read (no. 37): Concerning the power of absolving. The doctrine of the (Pistoian) Synod which, concerning the authority to absolve received through Ordination, declares that after the institution of dioceses and parishes it is fitting that each person exercise this judgment over PERSONS SUBJECT TO HIM, either by reason of territory or by a certain personal right, because otherwise confusion and disturbance would be introduced; insofar as after the institution of Dioceses and Parishes it declares that it is merely fitting, for preventing confusion, that the Power of absolving be exercised OVER SUBJECTS; understood thus, as though for the valid use of this Power that ordinary or subdelegated jurisdiction were not necessary, without which Trent declares that an absolution pronounced by a priest is of no moment; FALSE, RASH, PERNICIOUS, CONTRARY AND INJURIOUS TO TRENT, ERRONEOUS.

QUESTION 14. Do SUCCURSAL PRIESTS in France enjoy ordinary jurisdiction? Reply. Affirmative; for they are Pastors properly so called, and the care of souls is committed to them to be exercised not as vicars of another, but in their own name. The Succursal Priest, or Deservitor, is in fact bound, just as the Rector of the principal parish, by virtue of his office to administer the Sacraments to his subjects; and the subjects in turn must have recourse to him in the same cases in which parishioners must by law approach their proper Pastor and not another, for example, for contracting marriage, for receiving Paschal Communion, etc. - Gousset, no. 479; Vernier, no. 92; D. Bouix, Tract. de Parocho, p. 337, etc.

QUESTION 15. Can a simple Priest absolve those sailing upon the Ocean, or from whom must approval be obtained?

Reply 1. Of himself he cannot absolve except in probable danger of death, as was said above, because outside that case a Priest of this kind lacks every jurisdiction.

Reply 2. By universal custom, the approval of the Bishop of the place from which the voyage is undertaken is required and suffices; for by custom such a Bishop has the faculty of approving the Priest about to sail and of delegating him for the whole time of the voyage. - Thus commonly with Bouvier, sect. 5 at the end.

556. ○ QUESTION 16. Can military Chaplains absolve soldiers everywhere without the approval of the Bishop of the place?

Reply 1. Affirmative, if they are specially delegated by the Supreme Pontiff to the spiritual care of the soldiers, or by a Chaplain Major approved by the Pope.

Reply 2. But if they lack this special delegation, they can indeed hear confessions in the diocese of the approving Bishop, and also outside it while traveling and in camps by the tacit consent of the Bishops, as is evident from universal custom; they cannot, however, validly absolve in stations or garrisons without the permission of the Bishop of the place, because they have no jurisdiction. This is established from various Declarations of the Sacred Congregation which Father Zacharia relates in Lacroix, no. 1518. - See also St. Liguori, no. 577; Bouvier, De Approbatione; Bouix, De Parocho, p. 66, etc.

Appendix I. On the Jurisdiction and Approval of Regulars

Regulars, by reason of privileges and immediate dependence upon the Supreme Pontiff, differ in several matters of jurisdiction from secular Priests. Hence:

557. ○ I say I. Regulars properly so called, or those who emit solemn vows and are endowed with the privilege of exemption [1], and are therefore exempt from the jurisdiction of Bishops, receive jurisdiction immediately from the Pope for hearing the Confessions both of their own members and of secular persons. Hence is understood the jurisdiction granted to individual religious Priests, with the consent of their Superior being added [2]. This is established from Canon law, especially from the Decretal Super cathedram, from the Clementine Dudum de sepulturis, and likewise from other Constitutions which, although they were afterward modified, especially through the Council of Trent with regard to privileges, nevertheless remained unrevoked with regard to the substance of jurisdiction. - Thus commonly with Lugo, disp. 21, no. 4; Lacroix, no. 1552; Billuart, diss. 6, art. 6.

[1] The privilege of exemption does not of itself imply a delegation of jurisdiction immediately from the Supreme Pontiff; for the one can subsist without the other. In fact, however, all mendicant Religious, and those who by an indult of the Apostolic See have communication of privileges with them, are accustomed to receive jurisdiction from the Roman Pontiff through the prelates of their proper Order. Concerning this matter, a Religious of each Order should consult his own Constitutions and the privileges granted to his Order.

[2] Rather than consent, you would say a communication or delegation of jurisdiction.

I say II. Regulars receive from the Superiors of their monastery or Order approval together with jurisdiction for hearing the confessions of their own members; but for hearing the confessions of secular persons they receive approval from the Bishop of the place where the confessions are to be heard. The reason for the first is that the Council of Trent required the approval of the Bishop only for the confession of secular persons, and changed nothing in the ancient discipline with regard to the confessions of Regulars. The reason for the second is evident from the Decree of Innocent XII in the year 1700, by which it was decreed that Confessors, whoever they may be, both secular and regular, can in no way hear secular penitents without the approval of the Bishop of the place.... - See the things said at no. 538.

I say III. Regulars cannot confess, at least ordinarily, outside their own Order without the consent of their Superiors; indeed, even in the Monastery they cannot confess to anyone other than the one designated by the Superior himself. Those who dwell outside the Monastery, however, or are traveling, cannot confess except to a companion, if they have one who is fit; but if they do not have one, they can confess to any Priest, whether regular or secular. - These things are established from the privileges known to have been granted to all Religious Orders by Innocent IV and by other Supreme Pontiffs. - See St. Lig., no. 575; Lacroix, no. 1524; Laymann, etc. Recall also the things said above concerning the religious state, no. 174.

558. Resolutions. - 1. Although Regulars have jurisdiction from the Pope, nevertheless they have it bound with regard to hearing the confessions of secular persons, since for the validity of absolution the approval of the Bishop is required as a condition sine qua non.

2. A Bishop can grant approval to Regulars at pleasure without restriction, or with some restriction as to time, places, persons, etc.

3. If the Bishop expressly granted approval only for some transitory act, for example, for conducting some mission, the faculty received is considered to be valid only for that act and for every judgment then begun.

4. If the Bishop, or your Superior by his delegation, grants you approval for a determined class of penitents, the faculty cannot be extended to others, as is evident. But if the request for a faculty from the Bishop or from the Superior is general, and the concession was not restricted, the faculty obtained is not limited to the work which was the occasion of the request. Thus, for example, if you seek a faculty on the occasion of giving spiritual exercises to Nuns in a certain convent, by the same faculty received you can hear also the confessions of other faithful. The reason is that whatever is not excepted is contained in the concession. Except, however, reserved cases, which by law itself are never understood to be comprehended in a general faculty of hearing confessions [3].

[3] Thus expressly Boniface VIII (chapter Si Episcopus 2, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI): If a Bishop grants to his subject that he may choose for himself a fit confessor, the one whom he chooses has no power at all in cases which are specially reserved to that Bishop, since those things which someone would not probably grant specifically are not included in a general concession.

5. A religious missionary summoned by a Bishop to conduct a mission in his diocese by that very fact receives tacit approval for hearing confessions during the time of the mission for which he is summoned. The same must be said if he was requested by a Pastor or another Superior with the permission of the Bishop. Nevertheless, he is considered approved only for ordinary cases. Hence in practice recourse must always be had to the Bishop to determine the extension or measure of the approval [4].

[4] This passage of the Author seems somewhat obscure; nor is it sufficiently evident whether he speaks of the mere extension of approval beyond the time or occasion of the mission, or indeed of the extension of the faculty also to reserved cases. Whatever the case, the counsel of approaching the Bishop is useful in either hypothesis.

6. When a religious Superior, by delegation of the Bishop, employs a subject for the general works of the sacred ministry, apart from the hypothesis of some special restriction, he is considered to grant him an unrestricted faculty for any penitents whatever and also for all the reserved cases contained in the episcopal concession. The reason is that he is considered to grant all that he can and is accustomed to grant, according to the aforesaid rule: Whatever is not excepted is contained in the concession.

559. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can Regulars outside the house, when a fit companion is lacking, confess to a Priest not approved?

Reply. Affirmative, from the common opinion. But the Reply of the Sacred Congregation of the Council to the Bishop of Hildesheim, dated November 18, 1769, which could be opposed, is by no means contrary, since there is question there of Religious who had companions of their Order at hand, as is evident from the acts of the same Congregation [5].

[5] Compare the things said above in the note at no. 174.

QUESTION 2. Can a Bishop without cause deny approval to Regulars?

Reply. Negative. For, Pignatelli says, Regular Confessors receive jurisdiction not from the Bishop, but from the Supreme Pontiff, and approval is required only as a condition so that jurisdiction can be exercised. Therefore Bishops cannot prohibit Regulars from absolving at some time.... (Consultationes canonicae, vol. 4, consult. 163).

560. ○ QUESTION 3. Can a Bishop approve Regulars with a limitation of time, persons, or places?

Reply. Affirmative. This is established from various Decrees of the Holy See. - See St. Lig., Hom. apost., tract 20, no. 103 at the end. Nevertheless, in approving Regulars the Bishop cannot prohibit them from hearing confessions at the Paschal season. This is established by a Decree of the Sacred Congregation dated September 22, 1668.

QUESTION 4. Can a Bishop revoke approval granted to Regulars?

Reply 1. He cannot revoke the approval of all Regulars of the same community without consulting the Sacred Congregation of Bishops. Thus from the Bull Superna.

Reply 2. The Bishop can, however, revoke the approval of individual Regulars considered individually, but only for a just cause concerning confession; and this holds even if the Religious was approved after a prior examination. Thus St. Lig., Hom. apost., tract 20, no. 103, clearly teaches from the same Bull.

561. ○ QUESTION 5. After approval SIMPLY granted, but without a prior examination, can a Bishop recall a Regular to an examination?

Reply. Affirmative, as it seems. For the Bull does not prohibit recalling to an examination without cause except Regulars approved after a prior examination.

QUESTION 6. Does a Regular once approved in some diocese need a new approval if, after changing his residence, he returns to the same diocese?

Reply. Negative. The reason is that one approved indefinitely and without limitation remains approved at least until an implicit revocation of the approval; but in the present case no revocation intervenes, not even an implicit one. Therefore, etc. - Thus Lacroix, no. 1541; Lugo, disp. 21, no. 44, with the common opinion.

QUESTION 7. Does a Regular approved in some diocese need a new approval in order validly to absolve if, after changing place, he passes through the same diocese?

Reply. Negative, because approval granted indefinitely and without limitation endures until revocation [6]. - Lacroix, no. 1541.

[6] Lugo aptly observes (De Poenit., disp. 21, no. 43) that by the very fact that a priest enters the territory of another Bishop, he begins to be a subject of that Bishop and to have him as his Ordinary in relation to hearing the confessions of that flock. But by the very fact that, by setting foot in that territory, he becomes a subject, he recovers the approval which he received before and has not yet lost through revocation. Compare the things said above in the note at no. 544.

562. ○ QUESTION 8. Does a Religious validly absolve secular persons by delegation of the Bishop, but without the knowledge of his Superior?

Reply. Affirmative. The reason is that the Religious already has jurisdiction from the Pope through his Superior; but once this has been received, it endures until it is expressly revoked. Moreover, the approval of the Bishop is possessed. Therefore nothing is lacking for that Religious validly and licitly to absolve. - Billuart and others.

563. ○ QUESTION 9. Does a Religious validly absolve when his Superior is unwilling, but by express delegation of the Bishop?

Reply 1. Negative, if the Bishop intended only to give approval and, moreover, the Superior is so unwilling [7] that he is considered to remove jurisdiction from his subject. The reason is evident. For then the Religious has jurisdiction from no one.

[7] These things are not to be understood of just any Superior, but of the one who has power to constitute confessors according to the proper Constitutions of each Institute. Hence, if the Constitutions reserve this office to the Provincial Superior, it is manifest that the dissent of the local Superior, for example, of the Rector, Prior, Guardian, etc., cannot bring it about that jurisdiction conferred upon subjects by the Provincial ceases or is suspended.

Reply 2. Affirmative, however, if the Bishop intended also to confer jurisdiction, as is customarily done in present practice. The reason is that a Bishop can indeed confer jurisdiction upon a Religious, no less than upon a secular Priest, over his own sheep. For whoever enjoys ordinary jurisdiction can delegate it to any Priest. - Billuart, etc.

But that Religious would sin gravely against obedience, because in a grave matter he would transgress the precept of his Superior; nor in a case of this kind could he use the privileges which Regulars enjoy, for example, for absolving from certain censures. For a Religious receives a privilege of this kind only through the Superior himself, who by hypothesis grants no faculty to the subject [8].

[8] These things are confirmed by a Declaration very recently issued by the Congregation of Bishops and Regulars (Acta ex iis decerpta, quae apud S. Sedem geruntur, vol. 1, p. 683). For the following doubts were proposed:

I. Whether a Religious not approved by his Superior according to the laws of his own Order, or when that Superior is unwilling, validly hears the confessions of secular persons with the faculty of the Ordinary alone.

II. Whether Regular Superiors having jurisdiction can suspend their subjects from hearing the confessions of secular persons even ex informata conscientia.

And, if affirmative, III. Whether a suspension pronounced orally and without writing is valid.

IV. Whether absolution imparted by one who is bound by such a suspension is valid.

To II. Affirmative; yet in such a way that the suspended Religious hears confessions illicitly, but not invalidly.

To III. Affirmative, since it is imposed after the manner of a particular precept.

To IV. Affirmative.

To V. Provided for in the preceding replies.

It is provided for in the preceding replies because, as the Reply to III has it, the suspension in the case is imposed not after the manner of a censure, but after the manner of a precept by which the subject is prohibited from hearing confessions. Hence the Editor rightly observes (loc. cit., p. 684) that the subject is disobedient, but not a violator of a censure, and consequently does not incur irregularity.

Moreover, the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation supposes that not only approval but also jurisdiction was conferred by the Ordinary of the place upon the Regular in question. Hence in the first question the careful expression with the FACULTY, not with the approval of the Ordinary, was employed. Therefore this Declaration detracts nothing from the COMMON opinion of the Theologians (see Struggl, Theol. mor., tract 11, q. 3, no. 30) that Regulars have jurisdiction from the Supreme Pontiff; this opinion we already saw above, no. 555, expressly confirmed by the Sacred Congregation of the Council. And hence it must be repeated that Benedict XIV (De Synod., bk. 9, ch. 16, nos. 7-8), although he disputes at length concerning the faculty of Regulars for administering the Sacrament of Penance, proves by many things the necessity of approval which Regulars must obtain from the Ordinaries of the places where they exercise the ministry; but he has not a single word concerning the conferral of the faculty or jurisdiction. And hence it must be repeated that the Doctors commonly teach that a Religious suspended by his proper Superior from hearing confessions imparts absolution neither licitly nor validly. See Laymann, De Poenit., ch. 10, no. 19. How this is reconciled with the Declaration just cited, you have in these words of Marcus Struggl (loc. cit., no. 32): It is inferred that the absolution of an exempt Regular Priest who, having been merely approved by the Bishop..., should hear confessions without any actual permission, either express or tacit, of his legitimate Superior, is invalid; because he would not yet have jurisdiction from the Supreme Pontiff, which requires the consent of the legitimate Superior as a condition sine qua non. If, however, the Bishop were at the same time to give his own episcopal jurisdiction to such a Religious, the absolution would be valid even if conferred against the positive will of the Superior. Meanwhile, however, the Regular by absolving in this way would sin lightly or gravely according to the measure of the disobedience and prohibition, as Sporer, no. 682, teaches with Tamburini.

Moreover, the faculties of this Religious in the case would not extend further than the Bishop can grant them by delegation. Therefore, even if the Religious belongs to an Order to which some special faculty has been granted by the Apostolic See, for example, to some mendicant Order which enjoys the privilege of absolving from Papal Cases (concerning which the Regulars themselves must now be consulted), nevertheless he would absolve invalidly from these. The reason is that he would possess a faculty of this kind only insofar as it were perhaps communicated to him by his Superiors. But in the case the Superiors grant him no faculty. Therefore.

V. And, if negative, whether one who attempts an absolution of this kind incurs irregularity.

The Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, after discussing the matter, replied on March 2, 1866:

To I. Affirmative.

QUESTION 10. Can Regulars without the approval of the Bishop absolve their servants or other members of the household dwelling in the monastery?

Reply. Affirmative, if these servants or other secular persons are as members of the household, that is, if they remain in the house day and night and are nourished there, so that they are continual table companions and live under the obedience of the Religious.

It is otherwise, however, if they are not so regarded, for example, if they remain only during the day and dwell elsewhere at night, as laborers, daily hirelings, farm workers, etc. Thus from the frequently cited Constitution Superna of Clement X, sect. 4: In monasteries, and also in colleges where life is lived according to regular institutes, both Regular Prelates and the Confessors of the Regulars of those monasteries or colleges can hear the confessions of those secular persons who are members of the household and continual table companions, but not of those who merely serve them. - See Lacroix, no. 1505.

564. ○ QUESTION 11. Can Regulars absolve resident students without the approval of the Bishop, as being members of the household?

Reply. A twofold opinion is given.

THE FIRST OPINION denies absolutely, because resident students are not members of the household as servants are. For servants are of the house and are therefore called domestics, because by service they are as it were incorporated into the household; but students pay money so that they may receive food, instruction, and education from teachers. - Thus Lugo (Respons. moral.). This seems to be established also from a Decision of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars dated June 21, 1848, which was issued on this occasion. For the Bishop of Parma had issued a Decree that the Barnabites, or Clerks Regular of St. Paul, could administer the Sacraments of the Eucharist, Penance, and Extreme Unction to their resident students without any permission of the Pastor of the parish of the Holy Sepulcher, in whose territory the convent of the aforesaid Regulars was situated. But when the Pastor objected, the dispute was brought before the Sacred Congregation, which declared that the Decree of the Bishop was to be reformed.

THE SECOND OPINION very probably affirms. The reason is: 1. because where students or residents actually have complete dependence upon Regulars, they are already members of their household. Nor is it likely that the Fathers of the Council of Trent esteemed less the dependence which binds students to Regulars in respect of education than that which binds servants to them in respect of material service and wages, and consequently wished to bestow the benefit of household membership upon students no less than upon servants. Thus Pichler, Pellizzarius, and Schmalzgrueber. 2. Because several Regular Orders, such as the Benedictines, Theatines, the Congregation of Somasca, the Clerks Ministers of the Sick, etc., and even certain secular Congregations, such as those of St. Sulpice, the Holy Spirit, etc., possess the privilege of household membership for their resident students. But from the communication of privileges the other Regular Orders also obtain such a privilege. Therefore, etc.

This opinion has several Roman Theologians, and indeed most weighty ones, as patrons. Nor does the cited Decision of the Sacred Congregation in the case of Parma present an obstacle. For it is replied that it was given for a most special case and therefore is by no means to be extended to other cases [9].

[9] This declaration of the Sacred Congregation has nothing to do with the present cause. For the dispute there was not concerning hearing the confessions of students without the approval of the Bishop (which cause, moreover, would have had nothing to do with the pastor), but concerning the rights of the pastor in the case of death. Add that the pastor relied upon custom in his own cause; hence this Declaration of the Sacred Congregation cannot be transferred to other cases lacking these circumstances, not even in that question concerning parochial rights in the case of death.

In practice this latter opinion is safe, at least if the Superior of the college or residence declares it. This is evident from the doctrine of St. Liguori concerning the communication of privileges, and also the interpretation of the privileges of Regulars. - Hom. apost., tract 20, De Privilegiis.

Appendix II. On Jurisdiction with Respect to Nuns

565. ○ I say I. Nuns cannot confess except to a Priest specially approved for them by the Bishop, although they are exempt from the jurisdiction of that same Bishop and subject to Regulars of their proper Order. Thus from the Bull Inscrutabili of Gregory XV and from other Constitutions of the Supreme Pontiffs. Indeed, a Confessor approved for one monastery cannot validly hear the confessions of Nuns of another monastery unless he was approved in general for Nuns. Clement X confirmed this in the year 1670 by the Bull Superna. - See St. Lig., no. 576.

From a Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops dated September 20, 1642, the ordinary Confessor of Nuns cannot be approved except for a three-year term; after it has elapsed, he can no longer hear confessions in the same monastery without the permission of the Sacred Congregation. - See St. Lig., no. 577. But a restriction of this kind, as Bouvier observes, is not observed everywhere; and then the approval is valid until it is revoked by word or deed.

Moreover, the Confessor is bound to come to hear the confessions of the Nuns as often as he is summoned. Sacred Congregation of Bishops, 1705. But let him take care not to conduct himself as the Superior of the monastery, since no such authority belongs to him. - Thus the Sacred Congregation of Bishops, September 7, 1797. See Analecta Iuris Pontificii, 1859, pp. 1322, 1524.

566. ○ I say II. Bishops and other Superiors of Nuns [1] are bound two or three times a year, even for the Novices themselves, to furnish an extraordinary Confessor. Thus the Council of Trent, session 25, On Regulars and Nuns, chapter 10, establishes, where it is said: Besides the ordinary Confessor, however, another extraordinary one is to be offered by the Bishop and the other Superiors two or three times a year, who ought to hear the confessions of all. - Other Supreme Pontiffs confirmed these statutes, especially Benedict XIV in the Bull Pastoralis, issued August 5, 1748. A particular Confessor must, in addition, be granted to Nuns at the point of death [2], if they ask for one, and indeed also sometimes during life, if some Nun requests this or refuses to confess to the ordinary Confessor; but then an extraordinary Confessor is to be deputed only for certain occasions. These things are established from the Bull Pastoralis of Benedict XIV just cited.

[1] To offer an extraordinary confessor to Nuns belongs respectively to those to whom it belongs to assign the ordinary confessor also. And since some Nuns are subject to Prelates of Regulars, while others are subject to the Bishop, the Regular Prelate assigns a confessor to the former, one nevertheless specially approved for Nuns by the Ordinary of the place; the Bishop assigns a confessor to the latter. This is established from the Constitution Pastoralis of Benedict XIV, where it is said that the deputation of one of this kind (namely, an extraordinary confessor) regularly belongs to him to whom the election and deputation of the confessor pertain.

It is said, however, regularly; for if perhaps the Regular Prelate neglects the law of the Council of Trent concerning offering an extraordinary confessor, then, according to a Reply of the Sacred Congregation of the Council dated August 13, 1631, which Benedict XIV confirms by his authority in the cited Constitution, the Bishop can and must remedy the negligence or unjust obstinacy of the Regular Prelate and himself furnish the extraordinary confessor.

If, however, the Bishop neglects this, whether for monasteries which depend upon him or for those subject to a Regular Prelate who fails in his office, Benedict XIV in the aforesaid Constitution establishes that the deputation of an extraordinary confessor is to be made by the Cardinal Major Penitentiary when he has been asked for this by the nuns themselves.

[2] Concerning this case the cited Constitution of Benedict XIV establishes thus: At the point of death a particular confessor must be granted by the Bishop to any nun who asks for one, or by the Regular Prelate if the monastery is exempt; and, if the Regular Prelate is lacking or refuses, the Bishop can and must supply; but if the Bishop refuses, one is to be given by the Major Penitentiary, if time permits. In these provisions it is omitted what is to be done if time does not permit provision for the necessity of the nun in any of the aforesaid ways. But the Tridentine Synod sufficiently provided also for this case when it decreed that at the point of death there is no reservation, and that any priest can absolve any penitents whatever from any sins and censures whatever, according to the things said above (no. 550, q. 6).

QUESTION 2. What is understood here by the name Nuns?

Nor indeed does the Council of Trent prohibit several extraordinary Confessors from being appointed, or their being offered more than two or three times. The sense of the Decree, therefore, is that they are to be granted at least two or three times. - Ferraris, word Nuns, art. 5, no. 33; Bouvier, ibid.

567. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Are all Nuns bound to present themselves to the extraordinary Confessor and to confess to him?

Reply 1. All and each are bound to present themselves at least to hear salutary admonitions. This is established from the same Bull of Benedict XIV, and also from an express Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops dated October 19, 1621 (in Bouvier, ibid.). The reason for this provision is that the liberty of those Nuns who may perhaps need the ministry of the extraordinary Confessor may be safeguarded; otherwise the fear either of displeasing the ordinary Confessor or of falling under suspicion among the other Nuns would easily restrain them. - See St. Lig., no. 576.

Reply 2. They are not bound to confess to the extraordinary Confessor, but it suffices that they place themselves before him, for example, to ask his blessing or to receive salutary admonitions from him. This is established from the cited Bull of Benedict XIV. See St. Lig., no. 576.

Reply. Only women living under a rule in a cloister are understood; not, however, those who are not bound to observe enclosure [3], for example, such as those who are called Sisters of Charity (Soeurs de la Charite). - Bouvier, On Jurisdiction; Gousset, no. 480, etc.

[3] Although the Apostolic Constitutions concerning the furnishing of an extraordinary confessor seem to regard only nuns who observe enclosure, nevertheless an equal reason applies also to others when a Confessor is so assigned to them, whether at home or in churches, that they do not have free faculty to approach another.

Yet where nuns of this kind are accustomed to confess in Churches, there is scarcely, or hardly even, need to consider providing an extraordinary confessor. For a nearly universal custom prevails that each has free faculty to approach any of the priests who are accustomed to hear confessions in that church; indeed, if these priests are Regulars, it is all the same if they approach any one of the same Regulars even in another of their churches. Nor is it an obstacle that, for the observance of a certain order, some are assigned as quasi-ordinary confessors either by the Superior of the monastery or even by the Bishop. For an arrangement of this kind is regarded as merely administrative, and therefore it has nothing to do with the question of jurisdiction. And indeed, when either the church or the confessors have been designated by the Superior, it is manifest that a nun who chooses any confessor whatever and wherever she may choose him confesses, certainly contrary to the rule, but validly. Indeed, according to the general principle that odious things are to be restricted, the same is to be held if the designation is made by the Ordinary, unless he expressly adds that no one besides those designated can be regarded as approved for those nuns.

568. ○ QUESTION 3. What is to be held concerning Nuns now existing in France?

Reply 1. As regards the approval of the Confessor, since, in view of present circumstances, they are not considered to emit solemn vows, all things depend upon the will of the Bishops. Bishops, however, commonly intend to reserve to themselves special approval for Nuns, as is established from ordinary letters of approval, in which it is said: Nuns excepted, or Nuns not excepted.

Reply 2. As regards the extraordinary Confessor, the same obligation as before seems to rest upon the Bishop and the other Superiors to procure someone for cloistered Nuns. The reason is that the end of the law is the same, namely, to provide for liberty of conscience. For if they are bound to rigorous enclosure, it is equitable that they also enjoy the privilege of cloistered Nuns.

QUESTION 4. Is a Bishop bound to grant an extraordinary Confessor also to pious congregations of women which are not true Nuns?

Reply. Benedict XIV earnestly exhorts Bishops to extend to all communities of women the laws of the Council of Trent concerning extraordinary Confessors of Nuns. - Constitution Pastoralis curae, August 5, 1748, with which several Decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars agree.

569. ○ QUESTION 5. Can cloistered Nuns be absolved by any confessor while by chance they are outside the monastery?

Reply. Affirmative, with Lacroix, no. 1527, and others. The reason is that the Constitutions of Gregory XV, Inscrutabili, and of other Supreme Pontiffs, which prohibit Nuns from confessing to any Priest other than one specially approved by the Bishop for Nuns, do not seem to be understood except of Nuns dwelling in Monasteries; for they suppose that Nuns always remain within the cloister. Therefore any Confessors, although not approved for Nuns, can absolve Nuns who come to them per accidens. Moreover, there would commonly be excessive inconvenience if traveling Nuns were obliged to confess only to specially approved Confessors; for they would often be obliged to go without the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist.

Article III. On Reserved Cases

Reservation of cases is a restriction or limitation of jurisdiction, or the denial of the power of absolving from certain sins while the power of absolving from the others remains. We must treat: 1. of reservation; 2. of absolution from reserved cases.

§ I. On the Reservation of Cases, or on the Principle and Nature of Reservation

570. Principles. - I. There exists in the Church a power of reserving certain cases or causes of graver crimes from which inferior Confessors cannot absolve without a special faculty. For, as was said (preceding article), the power of conferring and limiting jurisdiction belongs to the Church; therefore the power of reserving cases also belongs to her. This is established, moreover, from the definition of the Council of Trent, session 14, chapter 7, etc.

II. The power of reserving sins belongs only to Prelates of the Church who have jurisdiction in both the internal and the external forum [1]. The reason is that it belongs to those alone who can confer jurisdiction in the society of the faithful to limit the same.

[1] You would say more accurately that whoever has ordinary jurisdiction, even for the forum of conscience alone, and can delegate it to another with greater or lesser restriction, can reserve sins to himself. For, as Lugo says (On Penance, disp. 20, no. 1), since in this sacrament there is required... jurisdiction, which must be communicated to inferiors by Superiors, it follows that a Superior can limit this jurisdiction more or less, giving it for more or fewer causes as seems good to him: this is to reserve to himself the absolution of those causes which he does not grant to the inferior.

From this the same author concludes (ibid., no. 2): Hence it is established that the Supreme Pontiff, by reason of his supreme and universal power, can reserve certain sins to himself for the whole Church; Bishops likewise, speaking in itself, can do so for their episcopate; and finally a pastor (who otherwise does not have jurisdiction in the external forum) for his parish. He observes nevertheless (ibid.) that this power of a pastor is almost useless, and therefore pastors are not accustomed to use this power. For this difference exists among the Pope, a Bishop, and a Pastor: when the Pontiff reserves, no one can absolve except with the permission of the Pontiff himself; when a Bishop reserves, others can absolve with the permission of the Supreme Pontiff; and finally, if a pastor were to reserve, others could absolve with the permission of the Pope or the Bishop. Therefore, unless the Bishop, while granting jurisdiction, at the same time provides that those sins which the pastor has reserved to himself are not to be absolved, just as the Supreme Pontiff prohibits Regulars to whom he grants jurisdiction from absolving from sins which Bishops reserve to themselves, pastors would reserve sins to themselves in vain. And therefore, says Lugo (ibid.), pastors are not accustomed to reserve, because that reservation would be almost useless, just as the faculty of granting jurisdiction has become almost useless, according to the things said above (no. 546, Principle III). I said almost; for, as the same Lugo observes (disp. 21, no. 4), a Bishop could approve someone to hear confessions and nevertheless confer no jurisdiction upon him, but only render him capable of receiving jurisdiction; wherefore, if he had from elsewhere a general privilege of his Order, or a special privilege of hearing confessions, once the Bishop's approval was in place he could... receive from the pastor jurisdiction to hear the confessions of his subjects. See also the Salmanticenses (On Penance, chapter 13, no. 2).

Hence: 1. the Pope can reserve cases throughout the whole Church; 2. Bishops can reserve them in their own diocese; 3. others having episcopal jurisdiction can reserve them with regard to their own subjects.

III. By the custom of the Church, three things are required for a sin to be considered reserved, namely, that it be: 1. mortal [2]; 2. external [3]; 3. consummated in act, and not merely attempted, unless something else is established from an express declaration of the one reserving [4]. - Thus commonly; St. Lig., no. 582.

[2] Mortal is understood not only by reason of the object, but also by reason of the malice in the act of the will.

[3] It is called external insofar as, in addition to the grave malice of the internal will, the external action must also have gravity in itself.

[4] When a work ought to be considered consummated, and therefore as falling under the reserving law, must be determined from the words of the law itself. Hence it can happen that, with reservation taken into account, a work must be considered consummated which otherwise does not seem consummated in its own genus. Thus, for example, if any external lapse of the flesh is reserved, even acts imperfect in the genus of lust will fall under the reservation, provided that the external action of itself bears the character of grave sin.

IV. Reservation immediately affects the Confessor [5], and mediately the penitent, because it immediately touches and restricts the power of the Confessor. - St. Lig., nos. 580, 581, and others commonly, against some.

[5] The contrary manner of speaking could therefore seem probable, because in fact it sometimes happens, according to the different condition of penitents, that one and the same confessor can at one time absolve from one and the same sin, and at another time cannot. Thus, for example, a Regular who is accustomed to hear the confessions both of domestic Religious and of secular persons will be able to absolve a secular person from the crime of perjury, but not a Religious, since this crime will be reserved for a Religious but not for a secular person. Likewise, a secular confessor will be able, even among secular persons themselves, to absolve Andrew from the same crime of writing a defamatory libel, because, as a perpetual member of the household of Religious, he is not subject to episcopal reservation (see the note above at no. 173), but he will not be able to absolve Andrew's brother Christopher, who is subject to the reservation. In fact, however, these things detract nothing from the general principle that reservation, as a mere limitation of jurisdiction, immediately affects the confessor. For in the foregoing and other similar cases the reason for the difference between penitent and penitent is that one is subject to one Ordinary and the other to another. Therefore, insofar as two different Prelates, the Regular Prelate for his own subjects and likewise the Bishop for his own, confer upon one

Now most episcopal cases are simply reserved without a censure, while almost all papal cases have a censure and are reserved principally because of the censure, so that in them the censure is immediately reserved and the sin itself mediately or accessorily. Hence, in papal cases, when the censure is reserved, the sin also remains reserved; but, on the contrary, when the censure is removed, for example because it was unknown, neither is the sin reserved, because, when the object of the reservation, that is, the censure, has been removed, the sin no longer remains reserved. - St. Lig., no. 580. But there are two cases which the Pope reserves without a censure: the first, namely, that of one who receives gifts from Regulars of either sex [6] (from the Constitutions of Clement VIII and Urban VIII); the second, if a woman calumniously accuses or denounces an innocent Confessor of solicitation (from a Constitution of Benedict XIV).

[6] The reservation of this case consists only in this: that whoever has received gifts from Regulars (understand this in grave matter) cannot be absolved unless the things received are restored to the monastery or Order. Therefore, if someone has already restored them, or at least has the intention of restoring them, the reservation ceases. Where, and to what extent, the Constitutions of Clement VIII and Urban VIII have been received in practice, see Diana (vol. 7, tract 3, resolutions 1, 2, 29, and 33), and the Salmanticenses (On Restitution, chapter 6, no. 10).

Concerning reservation to be made by Bishops, those matters are opportunely to be noted which we have in Benedict XIV, On the Diocesan Synod, book 5, chapter 5.

Although indeed (he says at no. IV) a certain rule to be observed everywhere cannot be prescribed concerning this matter...; nevertheless certain general admonitions and Decrees which have issued from the Sacred Congregations of the City concerning this matter can serve as a rule.

The Sacred Congregation appointed over the affairs of Bishops and Regulars, on January 9, 1601, decreed that the local Ordinaries were to be admonished thus: Lest the local Ordinaries, to whom this right of reserving cases belongs, be burdensome by more reservations than are necessary to their subjects or to Confessors cooperating in procuring the salvation of souls, let all be admonished to reserve few cases, and only those which, according to the state and quality of each diocese, they judge must necessarily be reserved for maintaining Christian discipline and the salvation of the souls entrusted to them. - And it decreed that the same admonition be repeated on November 26, 1602: But lest the local Ordinaries, to whom the reservation of cases belongs, exceed the measure in this matter, the same Sacred Congregation judges that they must again be earnestly admonished to reserve, not indiscriminately, but when it appears expedient for the common good, the absolution only of more atrocious and graver crimes, and they confer upon the same Confessor jurisdiction more or less circumscribed, he will be able to absolve the subject of the one from the same sin but will not be able to absolve the subject of the other. the reservation of which contributes to maintaining Christian discipline and tends to edification, not destruction, lest otherwise, with the power of the Ministers of the Sacrament of Penance restricted, an effect contrary to the pious intention of holy mother Church should follow. It also prohibits them from superfluously reserving to themselves cases contained in the Bull customarily read on the day of the Lord's Supper, or other cases specially reserved to the Apostolic See.

Encyclical letters from the same Sacred Congregation, given to the Bishops on the same day, November 26, 1602, also read in this manner: The Sacred Congregation judges that these things especially must be admonished: that the Ordinaries themselves see that they do not indiscriminately reserve those cases to which is annexed a major excommunication imposed by law, absolution from which is reserved to no one, unless perhaps because of frequent scandal or another necessary cause some cases of this kind appear to require reservation by name; nor those cases in which absolution is not conferred except with restitution or the execution of those things to which penitents are bound; nor those which, although they induce mortal sin, nevertheless concern matters of small moment and frequently occur among the unlearned, such as damage inflicted and similar things. In reserving carnal sins also, let them employ much circumspection because of the danger of scandals, especially in those persons upon whom some suspicion can fall because of access to extraordinary Confessors or frequent return to the Ordinaries. Finally, let them especially enter upon and follow that course which, after the morals, nature, and inclination of each province and people have been diligently considered, will appear more expedient in the Lord.

The Decisions of the Sacred Congregation of the Council agree with the Decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars. For when it was reported to the former that the Bishop of Bellicastro had increased the catalogue of reserved cases beyond measure, on January 29, 1661, it ordered all the others to be removed from the catalogue except ten, or at most twelve, of the graver cases, to be designated at the Bishop's judgment.

Thus far Benedict XIV. To the replies of the Sacred Congregation brought forward by him may opportunely be added the one given to the Bishop of Mirepoix on July 3, 1677. For when he had consulted the Holy See concerning certain Ordinances established by himself, and among them this also was proposed: Because many of the Clergy were more inclined to lust, we reserved this case to ourselves, and that severity greatly benefited the amendment of morals, the Sacred Congregation replied: It is not approved.

571. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Does ignorance of a reservation or censure excuse one from incurring it?

Reply 1. Affirmative as regards a censure, concerning which matter there will be fuller discussion where Censures are treated.

Reply 2. As regards reservation, it is disputed. St. Lig., with not a few others, denies it; the reason is that, they say, reservation restricts the power of the Confessor [7]. But the Salmanticenses, tract 18, chapter 6, no. 12; Lugo, On Penance, disp. 20, no. 11; Sanchez, On Matrimony, book 9, disp. 32, nos. 17 and 18; Beati [8], Moral Questions, q. 18, no. 25; Jacobus Graffius [9], Pract. quinq. cas., book 2, chapter 40, no. 29; Sporer, On Penance, no. 755; Roncaglia, On Penance, q. 7, chapter 2, q. 4; Viva, On Penance, q. IX, art. 3, no. 3; Burghaber, cent. 3, case 31; Quarti, On Reserved Cases, sect. 2, chapter 3, q. 6; and Quintanadvenas, Singular Theology, tract 3, singular IX, no. 1, judge the affirmative opinion probable. - Joseph de Januario, Selected Resolutions, res. 1; John Marin, Speculative and Moral Theology, disp. XI, sect. 2, nos. 90-120. - Add Diana, and Nicholas Mazzotta, who (tract 6, disp. 2, q. 3, chapter 2, q. 2) alleges for the same opinion also Navarrus, Coriolanus, Chapeauville, Malderus, Reginaldus, and Bassacus. Besides others, to these can be added Fagundez (On the Precepts of the Church, book 8, chapter 1, no. 28), Thomas Hurtado (Various Resolutions, vol. II, tract 12, chapter 1, no. 1123), Peter Hurtado (On II-II, vol. I, disp. 84, sect. 1), Merolla (Disputations on Universal Moral Theology, vol. 1, disp. 1, chapter 2, doubt 2, nos. 50-52), Mendoza (in Illsung, tract 6, disp. 6, no. 223), Palaus (tract 2, disp. 1, point 17, no. 8), etc., etc.

[7] This reason, which is usually brought forward as either the sole or at least the principal reason for that opinion, proves nothing. For we all say that reservation is a restriction of jurisdiction; but whether a reservation or reserving law comprehends even a sin committed in ignorance of the reservation, just as one committed from grave fear, or committed outside the territory, etc., these questions are not resolved from the fact that reservation is a limitation of jurisdiction. In brief: that reservation is a restriction of jurisdiction (which is the definition of reservation) contributes nothing toward deciding to what cases that restriction extends, or what sins are reserved, as Viva well observes (On Penance, q. IX, art. 3, no. 3), just as, namely, from the fact that a law has the force of obliging it would be wrongly concluded that this or that case is comprehended by the law itself.

Some others were moved by fear that in this way both Christian and religious discipline would be relaxed. But this difficulty also is very slight. For when the penitent first confesses that fault, he will be admonished by the confessor concerning the reservation, and thus the way to relaxation of discipline will be closed for the future; but as regards the past, under neither opinion can it be brought about that an unknown reservation imposes a restraint.

[8] Gabriel Beati taught moral Theology in the Roman College and published these Moral Questions, dedicated to Cardinal Chigi, at Rome in the year 1663, with the approval of John Paul Oliva, Superior General of the Society of Jesus, and Raymond Capisucchi, then Master of the Sacred Apostolic Palace and afterward enrolled among the Cardinal Fathers. He speaks thus concerning this question: It is inferred, thirdly, that one invincibly ignorant of some new Constitution in which the absolution of some sin was reserved does not incur it.... For although he knows that he sins, he nevertheless does not know that he sins against the Constitution, since he is ignorant of it. Therefore he cannot incur the reservation, which is a penalty imposed by that Constitution. - Sanchez, On Matrimony, book 9, disp. 32, no. 18.

[9] This Author, most renowned for his knowledge of Theology and the Sacred Canons, has these things concerning the present matter: Those who are ignorant are not bound by the Constitutions or Statutes of Bishops, although they may be bound by other penalties..., and consequently not by this reservation of a case, since it is a penalty.... The things which Navarrus said in chapter 27, no. 80, support this. And the reason is that ignorance occurring in the one for whose sake the reservation was made entirely excuses him from that reservation.

But that some, distinguishing between penal and medicinal reservations, would excuse the ignorant from incurring the former but not the latter, seems difficult to others. For, as the Acts of the Synod of Tusculum of the year 1763 observe according to the common opinion (part 3, chapter 10, art. 9, no. 2), all reservations, whether Pontifical or Episcopal, seem to be mixed, that is, at once penal and medicinal.

Hence the Salmanticenses (loc. cit. in the text): The second opinion says that every reservation is penal, and thus that ignorance excuses... from every reservation. We adhere to this opinion. And they say that they are moved by this reason: in the case a reservation cannot even be called medicinal, because, they say, with respect to one who did not know that the sin was reserved, reservation would in no way restrain him from committing it, and the end intended by the Superior in such a reservation would entirely cease. Therefore, just as with respect to the ignorant person the end of the reservation ceases and it is not a medicine restraining him from sin, so with respect to him the reservation ceases. Indeed, for this reason John Marin (loc. cit. in the text, no. 113) judged that the argument could be turned back upon the adversaries.

Therefore ignorance (he says) does not excuse according to the adversaries because reservation is medicinal.... But that reservation is medicinal proves that it is not incurred by one invincibly ignorant; and he concludes with the words of Sanchez (loc. cit. in the text, no. 13) concerning censures: It would not be medicine, but would rather do harm, if it were incurred while unknown.

 The VV. expend twenty columns (pp. 515-525) against this Note, yet in such a way that you could almost say that everything contained in them serves merely to increase the bulk of the volume, so entirely do they lack anything having even the appearance of some moment. We shall dispose of the matter briefly.

Against the first Note added to this question the VV. object (p. 519) that the whole question must be resolved entirely from the definition of reservation, which is a restriction of the jurisdiction of Confessors; they add only this one thing, that it remains merely to inquire whether legitimate titles exist by reason of which Confessors can sometimes validly absolve from reserved cases, and that these titles are reduced either to an express or tacit concession of the Superior, or to the probability that in certain circumstances the Superior cannot or does not wish to comprehend something under the reservation. - Reply. The question whether there is a Declaration of the Church, or tacit consent of the Church or of the Bishops, that Confessors sometimes absolve from reserved cases; likewise whether it is probable that in certain circumstances a Superior cannot or does not wish to comprehend some sin under his reservation: this question, I say, is not resolved from the reason that reservation is a restriction of jurisdiction. Therefore it is most true, and the VV. themselves admit what they seem to wish to attack, namely, that in resolving the question whether a sin committed in ignorance of the reservation is comprehended by the reserving law, the definition of reservation, namely that it is essentially a restriction of jurisdiction, is objected in vain, as was indicated in the Note.

The VV. insist (loc. cit.) that it cannot be proved by any reason, not even a slight one, that Bishops cannot or do not wish to comprehend those who are ignorant of the reservation. And on p. 517 they bring forward the words of Amort saying: In all ancient rituals in which reserved cases are treated, absolution from a reserved case is declared invalid without any exception for ignorance. - Reply. The will of the Legislator is gathered from the words of the law, with the common principles and rules for the interpretation of laws being employed, which are not presumed to be unknown to Legislators. Therefore, when something is established from common principles concerning the force of laws in circumstances either of ignorance or of grave fear, full satisfaction is assuredly given to the mind and will of the legislator. But someone would rightly call the observation added from Amort almost puerile. For surely, because when absolution from some censure is reserved to the Apostolic See no exception for ignorance is made, may it therefore be concluded that one who, while offending, was ignorant of the censure annexed to the offense cannot be absolved by others?

The VV. renew (pp. 521-522) the objection already touched upon in the Note, namely, that certain authors distinguish between a penal and a merely medicinal reservation, but that sins committed in ignorance of the reservation are touched by the latter. - Reply 1. These authors, therefore, consider a sin of this kind immune from reservation when the reservation is penal. Therefore even they regarded as false the argument sought against it from the nature and definition of reservation, namely, that it is a restriction of jurisdiction, which nevertheless is the principal, not to say the sole, argument usually brought forward against this opinion.

Reply 2. Do not the VV. themselves finally agree (p. 518) that every reservation from its nature must in some manner be called penal?

Aversa speaks well (q. 17, sect. 1): Generally every reservation is made to deter men from perpetrating such sins, and in this way in hatred of the offense and for the correction and a certain just vexation of the delinquent. And in fact the distinction by which some reservations are said to pertain to the good administration of the Church, others to be medicinal, and others penal, indicates not so much diverse species of reservation as the multiple end of every reservation: namely, insofar as this contributes to the good government of the Church, that reservation, through fear of punishment and of a more difficult absolution, restrains and withdraws from a fall. Therefore, just as ignorance excuses from incurring censures, which do not cease to be penalties although they are medicinal and are imposed for the good government of the Church, so also reservation, however much it is referred to the good administration of the Church, nevertheless, because it has the character of a penalty, is not incurred by one ignorant of it, from the more general principle; and all the more because, when knowledge of the reservation is absent, it then also ceases to be a medicine restraining from sin. For the rest, it can seem remarkable that certain Authors here do not excuse one ignorant of a reservation when the reservation is also medicinal and not merely penal; but, when treating the penalty of irregularity from a delict, they contend that ignorance of the penalty does not excuse from incurring it because it is a mere penalty and not also medicinal! What consistency worthy of a theologian is there here in establishing principles?

Here, however, the VV. (p. 518) turn their strength also to attacking the general principle concerning ignorance which excuses from penalties. They therefore allege: 1. John Corradus, who denies that ignorance excuses from incurring suspension, interdict, and irregularity, but that it excuses from incurring excommunication only when all fault is absent in the forum of God; 2. they then allege Suarez, who denies that ignorance of the penalty alone excuses from irregularity arising from a delict. Reply. Let the whole pass. St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 351) teaches that this opinion of Suarez can be set aside; indeed, the holy Doctor (ibid.) observes that even the opposite opinion is judged probable by Suarez. But as regards those anomalous opinions of John Corradus, the VV. ought plainly to know that they are not approved by the holy Doctor Alphonsus.

The VV. object (p. 517) that Jacobus de Graffiis undeservedly alleged Navarrus for himself, and therefore in this matter in no way proved himself to be what he is represented as in the Note above, namely, an author most renowned for his knowledge of Theology and the Sacred Canons. Reply. Let the Antecedent pass; and I deny the Consequent. I said, first, let the Antecedent pass. For in the allegation of Navarrus a mere error either of the printer or certainly of memory is found; since Navarrus in fact clearly proposes in that chapter 27, no. 16, and again at no. 274, to which he refers in the former place, those principles from which the conclusion of Graffius flows spontaneously. I said, secondly, I deny the Consequent; and the VV. cannot disprove this. For if even one less exact allegation suffices so that in that question all weight of authority is entirely lacking to a Writer, what indeed would have to be concluded concerning the authority of the holy Doctor Alphonsus in so many controversies?

The VV. object (p. 523) that, according to Cardinal de Lugo (On Penance, disp. 20, no. 9), it is the practice of all Religious Orders that ignorance of the reservation does not give the faculty of absolving a penitent who was ignorant of the reservation. Reply. Let the Antecedent pass; I deny the Consequent. For it is not equitable to derive and measure the norm of common law from those things which in Religious Orders may at some time have been customarily observed for the special end of religious perfection and for the more diligent observance of regular discipline. For the rest, what the VV. (p. 523) relate on this matter from Gobat, whose words they transcribe (Ex Tract., 7, no. 561), is almost amusing: Nor do I judge that a Regular Confessor would render the fidelity which he owes his Prelate if, having encountered a penitent involved in such a case and ignorant of the reservation, while absolving him according to the opinion of Quintanadvenas he did not expressly say: I shall indeed absolve you this time; but know that in the future you cannot be absolved by me without the express faculty of the Superior. For after he has indicated to the penitent that that sin is reserved, does not the reason by which the confessor was able to absolve him from the reserved sin cease by that very fact?

The VV. object (p. 523) with Leonard Jansen: The ignorance of the penitent does not bring it about that the Confessor receives jurisdiction over a sin over which he otherwise did not have it; and certainly, if this opinion held, only the sins of Theologians would be reserved, since they alone know the cases reserved in species. - Reply. Either this Leonard Jansen could have known how much force arguments of this kind, or rather ineptitudes, possessed, or he did not possess so great a power of judgment. If the first, then knowingly and deliberately he wished to deceive; if the second, why did he thrust himself into writing about theological matters with Minerva entirely unwilling? Whichever of these is said, he is not the kind of writer whom it was fitting to call upon the stage. No one ever said that ignorance of reservation brings it about that a faculty which was lacking is added. What is rightly said is that a circumstance of this kind brings it about that the case does not fall under the law of reservation, or, in other words, that the reserving law does not comprehend a sin committed in ignorance of this penalty. - To the second, however, it can be replied that, if one must indeed be a theologian in order to know the reservation of some sin, all the faithful will easily become theologians in this manner; for when they confess a fault of this kind for the first time, they will then return home adorned with this theological knowledge.

Finally, that we may omit more useless things, the VV. object (p. 524): 1. that their own negative opinion can with the best right be called the most common; 2. that the defenders of the contrary opinion are few, and that most of them are not numbered among the more distinguished and better known, and those possessing greater authority. Reply. The VV. enumerate fifteen who held the negative opinion absolutely; we shall grant that certain others can be added. Nevertheless, since at least as many adversaries can easily be enumerated, as is clear from those cited in the text, to whom several others also can be joined, according to what canons, I ask, can that opinion with the best right be called the most common? Moreover, the VV. finally produce these names for the same opinion (pp. 523-524): Illsung, Mendo, Potestas, Herincx, Concina, Holzmann, Engel, Antoine, Ferraris, Voit, Reuter, Croix, Leonard Jansen, and Cuniliati. With this supply of Authors, then, does there any longer remain to them a place for reproaching the contrary opinion because it has patrons most of whom are not numbered among the more distinguished and better known and those possessing greater authority?

But enough now concerning these things. This one thing must not be passed over: that while the VV. boast of so many and such great patrons for themselves, they found in no one any intrinsic reason which they could here produce for their own opinion. Why is this, unless because the arguments which can be considered the strongest are entirely of that weight which we saw above to be present in the arguments of Leonard Jansen?

QUESTION 2. Does ignorance at least excuse from reservation when it is joined with a censure?

Reply 1. Affirmative for papal cases, because papal cases, with the exception of a false accusation of the crime of solicitation, are reserved because of a censure, from which ignorance excuses, as was just said. Therefore, when the censure has been removed, no reservation remains. - St. Lig., no. 580, and others commonly.

Reply 2. For episcopal cases the opinion of the Doctors is not one. For the affirmative, among others, Aversa asserts that the Doctors commonly agree in this doctrine [10]. Suarez, however, concludes better, On Penance, disp. 29, sect. 2, no. 7, that the words of the reservation, custom, and the power of the one reserving are to be considered [11].

[10] A censure could indeed simply be removed while the reservation of the sin remained. In reality, however, and concomitantly, the matter stands thus: when the censure has been removed, by that very fact the reservation of the sin also ceases...; and if someone is excused from incurring the censure, although not from the fault, as can happen through ignorance, he is likewise excused from the reservation of the fault itself.... And in this doctrine the Doctors commonly agree. Thus Aversa (On Penance, q. 17, sect. II, section six).

For the contrary opinion this reason is usually brought forward (see St. Alph., book 6, no. 582): that papal cases differ from episcopal cases in this, that in papal cases the censure is reserved principally and indivisibly; but in episcopal cases the case is reserved principally and in itself, and the censure is annexed to it, etc. Yet these things, as is evident, do not present an argument by which the opinion is established, but repeat the opinion itself in other words.

[11] I say that even in excommunications reserved to Bishops through their Statutes or sentences, it is not immediately established that the sins themselves remain reserved in themselves; because, as I said, those two things are distinct; indeed, sometimes the censure and not the fault can be reserved. Therefore the words of the reservation, custom, and the power of the one reserving are to be considered. Thus Suarez.

For the rest, whoever thinks the doctrine related above (preceding question), which generally excuses the ignorant from reservation, to be sufficiently probable, will think that there is not much moment in this second question.

572. ○ QUESTION 3. Is a sin to be considered reserved when there is doubt about the reservation?

Reply 1. Entirely negative if the doubt is one of fact, that is, if the sin was doubtfully committed or is doubtfully grave. The reason is that reservation is of strict interpretation, and therefore is to be understood of certainly grave sins. For the Church does not intend to reserve sins unless they are certainly committed and certainly mortal, since she is accustomed to reserve only more atrocious sins. - Thus most commonly with St. Lig., no. 600.

Reply 2. Negative also if the doubt is one of law, that is, if it concerns the existence of the reserving law or its extension. The reason is the same, namely, because reservation is of strict interpretation, and therefore in doubt it is to be regarded as null. - Thus commonly; St. Liguori, no. 600; Lugo, ibid.; Elbel, no. 343, etc. - Against Antoine, etc.

573. ○ QUESTION 4. Can the subject of another diocese be absolved if the case is reserved only in the place of confession?

Reply. More commonly the recent authors deny it. Their reason is that the Confessor has jurisdiction restricted by his own Bishop.

Others, however, affirm it [12], with the most common opinion of the ancients. The reason of these authors is [13] that the Confessor absolves this penitent by jurisdiction indirectly communicated by the latter's Ordinary; and since this Ordinary did not reserve that sin to himself, by that very fact he did not restrict jurisdiction with regard to it. Thus Armilla, Cajetan, Navarrus, Bartholomew Ugolinus (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, chapter 39, section 6), Bartholomew Medina (Instruction for Confessors, translated by the Spagnuolo, book 1, chapter 10, section 3), Dicastillus (On Penance, disp. XI, no. 242), Alphonsus Vega (in Leander, On the Sacraments, vol. 1, tract 5, disp. 12, q. 27), Fagundez (On the Second Precept of the Church, book 8, chapter 8, no. 21), Mendo (On the Bull of the Crusade, disp. 23, chapter 2, no. 23), Matthew Stoz (Tribunal of Penance, book 2, q. 2, no. 64), Pellizarius (in Mazzotta, tract 6, disp. 2, q. 3, chapter 2, q. 4), Peter de Ledesma (On the Sacrament of Penance, chapter 12), Jacobus Graffius (in Leander, loc. cit.), Naldi (On Reserved Cases, sect. 2, chapter 4, q. 2, and Summa, word Reserved Case, no. 8), Quarti (On Reserved Cases, sect. 2, chapter 4), Joseph de Januario (Selected Resolutions, res. 1, no. 8, and res. 8), Paul Mezger (Scholastic Theology, vol. 4, tract 18, disp. 49, art. 2, section 2, no. 15), Baucius (in Quarti, loc. cit.), Louis Engel (Manual for Pastors, part 3, chapter 2, section 2, no. 7), Marcus Struggl (Moral Theology, tract 11, q. 3, art. 4, no. 48), Louis Babenstuber (tract 8, part 6, disp. 6, art. 4, section 2, no. 26), Diana (vol. 1, tract 5, resolution 39, no. 3); Dominic Viva (On Penance, q. 9, art. 3, no. 4), Mazzotta (loc. cit.), Reuter (On Penance, no. 371), and Elbel (On Penance, conference 14, no. 375) also admit that it is probable.

[12] Marcus Struggl, an excellent Theologian of the Order of the Servants of the Blessed Virgin and a contemporary of St. Alphonsus (Moral Theology, tract XI, q. 3, art. 4, no. 48), speaks thus concerning this matter from the common opinion, as he says: A traveling penitent can be absolved by any legitimate Confessor when he brings a case reserved in the diocese of the Confessor but not in the diocese of the penitent. Thus Babenstuber commonly, with Mezger and others. Suarez first introduced the opposite opinion with reasons assuredly weak, and for that reason he did not have even one author whom he could allege for it.

[13] The reason is sought from the doctrine which is held as an axiom among all, namely, that Jurisdiction must be given by the Superior of the one who is to be absolved, as Dicastillus says (tract 8, disp. 10, no. 245).

But who is this Superior? Fagnanus (on chapter Omnis utriusque, no. 52 and following) explains thus: Observe that sacramental confession must be made only to one's proper priest, and not to an alien one except with the permission of one's proper priest.... Because sacramental confession is a judicial act.... But the nature and reason of judgment require that sentence be pronounced only upon subjects, since no one can be bound or absolved by one who is not his judge.... Hence it was always believed in the Church of God, and the Tridentine Synod confirmed it as most true..., that an absolution which a priest pronounces upon one over whom he does not have ordinary or subdelegated jurisdiction must be of no moment. And that these things are to be held from divine law was indicated above (in the Note at no. 555).

Hence Fagnanus deduces the consequence (ibid., no. 70) that by common law travelers cannot of themselves be absolved: By common law no priest can absolve a penitent not subject to him, even in the diocese in which he is approved. From this Eusebius Amort (Moral Theology, tract 13, section 17, q. 5, 6), to the question, Does a Bishop or another confessor have jurisdiction over the diocesans of another Bishop?, replies without circumlocution (q. 6): He does not have it, nor can he delegate it to others over the subjects of another Bishop without the express or tacit concession of that Bishop.... It is evident from the Acts of the Councils, where Bishops are prohibited... from receiving an alien... diocesan to the Sacrament without the consent... of his proper Bishop. And he had prefaced concerning the same matter: It is proved from the constancy of the observance of the Church which flourished throughout the whole world until the fifteenth century, etc. Therefore visitors can be absolved only by authority which has been delegated in some manner by the Ordinary of the penitent. Hence Pichler (book 5, tit. 38, no. 14): Those who absolve travelers and visitors... hearing their confessions obtain a power tacitly delegated to themselves.

But if a priest absolves travelers by power delegated by the Ordinary of the penitent, he must attend to how much this Ordinary communicated to him, and not to the kind and measure which his own Ordinary granted him for his own subjects. Schmalzgrueber speaks excellently (book 1, tit. 29, no. 31): The power of the delegate must be measured from the authority and power of the one delegating, and from the mandate granted. For the delegate, in the jurisdiction granted to him, takes the place of the one delegating. Therefore the greater or lesser restriction of jurisdiction, namely the mode and measure of reservation, when there is question of absolving a visitor or traveler, must be taken from the laws of the diocese to which the latter belongs, and by no means from the laws of reservation which the Ordinary of the priest established for his own subjects.

John Stoz (Tribunal of Penance, book 2, q. 2, section 5, no. 64) most aptly applies these principles, which plainly accord with the divine economy of this sacrament, to the present case of a sin reserved in the diocese of the Confessor but not in the diocese of the penitent: A Confessor absolves a traveler coming from another diocese through jurisdiction delegated by the Bishop or pastor of the traveler from received custom. But (by hypothesis) this has not been restricted by them in any way. Therefore, although the confessor by virtue of his own ordinary jurisdiction* (which he has from his own Ordinary) cannot absolve his own subject from a case reserved in his own Diocese, he can nevertheless, by virtue of delegated jurisdiction, absolve a traveler from another Diocese in which that case is not reserved. Reuter also gives this reason (On Penance, no. 371), saying: because he absolves by virtue of jurisdiction delegated by the Bishop who does not reserve that sin.

Ugolinus touches in another manner upon the reason why, in the case, a visitor is immune from the reservations of the alien diocese in which he confesses, where he writes (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, chapter 39, section VI, no. 1): First, therefore, one who is not the subject of him who reserved the cases does not fall into those reserved cases. And Marcus Struggl (loc. cit.) gives the same reason for the preceding thesis: The reason (he says) is that the reservation of sins is valid only concerning the subjects of the reserving Bishop.

Nor indeed do these things pertain to singular opinions, but to common principles. And surely Arriaga (On Penance, disp. 40, no. 4), asking Whose sins can be reserved?, replies: The sins of all those over whom the one reserving has jurisdiction. Cardinal de Lugo likewise establishes the same as a general canon (On Penance, disp. 20, no. 9): The sins of those who are subject to the one reserving can be reserved. Therefore Amort most aptly defines reservation thus (On Penance, disp. 9, q. 1): It is a restriction of jurisdiction over SUBJECTS. Indeed, the Tridentine Synod establishes this very thing, saying that Bishops can reserve sins by the authority delivered to them over SUBJECTS.

Engel, moreover, admirably presses the patrons of the opposite opinion thus (Manual for Pastors, part 3, chapter 2, no. 7): I ask: when the case of the penitent is not reserved in his own diocese, should he be sent to his own Bishop or to the Bishop of the place where he confesses? Not to his own, because that Bishop did not reserve the case to himself; nor to the Bishop of the place where he confesses, because he is not subject to him, and reservations of cases are understood only concerning subjects (Trent, session 14, chapter 7); for they are introduced so that each Bishop may keep his own subjects, not those of another, in their duty. Paul Mezger argues in like manner (Scholastic Theology, tract 18, disp. 49, art. 2, section 2, no. 25): A reservation of cases made by a Bishop exists only concerning his own subjects; but by hypothesis the one confessing is not a subject of the Bishop in whose diocese he confesses; therefore the reservation is not valid concerning him. And to whom would such a penitent be sent? To his own Bishop? But with him the case is not reserved. To an alien Bishop? But the latter has no jurisdiction over the alien subject.

These things, although too few for the gravity of the question, suffice for the brevity of an annotation. For the rest, the difficulties by which the recent authors have entangled a matter most simple in itself and among the ancients would assuredly furnish matter worthy of the labor of a longer treatment.

 It is surely remarkable that the VV. wrote only eighteen columns (pp. 525-533) against this Note, although otherwise the question could only have seemed to them of the gravest moment.

They therefore object that it is undeservedly affirmed in the Note, as an axiom held among all, that jurisdiction must be given by the Superior of the one who is to be absolved. - Reply. That assertion is to be held as an axiom because it is certain doctrine of the Church defined in Ecumenical Councils, as was already shown above (in the Note at no. 555, q. 13), and at the same time (ibid., nos. 12, 15) the nullity of the little argument brought forward against it by the VV. was disclosed. A reply to certain words which the VV. (p. 527) added from Coninck was omitted there. Let the VV. have their reply in these other words of the same Coninck (On Penance, disp. 8, no. 31): When a penitent is granted the faculty of choosing a confessor for himself, or of confessing to some certain one..., the penitent himself does not give any jurisdiction to the confessor, but only designates him TO WHOM THE SUPERIOR, by the very fact that he is chosen, GIVES JURISDICTION. For by the very fact that a Superior grants to someone the power of choosing a confessor, HE GIVES JURISDICTION TO THE ONE CHOSEN under this condition, if he is chosen. Does Coninck not clearly say that jurisdiction is bestowed by the Superior of the penitent?

To the remaining things which are read in the Note, the VV. write (p. 528): The general principles which Father Ballerini brings forward here are certain and established and received by all, no one contradicting. Hence there was no need to bring forward the testimonies of individual Authors for them. Reply. Thanks be to God! But if these principles are certain and received by all, then, by their own admission: 1. it is certain that confession must be made to one's proper priest, and not to an alien one except with the permission of one's proper priest. Why, then, did they contend (p. 511) that no inquiry is to be made whether the Bishop of the visitor consents and has not objected? 2. It is therefore certain that the nature of sacramental judgment by divine law requires that sentence be pronounced only upon subjects. Why, then, do the VV. say with Voit (p. 530) that for absolving the visitor a faculty can be sought from the Ordinary of the place, of whom the visitor is not a subject? - 3. It is therefore certain that a Bishop does not have jurisdiction over the subjects of another Bishop, and consequently cannot delegate it to others; and thus that a priest who absolves travelers and visitors hearing their confessions obtains power tacitly from the Ordinary of the visitor. Why, then, do they contend (p. 511) that jurisdiction is from custom and by no means from the will of the Bishops of the visitor, and that their dissent is not to be considered? - 4. It is therefore certain, by their own admission, that the power of a priest delegated to absolve a visitor must be measured from the power of the one delegating, namely the Ordinary of the visitors, and from the mandate granted; and thus that the measure of jurisdiction and reservation must be taken from the laws of the diocese to which the visitor belongs, and not from the laws of reservation which the Ordinary of the place, to whom the visitor is in no way subject, established. Why, then, do the VV. themselves throughout this whole controversy always contend that it is to be inquired whether the priest hearing the visitor's confession has jurisdiction restricted by the Ordinary of the place, who has no jurisdiction over the visitor which he can restrict or not restrict?

Nevertheless, since the aforesaid principles, certain, established, and received by all, are expressed in the Note in the words of Fagnanus, Amort, and Schmalzgrueber, the VV. object from Fagnanus (p. 528) that by the reservation of cases only the person of the Confessor, whose jurisdiction is restricted, is affected, and the penitent only indirectly. Therefore, say the VV., a Confessor from whom jurisdiction concerning certain sins has been removed absolutely and without distinction, that is, was not granted by his Ordinary, cannot absolve any penitent confessing sins of this kind, nor accept or execute any delegation, whether tacit or formal, of an alien Bishop. - Reply. I concede the Antecedent, which is Fagnanus's (on chapter Omnis utriusque, no. 85); and I deny the Consequent and the Consequence, which are not Fagnanus's. Jurisdiction is power OVER SUBJECTS. Therefore a Bishop can restrict the jurisdiction of a Confessor with regard to absolving his own subjects, because he himself grants this; but with regard to aliens or non-subjects, I deny the supposition, namely, that the Bishop has jurisdiction which he either confers, restricts, or relaxes. Do the VV. now contend that this confessor is incapable of receiving jurisdiction delegated by another Bishop? But do they not admit among the certain principles that this also is received by all: that a priest who absolves travelers and visitors hearing their confessions obtains power tacitly delegated to him by the Ordinary of the visitor? Or perhaps can the Bishop of diocese A restrict the jurisdiction which the Bishop of diocese B delegates for absolving his own subject? Can a Bishop restrict the jurisdiction of a secular confessor whom a Regular Prelate has chosen to hear the confessions of his own subjects? Let this be the conclusion: a cause which rests upon no other supports than those which the VV. employ makes its condition sufficiently and more than sufficiently manifest.

The VV. object (p. 529): Amort with Schmalzgrueber absolutely denies that travelers can be absolved by a simple Confessor from a sin reserved in this diocese, although not in that of the penitent. Reply. In that place (tract 13, section 22, q. 26) Amort gives this reason: because a Bishop can prudently deny jurisdiction to confessors concerning graver crimes, etc. He says these things not of the Bishop of the penitent, for by hypothesis the latter did not reserve that sin, but of the Ordinary of the place where the visitor confesses. Yet Amort (see his words related above in the Note) absolutely denies that a Bishop has or can delegate any jurisdiction over the diocesans of another Bishop, and the VV. agree that this is a certain principle received by all, no one contradicting. Therefore Amort is less than consistent with himself, and his reply rests upon a false supposition; for the traveler is absolved by jurisdiction delegated by his Ordinary, or tacitly conceded. But it belongs to the one who grants jurisdiction to restrict it, not to others who have no jurisdiction over the penitent. Therefore. Amort adds (ibid.): I add that in the first twelve centuries it was lawful for no one, in relation to sacramental absolution, to subject himself to an alien Bishop or pastor without the permission of his own pastor or Bishop. But did he himself not write (see his words in the Note) that this was observed until the fifteenth century? And, what is the chief point, was he ignorant that this is a doctrine not disciplinary but dogmatic, defined by the Ecumenical Councils as of divine law, namely, derived from the essence of the sacrament instituted by Christ? But there is now no need to spend time and labor refuting Amort; he sufficiently refutes himself by his own contradictions.

Let us come to Schmalzgrueber. He gives this reason for his opinion (book 5, tit. 38, no. 58): because reservation affects not so much the penitent as the confessor, from whom it removes jurisdiction over the reserved case. - Yet the VV., as we saw, agree that it is a certain principle that jurisdiction for absolving travelers proceeds not from the Ordinary of the confessor but from the delegation of the Ordinary of the travelers, who by hypothesis does not restrict jurisdiction. Therefore the reason employed by Schmalzgrueber labors under a false supposition. - Schmalzgrueber adds allegations of Suarez and Cajetan. - Reply. Concerning Suarez a little below. But the allegation of Cajetan, taken from Suarez, here labors under a twofold defect: 1. because it is adduced by Suarez for another purpose, namely, where he treats of a sin reserved in the diocese of the traveler; 2. because Cajetan is also wrongly alleged for that purpose. - Schmalzgrueber had better prefaced (loc. cit.) that there were those who judged that even in this case a traveling penitent can be absolved by ordinary confessors, because, since he is not subject to that Bishop, the reservation made by him does not seem to touch a traveler of this kind. And here this excellent man indeed touched the matter to the point. But touching the question very lightly and in passing, he allowed himself, like several others, to be carried away by the authority of Suarez; and in this he was not consistent with himself.

Let the same reply be made as regards Pichler, produced by the VV. (loc. cit.), because he said (book 5, tit. 39, no. 14) that it is more probable in the case that the traveler cannot be absolved. - Reply. Pichler brings forward the reason that reservation regards not so much the penitent as the confessor, from whom it removes jurisdiction. Suarez; Cajetan. Yet it is evident that he transcribed this from Schmalzgrueber and, moreover, unhappily contradicts himself. For he now supposes that jurisdiction flows from the Ordinary of the confessor; yet a little before he had prefaced: Those who absolve travelers and visitors hearing their confessions obtain a power tacitly delegated to themselves..., since from general custom the tacit consent of the proper Bishop (of the visitors) is judged to be present. What indeed do votes and voters of this kind contribute to the cause when they themselves fight with themselves?

The VV. object (p. 529) that the testimony of John Stoz is brought forward truncated in the Note. For (loc. cit.) there follows: But I speak here only of a traveler and not of a sojourner. For the latter, since he has a quasi-domicile in the place of his sojourn, is subject to the ordinary jurisdiction of that place. - Reply. The question was and is about penitents who are not subjects of the Ordinary of the place. Therefore what Stoz has concerning sojourners who contract a quasi-domicile in that place, such as, for example, students who for the sake of studies remain for the greater part of the year in another diocese are commonly considered among the Authors, did not pertain to the matter; therefore we did not bring forward the text of Stoz truncated, but it did not seem equitable to us that pages be filled with useless things.

The VV. object (pp. 529-530): Father Ballerini alleges several texts from Ugolinus, Arriaga, Cardinal de Lugo, and Eusebius Amort to prove the affirmative opinion, which nevertheless have nothing to do with the matter. - Reply. The sense of the texts brought forward in the Note is this, to use the words of Ugolinus: One who is not the subject of him who reserved the cases does not fall into the reserved cases; or, in the words of Cardinal de Lugo: The general rule is that the sins of those who are subject to the one reserving in this sacramental forum can be reserved. And since the question is whether those who are not subjects of the one reserving are subjected to the reservation, why or how do those texts not pertain to the matter? Do they not render a negative reply to the question directly and openly?

The VV. add (p. 530) that Voit (vol. 2, no. 840) replied thus to those things which were brought forward in the Note from Engel and Mezger: A visitor can be sent to any confessor of his own diocese, where he will easily be absolved, since he does not have the case reserved there; or he can be sent in the alien diocese to another confessor who has the faculty of absolving from reserved cases; or at least the Confessor should seek permission from the Ordinary... to absolve from the reserved case. To these things the VV. say: Voit admirably! But another perhaps will say: Not admirably! For is it not, as we saw above and as the VV. admit, a certain principle that a Bishop does not have jurisdiction over the subjects of another Bishop? Therefore does Voit admirably send the confessor to seek the faculty of absolving from that Ordinary who has no jurisdiction over that penitent? Or is the penitent admirably sent to another confessor, one indeed endowed there with a faculty for reserved cases, but a faculty given by that Ordinary who by hypothesis cannot delegate jurisdiction which he himself does not have? Finally, did Voit admirably find no other remedy than that the penitent be sent back to his own diocese, so that, for example, a Roman visitor might be sent back from the city of New York in America to Rome in order that he may be absolved? And does doctrine of this kind perhaps have any appearance of verisimilitude, not to say truth?

To what had been said in the Note, that Suarez first introduced the opposite opinion with reasons assuredly weak, and therefore did not have even one author whom he could allege for it, the VV. reply (p. 531): Whether the negative opinion is supported by reasons assuredly weak we have already seen above. - Reply. But whatever the VV. have brought forward for that opinion has already been set forth here.

But whether they have brought forward any firm reason, the equitable reader has already been able to see with his own eyes up to this point. Yet it is altogether fitting now to examine the reasons brought forward by Suarez, from which it will also become evident how remarkably the patrons of this opinion, in defending it, perpetually fight both with themselves and among themselves; this surely is not an indication of truth.

Suarez (On Penance, disp. 30, sect. 1, no. 6) brings forward a threefold reason for this innovation of his; otherwise he does not treat this most grave question laboriously, but touches upon it most lightly and in passing in a few words. First, he produces his thesis as a consequence of the preceding thesis, in which, relying upon three false allegations, he had established generally that a visitor bringing a sin reserved in his own diocese can be absolved by a simple confessor of another diocese if the same sin is not reserved there. - But in this Suarez deduced from a false antecedent a gratuitous and entirely rejected consequence, adding a false allegation of Cajetan and of others whom he does not name, and could not name.

Concerning the antecedent, indeed, there will be discussion in its place. But the consequence must be called gratuitous, because if some thought that a penitent of another diocese could for some special cause or necessity be absolved from his own reserved sins, as, for example, Paludanus, St. Antoninus, and Cajetan, they nevertheless employed principles which can provide no occasion or reason suitable for deducing the Suarezian consequence. I said gratuitous and entirely rejected, because if any before Suarez spoke of this case, they stand without any controversy against Suarez, as, for example, Bartholomew Medina and Ugolinus, Peter Ledesma, Vega, and Graffius, alleged by Leander (vol. 1, tract 5, disp. 12, q. 27). I said, if any before Suarez, etc.; for among the remaining ancients not even a word concerning this case is found. But why? Because a question of this kind in itself could rightly have seemed nothing but absurd to them. For they knew that a visitor is absolved by virtue of jurisdiction conferred by the Ordinary of the visitor and in no way restricted by hypothesis; to what purpose, then, would they ask whether another Bishop restricted jurisdiction for his own subjects? It would be just as if someone were seriously to ask whether Ubaldus, deputed by a Regular Prelate to hear the confessions of exempt Nuns and at the same time sent by the Bishop to hear the confessions of girls dwelling in a boarding school, could not absolve the girls from certain sins because the Regular Prelate reserved those sins to himself with regard to the Nuns. Would not everyone call this question and doubt concerning Ubaldus absurd? But is the question in our case any less absurd, since here also there is question of two distinct jurisdictions conferred by different Ordinaries for different respective subjects?

Suarez seeks a second reason from the general principle which he himself elsewhere defends more sharply, namely, that visitors are bound by the laws of the places where they stay or through which they pass. Hence he writes (loc. cit.): Although he otherwise is not a subject, nevertheless he is then judged as a subject and as an inhabitant of that place; therefore according to the manner and jurisdiction granted there.

But: 1. even St. Alphonsus (book 1, no. 156) regards that general principle as less probable and less commonly received. 2. Suarez teaches absolutely that jurisdiction for absolving a visitor is bestowed by the Ordinary of the visitor; and concerning this matter he adds (disp. 30, sect. 1, no. 4): These things which we have said concerning the concession of jurisdiction made directly to the confessor have place in the same proportion in a faculty granted to the penitent to choose a confessor. What, then, does he mean when he now says that a visitor is judged according to the jurisdiction granted there, namely, in the place of confession? For either he signifies that jurisdiction is then granted by the Ordinary of the place, and thus he manifestly contradicts himself, no less than we saw above that Schmalzgrueber, Pichler, and Amort fight with themselves; or he understands jurisdiction bestowed by the Ordinary of the visitor, and behold, even Lugo (disp. 20, no. 73) proclaims that, if the visitor is absolved by virtue of jurisdiction conferred by his Ordinary, his Bishop alone could by reservation remove or limit the jurisdiction of the delegated Confessor, and not that other Bishop upon whom he does not depend. Dicastillus speaks no otherwise (disp. 11, no. 241): If we treat of voluntary jurisdiction outside the contentious forum, such as this is, then, if that confessor had jurisdiction, at least delegated, in that Episcopate in which there is no reservation, he can absolve the aforesaid penitent even if the cases are reserved in the Episcopate in which he is while he confesses; for he can absolve him by using the jurisdiction which he has in the Episcopate of the domicile of the penitent, in relation to which jurisdiction that case is not reserved.

And the Doctors plainly give this same reason why a Pastor in another diocese can absolve his own subject from sins which are indeed reserved there but not in his own diocese: namely, because he does not use jurisdiction received from the Ordinary of the place. Thus Arriaga (On Penance, disp. 39, nos. 33-34): Because the proper pastor has the power of absolving, not from the Bishop of the place where they now are, but from the Bishop of the place whence they departed; but there that sin was not reserved. Likewise Edmund Simonnet (On Penance, disp. 9, art. 6, reply 7): The case in which someone there confesses to his proper pastor is to be excepted; for there he could be absolved by him, because his jurisdiction IS ENTIRELY INDEPENDENT of the Bishop of the place in which the case is reserved; and thus he cannot be impeded from absolving by a reservation made by the Bishop of the place in which his subject confesses to him. And Lugo concerning the same hypothesis (disp. 20, no. 73): I reply by denying the consequence. The reason for the difference is that the former pastor does not have jurisdiction from this Bishop, but from his own Bishop or dependently upon him. And, to omit others, even the Salmanticenses (On Penance, chapter 13, no. 27): If the proper pastor were to come together with this traveler who is his subject, he could absolve him there without permission for reserved cases from that sin which was not reserved in his own diocese, although it was reserved here.... Indeed, if that confessor has jurisdiction at least delegated in the Episcopate of the domicile of the penitent from which the traveler departed, and in which there was no reservation, he can absolve the aforesaid penitent even if the cases are reserved in the Episcopate in which he is while he confesses; because he can absolve him by using the jurisdiction which he has in the Episcopate of the domicile of the penitent, in relation to which jurisdiction that case is not reserved.

And here we shall subsume: But any confessor absolves a visitor only by using jurisdiction indirectly granted to him by the Ordinary of the penitent, as Suarez himself and all with Suarez must concede according to the things said. Therefore it is wrongly established that the measure of jurisdiction, as Suarez said, is to be taken from the reservations of the Episcopate in which the visitor confesses. - But you will say: Do not Arriaga, Simonnet, and the Salmanticenses agree with Suarez in the remaining matters if you except the aforesaid case of the pastor, although they also admit with Suarez that a visitor is absolved by jurisdiction granted by his Ordinary? Reply. Entirely so; but from this finally conclude what everywhere strikes the eyes in this question, namely, that as many as abandoned the unanimous doctrine of the ancient Doctors, most plain and resting upon certain principles, after the most unfortunate footsteps of Henriquez and Suarez, involved themselves in perpetual contradictions and must continue to involve themselves in them.

Finally Suarez proposes the third reason thus (loc. cit.): Likewise, because in order that a concession be just, it ought to be equal on both sides; and he who is freed from one burden ought to feel another which follows from it. But such a person can be absolved by any confessor from sins reserved by his Bishop if they are not reserved there; therefore, conversely, he cannot be absolved by the same confessors from sins reserved there, even if they are not reserved by his Bishop.

Reply 1. If this reasoning were admitted, the argument could be turned back most excellently. For since, according to the laws, as we shall see below, a visitor who has not obtained special permission for this from his Ordinary cannot be absolved from his own reserved sins, consequently, in order that equity be preserved, since the visitor bears the burden of his own diocese, he must be said to be immune from the burden of the other diocese, and therefore not subject to its reservations. For the rest, not only the Minor proposition but also the Major of the Suarezian argument must be denied. For it is generally false that one who is exempted from one burden must necessarily undergo another burden. This plainly appears in one who departs from his own territory. For according to the common opinion, once he has departed from his own territory he is not bound to observe its special laws; nor nevertheless is he thereby bound to observe the laws of the alien territory. Likewise, while a visitor is said to be exempt from observing the laws of the alien territory, the Doctors commonly teach that he can nevertheless enjoy the privileges of the same place. See St. Alph., book 1, no. 161. Therefore it was not gratuitously asserted in the Note that Suarez introduced that new theory only with plainly weak reasons.

But to return to the VV., they finally allege (pp. 531-533) many Authors who went over to the opinion of Suarez. - Reply. Let it now be passed over whether all who are alleged there pertain to the matter, which can be entirely denied, for example, of Dicastillus, Filliucius, and Illsung. It is better to employ a briefer and peremptory reply to this argument. We shall therefore answer: let the reasons by which those Authors seem to have been moved to follow that opinion be produced and weighed; then let it be shown how many and who they are whose reasons do not conflict with those firm and universally admitted principles which they themselves, being in no way consistent with themselves, admit and profess. Then indeed something can be conceded to their authority; otherwise, let permission be given that their authority be set entirely aside without reproach.

The Reply of the Sacred Penitentiary dated November 21, 1873, which the Analecta Iuris Pontificii relate (fasc. 121, February 1875), must also be considered here. The case is proposed in these words: Titius, a priest, approaching the tribunal of penance, discloses sins partly simply reserved, and partly also reserved with an episcopal censure in the diocese of the confessor. He grieves for him here (so!!) and humanely admonishes his brother to present himself to one having the faculty; but the latter presses for absolution and says that the confessor, since he is not a judge of opinions, can and must absolve a penitent who wishes to follow an opinion not only probable but even most common among ancient and living theologians. The confessor, firm in his own opinion, does not acquiesce and dismisses the penitent without absolution. - It is asked: 1. Did the confessor conduct himself well? 2. Can he always conduct himself thus in the case? The Sacred Penitentiary, having considered the things set forth, replies: To both, affirmatively.

This case, no less than the other proposed at the same time concerning a simple priest who absolves a penitent in danger of death even from sins with reserved censure, although another confessor endowed with faculties would not otherwise be lacking, these cases, I say, were contrived, as is sufficiently evident, to stir up odium against opinions which do not please the proposer; and therefore in each case even living theologians are brought upon the stage.

Let us omit the second case, concerning which the Sacred Penitentiary replied: Let the petitioner consult approved authors; a few things concerning the first, which according to the mind of the proposer pertains to the argument of this Note. I said, according to the mind of the proposer; for although this is in no way expressed, the proposer nevertheless, by an entirely inept contrivance, wishes it to be inferred that the priest penitent is of another diocese, and attempts tacitly to insinuate this by the words "in the diocese of the confessor"; but unskillfully, because this manner of speaking is aptly employed also for distinguishing reservations of common law, or of a province, or of the whole Church. Indeed, when he adds episcopal censures, he rather intimates and supposes that the penitent is of the same diocese; for we shall not consider the writer of the little story so unskilled in theological matters as to be ignorant that visitors are not subject to the particular censures of a diocese, unless perhaps there is question of one imposed by sentence in the external forum, absolution from which, however, neither is customarily nor can be sought from a simple confessor.

Meanwhile the distinguished Writer of the Analecta judged that these things should be prefaced in French. He places this title: Decision of the Sacred Penitentiary. Cases reserved in the diocese of the confessor, but by no means in the diocese of the penitent. Then he proposes this question: Can a Confessor absolve a penitent from cases reserved in the diocese (understand: his own, where he hears the confession) but not reserved in the diocese of the penitent? And he replies: The Sacred Penitentiary, asked for its judgment concerning this question, judged that in those circumstances the confessor cannot absolve without a special faculty of the reserving Ordinary. Hence it follows that it is not lawful to follow theologians, both ancient and recent, who think otherwise.

May the most distinguished man allow these things to be answered candidly. 1. I deny the Antecedent. For the Reply of the Sacred Penitentiary extends no further than the proposed question necessarily and clearly requires. But the words by which the question is proposed, whatever finally may have been the mind of the inept proposer, neither necessarily nor manifestly require that they be understood of a priest who is a visitor in that diocese; indeed, those things are unskillfully mingled there which of themselves suggest that the penitent is of the same diocese as the confessor and altogether require the penitent to be a subject of the Bishop imposing the censures. Therefore both the proposed question and the Reply of the Sacred Penitentiary are wrongly drawn into the controversy concerning a case reserved only in the diocese of the confessor but not in the Episcopate of the penitent. Hence the consequence deduced from it by the distinguished man must likewise be denied, namely, that after this Reply of the Sacred Penitentiary it is not lawful to follow the opinion of the ancients and the recent authors who hold that diocesan reservations can in no way impede or prevent a visitor from being absolved from those sins which his Ordinary did not reserve for his own subjects. And another most grave reason indeed counsels this. For by what means could anyone finally prove that the Sacred Roman Congregation wished to disapprove a practice which, resting upon the unshaken principles of Catholic dogma, flourished in the Church through all past centuries until Suarezian novelties gradually began to increase and, through an accumulation of mutually contradictory assertions, to take root?

But, 2. let it also be permitted to reply: I deny the hypothetical consequence, namely, even if someone wished to suppose that the Reply of the Sacred Penitentiary was rendered to that question as the distinguished man fashioned it, that it nevertheless follows therefrom that it is not lawful to follow theologians who profess another opinion. For in the first place, who is ignorant of what the Salmanticenses also have (On Censures, chapter 2, no. 56), namely: When a Sacred Congregation pronounces decisions resting upon a probable opinion, it does not remove the probability of the opposite opinion so that it is not lawful to follow it? And in fact, did not even the holy Doctor Alphonsus sometimes set aside Replies of the Sacred Penitentiary and adhere to the opposite opinion? See book 6, no. 556.

Moreover, these things ought to avail all the more in the present matter, since the Sacred Penitentiary is presented as judging not concerning doctrines but concerning the act of the confessor, whether or not his manner of acting is to be disapproved. And surely this confessor in the hypothesis would have thought it lawful for himself to follow a doctrine which St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 588) called more common and far more probable. But if the matter stands thus, how could the Sacred Penitentiary have disapproved this, when elsewhere, to the Question proposed to it, Is a Confessor who follows all the opinions of Blessed Alphonsus de Liguori in the practice of the tribunal of sacred Penance to be disturbed?, it had replied on July 5, 1831: Negatively? But was it, or can it now be, the mind of the Sacred Penitentiary that while it does not disapprove a Confessor who in the practice of the tribunal of penance adopts the opinion of the holy Doctor Alphonsus, for that very reason it thereby denies that it is lawful for others to follow the opposite opinion? Yet the Sacred Penitentiary itself rejects a consequence of this kind, and indeed rejects it in precisely the same Reply, for it continues: Without, however, judging those worthy of reproach who follow opinions handed down by other approved authors. Therefore the consequence which the distinguished man deduces in his hypothesis is not admitted by the Sacred Penitentiary itself.

Let this also not be omitted here: that it is less pertinent, indeed unskillful, in the case to introduce the priest penitent objecting to the confessor that the confessor, since he is not a judge of opinions, can and must absolve the penitent who wishes to follow an opinion not only probable, etc. For in the case there is in no way question of an absolution denied to the penitent because he wishes to follow a probable opinion. But this and no other is the case concerning which both St. Alphonsus and the theologians commonly establish that absolution cannot be denied to a penitent of this kind.

Finally, with regard to the argument of this Note, it is fitting to dispel a doubt which you will seek in vain in the books of theologians, but which is carried about on the lips of certain persons. Some say, namely, that a visitor cannot be absolved from sins reserved in the diocese of the confessor, not because jurisdiction conferred by the Ordinary of the visitor, who did not reserve those sins, is lacking, but because the confessor lacks the approval of his own Ordinary. For, they say, when the Ordinary reserves certain sins, by that very fact he restricts the approval of the confessor with regard to those sins. Therefore, when approval is lacking, by that very fact the confessor becomes incapable of receiving jurisdiction from any other Ordinary and of using it concerning those sins; and consequently it would be just as if someone confessed to a confessor not approved, whose absolution the Tridentine Synod decreed to be null and void. Thus these neo-theologians.

Something, therefore, concerning this doubt also. And first, it can and ought indeed to seem remarkable that although this way, so easy and entirely obvious, was at hand by which the present question would be resolved peremptorily, nevertheless among so many Doctors who flourished for three centuries from the Tridentine Synod down to us, no one perceived it, indeed, no one even suspected the least thing concerning it. Nor is it less remarkable that although all theologians, both of the first and lowest rank, disputed so subtly and extensively concerning this necessary approval of the Ordinary, and investigated all the limitations which the Ordinary's approval can have as to places, classes of persons, and time, nevertheless no one thought anything about this new circumscription of approval as to species of sins. But can this remarkable dullness of mind, which these neo-theologians must so easily and necessarily ascribe to all theologians for three centuries, and indeed to all pastors of the Churches, not warn them, and with them all of us, that we should regard this newest light of theirs as suspect? Moreover, does this new prodigy of theological science agree with those things which are held as certain and settled in the schools of theology and indeed in the practice of the Church? Let us taste a few by way of example.

Let there be the case of which we spoke above (Note at no. 173, p. 111). Let a servant of Regulars approach, with sins reserved to the Bishop, a confessor lacking a faculty for reserved cases. It is certain, as we said (loc. cit.), and St. Alphonsus also teaches, that he is validly absolved even from the reserved sins. But the confessor does not have the Ordinary's approval for reserved sins. Approval cannot be had from the Regular superior. How, then, does he validly absolve? - Let there be a Superior of Regulars who, for hearing the confessions of his own subjects, summoned a secular confessor indeed approved by the Ordinary, yet without a faculty for sins reserved by him; the Regular superior, moreover, grants his subjects permission generally that they can be absolved from reserved sins, among which some are also reserved by the Bishop, for example, perjury, sacrilege, etc. I ask: whence does this confessor have the approval which the neo-theologians require? Does he validly absolve without approval? And perhaps do not object that by virtue of the Tridentine Decree the approval of the Ordinary is not necessary for hearing the confessions of Regulars. For it will be answered: what of the Capuchins, who by a Decree of Benedict XIV cannot choose a secular confessor unless he is approved? - Let there be a confessor who has obtained from the Sacred Penitentiary the faculty of absolving from certain sins, either through the customary Pagella or through other letters; among these sins suppose that some one is reserved by the Bishop, for example, sorcery. Indeed, the Sacred Penitentiary does not grant approval but supposes it, and expressly imposes the condition that the confessor be legitimately approved by the Ordinary of the place. Now behold, the question returns: for the Sacred Penitentiary does not grant approval; the confessor by hypothesis does not have approval from his own Ordinary for those sins; how, then, does he validly absolve? But what shall we say concerning the faculties which on the occasion of a Jubilee are granted to all approved confessors? Whence comes approval for these? Therefore, lest we add more, from these things it is now lawful to conclude that if not one of the whole company of Theologians who cultivated this sacred discipline for three centuries spoke of this new and singular manner of limiting episcopal approval, it must certainly not be said that this happened because they lacked sufficient acuteness of mind to discern it, which assuredly required neither the greatest nor a singular acuteness, but because in a theory of this kind they perceived nothing but an empty phantom, which accords less with certain doctrines and leads to absurdities.

QUESTION 5. Can the subject of another diocese be absolved when the sin is reserved in his own diocese but not in the place of confession?

Reply 1. He can be absolved by Regulars by virtue of the privilege granted to them in the Constitution Superna of Clement X [14].

[14] The Apostolic Constitution (section 7) establishes that a Regular Confessor in the Diocese in which he is approved can absolve those coming together from another Diocese from sins reserved there but not in the Diocese in which the same confessor is approved, unless he knows that the same penitents have migrated to the alien diocese in fraud of the reservation in order to obtain absolution. How these words of the Constitution present no obstacle to the things noted at the preceding Question will become plain below.

Reply 2. As regards secular Confessors, the older Theologians most commonly deny it, from chapter Si Episcopus 2, De Poenit. in VI [15], which stands thus: If a Bishop has granted to his subject that he can choose a fit confessor for himself, the one whom he chooses has no power at all in cases which are specially reserved to that Bishop: since those things do not come under a general concession which one would not probably grant in particular. Thus Bartholomew Medina (Instruction for Confessors, book 1, chapter 10, section 3), Cajetan (Summa, word Absolution 2, final proposition), Navarrus (on chapter Placuit, De Poenit., dist. 6, nos. 62-63), the Summa Armilla (word Absolution, no. 30), Emmanuel Rodriguez (Explanation of the Bull of the Crusade, section 9, no. 92), Sayrus (Summa of the Sacrament of Penance, chapter 21, no. 6), Jacobus de Graffiis (Golden Decisions, book 1, chapter 13, no. 46), Fagnanus (on chapter Omnis, De Poenit. et Remiss., no. 95), Dominic Soto (In IV Sent., dist. 18, q. 4, art. 2), Marcellus Megala (Institutions for Confessors, part 1, book 4, chapter 7), Finellius (Selected Golden Cases Reserved, chapter 9, no. 8), Fagundez (On the Second Precept of the Church, book 8, chapter 8, no. 20), John Chapeauville (Treatise on Reserved Cases, part 1, chapter 4, difficulty 9), the Summa Pisanella (word Confession III), Alphonsus Vega (in Fagundez, loc. cit., and Barbosa, On the Office and Power of a Bishop, part 3, allegation 53, no. 15), the Short Summa of Raymond (tract 4, chapter 5), Bartholomew Ugolinus (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, chapter 39, section 4, nos. 3-4), John of Freiburg (Summa, book 3, tit. 34, art. 39), Escobar (Moral Theology, book 16, chapter 7, no. 66), the Summa Astensis (book 5, tit. 14), the Summa Angelica (word Confession V, no. 6), the Summa Tabiena (word Confession I, no. 41), St. Antoninus (Summa, part 3, tit.

17, chapter 4), the Summa Rosella (word Confession III, no. 32), Peter Paludanus (In IV Sent., dist. 17, q. 3, art. 3, conclusion 4), the Summa Sylvestrina (word Confession I, section 11), Berarduccius (Summa Corona on the Sacrament of Penance, no. 51, doubt 3, section Fourth, when), Engel (Manual for Pastors, part 3, chapter 2, no. 7), Comitolus (Moral Resolutions, book 1, q. 28), Cosmas Philiarchus (*On the Office of a Priest, part 2, book 2, chapter 26), Cajetanus Verani (book 5, tit. 38, section 8, nos. 12, 13), Amort (Eclectic Theology, vol. 3, On Penance, disp. 9, q. 25), Barbosa (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, part 3, allegation 53, no. 15), etc. The more recent authors, however, made the privilege of Regulars common to secular Confessors; custom against which the Ordinaries do not protest, it must be considered can be validly and even licitly absolved. Except in each case if someone has transferred himself from his own diocese to another in fraud of the reservation [16].

[15] Although in this Chapter of Boniface VIII there is discussion only of a subject to whom the Bishop granted that he might choose a fit confessor for himself, which is an indirect delegation of jurisdiction, concerning whom it is established that the confessor chosen by that subject has no power at all in cases which are specially reserved to the same Bishop, nevertheless it is not to be doubted that the same avails in a general concession made to a priest, namely, the faculty of hearing confessions, which is a direct delegation of jurisdiction: namely, that the faculty of absolving from reserved cases is never comprehended unless it is expressed. Moreover, with regard to the first case, as Cardinal Cajetan argues well (Summa, word Absolution), if explicit permission, namely, to choose a confessor, does not comprehend reserved cases, much less does implicit permission, namely, that which is tacitly granted to those departing from the diocese, extend to them.

But how it came about that many afterward departed from the most common opinion of all the ancients, receive this brief history. Although all agreed that no one can validly be absolved by an alien priest without the permission of his proper Ordinary, and that this permission does not extend to reserved cases unless this is expressed, they nevertheless excepted a case of necessity, to which they referred also the obligation of the Paschal precept; and they taught that then a traveler could be absolved also from an episcopal case. Thus Paludanus (In IV Sent., dist. 17, q. 3, art. 3, conclusion 4), St. Antoninus (part 3, tit. 17, chapter 4), the Summa Rosella (word Confession III, no. 32), the Summa Tabiena (word Confession I, no. 41), Cajetan (Summa, word Absolution 2), etc.

Most, however, added that the Confessor must enjoin upon the penitent that, when he has access to his own Bishop, he should confess that reserved sin to him again and receive penance for it from him. Thus John of Freiburg, Master General of the Order of Preachers (book 3, tit. 34, q. 59), the Summa Pisanella (word Confession III), the Summa Astensis (book 5, tit. 14), the Summa Angelica (word Confession V, no. 6), the Summa Sylvestrina (word Confessor I, section 17), the Summa Corona (On the Sacrament of Penance, no. 51, doubt 5, section Fourth, when), and Cosmas Philiarchus (On the Office of a Priest, part 2, book 2, chapter 26). And indeed the last three expressly say that the confession of reserved sins is therefore to be repeated so that they may be directly absolved, since they were not absolved by the alien priest.

Finally Cajetan (loc. cit.) thought that the practice of obtaining absolution at Easter even from an episcopal case was confirmed by a certain oral oracle of Eugene IV, which he relates thus: I remember having read elsewhere that Eugene IV granted or declared by an oral oracle that travelers, wherever they found themselves at Easter, were to be considered as having acquired inhabitancy with regard to the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist. Yet neither Soto (Dominic, In IV Sent., dist. 18, q. 4, art. 2; Peter, Instruction of Priests, lecture 5, On Confession) nor Navarrus attributed to this declaration, omitting for now grave doubts concerning its authenticity, that force or sense; but they judged that by it this alone was prescribed: that travelers could not confess to others besides the plebans or pastors of the places. Thus far the most common opinion of all the ancients.

But behold, first Henry Henriquez (Summa of Moral Theology, book 6, chapter 14, no. 8), relying upon no other equipment than a heap of fallacious allegations, transfers to a general norm that very thing which the ancients had excepted from the general rule concerning a case of necessity or of the Paschal precept; and he is the first to infer the canon that a traveler can be absolved from a sin reserved in his own diocese if it is not reserved in the diocese of the confessor. Henriquez's disciple Suarez succeeds him and, seizing from his master three fallacious allegations, namely, of Paludanus, St. Antoninus, and Cajetan, which you may then see copied in good faith by a long series of Authors down to St. Alphonsus, not only repeats that canon but in addition is the first to establish the new, and until that time unheard-of, inverted canon concerning a traveler being subjected to the reservations of a diocese of which he is not a subject if he wishes to confess there, according to the things we said in the note at the preceding question. Nevertheless neither of these men yet dared entirely to renounce the principle in which the economy, or rather the essence, of the judgment of this sacrament is contained; and Henriquez expressly supposes that permission of the proper pastor of the penitents is possessed, and that the alien priest absolves from a tacit commission of the proper Bishop which bestows jurisdiction.

But not even these limits were preserved by others. See Lugo, On Penance, disp. 20, no. 70, and St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 589. In order to extricate themselves from the difficulty which chapter Si Episcopus presented against their new theory establishing that visitors are to be judged according to the laws of the place in which they confess, they established that the power of absolving them is to be derived not from their proper Pastor but from custom. By an incredible anachronism, they said that this custom was approved by Eugene IV when, namely, no man had even dreamed of theories of this kind; and from his oral oracle, if any such existed, others in addition, by a remarkable power of imagination, fabricated an extravagant Decretal. See Villalobos, Summa, vol. 1, tract 9, difference 59, no. 4. This is the genuine history of the vicissitudes of this controversy and of the immense confusion introduced into it.

 The VV. opposed forty columns (pp. 533-544) against this and the immediately following Note. Nevertheless, many words are not needed to satisfy their objections, all the more because there is question here not so much of opinions concerning which the Doctors went in different directions as of a historical matter.

1. First, therefore, the VV. (pp. 535-540) fill eight columns with texts of St. Antoninus, Cajetan, Navarrus, and the Summa Angelica, in order to prove that it is undeservedly asserted in the Note that the negative opinion was most common among the ancients.

To these, Reply 1. Let the Antecedent pass, and I deny the Consequence. The reason is that even if it were true, which is false, that these four dissent from the general opinion of others, these few, in comparison with the immense multitude of others who are seen alleged in the text, nevertheless would not prevent that doctrine from being called most common among the ancients. In this place let the testimony of a man by no means suspect avail, Eusebius Amort, who, when discussing the privilege of absolving penitents of another diocese from their reserved sins, which he asserts for Regulars but denies to every secular confessor, has these most explicit words (Eclectic Theology, vol. 3, On Penance, disp. 9, q. 25): I said that this was declared concerning Regular Confessors. But whether Bishops wish to extend jurisdiction over their own subjects with regard to reserved cases to external non-privileged Confessors, that is, non-Regulars, or whether the Pope wishes even against the will of Bishops to extend that jurisdiction to external non-privileged Confessors, is a question of fact, in which every positive concession of this kind, NEW AND BY NO MEANS CONFORMABLE TO THE MORE ANCIENT OBSERVANCE HANDED DOWN, indeed by no means connatural to the nature of things, is to be denied and regarded as null in practice so long as it is not sufficiently proved by arguments morally certain or at least more probable and placed beyond prudent doubt. Could the unanimous doctrine and practice of the ancients have been expressed more clearly? For the rest, it is truly remarkable that the VV., because of the dissent of these few fashioned by themselves, deny that this opinion of the ancients can be called most common; but a little later (p. 542) they do not hesitate to write that the opposite opinion of St. Alphonsus is with the best right to be considered most common, although it has against it that immense throng of thirty and more Authors who are alleged in Gury's text! Does not that saying rightly recur here (Prov. 20:10): Weight and weight, measure and measure?

2. But Reply 2. I deny the Antecedent also. Therefore something concerning each of those writers objected as dissenting; and first concerning St. Antoninus. It had been said in the Note that, according to St. Antoninus and some others, a traveler can be absolved also from an Episcopal case in a case of necessity, as, for example, when the Paschal precept presses. But the VV. (p. 537) deny that this is restricted by St. Antoninus to this case. Let the words of St. Antoninus (Summa, part 3, tit. 13, chapter 4), which he copied from Paludanus, therefore decide the question; they are as follows: If they departed with the permission of their Bishop or Pastor, by that very fact they have interpretative permission to confess, since they cannot worthily travel without confession. If Easter also comes, they can communicate on account of the same implicit permission and also be absolved from an episcopal case. Hence thus: If a general faculty for reserved cases had existed, St. Antoninus would have placed it in the first member, where he speaks of the general permission to confess. But he placed it not in the first but in the second member, where he speaks exclusively of the occasion of Easter. Therefore. And let the same also avail concerning Paludanus, whose words St. Antoninus took literally.

3. Now concerning Cajetan, with whose texts the VV. fill two columns (pp. 537-538). They press these words of his (Summa, word Absolution 2): I remember having read elsewhere that Eugene IV granted or declared by an oral oracle that travelers, wherever they found themselves at Easter, were to be considered as having acquired inhabitancy with regard to the Sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist; and according to this, at Easter there is no need of interpretative permission of this kind, but they can THEN be absolved by those confessors by whom inhabitants are absolved, even from episcopal cases, according as the Bishop of the place disposes. But, the VV.

subsume (p. 538), Suarez writes (On Penance, disp. 25, sect. 2, no. 9): I understand this to be an extension, not a limitation. Therefore, the VV. conclude, the same avails at other times of the year.

Reply. The VV. (p. 534) call the Note which they here attack in those forty columns wearisome, certainly paying less attention to the fact that fastidious is usually said not of one who causes weariness but of one who is affected by weariness. Nevertheless, according to the sense affixed to this word by the VV., another will perhaps with better right regard as wearisome the method of disputing which they themselves employ here. For what? Suarez (loc. cit., no. 8) merely contends that visitors can confess either to the pastor of the place at which they arrive or to other priests having jurisdiction there; and to confirm this he adds (no. 9): Cajetan signifies the same opinion... and relates that Eugene IV declared this even in the annual confession; which I understand to be an extension, not a limitation; an extension, namely, even to the annual Paschal confession. Hence he infers that if even at Easter, when there seems to be the greatest obligation of confessing to one's proper priest, confession can be made to another from the declaration of Eugene, it can also be made at any other time. Therefore the extension of which Suarez speaks here consists merely in this, that even at Easter a visitor can confess to another and not to the pastor. See this sense also in Filliucius, who, in order to prove that a visitor can confess to others besides the pastor, uses the same argument thus (tract 7, chapter 7, no. 195): Cajetan also relates that Eugene IV declared this concerning annual confession and Communion; wherefore much more at other times. Since these things are so, how then do the VV. twist the words of Suarez to signify that the faculty of absolving from an episcopal case was extended by the declaration of Eugene to other times outside Easter? And what can seem even less tolerable, how through this distortion of the Suarezian context do they attempt to insinuate that this is also the opinion of Cajetan? I said that this can seem even less tolerable; for Cajetan immediately and expressly adds these things, by which he rejects that extension: But in all the remaining aforesaid permissions (namely, apart from that which he says was granted by Eugene), whether explicitly or implicitly by Bishops or Pastors, I DO NOT APPROVE that those licensed can be absolved from cases reserved to the Bishop, because this is AGAINST THE DISPOSITION OF LAW in chapter Si Episcopus, where it is said that when a Bishop gives permission to someone to confess, he does not thereby grant the reserved cases. Therefore there is no, or very little, reason why Cajetan should be said to have departed from the most common doctrine of the School, or rather of the Church; and it can rightly seem troublesome and grave, the VV. may say wearisome, that against the manifest truth a doctrine which he expressly reprobates is attributed even to Cajetan, and that, to persuade this, words of Suarez which have nothing to do with the matter are thus distorted.

4. As regards the Summa Angelica, Blessed Angelus de Clavasio first establishes this general principle (word Confession V, no. 6): Whether a Bishop, granting permission to someone to choose a fit Confessor, by that very fact grants to the said chosen Confessor permission to absolve from his cases? I reply that he does not, unless he expresses this, or unless it is evidently established by other signs that he wishes specially to grant this. Chapter Si Episcopus, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI. Then (ibid., no. 12) he adds concerning the case of travelers: Whether pilgrims and travelers who, with the permission of their proper priest, confess to another who nevertheless has cases reserved to Bishops can be absolved by the one whom they chose as confessor. I reply according to Rodriguez that they can, especially if the time of general confession, as at Easter, is at hand; nevertheless it must be enjoined upon him that when he has access to his Bishop, he should confess that reserved sin to him again and receive penance for it from him. Now according to the VV. (p. 536): 1. Blessed Angelus, where he denies that a penitent can be absolved from reserved cases, speaks of one who remains in the diocese of his Bishop, not of travelers, whom he afterward says can be absolved outside the diocese. 2. He in no way restricts this faculty for travelers, for he mentions Easter there because then all the faithful confess.

Reply to 1. I deny the whole; for it is not lawful gratuitously to fasten this qualification upon Blessed Angelus so that, against the unanimous and absolute opinion and interpretation of all, he thus perverts the sense of chapter Si Episcopus. I said gratuitously, because there is no reason here why anyone should attribute this false interpretation of that Chapter to Blessed Angelus. Nor is it opposed to that Chapter that one who has reserved sins, when a just cause requires, but has no access to the Superior, can according to the laws be absolved by another, whether he remains in the diocese or is distant from it.

Reply to 2. I likewise deny the whole; for those words especially at Easter express a comparison with other less urgent causes on account of which one who has reserved sins can be absolved, as St. Alphonsus also intimates (book 6, no. 285). And indeed, if that penitent could be absolved at any time and occasion, the expression ESPECIALLY at Easter would be absurd, which it is not lawful gratuitously to attribute to Blessed Angelus.

But, 3. I further deny that Blessed Angelus either departed in any way from the most common doctrine or in any respect favors the new theory. And the VV. silently pass over these words of the question proposed by Blessed Angelus: Who (travelers) confess to another who nevertheless has cases reserved to Bishops. Therefore Blessed Angelus supposes a confessor endowed with a faculty over reserved cases; and indeed, since he does not say cases reserved to the Bishop of the place but cases reserved to Bishops, he supposes a privileged Confessor, such as the Mendicant Orders were in the time of Blessed Angelus. See Lezana, vol. 1, chapter 19, no. 17. But he would not have sought a privileged confessor if, departing from the common opinion of that time, he had judged, as the new theory introduced, that the penitent could be absolved by any confessor. Therefore.

Moreover, the VV. did not do well when, in relating the text of Blessed Angelus, they suppressed certain words. Blessed Angelus has: I reply ACCORDING TO RODRIGUEZ that they can; but the VV. truncate the beginning and write: And he replies that they can. Yet that allegation of Rodriguez has much moment, however troublesome it may be to the new theories. For Rodriguez touches this question in two places; and in one he indeed denies that absolution can be given, although the Confessor has a faculty over the reserved cases of that Diocese. Thus he writes (Explanation of the Bull of the Crusade, section 9, no. 92): It is asked whether, if a subject of one Bishopric were to go with reserved cases into another Bishopric where they were not reserved, the approved SECULAR Confessor there who had the cases of his Bishopric, although he did not have the Bull, could absolve him. Navarrus holds that he can, relying upon custom. Medina in his Summa says no. I hold the latter opinion to be truer.

And from these things it can be seen why Blessed Angelus supposes a Confessor not merely having a faculty for the reserved cases of that diocese, but one who generally possesses a faculty over Episcopal cases, as the Mendicants were then endowed. In the other place, however (Summa, chapter 55, no. 5), Rodriguez reserves the absolution of a visitor of this kind to the Bishop of the place and derives it from the consent of the Ordinary of the visitor. A Bishop, he says, can absolve... a traveler who comes from another Episcopate with cases reserved to his proper Bishop, because it seems that such a Bishop will ratify whatever the other has done, especially if he comes from far away, as if someone were to come to Salamanca from the Indies. And perhaps for this reason Blessed Angelus added that when the visitor has access to his Bishop, he should confess that reserved sin to him again and receive penance for it from him. These things have nothing in common with the new theories.

5. Navarrus remains, from whose texts the VV. construct nearly four columns. But to what purpose, someone may ask? For even in those things which they themselves bring forward from Navarrus, there is what suffices for our matter; and even if he had otherwise departed from the general doctrine of the ancients, would this prevent that doctrine from being called most common?

From the Commentaries of Navarrus on chapter Placuit, De Poenit., the VV. bring forward these things (p. 538, no. 63): If a Bishop has granted the faculty of traveling, he seems also to have granted that one can be absolved from Episcopal cases, according to Paludanus, whom Antoninus follows literally; but not if the faculty was granted by the pastor, according to the same authors. Yet this distinction displeases me; for the express faculty of choosing a confessor granted by a Bishop does not include reserved cases. The text is express and singular in that chapter 2, De Poenit., book 6. Therefore much less does a tacit faculty include them. If those Fathers had remembered that text, they would never have said this. In these things, therefore, Navarrus, no less than the ancients unanimously, relying upon the very well-known chapter Si Episcopus, denies that a faculty for reserved cases is contained in permission to choose a confessor, even if this permission is granted by the Bishop. But these things, contrary to what the VV. contend, plainly prove rather that Navarrus entirely adhered to the general and most common principle of the ancients.

The VV. take another text of Navarrus from chapter 27 of the Manual, no. 261, and it is as follows: To the question whether a pastor having the faculty of absolving from cases reserved to his Bishop can absolve a penitent of another Episcopate, with just permission granted to him, from sins reserved to his own Bishop, I replied that he can. Both because the gloss on chapter Placuit, 16, q. 1, and, more clearly through many passages, Panormitanus, hold that the legitimate confessor of one parish can absolve one confessing from sins committed anywhere; and Bishops seem tacitly to be bound to will that the same hold for sins reserved to them when the confession is made to one having a faculty of absolving from cases reserved to his own Bishop. In these things Navarrus, rather than departing from the most common doctrine of the ancients, indeed shows himself more severe. For from this he requires some special tacit consent of the Bishop of the visitor for absolution from reserved sins. But if you suppose consent of this kind, surely no one of the ancients denies that the visitor is legitimately absolved. Therefore Navarrus is falsely represented here as dissenting from the ancients. Moreover, Navarrus requires that the confession be made to a pastor who there has a faculty of absolving from reserved cases. But none of those who, as was indicated in the Note, concede that a visitor can be absolved from reserved sins at Easter requires that the confession be made to one having a faculty for reserved cases there. Therefore Navarrus appears even more severe. Nevertheless Navarrus was so firm in requiring a faculty concerning the reserved cases of the proper diocese with regard to the confessor of a visitor that he denied even to Mendicants dwelling at Rome the power of absolving visitors of this kind. For as he himself reasoned, the Most Eminent Vicar at Rome reserves no case, thus indeed Navarrus concerning his own times, and otherwise he was discharging the office of Canonist in the Sacred Penitentiary; therefore no faculty concerning reserved cases was granted to the Mendicants in that Roman diocese in which they were approved. But if they cannot absolve from Episcopal reserved cases in the diocese in which they are approved, a fortiori they will not be able to absolve from sins reserved to an external Bishop. Thus he writes (Counsels, book 5, counsel 21). From these things, that also is discovered to be false which the VV. write concerning Navarrus (p. 539), namely, that he does not deny that travelers are to be regarded as inhabitants, and therefore can be absolved from sins reserved to their Bishops. For the rest, this singular opinion of Navarrus pleased neither the older nor the more recent authors; and among the older authors not only Comitolus attacks it (Moral Replies, book 1, q. 28), but also Ugolinus (On the Office and Power of a Bishop, chapter 39, section 4), Rodriguez (On the Bull of the Crusade, loc. cit.), and Cosmas Philiarchus (On the Office of a Priest, part 2, book 2, chapter 26).

6. The VV. have two things concerning Navarrus which it is equitable not to pass over. For, first, in order to excuse St. Antoninus and Paludanus from a lapse of memory concerning chapter Si Episcopus, which Navarrus attributes to them in the first text cited above, they write: Boniface VIII speaks of a subject remaining in his own diocese, but not of those traveling or journeying.... Thus also others understood the aforesaid text, notably, as we saw, Clavasius.

Reply. A more plausible excuse should rather be sought from the words of St. Antoninus, who copies Paludanus. For after he said that a visitor can be absolved also from Episcopal cases, see no. 2 above, he proceeds thus: Because the Bishop, by not retaining to himself the authority of licensing travelers, by this very fact seems to give them permission to confess concerning Episcopal cases, just as the Pastor does concerning parochial cases. Therefore, if Navarrus considered chapter Si Episcopus sufficiently provided for when he himself, as we just saw, has recourse to a certain tacit consent of the Bishop, the same thing must be said to suffice for St. Antoninus and Paludanus, who openly suppose tacit consent of this kind. But no one will judge tolerable the reason for excuse submitted by the VV. and resting upon that preposterous and abnormal interpretation of chapter Si Episcopus which they wished gratuitously and injuriously to fasten upon Blessed Angelus de Clavasio above, no. 4, since it was rejected by all Doctors of every age. And every sensible person will surely judge that Cardinal de Lugo is to be pardoned if, after rejecting as less consistent with himself that common theory after Suarez, and unhappily entering upon a new path, he cast himself into an inextricable labyrinth of difficulties and devised this evasion of some kind (disp. 20, no. 70); in this, just as he had no one who preceded him, so he obtained no follower after him.

The VV. have another thing worthy of notice concerning Navarrus (p. 539), where they write: This final proposition, namely, that custom can give jurisdiction to one not having it, Navarrus already defended in the Commentaries, no. 32, where he teaches that priests can choose a confessor for themselves; and he observes that chapter Si Episcopus seems to stand in the way, in which it is said: No custom can introduce that anyone, apart from the permission of his Superior, can choose for himself a confessor who can loose or bind him. And after bringing forward the reply of Navarrus, namely, that priests do this by the tacit or express faculty of Superiors, concerning which see above and the passage of Suarez in no. 22 of the Note at section 555, question 13, the VV. append these words of Navarrus: Nevertheless, concerning the aforesaid decision of that chapter Si Episcopus there is the greatest doubt for me. For custom can give jurisdiction even to one otherwise having none, chapter Contingat, De foro competenti, where this conclusion is received by all. Why, then, can custom not give this jurisdiction? And here the VV., adding not even a word, thus break off the discourse, so that in the less cautious reader, especially in view of the preceding context, they may at least engender a grave suspicion that by this interrogative figure Navarrus in fact wishes to affirm that this jurisdiction also, namely, for validly absolving, can be given by custom, which is the doctrine tenaciously defended by the VV., as we have already seen above in the Note at no. 555, question 13.

But the matter stands entirely otherwise. For in that place Navarrus, after he gathers many things to amplify the difficulty or doubt (on chapter Placuit, De Poenit., disp. 6, nos. 36-38), replies to the question thus (no. 39): In this matter, which is for me a great difficulty, two things at present occur as replies. The first is that this custom cannot be introduced for this reason, because the Roman Pontiff reprobates it and does not permit it to be introduced. But Navarrus is not content with this solution, which, as is evident, is negative, because the text of the Chapter says something more. Hence he continues: Yet against this is the fact that the text does not say that the Roman Pontiff reprobates a custom of this kind or does not wish it to be introduced, but that it cannot in any way be introduced; and thus it says something much greater than that. In these words he absolutely denies that the custom can be introduced. The other reply of Navarrus is a certain anomalous interpretation of the same chapter, which found neither patron nor follower. The second thing, he says (no. 40), which occurred was that the mind of the Roman Pontiff is to say that a custom cannot be introduced whereby someone chooses a confessor who binds and absolves him by virtue of that election, unless he has from elsewhere the power of doing this. For this consideration that opinion makes, namely, that when a pastor simply gives his parishioner the faculty of confessing, the parishioner cannot choose a confessor who presides over no jurisdiction; but when he not only simply gives a faculty of this kind, but indeed commits his own place to whomever the parishioner chooses, then the parishioner can choose one who actually exercises no care of souls. Yet Navarrus himself admits that this opinion was rejected by all later authors after Panormitanus, and thus, as he says (no. 42), that it is the same thing for permission to choose a confessor to be given to a parishioner by the pastor and for the power of hearing to be committed by the pastor to the one whom his parishioner chooses. And indeed it is manifest that this interpretation of the Chapter was afterward admitted by no one; therefore it is superfluous to discuss these things further. It is evident, therefore, that the VV. gratuitously fasten upon Navarrus this opinion rejected by the Sacred Canons.

7. The VV. add another article (pp. 540-541) in which they attempt somehow to clear Henriquez and Suarez from the reproach of novelties badly introduced. But the matter can be dispatched in a few words.

For: 1. that each abusively sought patronage for his novelties from Cajetan, Paludanus, and St. Antoninus is sufficiently evident from the foregoing. - 2. That Henriquez strengthened his novelty only by a heap of other false allegations the VV. themselves plainly confirm by their silence. - 3. But what the VV. add (p. 540), It is certain that Henriquez was not the first who introduced the doctrine that a traveler can be absolved from a sin reserved in his own diocese if it is not reserved in the diocese of the confessor, has an easy reply: let the VV. produce anyone who before Henriquez has this general assertion, and then they can be believed.

8. Since the VV. call Henriquez as a patron, it will not be foreign to the matter to indicate briefly here how the whole system of the VV. is completely overthrown from the doctrines of Henriquez.

First, the VV. contend with St. Alphonsus that a visitor is now not absolved by the consent of his proper pastor, nor is jurisdiction had from him. But Henriquez speaks to the contrary thus (book 6, chapter 14, no. 8): An alien Bishop could absolve a traveling citizen, while he has business in his diocese, from sins reserved to his proper Bishop FROM THE TACIT RATIFICATION OF THE PROPER BISHOP, especially if the proper Bishop is very far distant. Adam Tanner also copied this opinion thus (On Penance, q. 9, no. 86): An Ordinary can absolve a traveler from reserved sins under the ratification of the proper Bishop, especially if the proper Bishop were very remotely distant, as if he came from India. But that this ratification imports the conferral of jurisdiction, Henriquez had clearly said before (book 6, chapter 13, no. 13): The ratification of a Prelate, which because of necessity or other reasons is believed to have been given by some external sign in past or present time, GIVES JURISDICTION TO THE CONFESSOR. And Henriquez had already established this general principle (book 6, chapter 8, no. 5): Travelers... can choose a Confessor from among those set forth along the way and at the end of their journey; for custom is interpreted as their having the permission of their proper pastor, although they did not seek it; and an alien Bishop or one acting in his place could, from a certain tacit commission of the proper Bishop, absolve him from sins reserved to his proper Bishop. Henriquez says these things to prove the more general assertion, namely, that jurisdiction is given by reason of status, etc. Elsewhere, however (Note q. on book 6, chapter 14, no. 8), he adds that the Doctors who deny that a traveler can be absolved from the reserved sins of his Bishop must be interpreted as meaning that the alien Bishop cannot do so by his own right. Therefore the theory of the VV. is overthrown by the first author of these novelties.

2. The VV. establish another foundation of their system in this, that custom bestows jurisdiction, which they do not wish to derive from the Ordinary of the visitor. But Henriquez, as is evident from his words last transcribed, attributes no other role to custom than that it indicates the permission of the Ordinary of the penitent: For custom (he says) is interpreted as their having the permission of their proper pastor; and this permission, as he himself adds, bestows jurisdiction. The same Henriquez again inculcates this thus (book 6, chapter 8, no. 2): Although custom cannot confer jurisdiction, it is nevertheless a witness and interpreter of the tacit permission which Pontiffs, while they see and remain silent, are considered to grant.

3. The VV. rely upon the words of Henriquez where he holds (book 6, chapter 14, no. 8) that the accused is accustomed to be judged according to the laws and customs of the place where he is present. But behold Henriquez himself, who elsewhere writes (book 6, chapter 7, no. 2): By reason of the offense in the external forum the accused can by law be punished by the judge of the territory; yet because of this the accused does not seem to acquire a favorable forum so that he can be absolved from sins by an alien pastor. See these same things defended as certain by Suarez (disp. 25, sect. 1, no. 18); and Lugo adds that the opposite opinion is deservedly rejected by all (disp. 19, no. 9). Now if the accused does not acquire a forum, how must he be judged according to the laws of the place? Moreover, since Henriquez teaches that jurisdiction in the case is bestowed by the Ordinary of the traveler, that absurdity which Lugo also censures returns, when he writes (disp. 20, no. 73) that if the Confessor does not have his jurisdiction from this Bishop, namely, of the place, but from the proper Bishop of the visitor or dependently upon him, then the Bishop of the visitor alone could by reservation remove or limit his jurisdiction, and not this other Bishop upon whom he does not depend. But it is no wonder that the authors of a new confusion involve themselves in perpetual contradictions.

9. But let us pass to Suarez, from whom the VV. relate these things (p. 541; from disp. 30, sect. 1, no. 4): The foundation is that he who thus remains in an alien Episcopate can confess and be absolved there not because he uses the faculty of choosing a Confessor, but because by this very fact, that he remains in an alien Episcopate, he can there be absolved after the manner of the inhabitants of that diocese and conduct himself as if he were a subject of the Bishop of that place; for in this sense the custom explained above and approved by Eugene IV must be understood. - To these things it can be replied briefly: 1. that the interpretation which Suarez here fastens upon the Declaration of Eugene IV is gratuitous and false, as is gathered both from the sense of the Doctors who are alleged in the Note and from those things said above, and indeed from the sense of Suarez himself; 2. that Suarez openly conflicts with himself when he here contends that jurisdiction in the case is had from elsewhere than through the election of the penitent; for we have already seen him several times defend that jurisdiction flows indirectly from the Ordinary of the penitent.

Another reason of Suarez (loc. cit.) is that confessors of another diocese are not bound to know which cases are reserved to another Bishop; therefore they ought to hear and judge the visitor according to the rite of their own Episcopate. Lugo also amplifies this reason thus (disp. 20, no. 72): For the Confessors of this city neither ought nor can interrogate individual penitents concerning their native place, or whether they are travelers, and much less concerning cases reserved in their native place, which surely neither the Confessor of this city nor the traveling penitent himself can know. Other authors also transcribed this argument.

Reply 1. But elsewhere we related these words of Bonacina (On Penance, disp. 5, q. 7, point 2, no. 6): One who undertakes a journey for this purpose alone, that he may avoid his proper pastor and confess to another, cannot validly confess before the pastor or priest of the place at which he arrives, as Coninck, Vasquez, Suarez, Reginaldus, and other recent authors well observe. And Suarez in fact writes thus (disp. 25, sect. 2, no. 9): If someone were to undertake a journey only for this, that he might have the occasion of confessing to another and not to his proper priest, this would no longer be necessity but will, and it would not be according to the intention of the pastors nor according to the custom of the Church; and therefore the confession would not be valid. Nor does Lugo think otherwise, who has these things in the clearest words (disp. 19, no. 7): Those who travel and make a journey can now, from the tacit will of their pastors, confess even to the pastor whom they find in the place where they are, provided that they did not deliberately depart from their domicile in order that, on the occasion of the journey, they might confess to another. How, then, is the Confessor said neither to be able nor to be bound at all to inquire concerning the diocese of the penitent and for what end he departed from it, when he knows that absolution will be invalid if the penitent deliberately departed in order to confess to an alien priest? And, moreover, it is no less necessary, as we shall see, to know concerning alien reserved cases.

2. Meanwhile, if the expression be permitted, a difficulty of this kind ought in a certain manner to provoke laughter if, setting aside for a little while the new theories which after Henriquez were built upon a heap of false allegations, we return to preceding times. Indeed: 1. before these novelties a visitor, as we have already seen, could not be absolved from reserved sins except in a case of some necessity, such as the occasion of the Paschal precept; 2. although Paludanus, St. Antoninus, and Cajetan, when speaking of absolution from reserved sins on the occasion of Easter, introduce no mention of any condition, nevertheless the Doctors more commonly, as is intimated in the Note, establish that an obligation must be imposed upon the penitent to disclose the reserved sin afterward also to his proper Ordinary.

But did this practice not require confessors to know that this or that sin was reserved in the diocese of the visitor? And since this practice flourished in the Church through so many centuries, yet we find not even the least indication among the Doctors that the ministry of this sacrament displayed any difficulty for this reason, what indeed is the reason that the recent authors, under the pretext of this difficulty, judge that all the principles concerning the economy of jurisdiction must necessarily be overthrown?

But, 3. we shall see a little later that the Apostolic See elsewhere prohibited by a most severe law that any confessor, whether Regular or Secular, should dare to absolve from sins which Ordinaries had reserved to themselves unless he had obtained from them a special faculty for this; and it was established that this was to be observed also concerning the reserved sins of other dioceses with regard to their subjects. But when Clement X confirmed for Regulars the privilege of absolving visitors in certain circumstances from sins reserved in their diocese, he imposed this condition: provided that they had not come in fraud of the reservation. But if anything were to be conceded to the reason which Suarez and Lugo, and afterward several others, repeat here, could anyone not with right represent these dispositions of the Apostolic See as less wise? Could anyone not repeat with Suarez and Lugo that a confessor neither knows nor is bound to know the reserved cases of other dioceses, and that he neither can nor ought to interrogate individual penitents as to which diocese they belong or whether they have reserved cases? How also could that which St. Alphonsus has (book 6, no. 590), and Scavini after him (tract 10, disp. 1, chapter 4, art. 2), be observed in practice: that a visitor cannot be absolved from censures reserved in his own diocese? Let it therefore be concluded that an argument of this kind has some appearance, but no solidity.

10. We must come to that part of the Note where there is discussion of the new theory brought forth by Lugo. Against this the VV. write an article (p. 541) with this title: St. Alphonsus and Lugo Are Vindicated from the Injurious Attacks of Father B.

Reply 1. There is no attack in the Note, but a merely historical exposition of the opinion both of Lugo and of St. Alphonsus.

Reply 2. One is called injurious who inflicts an injury; but an injury (law 1, ff. De iniuriis) is said to be that which is done not by right. Yet nothing occurs in the Note, as will soon become evident, which was said not by right. Therefore the attacks are called injurious without cause. But to the matter.

Enough was said in the Note at section 555, question 13, concerning the opinion of St. Alphonsus which denies that visitors are absolved from the will or consent of the respective Ordinaries, namely, from their indirect concession of jurisdiction.

But as regards Cardinal de Lugo, it is indeed seen that he also followed the common doctrine of all, otherwise most true and most certain, that jurisdiction for absolving a visitor is to be derived from the indirect delegation of the Ordinary of each penitent. And according to this sense he wrote (disp. 19, no. 7): Those who travel and make a journey can now FROM THE TACIT WILL OF THEIR PASTORS confess even to the pastor whom they find in the place where they are. And he added (ibid.) that almost all agree in this. Moreover, what he adds a little later (ibid., no. 9) returns to the same thing and confirms the opinion: that it is deservedly rejected by all that in this forum, namely, the penitential forum, jurisdiction is acquired by reason of a delict committed in such a place. But when he embraced the opinion which says that the norm of the place in which the confession is made is to be observed even concerning the absolution of the reserved sins of visitors, because otherwise an entirely intolerable care would be required in the Confessor, namely, of inquiring and knowing what the native place of individual penitents is and which cases are reserved in their dioceses, while from another side he recoiled from that absurdity which we already indicated above at the end of no. 8, namely, that jurisdiction delegated by the Ordinary of a visiting penitent is to be subjected to the laws and measures which another Bishop prescribed for jurisdiction granted by himself for other subjects, he took another new path, namely by having recourse to jurisdiction which would to some extent be acquired by custom alone.

Yet he expressed this opinion in such a way that, under a certain obscure wrapping of words, he appears to assert the very thing which he appears to deny in the same place. For he writes (disp. 20, no. 70): I reply that the penitent in our case does not have from the Bishop a faculty of choosing a Confessor, but has a faculty introduced by custom and the approval of Prelates. Now when he denies that a faculty of choosing a Confessor is had from the Bishop of the visitor, by that very fact, according to the sense received by all, he plainly appears to affirm that jurisdiction is not delegated by that Bishop. But, on the contrary, when he says that the penitent has a faculty (of choosing a confessor, surely) introduced by custom and the approval of Prelates, does he not affirm what he had previously denied: that the faculty of choosing a confessor is had from the approval, that is, the will and consent, of the proper Bishop? And if the faculty is had from the will and consent of the Bishop, does it not return that jurisdiction for absolving that penitent is indirectly delegated by the same Bishop?

But if you wish to attribute this sense to that obscure proposition, that by the approval of Prelates it is understood that not the faculty of choosing a confessor, but the custom, was introduced, we shall now ask: What is that custom? If you say the custom of choosing a confessor, behold, again we have this faculty granted by the Bishop and, consequently, a conflict with what precedes. But if you understand a custom by virtue of which, apart from at least the tacit concession of his proper Bishop, a visitor can be absolved by an alien priest, then we ask: Whence does that confessor have jurisdiction? For it is of divine law, as the Ecumenical Councils defined, that for absolving there is required either ordinary jurisdiction or jurisdiction delegated by one having ordinary jurisdiction. But it is absurd that ordinary jurisdiction was bestowed upon any confessor who might happen to be chosen by the visitor. Therefore it will be delegated jurisdiction; but by whom? Not by the Ordinary of the visitor, by hypothesis; nor, again, by the Ordinary of the Confessor, because he has no jurisdiction over one not his subject, nor therefore can he delegate to another what he does not have. Shall we therefore say that, according to Lugo, the Prelates approved this custom so that visitors, contrary to divine law, might be absolved by a priest who has neither ordinary nor delegated jurisdiction? But there is nothing wonderful in this. For you will never fail to find confusions of this kind, which conflict with themselves and with first principles, among those who, after Henriquez and Suarez, allowed themselves to be carried away by these novelties. Otherwise, even Lugo disposes of these most grave questions altogether lightly and in very few words.

11. In order to repel the charge of anachronism from the Declaration of Eugene IV invoked by Lugo and St. Alphonsus, the VV. write these things (p. 542): Eugene IV, who died in the year 1447, pronounced that Declaration at the request of certain Prelates.... And when the same Prelates made it widely known, the custom by which pilgrims, with regard to the sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist, are equated with inhabitants of the place grew stronger and stronger. They then call Navarrus and Jacobus de Graffiis as witnesses of this custom.

Reply. I now pass over those things which the VV. fabricate concerning the request of Prelates who afterward promulgated the Declaration of Eugene IV, and the custom which thence grew stronger and stronger, etc. For this Declaration could have been nothing other than a reply given orally to someone on the occasion of some doubt or controversy raised by some parish priest; and the universal silence of all concerning this matter down to Cajetan commends this, for he writes that he had learned something of it from no other source than a chance reading. But the things which we are about to say will plainly show that whatever the VV. have fashioned concerning Prelates promulgating it and a custom gaining strength must be relegated to dreams. Now to the matter itself.

The witnesses of the custom produced for us by the VV. are Navarrus and Jacobus de Graffiis. Let us begin with Navarrus. A twofold custom is found mentioned by Navarrus: one in the Commentaries on chapter Placuit, De Poenit., disp. 6, no. 32, by which priests could choose a confessor for themselves. Now with regard to this custom Navarrus replied (ibid., no. 33) that priests did this by the tacit or express faculty of their Superiors. But the custom of which Lugo speaks excludes a faculty of choosing which is from Superiors. Therefore the custom of which Navarrus speaks here does not pertain to the matter; indeed, it proves a contrary custom.

Navarrus mentions another custom in the Manual, chapter 27, no. 261, by which a Pastor having the faculty of absolving from cases reserved to his own Bishop could absolve a penitent of another Episcopate, with just permission granted to him, from sins reserved to his own Bishop. But this allegation labors under a twofold defect. First, because a custom of this kind, requiring, namely, that the confession of reserved sins be made to one having a faculty over reserved cases, is so far from being the custom of which Lugo speaks that he rejects it (disp. 20, no. 71). Second, because Navarrus here also supposes that just permission has been granted to the penitent. But the custom upon which Lugo relies requires that no permission be present. Therefore this also does not pertain to the matter; indeed, it commends the opposite.

Nor does the matter stand otherwise as regards the other witness. The VV. bring forward a passage from Jacobus de Graffiis in which he testifies (Golden Decisions, book 1, chapter 13, no. 48) that there was a custom at Naples by which a priest who has the FACULTY (of absolving) from cases reserved by his own Bishop can absolve the subjects of another Bishop from those reserved by him in his own diocese. But we have already said that this theory is not admitted by Lugo. Therefore these things also are not fit to bear witness to the custom which Lugo asserts. But let us inquire further: What did Graffius think concerning Lugo's hypothesis? Behold what he writes in the very place alleged by the VV. (no. 46): It is asked whether a confessor can absolve one not his subject... from some sin reserved to his own Bishop, which nevertheless is not reserved where he confesses; for example, the Bishop of Nola has reserved adultery to himself, which is not reserved where the adulterer confesses, namely, at Naples: can a confessor appointed by the Archbishop of Naples absolve him? I reply that... if he has not changed his domicile, as is the case with pilgrims, THEN HE CANNOT BE ABSOLVED; because, since by reason of domicile and habitation one is called a subject..., therefore he is not said to be exempted from subjection to his own Bishop, who reserved the sin, and consequently he cannot be absolved. Graffius therefore professes without ambiguity a doctrine diametrically opposed to that which Lugo and St. Alphonsus defend and for which they allege custom. What, then, might someone perhaps think of the VV., who allege and relate from Graffius the things following a little later and therefore could not have failed to see those adduced here also, yet do not hesitate to allege Graffius for that fabricated custom?

12. But for fuller evidence of the matter, it will not have been enough to show that the only two witnesses whom the VV. produce are wrongly alleged by them and moreover commend the opposite; besides, these would have been less suitable for proving a custom which existed in the age of Eugene IV, since they were later by a century and more, and in fact these two speak of the usage of their own age, not of an earlier one. Let us therefore inquire concerning the age of Eugene IV, when Eugene is said to have approved this custom as already existing, and then concerning the following age, when according to the VV. this custom grew stronger and stronger.

St. Antoninus was contemporary with Eugene, indeed was appointed Archbishop by Eugene himself. What does St. Antoninus say concerning that custom? In a few words: that custom, as Lugo says, supposes that the penitent does not have from the Bishop a faculty of choosing a confessor. But St. Antoninus has this (Summa, part 3, tit. 17, chapter 4): Concerning pilgrims it must indeed be said that, if they departed without the permission of their Pastors and Bishops, they have no privilege in this matter.

In this Innocent, Hostiensis, and William agree, namely, that pilgrims and merchants, and other travelers, if they do not have permission from their Pastors or Bishops..., cannot be absolved by others. Therefore St. Antoninus openly testifies that the opposite custom existed.

The same is evident also from the Summa Pisana, which St. Antoninus often praises. For it has these things (word Confession III): Can pilgrims confess to an alien priest? I reply: if they received the scrip and staff from their proper priests, or otherwise undertook the journey with their permission, it is to be presumed that permission to confess was given to them.... But if they travel without the permission of their proper priest, they cannot be absolved by another except in necessity. And a little below: Whether a pilgrim who has a crime whose absolution the Bishop had retained to himself can be absolved by a simple priest while on pilgrimage? I reply: He can be absolved, especially if the time of general confession is at hand, as at Easter. But it must be enjoined upon him that, when he has access to his Bishop, he confess it to him again and receive penance from him for it.... But if there was no necessity, neither was the absolution valid. Concerning which necessity it was said above. There it is said of the necessity of danger of death. And thus the Author seems to hold that the approaching time of Communion is not a just cause why anyone can be absolved by an alien priest. Do not these things in all their parts oppose the custom fabricated by the VV. and show that it was falsely fashioned?

And in the Summa Armilla of Bartholomew Fumus (word Absolution, no. 30): When someone has permission to confess from the Bishop or Pastor, he will not on this account be able to be absolved from reserved cases, because this is contrary to the disposition of the law in chapter Si Episcopus; and thus Cajetan holds. Therefore, contrary to what that boasted custom would imply, Fumus both requires permission to choose a confessor and denies a faculty over reserved cases.

And in the Summa entitled Summula of Raymond (tract 4, chapter 5): Concerning traveling pilgrims I gather... that if they do not contract a stay anywhere (namely, a domicile), they will not be able to confess there unless they have received from their proper Bishop or parish priest permission to confess anywhere...; because then they could also confess and be absolved there; ... nevertheless it would be safer to seek permission specially, and that the cases which his Bishop reserves to himself be declared to him, since they cannot be absolved from such cases without his permission. Do not these things also show that a custom existed altogether opposite to that which the VV. wrongly boast to have existed already from the age of Eugene IV and afterward to have grown stronger?

13. But indeed it must now seem superfluous to add the many things which would readily be at hand on the same matter, when even the VV. were able to produce nothing more suitable to the matter than those two testimonies of Navarrus and Graffius, which are most unsuitable to the cause of the VV. themselves and indeed manifestly overthrow their assertions entirely. Yet whoever desires more may approach the Authors alleged in Gury's text regarding the present question, and he will find as many truthful witnesses against that fabricated custom, traces of which he will find neither before the novelties introduced by Henriquez and Suarez nor even afterward, before Lugo, in order to avoid the absurdities with which the new Suarezian theory also abounds, entered upon this new path, assuredly with less success.

And indeed another blemish is not lacking in the appeal to the Declaration of Eugene IV. Cajetan, to be sure, is the sole witness who found a remembrance of this Declaration (where it was written he does not say); therefore what kind of Declaration this was can and must be elicited from Cajetan alone, and consequently whatever others have added as an appendage, which is not necessarily elicited from Cajetan's words, must be called gratuitously devised and asserted.

In the first place, therefore, it is most manifestly established from Cajetan's words that the Declaration of Eugene IV pertained solely to the occasion of annual confession and Communion at Easter.

Thus Cajetan: I remember having read elsewhere that Eugene IV granted or declared by an oral oracle that travelers, wherever they found themselves AT EASTER, were to be considered as having acquired inhabitancy with regard to the sacraments of Penance and the Eucharist. Moreover, from the testimony of Cajetan, which alone can be held as authentic here, it is so certain that this Declaration regards only the occasion of Easter that he expressly denies that it can be extended to other occasions. What is it, therefore, that both Suarez and Lugo, and others after them, when they establish as a general rule upon which their whole edifice in fact rests that pilgrims as visitors and travelers must always be held as inhabitants of the place with regard to the sacrament of Penance, place the chief, not to say sole, foundation of this rule in the Declaration of Eugene? What is it that they hand down this rule of theirs as a custom approved by Eugene when Eugene's Declaration pertains merely to the occasion of Easter?

Nor is this enough. For what, at last, was that which Eugene declared concerning the occasion of Easter? Dominic Soto (In IV Sent., dist. 18, q. 4, art. 2) saw this alone in the Declaration: that pilgrims and wanderers, as parishioners of the towns where they find themselves, ought to confess only to the plebans (by which name he seems to understand confessors appointed there), because they ought not to be of freer condition than the inhabitants. For thus he understands the words of the Declaration described there from Cajetan: to be considered as having acquired inhabitancy. Nor otherwise Peter Soto (Instruction of Priests, On Confession, lecture 5): Cajetan reasonably judges, from the concession of the Pontiffs..., that every traveler can be absolved wherever he finds himself at Easter, and by that right by which the other subjects of that place are, that is, by those by whom the others are absolved. Navarrus also refers the Declaration of Eugene to this (On chapter Placuit, disp. 6, no. 66), saying: In favor of Thomas de Vio is what he says he read somewhere: that Eugene declared by an oral oracle that travelers, in the place where they were found, were to be considered as inhabitants of that place with regard to the sacraments of the Eucharist and Penance. Since, therefore, inhabitants can confess to no others than their own pastor, it follows that nothing else is to be conceded to pilgrims. And Filliucius (tract 7, chapter 7, no. 195): Pilgrims and those making a journey... from custom and the tacit permission of Pastors can confess either to the pastor of the place... or to other delegated priests.... Cajetan also relates that Eugene IV declared this in annual confession or Communion; therefore much more at other times. Therefore what Eugene IV declared is finally concluded in these things: 1. that when Easter time occurs, travelers can make their confession and receive the Holy Eucharist in the place where they are then found; 2. that they ought to make confession there either to the pastor or to other delegated priests, no otherwise than the inhabitants, since travelers ought not to be of a better condition than the inhabitants, so that, namely, to use Cajetan's words, they can choose as confessor whomever they wish.

And since these things are so, what, I ask, was there in the Declaration of Eugene IV upon which both Suarez and Lugo could construct their theories? What was there by which Lugo might contend that a custom of which no one before him had thought was confirmed by Eugene? But now to other things; for what has been said thus far makes sufficiently plain whether the history of the vicissitudes of this controversy and of the immense confusion introduced into it, as it was outlined in the Note, is genuine or, as the VV. prefer (p. 543), spurious. But now to other things.

14. The VV. append another article with the title (p. 542): St. Alphonsus with the best right considers the affirmative opinion (namely, that a visitor can be absolved from his own reserved sins by any confessor if they are not reserved in the place of confession) most common; and then through seven columns they bring forward texts of twenty-nine Authors besides nine others whom the holy Doctor Alphonsus had alleged.

Reply. The question is not whether many entered upon the new and false path which Henriquez and Suarez had opened; for this stood clearly stated in the Note. And otherwise those allegations of theirs by no means prove that the history set forth in the Note is false and spurious.

In order to prove that the history set forth in the Note is spurious, behold the heads which they ought to have proved by solid arguments:

1. That the most common doctrine of all the schools unanimously, as it is exhibited in the Note, did not exist until Henriquez undertook to corrupt it, and Suarez after him.

2. That Henriquez, relying upon equipment other and suitable than a heap of fallacious allegations, introduced his new canon. Why did the VV. devote not even a few lines to repelling this charge? Why did the VV. not attempt to show that at least one of all those allegations of Henriquez pertained to the matter?

3. That the new inverted canon concerning subjecting a pilgrim to the reservations of the diocese where he confesses was not first introduced by Suarez.

4. That Lugo did not cast aside even those principles in which the essence of sacramental judgment is contained, so that he might in some way escape the absurdities which necessarily followed the new theory of Suarez.

5. That both the custom and the force of that custom, as Lugo supposes it, were so acknowledged and approved from antiquity that, apart from an incredible anachronism, it could be said to have been confirmed by Eugene IV.

6. That the oral Declaration of Eugene IV, if there was any, was not converted by Villalobos into a certain Decretal Constitution solely by a remarkable power of imagination.

But the VV. have accomplished none of these things, nor do the allegations of so many Authors which they add accomplish the same. Indeed, another labor would remain for the VV. regarding those Authors, namely, that they purge those Authors from the charge of contradictions in which they perpetually involve themselves. For, to say only one thing, setting aside now those authors who plainly show that they themselves do not sufficiently know why they affirm or deny something concerning these questions, you will find others who wish to render some reason for their assertions, on the one side asserting jurisdiction delegated to the confessor by the Ordinary of the penitent, but on the other supposing the same jurisdiction to have been granted not by the Ordinary of the penitent but by the Ordinary of the confessor, and therefore to be restricted or not restricted. But we have already said more than once: after authors, with Henriquez and especially Suarez as leaders, began to depart from the beaten and most correct path of the ancients, whose principles nevertheless they could not all deny, this series of contradictions could be avoided in no way.

15. But since the VV. attacked both the present Note and the Note immediately following at the same time, and the matter bears it because each Note pertains to the same question, we shall append here a reply also to those things.

First, therefore, through eight columns (pp. 547-550) the VV. attack what is said in the Note, namely, that in the Constitution Superna of Clement X there is question merely of the privilege of Regulars, namely, the privilege of absolving visitors from sins reserved in their own diocese. It is not true, they say (p. 548), that it is the common opinion that in the same Constitution there is question merely of the privilege of Regulars.

Reply. At first sight someone will perhaps understand with difficulty what the VV. mean here or to what this paradox of theirs tends. The words of the Constitution are these: But that a Regular Confessor can, in the diocese in which he is approved, absolve those coming together from another diocese from sins reserved in it, etc. Now the VV. first appear to wish to deny that there is question of a privilege. For they observe (p. 548) that the word can and the title of the Constitution prove nothing; and they give the reason (p. 548), that in the Constitution there is merely defined what Regulars can and cannot do. To these things, Reply. The title of the Constitution is this: A Constitution in which the privileges of Regulars with regard to... the administration of the Sacrament of Penance are declared. Now since the word can signifies to have power, while what kind of power is in question must be drawn from the nature of the matter being treated, and the subject is a Declaration of Privileges, it is manifest that power of this kind pertains to privileges.

But this is more clearly evident from the context in which the alleged clause lies. For where mention of privileges is made in the Constitution, only these things are had (sections 6 and 7): 1. that by virtue of privileges Regulars cannot absolve from cases reserved to himself by the Bishop; 2. that by confirmations of privileges obtained after Trent, the privilege, if any which Regulars had, of absolving from cases reserved to the Bishop did not revive; 3. that those having a faculty of absolving from all cases reserved to the Apostolic See cannot on that account absolve from cases reserved to the Bishop; but that they can... absolve those coming together from another diocese from sins reserved in it; 4. finally, that by virtue of the aforesaid privileges it is not lawful for Regulars to absolve penitents from censures with regard to the external forum. Since, therefore, it is there declared what by virtue of privileges they can or cannot do concerning the questions raised, while the sole power asserted there for Regulars is that they can absolve those coming together from another diocese from things reserved there, it clearly appears that this power pertains to privileges.

And this is elicited thence by another most evident argument. For after it is there said that BY VIRTUE OF PRIVILEGES it is not lawful for Regulars to absolve penitents from censures with regard to the external forum, etc., it is added: Indeed, those bound by ecclesiastical censures and denounced can be compelled by the Bishops to conduct themselves as such. Whence thus: here there is manifestly question of cases from which Regulars absolved by virtue of privileges; therefore there is question of reserved cases, for otherwise no privilege is required to absolve from them; moreover, there is question of cases reserved to a Bishop, as is evident from the cited words of the Constitution; finally, there is question of things reserved in another diocese, because from things reserved to the Bishop in the diocese where the Regular is approved, the Constitution itself, as we saw, declares that Regulars cannot absolve by virtue of privileges. Therefore it is most evident that the faculty of absolving those coming together from another diocese from things reserved there, etc., is declared in the Constitution itself as a privilege of Regulars. And behold the reason why the assertion of the VV. can deservedly be called a paradox.

16. But since the VV. (p. 547) do not hesitate to write that the concession concerning cases not reserved in the diocese of the Confessor, which is contained in the Constitution Superna of Clement X, is not a privilege specially conceded to Regulars, and moreover contend (loc. cit.) that this very thing is confirmed from a certain declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, it will certainly be profitable, for refuting prejudices of this kind, briefly to weave the history of those things concerning the absolution of episcopal cases which preceded the Constitution of Clement X: namely, whence arose the disagreements concerning this matter between Bishops and Regulars, to the removal of which Clement applied his hand. For, as John Marin writes (Speculative and Moral Theology, tract 22, disp. 10, no. 45), Clement X, since before his Pontificate he had a complete knowledge of it because for more than thirty years he had been Secretary of the Sacred Congregation, after he was elected Pontiff, desiring to extinguish disagreements of this kind, promulgated the Bull, etc.

We therefore see that the origin of the disagreements arose from the fact that Bishops bore it unwillingly that Regulars, by virtue of their privileges, attributed to themselves the faculty of absolving even from episcopal cases. For that Regulars absolved from these we have witnesses prior to Trent. Thus Fumus (Armilla, word Absolution, no. 26): The Friars who are held as presented according to the aforesaid form of the Clementine Dudum can absolve from all cases (except precisely those reserved to the Bishop or Superior BY LAW), however much other cases may be reserved to the Bishop by custom or Constitution or another's good pleasure.... Because the grace which the Pope grants, namely, to be able to absolve from all unless they are reserved BY LAW, cannot be revoked or restricted by an inferior.... Therefore this opinion is to be held and practiced.

And the Summa Tabiena (word Dispensation, no. 16): Since, therefore, the aforesaid Friars cannot absolve from cases reserved to Bishops BY LAW, as is said in the Clementine Dudum, therefore they can absolve from all others, as from those reserved by a particular custom of the place or by a synodal Constitution; because, by denying one thing, it conceded the other by being silent.... Nor can Prelates revoke or curtail the aforesaid concession, not directly, by denying the hearing of Confession, because they have it through the Clementine Dudum; not indirectly, by prohibiting parishioners from confessing to them..., nor by the retention of many cases, because this would be done in fraud of the law, which ought not to be done. After Sylvester related this opinion (Summa, word Confessor II, no. 5), he adds: Which opinion all Summists and Doctors commonly follow, and this reasonably and truly. Reginaldus testifies that Alphonsus Vivaldus held this same thing toward the close of the sixteenth century (book 8, no. 55). See also Lezana (Summa of Regular Questions, vol. 1, chapter 19, no. 17). Yet that there were some who contradicted is sufficiently indicated by the witnesses alleged, as also by Navarrus (Manual, chapter 27, no. 266).

Let us pause here a little. This controversy, to which Clement X finally put an end, rested wholly upon this, as is evident: how far the privileges of Regulars extended. But in that age no one, as we saw above, even dreamed of a faculty which unprivileged secular confessors might have for absolving episcopal cases; for the novelties introduced by Henriquez and Suarez had not yet disturbed this question. Therefore neither the controversy itself nor its resolution pertains in any way to unprivileged seculars. But to the history.

17. Meanwhile, in the year 1577, when St. Charles asked the Sacred Congregation of the Council whether Regulars could by privilege absolve in cases which the Bishop had reserved to himself, and the Congregation referred the matter to His Holiness, His Holiness, also following the opinion of the Congregation, judged that from the faculties granted to Regulars through the mare magnum or other privileges no power had been given to them of absolving from cases reserved to himself by the Bishop.

Under Clement VIII there followed a decree of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, issued January 9, 1601, by which all priests, both Secular and Regular, were commanded that none of them, under the pretext of privileges, indults, or faculties, etc., should dare to absolve anyone from the cases contained in the Bull In Coena Domini, or otherwise in any way reserved to the Apostolic See, nor even from cases which the Ordinaries of places had reserved to themselves. But afterward, by another decree of November 26, 1602, the same Sacred Congregation, by mandate of Clement VIII, thus moderates and declares the preceding Decree: namely, that under its prohibition henceforth are comprehended only the cases in the Bull In Coena Domini, and in addition (there are appended here the well-known five cases thereafter called Clementine), likewise all cases which the Ordinaries of places have reserved or will reserve to themselves in the future.

Again let us pause here a little. The VV. will reply that from the decree itself it is elicited that the controversy was also about secular confessors. Reply. I distinguish: concerning seculars endowed with some privilege or indult, I concede; concerning others, I deny. This is evident not only from the cited words of the Decree of 1601, but the Decree of 1602 speaks more clearly for our matter thus: Moreover, it declares that those priests, both Secular and Regular, WHO SHALL BE SUPPORTED BY ANY OF THE PRIVILEGES, INDULTS, AND FACULTIES EXPRESSED IN THE AFORESAID DECREE, can, according to their privileges, indults, and faculties..., absolve from cases not comprehended in the present Declaration; BUT TO OTHER PRIESTS NOT HAVING PRIVILEGES OF THIS KIND, NOTHING NEW IS CONCEDED. Therefore unprivileged secular priests HAVE NOTHING. Therefore the controversy, which did not reach its end even after this Decree, in no way pertains to them.

18. I said that even after this decree no end was made to the controversies. For, as is evident from the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars of January 7, 1617, very many Regulars did not hesitate to absolve from reserved cases, asserting that in the Decrees issued by command of Clement VIII excommunications reserved to the Apostolic See or to Ordinaries were by no means comprehended. Therefore the Sacred Congregation, by mandate of Paul V, renewed the preceding Decrees and, declaring in addition, commanded that none of the aforesaid priests, supported by whatsoever privileges, indults, and faculties, should dare or presume to absolve from excommunications or from cases reserved to the same Ordinaries or to the Apostolic See.

But still there was no end to the controversy. For the Regulars, adhering to the words of the above-mentioned Decree issued by command of Clement VIII on January 9, 1601, namely, He commands all priests, both Secular and Regular, dwelling THROUGHOUT ALL ITALY OUTSIDE THE CITY..., concluded, with some appearance of truth, that those who dwelt outside Italy or within the City, and indeed within the district of the City, were not bound by that Decree. Hence they contended that it was lawful for them in those places to absolve both from cases reserved to himself by the Bishop and also from those contained in the Bull In Coena Domini. Therefore, behold, the same Sacred Congregation again, on November 17, 1628, by command of Urban VIII, issued a Decree that Regulars of whatsoever Order... neither within nor outside Italy, by force of privileges..., can absolve anyone from the same cases in the Bull In Coena Domini or reserved to the Ordinary of the place; and if they act otherwise, the absolutions will be and are null and void. And here it is useful to observe that, according to Thesaurus (part 2, word Absolution, chapter 3, no. 4), by the name of secular Priests endowed with some privilege in the preceding Decrees were designated certain churches or distinguished sanctuaries in which those visiting them could by privilege be absolved from reserved cases. Of these, indeed, we see mention made in the decree under Paul V in the year 1617; but in the last one under Urban VIII, Regulars alone now come forward.

Moreover, that even this last decree of Urban VIII did not remove the controversy, behold Sporer as witness, who has these things (Sacramental Theology, part 3, no. 746): By the same privilege and by the same most reasonable extension, in the more common and safe opinion, on account of the very ample and most universal clauses of the Bulls..., we Mendicant Regulars absolved from cases reserved by Bishops ab homine, namely, those which the Bishops themselves, each in his own diocese, reserve to himself, even notwithstanding the Decree of Urban VIII of November 17, 1628, prohibiting this absolution, because that Decree either did not extend outside Italy or certainly was not sufficiently promulgated. But afterward so many authentic Bulls and Declarations in favor of Bishops were published or became known that, after weighing them, Alexander VII, in the thirteenth place among the condemned propositions, prohibited this also: Mendicants can absolve from cases reserved to Bishops without obtaining for this the faculty of the Bishops. Here again Regulars alone appear implicated in that controversy; and since the Decree of Alexander VII was issued in the year 1665, we now almost reach the time when Clement X defined this question in the manner which we have seen.

19. Meanwhile, it had already been observed, as Wigandt has (tract 14, examination 2, no. 59), that the precept imposed upon Regulars not to absolve from cases reserved to the Bishop was to be understood of those reserved by the Bishop of the place where confession is heard. Thus Wigandt: When Clement VIII... prohibited confessors from absolving from cases reserved to Ordinaries, it must be understood of the respective Ordinaries, namely, of those places where those confessors are found.

And, to omit others, Filliucius also noted this same thing (tract 7, chapter 9, no. 284), writing: I reply that the prohibition of Clement VIII must be understood of the respective Ordinaries, that is: let no one absolve from things reserved to his own Ordinary; but he is not prohibited from things reserved to another, not his own, because there is no discussion of this reservation in that decree.

And indeed in favor of this interpretation is the fact that the same Clement VIII, in another Constitution which begins Quaecumque a Sede Apostolica (December 7, 1604, section 9), uses this same manner of speaking thus: We decree, moreover, that the same confessors... can in no way absolve... from other cases reserved and to be reserved for the time being, both by Us and by Our aforesaid Vicar in the City, and by the respective Ordinaries of places.

To this also pertains the fact that Urban VIII, in the Decree of November 17, 1628 cited above, restricts the prohibition to cases reserved to the Ordinary of the place: Regulars... neither within nor outside Italy can, by force of privileges, absolve anyone from cases... reserved to the Ordinary of the place.

Therefore, since the prohibition of absolving from reserved cases was to be understood of those reserved to the Ordinary of the place in which the confessor was approved; and since Regulars could use their privileges even according to the decree of Clement VIII; and finally, since by virtue of privileges they could absolve penitents coming from anywhere even from things reserved in their own diocese, the conclusion was obvious that, even after the Decree of Clement VIII, Regulars could absolve visitors also from things reserved in their respective dioceses.

20. And that this conclusion was most correct, Fagnanus supplies us a clear argument, for he discharged the office of Secretary of the Sacred Congregation of the Council for many years and dictated his work a little before the Pontificate of Clement X. For thus he, when discussing chapter Si Episcopus of Boniface VIII, by which, as he says, custom is not simply taken away, but no custom can be introduced because it conflicts with the principles of its introduction, afterward adds these things (On chapter Omnis utriusque, no. 95): But because this question does not belong to the present inquiry, we have not judged that we should dwell longer upon it. It is enough, as regards the doubt now being treated, that Regulars in the diocese in which they are approved can absolve those coming together even from cases reserved in another diocese; for in this an APOSTOLIC PRIVILEGE effects more than custom, etc.

But what especially bears upon the present purpose, Fagnanus denies that this faculty is common to secular priests. Thus he (loc. cit.): Yet this opinion, as regards secular priests, suffers the greatest difficulty, indeed does not appear true; because it can be introduced by no custom that anyone, apart from the permission of his Superior, can choose for himself a confessor who can loose or bind him, which are the formal words of the text in chapter 2, Si Episcopus.

Thus also Reiffenstuel, who himself wrote before the Constitution of Clement X (Moral Theology, tract 14, dist. 9, q. 1, no. 2): Regulars within the diocese of the approving Bishop can absolve a penitent of another diocese from cases reserved in the diocese of the penitent, if these are not reserved in the diocese in which they hear confessions, since Regulars have jurisdiction from the Pope.

Indeed, Ferraris indicates that this had already been declared by the Sacred Congregation before the Constitution of Clement X (word Reservation of Cases, no. 4). For after he said: Hence penitents coming together from another diocese with sins reserved in it can be absolved by a Regular in the diocese in which he is approved, etc., and related in confirmation of it the text from the Constitution of Clement X, he proceeds thus: For that Regulars within the diocese of the approving Bishop can absolve even penitents of another diocese had already been expressly declared by the Sacred Congregation of the Council in Fagnanus..., because they have jurisdiction from the Pope, whose ju- risdiction is not restricted to the boundaries of any territory..., but the whole world is his diocese.

Let us therefore conclude that the history also of those things which preceded the Constitution of Clement X concerning this controversy all tends to this: that the words of Clement pertain merely to declaring and confirming the privilege of Regulars.

21. The VV. object here (p. 547) that that multitude of Authors concerning whom there was discussion above, no. 14, hold that the declaration of Clement X pertains not to a privilege specially granted to Regulars but to all confessors, even seculars.

Reply. I distinguish: those Authors inconsiderately followed the badly founded opinion of Suarez, I concede; they denied that it belonged to Regulars by privilege or that this privilege had been granted by the Apostolic See to all, I deny. One obscure Author of the theology for the Seminary of Perigueux insinuates this; but from the very fact that he alone dared to teach what, in a matter so obvious, no one else thought himself permitted to affirm, he sufficiently condemns himself.

I said, the badly founded opinion of Suarez. For all the things which Suarez has concerning this matter (On Penance, disp. 30, sect. 1, no. 4) are finally contained in these words: Some therefore absolutely deny that a visitor can be absolved there from cases of this kind (reserved in his own diocese). Soto holds this, and Navarrus indicates it. The foundation is that reserved cases are not comprehended in a general faculty according to chapter Si Episcopus 2, De Poenit. et Remiss. in VI; but that faculty (given to visitors by their proper Ordinary) is only general. Nevertheless, the contrary opinion, which Cajetan, Paludanus, and St. Antoninus hold, pleases me more. The foundation is that he who thus remains in an alien Episcopate can confess and be absolved there, not because he uses a faculty of choosing a confessor, but because, by this very fact that he remains in an alien Episcopate, he can be absolved there after the manner of the inhabitants of that diocese and conduct himself as if he were a subject of the Bishop of that place; for in this sense the custom explained above and confirmed by Eugene IV must be understood. All of which things, with the reverence due to the distinguished Doctor preserved, can deservedly appear intolerable. For: 1. What is it that he attributes the negative opinion to Dominic Soto alone, when this was the unanimous doctrine of all preceding Doctors, and indeed founded upon the essence of this sacrament? 2. What does that phrase, and Navarrus indicates it, mean, when Navarrus also openly professed the negative opinion, as above, no. 5, unless perhaps the chosen Confessor was endowed with a faculty over reserved cases also? 3. What is it that he proposes as a general rule for every occasion what Paludanus, St. Antoninus, and Cajetan had said, as above, nos. 2-3, concerning the sole case of necessity on the occasion of Easter? 4. What is it that he adduces the Declaration of Eugene IV for the same matter, when Cajetan, from whom he took this, in the most explicit words absolutely denies that Eugene's Declaration has any place outside the occasion of Easter? 5. What is it that he there poses the question concerning the concession of jurisdiction through a faculty of choosing a confessor granted to one making a journey, by which tacit faculty introduced by custom the traveler can confess; and a little later, when resolving the question, contradicting himself or at least submitting elements foreign to the proposed question, disputes concerning a custom in which that faculty of choosing a confessor has no part? And indeed he introduces that custom which he himself elsewhere denied could be introduced because it was repugnant to divine law. See above, note at section 555, question 13, no. 19. Behold the foundation, and indeed the sole foundation, of that new opinion introduced against the unanimous doctrine of the ancients!

22. The VV. insist (p. 547) with those things which Benedict XIV has (On the Diocesan Synod, book 5, chapter 5, no. 8), where a Response of the Sacred Congregation of the Council of September 16, 1649, is commemorated. They conclude:

Therefore, generally and without distinguishing between Regular and Secular Confessors, the Sacred Congregation declared the absolution invalid if the penitent departed fraudulently from his own diocese in order to avoid the reservation. From which declaration it must necessarily be gathered that penitents who departed for another purpose can be absolved.

Reply. Let the Antecedent pass, and I deny the Consequence which the VV. infer. The case proposed to the Sacred Congregation, as it is read in vol. 18 of the Decrees, p. 677, is this: Since an abuse has crept into the Diocese of Conza whereby many obtain absolutions from cases reserved to the Archbishop from neighboring Ordinaries, under the pretext that cases reserved in one diocese are not reserved in another, it is asked whether an absolution of this kind can be sustained. The Sacred Congregation replied that absolution of penitents who fraudulently transfer themselves to another diocese cannot be sustained. Therefore the Sacred Congregation resolves the question by adding that reason which holds in every hypothesis. But it entirely passes over the controversy concerning the fitness of the minister for absolving from reserved cases. Therefore nothing can be forced from this. Add that in the Question there is discussion not of a simple confessor but of Ordinaries; but by the name Ordinary a Bishop is understood. Therefore for another reason this resolution does not pertain to the matter, because the VV. dispute concerning a simple confessor. But what is prefaced in the cited book On the Synod is nothing. Moreover (thus there), this opinion formerly invaded the minds of many: that it was free to anyone to pass from his own diocese, where he had fallen into a reserved case, to another in which it was not reserved, for this purpose, that he might there be absolved by a simple confessor. And then the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation cited here is appended against that opinion. This, I say, is nothing. For it pronounces no judgment concerning that opinion beyond condemning the fraud; indeed, since in the Response of the Sacred Congregation there is no discussion, as we observed, of a simple confessor, it is plain that Lambertini passed over this question entirely. But if the VV. wish to contend that he inclined toward the new Suarezian opinion because he afterward appends certain words of that obscure Author of the theology for the Seminary of Perigueux whom we mentioned, another will reply: Let it pass.

23. The VV. object (p. 548) that the Authors alleged in the Note as testifying that the decree of Clement X regards Regulars rather hold the opposite.

Reply. I distinguish: that is, those Authors after the Suarezian novelties attribute the same faculty to secular confessors, let it pass; they do not admit that the decree was issued for Regulars, I deny. Let these things related by the VV. themselves serve as a specimen. Collet: The things which are said in the Constitution concerning Regulars, parity of cause commands to be extended to others, etc. And Roncaglia: Although the Pontiff there speaks of Regular Confessors, etc. Say the same of the rest.

24. The VV. reprehend (p. 549) what is said in the Note, that the faculty bestowed upon Regulars in the Constitution of Clement X is circumscribed by this condition: that they not absolve from things reserved in both dioceses. They object, on the contrary, that this is not a limitation imposed by Clement but is the unanimous opinion of all, because, as Suarez says, the Confessor has delegated jurisdiction from neither Bishop.

Reply. This objection can have some force as regards the followers of the novelties of Suarez himself, let it pass; as regards those who think that they must not depart from the most correct doctrine of the ancients, I deny. In the preceding Notes it has already been shown that, according to the most true and certain doctrine of the ancients, which the more recent authors, perpetually contradicting themselves, now admit and now forget, jurisdiction for absolving a visitor is delegated not by the Bishop of the place but by the Ordinary of the visitor. Moreover, it is a canon, as Engel says, that a delegate judges not from his own jurisdiction but from the jurisdiction of the one delegating (argument from chapter Sane 11, De officio Delegati), or, as Schmalzgrueber expresses the same canon (book 1, tit. 29, no. 31), The power of a delegate must be measured from the authority and power of the one delegating and, with the common and from the mandate granted. For the Delegate, in the jurisdiction granted to him, acts in the place of the one delegating. Hence, as we saw elsewhere, Lugo most deservedly judged absurd the Suarezian theory by force of which another Bishop, upon whom he does not depend, can take away or limit jurisdiction delegated by one Bishop. Wherefore, when there is discussion of absolving a visitor, nowhere among the ancients will you find any account taken of the jurisdiction which the confessor obtains from the Bishop of the place or of the reservation which prevails there. Since these things are so, the consequence is obvious in itself: a Regular confessor can assuredly absolve a visitor, however the latter may bring a sin reserved in both dioceses. For the diocesan reservation of the place does not stand in the way, because this pertains nothing to the cause, as was said; likewise, the reservation of the alien diocese does not stand in the way, because a Regular confessor, by virtue of privileges, can absolve those coming from alien dioceses even from reserved cases. Therefore, the matter considered solely in itself, nothing prevents a Regular from absolving from a sin reserved in both dioceses. Therefore he cannot do so only because the Apostolic See, which bestowed upon the Regular the privilege that he could absolve a visitor from his own reserved sins, wished to restrict that faculty by this condition: namely, if the same sins are not reserved also in the diocese of the confessor.

But if also in this place there is need of some material example, so to speak, to explain the matter for the capacity of an unlearned man, imagine a Regular who wishes to use that privilege concerning which St. Alphonsus speaks (book 6, no. 586), namely, of choosing, even without the permission of Superiors, once in life a confessor who may absolve him from any reserved cases; then imagine some sin of his to be reserved to the Ordinary of the place. Would anyone therefore say that a Regular of this kind cannot be absolved by the chosen confessor? And is not this rule common to all exempt persons? And are not visitors exempt by reason of territory? Therefore the same thing must be said in the proposed question, unless Clement X had circumscribed the privilege of Regulars in that manner, to greater abundance, in favor of Bishops.

25. But it will help to indicate here a typographical error which crept into the Vindiciae in this place. For after we read there (p. 549) that it was the unanimous opinion that pilgrims cannot be absolved whenever the case is reserved in BOTH dioceses, immediately afterward (p. 550) you find it written thus: But the Authors do not even specially propose the case in which the sin is reserved in BOTH dioceses. Those who commemorate this case, such as La Croix and Amort, commemorate it for another end. In these things, do you not have an open contradiction? But the contradiction is absent when in the second text you read not both, but either. For the words of the VV. regard that clause of the Note where it is said: From which it also becomes manifest that someone could vainly suspect that those words of Clement X regard the case in which the sin is reserved in only one of the two dioceses. For the words of the VV. also refer to the sense of Clement's text.

And indeed the VV. themselves (p. 550) bring forward for this same matter texts both from Croix and from Amort. For Croix (book 6, part 2, no. 1631) writes in express words: But if the case is not reserved in the diocese of the penitent but only in the diocese of the confessor, Clement declares nothing expressly concerning this case. And Amort (Scholastic Theology, On Penance, disp. 9, q. 26): But I judge that no argument can be elicited from that Bull of Clement X, because the Pontiff does not deny that pilgrims can be absolved from sins reserved only in the diocese of the confessor, but precisely denies that they can be absolved from sins if they are reserved simultaneously in their own and the alien diocese.

We have Voit alone, who, in order to elicit from Clement's Bull that a pilgrim cannot be absolved by any confessor if he confesses a sin reserved only in the diocese of the confessor but not in his own, reasons thus (vol. 2, no. 840): Clement X establishes that a confessor can absolve those coming together from another diocese from things reserved elsewhere, but not from things reserved in that where the same confessor is approved. But how does he not see the absurdity which he places in the mouth of the Pontiff? For in the Constitution it is added: unless he knows that the same penitents migrated to an alien diocese to obtain absolution in fraud of the reservation. But can a pilgrim come in fraud of the reservation if the sin is reserved only in the diocese of the confessor?

26. The VV. urge (p. 551) that in the Note the more recent authors are falsely and unjustly accused of having introduced immense confusion into this question; for in the Note it is conceded that pilgrims can be absolved from sins reserved in their own diocese insofar as the Bishops see this custom of absolving and remain silent, which is a sufficient sign of consent and ratification de praesenti; moreover, Suarez rightly explains that the older Authors also, Hostiensis, Raymond, Astensis, Gerson, William of Mont-Lyon, and Gabriel, who seemed to hold custom as sufficient even taken by itself alone, tacitly understood the consent of the Superior.

Reply. I deny the Supposition, as though it were said that the more recent authors introduced immense confusion into these questions because they derived the force of custom from the tacit consent of the Superior. In the Note it is said that confusion was introduced because Henriquez and Suarez introduced, only by means of false allegations, a practice and doctrine unknown to all the ancients and indeed rejected by them. On the contrary, it was added in the Note itself that these innovators by no means dared wholly to renounce that principle in which the economy of sacramental judgment is contained. But this also was added in the Note: there were not lacking some who, in order to avoid other graver absurdities, seemed to renounce even that principle, thereafter entangling themselves and the whole matter in equivocations and contradictions. See above, nos. 10 and 21.

27. The VV. add (p. 551) that the more recent Authors differ from Gury's opinion only in this: that in the present question he derives the validity of absolution from the tacit consent and ratification of the Bishops, whereas the more recent authors, at least most of them, say that the custom of absolving was confirmed by the authority of the Holy See, namely: 1. by the Declaration of Eugene; 2. by the Declaration of the Sacred Congregation of the Council in the year 1649; 3. by the Constitution of Clement X. From which premises the VV. then think themselves permitted to conclude thus (p. 553): We have now sufficiently proved that in the present matter pilgrims are no longer absolved from the tacit consent of the Bishops, but from the authority of the Holy See or, as they otherwise said, from the authority of the Church.

Reply 1. I deny first that the Declaration of Clement X was alleged by Authors for this matter; for one obscure Author of the theology of Perigueux dared this, as was said above, no. 21. But then I deny that this Declaration can be extended to anything other than the singular privilege of Regulars, as was clearly shown above, no. 15. Therefore the VV. gratuitously flee to it in order to find some pontifical approval of that custom.

Reply 2. I deny first that any Author had recourse to the Declaration of the year 1649 to establish that fabricated approval. But then I deny that anything can be forced from that Declaration in favor of an approval of this kind. See above, no. 22.

But this also must be added here: the Sacred Congregation was so far from judging that customs of this kind were to be approved that in that age it decreed that the privilege whereby they could hear the confessions of those coming together from an alien diocese was proper to Regulars. Thus testifies Fagnanus, then Secretary of the Sacred Congregation (On chapter Omnis utriusque, from no. 69). For when Lord Vulpius, Archbishop of Chieti, proposed to the Sacred Congregation against the Cassinese Monks the doubt, Whether Monks approved for hearing the confessions of seculars... can hear the confessions of those coming together from an alien diocese, Fagnanus replies that by a ratification de praesenti a pilgrim of this kind (nos. 70-72): It must be replied that the aforesaid Regulars can hear the confessions even of the diocesans of the Archbishop, because, although by common law NO PRIEST can absolve a penitent not his subject even in that diocese in which he is approved; indeed, NO CUSTOM CAN BE INTRODUCED whereby anyone, apart from the permission of his Superior, can choose for himself a confessor, as is read in chapter 2, De Poenit. et Remiss.; nevertheless, something else appears to be said in the present case, since the Monks of the Cassinese Congregation approved by the Ordinary can by PRIVILEGE hear the confessions of one of another diocese, even against the will of the Bishop. Fagnanus then adds (no. 75) that the Sacred Congregation judged that it should be referred to His Holiness, and that His Holiness approved the privilege; and finally he relates the judgment of the Sacred Congregation thus (no. 79): The Sacred Congregation declared that Regulars within the diocese of the approving Bishop can absolve even a penitent of another diocese, SINCE THEY HAVE JURISDICTION FROM THE POPE, whose jurisdiction is not restricted to the boundaries of any territory, but the whole world is his diocese. Therefore the VV. vainly seek in the responses of the Sacred Congregation that fabricated approval which excludes the necessity of at least the tacit consent of Bishops.

Reply 3. I deny that any approval of the kind produced by the VV. is deduced from that famous Declaration of Eugene IV. For we have already shown above, no. 13, that nothing else is contained in that Declaration except that on the occasion of Easter a visitor can confess either to the pastor of the place or to other priests appointed there, but to no one else.

Let us therefore conclude that that pontifical approval by which the VV., with a fruitless attempt, wish somehow to dignify that fabricated custom, by virtue of which pilgrims would no longer be absolved from the tacit consent of the Bishops, must be relegated to empty phantoms; and what is to be thought concerning it is sufficiently evident from those things noted above at question 13, section 555.

28. The VV. add (p. 552) that the Church confirmed that custom at least indirectly insofar as she approved that pilgrims, with regard to the sacrament of Penance, are considered as domiciliaries and equated with inhabitants. By this pilgrims, by the fact itself and by law, can be absolved from sins not reserved in the place of confession.

Reply. I deny the Antecedent. For the rule that pilgrims are equated with inhabitants is nothing but that new and false theory which Henriquez and Suarez introduced by means of false allegations and abuse of the Declaration of Eugene IV. What the sense of the Church is can be learned: 1. from the declaration mentioned by Fagnanus above, no. 27, where even merely hearing the confessions of those coming together from an alien diocese apart from at least the tacit consent of the Bishops is exhibited as a privilege of Regulars; 2. from the Constitution of Clement X, according to which the ability to absolve those coming together from an alien diocese from sins reserved in their Episcopate is again exhibited as a singular privilege of Regulars; 3. from the dogmatic Constitution Auctorem fidei of Pius VI, according to which the doctrine which holds that it makes no difference whether or not the penitent who is absolved is a subject, apart from jurisdiction at least indirectly and tacitly delegated by the respective Ordinary of each, is defined as false, rash, pernicious, contrary and injurious to Trent, erroneous. See above, note at question 13, section 555. Behold the genuine sense of the Church.

Consequently I deny the Consequence also. For the sole reason why visitors are validly absolved from reserved cases, if confession is not made to a privileged Regular, is the tacit consent of the Bishops, all the more because there is discussion of reserved cases. For if there is question of sins not reserved, confession outside the diocese, if made to a Regular, will be valid even against the will of the proper Bishop of the visitor, as we saw in the preceding number; but if there is question of reserved sins, confession, even if made to a privileged Regular, must be called invalid if it is made against the will of the Bishop, because it would be made in fraud of the reservation. And let these things suffice concerning this question, for it is not worth the labor to pursue certain other ineptitudes objected.

[16] That in the Constitution Superna there is question merely of the privilege of Regulars is evident: 1. from the very words related above, that a REGULAR Confessor can; 2. from the title or subject of the Constitution, which is of this kind: A Constitution in which the privileges of Regulars with regard to the preaching of the Word of God and the administration of the Sacrament of Penance are declared; 3. from the common opinion of the Doctors. On this matter may be seen Simonnet (tract 15, disp. 9, art. 6, reply 7), Elbel (conference 14, no. 376), Roncaglia (tract 19, q. 7, chapter 2, q. 1, reply 2), Platelius (Synopsis, part 5, no. 909), Ferraris (word Reservation of Cases, no. 4), Viva (On Penance, q. 8, art. 1, no. 5), Antoine (On Penance, chapter 3, art. 1, q. 6), Collet (On Penance, chapter 8, part 2, no. 560), Eusebius Amort (On Penance, disp. 9, q. 25), St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 589), and finally Father Anthony of St. Joseph (tract 27, no. 389), who published the Compendium of the Salmanticenses at Rome in 1789 during the pontificate of Pius VI. Therefore, that it could have seemed to some that this clause of the Constitution Superna contained some common principle which would have force as a law for all confessors, even seculars, is to be attributed first to the theory introduced by Henriquez and Suarez and thence received by many, concerning which there was discussion in the preceding note; and then also to the opportune argument deduced from the same Constitution that a visitor cannot be absolved from a reserved case whenever the case is reserved in both the diocese of the penitent and that of the Confessor. For it is the common opinion of the Doctors that the faculty bestowed upon Regulars was circumscribed by this condition through the words: But not in that where the same Confessor is approved, namely, lest they absolve from things reserved in both dioceses. See La Croix (book 6, part 2, no. 1631), Ferraris (loc. cit.), Eusebius Amort (loc. cit., q. 26), Marcus Struggl (On the Sacrament of Penance, q. 3, no. 48), Reuter (On Penance, no. 371), Mazzotta (tract 6, disp. 2, q. 3, section 2, no. 11), Viva (On the Sacrament of Penance, q. 9, art. 3, no. 4), Platelius (loc. cit.), Emmanuel Thesaurus (On Penance, part 2, word Absolution, chapter 3), Giordanini, commonly the Author of the work Instruction for New Confessors (vol. 2, no. 503), Wagemann (Synopsis of Theology, part 3, tract 2, chapter 5), Illsung (On Penance, no. 224), Gobat (tract 7, no. 376), Antoine (On Penance, chapter 3, art. 1, q. 6), etc.; from whom it also becomes manifest that someone could vainly suspect that those words of Clement X regard the case in which the sin is reserved in only one of the two dioceses.

Moreover, the reason brought forward by the Author why secular confessors also, although they do not have the privilege conceded to Regulars by the Apostolic See, nevertheless can absolve those coming together from alien dioceses even from things reserved there, notwithstanding the Constitution of Boniface VIII (the cited chapter Si Episcopus), is the only one in fact which coheres with the essential principles of sacramental judgment solemnly defined by the Council of Trent and again inculcated by Pius VI in the Constitution Auctorem fidei (no. 37) against Jansenist artifices: namely, that no one can be loosed or bound by one who is not his judge, and that an absolution which a priest pronounces upon one over whom he does not have ordinary or delegated jurisdiction is of no moment. For the Constitution Si Episcopus stands in the way insofar as it establishes that permission, tacit or express, to choose a confessor granted by the proper Ordinary in no way includes a faculty also for reserved cases. Therefore, whenever it is established by some sign that the Ordinaries, together with the aforesaid permission, consent also to a faculty over reserved cases, the Constitution of Boniface VIII is sufficiently observed. But a sufficient sign of this consent of the Ordinaries is that they know this custom of absolving and remain silent; for thence arises that ratification de praesenti which in the case suffices for the validity of absolution. To this pertain those things of Reginaldus (book 1, no. 70): It must be held that sufficient jurisdiction... is acquired through tacit permission, which is had from ratification de praesenti, occurring when, while the proper priest who can contradict sees, knows, and remains silent, the sacrament of penance is administered. Therefore, with regard to absolution from reserved cases, there avails that very thing which Cardinal Cajetan (Summa, word Confession 2) said generally concerning confession made in an alien diocese from the tacit permission of the proper priest: Tacit episcopal permission gives force to absolutions, and custom concurs only as a witness of permission.

And with these things is most aptly connected what Clement X declared Regulars must guard against and what, a fortiori, as St. Alphonsus says (no. 589), must now be transferred also to secular Confessors on account of this new practice introduced: namely, that penitents who go to an alien diocese to confess in fraud of the reservation, that is, to evade the judgment of their proper priest, are to be excepted from that law. For in these circumstances the consent of the Ordinary, from which jurisdiction for absolving flows, can in no way be supposed. To this, therefore, returns what the Theologians, whether all cohere with themselves let others see, commonly establish concerning simple confession to be made outside the diocese: namely, that the absolution will be valid provided, to use the words of Bonacina (On Penance, disp. 5, q. 7, point 2, no. 6), they do not make the journey in fraud of the law for this cause alone, that they may... avoid their proper pastor and confess to another..., as Coninck, Vasquez, Suarez, Reginaldus, and other more recent authors well observe. Lugo places the same condition (On Penance, disp. 19, no. 7): provided, however, he says, that they have not deliberately departed from their domicile so that on the occasion of the journey they might confess to another. Concina also repeats this more recently (On Penance, book 2, diss. 2, chapter 4, no. 20), denying that they, the subjects, are validly absolved if they deliberately departed in order to confess elsewhere. See above, no. 555.

Although this reason does not appear to avail as regards Regulars, who, since they have jurisdiction not from the Bishops but from the Apostolic See, by that very fact appear not to need that delegation of jurisdiction which is contained in the tacit consent of the Ordinaries or ratification de praesenti, nevertheless another reason exists as regards them: namely, the prohibition of the Apostolic See, which, while it circumscribes the privilege conceded to them by this condition, provides with equal efficacy for order and so guards discipline that there is nothing which may impede the Bishops from governing and correcting each his own flock.

QUESTION 6. Can Regular Prelates or Superiors reserve cases in their Order or Monastery?

Reply. They can reserve only certain cases determined by Clement VIII, which are eleven in number, as may be seen in St. Alphonsus, etc. But they can by no means reserve others without the consent of the General Chapter for the whole Religion and of the Provincial Chapter for the whole Province [17].

[17] The decree of Clement VIII is as follows: Our Most Holy Lord, who long ago carefully weighed and learned from experience that the reservation of the faculty of absolving Religious penitents from certain graver sins, unless Superiors use it very prudently and moderately, can lead certain infirm persons, who sometimes fear to reveal to the Superior the stains of their conscience, into danger of eternal damnation and despair of a spiritual remedy; therefore, that His Holiness might provide opportunely against this evil, he decreed that none of the Superiors of Regulars reserve to himself the absolution of sins except those which follow, or some of them, according as they shall prudently judge in the Lord to be expedient for the advantage of their subjects.

Poisonings, incantations, divinations.

Apostasy from Religion, whether the habit is laid aside or retained, when it proceeds so far that an exit is made beyond the enclosure of the Monastery or Convent.

A nocturnal and furtive departure from a Monastery or Convent, even when made without the intention of apostatizing.

Ownership contrary to the vow of poverty, when it constitutes a mortal sin. A false oath in a regular or legitimate judgment.

The procuring of, assistance toward, or counsel for causing an abortion after the fetus has been animated, even when the effect does not follow.

The falsification of the handwriting or seal of Officials of the Monastery or Convent.

The theft of property of the Monastery or Convent in a quantity constituting a mortal sin.

A voluntary carnal lapse consummated in act.

The killing or wounding, or grave striking, of any person.

The malicious obstruction, delay, or opening of letters from Superiors to inferiors and from inferiors to Superiors.

If, besides these, it should seem that some other grave sin must be reserved for the preservation of the Religion or for purity of conscience, this is not to be done except by the mature discussion and consent of the General Chapter for the whole Order, or of the Provincial Chapter for the Province.

But other things most worthy of being known are also contained in the same Decree. First, indeed, it is established that subjects are not to be obliged to confess to Superiors: It shall not be lawful for Superiors of Regulars to hear the Confessions of their subjects, except when they have committed some reserved sin, or when the subjects themselves spontaneously and of their own motion have requested this of them.

It is then decreed that several confessors are to be appointed in each house, so that subjects may be free to confess to any of them at their pleasure; and a norm is also added concerning the faculty to be given to those confessors for absolving even from reserved cases. Superiors shall appoint in each house two, three, or more Confessors according as the number of subjects is greater or smaller; and they shall be learned, prudent, and endowed with charity, who shall absolve them from non-reserved cases and to whom absolution from reserved cases also shall be committed whenever a case occurs in which the Confessor himself especially judges that it ought to be committed. As regards the first point, the interpretation must be rejected altogether as though only one Confessor could be given if the number of subjects is not so great; or as though, when several are given for their great number, a certain determined portion could be assigned to each in such a way that individuals would have only one to whom they might confess exclusively. As regards the second point, however, it is manifest that, in determining whether a faculty for absolving from reserved cases is to be granted to the Confessor, the principal part must be deferred to the judgment of the Confessor himself.

To these was added a declaration of the greatest importance, which it is evident was issued by the same Clement VIII from those things which Ferraris relates (word Regular Prelate, no. 58). It is appended to the same Decree of Clement in these words: His Holiness afterward declared and declares that, if the Superior should be unwilling to grant a faculty for some reserved case to the Confessors of such Regulars when they request it, the Confessors may nevertheless, FOR THAT OCCASION, absolve Regular penitents even without having obtained the faculty from the Superior. Clement wished the matter to be deferred to the judgment of the Confessor to such an extent that, even if the Superior denies the faculty to him, he nevertheless can absolve the penitent from the reserved cases. Pellizzarius (On Nuns, chapter 9, no. 29) wisely observes that this declaration avails also for the confessor of Nuns when he requests from their Ordinary a faculty for absolving from reserved cases, whether that Ordinary is a Regular Prelate or the Bishop of the place, according as the monastery is or is not exempt. Moreover, when the Declaration says that the confessor, after the faculty has been requested although not obtained, can absolve FOR THAT OCCASION, this is not to be understood as though the Pontiff conceded it for only one occasion, but as meaning that the Confessor cannot again absolve either the same or another penitent from a reserved case unless he again asks permission from the Superior; and if this is denied, the confessor can again absolve, and so forth. Therefore, the sense will be that, as often as the faculty is requested and denied, so often can the confessor absolve, and so forth. On this matter St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 586) relates that Collet adduces a decree of Urban VIII; but this is a mere hallucination of Collet, who wrongly interpreted certain words of Diana's Compendium, published at Rome in 1654, to which he himself refers.

But it is altogether to be desired that Superiors leave no occasion for recourse to the use of the faculty conceded by this Declaration. For Suarez most wisely observes (On Penance, disp. 30, sect. 4, no. 9) that, regularly and morally speaking, the Superior ought to be easy rather than difficult in conceding this faculty; and this according to the General Ordinances of the Society of Jesus (chapter 6, no. 1), where these words were read: In no way ought the Superior to be difficult, but rather easy and prompt in conceding it.

And an excellent reason is given in those words of St. Thomas (In IV Sent., dist. 17, q. 3, art. 3, q. 4, ad 6): But a priest would sin if he were not ready to grant permission to confess to another; because many are so infirm that they would rather die without confession than confess to such a priest; whence those who are too solicitous to know the consciences of their subjects through confession cast a snare of damnation upon many and, consequently, upon themselves. And again (Against Those Who Assail Religion, chapter 4): Certain persons, as has been found by experience, would desist from confession unless they could confess to others than their own priests, sometimes because of shame, because they blush to confess their sins to those with whom they converse daily; but sometimes because they suspect the priests to be hostile to them, and for many other reasons. Hence pious Prelates condescend to their infirmity, lest they fall altogether into despair, by providing other confessors for them.

Therefore, after Suarez (loc. cit.) adds that, morally and in itself speaking, there is less danger in conceding this faculty than in denying it, he continues: For it to be conceded, it ought to suffice that no special reason for denying it occurs; but for it to be denied, some special reason which requires this must always intervene.... Indeed, although it may sometimes seem to the Superior that a sufficient reason for denying the faculty intervenes, nevertheless, if it has become evident to him from the report of another or in another way that the subject is in no way willing to approach the Superior, nor can he be induced to do so after other remedies have been attempted, then the Superior ought never to deny the faculty, nor can he lawfully do so, except in a case of harm to others; because, notwithstanding whatever reason occurs and all things being weighed, it is then more expedient, indeed necessary, according to the laws of charity. Likewise, because this is a certain medicine for the subject; therefore, if applied with rigor it turns to his destruction, it must be tempered, and therefore the faculty must be conceded. Hence Navarrus (On chapter Placuit, no. 149) says that the excessive shame alone of the penitent is sometimes a sufficient cause for this faculty to be given.

As for Suarez's exception of the case of harm to others, it must be understood when scandal or any harm would perhaps threaten either the Religion, the house, another person, or the penitent himself, and it could not otherwise be met except by making the matter known to the Superior. But then, if the subject refused, he certainly could not be absolved, not from a defect of jurisdiction in the Confessor, but from a defect of disposition in the penitent himself. For the law of nature requires that the subject remove that scandal or harm; and if the only means available is that the matter be disclosed to the Superior, he is certainly bound to this.

From these things it is now also evident that throughout this whole affair secrecy must be so provided for that the penitent is not discovered by the Superior himself. Thus the Doctors commonly. Hence in the General Ordinances of the Society of Jesus (chapter 6, no. 3): Let the Superior beware, when the faculty is requested from him, lest he inquire curiously or do anything else from which he could conjecture who that person is for whom it is requested, and lest he seek any circumstances other than those which pertain to the matter. Let the Confessor also beware lest anything escape him from which the penitent could be recognized; and if he fears that, from knowledge of some circumstance, the Superior could probably suspect who that person is, let him know that he must omit it altogether and employ every caution in proposing the case, lest the Superior in any way be able probably to recognize the author. If he sees that, by proposing the case specifically, an occasion of suspicion would be given to the Superior, it will suffice if he says in general that someone has fallen into a reserved case which can bring harm neither to the Religion, nor to another, nor to the penitent himself. Finally, let both the Superior and the Confessor be mindful of the obligation of the Seal and so conduct themselves that in all things they take counsel for its purity and integrity.

And as regards the Seal, another most grave point occurs which Clement VIII also had before his eyes in the aforesaid Decree: namely, that no one can in any way use for external government knowledge obtained on the occasion of hearing confession. Thus Clement: Both the Superiors who exist for the time being and Confessors who have been promoted to the rank of Superior shall most diligently beware lest they use for external government that knowledge which they had in Confession concerning the sins of others. Suarez indeed had once judged (On Religion, tract 10, book 8, chapter 5, nos. 12-13) that under the name of external government there did not come that government which might be necessary for avoiding a sin or scandal either of the penitent or of others arising precisely from that sin, and accordingly that the Superior could use knowledge had from confession for that end. But he himself afterward expressly rejected that opinion (On Penance, disp. 33, sect. 7, no. 4).

§ II. On Absolution from Reserved Cases

574. Principles. - I. By ordinary power, the following can absolve from reserved cases: 1. those who themselves reserve them; 2. their successors in the same power; 3. their Superiors.

II. Bishops or their delegates can absolve even from occult papal cases, excepting, however, those which His Holiness Pius IX declared to be reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See. This is established from the concession of the Council of Trent, sess. 24, Decree on Reformation, chapter 6, Liceat, and from the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, October 12, 1869.

Bishops can absolve from papal cases even when notorious or public all the faithful who, because of a legitimate impediment, cannot approach the Apostolic See, lest danger threaten souls from a delay of absolution. This is established from Canon Law.

III. No Confessor, even a Regular, can absolve from properly episcopal cases unless he has received the faculty from the Bishop himself, even if he can absolve from any cases whatsoever reserved to the Pope. Thus Clement X in the Bull Superna, where it is said: Those having the faculty of absolving from all cases reserved to the Apostolic See cannot on that account absolve in cases reserved by the Bishop. Except, according to what was said above, Regulars, who by the same Constitution of Clement X can absolve those coming together from an alien diocese from the cases reserved there, unless, however, they have come in fraud of the reservation and the sins are also reserved in the place of confession.

IV. There is no reservation at the moment of death. Therefore, all Priests can then absolve any penitents from all sins and censures. - Trent, sess. 14, chapter 7.

575. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Can an inferior sometimes absolve one having reserved sins outside danger of death?

Reply 1. He can indeed sometimes absolve, namely, whenever the faculty cannot be sought from the Superior, not even by letter [1], and otherwise there is danger in delay or a grave inconvenience threatens; and this avails even if the sin should be reserved with excommunication. The reason is that the Church, a pious mother, and every Superior cannot be judged to wish to oblige anyone to something morally impossible or to undergo so great an inconvenience. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, no. 585.

[1] Observe with St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 89) that the common, more probable, and safe doctrine is that one who has an impediment to appearing before the Pontiff is not bound to seek absolution through an intermediary or by letter, even from the Sacred Penitentiary: 1. because by common law, while that impediment remains, Bishops possess the power of absolving; 2. because no obligation is present except that of appearing personally; if, therefore, anyone cannot perform this, he is bound to nothing else except what the legislator has substituted; 3. because obtaining absolution through the Sacred Penitentiary is a privilege, but according to the common axiom no one is bound to use privileges. Nevertheless, if a privileged confessor is lacking and the impediment is not perpetual, a petition for the faculty by letter will be useful, so that the penitent may be freed from the burden of appearing at some time.

Albitius (On Inconstancy, chapter 25, no. 33) adduces for the opposite opinion the example of a decision issued by the Congregation of the Holy Inquisition. But the example is not to the point. Someone had namely been absolved under the express condition that he present himself at Rome either personally or through a procurator; and when he alleged the inconvenience of the journey, it was granted to him that he might have recourse to the Sacred Penitentiary. Here, therefore, there is a special disposition for a special case, which neither ought nor can be converted into a general principle.

Reply 2. Yet in such a case he cannot absolve except indirectly from the reserved cases, although he absolves directly from the others. The reason is that he does not have jurisdiction over the reserved cases. Nor is the Church judged to supply this jurisdiction; for there is no necessity of supplying it, since indirect absolution from the reserved cases suffices for the present necessity. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and the others cited above.

Hence, 1. the Confessor cannot then absolve except with the burden that, when an opportunity is given, the penitent present himself to the Superior or to another having the faculty of absolving from reserved cases.

These things, however, avail when the penitent can within a short time approach the Superior or another having the faculty over reserved cases. But if the impediment lasts for a long time, which is computed from six months to five years, an inferior can absolve directly, with the burden nevertheless imposed of presenting himself to the Superior or his delegate if the sin is reserved with a censure. It is otherwise if the sin does not have a censure attached. - Suarez, On Penance, disp. 30, sect. 3, no. 7. - Lugo, disp. 20, no. 223. But when the impediment is perpetual [2], absolution is given directly without any burden of appearing before the Superior. Chapter Eos qui, 22, De Sent. Excomm., in VI. Those things which are said concerning a reservation of the Pontiff can be extended to episcopal reserved cases [3]. Thus the common opinion in St. Alphonsus, no. 585 and book 7, no. 92.

[2] Those judged to have an impediment of this kind are children before puberty, sons of a family, the aged, servants, the poor, the infirm or sickly, women, Regulars, and much more nuns, those perpetually condemned to prisons or galleys, and finally all who are bound by a duty of supporting or administering a family, or of discharging a public office which cannot be left without public or grave detriment. See St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 88).

[3] By episcopal reserved cases the Author seems to mean sins which a Bishop reserves to himself. Concerning these St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 585) judges as more true that the rule handed down concerning papal reserved cases does not avail; but afterward (book 7, no. 92) he proposes the doctrine of Roncaglia (tract 4, q. 1, chapter 6, q. 5), who establishes this general principle: Those things which have been said concerning cases reserved to the Supreme Pontiff can, from parity of reason, be extended to episcopal reserved cases, etc.; and Sporer has things corresponding to these (On Penance, no. 750). But that St. Alphonsus opposes to Roncaglia Laymann, Soto, Coninck, and Suarez, by whose authority he had previously been moved to judge the first opinion more true, is in fact of no account. For the first three of these do not touch this question at all; but Suarez (On Penance, disp. 30, sect. 3, nos. 11-12), after adducing reasons for each opinion, merely says that he inclines more to that side, lest in a matter so grave this faculty be attributed without sufficient foundation. Yet others rightly think that sufficient foundation is present in chapter Eos qui, 22, De Sent. Excomm., in VI, which thus determines: Those who are absolved by another from a sentence of a canon or of a man (when, because of the imminent moment of death or another legitimate impediment, they cannot have recourse for the benefit of absolution to him by whom otherwise they were by law to be absolved), etc.; for here there is question of any Superior whatsoever and not only of the Roman Pontiff. The same can also be elicited from chapter Nuper, De Sent. Excomm., in which the question is expressly raised concerning any Prelate whatsoever. Nor indeed is Roncaglia alone with Sporer in that doctrine; for he himself alleges Hurtado and Diana, while Diana (vol. 1, tract 5, resolutions 18 and 19) adds Palaus, Henriquez, Marchant, Caelestinus, Gamachaeus, and Granadus. And he concludes (resolution 18, no. 7): And I judge all these things sufficiently probable and safe; and let them be noted especially by Confessors, because they are not everywhere encountered in Authors, but are of daily occurrence in practice.

Moreover, the same question is raised concerning those who, bound by a pontifical censure and hindered from approaching Rome, ought to seek absolution from the Bishop: whether, if they are also hindered from betaking themselves to the Bishop, they can be absolved by any Confessor. St. Alphonsus replies (book 7, no. 92): Suarez, Lugo, Becanus, etc., more commonly deny it, according to Viva, On Penance, q. 9, art. 2, no. 9, because in law this is conceded only to Bishops, nor in a positive law does an argument from parity avail. But in this he was deceived by Viva, who in that place badly confounds distinct questions; while Suarez was so far of the affirmative opinion that Lugo attempted to attack him for this reason (On Penance, disp. 20, nos. 228-229). Moreover, the laws are manifest not only in the cited chapter Eos qui, but also in chapter Nuper, in which the faculty is also given to others besides the Bishop in these words: But if for some just cause it is difficult for the one to be absolved to approach the excommunicator himself, we grant by indulgence that (after security has been given according to the form of the Church that he will obey the mandate of the excommunicator) he may be absolved by his own Bishop or proper priest. This sentence, as St. Alphonsus says (loc. cit.), the Doctors most commonly interpret not disjunctively, as though it were equally permissible to approach either the Bishop or another confessor, but substitutively, namely, that he can then be absolved by another confessor when the Bishop cannot be approached. But if the Doctors most commonly elicit this from this canon, how do they more commonly deny that one who is impeded can be absolved by someone other than the Bishop? And in fact the same St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) adduces many more for the second opinion than for the first.

 The VV. expend twenty-four columns (pp. 554-565) in attacking this Note. Therefore, as regards the first part of the Note, in which it is said that no account is to be made of the fact that St. Alphonsus opposes Laymann, Coninck, and Soto to Roncaglia because they do not touch at all upon the question at issue, the VV. (p. 556) establish this thesis: St. Alphonsus rightly alleges the Authors cited for the negative opinion.

Reply. This controversy has an easy solution if the state of the question is rightly defined. Therefore, in the present matter there is question of a penitent who is impeded from approaching the Bishop for a long time; concerning this case St. Alphonsus elsewhere (book 7, no. 86) thus determined: If, however, the impediment is FOR A LONG TIME, for example, for a year or six months..., he ought not to be absolved unless an oath has first been given, etc.; that is, he teaches that he is to be absolved, with the burden imposed of presenting himself to the Superior when the impediment ceases, etc.

1. These things being established beforehand, we now come to Laymann. He (book 5, tract 6, chapter 12, nos. 9-10), to the question, What is a Confessor to do if a penitent confesses, among other things, a sin reserved to the Superior?, first replies: Ordinarily he ought not to absolve him, but to send him to the Superior, etc. Here, as is evident, there is no discussion of a penitent having a long-lasting impediment. Therefore these things are not to the point.

The other reply is this: If some necessity urges, for example, if the penitent is far distant from the Bishop, then the confessor can absolve the penitent in such a way that the absolution falls upon the non-reserved sins..., but indirectly upon the reserved sins. And here likewise there is no trace of a long-lasting impediment, indeed not even of a perpetual impediment. Therefore neither do these things touch the present controversy. Therefore it was rightly said in the Note that Laymann does not touch this question and accordingly is alleged in vain.

Indeed, it may be added that if Laymann has anything which can pertain in any way to the present matter, he inclines to the opinion opposite to that which the holy Doctor Alphonsus attributes to him. For (loc. cit., no. 15) he has these words: Finally I observe that, even outside danger of death, if there is a moral impossibility of approaching the Apostolic See for absolution from a sin reserved to the Supreme Pontiff, but neither the Bishop or his Vicar, to whom in such a case the faculty of absolution devolves accidentally, can be approached, nor can any privileged confessor be had, then it is very probable, as Felicianus, Scotus, Sylvester, Suarez, and Filliucius hand down from the argument of chapter Nuper, De Sent. Excomm., that even the Pastor or another inferior legitimate confessor can absolve, for example, a nun in enclosure; with an obligation imposed, or rather with the penitent advised of the obligation that, if it should happen that the impediment to approaching the Pope is removed, he ought to present himself to him, not that he may be absolved again, since he was truly and directly absolved, but, etc. Therefore Laymann teaches that one who cannot approach the Bishop can be absolved directly by an inferior. But why, finally, does Laymann admit this except from the general principle that a remedy ought not to be lacking, according to the Sacred Canons, for danger to souls and the necessity of the penitent? But are not the same danger and the same necessity present whether the case is episcopal or pontifical, for absolution from which the Bishop must be approached? Indeed, St. Alphonsus also (book 7, no. 92) does not reject this, both because, where there is the same reason, there ought to be the same law, as the Gloss says on chapter Dilectus, and because a law expressly granting this is not lacking; for in chapter Nuper, 29, De Sent. Excomm., it is held that one impeded for a just cause from approaching a Superior having the right to absolve from a censure is to be absolved by his own Bishop or proper priest. In that place the holy Doctor treats the general question, Whether those still impeded from approaching the Bishop for these censures, or OTHER RESERVED CASES, can be absolved by any confessor. Therefore, since the same reason avails for each case, if anything can be conjectured concerning Laymann's mind, there is certainly no reason why he should be drawn into the opinion which St. Alphonsus attributes to him; but, on the contrary, he can rightly be alleged for the opposite.

2. Let us pass to Dominic Soto, concerning whom the VV. (p. 559) write: St. Alphonsus alleges Dominic Soto only in book 7, no. 91, and indeed only indirectly from Laymann, where he treats reservations without a censure.

Reply. This is not true; for St. Alphonsus alleges Soto also in no. 92, where he asks whether, if someone is impeded from approaching the Bishop, a simple confessor can absolve him from cases and censures reserved by that same Bishop; and this is our present question. Therefore let the VV. seek another place in the works of Dominic Soto where he denies that an inferior can absolve from episcopal reserved cases when there is a long-lasting impediment, for example, for four years, to approaching the Bishop. Moreover, to exempt this place of the holy Doctor from every reproach, it would perhaps be expedient to employ another interpretation of it, such that he does not oppose those four Authors, namely, Suarez, Laymann, Coninck, and Soto, to Roncaglia, but adduces them for the hypothesis of an impediment that is indeed temporary but not long-lasting. And thus this place is better reconciled with those things which he has previously, and which we adduced above, concerning those impeded from approaching the Bishop for censures and other reserved cases. For, in view of the context, it is not necessary that this question be understood only of pontifical cases.

3. As regards Coninck, the VV. adduce (p. 558) this passage of his (disp. 8, no. 88): Others add that the same thing must be said of a Pastor with respect to cases reserved to the Bishop when the latter cannot be approached, but they do not sufficiently prove it, and necessity can scarcely occur, since a faculty for absolving from them can easily be obtained from the Bishop; unless perhaps in some sudden necessity, concerning which we shall say what must be done in the following doubt. But in the following doubt Coninck has that which all others also have, namely, that the penitent is to be absolved directly from the non-reserved sins, but indirectly from the reserved sins, etc.

Reply. That someone indicates a means by which some necessity can be met does not solve the general question, in which it is supposed that a means of providing for the necessity is not present. Others here add that a simple confessor cannot absolve the penitent in the case if a privileged confessor is at hand who can absolve also from the reserved cases; but even this, as is evident, does not solve the question under the hypothesis in which a privileged confessor is lacking. Therefore let it be sought in Coninck what must be done when, for a long time and from whatever cause may finally be imagined, the means proposed by him is lacking. And since you will seek in vain for the solution of this question in him, he is consequently opposed without reason to Roncaglia, who discusses this hypothesis.

Moreover, the remedy which Coninck suggests here can have place also when someone impeded from approaching the Pontiff ought, according to the canons, to receive absolution from the Bishop, yet cannot approach the Bishop either. For even in this case the Bishop can delegate to another the faculty of absolving.

Why, then, do neither St. Alphonsus nor the VV. object to Coninck in this case, but admit that this penitent can be absolved by an inferior?

4. Nearly the same things which we said concerning Coninck avail with Suarez. His thesis stands thus (disp. 30, sect. 3, no. 12): Absolutely speaking, I judge that inferior priests do not have jurisdiction over these reserved cases outside the moment of death BY FORCE OF COMMON LAW, because the Pontiffs speak only of cases reserved to themselves, in which there is the most special reason which was already touched upon.

Reply. Let those words, By force of common law, be carefully observed. For Suarez continues: And it can furthermore be explained because it pertained to the care of the Pontiffs themselves to commit this jurisdiction in their own cases; but as regards inferior Prelates it was not necessary for this to be established by common law, but just as reservation is made by them through particular statutes either of Dioceses or of Religious Orders, so it is committed to their care and prudence that they make it in a manner accommodated to the salvation of souls; and therefore in statutes of this kind it is ALMOST always customary to declare that, as often as access to the Prelate is difficult, absolution can in some way be obtained from others, lest penance be delayed too long. But, it can again be rejoined, these things do not pertain to the matter. For the question concerns the hypothesis of a penitent who for a long time must lack absolution because he can neither approach the Bishop nor has another at hand who possesses the faculty of absolving. But the hypothesis of Suarez stands otherwise. Therefore, in the hypothesis which is established here by us, the reason from which Suarez wishes to extricate himself retains all its force; and he proposes it thus (loc. cit., no. 11): Although the difficulty of appearing before the Superior occurs more frequently with regard to the Supreme Pontiff than with regard to inferior Prelates, nevertheless it cannot be denied that it can often happen with danger to souls arising from a delay of penance. Therefore, although the Pontiffs established that law on the occasion of cases reserved to themselves, yet, their reason being considered (namely, Lest danger threaten souls from a delay of penance, chapter final, De Poenit. et Remiss.), it can probably be believed that they established a general law to be observed in every reservation of cases.

Indeed, someone could add that it not only can probably be believed, as Suarez has it, but must be held as certain that the Pontiffs established a general law to be observed in every reservation of cases. For are not the words of canon Eos qui (chapter 22, De Sent. Excomm., in VI) most clear? Those (thus Boniface VIII) who are absolved by another from the sentence of a canon OR OF A MAN (when, because of the imminent moment of death or ANOTHER LEGITIMATE IMPEDIMENT, they cannot have recourse for the benefit of absolution to him by whom they otherwise were by law to be absolved): if afterward, when it ceases, etc. But the things contained in this canon pertain to common law; and the canon generally embraces all Superiors from whom absolution is to be sought, and Bishops certainly are comprehended among these. Therefore.

Moreover, the same Suarez (loc. cit., no. 8) had written: In pontifical cases the general rule of law is that, as often as access to the Supreme Pontiff or to his Legate or Delegate is not open except with great difficulty and delay, the sinner can be absolved by an inferior priest, with the burden, etc. Yet he added (loc. cit., no. 10): It is often necessary to have recourse to the Bishop before inferiors, if this can be done, because the laws themselves declare this. But from those things which we brought forward above from Suarez himself, it was necessary, for preventing danger to souls, that the Pontiffs should establish a law of this kind. Therefore, by Suarez's own admission, in order to ward off danger to souls it was necessary that those who could not approach the Bishop without great difficulty and delay should be capable of being absolved by an inferior priest. But, insofar as warding off danger to souls is concerned, what difference does it finally make whether the Bishop must be approached for absolution from a pontifical case or for absolution from an episcopal case?

And hence indeed we may learn, if you please, why Lugo wrote that Suarez inclined to the negative opinion, although his thesis which we adduced announces this in a certain absolute manner. For the whole context indicates that there was indeed in Suarez a strong will to deny, or rather an ineffectual wish, which nevertheless the preceding and following context proved altogether ineffectual. Therefore there was in fact no cause for the VV. (p. 559) to write these things: Father Ballerini clearly shows that he did not examine the opinion of Suarez. The very thing happened to him which he everywhere reproaches St. Alphonsus with, namely, that he blindly copied Authors. For he himself was deceived by Cardinal de Lugo. Reply. There was no deception at all, but a discreet and even benign interpretation of the Suarezian context.

It also does not appear why the VV. (p. 560) write: Therefore, since Suarez calls the opinion that in a case of necessity the penitent can be directly absolved very doubtful and, rigorously speaking, not true, much more does he reject direct absolution where no necessity is present. For to what purpose are these things? Whom perhaps do they attack? Why do the VV. not indicate who perhaps asserted what they there wish to refute? What do they desire to insinuate by that silence?

5. The VV. object (pp. 560-561): Lugo demonstrates that the words of chapter Eos qui do not furnish a sufficient foundation for the affirmative opinion.

Reply. I distinguish: Lugo attempts to extricate himself from this difficulty through a gratuitous and violent interpretation, I concede; he demonstrates it, I deny.

The VV. object (p. 561): In chapter Nuper, De Sent. Excomm., there is openly discussion only of pontifical reservations, because it is said: let him be absolved by his own Bishop or proper priest.

Reply. I deny the whole. The reason is that, as no one is ignorant, someone can legitimately be struck with excommunication even by a Bishop not his own if, for example, in another diocese he acquires a forum by reason of the offense, as if someone refuses afterward to take as wife a violated girl to whom a true promise of matrimony was made; for the Bishop of that diocese can compel him by censures to keep faith. From that excommunication he can afterward, in those circumstances of which chapter Nuper treats, be absolved by his own Bishop.

6. As regards the other part of the Note, where there is discussion of absolving those who cannot approach the Pontiff, the matter can be disposed of in a few words, although the VV. discuss this matter through eight columns.

The VV. (p. 563) freely concede what is said in the Note, that the holy Doctor Alphonsus was deceived by Viva when he wrote (book 7, no. 92), Suarez, etc., more commonly deny it, but in these words: It is only a mere inadvertence or slip of the pen that the holy Doctor alleges Suarez for the negative opinion. Yet perhaps it would have been better to act here more sincerely or simply. For what they say of inadvertence is most true, and they very well allege the place of the holy Doctor where he attributes the opposite opinion to Suarez in these words (book 6, no. 585): In pontifical cases the rule of law is, AS SUAREZ WELL SAYS, that as often as access to the Pontiff is not open, the penitent can be directly absolved by the Bishop; or, when an impediment to approaching the Bishop is also present, by any confessor, etc. But what the VV. add concerning a slip of the pen is not to the point, because it is manifest, and the holy Doctor himself openly says, that he took these things from Viva.

7. To those things which are said in the Note, that Suarez was so far of the affirmative opinion that Lugo attempted to attack him for this reason, the VV. write (p. 564): Rather, Father Ballerini himself was again deceived by Cardinal de Lugo; for Suarez does not hold the affirmative opinion to such an extent that he deserves to be rebuked for it, and the things which Lugo objects against him are unjust.

Reply. It is indeed difficult to divine in what matter the VV. could have said that Father Ballerini was deceived by Cardinal de Lugo. Is it perhaps as though the Note said that Lugo's attack against Suarez was just or efficacious? But in the Note, on the contrary, it is merely said that Lugo attempted to attack him; and since in the Note itself the opinion of Suarez is exhibited as certain and confirmed by manifest laws, who would suspect that anything there is deferred to Lugo's attack? Does the deception perhaps reside in this, that the Note may seem to defer too much to the opinion of Suarez? Does what the VV. say perhaps look to this: that Suarez did not hold the affirmative opinion to such an extent that he deserved on that account to be rebuked by Lugo; namely, as though Suarez were not so firm in that opinion and Lugo therefore unjustly rose against him? But does not St. Alphonsus also (above, preceding number) praise Suarez because he relies upon a rule of law? Where, then, is this deception of Father Ballerini?

8. But the VV. also add another thing here (pp. 564-565), namely, they attack that rule of law and contend that in the alleged texts of Canon Law there is no firm foundation for the opinion which is treated here.

Reply. It is truly remarkable to what heat of contention and contradiction men can be carried away! Indeed, the holy Doctor Alphonsus (book 7, no. 92) wrote: A law expressly granting this is not lacking; for in chapter Nuper, 29, De Sent. Excomm., it is held, AS WE NOTED ABOVE, that one impeded for a just cause from approaching the Superior having the right to absolve from a censure is to be absolved by his own Bishop or proper priest. And in the place which he himself indicates, he has these things (book 7, no. 85): The same is established also in chapter Nuper, where at the end it is said MORE GENERALLY that, AS OFTEN AS anyone can with difficulty for a just cause approach for absolution from an excommunication him by whom he was to be absolved, he is to be absolved by his own Bishop or proper priest. And while the holy Doctor Alphonsus contends that it is established more generally in that canon that AS OFTEN AS, etc., is it not remarkable that the VV., under the assumed pretext of vindicating the holy Doctor, attack him instead?

9. Finally, the VV. take badly those last words of the Note: If the Doctors most commonly elicit this from this canon, how do they more commonly deny that one who is impeded can be absolved by someone other than the Bishop?

Reply. St. Alphonsus adduced three altogether, and among them Suarez, whom the VV. admit to have been alleged through inadvertence; and Becanus also could be joined to Suarez, since he touches this whole matter very lightly and in very few words and does not have this special question. Therefore Lugo alone remains. Thus, in order that they might defend the holy Doctor more suitably, others besides Lugo alone had to be adduced, so that it might be established that this doctrine is more commonly defended by the Doctors.

2. If the penitent has only reserved sins, he cannot be absolved unless he submits to the keys another sin, at least a venial sin of his past life, to be remitted directly. Otherwise no matter of the Sacrament would be given.

The cases in which an inferior can thus absolve are especially: 1. danger of infamy or scandal, for example, from the omission of the celebration of Mass; 2. the necessity of fulfilling the precept of confession or Communion; 3. fear lest the penitent remain for a long time in the state of mortal sin. - St. Ligorius, ibid.

576. ○ QUESTION 2. Is one who has been absolved from reserved cases at the moment of death by an inferior bound to present himself to the Superior if he recovers?

Reply 1. No, as regards a simple reservation. The reason is that, according to Trent, there is no reservation at the moment of death. Therefore there is also no burden of reservation unless it is proved from another source.

Reply 2. Authors commonly affirm this as regards censures attached to a reservation, from chapter Eos qui, 22, De Sententia excommunicationis, in VI, where no one is absolved at the moment of death from a reserved censure except under the law that, as soon as he conveniently can, he take care to present himself before the Superior, humbly to receive his mandate. Hence, if he recovers, he must have recourse to the Superior, and indeed under pain of falling again into the censures, unless a legitimate usage exempts him from this obligation. Nevertheless, some limit the obligation of presenting oneself to the Superior to the case of striking a Cleric or to another reservation which the Legislator may perhaps have excepted, of which kind the cases of the Bull In Coena were judged to be [4]. They elicit this both from the Council of Trent, by which it was declared without any restriction that every reservation ceases in danger of death, and especially from the Roman Ritual, which clearly intimates an obligation of presenting oneself to the Superior not absolutely but conditionally: But if someone confesses while placed in danger of death, he is to be absolved from all sins and censures, however reserved they may be (for every reservation then ceases); but first, if he can, let him make satisfaction to whom he ought; and if he escapes the danger, and for some reason is bound to present himself to the Superior by whom otherwise he was to be absolved, as soon as he can let him present himself before him, to perform whatever he owes. Navarrus, Henriquez, Avila, Filliucius, Sporer, Gobat, Diana, and others call this opinion probable; nor does St. Ligorius seem to contradict it [5].

[4]  To this must be referred what is thus read in the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis of Pius IX immediately after the list of excommunications which are reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See: But let those presuming to absolve without the due faculty, even under any pretext whatsoever, know that they are bound by the bond of an excommunication reserved to the Roman Pontiff, provided there is no question of the moment of death; in which, however, the obligation of standing by the mandates of the Church, if they recover, shall remain firm with regard to those absolved.

[5] St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 87) adds Corneius and the Salmanticenses to the Doctors alleged by the Author; the latter say (On Censures, chapter 2, no. 66): On account of the authority of such great men, we judge this probable. Thomas Del Bene likewise holds that opinion probable (On the Office of the Holy Inquisition, part 1, doubt 66, no. 19), who adds Gambarupta to the aforesaid; Sporer (On Penance, no. 726) joins Jordanus and Joseph de Januario to these; finally Diana (vol. 6, tract 1, resolution 202, no. 2) writes: Claudius Millardus, in the Summa of Pastors, On Penance, chapter 97, no. 10, observes that it appears most probable that this burden of presenting oneself before the Superior, if someone was absolved at the time of death from reserved excommunications, no longer has place and ceased after Trent.... Caelestinus, in the Compendium of Moral Theology, tract 1, chapter 7, no. 3, thinks that this doctrine can be approved with a safe conscience when the excommunication is not notorious or brought to the external forum. Sporer held the same, establishing (no. 752) that even the obligation of appearing before the Superior because of the striking of a cleric most probably avails only for the external forum, namely, when the matter has already been brought to the contentious forum.

Observe furthermore that, according to the mind of St. Alphonsus (book 7, no. 87), this question has place not only if someone was absolved from reserved censures at the moment of death, but also when, because of a long-lasting impediment to approaching the Superior, he obtained absolution from another and performed those things which the Superior would have exacted from him.

 The VV. write twelve columns against this Note and the text of Gury (pp. 566-571). We shall indicate in a few words those things which are of any or whatever importance.

1. Therefore, the VV. object (p. 567) that in the proposed case the negative opinion is rightly called more common and more probable by St. Alphonsus.

Reply. Let it pass; for this is denied neither in the Note nor in the text. But in the text it is merely said: Nor does St. Ligorius seem to contradict it.

2. But, the VV. say (loc. cit.), St. Alphonsus manifestly contradicts it and proposes the doubt only concerning one amended, who has already satisfied the parties.

Reply. Neither in the text nor in the Note does anything occur which excludes either satisfaction already fulfilled or the will of satisfying; indeed, an express mention of this is seen in the text of the Roman Ritual.

3. The VV. object (p. 568) that it is omitted in the Note that the Salmanticenses do not adhere to that opinion which they judge probable.

Reply. Let it pass. For it was sufficient for the purpose of the Note to indicate that the opinion had been judged probable by the Salmanticenses also.

4. The VV. (p. 569) prefix this title to another article: The arguments brought forward by Fathers Gury and Ballerini for the affirmative opinion are weighed.

Reply. I deny the supposition. For neither Father Gury nor Father Ballerini brings forward any argument, but they merely report both the opinion of others and some reason. Therefore, with fruitless labor the VV. fill two columns with texts of Patritius Sporer, whom they otherwise cannot deny to have judged the opinion which they attack to be most probable.

5. That the VV. may extricate themselves from the words of the Roman Ritual, they object that there is discussion there not only of reserved censures but also of reserved cases without a censure.

Reply. I concede the Antecedent and deny the consequence. For those words of the Ritual, And if for some reason he is bound to present himself to the Superior, would absurdly be drawn to a distinction between censures and other sins; rather, they openly indicate that there can be a doubt whether those who have been absolved from a censure are also bound to present themselves.

And let these things suffice for those twelve columns of the VV.; for certain other things do not require a reply.

577. ○ QUESTION 3. Is one bound by a reservation, when under a necessity of communicating or celebrating, bound to confess to a simple Confessor when another is lacking?

Reply 1. More probably he is not bound to confess if he has no other mortal sin except the reserved one; the reason is that he is bound to confession neither by reason of the reserved sin, which cannot be directly remitted, nor by reason of venial sins or mortal sins already remitted, since these are not necessary matter of confession. - St. Ligorius, no. 265 [6]. - Lugo. - Elbel, etc.

[6] If he has no other mortal sin except the reserved one, the Doctors agree that he is not bound to confession, but that it suffices for him to be contrite. St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 265, q. 1).

Reply 2. If, however, he observes that he does not have contrition but only attrition, he will be bound to confess at least a venial or mortal sin already remitted on another occasion, so that he may thus be absolved indirectly from the reserved sins and communicate in the state of grace. - Thus commonly. - St. Ligorius, nos. 265, 585.

Reply 3. Furthermore, he is bound to confess if he has both reserved and non-reserved mortal sins. The reason is that the divine precept of premising confession before Communion urges, and no excuse from the precept of confession is given. - Thus most commonly, says St. Ligorius, against some who denied it because, as they said, the Confessor lacks jurisdiction over such a penitent; which is plainly false [7].

[7] It seems opposed to these things that St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 585, doubt 2) says that this negative opinion is not improbable, and elsewhere (ibid., no. 596, q. 1) calls it sufficiently probable, because, as he says, it is probable with Vasquez, Tournely, Armilla, Gerson, Trullench, etc., that a simple confessor lacks all jurisdiction over one having reserved sins, since he is not his competent judge; therefore he cannot absolve him even from the non-reserved sins. Indeed (ibid., no. 265, q. 1), he adds for the same opinion Alexander of Hales, Sylvester, Richard, and Praepositus, and continues: and Suarez, Palaus, and Filliucius rightly call this probable. The reason is that that confession made to an inferior would be invalid, since it would be made to an incompetent judge who, because of the reserved sins with which the penitent is burdened, lacks all power over him. How, then, does the Author abruptly call false that which St. Alphonsus, after so many grave Doctors, affirms is rightly called probable?

But these things can easily be reconciled if the reason of the thesis is distinguished from the reason of the argument which St. Alphonsus adduces for it. For the thesis was in fact held at least as likely by those Authors whom St. Alphonsus himself alleges; hence it seems to have derived at least some extrinsic probability. But the argument drawn from this, that one cannot be absolved even from non-reserved sins unless the priest can absolve him at the same time from the reserved sins, belongs scarcely to a few, and has no strength from reason.

And indeed Vasquez (In III Part., q. 91, art. 3, doubt 9, no. 24) argues from this, that if someone could in necessity be absolved indirectly from reserved sins, he could also be so absolved outside necessity. But this is manifestly false; for it is certain among all that necessity excuses from the precept of the integrity of confession, but that outside necessity no one is excused from it.

Sylvius, however (In Suppl., q. 20, art. 2, q. 3), whose opinion Pontas (word Reserved Case, no. 21) and Collet (On Penance, part 2, chapter 8, no. 569) also report, argues from this, that according to the Council of Trent priests outside the moment of death can do nothing in reserved cases; but this would be false, in his opinion, if they could absolve at least indirectly from reserved cases. But that whole argument rests upon a perverse notion of indirect absolution, as though reserved sins were remitted in some way by the force of absolution, when among Theologians it is established that they are remitted no otherwise than they are remitted accidentally in the reception of the Eucharist or Extreme Unction, namely, consequently upon the infusion of sanctifying grace (as Dominic Soto says in In IV Sent., dist. 18, q. 2, art. 5, proposition 2), and not by the force of absolution. To this, therefore, the words of the Author look when he says that it is false that a priest cannot be the judge and minister of the sacrament with respect to one who also has reserved sins.

Moreover, if certain others denied that anyone was bound to premise confession before the reception of the Eucharist when, besides other sins, he also has reserved sins, these did not deny that he could be validly absolved directly from the non-reserved and indirectly from the reserved sins; but they merely thought that in the case he was not bound to confess. For they thought that in a confession of this kind the reserved sins also had to be expressed; and since direct absolution from these would afterward have to be sought from one having the power for it, it followed, in their opinion, that the penitent would have to confess the same sins twice. They judged this burden of confessing the same sins twice so grave that for this reason they thought he should be excused from confession unless someone was present who could also absolve from the reserved sins. See Suarez, On the Sacraments, disp. 66, sect. 4.

But this reason also is destitute of all force; and therefore it was said that scarcely any merely extrinsic probability had belonged to the aforesaid thesis. And this indeed can be shown without any difficulty. For someone would be excused in the case from premising confession insofar as he would necessarily have to undergo that grave burden of confessing the same sins twice. But it is false that so grave a burden must then be undergone; for according to the common opinion it is far more probable (see the following question) that in that confession there is no obligation to express also the reserved sins over which the confessor has no power. Therefore it could at one time have seemed that a shadowy probability inhered in that thesis; but since it lacks a solid foundation, in fact it has no probability.

 The VV. object (p. 940, note 4) that in this Note the reasons of diverse Authors are refuted, but the foundation of this opinion which St. Alphonsus thus expounds is passed over: The reason is that that confession made to an inferior would be invalid, since it would be made to an incompetent judge. And the VV. continue: What wonder if he seems an incompetent judge to whom the right of knowing the whole cause is denied, that is, all the sins committed, especially the graver ones, and the disposition and true state of the penitent? FOR THIS REASON, the holy Doctor, although he embraces the opposite opinion as more probable, nevertheless rightly called this opinion also probable with Suarez and others.

Reply 1. I deny that Suarez called that opinion simply probable; his words are (On the Eucharist, disp. 66, sect. 4, section Fourth): It does not seem improbable. But then I deny what the VV. insinuate by that phrase FOR THIS REASON, as though Suarez either deferred anything to that reason which St. Alphonsus employs or even mentioned it. This is altogether false; for Suarez said that opinion did not seem improbable because otherwise the penitent is obliged to confess the same mortal sin twice, which is a grave burden. It was already said in the Note that this reason is not efficacious, and Suarez admits it, nor do the VV. deny it.

Reply 2. As regards the argument of St. Alphonsus, the VV., as I think, would better have consulted the honor and reverence due to the holy Doctor if they had omitted disputing both the argument and the question itself.

First, indeed, it is most true that this opinion is called probable by St. Alphonsus. For he writes (book 6, no. 265, q. 1): And Suarez rightly calls this probable; which, however, as we have seen, is not altogether true of Suarez. But, passing over this, the holy Doctor himself elsewhere (book 6, no. 585, doubt 2) judges a little differently and merely says thus that it is not improbable: Although the negative opinion is not improbable. But behold, afterward he again judges differently, when he writes (book 6, no. 596, q. 1): Antoine denies it, and speaking in itself his opinion is sufficiently probable. Nevertheless, to omit for now that it is not true that Antoine denies it, because in the place which St. Alphonsus alleges (On Penance, appendix 4, chapter 3, art. 2, q. 5), Antoine, reporting two opinions, finally retains the affirmative at the end; to omit this, I say, St. Alphonsus lastly concludes thus in this place: And since this opinion (namely, the affirmative) is common (but he had called it most common in no. 265, q. 1), as Antoine himself admits, and very probable, indeed CERTAINLY MORE PROBABLE, as we said, it can well be reduced to practice; for it is morally certain that with a probable opinion the Church supplies jurisdiction. Therefore St. Alphonsus finally calls the affirmative certainly more probable. But, as is most well known, when the holy Doctor calls an opinion certainly more probable, he himself testifies that he does not hold the opposite as probable, but only as slightly or doubtfully probable. How, then, did he elsewhere call this same opinion sufficiently probable and say that Suarez rightly called it probable? Moreover, why is discussion of the Church supplying jurisdiction introduced here? For under the hypothesis the priest has jurisdiction over the non-reserved sins; therefore it is not necessary that this be supplied by the Church. But over the reserved sins the Church supplies no jurisdiction, and therefore the penitent must afterward present himself to the Superior to be absolved by him. Therefore the reverence due to the holy Doctor required that the VV. not at all raise a question about these things.

But this is not yet the end. The holy Doctor (book 6, no. 596, q. 1) asks, Whether, if the penitent confesses it (namely, the reserved sin) when necessity urges, a simple confessor validly and licitly ABSOLVES him. And he replies: Antoine denies it (which has already been said not to be true), and speaking in itself his opinion is sufficiently probable; for, as we said in no. 265, q. 1, it is probable with Vasquez, Tournely, Armilla, Gerson, Trullench, etc., that a simple confessor lacks all jurisdiction over one having reserved sins, since he is not his competent judge; therefore he cannot absolve him even from the non-reserved sins. But these things are far from the truth, because of these Vasquez alone taught that anomalous opinion, namely, that a simple confessor lacks all jurisdiction over one having reserved sins, etc., and attempted to defend it more diffusely (q. 91, art. 3, doubt 9, from no. 10), and for it he also brought forward that absurd reason which we indicated in the Note.

The cause of this error in the holy Doctor, which we shall call material, seems to have been that he had indeed alleged these Authors in no. 265, q. 1, to which place he refers, but the question was not proposed thus there. For the question (no. 265, q. 1) is proposed thus: It is asked, 1. whether one who has a reserved sin and does not have access to a confessor having the faculty is bound to confess to an inferior confessor. It is manifest, moreover, that this question differs greatly from the preceding one. Nevertheless, while discussing a penitent who simultaneously has reserved and non-reserved mortal sins, he again replies thus: The first opinion denies that he is bound to confession and says that he can communicate after only contrition has been premised. Thus Vasquez, q. 91, art. 3, doubt 9; Collet, vol. 5, p. 499, word Hence one who; likewise Gerson and Alexander of Hales according to Lugo loc. cit.; Sylvester and Richard according to Diana, part 3, tract 4, resolution 104; likewise Armilla, Praepositus, Trullench, etc., according to Viva, On the Eucharist, q. 4, art. 7, no. 6; and Suarez, disp. 66, sect. 4, section Fourth, Palaus, and Filliucius according to Viva loc. cit., rightly call this probable. But afterward he gives the same reason as above, thus: The reason is that that confession made to an inferior would be invalid, since it would be made to an incompetent judge who, because of the reserved sins with which the penitent is burdened, lacks all power over him; whence, just as absolution cannot be divided to remit one sin without another, so neither can confession. That the holy Doctor thought this reason was commonly adduced by all these Authors is manifestly apparent from his words which we described shortly before from book 6, no. 596. But those Authors by no means hold that anomalous opinion of Vasquez.

For, 1. for example, St. Alphonsus alleges Gerson and Alexander of Hales according to Lugo, loc. cit., that is, On the Eucharist, disp. 14, no. 87, at the end. But in that paragraph Lugo does not even name Gerson and Alexander of Hales. He indeed mentions them in no. 86, but for an altogether opposite doctrine. This last argument persuades me (he says) that that opinion is not improbable which teaches that in the aforesaid case the penitent is not obliged to tell the confessor the reserved sins from which the confessor himself cannot absolve him, but only those from which he can absolve him; for concerning these alone is he judge, and therefore these alone can he legitimately hear in his tribunal. Although some call this opinion improbable..., nevertheless not a few and not contemptible Theologians admit it to be true or probable; GERSON, ALEXANDER OF HALES, and Major say that it is probable. Indeed, and this will seem of greater moment, Vasquez attributes the same opinion to them (q. 91, art. 3, doubt 5, no. 3); so far, namely, were they from thinking the same as Vasquez.

2. He alleges Armilla, Praepositus, Trullench, etc., according to Viva, On the Eucharist, q. 4, art. 7, no. 6. But Viva, who also adds John Sanchez, alleges these by reference from Diana, part 2, tract 14, resolution 65. Now Diana adduces them, except Trullench, whom Viva had added on his own, as affirming that a priest, if scandal is present, can celebrate without previous confession because it seems a grave burden to confess the same sins twice. Therefore these also bring forward another reason and can by no means be invoked for the anomalous opinion of Vasquez. And say the same of Trullench, who, discussing the same priest, indeed concludes (On the Decalogue, book 1, chapter 3, doubt 4, no. 13): If he cannot judge that he has perfect contrition, let him confess and be absolved by the confessor directly from the non-reserved sins. These things are indeed diametrically opposed to the reason which St. Alphonsus borrowed from Vasquez.

3. He alleges Richard and Sylvester according to Diana. But in Diana (vol. 1, tract 5, resolution 132, no. 3), Richard, no otherwise than the Authors cited above, excuses from confession only because it is judged a grave burden to confess the same grave sins twice; while Sylvester (ibid., no. 4) is alleged by Diana as not rejecting the opinion which teaches that one bound by a reserved excommunication in a case of necessity can celebrate or receive the Eucharist after only contrition has been premised; where no trace at all of the opinion of Vasquez is discerned.

4. He alleges Suarez, Filliucius, and Palaus as judging that same reason probable. But we saw above that what did not seem improbable to Suarez was not the doctrine of Vasquez, but the opinion which excuses one from the burden of confession to be premised before the reception of the Eucharist lest one be compelled to confess the same sins twice. Nor does Filliucius have anything else, who gives the reason (tract 4, chapter 8, no. 213): Lest the penitent be bound to confess the same reserved sin to two persons. Nor does Palaus hold otherwise (tract 21, sole disp., point 12, no. 6), saying: But if you are burdened by other non-reserved mortal sins, although some judge, not improbably, that you are not obliged to confess because you would be obliged to submit the same reserved sins to the keys twice..., nevertheless I judge it more true that you are obliged to premise confession at least of those which are not reserved.

Therefore, of so many Authors alleged we have only Collet who followed the footsteps of Vasquez (On the Eucharist, part 1, chapter 6, art. 3, conclusion 4), who certainly is by no means fit to procure probability for any opinion. And indeed (On Penance, part 2, chapter 8, no. 570) he relies upon that absurd reason which we saw was also adduced by Vasquez in the Note: namely, that otherwise one having reserved sins could, in the same case of necessity, that is, of celebrating or receiving the Eucharist, confess even to one who is in no way approved.

And from these things it is now sufficiently evident that that great apparatus of so many allegations which we see in St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 265, q. 1) certainly could cause the thesis which he there proposes to be called not improbable; but it is of no benefit at all for adding force to the Vasquezian reason which he employs both here and again in book 6, no. 596, q. 1, in which latter place, moreover, the holy Doctor without cause attributes it to all those Authors.

Moreover, to refute that opinion of Vasquez to which the VV. seem to defer so much weight, namely, that one having simultaneously reserved and non-reserved sins is not only not bound to premise confession before receiving the Eucharist, but that his confession is necessarily altogether invalid if he confesses to a simple confessor, to show, I say, that this opinion is altogether empty, it is enough merely to have examined the arguments by which Vasquez or Collet attempted to confirm it.

One altogether inept argument, which we now saw transcribed by Collet, had already been indicated in the Note. Vasquez takes another argument from chapter Si celebret, De Clericis Excommunicatis, which he himself develops more diffusely where he treats Excommunication (doubt 4, no. 9). But to reveal the absurdity of this argument it ought to suffice that from that argument it would follow that all sacraments received by an excommunicated person, even Confirmation and Sacred Orders, indeed even matrimony, are invalid.

Vasquez draws a third argument from the Council of Trent because it is said (sess. 14, chapter 7) that outside the moment of death priests can do nothing in reserved cases; which argument you may also see transcribed by Collet (loc. cit., no. 571). But, says Lugo (On the Eucharist, disp. 14, no. 97), it is easily replied that they can do nothing directly, but nevertheless can indirectly, just as in the case in which a penitent, forgetful of a reserved sin, confesses the non-reserved sins and is indirectly absolved from the reserved sins according to the opinion of all. Therefore it cannot be understood of a power even to absolve indirectly. On this matter the same Lugo wisely observes that the Council of Trent carefully said they can do nothing in reserved cases, and not they can do nothing with respect to a person having reserved sins. But by an argument drawn from one who either forgets the reserved sin or knowingly omits it in confession for another just cause, Lugo refutes ad hominem the opinion of Vasquez, who who holds that in these cases confession is valid. That these sins, namely, the non-reserved, are simultaneous with reserved sins does not impede the validity of the aforesaid absolution, as is established in one who for a long time invincibly forgot a reserved sin and meanwhile often confessed other non-reserved sins to an ordinary confessor, by whom he is indeed validly absolved directly from those and indirectly from the reserved sin. Vasquez himself admits this, though he attempts in vain to give a reason for the difference between that case and ours, such that in the former absolution from the non-reserved sins is valid, but in ours it is not; Suarez rightly attacks this reason. For Vasquez seems without foundation to remove the power of absolving indirectly from a reserved sin when it is disclosed, although this could be done if it were kept silent. For what difference does its being expressed make, such that it therefore cannot be remitted? Or why can the absolution not be terminated directly at the non-reserved sins alone, just as if the reserved sin had not been stated? Thus Lugo (loc. cit., no. 86).

To add strength to the reason which St. Alphonsus took from Vasquez or Collet, the VV. added these things: And in fact what wonder if he seems an incompetent judge to whom the right of knowing the whole cause is denied, that is, all the sins committed, especially the graver ones, and the disposition and true state of the penitent?

Reply. This rejoinder does not prove what the reason of St. Alphonsus there has, namely, that the confession is invalid because the judge who does not have power also over the reserved sins is incompetent; but at most it could in some way prove that in the case not only the non-reserved but also the reserved sins must be disclosed in confession, if at any time this were altogether necessary for that end. Therefore this rejoinder concludes absolutely nothing for the opinion of Vasquez and the holy Doctor Alphonsus.

578. ◦ QUESTION 4. Is one having reserved and non-reserved sins bound in confession also to accuse himself of the reserved sins?

Reply. No, more probably. The reason is, says St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 265, Question II), both because otherwise he would be bound here to confess those reserved sins twice, first to the inferior and afterward to the Superior; and because, as was said above (loc. cit., Question I), there appears to be no obligation to confess those sins over which the confessor cannot be judge, since he has no jurisdiction over them. - Recall the things said in the preceding question, Reply 1 [8].

[8] Therefore, what St. Alphonsus writes concerning the same matter (book 7, no. 92), namely: But whether one having reserved sins and censures is bound to disclose them to a confessor not having power over them, in a case where the necessity of communicating or confessing urges and access to the Superior is not open? See the things said On the Eucharist, book 6, no. 265, Question II, where we said that he is bound. See the reason there, must plainly be understood of a case in which the penitent has only reserved sins or censures.

But that certain more recent authors make an exception from this norm if the penitent is a relapser into reserved sins or is in a proximate occasion (see St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 265, q. II, and no. 585, doubt 3) is less to the point: both because it seems absurd that a Confessor, led by an empty suspicion, should ask penitents whether perhaps they have reserved sins in which those circumstances are present; and because questions ought to be restricted to those matters in which the confessor is judge; and finally because suitable remedies will not be lacking when those reserved sins are disclosed to one having the faculty, to whom it pertains to know that whole cause.

QUESTION 5. Is one validly absolved who in good faith accuses himself of a reserved sin to a simple Confessor, or who without fault forgets it?

Reply. Yes, if he submits another non-reserved sin to the keys; the reason is that the Confessor does not lack power over non-reserved sins, although he cannot absolve directly from the reserved sins. - Thus commonly with St. Ligorius, no. 565.

579. ○ QUESTION 6. Can an inferior absolve a dying person from reserved cases when the Superior or another having the faculty is present?

Reply 1. Yes, if the cases are purely reserved. The reason is that at the moment of death there is no reservation.

Reply 2. Yes, even as regards sins reserved with censures. This is elicited from Trent, sess. 14, chapter 7: It has always been observed in the same Church of God that there is no reservation at the moment of death; and therefore all Priests can absolve any penitents from any sins and censures whatsoever [9].

[9] Yet it would be useful to employ a confessor who possesses power over the reserved cases, because thus the necessity of approaching the Superior after health has perhaps been restored is removed, if indeed there is question of those reserved cases which require this; concerning which see the note above at no. 576. This observation also has place in the following question.

QUESTION 7. Is permission of the Bishop required for absolving a dying person from papal cases if it can easily be sought?

Reply. No. For, as is established from the adduced words of the Council of Trent, at the moment of death there is no reservation. This avails for both notorious and occult cases. Therefore the permission of the Bishop would be altogether superfluous.

580. ○ QUESTION 8. Can the Superior absolve a penitent from reserved sins and remit him to an inferior for absolution from the non-reserved sins?

Reply. No. The reason is that, from proposition 59 condemned by Innocent XI, it is not lawful to divide confession because of the multitude of affairs or penitents. - Thus commonly against some. - See St. Ligorius, no. 595 [10].

[10] Proposition 59 condemned by Innocent XI stands thus: It is lawful to absolve those who have confessed only partially because of a great concourse of penitents, such as can occur, for example, on the day of some great feast or Indulgence. But this, as is evident, is less efficacious for solving the question proposed by the Author, since it is altogether different.

But many and grave Authors say, according to Lugo (On Penance, disp. 20, no. 75), that a Superior can sometimes absolve from the reserved sins alone and remit the penitent to an inferior for completing the confession, because, on account of the occupations of Prelates, he does not have leisure to hear the integral confessions of subjects. Thus Cajetan, St. Antoninus, Paludanus, Henry, Navarrus, and both Sotos, etc. But then he continues (no. 76): The contrary opinion teaches that, speaking in itself, this cannot be done, but that the Superior must either not absolve or hear the integral confession. Adrian, Sylvester, Victoria..., and the other more recent authors commonly hold this. This opinion is more true.

Why he added the phrase speaking in itself he gives the reason below (ibid., no. 78) thus: Nevertheless, we do not deny that a reasonable cause can be given for doing this sometimes and for absolving sacramentally from the reserved sins alone; for example, if the penitent should say that he needs the absolution of the Superior or his permission to confess to another, and that he would not wish to tell the species of the sin except in sacramental confession, because he does not wish to disclose the same sin to two persons; and, on the other hand, he could wait no longer because of an urgent necessity of communicating or something similar; and finally, the Superior should judge it necessary personally to hear the reserved sin because, on account of some circumstance, it would be very expedient: then a cause could be given for hearing and absolving in a divided confession; yet this case is most rare. He then adds (ibid., no. 79) how it could happen that even a privileged confessor ought for the same cause to absolve in a divided confession. But (he concludes) even this could happen only most rarely.

QUESTION 9. Is reservation removed through an invalid or sacrilegious confession?

Reply 1. It is probably removed through a confession invalid without fault. The reason is that reservation is principally ordained to this, that sins be referred to the Superior. - St. Ligorius, no. 598.

Reply 2. It is probably removed even through a sacrilegious confession, because there is the same reason as for the preceding case. - St. Ligorius, ibid., and others more commonly. Except: 1. if the penitent culpably conceals the reserved sin itself, because it is by no means presumed that the Superior in a sacrilegious confession of this kind wishes to remove the reservation of a sin deliberately not referred to him; 2. St. Alphonsus also excepts the case in which the confession is made invalid in a Jubilee, because the Pontiff does not give the faculty of absolving from reserved sins except that the faithful may gain the Jubilee, and consequently otherwise he is not judged to wish to concede it [11]. But others with Lugo hold otherwise, disp. 20, no. 113.

[11] This reason, which St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 537, q. II) took from La Croix (book 6, part 2, no. 1449), proves too much; for the consequence would be that reservation is not removed even in those who, after first confessing validly, afterward do not gain the Jubilee. Benedict XIV himself rejects this opinion of certain authors in his Constitution Inter praeteritos, section 86, in these words: Since absolution from censures in the case of which there is question was and is given, not indeed with reincidence, but absolutely, therefore in the same Constitution LIV we declared that he by no means remains bound by the censures from which he had been loosed, or deprived of the grace of the commutations (namely, of vows) and dispensations obtained.

Moreover, for enjoying the graces conceded in a Jubilee, Benedict XIV requires this one thing: that a sincere will of gaining the Jubilee be present. Thus the cited Constitution, section 86: It was said above that one who has the faculties which are conceded during the year of Jubilee can use them only with those penitents who have a sincere will of obtaining the Jubilee and who, with this intention of fulfilling the works enjoined for obtaining it, approach confession. Nor will you find anything more in section 62, to which St. Alphonsus appeals: If all the faculties which are granted (he says) are directed to the obtaining of the Jubilee and are, as it were, a preparation for it, it clearly follows thence that there is no place for their use except with one who is prepared to obtain the Jubilee and has a certain purpose of fulfilling the works enjoined for acquiring it. For this matter he also adduces these words of Suarez (On Religion, tract 6, chapter 16, no. 6): The grace is not conferred except in order to this end and by way of preparation for the effect of the Jubilee; therefore one who does not have the intention of fulfilling the works and obtaining the Jubilee cannot enjoy the faculty.

 To that which is noted here concerning the holy Doctor Alphonsus, the VV. rejoin (p. 576, note 2): The reply is easy. The holy Doctor does not require that the Jubilee actually be gained after all the conditions have been fulfilled, but only that the confession be a true preparation for gaining the Jubilee. Hence the consequence rather is that reservation is removed in those who first confessed validly, even if afterward they do not gain the Jubilee for another cause.

Reply. An easy reply is also at hand for these things, namely, I deny the whole. First, therefore, let those things which St. Alphonsus has (book 6, no. 598, at the end) be read. For among the cases in which he denies that reservation is removed this also is contained in express words: Likewise an invalid confession made in a Jubilee, whether culpably or inculpably, must be excepted; because there, since the Pontiff does not furnish the faculty of absolving reserved sins except for the end that the faithful gain the Jubilee, HE IS NOT JUDGED TO WISH TO REMOVE THE RESERVATION IF THEY DO NOT GAIN THE JUBILEE. But the reason which is here given why reservation is not removed if the confession is invalid even inculpably manifestly presents the more general principle, namely, that the Pontiff is not judged to wish to remove reservation if the penitents do not in fact gain the Jubilee. Therefore that reason proves too much, because it also comprehends those who, after first confessing validly, afterward do not gain the Jubilee.

The manner of speaking which Croix uses (book 6, part 2, no. 1449) falls upon the same rock. That he may gain the Jubilee, he says, and consequently that he may acquire the right of absolution from reserved sins, etc. These words clearly labor under equivocation. For according to the Pontifical Decrees, one who wishes to gain the Jubilee acquires the right to absolution from reserved sins, not one who in fact finally gains it.

The holy Doctor, say the VV., requires only that the confession be a true preparation for gaining the Jubilee.

Lugo replies here (On Penance, disp. 20, no. 113): It certainly seems probable to me that, whenever the defect is not in the integrity concerning the reserved sins themselves, reservation can be removed by virtue of that absolution if the penitent has the intention of gaining the Jubilee, of afterward confessing validly, and of placing all the other requisites. For just as a Confessor validly absolving by privilege and delegation removes the reservation of the sin, although the confession is invalid because of a defect even known to the penitent, provided it is not concerned with the integrity due in reserved sins, I do not see why by virtue of the Jubilee the confessor cannot also loose the bond of reservation of the sin in like circumstances, although he does not absolve from the sin itself because of the indisposition of the penitent. Lugo observes the same thing (loc. cit.) concerning absolution from reserved censures. I add (thus he), that even if the penitent notices the defect of the confession, he can nevertheless sometimes have the intention of gaining the Jubilee and of placing all the requisites; for example, if he has the intention of afterward confessing validly before the end of the week. And then he seems to be validly absolved from excommunication and reserved censures in that invalid confession, because absolution from censures is given before absolution from sins, and its validity does not depend upon the validity of the absolution.... Since, therefore, he has the intention of gaining the Jubilee, he now seems to be disposed for obtaining absolution from the censures, although he is not disposed for obtaining absolution from the sins.

But these things avail a fortiori when the penitent confesses in good faith and therefore the confession is inculpably invalid. On this matter the same Lugo says (loc. cit., no. 112): As regards censures, it does not appear why the absolution would not then be valid, since by virtue of the Jubilee someone can be absolved from excommunication even outside the sacrament; therefore indisposition for justification does not impede absolution from excommunication. But from this an argument can be made for the removal of reservation; because if he is validly absolved from excommunication, therefore at least the reservation of the sin having a reserved excommunication is removed according to the common opinion of Theologians. Then, if by virtue of the Jubilee the Confessor can validly remove the bond of excommunication from one who confesses invalidly, why will he not by the same virtue be able to loose the bond of reservation of the sin, notwithstanding the invalidity of the confession? And he had premised (loc. cit., no. 111): Just as a Religious who by privilege can absolve from reserved sins removes the reservation, although the absolution from sins is invalid because of the indisposition of the penitent.

And from these things it is indeed gathered that the reasons which St. Alphonsus brings forward to the contrary (book 6, no. 537, q. 2) do not impede. The reason, he says, is both that one's fraud ought not to benefit anyone, and that the faculties are conceded in confession so that through it the faithful may gain the Jubilee. For, first, no fraud in fact intervenes when the penitent has a true will of gaining the Jubilee, although here and now he is not disposed; just as, according to Lugo, if someone for this same reason should outside the sacrament seek and obtain absolution from a reserved excommunication, although here and now he is not disposed and therefore wishes to defer confession until the following month. Otherwise, there is no reason why the confessor should be unwilling to use the faculties, especially because, as St. Alphonsus says (book 6, no. 598, q. 4), the end of reservation is obtained even in a sacrilegious confession. The end of confession is one thing, says the holy Doctor, and the end of reservation another. The end of confession is that sin be remitted; but the principal and direct end of reservation is that those committing reserved sins of this kind be subjected to the judgment of the Superior. Therefore, when a subject refers his sin to the Superior and accepts the penance imposed upon him by the Superior, even if he confesses sacrilegiously, the end of reservation is already obtained, although the sin is not remitted. But that the sinner derives an advantage from such iniquity happens accidentally; for although by his interpretative will the Superior would be unwilling to remove the reservation if he recognized the sacrilege, nevertheless by his actual will he then already wishes to remove it.

Consequently, neither do those things have force which the VV. report from St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 537, q. 2), namely, that when the Pontiff concedes a faculty of absolving from reserved sins so that the faithful may gain the Jubilee, he is not presumed to concede it for those who cannot gain the Jubilee with that confession. Another will say otherwise: the Pontiff concedes that faculty so that all who have the will to gain the Jubilee may be able to obtain it. But they can gain the Jubilee even if they do not gain it by that confession but by another valid confession afterward, especially since the end of reservation, as St. Alphonsus proves, is already obtained even in the preceding invalid confession. And this can be confirmed from parity and by an argument ad hominem. For let us prescind from the occasion of the Jubilee. What generally is the end for which a Superior concedes the faculty of absolving from reserved sins? Certainly that a member of the faithful having reserved sins may be reconciled to God. Will the VV. therefore conclude that the Superior is not presumed to concede it for those who cannot by that confession, as culpably invalid, obtain reconciliation with God? But St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 598, q. 4) adheres to the opinion which affirms that reservation is removed by that invalid confession, and excellently refutes the reasons of the opposite opinion.

581. ○ QUESTION 10. Is reservation removed if the penitent, while confessing to the Superior, forgets the reserved cases?

Reply. Yes, at least probably, because it is rightly presumed that the Superior wished to free the penitent from every bond from which he can absolve him. - Thus Lugo, the Salmanticenses, and others commonly, against others who also probably deny it. - St. Ligorius, no. 597, calls the first opinion most common and the other more probable [12].

[12] Although St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) called the opinion which denies that reservation is removed more probable, nevertheless he does not prohibit anyone from following the common, indeed, as he himself calls it, most common doctrine of Lugo, notwithstanding the objections of Suarez; but he merely adds a new exception to that doctrine thus: Nevertheless, I think it must altogether be said that reservation is not removed when a positive presumption is present that, if the Superior had heard the reserved sin, he would have deferred absolution. But it scarcely appears when this hypothesis can have place. For scarcely any other reason for deferring absolution can be present except that the penitent here and now is not disposed. Yet St. Alphonsus himself (ibid., no. 598, q. IV) proceeds so far as to concede that reservation is removed even when the penitent confesses sacrilegiously. Therefore no reason appears why in that case also the general foundation of this doctrine cannot avail, which Lugo (On Penance, disp. 20, no. 91) thus expounds: The whole difficulty ought not to concern possibility, but fact or will: whether in fact the Superior wishes directly to remove reservation for forgotten sins whenever he absolves a subject. And as regards this, we say that according to the common opinion that will is probably presumed in the Superior.

 In this place the VV. (pp. 572-573, in the Note), by instituting a comparison among the various editions, corrected the common text of the holy Doctor Alphonsus. For in all the editions after the sixth, of the year 1767, book 6, no. 597, it was read thus: I judge this second opinion more probable; and Sylvius, vol. 4, Suppl., q. 20, art. 2, near the end, holds this as true with Sylvester, Angelus, Adrian, Navarrus, Covarruvias, Bonacina, Sa, Coninck, and several others, with whom Pontas, case 25, agrees, and to whom the Continuator of Tournely, vol. 6, part 2, p. 131, adheres. Although the first also seems probable, both on account of the authority of the Doctors, who, as Concina himself admits, commonly teach it, and because it can probably be presumed that the Superior consents, etc.

But through the inadvertence of the printer, as the VV. relate, it happened that those nine Authors appeared to be alleged for the opinion denying, when St. Alphonsus, on the contrary, had added them for the affirmative. Therefore this passage ought to be read thus: I judge this second opinion more probable. Although the first also seems probable, both on account of the authority of the Doctors, who, as Concina himself admits, commonly teach it, and Sylvius holds this as true with Sylvester, Angelus, Adrian, Navarrus, Covarruvias, Bonacina, Sa, Coninck, and several others, with whom Pontas agrees and to whom the Continuator of Tournely adheres; and because it can probably be presumed that the Superior consents that the reservation be removed, etc.

Thence also that which the holy Doctor had premised in the same place must be corrected. For he had also alleged Sylvester and Angelus as patrons of the negative opinion, whom in the new addition he admits to stand for the affirmative. Indeed, Rosella and Gabriel must also be deleted there. St. Alphonsus cites them with the two aforesaid thus: Likewise Sylvester, Angelus, Rosella, and Gabriel according to Lugo. But Lugo (disp. 20, no. 85) adduces all of these not for the negative but for the affirmative opinion.

Moreover, in those twelve columns which the VV. (pp. 572-578) oppose to the present Note, they object to two things. The first is (p. 574) that it is asserted less correctly in the Note that scarcely any reason is given for deferring absolution besides the actual indisposition of the penitent. For, they say, the Bishop could defer absolution: 1. so that the scandal might first be repaired; 2. so that the penitent might first fulfill some part of satisfaction.

Reply. Absolution can also be deferred for other causes, for example, until the penitent repairs the damages inflicted, restores reputation, removes the occasion of sinning, etc. But these and other things of this kind in no way prevent the reservation from ceasing. The reason is that the sin omitted through forgetfulness must afterward be submitted to the keys. Yet even when reservation has been removed, the simple confessor to whom the confession is made will, according to his office, enjoin the things that must be enjoined and perform those things which the Superior would have performed, no otherwise than a privileged confessor to whom the penitent had confessed the reserved sins. Therefore the causes on account of which it may be presumed that the Superior does not remove the reservation are imaginary.

The other thing which the VV. reprehend is what is said in the Note, namely, that since St. Alphonsus concedes that reservation is removed even when the penitent confesses sacrilegiously, it must not be judged that reservation is not removed on account of the indisposition alone of the penitent, which could even be inculpable. The VV. rejoin (pp. 576-577): The reason is different, and the distinction between this and the other question is essential. For the penitent who inculpably forgets a reserved sin indeed confesses validly; but the Superior, to whose judgment the offense is not submitted, can neither apply medicine, nor admonish the penitent as is fitting, nor impose upon him a due and at the same time salutary penance.... But none of these requisites is lacking in the confession which the other performs, although invalidly.

Reply. It has already been said that in the case it belongs to the confessor, to whom the penitent afterwards confesses that sin, to take care of applying both the medicine and the admonitions, and also of imposing a due and salutary penance. Wherefore it is not true that the end of the reservation is thus not satisfied; nay rather, this is what generally happens when either the penitent, or the confessor for the penitent, seeks and obtains from the Superior a faculty for reserved cases in general.

QUESTION 11. Is one who confessed a doubtfully reserved sin to an inferior altogether freed from the reservation, even if he afterward recognizes it as certain?

Reply. Yes, more probably. The reason is that, since the doubtfully reserved sin was accused, it was already directly absolved, and consequently the reservation was directly removed [13]. - St. Ligorius, no. 600.

[13] Add that unless the reservation of the sin is certain, the sin is not considered to fall under the reservation at all. See what was said above, n. 572.

582. ○ QUESTION 12. Can a Bishop absolve visitors from episcopal censures [14] which they incurred in their own diocese?

[14] By episcopal censures the Author understands those which are proper to that diocese and at the same time reserved to the Bishop.

Reply 1. No, if there is question of censures ab homine by a particular sentence, as will be said in the Treatise on Censures.

Reply 2. If there is question of censures a jure, or even ab homine by a general sentence, it seems that the answer must be affirmative, while the present and common custom stands against which Ordinaries do not protest, although the older authors most commonly denied it. - Recall the things said above concerning a visitor to be absolved from cases reserved in his own diocese, no. 573, Question 5.

583. ○ QUESTION 13. Can visitors be absolved from a reserved sin if they sinned in their own diocese and went elsewhere to confess?

Reply. No, if they go elsewhere precisely in fraud of the reservation, as is established from the Bull Superna of Clement X. But Theologians do not agree how the phrase in fraud is to be understood. According to the more probable opinion, fraud of this kind intervenes when someone goes to an alien diocese for the principal end not only of confessing but also of avoiding the judgment of his proper Pastor. - St. Ligorius, no. 589, and others commonly. - Hence a visitor can be validly absolved if he went into an alien diocese for some honest end, for example, for conducting business, for gaining an indulgence, for confessing with less inconvenience or completing the confession more quickly, for finding an unknown or more prudent Confessor who might direct him better and take counsel for the tranquility of his conscience, or for other similar motives [15].

[15] Compare what was said above on these matters (n. 573, q. 3).

Appendix I. On Absolution of One's Own Accomplice in a Shameful Sin

584. ○ I. No confessor can absolve his own accomplice in a shameful sin; but one who presumes to absolve incurs ipso facto an excommunication reserved to the Pope. This is established from the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV, June 1, 1741, and likewise from another Constitution of the same Pontiff, Apostolici muneris, February 8, 1745.

II. A Confessor lacks all jurisdiction for absolving an accomplice with regard to the sin in which he was a participant. This is inferred from the express words of the Bull, in which it is said: Any authority and jurisdiction for absolving any person whatsoever from a fault of this kind being moreover taken away from him by the law itself.

585. Questions. - QUESTION 1. What is comprehended under the name of a shameful sin?

Reply. Every grave sin against the sixth precept of the Decalogue is comprehended, even if it is not consummated by intercourse; indeed, even if it is only a shameful touch. Some also add indecent conversation; but others contradict this, and this opinion, says Amort (On Penance, disp. 10), is more conformable to the words of Benedict XIV, On the Synod, book 7, chapter 14, no. 4, where he describes this crime.

It is required, however, that on each side there be a mortal sin not only internal but also in the character of an external act, and with formal complicity, that is, with mutual consent externally manifested. - St. Ligorius, no. 554, and others.

QUESTION 2. Under the name of accomplice are not only women but also men comprehended?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that the words of the Bull are altogether general; for in it is said: Whoever dares to hear the sacramental confession of a person who is an accomplice in a shameful sin against the sixth precept. Therefore the disposition of the Constitution is not to be restricted to the female sex. - Thus commonly. - Gousset, no. 488.

586. ○ QUESTION 3. Can a Priest absolve an accomplice at the moment or in danger of death?

Reply. Yes, validly and lawfully, if another Priest who can discharge the office of Confessor cannot be summoned; but if another Priest is present, even one not approved, who can hear the confession, he will indeed absolve validly but unlawfully, and he will not escape the penalties.

QUESTION 4. Can a Priest absolve an accomplice at death if another cannot be summoned or approach without infamy or scandal?

Reply. Yes, validly and lawfully. Yet the Priest who is the accomplice is bound, if he can, to forestall such dangers of infamy or scandal, for example, by departing under some pretext, etc. Otherwise he will not escape the penalties, although the absolution is valid. This is established from the Constitution of Benedict XIV. - St. Ligorius, no. 553.

QUESTION 5. Can a Priest absolve an accomplice at death if the latter refuses to confess to another?

Reply. It seems that the answer must be affirmative if the penitent is otherwise disposed, lest he perish, or at least lest his eternal salvation be endangered [1].

[1] There can be no controversy concerning the validity of the absolution if the penitent is rightly disposed; for Benedict XIV himself affirms that it is valid in the Constitution Apostolici muneris. Therefore the doubt can be only whether lawfully the Priest absolves lawfully. Now Benedict XIV, in the cited Constitution, condemns only one who, with no necessary cause compelling him, presumed to hear the sacramental confession of his accomplice and to bestow absolution from that crime upon him. But when a sick person near death refuses to confess to anyone else, not only does the eternal salvation of the sick person impose upon this Priest the necessity of hearing the confession, but a cause of scandal will also easily be present if he refuses to hear the confession of that sick person.

587. ○ QUESTION 6. Can a Priest absolve an accomplice from other sins extraneous to himself after the accomplice has once been rightly absolved by another?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that he lacks jurisdiction over this penitent only with regard to the sin in which he himself was a participant; therefore, once that sin has been blotted out through absolution imparted by another, the prohibition now ceases and jurisdiction is not lacking [2]. - St. Ligorius, no. 555, and others commonly.

[2] They relate that Benedict XIV, once asked by the Bishop of Brugnato whether a priest could absolve an accomplice after the latter had already been absolved by another confessor, replied that the accomplice could not be absolved by the priest who was his accomplice even if he had been absolved a hundred times by others. Nevertheless, this response in no way conflicts with the doctrine of the Author. For the Pontiff took away from the priest the jurisdiction by which he might absolve his accomplice from the crime in which he himself was an accomplice. And since this priest no longer has any jurisdiction over that crime, while that crime can be matter of absolution even after it has been remitted in another confession, it must certainly be said that the priest who was the accomplice cannot absolve the accomplice from that crime even if he has already been absolved by another; for with regard to that crime he perpetually lacks jurisdiction. But the Author is not speaking of absolving the accomplice from that crime, but of absolving him from other sins after that crime has been rightly expiated by confession made to another priest.

What, then, you will ask, is the Confessor to do if the penitent accuses himself of that sin, although remitted? I reply: If he accuses himself of this alone, the matter returns to the same as if someone confessed only a reserved sin to one not having the faculty over reserved sins; concerning which it was said above (section 575, Reply 2, no. 2) that he cannot be absolved, because thus no suitable matter of the sacrament is present. But if he also confesses other sins, it will be the same as if someone brought forward reserved and non-reserved sins together, namely, when matter partly suitable and partly unsuitable is proposed; but then the penitent can certainly be absolved, as was said in the cited section 575; yet the absolution, both from the nature of the matter and from the mind of the one absolving, falls only upon the suitable matter. Moreover, the present case differs from that preceding case in this: that for absolving one who with other sins also brings forward reserved sins, a cause excusing from the integrity of confession is required, as is noted in the same place; but in the present case no cause of this kind is required, because there is no need for that already remitted sin to be submitted again to the keys, and therefore its accusation occurs as something merely extraneous to the confession.

But if any shame remains in a Priest who through pitiable frailty committed a shameful sin with another, if any honor due to the Sacrament remains, he will never afterward hear the confession of his accomplice. Moreover, danger of a new lapse, or at least of grave temptation, can easily be present in the direction of such a penitent. - Gousset, ibid. - Therefore the faithful are to be warned, insofar as this can be done, never afterward to approach as Confessor the accomplice in their sin, except in a case of necessity.

In certain dioceses it had been provided by particular law that a Priest could never hear the confession of an accomplice, at least when intercourse had been consummated. Yet the Sacred Congregation of the Council more than once disapproved this; and when the Decrees of the Synod of Cosenza were proposed, although the defenders of this Decree brought forward many things in its defense and denied that danger of scandal was present, which others warned would easily arise from such a decree especially in small places, the Sacred Congregation of the Council replied on December 2, 1679: Let such a Decree be deleted [3]. - Analecta Juris Pontificii, p. 752.

[3] Thus the Sacred Congregation most wisely took care that zeal for restraining the faithful from evil, which sometimes spares no devices or efforts, should not exceed the limits of prudence; from which perhaps it may happen that the power given by Christ (2 Cor. 13:10) tends rather to destruction than to edification, while the difficulty of the remedy drives into the abyss of despair one whom it did not restrain from evil.

And here indeed a much more difficult question presents itself to us. For what is to be done if in some place a woman who has miserably fallen into a sin of this kind with a priest has no other priest there to whom she might sacramentally confess that sin, and the circumstances of the persons, place, etc., are such that she cannot turn elsewhere to seek a confessor, nor is there any hope, as can happen, for example, in mission territories, that another priest will ever come there? Shall we say that the mind of Pope Benedict XIV, when he promulgated those Constitutions, was that a most wretched woman in these circumstances ought to lack the sacraments of the Church throughout the course of her whole life, until in the final moments of life she can at last be absolved by the priest who was her accomplice in the sin, as the Constitution of Benedict XIV provides? Indeed, since death sometimes comes unexpectedly and with no illness as though announcing its arrival beforehand, shall we say that the same woman is constrained also by this dreadful necessity: that after that sin she must undergo the danger, prolonged perhaps for very many years, of departing from this life without sacramental absolution? But then what is she to do when the precept of annual confession and Communion urges? Will you say that she can, and indeed ought, perpetually to approach the sacred table after merely premising contrition? What if scandal of the people and infamy of the woman follow if it becomes public that she does not approach the sacrament of Penance for several years? Someone may perhaps suggest that in this necessity one can act with a penitent of this kind no otherwise than with one having a reserved sin, and thus, passing over the fault over which the priest has no jurisdiction, the remaining sins can be submitted to absolution; and in this way that fault also can be remitted indirectly. But where and when will that fault finally be submitted to the keys of the Church? It must therefore be admitted that most grave difficulties occur, whichever way one may finally turn; nor, it seems, will anyone easily proceed to define anything in so grave a matter by relying upon his own judgment alone.

Yet there are two things which seem sufficiently clear. One is that Benedict XIV, when he took away from a Confessor who was an accomplice in the crime jurisdiction for absolving his accomplice from the same crime, indeed wished to remove the occasion of a most grave scandal, but by no means to close to the penitent the way of reconciliation instituted by Christ the Lord and imposed upon all the faithful; indeed, for this reason he rendered the Confessor who was an accomplice in the crime incapable of the ministry of this reconciliation, so that it might be obtained more fittingly and certainly through the ministry of another priest. He therefore supposed that which generally occurs, and occurred much more in that age, namely, that other priests were not lacking from whom the penitent might obtain, according to the law established by Christ, remission of his sin through confession and sacramental absolution which he sought. Therefore he perhaps will not have strayed very far from the truth who thinks that in the present hypothesis, as altogether extraordinary, a determination is sought in vain in those Constitutions.

The other is that the mind and practice of the Church have never been such that, whenever she restricts or removes jurisdiction for remitting certain sins and reserves their absolution to certain persons, she wished thereby to commit it that, with the law of Christ concerning seeking and obtaining pardon of sins through the sacrament of Penance set aside, the faithful should obtain the grace of justification only through contrition or even only through indirect remission of crimes. For however these means may seem, and in fact may be, sufficient for the grace of reconciliation with God and therefore for obtaining eternal salvation, nevertheless the Church, insofar as it lies in her, does not permit the economy established by Christ to be neglected. Hence that declaration of the Council of Trent (sess. 14, chapter 7): It has always been observed in the Church of God that there is no reservation at the moment of death; and therefore all priests can absolve any penitents from any sins and censures whatsoever. Nor indeed must it be judged that this was provided by the Church only for the moment or danger of death. For according to the sense of the same Church, which most manifestly reveals itself to us in the sacred Canons and the unanimous opinion of the Catholic schools, whenever it happens that someone, on account of a legitimate impediment, cannot have recourse for the benefit of absolution to him by whom otherwise he was by law to be absolved, he can be absolved by another (chapter Eos qui, 22, De Sent. Excomm., in VI). We find the same established in chapter Ea noscitur, 13, De Sent. Excomm., and chapter Quamvis, 58, same title. Moreover, according to the doctrine of the Catholic schools (see above, no. 575), this obtains when the impediment to approaching one who possesses the faculty of absolving persists for a long time, which is computed from six months. Indeed, what of the fact that the Church does not forbid Catholics dwelling in a region of schismatics, if perhaps they feel themselves burdened with sins and do not judge that sufficient provision is made for the peace of conscience through contrition, to seek sacramental absolution from a schismatic priest when a Catholic priest is lacking? Therefore it is most alien to the mind and custom of the Church so to restrict or bind the jurisdiction necessary for administering the sacrament of Penance that it remains restricted or bound even when, for a long time and much more throughout the whole course of life, no access is open to the sinner to those who do not have it bound or restricted.

Nevertheless, it must not be denied that a distinction of no slight moment intervenes between the present question and the general question concerning reserved sins. For although the condition of each case may seem equal when only the lack of another confessor is considered in the necessity of confessing, nevertheless the character of the inconvenience which in the present case can be feared from confession to such a priest is different. To this difficulty perhaps this one thing can be replied: that fear of an inconvenience which can be called voluntary, because it lies in our will freely to admit or remove it, neither can nor ought to bring it about that those things which seem necessary are omitted. Hence Benedict XIV himself did not fear an inconvenience of this kind so far as to think that a Confessor who was an accomplice should be prevented from hearing the confession of his accomplice even when necessity urged. For it belongs to the Church as a pious mother not to fail her children in necessities and therefore not to withdraw the necessary aid of the Sacrament in these circumstances, lest, if anyone perish, his destruction be attributed rather to the negligence or severity of the mother than to the obstinacy of the children.

But it also happens from other causes that sacramental confession inspires in either the priest, because of certain conditions of a penitent, or the penitent, because of conditions of the priest, a fear of some inconvenience which is not empty. Yet who would therefore say that either the priest is to be deterred from furnishing the ministry or the penitent from making confession where reception of the sacrament appears necessary? Namely, when necessity demands the use of the sacrament, the necessary aid must by no means be denied on the one side, nor neglected on the other. If anyone abuses this aid, the fault of the ruin will fall entirely upon the malice of him who was unwilling to use a good well.

588. ○ QUESTION 7. Can a Bishop absolve from the excommunication imposed upon a Confessor who absolved his own accomplice, if the case is occult, by the concession of Trent, chapter 6, Liceat, sess. 24?

Reply. St. Ligorius, no. 556, replies thus. On the one hand it seems that the answer must be no; for if the Bishop or another delegated by him could absolve this case when it is occult, the reservation of the Pontiff would become useless and illusory, for this case can occur only occultly....

Nevertheless, it seems that it can probably be said that, even while preserving the faculty imparted to Bishops by the Council for absolving this case when it is occult, the reservation of the Pontiff would not become altogether useless and illusory: both because, although the case is ordinarily occult, nevertheless it can sometimes happen that it is public; and because the law of reservation would have place at least in Rome and in other places where Trent has not been received and where Bishops cannot use the aforesaid faculty....

Thus indeed St. Alphonsus according to the laws then in force. But now, since the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis of Our Most Holy Lord Pope Pius IX, in confirming the faculty attributed to Bishops by the Council of Trent, excepted censures reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See, and since among these, no. 10, is enumerated the excommunication upon those absolving an accomplice in a shameful sin according to the Constitutions of Benedict XIV, it is evident that this controversy no longer has place.

589. ○ QUESTION 8. Does a Priest incur excommunication who indeed hears the confession of an accomplice but does not absolve him?

Reply. It seems that the answer must be no with St. Ligorius, no. 556 [4]. - Ituriaga, vol. V, case 50. - The reason is that this is sufficiently clear from the Constitution Inter praeteritos of Benedict XIV, where it is thus said: No less was the penalty of excommunication imposed by us in the cited Constitutions upon a Priest who is an accomplice, who either outside the moment of death hears the confession of the penitent and absolves him, or who absolves him at the moment of death when another Priest is not lacking.... Therefore, according to the mind of the Pontiff, confession does not suffice, but absolution is also required.

[4]  Thus the holy Doctor says on this matter (book 6, no. 556): The question is raised whether a priest who does not absolve an accomplice but only hears him in confession incurs this excommunication. Concerning this doubt I consulted the Sacred Penitentiary, which on July 9, 1751, replied absolutely: The aforesaid confessor is not held by excommunication through a fictitious absolution. And I had long adhered to this opinion; but afterward, when I had read through the Constitution Inter praeteritos of the same Pontiff Benedict XIV, cited several times, I found the opposite sufficiently declared in section 59.

Appendix II. On Solicitation in Confession

It is indeed to be lamented, and this can never be lamented enough, that at times ravening wolves are found in the fold of Christ; that those appointed as watchmen of the house of Israel themselves cruelly devastate it; that those placed over the salvation of souls cruelly thrust those same souls into destruction. For who, seeing so great an abomination standing in the holy place, will not be seized with horror? Who will restrain himself from grief and not strive according to his strength to remove it from the midst? That they might bring efficacious remedies to so great an evil, the Supreme Pontiffs at various times enacted severe laws against such perverse ministers of God. Hence:

590. Matters to Be Established. - I. By the common law of the Church, Priests [1] soliciting to sin against the sixth precept of the Decalogue in confession [2], or on the occasion, pretext, or simulation of confession [3], immediately before or after confession, or in a place where confessions are heard, or chosen for confession, are to be denounced to ecclesiastical Superiors. This is established from the Bull Universi gregis of Gregory XV, issued in the year 1622, which was confirmed by the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV.

[1] A priest who lacks jurisdiction for validly absolving is also comprehended. Thus Benedict XIV expressly in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, section 2; and a Decree of the Holy Inquisition, February 4, 1661, no. V, had preceded. For when the question was raised, Whether a Priest lacking jurisdiction, if he solicits a penitent in confession, is to be denounced, the reply was that he is to be denounced and that the negative opinion is not probable.

 Yet an interpreter is not comprehended. St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 690), after saying that the most common opinion against a few is that there is no obligation of denouncing an interpreter, nevertheless continues that the interpreter is to be denounced on account of an edict of the Holy Office which commands that all who abuse the sacrament of Penance for indecent ends and for soliciting penitents are to be denounced. But what the opinion of the Holy Office is appears from the sixth among the Decrees of February 4, 1661, which were unknown to the holy Doctor. For this decree stands thus: Whether an interpreter, if he solicits a penitent in confession, is to be denounced. They judged that the negative opinion does not lack probability. And indeed, as Giraldi observes (Exposition of Pontifical Law, part 1, book 5, title 7, p. 637), probability is understood here not in any manner and slight, but such that one can and ought safely to govern himself by it in practice. But the Edict reported by St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 680) says that it commands those things according to the Apostolic Decrees. Moreover, Decrees of this kind, as is evident, exclude an interpreter. Furthermore, if the holy Doctor himself (book 6, no. 288) concedes that by force of the Constitutions against solicitors a layman or cleric who, pretending to be a confessor, solicits is not to be denounced, a fortiori this can be said of an interpreter.

Likewise, by force of the Apostolic Constitutions there is no obligation of denouncing one who orders a confessor to solicit in confession. Thus the Resolution or Decree of the Holy Office under no. VII among those issued February 4, 1661, which stands thus: Whether one ordering a confessor to solicit in confession is to be denounced. They judged that the negative opinion does not lack probability.

As regards a layman or cleric not yet a priest who, while hearing confession, solicits a penitent, St. Alphonsus rightly observes (book 6, no. 688) that, although they are not to be denounced by force of the Constitutions against solicitors, they are nevertheless to be denounced from another Constitution of Gregory XIII, which the Salmanticenses (tract 21, chapter 4, point 3, no. 27) indicate. And against the opinion of some who denied that these are to be denounced if they had not also imparted absolution, the same holy Doctor reports the words of an Edict of the Holy Inquisition by which it is enjoined that they are to be denounced although they had neither solicited the penitent nor proceeded to the act of absolving.

The question is usually added here whether soliciting Bishops are to be denounced. Some indeed deny it, because a Bishop even in the crime of formal heresy is not by law subject to Inquisitors; but solicitors are commanded to be denounced as suspected of heresy, as is evident from the letters of Pius IV. Moreover, in the Council of Trent (sess. 24, chapter 5) it is established that the graver and criminal causes, even of heresy, are known and terminated only by the Roman Pontiff; but the causes of Bishops are judged to be major causes. Others, however, whose opinion St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 685) calls better, affirm it, saying that the denunciation is to be made to the Roman Pontiff if this can conveniently be done; otherwise it is to be made to the Inquisitors, who, although they cannot punish or form a process as regards Bishops, can nevertheless receive information to be afterward transmitted to the Roman Pontiff, as is gathered from the Extravagant Cum Matthaeus, De haereticis, where it is prescribed that proceedings be conducted thus against Nuncios and Officials immediately subject to the Apostolic See. Yet someone will reply that no firm argument is drawn from chapter Cum Matthaeus: both because those Officials can be denounced by force of the clause of Gregory XV, fortified by whatever privilege and preeminence, which clause must be judged a restriction of their immunity; and because the causes of these Officials are not judged among the major causes which by common law are reserved to the Roman Pontiff, wherefore the parity does not hold; and finally because, when there is question of imposing penalties, arguments from parity by no means avail. On the other hand, in the Constitution of Benedict XIV a denunciation is commanded which is to be made to the competent judge; but Inquisitors, as regards Bishops, are not competent. Indeed, a denunciation is there commanded to be made to the Ordinaries and Inquisitors of priests, namely, of whatever dignity and preeminence they may be. Therefore only those inferior to Bishops are understood, because Bishops are not to be denounced to Ordinaries and Inquisitors. Moreover, solicitors are said to be denounced so that Inquisitors and Ordinaries may proceed against them. But these can do nothing against Bishops. Therefore, since there is question of positive law and nothing in it is said either concerning denouncing Bishops or concerning denunciations to be made to the Roman Pontiff, it does not appear why that obligation should be imposed when no law commands it. Nevertheless, a denunciation made to Inquisitors will be lawful; but it is one thing for something to be done lawfully and another for it to be commanded by Pontifical Constitutions against solicitors.

[2] In the Apostolic Constitutions there is discussion only of abuse of the Sacrament of Penance. Hence from the common opinion of the Doctors (see St. Alphonsus, book 6, no. 684) it is concluded that there is no obligation of denouncing a priest who, for soliciting, abuses the administration of other sacraments. This is confirmed from the cited Decree of the Holy Inquisition, no. X; for to the question, Whether a Confessor incurs the penalties of the Apostolic Constitution against solicitors if he solicits a woman in other sacraments, namely, baptism and matrimony, and whether he is to be denounced, and if he is to be denounced, whether he can be punished by the Inquisitors, it was replied, as regards each article, that the negative opinion is probable.

[3] St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 678) writes thus concerning these clauses: It is said on the occasion of confession when the confessor or penitent invites to a true confession; but under pretext when to a fictitious confession. These two, however, differ from the simulation of confession insofar as occasion and pretext seem to indicate the cause on account of which it happens that the confessor and penitent meet and converse together; but simulation seems to be referred to the external appearance which the manner of conversing or speaking together presents. It is also added in the Constitution Sacramentum, section 1: in the confessional, or in another place destined for hearing confessions, or chosen with the simulation of hearing confession there; for outside places of this kind, among which the chamber of a person truly or fictitiously sick must also be numbered,

 As regards the pretext of confession, St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 679) rightly says that it must be denied that a confessor is to be denounced who, under the pretext of hearing a confession, obtains permission from the Superior to go to a certain house where he solicits or, according to an arrangement already made, perpetrates the evil. He adduces the reason that the pretext of confession is then not in relation to the penitent but in relation to the Superior. This reason indeed avails as regards the latter part, for in the case the pretext of hearing a confession is the means by which he withdraws himself from the Superior, not that by which he conceals the act of solicitation; but it does not avail thus as regards the first part, for it is not necessary that the pretext of confession be referred to deceiving or entrapping the penitent. Therefore St. Alphonsus himself (book 6, no. 679) says that the Confessor is to be denounced if he should solicit outside confession and the woman should refuse, fearing defamation, and therefore the confessor should persuade her to pretend to be sick and summon him for sinning: because then the confessor is directly soliciting the woman to furnish consent under the pretext of confession.

St. Alphonsus then (loc. cit.), against several, thinks with Roncaglia that more probably a confessor is not to be denounced who agrees with a woman that, to elude the household, she should pretend to be sick and summon him to the house to perpetrate the sin. The reason, he says, is that it is then not verified that the confessor solicits under the pretext of confession, but only that under the pretext of confession he executes the sin. But, first, it does not appear in what this case differs from the preceding one; for if this is arranged to elude the household, the pretext of confession now serves for soliciting. Moreover, even if the priest were not to be denounced by force of this clause, he would nevertheless be to be denounced on account of the simulation of confession which he would abuse to keep away the household and for the present provocation and execution of the sin. For provocation and simulation of confession are not absent merely because each had previously agreed upon this. Otherwise a priest who by agreement held shameful conversations with a penitent in a place destined for confessions would not be to be denounced; for as regards the sick, the place of confession is indeed the chamber of a person truly or fictitiously sick. Hence the Salmanticenses (tract 21, chapter 4, point 4, no. 55), concerning the preceding case, namely, of the priest who under the pretext of hearing a confession obtains permission from the Prelate to go out, etc., thus limit the resolution of St. Alphonsus: But the things said are true provided these things are not done under the appearance of confession to deceive the household, because then simulation of confession suffices for incurring the penalties of the aforesaid Constitution.

St. Alphonsus adds (loc. cit.) that it seems much less to him that the confessor is to be denounced if a woman, with no agreement premised, summons and solicits him under the pretext of confession, although they afterward have intercourse; because according to the Bull the confessor is then to be denounced when he himself solicits under the pretext of confession, but in this case not the confessor but the penitent solicits the confessor under the pretext of confession. But this resolution also seems too difficult. For although the confessor is not to be denounced because he himself uses a pretext of confession devised by himself for ensnaring the penitent, nevertheless, while he believes that he is approaching to hear confession, he abuses the pretext of confession for consenting to the provocation and thus for an indecent transaction, and he performs this by simulating confession. For do we not here have an indecent transaction with simulation of confession in a place chosen for confession, although outside the occasion of confession, as is read in the Apostolic Constitutions?

the simulation of confession can scarcely, or not even scarcely, be had. For Gregory XV says thus: We command all Ordinaries of places diligently to inquire and proceed against all Priests, both secular and regular, who in any manner whatsoever shall have attempted to solicit or provoke persons, whoever they may be, to indecent acts among themselves or with others, in the act of sacramental confession, or immediately before or after it [4], or on the occasion or pretext of confession, even when confession did not follow, or outside the occasion of confession, in the confessional or in any place where confessions are heard or chosen for hearing confession, simulating that they hear confessions there; or who shall have held indecent conversations or dealings with them; commanding all Confessors to admonish their penitents whom they know to have been solicited by others as above concerning the obligation of denouncing the solicitors to the Ordinaries of places. - See St. Ligorius, no. 675.

[4] According to the practice of the tribunal of the Holy Office, a Confessor is not judged to have solicited immediately after confession if the solicitation occurs after a whole day has elapsed, provided he in no way indicated his depraved intention in confession. See Giraldi (loc. cit., p. 637). Yet this does not prevent a confessor of this kind perhaps being denounced by force of another clause.

II. Solicited penitents cannot be absolved before they have satisfied the obligation of denouncing, or at least unless they promise that they will shortly satisfy their obligation. Thus Benedict XIV in the cited Constitution [5]. But not only those who have been solicited are bound to this denunciation, but also all others who know it certainly, unless they have learned it under the secrecy of counsel; and this avails even if they cannot juridically prove the crime [6]. - St. Ligorius, nos. 695, 699.

[5] The words of Benedict XIV are (section 2): Let Confessors furthermore take diligent care not to impart sacramental absolution to penitents whom they know already to have been solicited by others unless, first bringing the aforesaid denunciation into effect, they have indicated the delinquent to the competent judge, or at least pledge and promise that they will denounce him as soon as they can. Therefore certain authors, relying, as they think, upon the authority of Benedict XIV, wrongly contend that a penitent can never be absolved before the denunciation has been made; for the holy Pontiff most prudently uses a disjunctive precept. Hence you may say that the denunciation is indeed to be premised when absolution can conveniently be deferred and an occasion of denouncing will shortly be available; and this must be attended to all the more earnestly, the more difficult the penitent seems to be induced to it. But when the penitent can return to the same confessor either not at all or only after a long time, or a suitable occasion for denouncing is not at hand, for example, if there is question of a girl who is far distant from the Episcopal See and lives under the care of her parents in such a way that she is not free to approach the Bishop, while on the other hand she sincerely promises that she will satisfy her obligation, there is nothing to prevent the confessor from imparting absolution at once.

[6] This obligation is established not from the Constitutions either of Gregory XV or of Benedict XIV, but from an Edict of the Roman Inquisition which St. Alphonsus reports (book 6, no. 680). It is confirmed by the fourteenth of sixteen decrees of the Holy Inquisition which were issued on February 11, 1661, and were afterward confirmed by Benedict XIV with apostolic authority in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, and which can be seen both in Albitius (On Inconstancy in the Faith, chapter 35, no. 66), in Giraldi (Exposition of Pontifical Law, part 1, book 5, title VII), and in Scavini (On Penance, chapter 4, art. 4). For when the question was put, Whether anyone is bound to denounce a soliciting confessor if he heard this not from trustworthy persons, but only from frivolous persons, and the Sacred Congregation replied that the negative opinion does not lack probability; it plainly follows that the obligation is present if anyone has learned it from trustworthy and serious persons.

III. The denunciation must be made within a month. Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, March 10, 1677. - St. Ligorius, no. 693. But a penitent who, without sufficient reason, does not carry out the denunciation within the appointed time incurs a latae sententiae excommunication, reserved at Rome to the Pontiff, but outside the City not reserved after the denunciation has been made. From a Decree of the Sacred Penitentiary, March 22, 1852. - See Analecta Iuris Pontificii, series 2, col. 1606 [7]. In some places it is prescribed by particular law that any Priest soliciting to shameful acts be denounced, even though he is not a confessor or solicited without any relation to confession. But several Canonists, especially more recent ones, deny that a Bishop can enact a statute of this kind; because, since by Canon law a Priest cannot be condemned by the Bishop unless he has been convicted by legitimate witnesses and proofs, the Bishop can by no means punish an occult offense here, nor proceed against the accused, owing to the lack of every canonical and juridical proof. See Stremler, Treatise on Ecclesiastical Penalties, part I, chapter 4. - Craisson, Manual of Canon Law, nos. 3826, 3828, 3844. - Analecta Iuris Pontificii, vol. 4, p. 1866 ff., and others [8].

[7] The Analecta Iuris Pontificii (loc. cit.) neither contains nor intimates that Response of the Sacred Penitentiary, and perhaps the Author cites it because the following is read there: If she (the person solicited) refuses to fulfill this obligation, she incurs major excommunication, which, for Rome, is reserved to the Sovereign Pontiff. But in other countries, absolution from it can be received from any approved confessor, according to what the same author says; this indeed is also the practice admitted by the Author. Moreover, the author to whom the Analecta appeals is Albitius, whose passage is appended there (from chapter 35, On Inconstancy in the Faith, nos. 18-25). But Albitius in fact has nothing of the kind. For his words which pertain to this matter are as follows (nos. 20, 21): But if they refuse to denounce, they then fall into the excommunication proposed in the aforesaid Edicts, from which, if it is reserved to the Pontiff, or to the Bishop, or to the Inquisitor, they cannot be absolved except by him to whom it was reserved. But if it is not reserved, they can be absolved by any confessor.... This absolution is not usually imparted unless the denunciation has truly and actually been made, etc. Albitius, therefore, does not say that this excommunication is reserved at Rome to the Supreme Pontiff, but elsewhere is not reserved, so that any confessor can absolve from it; rather, he refers the matter to the various Edicts, so that it may be ascertained whether it is reserved or not.

Moreover, the Edicts of the Holy Office of the Inquisition concerning the denunciation of solicitors, as Laurentius Cozza reports them (Selected Doubts concerning Solicitation, final doubt), reserve absolution to the Holy Office even after the denunciation has been made; and the same Cozza rightly observes that the opinion which granted to any confessor the faculty of absolving the guilty person after denunciation (see St. Alphonsus, no. 693) arose originally from an equivocal sense conveyed by the words of a certain Edict as they were reported summarily by Lupus. Nevertheless, Giraldi also indicates that the discipline in this matter was afterward changed (loc. cit. in the preceding note, pp. 627-628), saying: One omitting to denounce a Confessor for solicitation within the said month, even if he afterward denounced him, formerly could not be absolved except by the said Roman Inquisition; today, however, by decrees of the same body from the years 1735 and 1758, he can be absolved by any Confessor. The Response of the Sacred Penitentiary which the Author cites accords with these Decrees of the Holy Inquisition. Nevertheless, the Author combines the enactment of the Sacred Penitentiary less skillfully with the practice which the Analecta intimates. For the decree of the Sacred Penitentiary, just like the decrees of the Holy Inquisition mentioned by Giraldi, neither reserves absolution before denunciation to the Pontiff only at Rome, nor establishes that the cessation of the reservation after the denunciation has been completed avails only outside the City.

 Moreover, the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis of the year 1869 removes every controversy concerning this matter; in it, Those who neglect or culpably omit to denounce within a month confessors or priests by whom they were solicited to shameful acts in any of the cases expressed by Our Predecessors

Gregory XV, Constitution Universi, August 20, 1622, and Benedict XIV, Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, June 1, 1741, are declared to incur a latae sententiae excommunication reserved to no one.

[8] Elsewhere it had been provided by a Bishop that a woman with whom a priest had sinned could not be absolved unless she denounced the priest himself. The Bishop had prescribed this manner of denunciation: the woman was to hand to the Confessor a sealed paper containing the name of the priest, and the Confessor, transmitting it to the Bishop, was to testify that he had no doubt that faith should be placed in the denunciant. But the Apostolic See judged that this law and practice too should be abolished.

591. Questions. - QUESTION 1. Is a penitent bound to make a denunciation if he himself consented to the solicitation?

Reply. Yes. The reason is that the law is general and does not appear in any way to except this case; for the crime of the solicitor and the danger to souls are not thereby diminished. Nor is it an objection that by natural law the penitent is not bound to accuse himself; for ordinarily he can certainly denounce the solicitor without admitting that he gave consent to the solicitation [9]. - St. Ligorius, no. 700.

[9] This is expressly provided in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, section 2, where it is established that the confessor is to be denounced even if.... the solicitation between the confessor and the penitent was mutual, or the penitent consented to the solicitation.

Moreover, the Sacred Congregation of the Inquisition, July 23, 1624 (in Giraldi, loc. cit. in the preceding note, p. 641), declared that a woman who consented to the soliciting priest is not bound in the denunciation to disclose the consent given by her; she is nevertheless bound to denounce even if she herself first solicited and drew the confessor to consent. St. Alphonsus reports another decree on the same matter (book 6, no. 700).

Furthermore, an Instruction was issued by the Holy Office of the Inquisition in the year 1756 in which, while it is declared that even a woman who consented is bound to denounce, it is nevertheless added that she is not bound to disclose her consent, nor is she to be questioned about it by the Ordinary or Inquisitor; likewise, a soliciting confessor, if proceedings are brought against him, is not to be questioned about the penitent's consent, and if perhaps he spontaneously says it, it is not to be written down or entered into the acts. It then also admonishes Confessors to instruct penitents concerning these things where necessary, so that every obstacle to making the denunciation may thus be removed (in Giraldi, loc. cit., p. 642).

QUESTION 2. Is a Confessor to be denounced who consented to a soliciting penitent, but did not himself solicit?

Reply. Yes [10]. For this is manifestly evident from the second among the Decrees of the Holy Office of February 11, 1661. For to the question, Whether a Confessor who consents to solicitation, but immediately ceases to speak about that shameful matter, deferring its completion to another time and not furnishing absolution to the penitent, incurs the penalties contained in the Bull of Gregory and is to be denounced, the reply was that he incurs them and that the Confessor is to be denounced, the probable opinion, which they judged not to be probable, being rejected. The same thing is plainly elicited from among those same Decrees, where, to the question, Whether a Confessor, if induced by fear he consents to one soliciting, is to be denounced, the reply was that he is to be denounced and that the negative opinion is not probable. A fortiori, therefore, a Confessor is to be denounced where there is no excuse whatsoever from fear inspired.

[10] This case is manifestly comprehended in those words of Gregory XV: Or shall have held illicit and indecent conversations or dealings with them; these occur likewise in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV. For the nature of a dealing is that two or more persons act or agree among themselves concerning some matter to be carried out; nor does it matter which of them first proposes the matter, provided that each acts at least concerning the accomplishment of the matter, even if perhaps both do not afterward agree upon the conditions. The Doctors therefore rightly conclude that these words comprehend a Confessor who did not solicit the penitent but merely consents to one soliciting; for in the truest sense an illicit and indecent dealing takes place, by which each consents to shamefulness.

 St. Alphonsus, on the question Whether a confessor who consents to a woman soliciting in confession is to be denounced (book 6, no. 681), judges that the opinion which denies it seems more probable; and setting aside the reason adduced by others, namely, that the words of Gregory XV are to be understood of shameful dealings of which the confessor is the author, he regards this reason as the stronger one: because by the same Bull of Gregory Confessors are commanded to admonish concerning the obligation of denunciation, not just any penitents who have held indecent dealings with confessors, but those whom they know to have been solicited by others, as above. Therefore it is inferred that the penitent, if he wished, could lawfully denounce the confessor in the said case according to the first probable opinion; but it seems more probable that the penitent is not bound to do this, because, in order that he himself contract the obligation of denouncing the confessor, it is required that he have been solicited by him. Moreover, as is evident, after the Decrees of the Holy Inquisition cited in the text, this opinion can be held neither speculatively nor practically, especially since decrees of this kind were solemnly confirmed by Benedict XIV in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae in these words: All and each of the aforesaid decrees (among which those issued February 11, 1661, are also expressly mentioned there) emanating for the interpretation and declaration of those [namely, the Letters of Gregory XV], by Apostolic authority and by the tenor of the present letters We approve and confirm, and to all and each of them We add the strength of inviolable Apostolic firmness. But, as we have already said, these Decrees were altogether unknown to the holy Doctor Alphonsus; for no one had made them public before Ubaldus Giraldi, who published his work (Exposition of Pontifical Law, etc.) at Rome in the year 1769; and the work of Giraldi does not seem ever to have come into the hands of the holy Doctor Alphonsus.

This ignorance of the Decrees, as is manifest, was more than sufficient to remove every reproach from the holy Doctor. Nevertheless, behold the VV., who dedicate fourteen columns to this argument (pp. 579-587) and seek other defenses from elsewhere! Let the impartial reader judge whether they can be approved.

First, therefore, they propose the question (p. 581), Whether, notwithstanding the two cited Decrees of the Holy Inquisition, the negative opinion of St. Alphonsus cannot be sustained. And as regards the first of the cited decrees, they do not hesitate to reply, which is surely a matter for astonishment (p. 582): With deference to a better judgment, we think that this Resolution of the Holy Inquisition does not prevent the negative opinion which the holy Doctor calls more probable from being sustained, namely, that a Confessor who consents to solicitation, but himself in no way solicits, is not to be denounced.

I have said that these things are plainly worthy of astonishment. For what is this? A Decree solemnly confirmed by a Pontifical Constitution enacts that a confessor who merely consents to solicitation is to be denounced, even if he is induced to it by fear, as the other Decree reported in the text has it; and nevertheless shall we dare to affirm that a confessor of this kind is not to be denounced if, not indeed impelled by fear, but of his own free will, he professes that he consents? Is perhaps the one who consents under the compulsion of fear more guilty than one who consents willingly and under no compelling fear?

The VV. reply (pp. 581-582) that in the first Decree there is no question simply of a Confessor consenting to solicitation, but several circumstances are added, namely, that the confessor immediately DISSENTS, not because he repents of having consented, but because he proposes to defer completion to another time lest he incur the appointed penalties.

Reply. 1. In the Decree of the Holy Inquisition, as we have seen, it does not read, "immediately dissents," but "immediately ceases to speak about that shameful matter." Therefore, everything which the VV. build upon this immediate dissent is empty. 2. Whether it is the immediate dissent which the VV. imagine, or the immediate breaking off, as the matter truly stands, of conversation about the shameful thing after consent, and the postponement to another time, these are not circumstances which increase, but rather those which diminish, the guilt of a shameful dealing on the occasion of confession. And in truth it would be most absurdly established that a confessor who, after assenting to the woman's solicitation, immediately ceases to speak about that shameful thing and puts off the completion of the shameful dealing to another time is to be denounced, but that he is not to be denounced if, continuing to speak about that shameful matter, he then completes the shameful dealing by agreeing upon the place, time, etc. 3. The substance of the guilt resides in the indecent dealing, which is completed through the confessor's consent, as is also evident from the cited ninth Decree. But this whole substance remains altogether whether those circumstances are present or are not present. Therefore, the obligation of denunciation is vainly referred not to the substance of the guilt but to those circumstances.

As regards the ninth Decree reported in the text, St. Alphonsus, ignorant of these decrees, as we have said, had written (book 6, no. 687, question 8): Whether a confessor is to be denounced who consents to a soliciting woman on account of fear inspired by her, that she will accuse him unless he consents? And he replied: But it can better be said that this confessor is not to be denounced, because then he would truly be the one solicited, not the one soliciting, according to what was said in no. 681. This resolution, as is evident of itself, is diametrically opposed to the Resolution of the Holy Office confirmed by Benedict XIV with Apostolic authority.

And in this response of the holy Doctor, the reason which he gives must also be noticed, namely, that the confessor is then the one solicited, not the one soliciting. For since he adds, according to what was said in no. 681, it is now evident that this is the same reason why the same holy Doctor had generally denied that a confessor who merely consents to a woman's solicitation is to be denounced. But this general principle is shown to be false by the Decrees of the Holy Inquisition, as we have said.

What here can scarcely be wondered at enough by anyone is that the VV. seem to defend that condemned resolution, adducing, namely, 1. the reason given for it by St. Alphonsus; 2. the support of Scavini, whom they say subscribes to the reason of St. Alphonsus; and, furthermore, 3. they contend that it is in some manner confirmed by the Instruction of the Holy Roman Inquisition of February 20, 1867. Let others judge how these things can seem tolerable to anyone.

As regards the first, St. Alphonsus (book 6, no. 681) gave this reason for his resolution: that it is rightly judged that the Pontiff was unwilling to oblige penitents to denounce confessors whom they themselves had tempted, because of the great difficulty which would deter penitents from denouncing in this case, in which the sin had its cause from them; and also because, if they denounced, their reputation would be placed in very great danger. But no one, I think, will dare to assert or suppose that a reason of this kind was unknown either to the Holy Inquisition or to the Roman Pontiff enacting the Decree. Shall we therefore say that St. Alphonsus judged better than the Apostolic See concerning the weight of this reason? Therefore, lest anyone act contumeliously against the Apostolic judgment, two things must be diligently observed. The first is that it pertains to the prudence of the Confessor to consider carefully and teach the penitent in what manner the denunciation can take place while preserving the reputation of the denunciant. The second is what St. Alphonsus himself (book 6, no. 695) teaches: that not only the solicited penitent, but also anyone else who has learned from another source that the solicitation was carried out, is bound to denounce. The holy Doctor confirms this also from an Edict of the Holy Inquisition which he reports in the preceding no. 680. And hence comes the response of the same Holy Inquisition contained in the fourteenth of the aforesaid Decrees. For to the question, Whether anyone is bound to denounce a soliciting confessor if he heard this not from trustworthy persons, but only from frivolous persons, the reply was that the negative opinion does not lack probability. Therefore, the reason adduced by St. Alphonsus is by no means adequate for establishing generally that a confessor who merely consents to solicitation is not to be denounced.

As regards Scavini, he in no way denies that a confessor of this kind is to be denounced; he merely observes that it can sometimes happen that it is difficult for the denunciation to be completed while preserving the penitent's reputation. Concerning this matter it has already been said that this business pertains to the prudence of the Confessor.

Finally, as regards the Instruction of the Holy Inquisition of the year 1867, the VV. think that it supports the condemned resolution under discussion because no mention is made in this Instruction of the ninth Decree, by which it is defined that a confessor who, impelled by fear, consents to a soliciting woman is to be denounced. - But do the VV. perhaps wish to insinuate by this that that Decree was abrogated? Indeed, if an argument of this kind were valid, then most of those sixteen Decrees would have to be said to have been abrogated, and among them even that first decree by which it is defined that a confessor who gives a penitent in confession a paper to be read afterward at home, in which he solicits her to venereal acts, is to be denounced; these things are plainly absurd. And in fact, in this Instruction scarcely a few things are mentioned concerning the cases in which a Confessor is certainly to be denounced.

