[4] Cited authentic document; Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 8, 1859 (Decreta authentica, n. 387, to II).

525 II. Attachment of indulgences.

1. The power of attaching indulgences to Crucifixes of the Way of the Cross belongs:

a) To Cardinals and Bishops, according as was said in n. 524 about the Way of the Cross itself (canon 239, § 1, 6°; canon 349, § 1, 1°).

b) To Superiors of the Order of Friars Minor; of these, the Minister General alone can delegate the faculty either to subjects or to outsiders.[1]

2. For attaching indulgences, the sign of the cross made with the intention of applying the indulgences suffices.[2] Several crucifixes can also be blessed in a group by a single sign of the cross;[3] likewise crucifixes to which other indulgences have already been attached[4] (n. 546).

[1] Rescript of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, cited, March 15, 1884.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, April 11, 1840 (Decreta authentica, n. 281, to V); January 7, 1843 (Decreta authentica, n. 313, to II and IV).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 11, 1855 (Decreta authentica, n. 363).

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 29, 1820 (Decreta authentica, n. 249, to III).

526 III. Attached indulgences and their acquisition.

1. To the Crucifix of the Way of the Cross are attached the same indulgences as to the Way of the Cross, that is, both the plenary indulgence attached to the Way of the Cross itself, and the plenary indulgence attached to the Way of the Cross by reason of Communion (n. 531).[1]

2. For acquiring the indulgences set forth, these things are required:

a) Of itself, there is required:

a) That someone be impeded by illness or another cause from visiting the stations of the Way of the Cross.[2] A moderately grave cause seems to suffice.

b) That the Crucifix be held in the hand during the recitation of the prayers, of which immediately.[3] If the prayers are recited in common, it suffices that one person hold the Crucifix in the hand, and that the others, other concerns having been set aside, compose themselves for reciting the prescribed prayers together with the person who holds the Crucifix.[4] It is said "other concerns having been set aside," that is, at least those external occupations which impede internal attention.[5]

c) That meanwhile twenty Our Fathers, Hail Marys, and Glory Bes be recited, with heart at least contrite and devoutly: namely, one for each station, five in memory of the holy Wounds of Christ, and one according to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff.[6]

d) That in the use of the crucifix there be meditation on the Lord's Passion, or at least a pious recollection of the same.[7]

Note. If someone, once the recitation has been begun, has been unable for a reasonable cause to recite all the prescribed Our Fathers, Hail Marys, and Glory Bes, instead of the plenary indulgence he obtains a partial indulgence of ten years and as many quarantines for each Our Father with Hail Mary and Glory Be recited.[8]

b) Incidentally, so to speak, these things hold:

a) If some sick person, without grave inconvenience or difficulty, cannot recite twenty Our Fathers, Hail Marys, and Glory Be prayers, he can gain the indulgences either by kissing, or even only by looking, with affection and a contrite mind, upon some Crucifix blessed for this purpose, shown to him either by a priest or by some other person, and by reciting some brief prayer or ejaculatory prayer in memory of the Passion and Death of Jesus Christ our Lord.[9]

b) If someone, by force of illness, is able only to kiss or only to look at the Crucifix blessed for this purpose, but not to add an ejaculatory prayer, he is not prevented from obtaining the plenary indulgences.[10]

[1] Sacred Penitentiary, October 20, 1931 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 522).

[2] Cited authentic document.

[3] Cited authentic document.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 19, 1884. The document is held in the archive of the General Curia of the Order of Friars Minor (Sleutjes, p. 67).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, November 13, 1893.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 8, 1859 (Decreta authentica, n. 387, to I).

[7] Sacred Penitentiary, December 14, 1917, to IV (A.A.S. 1917, p. 30).

[8] Sacred Penitentiary, October 20, 1931 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 522).

[9] Sacred Penitentiary, March 25, 1931 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 167).

[10] Sacred Penitentiary, October 20, 1931 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 522).

Section III. On the Papal or Apostolic Blessing

527 I. Notion. A papal blessing is a blessing granted by the Supreme Pontiff or in his name. It is a sacramental, to which a plenary indulgence is usually attached.

528 II. Granting of the blessing.

1. Who can grant it by common law, see n. 494.

2. In granting the blessing the prescribed formula is to be used (canon 914). Moreover: 1. Bishops and other secular Prelates are to use the rites and formula prescribed by Clement XIII, September 5, 1762, and inserted in the appendix of the Roman Pontifical. 2. Regular Prelates are to use the formula established by Benedict XIV through the Encyclical Exemptis praedecessorum, March 19, 1748, and reported in the Roman Ritual, title VIII, chapter 32. 3. Missionaries can grant it with the sign of the Cross alone and the formula: "May the blessing of Almighty God, Father, and Son, and Holy Spirit, descend upon you and remain always. R. Amen";[1] nevertheless it is permitted to use the formula of the Roman Ritual.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, May 11, 1911, to III.

529 III. Acquisition of the indulgence. Unless something else is expressly established, for acquiring the indulgence it suffices that one be: 1. present to the one blessing; 2. contrite in heart, or in the state of grace.[1]

[1] Cf. Fanfani, p. 74.

Section IV. On the Papal or Apostolic Blessing at the Point of Death

530 I. Notion. The blessing of which we speak is understood as a blessing granted by the Supreme Pontiff, or in his name, to one dying. To this likewise a plenary indulgence is attached, which obtains its effect at the moment at which the soul is separated from the body; and it is applicable only to the living.[1]

[1] Raccolta, I, p. XXII, 4 and 11, Avvertenze, 1°; cf. A.S.S. 32, p. 238.

531 II. Granting of the indulgence.

1. Who can grant it, see n. 494.

2. It is to be granted "to those sick persons who either asked for it while they were of sound mind and with their senses intact, or would probably have asked for it, or have given signs of contrition; it is to be imparted to them also if afterward they have been deprived of the use of the tongue and of the other senses, or have fallen into delirium or insanity. But it is altogether to be denied to the excommunicated, the impenitent, and those who die in manifest mortal sin."[1] Nor are children excluded, even if they have not yet received their first Communion, provided they are capable of sinning.[2] Likewise it can be granted to all those to whom death is imminent from an external cause, as to those condemned to death or to soldiers before battle.[3]

3. It can be granted as soon as one is in such danger that Viaticum can be administered to him; but the custom is, and it is founded in the Roman Ritual, of granting it after the Sacraments of Penance, Holy Eucharist, and Extreme Unction have been received.

4. It is to be granted with the formula prescribed by Benedict XIV through the Bull Pia Mater, April 5, 1747, and inserted in the Roman Ritual, title V, chapter 6, and indeed under pain of nullity both as regards the formula itself[4] and as regards the Latin language[5] to be used.

The practice of imparting the blessing to several sick persons at once can be tolerated, provided that the formula of blessing, "Our Lord Jesus Christ," down to the words "Holy Spirit, Amen," is pronounced individually over each one, even if all the rest has been recited in the plural.[6]

5. Since the indulgence is applied at the last moment of life, a blessing once granted in the same illness cannot be granted again;[7] and this holds even if it could be received under several titles,[8] or if someone received it in the state of grave sin or fell back into sin after receiving it.[9] Otherwise, if someone, having been delivered from grave danger, falls into it again.[10]

[1] Roman Ritual, title V, chapter 6, n. 1. Likewise the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 23, 1775 (Decreta authentica, n. 237, to V), responded that the blessing at the point of death with application of the plenary indulgence can, if there is danger in delay, be granted both validly and licitly to those who, even culpably, have not been refreshed from the beginning of the illness by the Sacraments of Penance, or Eucharist, or Extreme Unction, or by any of these, and suddenly are turning toward death.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, December 16, 1826 (Decreta authentica, n. 2650).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 18, 1885.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 5, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 286, to VIII); March 22, 1879; Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, May 7, 1882; Brief of Leo XIII, July 7, 1882 (Decreta authentica, n. 444, to III, pp. 411 and 491).

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, June 3, 1904 (A.S.S. XXXVIII, p. 340, to I).

[6] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 10, 1886.

[7] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 23, 1775, to 6 (Decreta authentica, n. 237, to VI); June 20, 1836 (Decreta authentica, n. 237, to VII); September 24, 1838 (Decreta authentica, n. 263, to II).

[8] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 12, 1885.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 20, 1836 (Decreta authentica, n. 257, to VII).

[10] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 10, 1886.

532 III. Acquisition of the indulgence. In order that the indulgence be acquired, the following are required for validity:

1. That the person constituted in danger be in the state of grace, at least at the last moment of life (n. 500).

2. That he invoke with his mouth, if he can, otherwise in his heart, the Most Holy Name of Jesus.[1]

3. That he receive the pains of sickness and death itself from the hand of the Lord with a calm and willing mind, in satisfaction for sins.[2]

Note 1. Neither the Bull Pia Mater nor the Raccolta (p. 529) requires Confession and reception of the Holy Eucharist; hence they are not prescribed, unless the rescript by which the faculty of imparting the blessing is granted to someone requires them, which today is usually the case.[3]

Note 2. When Viaticum, Extreme Unction, and the papal blessing are conferred at the point of death, the Confiteor, etc., must be recited three times.[4]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 23, 1775 (Decreta authentica, n. 237, to VII); September 22, 1892 (A.S.S. XXV, p. 315).

[2] The Bull Pia Mater, already cited.

[3] Beringer-Steinen, I, n. 1027 (A.A.S. IX, pp. 54, 69).

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 5, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 286, to VII).

Section V. On General Absolution with a Plenary Indulgence

533 I. Notion. The absolution of which there is question consists in a deprecatory absolution from the punishments of sin, which on certain days is granted to the three Orders of certain religious families; to this absolution is attached a plenary indulgence, applicable also to the departed.

534 II. Granting of the absolution.

1. Publicly, that is, outside confession, whether to one or to several, it can be granted: to Religious of the First Order by their own Superior or his delegate; to Nuns of the Second Order and Tertiaries with simple vows, by the confessor of the monastery or another delegated[1] by the Bishop;[2] to secular Tertiaries by the director of the confraternity, and if he for any reason is absent, by anyone approved for confessions.[3]

Privately, or in confession, it can be granted by any confessor;[4] nor, if the penitent is in the state of grace, is it required that confession and sacramental absolution have preceded, but it is enough that it be granted in the confessional.[5]

2. The absolution is of itself to be granted on the very day to which it is attached, namely from midnight to midnight; but Leo XIII declared that any Tertiary "can become a participant in the general absolution on the day before the day on which it is listed in the Index of indulgences of the same Third Order as to be bestowed, yet not publicly, but only privately, namely after completed sacramental confession," or at least in the confessional, as seems able to be added according to what was said above.[6]

3. The formula of absolution to be used is found in the Roman Ritual (edition of 1925), namely:

a) The Formula of General Absolution for Regulars of any Order enjoying this privilege (p. 276).

b) The Formula of Blessing with a plenary indulgence for Secular Tertiaries, and for all others having communication of privileges and graces with them, or with Regulars of any Order (p. 278).

c) "If this indulgence is imparted immediately after sacramental absolution, the rest being omitted, the Priest should begin absolutely from the words: 'Our Lord Jesus Christ,' etc., and so continue to the end, with only the plural number changed into the singular" (p. 279). Indeed in the case this formula suffices: By the authority granted to me by the Supreme Pontiffs, I impart to you a plenary indulgence of all your sins, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, Amen.[7] (p. 505).

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 11, 1903.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 27, 1903.

[3] Holy Office, section on indulgences, December 15, 1910.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 10, 1886; January 30, 1896, to I.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, July 21, 1881.

[6] To the Orders of St. Francis these indults were furthermore granted: 1. Friars and Nuns, by decree of August 26, 1895, can receive the absolution on the vigil, or the day preceding those feasts to which it is granted. Indeed, by a privilege granted by Pius X to the Order of Friars Minor Capuchin and thence transferred to the other two families of the First Order, religious who are detained by a lawful impediment, to be recognized by the Superior, so that they cannot receive the General Absolution on the assigned day, are able to receive it on one of the seven days immediately following the assigned feast (Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 14, 1904). 2. Nuns of the Second Order impeded by illness can receive the same absolution on a day within the octave, when their own confessor enters the enclosure to hear the confessions of the sick sisters (Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 21, 1882). 3. For Tertiaries the Supreme Pontiff granted on January 16, 1886, that if on working days, or days which are not of precept, they are lawfully impeded from being able to receive the said absolution, they can receive it on some feast of precept (even on Sunday) which occurs within the octave of the working days (Stein, Tractatus de indulgentiis lucrandis, p. 60).

[7] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, March 22, 1905.

535 III. Acquisition of the indulgence. In order that the indulgence be acquired, confession, communion, and the assigned prayers are required.

Section VI. On Real Indulgences

We shall treat first of real indulgences generally, then of some real indulgences in particular.

Chapter I. On Real Indulgences Generally

Real indulgences are those which are attached to pious objects. By the name of pious objects here come: chaplets, rosaries, crosses, crucifixes, small statues, and sacred medals.[1]

[1] Beringer-Steinen, I, n. 832.

536 I. Required matter. Pious objects must be made from solid matter, for example from iron, from wood, especially harder wood, from coral, shell, ivory, marble, etc. But those composed of fragile matter, for example from tin, lead, or glass, are excluded;[1] yet chaplets and rosaries can be made from solid and compact glass, from tin, lead, or crystal,[2] from polished steel, etc.[3] Likewise printed or painted images are excluded. Moreover images must represent Saints canonized in the customary form or inserted in duly approved martyrologies.[4]

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 24, 1846 (Decreta authentica, n. 333); Sacred Penitentiary, February 17, 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 143).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 29, 1820 (Decreta authentica, n. 249, to I and II); August 8, 1859; Sacred Penitentiary, December 21, 1925 (A.A.S. 1926, p. 24).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 22, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 271, to II).

[4] Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, June 16, 1764 (Decreta authentica, n. 1520); cf. Sacred Penitentiary, February 17, 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 143).

537 II. Attachment of indulgences.

1. By force of common law Cardinals, from their promotion in Consistory, and Bishops, even titular ones, from the day on which they receive authentic notice of the completed canonical provision, can attach to the things of which we are speaking the indulgences which are customarily granted by the Holy See, that is, the Apostolic or Papal indulgences, as they are called (canon 239, § 1, 5°; canon 349, § 1, 1°). Others also, who receive from the Holy See the simple faculty of blessing rosaries, chaplets, crosses, crucifixes, small statues, and medals, can attach to them only the Apostolic indulgences.[1]

Note. Of itself sacramental jurisdiction is not required in order that someone can receive and exercise the faculty of attaching indulgences. Nevertheless the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 14, 1901, declared that the faculty of blessing pious objects with application of Apostolic and St. Bridget's indulgences is not validly exercised by one who is not approved for hearing confessions, at least of men.

2. The attachment of indulgences is made in the customary form, that is, by a single sign of the cross over the things to be blessed, with the intention of applying the indulgences, without pronouncing a formula of blessing and without sprinkling holy water;[2] and this holds even if several things are blessed in a group, which can well be done (n. 499). Sometimes, however, a special form is prescribed, for example for the rosary of St. Dominic and of the Seven Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

3. To one and the same thing or place several indulgences can be attached under various titles (canon 933), provided, however, that the thing has the form required for each indulgence. Besides, these several indulgences can also be attached to the same thing by a single sign of the cross, unless a special form is prescribed for some indulgence. Thus, for example, to one and the same crucifix there can be attached the Apostolic indulgences and those of the Way of the Cross; to one and the same chaplet of five decades there can be attached the indulgences both Apostolic, and of St. Dominic, and of the Crucigeri.[3] But if the matter concerns medals to be blessed in place of scapulars, as many signs of the cross must be made as there are scapulars, and the blessings probably ought to correspond to the individual scapulars; but this blessing can be given, even publicly, by a single sign of the cross for each scapular to several blessed medals, even if they are destined for several persons afterward to be enrolled.[4]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 29, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 291).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 7, 1843 (Decreta authentica, n. 313, to II).

[3] Stein, op. cit., p. 41.

[4] Holy Office, June 4, 1913 (A.A.S. 1913, p. 303).

538 III. How acquisition of indulgences has place was seen above, where there was discussion of real indulgences in particular. Yet recall this: by one and the same work, to which indulgences are attached under various titles, several indulgences cannot be acquired, unless the required work is confession or communion, or unless something else has been expressly provided (canon 933); these things were explained in n. 502.

539 IV. How cessation of real indulgences happens, see n. 507.

Note. Among real indulgences, the Apostolic or Papal indulgences should be mentioned in particular.

1. Apostolic indulgences are those which, according to a catalogue customarily issued by the Roman Pontiff after his election, are attached to pious objects by the Supreme Pontiff or by a delegate. It is said "to pious objects," namely those of which there was discussion on p. 407, with the matter also observed of which we spoke under I on the page cited. For the catalogue of indulgences attached to the aforesaid objects by Pius XI, see A.A.S. 1922, p. 143.
2. Who can attach the said indulgences to things, and what form is to be used in attaching them, see n. 537.
3. "In order that someone may be able to gain Apostolic Indulgences, it is necessary that he carry upon himself, or decently keep in his house, some one of the things blessed by the Supreme Pontiff himself or by a priest endowed with the faculty."[1] Finally, in order that someone actually gain the indulgences, he must fulfill the prayers or pious works prescribed for each indulgence.

[1] Sacred Penitentiary, February 17, 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 143).

Chapter II. On Some Real Indulgences in Particular

Article I. On Chaplets

540 I. Different chaplets. The principal chaplets are: the chaplet of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the chaplet of the Seven Sorrows, the chaplet of St. Bridget, etc. The name rosary belongs especially to the chaplet of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

As regards the matter required, see what was said in n. 536. Moreover:

1. The chaplet of the Blessed Virgin Mary must consist of five, ten, or fifteen decades,[1] in each of which one Our Father and ten Hail Marys are recited. Without loss of indulgences, the individual decades can be separated from one another, provided that at least five decades are recited on one and the same day.[2] In the recitation the more principal mysteries of the life, passion, and resurrection of Jesus Christ are to be meditated upon.[3] The custom, though not obligatory, is that the joyful mysteries are recalled on Monday and Thursday, the sorrowful on Tuesday and Friday, and the glorious on Wednesday, Saturday, and Sunday.[4] If some person is incapable of meditation, it suffices to recite the rosary devoutly, provided he takes care to grow accustomed to meditation on the mysteries.[5]

The indulgences attached to the chaplet of the Blessed Virgin Mary are usually called the indulgences of St. Dominic; among them there is, provided that at least five decades are recited, an indulgence of 100 days for each Our Father and Hail Mary. Besides, for the recitation of the third part of the chaplet of the Blessed Virgin Mary before the Most Holy Sacrament, whether exposed or reserved in the tabernacle, a plenary indulgence was granted by the Supreme Pontiff Pius XI on September 4, 1927.[6]

2. The chaplet of the Seven Sorrows consists of seven parts, in each of which one Our Father and seven Hail Marys are said, with three Hail Marys added at the end in honor of the tears of the Blessed Virgin Mary. Meditation on the Sorrows is not necessary.

For each Our Father and Hail Mary an indulgence of 100 days is granted.

3. The chaplet of St. Bridget consists of six decades; in each one Our Father, ten Hail Marys, and one Creed are said, with one Our Father and three Hail Marys added at the end. Meditation on the mysteries is not required.

For each Our Father, Hail Mary, and Creed an indulgence of 100 days is granted, provided that one has the intention of saying the entire chaplet.[7]

St. Bridget's indulgences can also be attached to a chaplet of five decades; then, however, to gain the indulgences, the Creed must be added at the end of each decade.[8]

Note. Among the indulgences which can be attached to chaplets besides those already mentioned, the Apostolic indulgences especially deserve mention (n. 539); likewise the indulgences of the Crucigeri, that is, 500 days for the recitation of each Our Father and Hail Mary, even if the entire chaplet is not recited.[9]

[1] A chaplet consisting of fifteen decades is also called the rosary of St. Dominic.

[2] Rescript of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, July 8, 1908 (Analecta Ordinis Praedicatorum 1908, p. 634).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 13, 1726 (Decreta authentica, n. 92).

[4] Raccolta, n. 194.

[5] Constitution Pretiosus, May 26, 1727.

[6] A.A.S. 1927, p. 376.

[7] Raccolta, I, p. 206.

[8] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 29, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 291, to VIII).

[9] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 20, 1886.

541 II. Attachment of indulgences.

1. As regards the form to be used, see what was said in n. 537.

2. To one and the same chaplet several indulgences can be attached, provided the chaplet has the form required for each indulgence (cf. canon 933). Hence to the chaplet of the Blessed Virgin Mary can be attached the indulgences both proper to the said chaplet, or of St. Dominic (n. 540), and Apostolic (n. 539), and of the Crucigeri (n. 540), and of St. Bridget (n. 540).

542 III. Acquisition of indulgences. Having noted above (n. 540 under I), it suffices to add these things:

In order that the indulgences be acquired which require the recitation of certain prayers, the chaplet must be held in the hand and the beads must be passed through successively. If, however, two or more recite the chaplet together, for the acquisition of indulgences it is enough to recite the prayer alternately with a companion, or to follow it mentally while it is recited by another (canon 934, § 3).[1] It is said "to follow it mentally"; hence the faithful must abstain only from those external occupations which impede internal attention to the devout recitation of the rosary prescribed for gaining the indulgences.[2]

2. By one recitation of a chaplet, the indulgences of several chaplets cannot be acquired, unless something else has been expressly provided (cf. canon 933). Something else, however, has sometimes been expressly provided. Thus, for example, one who recites a chaplet to which the indulgences of St. Dominic and of the Crucigeri are attached acquires both indulgences by one recitation.[3]

[1] Raccolta, I, p. 348.

[2] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 22, 1858 (Decreta authentica, n. 384); January 8, 1898.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, November 13, 1893 (A.S.S. XXVI, p. 310).

543 IV. How cessation of indulgences has place, see n. 507.

Article II. On Scapulars

544 Scapulars, which the faithful are accustomed to wear, in their origin and institution are nothing other than the scapulars proper to various religious Orders, reduced to a small form for the greater convenience of the faithful.[1] Therefore they are a sign of a certain union with an Order or Congregation. More recent scapulars, however, are mere emblems or signs of a special devotion, for example toward the Sacred Heart, etc.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 12, 1907, to I.

545 I. Different scapulars. The principal ones are: the Scapular of the Most Holy Trinity (of the Order of Trinitarians); of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel (of the Carmelites); of the Seven Sorrows of the Blessed Virgin Mary (of the Servites); of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary (of the Theatines); and also of the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ (of the Congregation of the Mission of St. Vincent de Paul).

546 II. Conditions. In order that someone enjoy the privileges of scapulars, these must be duly made, duly blessed and imposed by a priest having the faculty, with due inscription added if the matter concerns a scapular which is the badge of some Confraternity - such as, for example, the Scapular of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel, of the Seven Sorrows, and of the Most Holy Trinity - and finally they must be worn in the due manner.

1. They should be duly made, namely from woven wool. Yet nothing prevents the scapular from having ornaments woven in or embroidered with a needle from another material, provided such ornaments are such that the prescribed color predominates.[1]

White is prescribed for the scapular of the Most Holy Trinity, brown or tawny for the scapular of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel, black for the scapular of the Seven Sorrows, blue for the scapular of the Immaculate Conception, red for the scapular of the Passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ. The form should be square or oblong rectangular, but not round, oval, or many-angled.[2]

The ribbons or cords can be from any material and of any color, except the cords of the red scapular, which must be made from red wool. Several scapulars can be attached to two common cords,[3] provided that, if among them there is the Scapular of the Passion, the cords are made from red wool.

Finally, different scapulars must be "distinct, that is, truly several, for example five scapulars, united either by the same number of cords or by only two cords, and in such a way that one part of each scapular hangs from the shoulders and the other from the breast, but not only one scapular on which little pieces of cloth of different color are sewn."[4] With these things considered, the little pieces of cloth should not be so joined that only the extremities of each scapular are visible; but it suffices if the individual little pieces are sewn together only at the upper part - for example by two cords - and otherwise hang loose.

2. They should be blessed and imposed by a priest having the faculty. Moreover the faculty belongs:

a) To Cardinals, who from their promotion in Consistory enjoy the faculty of blessing, by the sign of the cross alone, scapulars approved by the Apostolic See and of imposing them without the burden of inscription (canon 239, § 1, 5°).

b) To Bishops, even titular ones, who from receiving authentic notice of completed canonical provision can do the same as Cardinals, yet with the rites prescribed by the Church (canon 349, § 1, 1°).

c) To Superiors of the Orders to which the scapular pertains (n. 545).

d) Other priests must receive the faculty from the Holy See or from the Superiors of the Orders; the faculty received, however, is altogether personal, so that it does not belong to a substitute, nor can it be communicated to others, unless that has been expressly signified.[5]

3. They should be duly blessed and imposed;[6] concerning this, observe:

a) Of itself, for scapulars of different species, different blessing and imposition are prescribed. I said of itself, since to many an indult has been granted of blessing and imposing at once, that is, under a single formula, four[7] or even five[8] of the enumerated scapulars. Several scapulars of the same species can be blessed at once (n. 546). The blessing can be done whether the persons to be invested are present or absent.

b) The imposition must be done by the same one by whom the blessing was done.[9] An imposition made on only one shoulder and not around the neck is valid.[10] If several persons are to be invested, it suffices to impose one and the same blessed scapular upon those several persons in alternate turns, yet in such a way that the first scapular which the enrolled person must afterward wear is blessed.[11] It has also been granted to some that each of the faithful may impose the blessed scapular upon himself. If several are concerned, it suffices to pronounce the form of imposition once in the plural number, and this either before or after the imposition of the scapular or scapulars, if there are several.[12]

4. The persons invested should be aggregated to the confraternity, if the imposition of the scapular is connected with the said aggregation (p. 411). Hence the priest continues: I, by authority, etc. But in order that the aggregation or reception be established, inscription in the register of the association must absolutely be made; indeed, since confraternities constitute a moral person (cf. canons 687, 708), inscription is necessary for validity (canon 694, § 2).

Beringer-Steinen rightly judge that the Decree of the Holy Office, April 23, 1914, persists,[13] which states: "His Holiness, in the usual audience on April 23, 1914, granted to the Most Reverend Assessor of the Holy Office, after a previous sanation of all defects hitherto admitted in the inscription and transmission of the names of Christ's faithful who have been enrolled in any pious Sodality, declared that, with the obligation in conscience of inscribing and transmitting the names according to decrees and other prescriptions of the Holy See remaining firm, the faithful, by the very fact that they are admitted by one lawfully deputed, are to be considered duly enrolled, only for the effect that they may be able to gain indulgences and become participants in other spiritual graces, even if their names for any reason have not been entered in the register of the Sodality. Anything to the contrary notwithstanding."[14] Besides, Cardinals are exempted from the burden of inscription if the matter concerns rosaries, medals, or scapulars with which association to some sodality is attached (canon 239, § 1, 5°).

Note 1. Even upon little children a scapular can validly be imposed, so that when they have attained the use of reason, they can enjoy the indulgences and privileges without a new reception.[15] Besides, someone can also impose the scapular upon himself, provided he has received the faculty indiscriminately, and not specifically, for example only for some community of Nuns, etc.[16]

Note 2. Soldiers can be received into the Confraternity of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel, "provided they impose upon themselves the aforesaid scapular, already previously blessed, and also pour out some prayers to the Blessed Virgin Mary (for example by reciting the Hail Mary three times while they impose the scapular upon themselves), and thus are placed under the protection of the same Blessed Virgin."[17]

Note 3. On July 24, 1884, invalid receptions to scapulars and the respective sodalities previously made in good faith were sanated. Besides, receptions into the Confraternity of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel were last sanated on February 4, 1908, and receptions into the Confraternity of the Seven Sorrows on September 12, 1911.[18]

5. They should be duly worn. Moreover:

a) They must be worn day and night, and in such a way that one part hangs from the shoulders and the other from the breast;[19] whether immediately upon the body or over clothing is indifferent.[20]

b) Several scapulars can be worn in the manner of one, namely so that they are suspended by only two cords[21] (p. 412).

c) One who has put aside the scapular for a brief time gains the indulgences; if it is put aside for a long time, the indulgences are suspended. If the scapular has been worn out or lost, or if someone has put it aside and even for a long time has not worn it, he is not bound to a new imposition, but it suffices to resume the scapular; nor is it necessary that the scapular which is resumed be blessed.[22] Otherwise it must be said if someone put aside the scapular out of contempt or at least with the intention of no longer wearing it.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 18, 1868 (Decreta authentica, n. 423).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 18, 1868 (Decreta authentica, n. 423); cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 12, 1840 (Decreta authentica, n. 278).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, April 27, 1887, to IV.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 22, 1872 (Decreta authentica, n. 306); April 24, 1843 (Decreta authentica, n. 319).

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 18, 1862 (Decreta authentica, n. 394); August 18, 1868 (Decreta authentica, n. 421); April 27, 1887.

[6] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 18, 1868 (Decreta authentica, n. 421); April 27, 1887.

[7] Formerly the scapular of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel was always excepted from the indult (Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, April 27, 1887).

[8] Nouvelle Revue Theologique 1911, p. 430 sq.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 16, 1872 (Decreta authentica, n. 430).

[10] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 27, 1887.

[11] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 18, 1868 (Decreta authentica, n. 421, to I).

[12] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, April 18, 1891; June 18, 1898, to IV and V.

[13] Beringer-Steinen, op. cit., p. 49 sq.

[14] A.A.S. VI, p. 307 sq.

[15] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 29, 1864 (Decreta authentica, n. 410).

[16] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 7, 1840 (Decreta authentica, n. 280).

[17] Pius X, January 4 and March 30, 1908.

[18] Beringer-Steinen, II, p. 207.

[19] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 12, 1840 (Decreta authentica, n. 277).

[20] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 12, 1855 (Decreta authentica, n. 367, to II).

[21] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 26, 1864 (Decreta authentica, n. 408, to I).

[22] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 27, 1857 (Decreta authentica, n. 379).

547 III. Metal medals to be substituted for scapulars. Although Pius X "earnestly desires that the faithful continue to wear" scapulars, nevertheless he graciously conceded that for a scapular or scapulars, except those which are proper to Third Orders,[1] a single metal medal may be substituted, so that, with the laws proper to each scapular preserved, all spiritual favors (not excepting the so-called Sabbatine privilege of the scapular of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel) and all indulgences attached to each one can be participated in. Moreover:

1. On the obverse the medal should bear the image of Our Most Holy Lord Jesus Christ showing his Most Sacred Heart; on the reverse, the image of the Blessed Virgin Mary.[2]

2. The medal must be blessed; moreover, someone can bless several medals at once, whether those which he has before himself, or those "which the faithful have in the church or in some convent, even though these medals are not seen and are not known individually."[3] Besides, the medal or medals must be blessed with as many distinct blessings, that is, signs of the cross, as there are scapulars for which they must substitute. But it does not matter whether or not the order of the different scapulars is observed in making the signs of the cross.[4] "Yet lest," says Vermeersch, "those five signs of the cross, given confusedly, be valid for no definite scapular, the priest blessing will at least mentally assign his sign to each scapular."[5] So also Stein,[6] Beyersbergen.[7] But it is not contradictory that all and each of the signs of the cross - for example, five - should be valid for each of the five scapulars, determined in the mind of the priest, so that, when five signs have been made, the medal supplies those five determinate scapulars. Since, however, the matter is doubtful, the safer part is to be put into practice. Finally, several medals can also be blessed for indeterminate persons, whether already enrolled in the scapular or to be enrolled afterward: if for those not yet enrolled, the medals will enjoy the favors of the scapulars at the time when the persons will have been enrolled by regular imposition.[8] Soldiers, however, even before the scapulars have been imposed, can validly wear a medal in place of scapulars, and by that very fact are enrolled in the Confraternities.[9]

3. One who enjoys the faculty of blessing and imposing determinate scapulars can also bless a medal which supplies for them;[10] nor is it required that the same one who blessed and imposed, or is going to bless and impose, the scapular, also bless the medal.[11]

4. Of one who has put aside the medal, etc., the same must be said as was said of one who has put aside the scapular (p. 414).

[1] Holy Office, December 16, 1910; Sacred Congregation of Religious, March 25, 1922. Nevertheless, considering the cited decree of the Sacred Congregation of Religious, Superiors of the secular Third Order of St. Francis, with respect to their Tertiaries in individual cases, when a just and grave cause is present, can grant permission of substituting a blessed medal for the scapular of the secular Third Order of St. Francis.

[2] Holy Office, December 16, 1910.

[3] Holy Office, June 5, 1913, to I.

[4] Holy Office, June 5, 1913, to II and III.

[5] Vermeersch, Periodica VII, p. 224.

[6] Stein, op. cit., p. 54.

[7] N. K. Stemmen, 1923, p. 17.

[8] Secretariat of State, March 22, 1912; Vermeersch, Periodica VII, p. 224.

[9] Holy Office, December 16, 1910; June 5, 1913, to I.

[10] Holy Office, December 16, 1910.

[11] Periodica V, p. 269.

548 IV. The Sabbatine privilege. Among the favors attached to the scapular of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel, and likewise to the medal, the so-called Sabbatine privilege deserves special mention; this privilege is reported as having been promulgated by John XXII through a Bull.

Most hold the said Bull to be spurious. There is, however, a Decree of the Holy Office under Paul V, January 20, 1613, which has these words: "The Carmelite Fathers are permitted to preach that the Christian people can piously believe concerning the help of the souls of the brothers and confreres of the sodality of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel, namely that the Most Blessed Virgin, by her continual intercessions and pious suffrages and merits and special protection, after their passing, especially on Saturday, which day has been dedicated by the Church to the same Most Blessed Virgin, will help the souls of the brothers and confreres dying in charity, who in life wore the habit, and observed chastity according to their state, and recited the Little Office, or, if they do not know how to recite, observed the fasts of the Church and abstained from flesh meat on Wednesday and Saturday (unless on those days the feast of the Nativity of the Lord should fall)." Moreover:

1. The Little Office can be said privately in any language. Those who are already bound to it under another title satisfy by a single recitation.
2. The faculty of commuting either the Office or abstinence on Wednesday and Saturday is conferred together with the faculty of aggregating the faithful to the confraternity, and it can be exercised even outside confession. Finally, by Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 14, 1901,[1] to any confessor was granted the power of commuting abstinence on Wednesday and Saturday.

[1] A.S.S. XXXIV, p. 120.

Section VII. On the Heroic Act of Charity

549 I. Notion. "The heroic act of charity consists in this, that one of Christ's faithful, either by using some formula or even only mentally, offers to God Almighty for the souls in Purgatory all satisfactory works which he himself, so long as he lives, will perform; likewise all indulgences, both those granted for the departed and those granted only for the living, which he also can and must apply to the departed; finally all suffrages which after death will be able to come to him in any way whatsoever."[1] It is said:

1. Satisfactory works, that is, the satisfactory fruit of his works, which fruit is attached to every good work and of itself is ordered to taking away or lessening the punishments due to one's own sins. But the meritorious fruit of works is not ceded, since it is so personal that it cannot be renounced; nor are works ceded insofar as they are impetratory, whether for oneself or for others.
2. Offers to God; now this oblation can be made to God either immediately or mediately, namely through the Blessed Virgin Mary, in whose hands all satisfactory works, all indulgences, and all suffrages are deposited, to be distributed by her to the souls in purgatory as she pleases.[2] Finally, the offering made to God does not assume the character of a vow, and can always be revoked at will.[3]

That the act explained is greatly to be commended is clear from its very nature; for it is an act of charity toward the departed, by which someone as it were chooses punishments for himself, so that the souls of purgatory may more quickly escape punishment. There is added the fact that the Supreme Pontiffs have enriched the mentioned act with privileges.[4]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 19, 1885.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 19, 1885, to III and IV.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 19, 1885.

[4] Benedict XIII, August 23, 1728; Pius VI, December 12, 1788; Pius IX, September 30, 1852.

550 II. Privileges.[1]

1. Priests who have made the praised act enjoy the indult of a privileged altar on individual days.
2. The faithful can gain a plenary indulgence: 1. on individual days on which they receive Holy Communion; 2. on individual Mondays on which they hear Mass in suffrage for the departed, provided that in either case they visit a church or public oratory and there pray according to the intention of the Supreme Pontiff. But if someone is impeded from hearing Mass on Monday, it suffices to assist at the Mass to be heard on Sunday by precept. Priests also can gain the said indulgences, even if they celebrate and by celebrating have already gained another indulgence; since even communion received on the occasion of celebration suffices for acquiring a plenary indulgence, indeed for acquiring several plenary indulgences[2] (canon 933).
3. All indulgences which are gained by those who have made the heroic act of charity are applicable to the departed.[3]

Note 1. The plenary indulgence which a priest gains by force of the privilege of the altar granted on account of the heroic act of charity must be applied to the soul for whom the Mass is celebrated; for the privilege is granted by the Supreme Pontiff in this sense.[4]

Note 2. It was asked whether those who have made the heroic act of charity can, or rather must, apply to the departed the plenary indulgence to be gained at the point of death. The Sacred Congregation of Indulgences left the question in suspense, responding on January 23, 1901: "No interlocutory response is to be given." But of itself nothing prevents the said indulgence from being able to be renounced; that this must be done seems to be deduced from the special character of the heroic act of charity, as explained above.

[1] Raccolta, p. 531; Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 19, 1885.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 10, 1844 (Decreta authentica, n. 327, to II and III).

[3] Raccolta, p. 531.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 19, 1885.

Section VIII. On the Jubilee

We must treat first of the notion, division, and interpretation; then of the benefits of the Jubilee; finally of the suspension of indulgences and faculties on the occasion of the Jubilee.

Chapter I. On the Notion, Division, and Interpretation of the Jubilee

551 I. Notion. Among the Jews the Jubilee meant a year of remission and joy, according to these words of Sacred Scripture: "You shall also number for yourself seven weeks of years, that is, seven times seven, which together make forty-nine years, and you shall sound the trumpet in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, at the time of propitiation, throughout all your land. And you shall sanctify the fiftieth year, and shall proclaim remission to all the inhabitants of your land: for it is the Jubilee."[1] Among Christians the Jubilee likewise signifies a time of remission, to which several and special benefits are attached, as we shall explain more fully afterward.

[1] Leviticus 25:8 sq.

552 II. Division. The Jubilee is distinguished as ordinary and extraordinary (cf. canon 931, § 3). The ordinary or greater Jubilee is the one which recurs every twenty-fifth year; the extraordinary or lesser Jubilee is the one which is granted on account of special circumstances, for example after the coronation of the Supreme Pontiff.

The ordinary Jubilee is first celebrated at Rome for an entire year, beginning from the first Vespers of the Nativity of the Lord which precede the twenty-fifth year, up to the second Vespers of Christmas Day of the following year; that year is usually called the holy year. When the holy year has elapsed, the Jubilee is extended for a shorter time to the whole world.

The extraordinary Jubilee is usually celebrated at the same time in the City and in the world, and, according to circumstances, for a shorter or longer time.

A Jubilee is also distinguished as universal and particular, according as it is granted to the whole world or only to a part.

553 III. Interpretation. Unless the Bull of the Jubilee establishes the contrary, in both the ordinary and the extraordinary Jubilee the rules handed down by Benedict XIV are to be observed.[1]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 15, 1852. Cf. the Bulls Apostolica indulta, August 3, 1744; Peregrinantes, May 5, 1749; Cum nos super, May 17, 1749; Convocatis, November 25, 1749; Inter praeteritos, December 3, 1749; Paterna caritas, December 17, 1749; Benedictus Deus, December 25, 1750; Celebrationem, January 1, 1751.

Chapter II. On the Benefits of the Jubilee

The benefits of the Jubilee are, besides the plenary indulgence to be gained, the faculty of choosing a confessor, and the special faculties granted to confessors. For these benefits the Bull by which the Jubilee is granted must be examined each time. For the last Jubilee see A.A.S. 1927, pp. 310, 317, 318, 336.

Article I. On the Faculty of Choosing a Confessor

554 I. Nuns, and their novices, candidates, and postulants who are educated by them and live with them, and also all religious sisters of simple vows with novices, candidates, and girls being educated, though not externs and others using a common table with them, and also all oblates without vows approved by Ecclesiastical authority, with novices, candidates, girls, and others living in common with them, can choose for themselves a confessor approved by their Ordinary according to the prescriptions of the Code. This confessor can absolve them from any censures and sins, even those reserved to the Holy Apostolic See in a special manner, excepting the case of formal and external heresy.[2]

II. The faculty formerly granted to regulars and others, after the new Code (cf. canon 519), now lacks practical value.

[1] Cf. Navarrus, Commentarius de Iubilaeo; Viva, De Iubilaeo; Van de Burgt, De Iubilaeo; Bastien, De Iubilaeo.

[2] A.A.S. 1924, pp. 317, 319.

Article II. On the Special Faculties of Confessors

555 I. Faculties granted. To confessors lawfully chosen according to what was said in Article I belongs:

1. The faculty of absolving both from sins and - but in the forum of conscience only - from censures reserved either to the Holy See or to Ordinaries, except those which perhaps are excepted by the Bull, with a salutary penance nevertheless imposed, and with other things to be imposed by law. Therefore, as Benedict XIV teaches, the confessor "should not omit imposing upon each penitent his own salutary penance in the sacrament, not even under the pretext of the Jubilee to be obtained by the same penitent."[1] Other things to be imposed by law are understood as those which by either divine or ecclesiastical law are imposed upon the penitent.[2] Moreover:

a) One who falsely accused a confessor of solicitation cannot be absolved unless he has retracted the accusation and compensated other damages perhaps following upon the accused person, or is prepared to retract the accusation and compensate the damages.[3]

b) Those who have propagated heresy, or at least are guilty of external heresy, should not be absolved before they have abjured the heresy before the confessor and have repaired the scandal, or at least are prepared to repair it.[4]

c) Those who retain or read prohibited books should not be absolved before they have put them away or have seriously promised that they will put them away.[5]

d) Those who have given their name to a condemned secret sect should not be absolved except on the condition that they separate themselves altogether from the respective sect and abjure it, and that books, manuscripts, and signs concerning the sect, if they retain any, be handed into your hands (the hands of the confessor), to be cautiously transmitted as soon as possible to the Ordinary, or at least, if just and grave causes demand it, to be burned.[6]

e) One who violated the enclosure of Nuns for an evil end, even in occult cases, must be forbidden by the confessor from approaching in the future any monastery and church of Nuns; and he must be warned that he is absolved from the censure in such a way that, if he does not observe the prohibition imposed, he falls back by that very fact into the same censure.[7]

f) One who absolved an accomplice is usually obliged by the Sacred Penitentiary: 1. "that insofar as the accomplice person should approach him again, after being warned of the nullity of the past absolutions, he send that person back to another confessor who is not an accomplice"; 2. "that he abstain in the future from hearing the confessions of any accomplice person, insofar as this can be done without grave scandal"; 3. "that he take care to resign the office of confessor, if he has absolved two accomplices once or one accomplice twice."[8] But more recent Bulls have been accustomed to restrict the faculty of absolving a confessor who has absolved an accomplice.

g) Those who have been excommunicated, suspended, interdicted by name, or otherwise declared to have fallen into sentences and censures, or publicly denounced, should not be absolved unless within the time of the Jubilee they have made satisfaction and have come to agreement with the parties, where that is necessary.[9] But afterward this was added: "But if within the prescribed term, in the judgment of the confessor, they could not make satisfaction, we grant that they can be absolved in the forum of conscience, for the sole effect of obtaining the indulgences of the Jubilee, with the obligation imposed of making satisfaction as soon as they can."

2. The faculty of dispensing with a penitent constituted in sacred Orders concerning an occult irregularity contracted because of violation of a censure.[10]

3. The faculty of commuting any vows whatsoever, even sworn vows and vows reserved to the Apostolic See, into other pious and salutary works. There are excepted: 1. reserved vows of chastity and Religion; 2. vows made and accepted in favor of a third party, as vows made in any Religion; 3. penal vows, which are called preservative from sin, unless the future commutation is judged to be such that it restrains no less from committing sin than the former matter of the vow;[11] the vow of not seeking commutation is not excepted (St. Alphonsus, VI, 537, q. 4). Moreover observe:

a) For the commutation of vows (during the time of the Jubilee) a special cause is not required; but that common cause on account of which the Pontiff was moved to proclaim the Jubilee suffices (St. Alphonsus, II, 537, q. 40).

b) The power of commuting sworn vows quite probably carries with it the power of commuting oaths; nor does St. Alphonsus contradict this, since he speaks only of the power of commuting vows (III, 190).

It is disputed whether the power of commuting an oath of chastity and Religion belongs to the confessor. But it seems improbable that the Church, which denies the power of commuting a vow of some thing, would grant the faculty of commuting an oath concerning the same thing.

4. The faculty of commuting, from a just cause, the works assigned for the Jubilee into other pious works;[12] concerning this see n. 559.

The faculty of dispensing in some impediments of marriage is commonly not granted; yet in the year 1925 some faculty had been granted, but only for the internal forum.

[1] Bull Convocatis, § 26.

[2] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, April 18, 1900.

[3] A.A.S. 1924, p. 338, under IV.

[4] A.A.S. 1924, p. 311, under IV.

[5] A.A.S. 1924, p. 339, under VIII.

[6] A.A.S. 1924, p. 311, under IV.

[7] A.A.S. 1924, p. 339, under VI.

[8] A.A.S. 1924, p. 310, under I.

[9] A.A.S. 1924, p. 310, under IV.

[10] Bull Benedictus Deus, nn. 4 and 5.

[11] A.A.S. 1917, p. 311, under VII, p. 320.

[12] A.A.S. 1927, p. 312 sq.

556 II. Things to be noted. Concerning the faculties explained above these things are to be noted:

1. It is not permitted to use them except with respect to penitents who have the intention of gaining the indulgence of the Jubilee and therefore of fulfilling the prescribed works.[1] But the fact that someone sinned in hope of receiving absolution by force of the Jubilee does not prevent him from enjoying the favors, provided he is now sorry, and wills to gain the Jubilee and to fulfill the pious works (St. Alphonsus, VI, 537, q. 6). But if the penitent afterward, having changed his mind, does not fulfill the works required for gaining the indulgence, he sins, because he acts against the intention of the Supreme Pontiff who granted the faculties for gaining the Jubilee.[2] Yet it is not established that the sin is grave. Besides, the favors granted, for example the commutation of a vow, persist[3] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 537, q. 3).
2. The faculties must be used in sacramental confession;[4] but it is not required that all the faculties be exercised in the same confession or by the same confessor. Thus, for example, one who in confession for the Jubilee omitted to ask for commutation of a vow can ask for this in another confession and from another confessor. Nor is it required that absolution be granted now to one sacramentally confessed. Hence even if the confessor judges that absolution is to be deferred, he can nevertheless remove, for example, a censure or commute a vow; and if this has taken place, an ordinary confessor also, with the censure and the reservation of the sin removed, can absolve the penitent from sins.
3. Concerning repeated use of the favors, receive these things:

a) A penitent who has enjoyed the favors granted and has fulfilled all the prescribed works cannot enjoy the favors again, for example if he should make a new vow; and this holds even if the indulgence itself can be acquired several times.[5] The faculty of commuting prescribed works is excepted; it is permitted to use this several times[6] (n. 559).

b) One who has enjoyed the favors granted, but before he has fulfilled all the prescribed works needs them again, for example by falling back into censures, can, as seems to have to be said in view of the Bull Convocatis, n. 84 at the end, enjoy the favors again. Namely, the Supreme Pontiff states that "if he has once shared in them (the graces) the first time that he obtained the Jubilee, he cannot become a participant in them again, if after the first acquisition of the Jubilee he falls again into censures, etc." By these words it is implied that he can again become a participant in the graces if before the acquisition of the Jubilee, or before all the works have been fulfilled, he again falls into a censure. Moreover it seems more consonant with the mind of the Church that the faculties granted can be exercised until the faithful person, all the works having been fulfilled, has obtained the Jubilee.[7]

4. If someone has forgotten a reserved sin or reserved censure in a confession otherwise valid, or from a just cause has omitted it, according to many authors the reservation of the sin and the censure have been removed. The reason is that it is fitting to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff, who granted special faculties to the confessor in favor of the penitent, that the well-disposed penitent, insofar as it can be done, enjoy the said faculties (St. Alphonsus, VI, 537, q. 4). But if someone exposed a reserved censure or sin to the confessor, yet confessed invalidly, the reserved censure and the reservation of the sin have not been removed, if the confession was culpably invalid, that is, sacrilegious; since the sincere intention of acquiring the Jubilee is lacking (p. 421). Besides, "since the Pontiff grants the faculty of absolving from reserved things so that the faithful may gain the Jubilee, he is not presumed to grant it for those who cannot gain the Jubilee by that confession" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 537, q. 2). Moreover, because of the latter reason, the same solution seems to have to be admitted against several authors, if the confession was inculpably invalid (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

5. One who confessed during the time of the Jubilee can, if absolution seems to have to be deferred for him and to be granted after the Jubilee, be absolved from reserved things even after the time of the Jubilee (St. Alphonsus, VI, 537, q. 4).

[1] Bulls Convocatis, § 24; Inter praeteritos, § 62; Benedictus Deus, § 6; Celebrationem, § 8; Sacred Penitentiary, June 1, 1869; January 15, 1886.

[2] Cf. Bull Inter praeteritos, n. 86.

[3] Cf. Bulls Convocatis, n. 34; Inter praeteritos, n. 86; Leo XIII, Bull Praesentes Litteras; Sacred Penitentiary, November 1, 1899.

[4] Bulls Convocatis, § 25; Inter praeteritos, § 62, compared with Convocatis, § 40.

[5] Bulls Convocatis, § 52; Inter praeteritos, § 84; Sacred Penitentiary, June 1, 1869; Sacred Penitentiary, March 18, 1886.

[6] Sacred Penitentiary, March 18, 1886 (A.S.S. XVIII, p. 512).

[7] For the Jubilee of the year 1875, however, the Sacred Penitentiary, January 25, 1875, by mandate of the Supreme Pontiff, declared: "His Holiness declared that by force of the present Jubilee (the faithful) can be absolved only once from censures and reserved cases (and likewise that the indulgence of the Jubilee itself can be acquired only once)." And on the same day the Sacred Penitentiary, to the question "Whether confessors can absolve a penitent who, already absolved from reserved things and censures, has fallen into them again before he has fulfilled the works prescribed for acquiring the Jubilee," responded: "By virtue of the Jubilee one can be absolved only once from reserved things and from censures, or, negatively."

Article III. On the Indulgence

To the Jubilee is attached a plenary indulgence, to be gained only once, unless it is expressly granted as to be acquired several times. Moreover, in the Jubilee of the Holy Year in the City, it is granted several times to those who repeat the prescribed works.[1] Now we must speak about the works which are usually prescribed for gaining the indulgence.

[1] Bulls Convocatis, § 52; Inter praeteritos, § 84; Benedictus Deus, § 2.

557 I. Prescribed works. In the ordinary Jubilee there are commonly prescribed only: confession, communion, and visitation of the designated churches together with prayer according to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff; in an extraordinary Jubilee, besides the works enumerated, fasting and almsgiving are usually enjoined. A few things about each; moreover compare what was said in n. 494.

1. Confession is necessary even for those who have not sinned gravely, although absolution is not required for these.[1] If someone after completing the confession of the Jubilee, but before the last work has been fulfilled, falls into mortal sin, he is bound to confess again, nor does contrition suffice; however, it is not required that the other works, even if already fulfilled in the state of sin, be repeated.[2] The annual confession, by which satisfaction is made for the precept by which one constituted in mortal sin is bound, does not suffice.[3]

2. Communion, certainly worthy communion; the Paschal communion does not suffice;[4] nevertheless in the year 1925, if someone had neglected to receive Paschal communion, communion for the Jubilee also availed for fulfilling the Paschal precept; for the Jubilee, at least of the year 1900, the Sacred Penitentiary declared on March 28, 1900, to 2, that Viaticum suffices.

3. Visitation of churches. Which churches are to be visited and how often are determined in the City by the Supreme Pontiff, outside the City by the Bishop. In instituting the visitations it is permitted to compute the day either according to civil custom (from midnight to midnight) or according to ecclesiastical custom (from first Vespers up to sunset of the following day).[5] When several visitations are prescribed, it is not enough to enter the church once and there recite the prayers several times, but one must go out from the church and enter it again.[6] Moreover the visitations must be made with the intention of worshiping God.[7]

Regulars also are bound to visit the churches designated by the Bishop, unless they enjoy a special privilege; nevertheless commutation can be granted to those lawfully impeded.[8]

4. Prayers to be recited. They must be recited in the place to be visited and according to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff. Oral prayers suffice; merely mental prayers do not, to which therefore an oral prayer would have to be added.[9] Moreover compare what was said in n. 498.

5. Fasting is to be taken in the strict ecclesiastical sense, that is, joined with abstinence, and indeed, considering the old law, with abstinence not only from flesh meat but also from eggs and milk products.[10] Under the new law, however, fasting no longer includes abstinence from eggs and milk products. Fasting also concerns those who otherwise are not bound to it, such as children and the elderly (St. Alphonsus, VI, 534, 3°); nevertheless there is place for commutation (n. 559).

6. If almsgiving is enjoined, as devotion suggests, a modest amount suffices; if it is prescribed according to each one's means, a larger amount must be given by the rich. It is indifferent whether money or another thing is given. Religious, wives, and children of families satisfy by consenting to the alms which the Superior or father gives in the name of the whole community or family. Nevertheless religious and the truly poor can ask for commutation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 538, q. 11).

[1] Bulls Convocatis, § 46; Inter praeteritos, § 77; cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 19, 1759 (Decreta authentica, n. 214); May 6, 1852 (Decreta authentica, n. 359, to IV).

[2] Bulls Convocatis, § 42; Inter praeteritos, § 79; cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, November 28, 1759 (Decreta authentica, n. 217, to I).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 10, 1844 (Decreta authentica, n. 327, to I), compared with the Sacred Penitentiary (A.A.S. VIII, p. 351).

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 10, 1844 (Decreta authentica, n. 327, to I).

[5] Bull Inter praeteritos, § 13; Sacred Penitentiary, January 24, 1875.

[6] Sacred Penitentiary, January 25, 1875.

[7] Bull Inter praeteritos, § 13.

[8] Bulls Convocatis, § 51; Inter praeteritos, § 83.

[9] Bulls Convocatis, § 51; Inter praeteritos, § 83.

[10] Sacred Penitentiary, March 16, 1865; Bucceroni reports other declarations of the same Congregation, Enchiridion, n. 1065.

558 II. Things to be noted concerning the prescribed works.

1. Works owed by law or precept do not suffice, unless the Supreme Pontiff signifies the contrary.[1] Hence, as has already been noted, annual confession, Paschal communion, etc., do not suffice.
2. The prescribed works, even confession and communion, must be done during the time of the Jubilee;[2] likewise with the intention of gaining the indulgence; but a habitual intention suffices (n. 501).
3. The works enjoined, whether all or some of them, can also be fulfilled outside one's domicile, provided that the ordinances of the Ordinaries of the places are observed.[3]
4. Finally, it does not matter in what order they are fulfilled, nor is it required that they be done in the state of grace, except for the last work.[4]

[1] Bull Inter praeteritos, § 53; this speaks of debt in any way whatsoever; but since canon 932 speaks only of law and precept, things owed under another title, for example a vow, now seem to suffice.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 9, 1763 (Decreta authentica, n. 231); May 10, 1844 (Decreta authentica, n. 327, to I); canon 931, § 3.

[3] Sacred Penitentiary, January 15, 1886, to VI.

[4] Bulls Convocatis, § 47; Inter praeteritos, §§ 73-76.

559 III. Relaxation of the works. To the Supreme Pontiff alone belongs the faculty of dispensing in some work; but to confessors - not, however, of itself to Superiors[1] - is granted the faculty of commuting for those morally impeded the prescribed works into other pious works; concerning this, observe:

1. The faculty of commutation does not include confession; nor communion except for children who have not yet been admitted to first Communion;[2] nor the prayers to be recited according to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff.[3]
2. Commutation cannot be made into works otherwise owed, unless this is expressly granted;[4] nor, as follows from the nature of commutation, can it be made into notably lesser works.
3. Commutation of itself, that is, considering the norms of Benedict XIV, seems to have to be made in sacramental confession. For thus Benedict XIV established generally concerning the use of faculties.[5]

4. Even if the indulgence can be acquired several times, nevertheless the commutation of the works enjoined, considering the Bull of Benedict XIV,[6] can be made only once; but the Sacred Penitentiary, March 18, 1886,[7] responded that the works enjoined can be commuted several times.

Note. One who foresees that the time for completing the prescribed works will not suffice for him should ask for commutation or, if the Bull permits it, prolongation of the Jubilee.

[1] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, April 23, 1886, to II and III.

[2] Considering the kindly mind of the Church, this perhaps can be extended to those very few sick persons who cannot communicate even at home.

[3] Benedictus Deus, § 3; Inter praeteritos, § 53.

[4] Inter praeteritos, § 53.

[5] Inter praeteritos, § 63; cf. Sacred Penitentiary, January 30, 1886.

[6] Bull Convocatis, §§ 52 and 39.

[7] A.S.S. XVIII, p. 512.

Chapter III. On the Suspension of Indulgences and Faculties on the Occasion of the Jubilee

560 In order that the City of Rome during the time of the Jubilee may be celebrated by as great a gathering of mortals as can be, during the Holy Year, that is, the year in which the ordinary Jubilee is celebrated in the City - but not during the time in which the said Jubilee is extended to the world, nor in an extraordinary Jubilee - indulgences and faculties outside the City are moderated as follows:

I. All indulgences - even those which have been granted for the living only - can be acquired for the departed. No indulgences can be acquired for the living, except indulgences granted: 1. to those who are constituted at the point of death; 2. for the recitation of the Angelus of the Lord or the Regina Caeli according to the time, and certain others to be assigned in the Bull.[1]

II. The faculties of absolving from reserved cases and censures, of commuting vows, of dispensing from irregularities and impediments, are suspended, with these exceptions:

1. Faculties granted in any way through the Code of Canon Law, except those which were granted by privilege.
2. Faculties for the external forum granted in any way to Nuncios, Internuncios, Apostolic Delegates, and also to Ordinaries of places and Superiors of Religious Orders over their subjects.
3. Faculties granted by the Sacred Penitentiary for the internal forum, insofar as they are exercised toward penitents who cannot go to the City without grave inconvenience.[2]

[1] A.A.S. 1927, p. 306 sq.

[2] A.A.S. 1927, pp. 307, 308.

Scholion I. On the Plenary Indulgence at the Point of Death

561 I. At the point of death only one plenary indulgence can be gained, although the dying person may have a right to it under various titles.[1] This holds even if the dying person, because of a less perfect disposition, acquires only partially the plenary indulgence which he acquires.

This indulgence, which is acquired at the last moment of life, cannot be applied to the departed (n. 530). An exception should more probably be made if the matter concerns one who has elicited the heroic act of charity; for he enjoys the privilege of applying to the departed all indulgences which he gains (n. 550).

II. Concerning the various titles from which a dying person can acquire a right to the said indulgence, it is useful to note these things:

1. It is to be advised that the dying person strive to make several titles his own; for it can happen that the conditions required for some title are not fulfilled, while the conditions established for another title are fulfilled; whence it happens that, with several titles in place, the hope of gaining the indulgence is increased. There is added the fact that several titles can occur without the intervention of a priest, and that the conditions to be fulfilled for different titles especially promote the disposition required for gaining the indulgence.

When an indulgence is granted under the customary conditions, there are required: confession, communion, invocation of the Name of Jesus by mouth, or, if that cannot be done, in the heart, and prompt acceptance of death in satisfaction for sins.

2. The principal titles are:[2]

a) The Apostolic blessing at the point of death, concerning which we spoke at length in n. 530 sq.

b) Enrollment in most confraternities.

In order that the indulgences be gained, the customary conditions are for the most part required (n. 494).

c) Enrollment in an Order, religious Congregation, or Third Order; this holds at least for most Congregations and Third Orders.

For a member of an Order and of a Third Order, confession and communion are required, or, if these cannot be done, a penitential invocation of the Holy Name by mouth, or, if that is impossible, in the heart.

d) Use of a cross or another object to which Papal indulgences are attached.

In order that someone acquire the indulgence: 1. he should carry the object upon himself or keep it decently in his house; 2. he should fulfill the customary conditions.

e) Use of a crucifix, that is, a cross with the image of Christ crucified, to which is attached a plenary indulgence at the point of death toties-quoties.[3]

In order that the indulgence be gained, the dying person: 1. should kiss or in some way touch the crucifix;[4] 2. should fulfill the customary conditions.

f) Recitation of the acts of faith, hope, and charity.[5]

It is required only that someone has frequently elicited the said acts in life; it does not matter by what formula he has done this.

g) Recitation of the prayer: Lord my God, from now on I accept from your hand with a calm and willing mind whatever kind of death shall have pleased You, with all its distresses, punishments, and pains.[6]

It is required that, on whatever day he wishes, after confession and communion have been received, by reciting the said act with charity he accept death from God.

h) Sometimes the Supreme Pontiff grants by name a plenary indulgence to a dying person, with no condition established.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 23, 1901, to II (Collectio, n. 2100).

[2] Cf. N. K. Stemmen, 1922, p. 72.

[3] Toties-quoties, whose meaning in this case is that any one of Christ's faithful constituted at the point of death may be able to acquire a plenary indulgence through the use of this crucifix (Holy Office, June 10, 1914); in what sense this decree is to be understood was declared and confirmed by the declaration of the Sacred Penitentiary, June 23, 1929 (A.A.S. 1929, p. 510 sq.).

[4] Holy Office, January 11, 1914.

[5] Raccolta, I, p. 18; Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 22, 1756.

[6] Raccolta, I, p. 148; Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 9, 1904.

Scholion II. On Toties-Quoties Indulgences

562 I. A toties-quoties indulgence is here understood as a plenary indulgence which on the same day can be acquired as often as the work enjoined, usually a visitation of a determinate church with prayer according to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff, is repeated.

II. Especially the following toties-quoties indulgences can be acquired, certain conditions being observed: 1. on the feast of the Most Holy Trinity;[2] 2. on the feast of the Most Holy Sacrament;[3] 3. on the last Sunday of the month of June;[4] 4. on the feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary of Mount Carmel;[5] 5. on Portiuncula or the following Sunday;[6] 6. on the feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary of the Seven Sorrows in the month of September, or on the Sunday of the solemnity;[7] 7. on the feast of the Most Holy Rosary or the Sunday of the solemnity;[8] 8. on the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed.[9]

[1] Cf. N. K. Stemmen 1923, p. 68.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 10, 1904.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, July 30, 1906; December 10, 1907.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 8, 1906; from the audience of Pius X, January 26, 1908; cf. Collectio precum piorumque operum, pp. 78-79.

[5] Brief Quo magis, May 16, 1892.

[6] Motu proprio, June 9, 1910; Holy Office, May 26, 1911.

[7] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 27, 1888.

[8] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, July 7, 1885.

[9] Holy Office, June 25, 1914.

Treatise VI. On Extreme Unction

(St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 29-32; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, lib. VI, n. 706-733; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 17, n. 1-13.)[1]

We shall speak first of Extreme Unction considered in itself, then of its ministration, and finally of the reception of Extreme Unction.

[1] Cf. Billuart, De Extrema Unctione, sole dissertation; Schmitz, De effectibus sacramenti Extremae Unctionis; Kern, De sacramento Extremae Unctionis tractatus dogmaticus; Heimbucher, Die heilige Oelung.

Dissertation I. On Extreme Unction Considered in Itself

563 Extreme Unction can be defined: the sacrament by which a sick person, through an anointing with blessed oil and the prayer of the priest, is relieved according to the soul, and, if it is expedient for the soul, also, at least sometimes, according to the body (cf. St. Thomas, In IV Sent., dist. 23, q. 1, a. 1, 2, 3, 4; q. 2, 1 and 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 706). It is also called simply anointing, or the anointing of the sick, the sacrament of those departing, etc.

With this definition given, we shall treat first of the existence, then of the essence, then of the effects, and finally of the necessity of Extreme Unction.

Part I. On the Existence of Extreme Unction

564 I. Extreme Unction is a true sacrament; this proposition is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that Extreme Unction is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ our Lord, and promulgated by blessed James the Apostle; ... let him be anathema."[1]

Note. It is disputed at what time Extreme Unction was instituted. Some have thought that the anointing performed by the Apostles, of which Mark speaks,[2] was Extreme Unction. But this opinion must be rejected, because the minister of that sacrament is a priest; the Apostles, however, were constituted priests afterwards, namely at the Lord's Supper. Most hold that this sacrament, which is the complement of Penance, was instituted after Christ's resurrection together with Penance.

[1] Session 14, canon 1.

[2] "And they anointed with oil many sick persons and healed them" (Mark 6:13).

565 II. Extreme Unction, even in the case in which several anointings and prayers are used, is only one sacrament; otherwise the dogma concerning the sevenfold number of the sacraments would not stand. This, however, is explained in different ways by different authors. According to some, the diverse anointings and prayers taken together signify and produce one complete effect; but the effect is produced either by parts, as Scotus teaches,[1] or after the last anointing has been performed, as St. Thomas holds (Supplement, q. 30, a. 1, ad 3; cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 707, qu. 2). According to others, the first anointing together with the partial form signifies and effects the entire effect, while the other anointings are regarded only as sacramentals (n. 570).

[1] According to Mastrius, Scotus supposes that the individual actions have their own partial effects. For Scotus says, In IV Sent., dist. 23, at the end, ad 2, that this sacrament is indeed one by unity of integrity, but not by unity of indivisibility, just as its effect is not one indivisibly, because it is not the remission of one venial sin, but one by the unity of the full remission of all venial sins (Gaude, in St. Alphonsus, VI, 707).

Part II. On the Essence of Extreme Unction

Section I. On the Remote Matter

566 I. For validity, so that it be indubitable here, there is required: 1. olive oil; 2. blessed either by a Bishop or by a presbyter who has obtained delegated faculty to bless it; and this 3. with the special blessing of the oil of the sick. From the preceding, olive oil and a blessing performed by a Bishop or by a delegated presbyter are certainly required; the special blessing is probably required.

1. Olive oil is certainly required. This is clear: 1. from the words of St. James: "anointing him with oil."[1] But oil spoken of simply is olive oil. 2. From the Council of Florence.[2] 3. From the consensus and practice of the Eastern and Western Church (St. Alphonsus, VI, 709; cf. canons 937 and 945).

2. A blessing performed either by a Bishop or by a presbyter who has obtained delegated faculty to bless the oil is certainly required; in other words, a blessing performed by a simple priest who has not been delegated is not sufficient. This is clear from the response of the Holy Office, which, with Gregory XVI approving, responded to the question whether in a case of necessity a parish priest could use oil blessed by himself for the validity of the sacrament of Extreme Unction: "Negatively, according to the form of the decree of Thursday before the Most Holy Father, January 13, 1611."[3] The same Holy Office, on May 15, 1878, declared: "Oil blessed by a presbyter who has not been furnished with a special faculty by the Holy See is matter wholly unfit for the Sacrament of Extreme Unction, and cannot validly be used even in extreme necessity." This is clear besides from the matters by which it will immediately be proved that, in itself, a blessing made by a Bishop is required, and therefore that a simple priest in himself lacks this faculty and needs delegation (cf. canon 945). Hence, for the sake of completeness, further observe:

a) In itself, a blessing made by a Bishop is required. This is clear 1. from the Council of Trent;[4] 2. from the Council of Florence;[5] 3. from the decree of the Holy Office, approved by Paul V.[6]

b) The Supreme Pontiff can confer upon a simple priest the power of consecrating the oil. This is clear from the Decree of Clement VIII, Sanctissimus Dominus;[7] from the Constitution of Benedict XIV, Etsi pastoralis;[8] from the declaration of the Holy Office cited above;[9] from canon 945; and from the fact that priests of the Eastern Church and the Italo-Greeks enjoy and use this faculty.[10]

c) It is doubtful whether even a Bishop, in himself, that is, without delegation of the Supreme Pontiff, can confer upon a simple priest the faculty of consecrating the oil.

3. It is altogether doubtful whether for validity the special blessing is required, or whether the blessing by which the chrism of Confirmation or the oil of catechumens is consecrated is sufficient (cf. canon 945). Hence in a case of necessity the sick person can, or even must, be anointed, conditionally of course, with the chrism of Confirmation or with the oil of catechumens. If afterwards the oil of the sick can be had, the sacrament should be repeated conditionally (St. Alphonsus, VI, 709, dub. 2).

[1] James 5:14.

[2] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 700.

[3] September 14, 1842 (Collectio de Propaganda Fide, n. 956).

[4] Session 14, De sacramento extremae unctionis, cap. 1.

[5] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 700.

[6] January 13, 1611 (Collectio de Propaganda Fide, n. 956, note).

[7] August 31, 1595.

[8] May 26, 1742, § 4.

[9] May 15, 1878.

[10] Cf. Kern, op. cit., p. 124 sq.

567 II. For liceity there is required: 1. that matter certainly valid be used; 2. that the oil have been blessed on the Lord's Supper, on the most recent Thursday before Easter (canon 734, § 1).[1] "Therefore let the parish priest," says the Roman Ritual,[2] "have the sacred Oil of the sick, which each year, on Thursday in the Lord's Supper, blessed by the Bishop, is to be renewed, the old having been burned; nor should the old be used unless necessity urges" (cf. the cited canon). If the blessed oil seems insufficient, "other unblessed olive oil should be added, even repeatedly, but in a smaller quantity" (canon 734, § 1).[3] Thus the admixture can be made several times, even if finally the quantity of unblessed oil is greater, provided that in each admixture it is smaller.[4] Nevertheless, on Thursday in the Lord's Supper it is not permitted to bless part of the Holy Oils in order at once to mix that part with unblessed oils.[5] Besides, note:

a) Old oils are not to be used unless necessity urges (canon 734, § 1).

b) The parish priest must request the holy oils from his Ordinary; and he should carefully keep the oil of the sick in a clean and decently adorned place, in a silver or tin vessel, and should not retain it at home unless because of necessity or another reasonable cause, with the license of the Ordinary having been obtained (canon 946, joined with 735). A reasonable cause is, for example, a greater distance of the parish house from the church.[6]

[1] On Thursday in the Lord's Supper, threefold oil is blessed by the Bishop, namely: 1. the oil of the sick; 2. the oil of catechumens; 3. chrism, which consists of olive oil and balsam. The oil of the sick is marked on the vessel with the letters O. I. or with the letter I alone; the oil of catechumens with the letters O. C. or the letter O alone; chrism with the letters Ch. or the letter C alone.

[2] Title V, cap. 1, n. 3.

[3] Roman Ritual, loc. cit.

[4] Pius VI, April 1, 1794; Sacred Congregation of the Council, September 25, 1862.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, December 7, 1744, n. 2883; January 28, 1910 (A.A.S. 1910, p. 118).

[6] Sacred Congregation of Rites, Decreta authentica, n. 2650, to the third factual case; 3276, ad 5; 3739, ad 2; 3779, ad 7.

Section II. On the Proximate Matter

568 I. For validity, so that it be indubitable here, these suffice: 1. anointings of the different senses together with partial forms; 2. in a case of necessity, a single anointing in one sense with the prescribed shorter form, which will be cited immediately. It is said:

1. Anointings of the different senses together with the particular forms suffice. Moreover, they suffice even if the anointing of a paired part, for example of one eye, etc., is omitted.

2. In a case of necessity, a single anointing in one sense with the prescribed shorter form suffices. This is clear: 1. from canon 947, § 1; 2. from the Roman Ritual;[1] 3. from a decree of the Holy Office approved by Pius X.[2]

The decree states: "When this Supreme Congregation was asked that one short formula be determined in the administration of the sacrament of Extreme Unction in a case of imminent death, the Most Eminent and Reverend Father General Inquisitors, after the matter had been most maturely weighed and after the vote of the Reverend Consultors had been had, decreed: In a case of true necessity the form is sufficient: 'Through this holy anointing may the Lord forgive you whatever you have committed. Amen.'" The decree indeed explicitly speaks only of the abbreviated form, but implicitly signifies that the single anointing corresponding to it is sufficient. Besides, note:

a) Likewise outside necessity a single anointing in one sense with the prescribed shorter form seems sufficient: both because, with respect to validity, a distinction is not readily to be admitted; and because St. James[3] speaks only of anointing the sick person, without mention of the parts of the body. Finally, this is supported by the very great variety which, with respect to the number and place of anointings, has prevailed in the Greek and Latin Church.[4]

b) Whether a single anointing in one sense together with the particular form suffices for validity is not beyond doubt. If it suffices, the later anointings seem to be regarded as sacramentals, which plainly express the effect of Extreme Unction. If it does not suffice, it must be said that the effect is produced in the last necessary anointing according to these words of St. Thomas: "When there are many actions ordered to the same effect, the last is formal with respect to all the preceding and acts in virtue of them; and therefore in the last action grace is infused, which gives the sacrament its effect" (Supplement, q. 30, a. 1, ad 3).

[1] Title V, cap. 1, n. 21.

[2] April 24, 1906.

[3] James 5:14.

[4] Kern, op. cit., p. 131 sq.

569 II. For liceity outside the case of necessity there is required: 1. that the members to be designated be anointed, and this 2. in the prescribed order; 3. by the minister's own hand, that is, with the right thumb, no instrument being used; and 4. in the manner of a cross (canon 947, joined with the Roman Ritual).

1. Members to be anointed. The organs of the five senses must be anointed, namely the eyes, ears, nostrils, mouth, and hands (canon 947, § 1, joined with the Roman Ritual, title V, c. 1, n. 15). The anointing of the kidneys is always to be omitted (canon 947, § 2).[1] The anointing of the feet can be omitted for any reasonable cause (canon 947, § 3). If someone is mutilated in some member, the part nearest that place is anointed, with the same form of words.[2] If someone lacks a sense itself, for example hearing, or has always lacked it, nevertheless the organ is anointed. With respect to paired organs, the anointing should be made separately on each organ, but under one form, beginning from the right; except the lips, which are anointed with a single anointing.

The anointing of the organs of the five senses is prescribed under grave obligation. Likewise the anointing of each of the paired organs seems to oblige under grave obligation, so that only a grave cause excuses, for example the difficulty of turning the sick person and reaching the paired organs (St. Alphonsus, VI, 710).

2. The prescribed order obliges, so that every inversion is a sin; indeed an inversion of at least several anointings seems to be grave (St. Alphonsus, VI, 710). Now, considering the prescribed order, the following are anointed:

a) The eyes, over both closed eyelids.

b) The ears, at the lower parts of the auricles.

c) The nostrils, over each nostril, and indeed from the side, lest sneezing be excited.

d) The mouth, over each closed lip; with a single anointing by which both lips are anointed; but if this cannot conveniently be done, it is sufficient to anoint one lip.

e) The hands, in the middle of the palms; but the hands of a priest are anointed on the outside.

f) The feet, on the upper part or on the soles according to the prevailing custom.[3]

3. The anointings should be made by the minister's own hand, that is, with the right thumb;[4] not with another finger nor with a brush or similar instrument: a contrary custom, if it prevails anywhere, cannot be observed.[5] Nevertheless, in a case of grave necessity, for example if contagion is to be feared from contact, as if some sick person is suffering from leprosy, plague, or smallpox, it is permitted to use a brush or small rod[6] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 710).

4. In the manner of a cross, as the Roman Ritual has it.[7]

5. Finally, it is very much recommended that for each anointing the thumb be dipped in the oil, all the more because some doubt whether one drop suffices for all the anointings (St. Alphonsus, VI, 709, dub. 4).

[1] In place of the kidneys, in some dioceses the anointing of the breast was permitted. Now, with the anointing of the kidneys forbidden, the anointing of the breast also is to be omitted.

[2] Roman Ritual, title V, cap. 1, n. 19.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, August 27, 1836, n. 2743.

[4] Roman Ritual, title V, c. 2, n. 8.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, May 9, 1857, n. 3051.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Rites, May 9, 1857, ad II, n. 3051.

[7] Roman Ritual, title V, c. 2, n. 8.

570 III. For liceity in a case of necessity a single anointing in one sense, or more rightly on the forehead, with the prescribed shorter form suffices, with the obligation remaining of supplying the individual anointings when the danger has ceased (canon 947, § 1). It is said:

1. In a case of necessity. But a case of necessity is present: 1. when there is some danger that the sick person may die before the individual anointings have been performed; 2. when several persons must be anointed and it is feared that, if each is anointed in the ordinary manner, someone may die without Extreme Unction; 3. when, if the individual anointings are performed, danger of contagion can arise or increase; nevertheless, if the danger arises from contact, it should be forestalled by use of a brush or small rod; 4. when a longer ministration exposes the sacrament to danger of irreverence, as can happen, for example, in anointing an insane person.

2. When the danger has ceased, the individual anointings must be supplied. That is, they must be supplied if the danger on account of which the single anointing was used has ceased. Hence they must be supplied if the sick person has survived; if the danger has ceased that one of several persons to be anointed may die without Extreme Unction; if the danger of contagion has ceased, for example because a brush has been brought by which the individual anointings can be performed.

c) The individual anointings must be supplied; and indeed absolutely, not conditionally, and, as seems most probable, always. I said absolutely, for thus the Holy Office expressly states.[1] I said always, because both canon 947, § 1, and the Holy Office[2] and the Roman Ritual[3] state without any restriction that the anointings are to be supplied, provided, however, that the danger of death continues. But the reason why they are prescribed to be supplied is that the sick person not be deprived of the sacramentals which seem to be contained in the anointings to be supplied and which plainly express the effect of Extreme Unction (n. 570).

Note 1. Not all agree in defining the nature of the anointings to be supplied. Some have thought that the sacrament is iterated in the supplied anointing. This, however, is not satisfactory, both because in that opinion the anointings would have to be supplied conditionally, since it is doubtful whether Extreme Unction can validly be repeated in the same danger, a doubt which is not considered removed either by the decrees cited above or by the Code; and because the iteration of the sacrament in the same danger is severely prohibited by the Code itself.

Others judge that the supplies are parts which with the preceding anointing constitute one whole, whether they are considered as partial sacraments or as the perfection or extension of the sacramental sign itself. But neither does this opinion seem correct, both because it supposes that the preceding anointing lacks the perfection of the sacrament, which is admitted with difficulty, and because, once this opinion is admitted, the anointings cannot be supplied if the moral union between them and the earlier anointing has ceased.

Others teach that the supplies are integral parts of the sacrament. But then also moral union between them and the essential part seems to be required; and if that is lacking, the supplies would have to be omitted.

These things being posited, it remains to be said, as it seems, that sacramentals, or ceremonies very efficacious by reason of the accompanying prayers of the Church, are contained in the supplied anointings.[4]

Note 2. What has been said about the anointings to be supplied after a single anointing is also to be applied to anointings neglected in the ordinary ministration, for example through forgetfulness; these therefore must likewise be supplied. If, however, it is feared that, because of the space of time, the required union is lacking, the sacrament is in itself to be repeated conditionally.

[1] March 9, 1917.

[2] January 31, 1907.

[3] Title V, cap. 1, n. 21.

[4] Cf. Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1917, p. 241; 1928, p. 92.

Section III. On the Form and on the Union of Matter and Form

571 I. The ordinary form in the Latin Church is the prayer prescribed by the Roman Ritual for the individual anointings, namely: "Through this holy Unction, and His most tender mercy, may the Lord forgive you whatever you have committed through sight, or through hearing, etc. Amen."[1] That the words "and His most tender mercy" are not required for validity is gathered from the form to be used in a case of necessity, in which the aforesaid words are omitted. Nevertheless, outside a case of true necessity, the omission is held to be gravely illicit (St. Alphonsus, VI, 711, dub. 2).

Among the Orientals this or a similar form is used: "Holy Father, physician of souls and bodies, who sent Your only-begotten Son, Our Lord Jesus Christ, healing every disease and freeing us from death, heal also Your servant N. from the bodily infirmity detaining him, and give him life through the grace of Your Christ, by the intercessions of N. N. and of all the Saints. Amen."

[1] Title V, cap. 1, n. 20. From the new editions of the Roman Ritual, the word "Amen" is to be said by the priest.

572 II. "In a case of necessity a single anointing in one sense, or more rightly on the forehead, suffices with this shorter form: 'Through this holy Unction may the Lord forgive you whatever you have committed. Amen.'" Thus the Roman Ritual,[1] canon 947, § 1, and the Decree of the Holy Office.[2] As it is useful to note in passing, everyone is under obligation to hold the aforesaid shorter form by memory.

Note. As is gathered from the words of St. James,[3] it is required for the essence of the form that it be deprecatory formally, or according to sense (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 29, a. 8; St. Alphonsus, VI, 711, dub. 1). But nothing seems to prevent a form that is grammatically indicative from being formally deprecatory, namely from the intention of praying to God, an intention, I say, sufficiently manifested by the very nature of the action.

[1] Loc. cit., n. 21.

[2] April 24, 1906.

[3] James 5:14 sq.

573 III. With respect to the union of matter and form, it is sufficient to have noted: For validity, the union which we described in the treatise on the Sacraments in general suffices (n. 22). With respect to liceity, these words of the Roman Ritual are to be observed: "While the priest anoints the eyes, ears, and other members of the body which are paired, let him take care that, in anointing one of them, he does not complete the form of the Sacrament before he has anointed both members of this kind."[1]

[1] Title V, cap. 1, n. 18.

Scholion. On the Special Character of Extreme Unction

574 Extreme Unction is primarily a sacrament of the living, secondarily a sacrament of the dead (St. Alphonsus, VI, 731). I said:

I. Extreme Unction is primarily a sacrament of the living, that is, in itself and primarily it is ordered to second grace, or to the increase of grace. For 1. St. James and the Council of Trent set forth first grace as an effect of Extreme Unction only conditionally; by this it is suggested that the said sacrament is not primarily ordered to that effect; this being posited, it remains that we say that it is primarily ordered to second grace, that is, to the increase of grace. 2. If Extreme Unction were primarily ordered to conferring grace, and not to the increase of grace, the sacrament of Penance would not be, for all those who have fallen after Baptism, a necessary means of salvation to be employed in fact or in desire. It would be sufficient for the sick to have recourse to Extreme Unction. The Roman Catechism teaches the same: "For this sacrament was not instituted in the first place for the remission of graver crimes, but Baptism alone and Penance by their own power effect this."[1]

II. Extreme Unction is secondarily a sacrament of the dead, that is, also in itself, but only secondarily, it is ordered to first grace. I said in itself; for St. James[2] and Trent,[3] whose words are cited in the note, because they expressly state that sins are remitted through Extreme Unction, seem to suggest that the said sacrament by its nature is ordered also to that effect. There is added the fact that the form of the sacrament also expresses the remission of sins, indeed expresses that alone. I said only secondarily; this follows from the things by which we proved that Extreme Unction is primarily ordered to second grace. Therefore this sacrament differs from the other sacraments of the living, which confer first grace only accidentally.

Corollary I. But if you ask further what, with respect to the remission of mortal sins, those words "in itself, but secondarily" imply when Extreme Unction is being discussed, and what those words "accidentally" imply when the other sacraments of the living are being treated, it must be said thus: If someone constituted in mortal sin receives a sacrament of the living, Christ in Extreme Unction intends to infuse sanctifying grace in order to remit sin; while in the other sacraments of the living He intends to infuse sanctifying grace for another end proper to each sacrament.

Corollary II. As to the mode by which Extreme Unction remits sins, it must be said that mortal sins are remitted directly; concerning venial sins, it is disputed whether they are remitted directly or indirectly (p. 210).

[1] Part 2, c. 6, q. 14.

[2] "If," he says, "he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him" (James 5:15).

[3] "It wipes away offenses, if there are any to be expiated, and the remains of sin" (Session 14, cap. 2).

Part III. On the Effects of Extreme Unction

575 The primary effect, to which all the other effects are reduced, is disputed. According to the Scotists, Extreme Unction is ordered to the final remission of venial sins in the dying person who is now incapable of helping himself; from this remission of venial sins follows the relief of sorrow and sluggishness, which are effects of sin. They argue from the form of the sacrament, which seems directly destructive of sin. According to St. Thomas (Supplement, q. 30, a. 1) and St. Alphonsus (VI, 721, 731), it is ordered primarily to helping and strengthening the soul of the sick person, or to healing his spiritual infirmity, which is left in us from original and actual sin and which must especially be healed in the last struggle. But sins are remitted secondarily, namely insofar as they obstruct spiritual strengthening. This opinion is supported by the words of St. James, who seems to mention the remission of sins as a secondary effect: "And the prayer of faith shall save the sick man, and the Lord shall raise him up; and if he be in sins, they shall be forgiven him."[1] In particular, the following are enumerated:

I. Sanctifying grace, in itself and primarily second grace, or the increase of grace; likewise in itself but secondarily first grace, as follows from the things said above (n. 574).

II. Sacramental grace, which consists in this, that the sanctifying grace which Extreme Unction increases is ordered to this: that the sick person not be cast down by illness, but on the contrary be strengthened in illness, and, having been strengthened, vigorously fight against the last temptations and readily bear the final pains; and it brings with itself a right to actual graces to be received in order to those effects. Now, that the sacramental grace of this sacrament is what we have described is supported first by these words of St. James: "And the Lord shall raise him up," that is, shall stir him up and strengthen him.[2] Then the Council of Florence says: "The effect of this sacrament is the healing of the mind and, insofar as it is expedient, also of the body."[3] And the Council of Trent says: "Our most merciful Redeemer, who wished that at every time there be provided for His servants salutary remedies against all the weapons of all enemies, just as in the other sacraments He prepared the greatest helps by which Christians could preserve themselves whole, while they lived, from every graver harm of the spirit, so by the Sacrament of Extreme Unction He fortified the end of life as by a certain strongest protection. For although our adversary seeks and seizes occasions throughout the whole of life so that he may in any way be able to devour our souls, nevertheless there is no time at which he more vehemently strains every nerve of his cunning to destroy us utterly and, if he can, to disturb us even from confidence in the divine mercy, than when he perceives that the end of life is impending for us."[4] Tradition is added, whose testimonies Kern brings forward (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 30, a. 1, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 731).[5]

III. The remission of mortal sins; this is clearly gathered from the words of St. James and Trent cited above (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 30, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, VI, 731). It is required, however, that the sick person be attrite, at least habitually. But this also suffices, since that cannot be demanded which already of itself remits mortal sins, namely contrition.

IV. The remission of venial sins. For St. James and the Council of Trent do not distinguish between mortal and venial sins. Besides, there is no reason to exclude venial sins; indeed, since lesser offenses are more easily remitted, there is rather reason to include them. Nevertheless they are not remitted unless the sick person is at least habitually attrite for them.

V. The remains of sins, as the Council of Trent cited above expressly states (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 30, a. 1, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 731). "But the remains of sin here are not called dispositions left from acts, which are certain begun habits, but a certain spiritual weakness existing in the mind itself; when it has been removed, even if the same habits or dispositions remain, the mind cannot be inclined to sin in the same way" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.; St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

VI. The remission of punishments, which by some is also referred to the remains of sins of which we have just spoken, more or less fully according to the disposition of the recipient. Thus it is taught not improbably: for since the end of this sacrament is also the consummation of the Christian life, as the Council of Trent speaks,[6] or the final disposition of the soul so that it may enter glory, it also remits temporal punishment; but, because Extreme Unction works by way of medicine, whose effect depends on the disposition of the subject, a greater or lesser remission of punishment is given according as the disposition of the subject is better or less good.

VII. Health of the body. This is clear both from the words of the Council of Florence cited above and from the Council of Trent, according to which the anointed person "sometimes obtains health of body, where it is expedient for the salvation of the soul."[7] Besides, note:

1. Extreme Unction does not confer health of body if it is not expedient for the salvation of the soul. "The operative reason," says St. Thomas, "never induces a secondary effect except insofar as it is expedient for the principal effect; therefore from this sacrament bodily healing does not always follow, but when it is expedient for spiritual healing" (Supplement, q. 30, a. 2). But it is disputed whether this sacrament confers health whenever it is expedient for the soul, or only sometimes, that is, according to the order of divine wisdom and providence, as is said. Some deny that it always produces that effect whenever it profits the soul. They deduce that this happens only sometimes from the words of the Council of Trent cited above. Others teach the contrary, and think that the sense of the words of the Council of Trent is this: "sometimes, namely, where it is expedient for the salvation of the soul."

2. Extreme Unction confers health not by way of miracle, but insofar as spiritual strengthening overflows into the body, and brings with it a right that the means of recovering health be directed by the special Providence of God. "The unction," as the Council of Trent teaches, "raises up and confirms the soul of the sick person, exciting in him great confidence in the divine mercy; by this confidence the sick person, being relieved, bears the inconveniences and labors of illness more lightly, resists more easily the temptations of the devil lying in wait for his heel, and sometimes obtains health of body, where it is expedient for the salvation of the soul."[8] And St. Thomas teaches that in Extreme Unction grace is conferred "not only so that it may remove guilt, but also the remains of guilt and the infirmity of the body" (Supplement, q. 29, a. 5), so that healing according to the holy Doctor must be called an effect of the grace conferred. Hence they are deprived of the aforesaid effect who defer reception of the sacrament so long that health cannot be expected without a miracle (St. Alphonsus, VI, 714).

[1] James 5:15.

[2] James 5:15.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 700.

[4] Session XIV, De extrema unctione, Prooemium.

[5] Op. cit., p. 238.

[6] Session XIV, doctrine on the Sacrament of Extreme Unction.

[7] Session XIV, De extrema unctione, cap. 2.

[8] Loc. cit.

Part IV. On the Necessity of Extreme Unction

576 I. Necessity of means must be denied, both because of canon 944, which denies it, and because of the reasons for which we denied the necessity of means of Confirmation (n. 116).

577 II. Necessity of precept. 1. There is an obligation of receiving Extreme Unction. This is deduced first from canon 944: "It is lawful for no one ... to neglect it." Then he who neglects a special means, instituted by Christ, by which the sick person is fortified and strengthened in those most serious moments of life on which eternity proximately depends, seems to sin against charity toward himself.[1]

2. The obligation is quite probably only light. I understand the obligation in itself, because one who neglects Extreme Unction can accidentally sin gravely, for example by reason of scandal or contempt.[2] But in itself a grave obligation is quite probably lacking. The reason is that such an obligation is not established either from the nature of this sacrament, "which is not necessary for salvation, but only useful" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 733), or from a positive precept, because it is not clear that the words of St. James, "let him bring in the priests," are to be understood of a precept and not only of counsel; nor from the precept of charity toward oneself, "for charity does not oblige under grave precept to that which is better" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). Finally, the Code does not settle this controversy, neither insofar as it concerns divine law, which it does not intend to interpret,[3] nor insofar as the ecclesiastical Legislator imposes a grave precept in canon 944. If he had intended that, he would certainly have used clearer and weightier words.

Objection. The Council of Trent declares: "Now, as regards the prescription of those who ought both to receive and to minister this sacrament," etc.

Response. The Council does not intend to urge the obligation of reception, but rather to signify to whom the reception and to whom the ministration of the sacrament belongs.

[1] Cf. Council of Trent, session 14, De sacramento extremae unctionis, at the beginning and cap. 2.

[2] Cf. Council of Trent, loc. cit., cap. 3.

[3] Cf. Preface.

Dissertation II. On the Ministration of Extreme Unction

578 I. The ministering person. 1. Every priest, and only a priest, validly administers Extreme Unction (canon 938, § 1). This is of faith from the Council of Trent.[1] It can, moreover, as is clear from the Tradition and practice of the Church, be ministered both by one and by several priests.[2] But if several minister the sacrament, each should take care that he himself pronounce the respective form for the matter applied by himself. In the Latin Church it must be ministered by one alone.

But if the minister fails while ministering, and another is immediately present, the latter should continue where the other stopped. If a longer delay, for example a quarter of an hour, has intervened, the other should repeat conditionally the anointings performed by the first, namely because of doubt whether the union which perhaps is required between the particular anointings is present; then he should complete the others (St. Alphonsus, VI, 724).

Note. A priest cannot validly confer Extreme Unction on himself, as is deduced from the constant tradition and usage of the Church (n. 21).

2. The Ordinary and the parish priest of the place in which the sick person is staying licitly minister this sacrament; for that reason they are called the ordinary ministers of Extreme Unction. Besides, in a case of necessity, and likewise with the permission, either given or reasonably presumed, of the same parish priest or local Ordinary, any other priest can minister this sacrament (canon 938, § 2). In addition, the prescriptions of canons 397, 3°, and 514, §§ 1-3, remain firm; see these in the treatise on the Holy Eucharist, n. 164.

[1] Session 14, De sacramento extremae unctionis, canon 4.

[2] In the Greek Church Extreme Unction is conferred by seven, or at least by three, priests (Papp-Szilagyi, Enchiridion iuris ecclesiastici orientalis, p. 2, § 81). Cf. Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, March 23, 1844 (Collectio, n. 818).

579 II. Obligation of ministering. 1. The ordinary minister is bound: 1. from justice and under grave obligation to minister Extreme Unction to subjects who ask for it, and indeed in good time; 2. under grave obligation to use prudent diligence so that subjects who are negligent about salvation may be warned in good time (St. Alphonsus, VI, 714, 729; cf. canon 939). As to the extent to which the ordinary minister is bound even with danger to life, see the treatise on the Sacraments in general, n. 34. Besides, these words apply to him before others: "With every zeal and diligence care must be taken that the sick receive it while they are fully in possession of themselves" (canon 944).

2. Any priest in a case of necessity is bound from charity to procure Extreme Unction for a sick person (canon 939). A case of necessity as taken here is already present if the ordinary minister is lacking and there is danger in delay. But the obligation in itself is light; accidentally it is grave if either the reason of grave scandal is added, or the sick person is probably in the state of mortal sin and will not be saved securely enough by confession, for example because he is deprived of the senses. That is, for receiving Extreme Unction fruitfully, attrition suffices, while for confession accusation is also required (St. Alphonsus, VI, 729).

3. Those who from charity or piety are bound to provide for the salvation of the sick person are likewise, in themselves, bound under light obligation to take care that the sick person receive Extreme Unction; under grave obligation in the case in which other priests are bound under grave obligation to minister it, as was explained under 2.

580 III. Things to be observed in ministering. 1. The Oil of Extreme Unction should be carried to the sick in the simple manner prescribed by the Roman Ritual,[1] not solemnly with surplice and lights,[2] unless the Holy Eucharist is carried at the same time. But if the latter is not carried at the same time, the minister, for example the sacristan, or the priest himself, should carry the surplice with him.

2. In the ministration itself, the following are prescribed under grave obligation: 1. sacred vestments, namely surplice and stole; to omit either is quite probably only venial; 2. the prayers assigned by the Ritual for the priest. Urgent necessity excuses from the foregoing.

3. It is prescribed under light obligation that a minister be used, and that he be male. If a male is lacking, a woman seems able to answer.

4. A lighted candle seems to be only of counsel, unless the priest needs it, since it is said to be lit "so that it may provide light to the one anointing." Likewise it seems to be counsel rather than a true precept that those standing by recite the Penitential Psalms and the Litanies. Finally, it is not established that it is prescribed under sin that, contrary to ancient custom, Extreme Unction be ministered after Viaticum (St. Alphonsus, VI, 716, 726-728).

[1] Title V, cap. 1, n. 13, and cap. 2, n. 2.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, January 23, 1606, n. 106.

Dissertation III. On the Reception of Extreme Unction

We must speak first of the person receiving, then of the manner of receiving Extreme Unction, and finally of the repeated reception of Extreme Unction.

Part I. On the Person Receiving

581 I. In order that someone be capable of receiving Extreme Unction, it is required: 1. that he be baptized; 2. that he be or have been in possession of reason; 3. that his health be gravely afflicted, and indeed at least to that degree from which death not rarely follows within a time not very long; but such a degree also suffices, at least for validity. It is said:

1. That he be baptized (cf. n. 38).

2. That he be or have been in possession of reason; hence canon 940, § 1 indeed states that Extreme Unction cannot be given except after the use of reason has been attained, but does not add that actual or habitual use of reason is required.[1] The reason seems to be that the gravely sick person who neither has nor has had the use of reason is, and was, and will be, at least in himself, incapable of actual strengthening, to which the sacramental grace of Extreme Unction gives a right (St. Alphonsus, VI, 718). I said "and will be incapable," as a perpetually insane person. I said "and will be, at least in himself, incapable," as a gravely sick infant, who in himself will either recover or die before the use of reason, while accidentally it will happen that he is going to prolong the grave illness until he will attain the use of reason, and thus will be capable of spiritual strengthening. Therefore little children and the perpetually insane cannot be anointed. But adults who have lucid intervals, or who at least were not perpetually insane, are capable; likewise those who are delirious;[2] likewise children as soon as they have reached the use of reason (St. Alphonsus, VI, 720).

In doubt whether the sick person has attained the use of reason - understand: whether he either enjoys the use of reason or at some time enjoyed its use - the sacrament should be ministered conditionally (canon 941), for example: "if you are capable."

Question. Is one who has never sinned personally capable of Extreme Unction?

Response. It seems that it must be affirmed, because he is capable of the primary effect of the sacrament, that is, strengthening of soul. That it is not required that someone have sinned after Baptism follows from the fact that the Holy Office[3] and the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide[4] responded that a pagan who becomes gravely sick immediately after receiving Baptism is to be anointed.

It is disputed whether the Blessed Virgin Mary was capable of Extreme Unction. It seems that it must be denied, because Extreme Unction strengthens by way of spiritual medication. Hence the Council of Florence, as we have already noted, teaches: "The effect of this Sacrament is the healing of the mind." But the Blessed Virgin Mary was incapable of strengthening of this kind.

3. That health be gravely afflicted, and indeed at least to that degree from which death not rarely follows within a time not very long; but such a degree also suffices, at least for validity. I said:

a) That health be gravely afflicted, whether from disease taken in the stricter sense, or from a similar cause, for example from a wound, from difficult childbirth, from poison swallowed, or from old age. That this is required is proved first by the words cited above of St. James, who advises the sick person to summon the priests, who will save him and comfort his depressed spirit; these things you would scarcely apply to one suffering from a slight illness. Then Benedict XIV in the Bull Ex quo primum, § 46, teaches that Extreme Unction is to be ministered "only to faithful persons gravely sick." Then the Council of Trent teaches that this sacrament was instituted by Christ so that He might "fortify the end of life as by a certain strongest protection" (p. 437). Finally, the whole rite of Extreme Unction does this one thing, that it commends to the divine mercy the sick person constituted in danger of death[5] (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 32, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 713, dub. 2).

b) That health be afflicted at least to that degree from which death not rarely follows within a time not very long, or at least to that degree that death not very remote must be feared. This is deduced from the fact that several ecclesiastical documents expressly state that Extreme Unction is not to be conferred except on those who are in danger of death or whose death is feared. Thus, for example, canon 940, § 1: "Extreme Unction cannot be given except to a faithful person who, after attaining the use of reason, is in danger of death by reason of infirmity or old age." Likewise the decree of Eugene IV in the Instruction to the Armenians: "This sacrament must not be given except to a sick person whose death is feared." But these things in their obvious sense signify the state described by us (St. Thomas, loc. cit.; St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

c) Such a degree also suffices, at least for validity. This is drawn from the fact that the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide responded[6] "Affirmatively" to the question: "Sometimes Missionaries encounter someone suffering from hectic fever, that is, a kind of consumption, or from another illness, who, experience being the guide, is going to live for several more months, but will die within the year: it is asked whether in such a case the Missionary can minister Viaticum and Extreme Unction to him, because when the time of receiving them is actually at hand, the Missionary will not be able to be present in the same place, either because of great distance or because of another impediment." I said at least for validity, because from the response cited it does not follow that, in itself or in ordinary circumstances, the sacrament is licitly conferred in a case in which death is judged to be fairly distant; therefore further observe: as soon as the state just described is present, the sacrament is indeed conferred validly; but with respect to liceity, take the following:

a) If death is judged to be fairly far away, as in the case just set forth and resolved by the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, one may doubt whether the sacrament is already in itself licitly conferred.

b) If death is indeed judged to be more at hand, but not yet imminent, the sacrament is licitly conferred, although its conferral can be deferred.

c) If death seems imminent, Extreme Unction must be conferred;[7] nor is it permitted to wait until the sick person begins to lack the full use of reason. "The reason," says St. Alphonsus, "is that thus he is deprived of the richer fruit which he would have received if he had received the sacrament while he was in possession of reason, since then he would have disposed himself more for it. Likewise because he is deprived of spiritual strength for resisting the devil and for bearing the inconveniences of illness. Likewise because, if the sick person perhaps were in mortal sin and had received the sacrament while in possession of reason, by the help of attrition he perhaps would have obtained grace, of which otherwise he is deprived. Finally, because by virtue of this sacrament he perhaps would have obtained health of body, if it had been conferred at a suitable time; for although this sacrament by a certain supernatural power also works bodily health if it is expedient for the salvation of the soul, as Trent says, nevertheless it does not work by way of miracle, but in a certain ordinary way, namely by helping natural causes, as the Doctors commonly say. All these things at least when taken together seem to bring grave harm to the sick person" (VI, 714). Hence canon 944: "With every zeal and diligence care must be taken that the sick receive it while they are fully in possession of themselves." And the Roman Catechism says: "They sin most gravely who are accustomed to observe that time for anointing the sick person when, all hope of recovery now having been lost, he begins to lack life and senses."[8]

[1] Cf. Roman Ritual, title V, cap. 1, n. 8.

[2] Cf. Roman Ritual, loc. cit., n. 11.

[3] May 10, 1703 (Collectio, n. 256, ad 8).

[4] September 26, 1821 (Collectio, n. 768).

[5] Kern, op. cit., p. 294.

[6] February 20, 1801 (Collectio, n. 651).

[7] Cf. Council of Trent, session 14, De extrema unctione, Prooemium and cap. 3; Roman Ritual, title V, cap. 1, n. 5.

[8] Part 2, cap. 6, n. 9.

582 Corollary I. Extreme Unction cannot be conferred on those whose death is imminent from a merely external cause, for example "on those about to enter battle, or about to undertake navigation, or a journey, or other dangers, or on criminals soon to be punished with the final penalty."[1] Nor can it be ministered when the danger of death is not yet present but will arise shortly, for example from the dangerous surgical operation itself about to be undergone, or from the difficult childbirth itself about to follow; otherwise, if someone is already actually in danger.

Corollary II. A woman in childbirth who "labors in childbirth with only common pains will indeed not be able to be anointed, even if she gives birth for the first time, or at another time had been in danger of death; because then she is not yet laboring under a dangerous infirmity" ... "But otherwise, if the woman has already begun to be distressed by very grave torments, so that she is already actually in proximate danger of death; because then she is truly already dangerously sick" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 713, dub. 3). The old cannot be anointed because of advanced age alone; otherwise if there is added such weakness of the vegetative functions that health must be called gravely afflicted. Hence canon 940, § 1 speaks of old age by reason of which someone is in danger of death. And the Roman Ritual states: "Extreme Unction is to be ministered to those who fail because of old age and seem day by day about to die, even without another infirmity."[2]

Those about to undergo a dangerous operation, but not yet constituted in danger of death, cannot be anointed before the operation; nor can the same be anointed as soon as they have been deprived of the senses by chloroform, unless the state of the sick person induced by the chloroform is regarded as gravely dangerous. If the disease is lethal, and physicians can avert the danger of death by the operation to follow, the sick person can be anointed if he does not wish to undergo the operation; if he wishes to suffer it, the matter seems doubtful.

But if it is rightly feared that someone, for example a person condemned to death, is going to die from fear, he is certainly validly anointed if fear has so afflicted his health that, even if the fear vanished, nevertheless grave danger would persist. Otherwise he seems able to be anointed only doubtfully validly, because it is doubted whether fear can really be called a disease.

Corollary III. A merely estimated danger of death does not suffice; for the things by which we proved that danger of death is required, in their obvious sense, signify a truly existing danger and not merely an estimated one. I add these things: suppose that someone lying on the ground, according to bystanders, is in danger of death and is anointed by a priest. A physician arrives and declares that he is well, but completely drunk. Who would say that he had been validly anointed?

Corollary IV. When it is doubted whether the sick person is really in danger of death, or whether he is dead, this sacrament should be ministered conditionally (canon 941). As to the extent to which one apparently dead can be conditionally absolved and anointed, this has been set forth in the treatise on Penance, n. 477.

[1] Roman Ritual, title V, c. 1, n. 9.

[2] Title V, cap. 1, n. 5.

583 II. Once the requisites for the capacity of receiving Extreme Unction have been posited, it must be given, and indeed absolutely, not only to those who here and now ask for it, but also "to sick persons who, when they were in possession of their mind, asked for it at least implicitly or would probably have asked for it, even if afterwards they lost the senses or the use of reason" (canon 943).[1] But "this sacrament is not to be conferred on those who, impenitent, contumaciously persevere in manifest mortal sin; but if this is doubtful, it is to be conferred conditionally" (canon 942). It is said:

1. They asked for it at least implicitly; these words certainly comprehend those who had, and did not retract, an implicit will or intention in the stricter sense, for example the will of dying as a Christian (p. 33). With respect to implicit intention in the most general sense - for example the will of employing the means of salvation - the matter seems doubtful and not settled by the Code (p. 33).
2. Or would probably have asked for it; for one who, in possession of himself, would probably ask for Extreme Unction is presumed to have had, and not retracted, an explicit will or intention of receiving Extreme Unction, or at least an implicit intention in the stricter sense.
3. This sacrament is not to be conferred on those who contumaciously persevere in manifest mortal sin.

What if someone rejected the priest up to the deprivation of the senses?

Response 1. If he did not certainly reject him from an evil will, but perhaps because he was not sufficiently conscious of the danger, with also an indifferent spirit being added, Extreme Unction can be conferred.

Response 2. If he certainly rejected the priest from an evil will, considering the reverence due to the sacrament, it is better, as it seems, not to anoint him, unless the deprivation of the senses endures longer, or the dying person gives a sign which with some probability can be regarded as a declaration of a changed will.

4. But if this, that is, contumacy, is doubtful, it is to be conferred conditionally, namely, considering the more obvious sense, under the condition: "If you are now not contumaciously persevering in mortal sin." Nevertheless, it can seem to someone that this is the sense of the canon: "If you are doubtful about the contumacy, the sacrament is to be conferred conditionally," the determination of the condition being left undecided; this being posited, the canon does not prevent the condition "if you are capable," etc., from being added. Besides, it is certainly lawful to minister the sacrament "according to the mind of the Church."

[1] Roman Ritual, title V, cap. 1, n. 11.

Scholion. On the Anointing of Baptized Non-Catholics

584 We speak of baptized non-Catholics who are in good faith, or at least not certainly in bad faith. Now:

I. Outside the danger of death, baptized non-Catholics cannot licitly be anointed, according to what was said in the treatise on Penance (n. 478).

II. In danger of death. We distinguish between non-Catholics who admit Extreme Unction and those who reject it.

1. Those who admit Extreme Unction, as for example schismatics, can be anointed as follows:

a) If they are already deprived of the senses, scandal having been removed, they can be anointed according to what was set forth in the treatise on Penance (n. 478).

b) If they are not deprived of the senses, in themselves they cannot be anointed; accidentally they seem able to be anointed according as we spoke about the granting of absolution (n. 478).

2. Those who reject Extreme Unction should not be anointed; nevertheless I would not condemn one who conditionally anoints them, according to what was said in the treatise on Penance (n. 478).

Corollary I. In doubt whether the person to be anointed is baptized, or validly baptized, first he must be baptized or rebaptized conditionally.

Corollary II. Prudence, considering the common good, can readily prohibit a non-Catholic from being anointed. Besides, as we already noted in the treatise on Penance, one who assists a dying non-Catholic should strive to bring him to acts of contrition and charity, so that he may be saved more securely.

Corollary III. Having set forth those things which regard the subject of Extreme Unction, it is useful to state briefly to which dying persons deprived of the senses Extreme Unction can be conferred. Now it can be conferred: 1. on Catholics, even if they have not fulfilled religious duties or have been deprived of the senses in the act of sin; 2. on those whom, after an examination has been made if the occasion allows, you suspect with some probability to be Catholics; 3. on apostates; 4. on heretics who admit Extreme Unction, or have shown an inclination toward the Catholic Church; likewise, others add, on those who do not admit Extreme Unction and have not shown the said inclination, unless, however, prudence prohibits them from being anointed.

From those enumerated, only those are excepted who here and now certainly persevere contumaciously in mortal sin.

Part II. On the Manner of Receiving Extreme Unction

585 With respect to both the valid and licit reception of Extreme Unction, we refer to those things which we noted in the treatise on the Sacraments in general. It is useful, however, to complete in a few words those things which regard licit reception. Now:

I. For licit reception the state of grace is required. For the reverence due to the sacrament requires a state which corresponds to the end to which it is primarily ordered. But Extreme Unction is primarily ordered to increasing grace. Therefore the state of grace must already be present. If, however, someone attrite and in good faith receives the sacrament, he recovers grace (n. 6).

II. The state of grace can be recovered, by one who is in mortal sin, by reason of Extreme Unction either through confession or through perfect contrition; but by reason of Communion, if this is placed before Extreme Unction, it must be recovered through confession (n. 43). But Communion - although at most only under light obligation - is to be placed before Extreme Unction, according to these words of the Roman Ritual: "From the general custom of the Church it is to be observed that, if time and the condition of the sick person permit, the Sacraments of Penance and Eucharist be given to the sick before Extreme Unction"[1] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 716).

Note 1. If the one to be anointed is excommunicated, he should be freed from excommunication before he is absolved from sins and given holy Communion and Extreme Unction.

Note 2. If the sick person suffers from frenzy or insanity, care must be taken that he do nothing against the reverence of the sacrament, for example, if necessary, by binding or firmly holding the sick person (St. Alphonsus, VI, 732).

[1] Title V, cap. 1, n. 2.

Part III. On the Repeated Reception of Extreme Unction

586 The Council of Trent[1] declares: "But if the sick recover after receiving this Unction, they will be able to be helped again by the aid of this Sacrament when they fall into another like danger of life." And canon 940, § 2 says: "In the same infirmity this sacrament cannot be repeated, unless the sick person after receiving the Unction has recovered and has fallen into another danger of life." So also the Roman Ritual.[2] With these things premised, I say:

I. Extreme Unction can be repeated in another infirmity; in other words, it can be repeated: 1. as often as someone after an infirmity has been driven out, or after health has been recovered, is again dangerously sick; 2. as often as in the same infirmity the danger of death has vanished and afterwards arises again (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 33, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 715). This follows from the Council of Trent and canon 940, § 2 cited above. The reason is that Extreme Unction was instituted precisely for the danger of death; hence it can at least then be repeated when the danger is repeated.

Question. Can Extreme Unction be repeated if a grave danger is increased, or if, while a danger endures, another disparate danger is added?

Response. It seems that it must be altogether denied; for the Council of Trent above and canon 940, § 2 require that the sick person, after he has recovered, become gravely sick again. Some indeed permit Extreme Unction to be repeated if the sick person, after the same grave danger has endured for a long time, is in much graver danger. They allege as reason that in this hypothesis the danger, according to common estimation, is morally considered another danger. But even this opinion cannot be reconciled with the words of the Council of Trent and the cited canon.

Objection. Canon 940, § 2 declares: "In the same infirmity this sacrament cannot be repeated." But in the hypothesis posited a new infirmity or new danger is added.

Response. From the cited words of the Council of Trent, and likewise from the words of the canon which follow the opposed words, it follows that by "the same infirmity" is understood the same lethal condition of the sick person; this condition is aggravated by a new infirmity or new danger. Meanwhile the sacrament continues to confer helps against the new illness.

Corollary. As often as Extreme Unction according to what has been said is licitly repeated, so often also it must be repeated. This seems to be commonly admitted if someone after recovering health becomes dangerously sick again; not so if in the same illness the danger of death vanished and afterwards arises again. But since the obligation is founded, as it were, in the danger of life, likewise the obligation of repeating seems to be present as often as the danger is repeated.

II. Extreme Unction cannot licitly be repeated in the same infirmity; whether it can validly be repeated is doubtful. Kern[3] and others affirm, especially because for several centuries in a great part of the Church there prevailed the use of repeating the sacrament seven times[4] in the same danger. Others deny or doubt; and to the argument of their adversaries they respond that it seems doubtful whether the said repetition of which Kern speaks was regarded as a repetition of the sacrament. That is, according to some,[5] all the anointings taken together were regarded as one sacrament; according to others,[6] the repeated anointings, that is, those which followed the first ministration, were like sacramentals strengthened by liturgical prayers.

Question. Does a most grave cause excuse from the prohibition, for example if someone after receiving Extreme Unction has certainly or probably sinned gravely, and, not yet having confessed, is deprived of the senses?

Response. I think that in the proposed case the sacrament can be repeated conditionally, namely because in this way provision is made for the salvation of the dying person much more securely than through absolution.

III. In doubt whether the danger was absent, a sick person who again becomes gravely sick can be anointed again, and indeed conditionally if grave doubt persists; absolutely if it is sufficiently established that the danger was absent. Nevertheless, commonly it will not be sufficiently established unless the sick person has been better for a notable time, for example for several weeks (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 715).

Practical Note.

[1] Session 14, De extrema unctione, cap. 3.

[2] Title V, cap. 1, n. 8.

[3] Op. cit., p. 338 sq.

[4] That is, here the anointings were repeated for seven continuous days; there seven priests, one after another, performed the complete sacramental rite.

[5] Schmid, in Zeitschrift fur katholische Theologie, t. XXV, p. 258 sq.

[6] De Smet, in Collationes Brugenses, 1910, p. 192 sq.

587 It is useful to note two practical things:

I. Especially through Extreme Unction provision is made for the salvation of the dying person, above all of one deprived of the senses. That is: 1. attrition suffices for Extreme Unction; for Penance confession is also required; 2. habitual attrition suffices for Extreme Unction; the same cannot be said quite so absolutely about Penance (n. 41); 3. Extreme Unction received without attrition can revive; Penance received in that way is received invalidly, so that there can be no question of reviviscence.

II. Care must be taken that Extreme Unction be given in good time, both so that the sick person may sooner receive the spiritual fruits of the sacrament, and so that, if it is expedient for the soul, he may also recover bodily health.

Treatise VII. On Order

(St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 34-40; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, lib. VI, n. 734-830; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 17.)[1]

[1] Cf. Benedict XIV, De Synodo dioecesana, lib. 8, c. 9-11 and lib. 12, c. 3 and 4; Many, De sacra ordinatione; Gasparri, De sacra ordinatione; Wernz-Vidal, Ius canonicum, t. V; Pesch, Praelectiones dogmaticae de Ordine.

588 I. By the institution of Christ there exists in the Church a twofold state, namely that of clerics and that of lay persons. Now "those who have been assigned to the divine ministries by at least the first tonsure are called clerics" (canon 108, § 1).

II. Clerics "are not all in the same grade, but among them there is a sacred hierarchy in which some are subordinated to others" (canon 108, § 2). The aforesaid hierarchy is called the hierarchy of Order.[1]

III. The distinct grades of the hierarchy of Order are counted as eight from the Council of Trent,[2] namely Porter, Lector, Exorcist, Acolyte, Subdiaconate, Diaconate, Presbyterate, and Episcopate.[3]

1. "Porter is the order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of opening and closing the door of the church, and of admitting the worthy and excluding the unworthy" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 735).
2. "Lector is the order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of reading psalms and lessons from the pulpit in church, and of catechizing or instructing the people in matters of faith" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
3. "Exorcist is the order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of casting out demons" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
4. "Acolyte is the order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of serving the subdeacon in solemn Mass, by lighting candles, preparing and handing to him the cruets of wine and water" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
5. "Subdiaconate is the order by which there is conferred upon someone the power of serving the deacon in solemn Mass and solemnly chanting the Epistle" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
6. "Diaconate is the order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of immediately assisting the presbyter in solemn Mass and solemnly chanting the Gospel" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
7. "Presbyterate is the order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of consecrating the Body and Blood of Christ, and also of absolving from sins and feeding subjects by work and doctrine" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
8. "Episcopate is the order by which there is conferred upon someone a special power of confirming the faithful and ordaining the ministers of the sacraments, taking 'ministers' more broadly, that is, not only for those who confect the sacraments, but also for those who minister by office to those confecting them, and also of consecrating things pertaining to divine worship" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 735).

a) Tonsure is not an order, but a preparation for them, or "it is a solemn ecclesiastical rite, consisting in a slight cutting of the hair with certain words, celebrated by a suitable minister, signifying by the institution of the Church that a baptized male is transferred from the lay state into the lot of the Lord and the clerical state" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

b) Episcopate and Presbyterate are often designated by the one name of Priesthood; hence Bishops are called priests of the first order, presbyters priests of the second order. Therefore many enumerate only seven orders. Now the priesthood, which, as was said, includes Episcopate and Presbyterate, the Diaconate, and the Subdiaconate are called major or sacred Orders; the others are called minor Orders.

c) "In the following canons," so says canon 949, "by the name of major or sacred orders are understood presbyterate, diaconate, subdiaconate; but by the name of minor orders, acolytate, exorcistate, lectorate, porterate." And canon 950 says: "In law the words 'to ordain,' 'order,' 'ordination,' 'sacred ordination,' comprehend besides episcopal consecration the orders enumerated in canon 949 and the first tonsure itself, unless something else is drawn from the nature of the matter or from the context of the words."

IV. Episcopate, Presbyterate, and Diaconate are of divine institution. But the Episcopate by divine law is a grade distinct from the Presbyterate and superior to it.[4] Subdiaconate and the minor orders do not seem to be of divine institution.

1. That the Episcopate and Presbyterate, together with the office of certain ministers, are of divine institution, the Council of Trent defined in these words: "If anyone says that in the Catholic Church there is not a hierarchy instituted by divine ordination, which consists of Bishops, Presbyters, and Ministers, let him be anathema."[5] Canon 108, § 3 agrees.
2. That Bishops are superior to presbyters, the Council of Trent likewise teaches, although it does not expressly say "by divine law": "If anyone says that Bishops are not superior to Presbyters, or that they do not have the power of confirming and ordaining, or that the power which they have is common to them with Presbyters, let him be anathema."[6]
3. That the minor orders are not of divine institution is proved especially from this, that in the most ancient documents, where the different grades of the Hierarchy are discussed, only Episcopate, Presbyterate, and Diaconate are enumerated.[7]

With these things premised, we shall speak first of Order considered in itself, then of its ministration, then of the reception of Order, and finally of certain matters which regard both ministration and reception.

[1] The ecclesiastical hierarchy taken generally is: the body of clerics who, according to various grades, enjoy sacred power in the Church. It is distinguished into the hierarchy of Order and the hierarchy of Jurisdiction, according as the sacred power concerns the ministry of divine worship, for example the dispensation of the sacraments, etc., or the governance of the faithful.

[2] Session 23, canons 2 and 4.

[3] Among the Greeks only four Orders are conferred: two major, namely Priesthood and Diaconate, and two minor, namely Subdiaconate and Lectorate. But the Maronites have the order of Cantorate, to which tonsure is attached; and the Armenians have four minor orders just as the Latins do.

[4] Bishops are superior to presbyters both by reason of teaching and governance and by reason of Order. The first is proved in the treatise on the Church; the second is discussed here.

[5] Session 23, canon 6.

[6] Session 23, canon 7.

[7] Gasparri, De sacra ordinatione, n. 41.

Dissertation I. On Order Considered in Itself

Part I. On the Existence of the Sacrament of Order

589 Here dogmatic theologians first inquire whether Order, taken generally, is a sacrament; then to which grades the character of a sacrament belongs. Now:

I. Order, or sacred Ordination, is a true and properly so-called sacrament of the New Law; this proposition is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that Order, or sacred Ordination, is not truly and properly a sacrament instituted by Christ the Lord, or that it is a certain human fiction devised by men unskilled in ecclesiastical matters, or that it is only a certain rite of choosing ministers of the Word of God and of the Sacraments, let him be anathema."[1]

II. With respect to the diverse grades of Order, the character of a sacrament belongs to the Presbyterate and Diaconate, and very probably to the Episcopate; the Subdiaconate more probably, and the minor Orders almost certainly, are not sacraments. It is said:

1. Presbyterate is a sacrament. This is proximate to faith from these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that through sacred Ordination the Holy Spirit is not given, and that therefore Bishops say in vain: Receive the Holy Spirit; or that through it a character is not imprinted; or that he who was once a priest can become a layman again, let him be anathema."[2]

Christ instituted the Presbyterate, with respect to the power of consecrating and offering the true Body and Blood of the Lord, at the Last Supper. "If anyone says," so says the Council of Trent, "that by those words, 'Do this in commemoration of Me,' Christ did not institute the Apostles as priests, or did not ordain that they and other priests should offer His Body and Blood, let him be anathema."[3] But with respect to the power of remitting and retaining sins, He instituted it after the resurrection, when He handed this power to the Apostles in these words: "Receive the Holy Spirit. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained."[4]

2. Diaconate is a sacrament. It is the very common opinion of theologians, and so certain that it cannot be denied without temerity.[5]

3. Episcopate is a sacrament distinct from Presbyterate. This is today the common and very probable opinion (St. Alphonsus, VI, 738).[6]

Christ instituted the Episcopate after His resurrection and before the ascension, as theologians commonly admit (St. Alphonsus, Opera dogmatica, 7, p. 123, fourth, and p. 124, sixth).

4. Subdiaconate and the minor orders do not seem to be sacraments, because they do not seem to have been instituted by Christ (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 737).[7]

In writings left to us from antiquity, the first mention of these orders, as of a matter known to all, occurs in St. Cornelius, Pope, around the year 252; he speaks thus about Novatian: "Therefore that defender of the Gospel was ignorant that there ought to be one Bishop in the Catholic Church, in which it was not hidden from him - for how could it be hidden? - that there were forty-six Presbyters, seven Deacons, seven Subdeacons, forty-two Acolytes, and fifty-two Exorcists and Lectors together with Porters."[8] Anastasius Bibliothecarius also relates in the history of Pope St. Caius, who held the See of Peter from the year 283 to 296: "He established that all Ordinations in the Church should ascend thus: if someone deserved to be a Bishop, he should be ordained Porter, Lector, Exorcist, Sequens (Acolyte), Subdeacon, Deacon, Presbyter, and thereafter Bishop."[9]

III. Although the character of a sacrament belongs to several Orders, nevertheless it must simply be said that there is only one sacrament of Order. For "the division of Order is not of an integral whole into its parts, nor of a universal whole, but of a potestative whole, whose nature is this: that the whole according to its complete notion is in one, while in the others there is some participation of it. And so it is here. For the whole fullness of this Sacrament is in one order, namely the priesthood; but in the others there is a certain participation of order. And therefore all orders are one sacrament" (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 37, a. 1, ad 2).

[1] Session 23, canon 3.

[2] Session 23, canon 4.

[3] Session 22, canon 2.

[4] John 20:22-23.

[5] Cf. Pesch, op. cit., n. 615.

[6] Cf. Pesch, op. cit., n. 614.

[7] Pesch, op. cit., n. 592.

[8] Epistle to Fabian of Antioch, c. 3.

[9] Historia de vitis Romanorum Pontificum, c. 29.

Part II. On the Essence of the Sacrament of Order

There will also be discussion of the essence of Orders which are not sacraments.

590 I. The essence, or matter and form, of Orders which are not numbered among the sacraments. 1. The matter of the minor Orders, according to the opinion of all, is the handing over of the instruments;[1] the form is the words which accompany the respective handing over.

2. The matter of the Subdiaconate[2] according to some is the handing over of the empty chalice with the paten, while the form is the correlative words; according to others, the handing over of the chalice with the paten and of the book of Epistles, and the form the respective words; according to a very few, finally, all the things prescribed in the ordination constitute the matter and form.

Corollary I. According to the more common opinion, to the handing over of the instruments there must correspond for validity an acceptance made by physical contact, so that moral acceptance, for example by a nod, does not suffice. The reason is that the word "touching," which the Pontifical uses, designates physical touch. Nevertheless, it does not obstruct validity that the acceptance is made by a hand covered with a glove.

Corollary II. Once the almost morally certain opinion is admitted which does not hold the minor Orders to be sacraments and teaches that they are of ecclesiastical institution - once, I say, this opinion is admitted - the Supreme Pontiff can sanate in the root all defects, even substantial ones. There are also those who think that they are certainly validly conferred if the essentials have been observed according to a probable interpretation, since the Church is considered to supply insofar as there is need. But these things cannot practically be applied to the Subdiaconate, since the opinion which denies the character of a sacrament to that Order is indeed very probable, but still is not certain.

[1] In the Greek Church, imposition of hands is performed outside the church.

[2] The source note marker is attached to the Subdiaconate heading; the surrounding note text gives no further substantive detail beyond the preceding observation.

591 II. The essence, or matter and form, of Orders which are sacraments.

1. Matter and form of the Diaconate. In the ordination of a Deacon: 1. "The Pontiff, extending his right hand, places it upon the head of each one to be ordained, ... saying to each: Receive the Holy Spirit, for strength, and for resisting the devil and his temptations, in the Name of the Lord."[1] 2. The Pontiff continues, holding his right hand extended, even to the end of the Preface: "Send forth upon them, we ask, O Lord, the Holy Spirit," etc. 3. Lastly, he hands to all the book of the Gospels, saying: "Receive," etc. Now:

a) The matter of the Diaconate according to some is only the imposition of the right hand; according to others it is only the handing over of the instruments; according to still others it is each ceremony (St. Alphonsus, VI, 748, 737).

Corollary. In order that the matter be indubitable, the last opinion must be followed. In addition, in the imposition of the hand, physical touch is required, at least so that every doubt be forestalled, although mediated touch suffices, for example through a hand wrapped in a glove or over the small cap of the ordinand.[2]

b) The form of the Diaconate according to some consists only in the words "Receive the Holy Spirit," etc., which the Bishop pronounces while imposing the right hand on each; according to others it is only the preface or eucharistic prayer; according to others it is the words "Receive power," which the Bishop pronounces while handing to all the book of the Gospels; according to still others it is both the words "Receive the Holy Spirit," the preface, and the words "Receive power" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 748, 737).

Corollary. In order that the form be indubitable, the last opinion must be followed. In addition, if the Diaconate has been doubtfully validly conferred, provision should be made for convalidation (cf. n. 594).

[1] Roman Pontifical, p. 41.

[2] Holy Office, June 22, 1892.

592

2. Matter and form of the Presbyterate. In the ordination of a Presbyter: 1. The Bishop "at the same time imposes both hands upon the head of each one to be ordained successively, saying nothing. The same is done after him by all the Priests who are present." This is called by many the first imposition. 2. Then "both the Pontiff and the priests hold their right hands extended over them"; this extension is called by many the second imposition, but it should rather be called a continuation of the first. While the Pontiff holds his hand extended, he says: "Let us pray, dearest brethren," etc. Afterwards "the Pontiff, having laid aside the miter, turned toward the altar, says: Let us pray. And the ministers: Let us bend the knees. Response: Arise. And immediately, turned toward the ordinands, he says: Hear us, we ask," etc. Then, with hands extended before the breast, he says the Preface. 3. The Pontiff "hands to each one successively the chalice with wine and water and the paten placed over it with the host, and they, the ordinands, receive it between the index and middle fingers, and touch the cup of the chalice and the paten at the same time, the Pontiff saying to each: Receive the power to offer Sacrifice to God and to celebrate Masses, both for the living and for the dead, in the Name of the Lord." 4. Finally, he places both hands upon the heads of the ordinands, saying: "Receive the Holy Spirit. Whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them, and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained."[2] This is called the last imposition. Now:

a) The matter of the Presbyterate according to some is only the imposition of hands upon each; according to others, only the extension of the hand toward all; according to others, the imposition of hands upon each and the extension of the hand, which extension is regarded as a continuation of the first imposition, so that both constitute one imposition; according to others, only the handing over of the instruments; according to others, both the imposition of hands upon each, the extension of the hand, and the handing over of the instruments; others hold that the power of sacrificing is conferred in the handing over of the instruments, and the power of absolving in the last imposition of hands (St. Alphonsus, VI, 749). Now:

a) It is most probable that the imposition of hands alone is the matter of the Presbyterate; this opinion Cardinal van Rossum solidly proves.[3] Nevertheless, as we said, it is further disputed whether the imposition of hands upon each alone, or the subsequent extension of the hand, or both, constitutes the matter.

b) Those who hold also either the handing over of the instruments alone as matter, more commonly require physical touch of those instruments, although mediated touch, or touch performed by a veiled hand, suffices (St. Alphonsus, VI, 742, 743). Three things must be touched: the chalice, the paten, and the host; and, so that all anxiety be forestalled, care must be taken that each be touched. Nevertheless, for validity these suffice: 1. the touch of the chalice and host, the paten not being touched;[4] 2. the touch of the chalice and paten, the host not being touched[5] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 751, 752). Almost the same seems to have to be said of the touch of the paten and host.[6] It is more doubted: 1. whether the touch of the chalice alone, or of the paten alone, or of the host alone suffices; 2. whether the chalice and paten must be consecrated; 3. whether the paten and chalice without host and wine suffice[7] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 750).

b) The form of the Presbyterate consists in the words which correspond to the matter; but in designating the form, authors differ according to the diversity of the matter which they admit. Of those who hold only the imposition of hands as the matter, some place the form in the words alone which are said during the extension of the hand which follows the imposition of hands upon each, in other words, in the prayer "Let us pray, brethren," etc.; others in the prayer "Hear us," etc. alone; others in the Preface alone; others in the prayer "Hear us," etc. and the Preface; others in the prayer "Let us pray, brethren," etc., and the prayer "Hear us," etc. and the Preface.

Corollary. In order that the Presbyterate be conferred certainly validly, there are required: 1. imposition of hands upon each; 2. extension of the hand toward all together with the exhortation "Let us pray, brethren," the prayer "Hear us," and the following Preface; 3. handing over of the consecrated chalice and paten with bread and wine, together with the accompanying words; 4. physical touch of the chalice, paten, and host, or at least of the chalice and host, or of the chalice and paten; 5. imposition of hands at the end of Mass with the words "Receive the Holy Spirit. Whose sins," etc.

[1] Cf. G. Cardinal van Rossum, De essentia sacramenti Ordinis.

[2] Roman Pontifical.

[3] De essentia sacramenti Ordinis, p. 62 sq.

[4] Holy Office, July 25, 1866; November 22, 1871; June 9, 1875; July 22, 1892.

[5] Holy Office, responses just cited.

[6] Holy Office, March 17, 1897; cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, December 3, 1661, n. 1221.

[7] Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 11, 1708; Holy Office, July 6, 1898; January 11, 1899.

593

3. Matter and form of the Episcopate. In the ordination of a Bishop: 1. The Consecrator, with the assisting Bishops helping, places the open book of the Gospels upon the neck and shoulders of the one to be consecrated, saying nothing. 2. The Consecrator and the assisting Bishops touch the head of the one to be consecrated with both hands, saying: "Receive the Holy Spirit." When this has been done, the Consecrator, standing, with the miter laid aside, says: "Be propitious, O Lord," etc. 3. The Consecrator, with hands extended before the breast, says the Preface. 4. The Consecrator hands the closed book of the Gospel to the consecrated one, saying: "Receive the Gospel," etc.

a) The matter of the Episcopate according to some is only the imposition of the hands of the Consecrator; according to others, only the imposition of the three Bishops; according to others, the imposition of hands and of the book of the Gospels upon the neck and shoulders of the one to be consecrated;[1] according to a very few, besides the things enumerated, the handing over of the book of the Gospels is also required.

b) The form of the Episcopate according to very many is only the preface said or sung by the consecrating Bishop; according to others it consists in the words of the Consecrator alone pronounced in the imposition of hands, namely "Receive the Holy Spirit"; according to others, the same words pronounced by the three Bishops; according to others, the words cited and the prayer "Be propitious," etc.; according to others, the cited words, the prayer "Be propitious," etc., and the following Preface; according to a very few, even the words pronounced in the handing over of the book pertain to the form.

Corollary. In order that the Episcopate be conferred certainly validly, all things are required which with some probability are said to pertain to the matter or form.

[1] Roman Pontifical. In the imposition of the book the Consecrator says nothing; but those who hold it to be partial matter refer also to the imposition of the book the words to be pronounced in the imposition of hands.

Scholion. On Correcting Defects of Ordinations

594 I. Obligation of correcting defects. Commonly there is an obligation of correcting defects: 1. if the ordination was doubtfully valid, in other words, if the defect concerned something certainly or probably essential; 2. if it concerned something accidental which is of the greatest moment. I said commonly; for after receiving a higher Order there is no obligation of correcting defects, even essential ones, admitted in the conferral of lower Orders. The reason is that one who receives a higher Order is considered eminently to receive the lower ones. Nevertheless: 1. a doubtfully valid ordination to the Diaconate, as being an Order of greater moment and a sacrament, seems to have to be convalidated even after the Presbyterate has been received; since the Holy Office[1] resolved that ordination to the Diaconate had to be repeated with respect to a priest whose head the Bishop, while conferring the Diaconate, had not physically touched. 2. Likewise a doubtfully valid ordination to the Presbyterate must be repeated even after the Episcopate has been received; both because the Presbyterate is an Order of the greatest moment and a sacrament, and because it is very doubtful whether the Episcopate contains the Presbyterate, indeed whether the Episcopate is validly conferred on one who is not a priest (St. Alphonsus, VI, 793).[2]

II. Manner of correcting defects. 1. If the defect concerned something certainly or probably essential, commonly the whole ordination must be reiterated. I said commonly, because there are exceptions, for example if in the ordination of a presbyter the last imposition was omitted; in that case it suffices to supply it, as we shall immediately explain.

2. If the defect concerned something accidental, there is no obligation of supplying it, unless it concerns an accidental element of very great moment. In this matter such an element is judged to be the anointing of the hands; but not the imposition of the hand of the presbyters. Nor is there sufficient certainty about others. Besides, from the response of the Holy Office: nothing is to be supplied if in place of the oil of catechumens the oil of Holy Chrism was used (St. Alphonsus, VI, 758).

[1] January 20, 1875 (Collectio, n. 1431).

[2] Besides, canon 1004 is to be observed: If someone, already promoted to some orders in an eastern rite, has obtained from the Apostolic See an indult of receiving higher orders in the Latin rite, he must first receive in the Latin rite the orders which he did not receive in the eastern rite.

595 Corollary I. The whole ordination must be repeated: 1. if in the ordination of a Deacon or Presbyter the first imposition was omitted; 2. if in it physical contact did not take place;[1] 3. if the second imposition of hands was omitted by the Bishop, that is, the one which follows the first, in which nothing is said;[2] 4. if the handing over of the instruments was omitted, or the respective words were not added or were substantially corrupted;[3] 5. if the chalice was handed over without wine or the paten without the host;[4] 6. if it is doubted whether the ordinand physically touched the instruments or one of those instruments whose touch, according to what was said on p. 456, is regarded as necessary with some probability.

Corollary II. It suffices to supply the defect if in the ordination of a Presbyter the third imposition of hands was omitted, or if the form corresponding to that imposition was essentially corrupted.[5]

Corollary III. Nothing is to be repeated: 1. if the Bishop after the first imposition, duly performed, "did not hold his hands extended over the ordained person also through the interval which intervenes between the first and second imposition of hands";[6] 2. "if the Bishop, after physical touch of the heads of the ordinands, had his hand extended over the ordinands at least immediately before the recitation of 'Let us pray,'" etc.[7]

[1] July 22, 1874 (Collectio, n. 1421).

[2] Holy Office, July 4, 1900 (Collectio, n. 2086); May 7, 1902 (Collectio, n. 2140).

[3] Holy Office, November 30, 1898; cf. response of the Holy Office, July 19, 1899 (Collectio, n. 2058).

[4] Holy Office, June 20, 1886; September 1, 1892; July 6, 1898 (Collectio, n. 2008); January 11, 1899 (Collectio, n. 2032).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, May 22, 1841, n. 2836; Holy Office, March 4, 1874.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Rites, June 14, 1893, n. 3307.

[7] Holy Office, September 12, 1877 (Collectio, n. 1482); November 30, 1898.

596 III. Time for correcting defects. "As often as an ordination must be repeated or some rite supplied, whether absolutely or conditionally, this can be done even outside the times and secretly" (canon 1007).

Note 1. "Even if someone could rest in the first ordination on account of some opinion considered morally certain, nevertheless he will not sin if, while the opposite opinion of others stands for the nullity of the sacrament, he is ordained again conditionally for greater peace of soul; and the Bishop also can licitly do this for his benefit. And the reason seems to be that anxiety itself about the doubt, provided it is vehement, is a just cause for repeating ordination conditionally" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 751). Nevertheless one must beware of scruples, which easily creep in; that is, the anxious and agitated ordinand, after such a great series of actions, easily doubts whether he duly performed something. But ordinarily doubts of this kind should be rejected at once, and to this end it should be considered that both the Bishop and the ministers carefully attend lest anything be omitted either by the one ordaining or by the one being ordained, especially from those things which perhaps are required for validity.

Note 2. If some doubt arises about the validity of an ordination, recourse must be had to the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, which, if the doubt is connected with dogmatic doctrine, will remit the matter to the Holy Office. Religious should approach the Sacred Congregation of Religious, which will have recourse to the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments. If the discussion concerns a case of conscience, the Sacred Penitentiary should be approached.

Part III. On the Effects of the Sacrament of Order

597 The effects of the sacrament of Order are:

I. Sanctifying grace: in itself second grace, accidentally first grace (n. 6).

II. Sacramental grace, which consists in this: that the sanctifying grace which the sacrament of Order confers is both directed to this, that the ordained lead a life congruent with their state and faithfully fulfill the ministries annexed to it, and gives a right to actual graces to be obtained in order to those effects.

III. Character. 1. The existence of character is clear from what was said in n. 8. But from the fact that character is imprinted through the sacrament of Order, it is deduced that through all Orders which are sacraments, and therefore through Diaconate, Presbyterate, and Episcopate, character is imprinted. It is disputed, however, whether those individual Orders imprint a distinct character, or only one character, which is enlarged through the following Orders.

2. The effect of the character is that a man receives the power of confecting and administering sacred things and is deputed to them. Nevertheless, character and power do not differ in reality, but consist in the same real quality. But what kind of power is conferred by the individual Orders is sufficiently clear from what was said in n. 588.

Dissertation II. On the Ministration of Order

We shall speak first of the person ministering, then of the liceity of ministering.

Part I. On the Person Ministering

598 I. The ordinary minister of sacred ordination is a consecrated Bishop (canon 951); namely, in this sense, that, once his consecration is posited, he always confers Orders validly. It is disputed only whether a Bishop acts validly who, without an apostolic dispensation, consecrates a Bishop without two other assisting Bishops. That such a manner of acting is illicit is clear both from canon 954 and from the Roman Pontifical; nevertheless it seems altogether to be said that it is valid. For so Pius IV in the Brief of August 11, 1562, the Holy Office,[1] and the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide.[2] There is added the fact that only one of the Bishops in the Roman Pontifical is called the consecrator, and that in the other sacraments also one minister suffices.

Corollary. Ordinations performed by Jansenist, Old Catholic, and Russian Bishops are valid. But the ordinations of Anglicans are invalid by defect of minister, form, and intention, as Leo XIII authentically declared.[3]

[1] March 13, 1669 (Collectio, n. 177).

[2] May 18, 1695 (Collectio, n. 239).

[3] Constitution Apostolicae curae, September 13, 1896.

599 II. The extraordinary minister of sacred ordination is one who, although he lacks the episcopal character, has received from law or from the Apostolic See by a special indult the power of conferring some Orders (canon 951). Now this power has been conferred by law as follows:

1. Cardinals, from their promotion in Consistory, enjoy the faculty of conferring first tonsure and minor Orders, provided the one to be promoted has dimissorial letters from his proper Ordinary (canon 239, § 1, 22).
2. A Vicar and Prefect Apostolic, an Abbot or Prelate nullius, if they lack the episcopal character, can nevertheless, in their own territory and only while they hold office, confer first tonsure and minor Orders both on their own secular subjects according to the norm of canon 956,[1] and on others who exhibit the dimissorial letters required by law; ordination performed by them outside these limits is null (canon 957, § 2).
3. A Provicar and Proprefect, and others to whom the care of a vicariate or prefecture has devolved according to the norm of canon 309, enjoy the faculty with which the Vicar or Prefect was endowed (canon 310, § 2).
4. A regular Abbot of governance, even without a territory nullius, can confer first tonsure and minor Orders, provided the one to be promoted is subject to him by force of at least simple profession, and he himself is a priest and has legitimately received the abbatial blessing. Outside these limits, ordination conferred by him, every contrary privilege having been revoked, is null, unless the one ordaining is endowed with the episcopal character (canon 964, 1°).

Question. Can the Supreme Pontiff confer on a simple priest the power of ministering the Subdiaconate and Diaconate?

Response 1. With respect to the Subdiaconate, it is commonly admitted: both because it is not a sacrament; and because Pope St. Gelasius, in his letter to Bishop Lucianus,[2] seems to teach this implicitly; and because Supreme Pontiffs have several times put this doctrine into practice.[3]

Response 2. With respect to the Diaconate, there is dispute. Some affirm it, relying on the Bulls of which there will be discussion presently. Others deny it, and they respond to the things alleged by their opponents: 1° the Bull of Innocent VIII directed to the Cistercian Abbots (1489), at least insofar as it grants the faculty of conferring the Diaconate, does not seem genuine;[4] 2° the Bull of Boniface IX to the Augustinian Abbot of the monastery of St. Osyth in the province of London (1400), by which, besides the faculty of ministering the Subdiaconate and Diaconate, the faculty of ministering the Presbyterate was also conferred, was revoked by him in the year 1403.[5] There is added that the said Bull probably conferred nothing else except permission to receive Orders independently of the Bishop of London, so that the matter concerned not the power of Order but the power of jurisdiction.

[1] Cf. p. 462.

[2] Migne, Patrologia Latina LIX, p. 50 (in VI).

[3] Cf. Many, De S. Ord., p. 146.

[4] Cf. Gasparri, De Sacr. Ordin., t. II, p. 85; Wernz, Ius Decretalium, II, p. 48; Pastor, Geschichte der Papste, III, p. 253.

[5] Cf. Gillmann, Zur Lehre der Scholastik vom Spender der Firmung und des Weihesakraments, p. 137; Sagmuller, Kirchenrecht, I, p. 202 (ed. 1914); Dictionnaire de theologie catholique, s.v. Ordre, la theologie moderne, col. 1386.

Part II. On the Liceity of Ministering

600 First note these special points prefaced by the Code: 1° No one may promote to a higher Order one ordained by the Roman Pontiff without the faculty of the Apostolic See (canon 952). 2° Episcopal consecration is reserved to the Roman Pontiff in such a way that no Bishop may consecrate anyone as Bishop unless the pontifical mandate has first been established (canon 953). The consecrating Bishop, however, must employ two other Bishops who assist him in the consecration, unless there has been a dispensation from the Apostolic See in this matter (canon 954). The dispensation is given in such a way that two priests from the more worthy assist the consecrating Bishop.

Besides those special points, this principle holds with respect to the liceity of ministering Orders: In order that someone who enjoys the power of ordaining may licitly minister Orders, it is required that he either be the Superior of the one to be ordained, or have received dimissorial letters from the Superior of the one to be ordained in this matter (canon 955, § 1); and these things also hold if first tonsure is in question (canon 950; Pontifical Commission).[1] Having noted this principle, we shall speak separately about the ordination of seculars and of religious.

[1] February 17, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 195, ad I).

601 I. Ordination of seculars. The Code states: Each one is to be ordained by his proper Bishop, or with that Bishop's legitimate dimissorial letters (canon 955, § 1). Therefore a Bishop licitly ordains: 1° his own subject, unless this subject is of an oriental rite, in which case he cannot licitly ordain him without an apostolic indult; 2° another's subject who presents to him legitimate dimissorial letters received from his proper Bishop. Here, however, there are equated with a Bishop the Vicar and Prefect Apostolic, the Provicar and Proprefect, and others to whom the care of a vicariate or prefecture has devolved according to the norm of canon 309, and an Abbot or Prelate nullius (canon 957; canon 310, § 2). If, however, they lack the episcopal character, their power of validly ordaining is limited, as we said in n. 599.

But in order that the requisites for licit ordination may be clearer, something fuller must be said both about the proper Bishop and about dimissorial letters.

1. The proper Bishop, as regards the ordination of seculars, is only the Bishop of the diocese in which the one to be promoted has either: 1° domicile together with origin;[1] or 2° simple domicile without origin, but after an oath has been emitted by which the one to be promoted confirms his intention of remaining perpetually in the diocese; or 3° simple domicile without origin and without oath, namely if it is a question of promoting to Orders a cleric who has already been incardinated in the diocese by first tonsure, or of promoting a student who is destined for the service of another diocese according to the norm of canon 969, § 2, or of promoting a professed religious, of whom canon 964, n. 4 treats[2] (canon 956).

2. Dimissorial letters are letters by which a Bishop or competent Superior sends a subject to the minister of ordination so that he may be ordained by him. Now:

a) Dimissorial letters for seculars can be given, so long as they retain jurisdiction in the territory, by: 1° the proper Bishop, after he has legitimately taken possession of his diocese, although not yet consecrated; 2° the Vicar General, yet by special mandate of the Bishop; 3° with the consent of the Chapter, the Vicar Capitular after a year from the vacant see; within the year, however, only for those constrained by reason of a benefice received or to be received, or by reason of some certain office for which, on account of the necessity of the diocese, provision must be made without delay; 4° the Vicar and Prefect Apostolic, an Abbot or Prelate nullius, although they lack the episcopal character, even for major Orders (canon 958, § 1); 5° the Provicar and Proprefect Apostolic who has assumed the whole governance (canon 310, § 2, compared with canon 958, § 1, 4°; Pontifical Commission).[3]

Note. The Vicar Capitular is not to grant dimissorial letters to those who have been rejected by the Bishop (canon 958, § 2).

Those enumerated above likewise can give dimissorial letters: 1° for non-exempt religious; 2° for exempt religious professed with temporary vows and to be promoted to major Orders. For their ordination is governed by the law of seculars (canon 964, 4°).

b) Dimissorial letters are not to be granted unless all testimonies which are required by law have first been obtained (canon 960, § 1); for what testimonies are required by law, see n. 650. Furthermore, note: If after dimissorial letters have been given by the Ordinary new testimonies are necessary according to the norm of canon 994, § 3 (n. 650), an outside Bishop is not to ordain before he has received them (canon 960, § 2). But if the one to be promoted has spent time sufficient to contract an impediment according to the norm of the same canon 994 (n. 650) in the very diocese of the ordaining Bishop, this Bishop is to collect the testimonies directly (canon 960, § 3).

c) Dimissorial letters can be sent by the proper Bishop, likewise by the others enumerated under a), even by a Cardinal suburbicarian Bishop,[4] to any Bishop having communion with the Apostolic See, with the sole exception, apart from an apostolic indult, of a Bishop of a rite different from the rite of the one to be promoted (canon 961); likewise dimissorial letters can be sent to those who, according to what was said on p. 462, are equated with a Bishop.

Note. The proper Bishop is not to dismiss his subjects to another unless a just cause prevents him from ordaining them himself (canon 955, § 2).

[1] The place of origin of a son, even a neophyte, is that in which, when the son was born, the father had domicile, or, in the absence of domicile, quasi-domicile; or, if the son is illegitimate or posthumous, the mother. If it is a question of the son of vagabonds, the place of origin is the very place of birth; if of an exposed child, it is the place in which he was found.

[2] Cf. n. 602.

[3] July 20, 1929, ad I (A.A.S. 1929, p. 573).

[4] Before the Code a Cardinal suburbicarian Bishop could direct dimissorial letters only to the Cardinal Vicar of the City.

602 II. Ordination of religious. 1. A regular Abbot of governance, even without a territory nullius, can confer first tonsure and minor Orders, provided the one to be promoted is subject to him by force of at least simple profession, and he himself is a priest and has legitimately received the abbatial blessing. Outside these limits, ordination conferred by him, every contrary privilege having been revoked, is null, unless the one ordaining is endowed with the episcopal character (canon 964, 1°).

2. Exempt religious can licitly be ordained by no Bishop without dimissorial letters from their proper major Superior (canon 964, 2°). But:

a) The said Superiors can grant dimissorial letters to those professed with temporary vows only for first tonsure and minor Orders (canon 964, 3°); but to those professed with perpetual vows, also for major Orders.

b) Dimissorial letters from a religious Superior must be sent to the Bishop, or quasi-Bishop, for example a Prefect Apostolic and so on, of the diocese, or quasi-diocese, in which the religious house is situated, to whose family the ordinand belongs (canon 965). Only then can the Superior send dimissorial letters to another Bishop, when the diocesan Bishop has given permission, or is of a different rite from the religious to be ordained, or is absent, or is not going to have an ordination at the next legitimate time, or finally when the diocese is vacant and is not ruled by someone endowed with the episcopal character (canon 966, § 1). But it is necessary that in individual cases this be established for the Bishop who is to ordain from an authentic testimony of the episcopal Curia (canon 966, § 2). Religious Superiors should take care not to send a subject to be ordained to another religious house in fraud of the diocesan Bishop, or deliberately defer the granting of dimissorial letters to that time when the Bishop will be absent or will have no ordinations (canon 967).

Note. The privilege of receiving Orders from any Catholic Bishop must have been granted to religious nominally and directly, not by communication, after the Council of Trent, as Benedict XIV had decreed in the Constitution Impositi nobis.[1]

c) A religious Superior in his dimissorial letters must testify not only that the one to be promoted has emitted religious profession and belongs to the family of the religious house subject to him, but also about studies completed and about the other things required by law (canon 995, § 1); for what testimonies are required by law, see n. 650. For the rest, the Bishop, after receiving these dimissorial letters, does not need other testimonial letters (canon 995, § 2).

3. The ordination of: 1° non-exempt religious; 2° exempt religious professed with temporary vows and to be promoted to major Orders is governed by the law of seculars, every indult granted to Superiors to give dimissorial letters to those professed with temporary vows for major Orders having been revoked (canon 964, 4°).

4. Novices are not to be promoted to Orders during the novitiate (canon 567, § 2).

[1] February 27, 1747.

603 III. Points to be noted concerning the ordination both of seculars and of religious. 1. He who can give dimissorial letters for receiving Orders can also confer those same Orders himself, if he has the necessary power of Order (canon 959).

2. Any Bishop, after receiving legitimate dimissorial letters, licitly ordains another's subject, provided he himself can in no way doubt the genuine trustworthiness of the letters (canon 962).

3. Dimissorial letters can be limited or revoked by the grantor himself or by his successor, but once granted they are not extinguished when the right of the one giving them is dissolved (canon 963).

Dissertation III. On the Reception of Order

We shall treat first of the person receiving Orders, then of admission and preparation for the reception of Orders, and finally of the manner of receiving Orders.

Part I. On the Person Receiving Orders

604 The subject capable of receiving ordination is every baptized male who has not yet received it (canon 968, § 1).

It is said every, even infants and those perpetually without use of reason. "By the concordant judgment of theologians and canonists," says Benedict XIV, "it has been determined that this ordination is to be considered valid but illicit, provided it labors under no substantial defect of matter, form, and intention in the ordaining Bishop; the contrary opinion, which has rare followers and which has never pleased the supreme tribunals and Congregations of the City, not being heeded."[1] It was disputed only to some extent whether the Episcopate can validly be received before the use of reason has been acquired. Today, however, this is commonly admitted (cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 39, a. 2).

Nevertheless, an infant ordained in this way without his own will is bound by no obligations of clerics unless, fully master of his mind after completing the sixteenth year, he has ratified the ordination.[2]

Nor, in order that someone be capable of receiving a higher Order, is it required that he have received a lower Order. An exception, however, according to the much more common opinion, is the Episcopate, which cannot validly be conferred if the priesthood has not already been received (St. Alphonsus, VI, 793).

[1] Instruction Eo quamvis tempore, § 20, May 4, 1745.

[2] Benedict XIV, cited Instruction, § 28 sq.; Constitution Anno vertente, § 7 sq., May 19, 1750.

Part II. On Admission and Preparation for the Reception of Orders

605 I. No one from among seculars is to be ordained who, in the judgment of his proper Bishop, is not necessary or useful for the churches of the diocese. Yet the Bishop is not prohibited from promoting his own subject who is destined in the future, after legitimate excardination and incardination, for the service of another diocese (canon 969).

II. First tonsure and Orders are to be conferred only on those who have the purpose of ascending to the Presbyterate and whom one may rightly conjecture will someday be worthy priests (canon 973, § 1). Yet an ordained man who refuses to receive higher Orders can neither be compelled by the Bishop to receive them, nor be prohibited from the exercise of the Orders received, unless he is held by a canonical impediment or some other grave cause stands in the way, in the judgment of the Bishop (canon 973, § 2).

III. The Bishop is to confer sacred Orders on no one unless from positive arguments he is morally certain about that person's canonical suitability; otherwise he not only sins most gravely, but also commits himself to the danger of communicating in another's sins (canon 973, § 3). It is said from positive arguments; therefore it does not suffice that nothing is opposed, or that the ordinand has not committed a sin which can be juridically proved. For the rest, these things do not suffice for acquiring moral certainty.

Nor is one to depart from these things on account of a shortage of priests. "Care must be taken," says Benedict XV in his letter to the Bishops of Bolivia,[1] "lest those less worthy also be admitted to the priesthood by reason of necessity... Therefore we must weigh not how many, but what kind of sacred ministers we take up; and, after trying all the things which prudence may suggest for fostering the pursuit of the priesthood among youth, let us diligently commend the matter to God, in whose hand it is." Add these words of the Fourth Lateran Council: "It is better... to have fewer ministers, but upright... and useful ones, than more who... will be of no avail."[2] Likewise these words of St. Thomas: "God never so deserts His Church that suitable ministers sufficient for the necessity of the people cannot be found, if the worthy were promoted and the unworthy repelled. Even if as many ministers could not be found as there now are, it would be better to have a few good ministers than many bad ones" (Supplement, q. 36, a. 4, ad 1).

But if applicants are superabundant, the Bishop, in order to guard against idleness, should choose the better ones and leave aside the less suitable; and, with the things that must be observed being observed, religious Superiors also can apply these things with respect to those whom they foresee will be almost useless in religion for undertaking priestly offices.

IV. The proper Bishop or major religious Superior can forbid his clerics ascent to Orders for any canonical cause, even occult, and even extrajudicially, with the right of recourse to the Holy See remaining intact, or also to the Moderator General if it is a question of religious whose ascent has been forbidden by the Provincial Superior (canon 970).

V. Care must be taken that those aspiring to sacred Orders be received into the Seminary from tender years; but all are bound to remain there at least through the entire curriculum of sacred theology, unless the Ordinary has dispensed in particular cases for a grave cause, his conscience being burdened. Those who aspire to Orders and legitimately remain outside the Seminary are to be commended to a pious and suitable priest, who is to watch over them and form them to piety (canon 972).

[1] August 4, 1918.

[2] Chapter 27.

Part III. On the Manner of Receiving Orders

Section I. On the Requisites for Valid Reception

606 I. In infants and those perpetually without use of reason, no intention is required; this follows from the fact that they are incapable of eliciting an intention and yet, if they are ordained, they receive ordination validly (n. 604).

II. In adults intention or consent is required; habitual intention suffices. But it is disputed to some extent whether consent to the very Order to be received is required, or whether it suffices that the ordinand consent to the application of the external rite, although he does not wish to receive the Order (n. 40).

One who consents through grave fear, for example compelled by threats or terror, is indeed validly ordained; but as canon 214 has it: "A cleric who, compelled by grave fear, receives a sacred Order and afterward, once the fear has been removed, has not ratified the same ordination at least tacitly by the exercise of the Order, while nevertheless intending by such an act to subject himself to clerical obligations, is to be reduced to the lay state by sentence of a judge, after the coercion and the lack of ratification have been legitimately proved, without any obligations of celibacy and of the canonical hours. But coercion and lack of ratification must be proved according to the norm of canons 1993-1998."[1] These things, as is clear, do not pertain to him whom fear impressed from within, for example fear that, if the lay state is chosen, he will lead a miserable life, has led to Orders.

[1] Cf. A.A.S. 1931, p. 120 and p. 457 sq., where there are: 1° the remedy for preventing ordinations from fear; 2° the rules to be observed in processes concerning the nullity of sacred ordination or of the burdens inhering in sacred Orders.

Section II. On the Requisites for Licit Reception

607 In order that someone licitly receive Orders, he must be endowed with certain requisites, and be immune from irregularity or some other impediment (cf. canon 968, § 1). But those who are held by irregularity or some other impediment, even if it arose after ordination and even without their own fault, are prohibited from exercising the Orders received (canon 968, § 2). We shall speak first about the positive requisites, then about irregularities and the other impediments from which the ordinand must be immune.

Chapter I. On the Positive Requisites

608 (n. 608 stands at the heading Chapter I. On the Positive Requisites.)

609 608-609. Canon 974 states: "In order that someone may licitly be ordained, that is, receive tonsure and Orders, there are required: 1° received sacred Confirmation; 2° morals congruent with the Order to be received; 3° canonical age; 4° due knowledge; 5° reception of the lower Orders; 6° observance of interstices; 7° a canonical title, if it is a question of major Orders. As regards episcopal consecration, the prescription of canon 331 is to be observed." We shall speak of each, omitting those things which pertain to episcopal consecration, after first saying certain things about vocation, about the state of grace, and about the intention of ascending to the Presbyterate, and adding some things about the intention with which Orders are to be received.

I. Vocation;[1] concerning which it is useful to establish the following.

1. At least some vocation must be admitted altogether, so that it is licit for no one to approach ordination merely of his own accord. This is clear from these words of Sacred Scripture: "Nor does anyone take the honor to himself, but he who is called by God as Aaron was";[2] these words some, considering the context, understand of ecclesiastical vocation, others of divine vocation.

2. A twofold vocation is required, ecclesiastical, that is, proceeding from the Bishop, and divine.

a) No one denies that ecclesiastical vocation is required. For the rest, the Cardinal Secretary of State on July 2, 1912, signified that Pius X approved the judgment pronounced by the Commission of Cardinals concerning the work of Lahitton; and this judgment declared that the work La vocation sacerdotale was in no way to be reproved, indeed that in many respects it was outstandingly to be praised, for example "insofar as it maintains: 1° that no one ever has any right to ordination antecedently to the election of the Bishop," etc.[3]

b) Divine vocation also is required. For: 1° Canon 1353 enacts: "Let priests, especially pastors, take care that boys who show signs of ecclesiastical vocation be guarded with special care from the contagion of the world, be formed to piety, be imbued with the first studies of letters, and that the seed of divine vocation in them be fostered." And canon 1357, § 2 states: "Above all let the Bishop strive frequently to visit the Seminary personally, and to acquire for himself a fuller knowledge of the character, piety, vocation, and progress of the students, especially on the occasion of sacred ordinations." But by these words ecclesiastical vocation cannot be signified, since it has not yet taken place. There is added the authority of the Holy Fathers and Doctors of the Church. Thus, for example, St. Cyprian,[4] St. Cyril of Alexandria,[5] St. Bernard,[6] St. Thomas (p. 3, q. 27, a. 4), and St. Alphonsus (VI, 802) teach.

Nor is opposed the judgment pronounced by the Commission of Cardinals concerning the work of Lahitton, which praises the said work "insofar as it maintains: 1° (that which we have already noted) that no one ever has any right to ordination antecedently to the free election of the Bishop; 2° that the condition which must be attended to on the part of the one to be ordained, and which is called priestly vocation, by no means consists, at least necessarily and by ordinary law, in some internal aspiration of the subject or invitations of the Holy Spirit toward entering the priesthood; 3° but on the contrary, that nothing more is required in the ordinand, in order that he be duly called by the Bishop, than right intention together with suitability placed in those gifts of grace and nature, and proved through that probity of life and sufficiency of doctrine, which produce a founded hope that he will be able rightly to undertake the offices of the priesthood and holily observe its obligations." But these things are well composed with the opinion which admits divine vocation, if it is said that in the foregoing the discussion concerns those things which must be attended to by the Bishop in order that he may duly call someone to Order; it suffices to attend to the signs of divine vocation. There is added that right intention cannot be had without the grace of God; and, strictly speaking, this already suffices for us to be able to speak of divine vocation.

3. The signs of divine vocation are right intention and suitability. Right intention consists in the will of embracing Orders with a view to the glory of God and the salvation of souls (St. Alphonsus, VI, 802). Suitability is constituted by due knowledge and due probity of life, of which there will be discussion in nn. 613 and 615.

Sometimes extraordinary signs of divine vocation are present, when, namely, God manifests it in a miraculous way, as happened in St. Paul, or by unusual movements of grace.

Corollary I. One who does not follow a recognized vocation cannot be excused from sin, since, deprived of the special graces especially annexed to vocation, he exposes himself to grave danger of departing from the way of salvation (cf. the things said by St. Alphonsus about the religious state, IV, 78).

Corollary II. One who embraces the clerical state without vocation seems to sin gravely. The reason is that he undertakes obligations so difficult that they are scarcely observed without special helps, without a founded hope of receiving those helps (St. Alphonsus, V, 803).[7]

Corollary III. It is unlawful to force anyone in any way, for any reason, to the clerical state, or to turn away from the same state one who is canonically suitable (canon 971).

[1] Cf. Lahitton, La vocation sacerdotale; Jansen, in Ned. Kath. Stemmen, 1911, p. 324 sq.; 1912, p. 270 sq.; Hurtaud, La vocation au sacerdoce; Vermeersch, De vocatione religiosa et sacerdotali.

[2] Heb. 5:4; cf. 1 Tim. 3:10; Roman Catechism, p. II, c. 7, q. 3.

[3] A.A.S. 1912, p. 485.

[4] Epistle 55 to Pope Cornelius, n. 5, Migne, t. 3, col. 803.

[5] De adoratione in Spiritu et veritate, book II, Migne, t. 182, col. 585.

[6] Sermon 58, In Cantica, n. 3, Migne, t. 183.

[7] Cf. Roman Catechism, p. 2, c. 7, qq. 3 and 4.

610 II. The state of grace is required under grave obligation in receiving Orders which are sacraments; with respect to the others, there is not a grave obligation.

611 III. The intention of ascending to the Presbyterate (canon 973, § 1); the direct grave obligation is not sufficiently established, but one who receives a major Order without the said intention commonly gravely deceives his Superiors.

612 IV. Received sacred Confirmation, which canon 974, § 1, 1° prescribes, and concerning which the Council of Trent says: "Let those not be initiated by first tonsure who have not received the Sacrament of Confirmation."[1] Now the obligation of receiving Confirmation before first tonsure is quite probably only slight, because the Council of Trent, from which the Code is not judged to depart, speaks more mildly. Nor do the words of the Sacred Congregation of the Council[2] seem to be pressed too much, since it declares that one who has received first tonsure or Orders without being confirmed, as one badly promoted, cannot ascend to other Orders nor receive benefices without dispensation of the Apostolic See.

[1] Session 23, cap. 4, De reformatione.

[2] September 27, 1601.

613 V. Morals congruent with the Order to be received (canon 974, § 1, 2°; cf. canon 973); by these are understood especially piety, chastity, and sobriety, exercised, of course, through acts which do not merely present the external appearance of virtue. Therefore the said virtues are prescribed also by ecclesiastical law. Likewise they are prescribed by the moral law, and indeed, especially with respect to sobriety and chastity, under grave obligation: both by reason of the sacred and most worthy office, and by reason of the danger lest the ordained man, deprived also of the assistance of conjugal life, fall into many sins and be a grave scandal to others (St. Alphonsus, VI, 63 sq.; Homo Apostolicus, last tract, n. 16, 17). St. Thomas says thus: "Through Sacred Order someone is deputed to the most worthy mysteries, by which service is rendered to Christ Himself in the sacrament of the altar, for which a greater interior sanctity is required than the religious state requires" (2.2, q. 184, a. 8). And elsewhere: "One who is entangled in some vice ought not to be admitted to the ministry of Order" (Supplement, q. 35, a. 1, ad 3). Again: "For the suitable execution of Orders not just any goodness suffices, but excellent goodness is required" (Supplement, q. 35, a. 1, ad 3). And: "Those who are applied to the divine mysteries ought to be perfect in virtue" (In 4 Sent., d. 24, q. 3, a. 1). And: "Interior perfection is required for this, that someone worthily exercise acts of this kind" (2.2, q. 184, a. 6; cf. q. 189, a. 1, ad 3).

How greatly Bishops and other ecclesiastical Superiors must attend to morals congruent with the Order to be received is gathered from innumerable ecclesiastical documents, of which it is pleasing to bring forward the principal ones. Innocent III, in his Decretal which begins A multis, De Aetat. et Quantit., enacts: "Let no one be permitted to approach sacred Order unless he is either a virgin or is of proved chastity." The Council of Trent says: "Let Bishops know... that not every individual established in that age must be assumed to these Orders, but only those who are worthy, and whose proved virtue is old age."[1] The Roman Catechism says: "In him who is to be created a priest, integrity of life and morals ought greatly to be commended."[2] The same things are inculcated by Benedict XIV in his Encyclical Ubi primum,[3] Leo XIII in the Encyclical Etsi nos,[4] in his letter to the Bishops of Prussia,[5] and in his Encyclical to the Bishops of Italy,[6] and Pius X in the Motu proprio Sacrorum Antistitum.[7]

Corollary I. The things we have said about the moral law hold perfectly indeed for the priesthood alone, but less perfectly also for the Subdiaconate, and a fortiori for the Diaconate; and this all the more because today hardly anyone receives a major Order without being about to ascend to the priesthood.

Corollary II. Definitive judgment about the required morals belongs to the Bishop. Hence canon 1357, § 2: "Above all let the Bishop strive frequently to visit the seminary personally, carefully to watch over ecclesiastical instruction, and to acquire for himself a fuller knowledge of the character, piety, vocation, and progress of the students, especially on the occasion of sacred ordinations." A grave obligation also falls on Superiors, Directors, and confessors to keep the unworthy from Orders, with the things that must be observed being observed. "Whoever," says Leo XIII in his Encyclical to the Bishops of Italy,[8] "in the course of education shall have shown inclinations less suited to a priestly vocation, let them be sent away; and in admitting clerics to Sacred Orders the greatest weighing must be applied." And the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, in the norms for the seminaries of Italy, stated: "Besides the spiritual director of the students, certain learned and pious priests shall be designated for hearing their confessions; mindful of their grave obligation and according to the track of approved authors, they will provide counsels and lights to their penitents in their doubts, imposing the obligation of withdrawing from the ecclesiastical state on those who have shown themselves not to be called" (n. 2).[9]

Corollary III. One habituated in vice, for example of lust or drunkenness, is bound under grave obligation to desist from receiving sacred Order until he has put on morals congruent with the Order, indeed until for a notable time, for example for six months, he has conducted himself as amended, so that he must be said to have put on different morals and can form moral certainty that he will fulfill the obligations annexed to the Order. Except the case, however not easily to be presumed, in which someone is healed by an extraordinary impulse of grace (St. Alphonsus, VI, 802). So also the Venerable Paul Segneri, Leonard of Port Maurice, and innumerable others; cf. also the norms of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars cited above.

For the rest, with respect to sins of lust, one must proceed more severely if the sins are with persons of the other sex than if they are solitary; still more severely if the discussion concerns sins with persons of the same sex. If the latter arise from a passing passion, greater hope of amendment shines forth; but if they proceed from an abnormal and permanent passion - in which case affection toward the other sex is lacking - hope of amendment is to be regarded as practically none.

In doubt whether morals congruent with the Order to be received are present, ordination should be deferred, unless, all things considered, it is better to persuade the ordinand to abstain from receiving Sacred Orders.

[1] Session 23, cap. 12, De reformatione.

[2] Part II, c. VII, q. 28.

[3] December 3, 1740.

[4] February 25, 1884.

[5] January 6, 1886.

[6] December 8, 1902.

[7] September 1, 1910.

[8] December 8, 1902.

[9] In Monitor ecclesiasticus 1910, p. 123.

614 VI. Canonical age for tonsure and minor Orders is not directly established; but, as canon 976, § 1 states: "No one, whether secular or religious, is to be promoted to first tonsure before the theological course has been begun." With respect to major Orders, canon 975 enacts: "The Subdiaconate is not to be conferred before the twenty-first year has been completed; the Diaconate before the twenty-second has been completed; the Presbyterate before the twenty-fourth has been completed." In doubt whether someone has arrived at the required age, he cannot receive the Order, because the prohibition of receiving it, as the prior thing, is of the better condition (St. Alphonsus, VI, 799; t. I, n. 229).

615 VII. Due knowledge is imposed both on religious and on seculars. Now:

1. No one, whether secular or religious, is to be promoted to first tonsure before the theological course has been begun (canon 976, § 1).
2. The Subdiaconate is not to be conferred except at the end of the third year of the theological course; the Diaconate, except when the fourth year has begun; the Presbyterate, except after the middle of that same fourth year (canon 976, § 2).
3. The theological course must have been completed not privately, but in schools instituted for this according to the plan of studies determined by canon 1365 (canon 976, § 3).
4. In order that someone can be promoted to the Episcopate, he must be endowed with the degree of doctor or at least licentiate in sacred theology or canon law in some university or Institute of studies approved by the Holy See, or at least be truly expert in those same disciplines; but if he belongs to some religious institute, he must have from his major Superiors either a similar title or at least a testimony of true expertise (canon 331, § 1, 5°).

616 VIII. Reception of lower Orders; namely, Orders are to be conferred gradually, so that ordinations by leap are altogether prohibited (canon 977; cf. Council of Trent).[1] The prohibition of receiving Orders by leap is grave, as is clear both from the gravity of the words which the cited canon and Council of Trent use, and from the attached penalty (cf. canon 2374).

[1] Session 23, canon 2 and cap. 11, 14, De reformatione.

617 IX. Observance of interstices is chiefly prescribed so that "those promoted may exercise themselves in the Orders received, according to the prescription of the Bishop" (canon 978, § 1), and may always show themselves more suitable for receiving the Presbyterate;[1] these words, however, are not to be understood as of strict precept. These interstices are to be observed:

1. The interstices between first tonsure and the Ostiariate, or between the individual minor Orders, are entrusted to the prudent judgment of the Bishop (canon 972, § 2). Nevertheless it is not licit: 1° to confer first tonsure together with any of the minor Orders; nor 2° to confer all minor Orders at the same time (cf. canon 978, § 3). Yet a contrary custom is not reproved, as happens in those cases of which we shall now speak.
2. Between the Acolytate and the Subdiaconate at least one year must intervene; between the Subdiaconate and the Diaconate, and likewise between the Diaconate and the Presbyterate, at least three months, unless the necessity or utility of the Church, in the judgment of the Bishop, requires otherwise (cf. canon 978, § 2). The year of interstices can be computed either ecclesiastically, for example from one Saturday within the Octave of Pentecost to another, or civilly, for example from the first day of March to the same day of the next following year.

As is clear from the cited canon, the Bishop can dispense from interstices for a cause of public necessity or utility, not only seculars but also religious; and because no limitation is added, he can even grant that Orders be conferred on continuous days. Seculars and non-exempt religious are dispensed by the proper Bishop; exempt religious by him who legitimately ministers Orders to them. Nevertheless, without the special permission of the Roman Pontiff it is never licit: 1° to confer minor Orders with the Subdiaconate; 2° to confer two sacred Orders on one and the same day, any contrary custom being reproved (cf. canon 978, § 3).

Note. Regulars enjoy the privilege of receiving Orders without observing interstices. Some indeed deny this, because Gregory XIII, who granted to the Society of Jesus the privilege of receiving Sacred Orders on individual Sundays and on three feast days even continuous, stated that this privilege was incommunicable. But it is more truly and more commonly affirmed; because other Pontiffs gave to other Orders so broad a communication of the privileges of the Society of Jesus that it also contains this privilege; for example, Urban VIII, by the Constitution Redemptoris nostri,[2] to the Order of the Most Holy Trinity; Alexander VIII, by the Constitution Inscrutabili,[3] to the Order of Blessed Mary of Mercy (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 797, dub. 3; De privilegiis, 9). Moreover Ferraris[4] reports that Clement VIII[5] granted to the Congregation of St. John the Evangelist in Lusitania the same dispensation from interstices, without a clause excluding communication; and the other Regular Orders certainly participate in this privilege. Then Leo XII, by the Constitution Plura inter,[6] granted anew to the Society of Jesus the faculty of receiving Orders "with interstices by no means observed," with no exclusionary clause added.

Objection. After Trent the practice became established in the Roman Curia of not granting indults except with an added or understood condition that the days of ordination should be feast days, and indeed interposed days, not continuous ones.[7]

Response: "This limitation commonly regarded only indults granted to ordinands, but not privileges granted to Regulars or even sometimes to Bishops. But the addition of such a condition again proves that privileges which had previously been granted without such clauses are not subject to the aforesaid limitations."[8] [1] Council of Trent, cap. 11-13, De reformatione.

[2] March 22, 1634, n. 2.

[3] July 28, 1690.

[4] Interstitia, n. 14-16.

[5] November 23, 1596.

[6] July 11, 1826.

[7] Cf. Decree of Innocent XII, December 14, 1693; Giraldi, II, 95.

[8] Aertnys-Damen, II, 578; cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites in one Marianopolitan case, May 18, 1883 (n. 587 in the old collection), not taken up in the authentic collection, n. 3574.

618 X. Canonical title, if it is a question of major Orders. A title of support is understood, that is, a guarantee by which provision is made for the suitable and of itself perpetual support of the ordinand. It is required, however, if it is a question of receiving major Orders (canon 974, § 1, 7°),[1] lest perhaps the ordained man be forced to provide for himself by begging or in some other way which cannot be reconciled with the dignity or offices of the state. "One ordained in sacred Orders, if he loses the title, is to provide another for himself, unless, in the judgment of the Bishop, provision has otherwise been made for his suitable support" (canon 980, § 1). "But those who, apart from an apostolic indult, knowingly ordain their own subject in sacred Orders without a canonical title or permit him to be ordained, must themselves and their successors provide the necessary sustenance to the same needy person, until provision has otherwise been made for his suitable support" (canon 980, § 2). Finally, if a Bishop has ordained someone without a canonical title with an agreement that the ordained man not ask sustenance from him, this agreement lacks all force (canon 980, § 3). With respect to the required title, observe:

1. For secular clerics the canonical title is the title of benefice, and, failing that, of patrimony or pension. This title must be both truly secure for the whole life of the ordained man and truly sufficient for his suitable support, according to the norms to be given by Ordinaries for the different necessities and circumstances of places and times (canon 979). If not even one of the titles just assigned is available, it can be supplied by the title of service of the diocese, and, in places subject to the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, by the title of mission (canon 981, § 1). Now:

a) The title of benefice is that which is founded in a benefice; but a benefice actually obtained and peacefully possessed is required. But resignation of the benefice by whose title the cleric was ordained is null unless express mention is made that the cleric had been promoted by that title and had substituted for it another legitimate title of ordination, by grant of the Ordinary (canon 1485).

b) The title of patrimony is that which is founded in patrimony. By the name of patrimony here are understood goods possessed by the ordinand and sufficiently free from mortgage or other burden. "It is indifferent whether the patrimony is constituted in stable and certain fruitful goods, or in things which are equated with immovables. Thus a lay chaplaincy can be a title of patrimony, provided those who enjoy the right of naming have pledged their good faith, with the authority of the Bishop interposed, that they will not revoke the chaplain until provision has been made for him by a suitable benefice or patrimony."[2]

c) The title of pension is that which is founded in a pension. By the name of pension is understood a stipend of support assigned to the ordinand and to be supplied to him annually, whether from ecclesiastical benefices or from other goods. Hence also a personal pension.[3]

Note. As formerly, so also now the insufficiency of one title can be supplied by another title.[4]

d) The title of service of the diocese and of mission carries with it that the ordinand, by interposing an oath, devotes himself perpetually to the service of the diocese or mission, under the authority of the local Ordinary for the time being. The Ordinary must confer on the priest whom he has promoted by the title of service of the church or mission a benefice, office, or subsidy sufficient for his suitable support (canon 981).

2. For religious, the title is established as follows:

a) For Regulars the canonical title is solemn religious profession, or the title, as it is called, of poverty (canon 982, § 1); note that solemn profession alone is a title for Regulars.

b) For religious of perpetual simple vows, whether emitted in an Order or in a religious Congregation, the title is that of the common table, of the Congregation, or another similar title, according to the norm of the constitutions (canon 982, § 2); that is, as the legitimate constitutions have established or will establish in the future.

c) Other religious, that is, religious of temporary vows, whether emitted in an Order or in a religious Congregation, and likewise novices, as regards the title of ordination, are governed by the law of seculars (canon 982, § 3). The title of the common table does not belong to these religious, because they are not yet devoted to religious life, and therefore lack the right of receiving perpetual support from the goods of the religious institute.

[1] Council of Trent, session 21, cap. 2, De reformatione.

[2] Gasparri, n. 606.

[3] Aertnys-Damen, II, 590; cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 817.

[4] Cf. Benedict XIV, Quaestiones canonicae, 46.

619 XI. Right intention; concerning this it suffices to have observed these things:

1. A merely natural intention, that is, one resting on a natural motive alone, does not suffice, so that someone can be excluded for that cause.
2. An intention at least predominantly or equally supernatural suffices to this extent, that one approaching with an intention of this kind cannot be kept away.

Chapter II. On Irregularities and Other Impediments

(St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VII, c. 5; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 19, c. 3.)

We shall speak first about irregularities and impediments in general, then about irregularities and impediments in particular, and finally about the cessation of irregularities and impediments.

Article I. Irregularities and Impediments in General

620 I. Notion. An irregularity is a canonical impediment of itself perpetual, which prohibits the reception and exercise of Orders (cf. canons 968 and 983). It is called an impediment:

1. Canonical, that is, established by ecclesiastical law.
2. Of itself perpetual, that is, one which is not removed except by dispensation; and by this reason it differs from a simple impediment.
3. Of the reception and exercise of Orders. But by the name Orders here first tonsure also comes (canon 950). The reception and exercise of Orders are prohibited, but not the exercise or acts of jurisdiction alone, such as to dispense, to absolve from a censure, to give the faculty of absolving from sins (St. Alphonsus, VII, 342). Finally, the functions of the Acolytate are no longer prohibited, since today they are permitted even to laymen.
4. It prohibits; but it does not render the reception and exercise of Orders invalid. The prohibition, however, is grave, as is drawn both from the nature of the thing and from the grave penalties to be imposed on a transgressor (canon 2374).

A simple impediment is a canonical impediment of itself temporary, which prohibits the reception and exercise of Orders (cf. canons 968 and 987). It is called of itself temporary, that is, one which can cease without dispensation or by the fact itself.

Note. Irregularities and impediments have been established so that provision may be made for the reverence due to Orders, but not by way of penalty, except perhaps secondarily if it is a question of an irregularity from delict (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 17, n. 73).

621 II. The origin of irregularities is ecclesiastical law (canon 983); the same holds for simple impediments. Moreover, the cited canon sufficiently signifies that irregularity is introduced by written law alone, not by custom.

622 III. Interpretation; concerning it observe:

1. Laws which constitute an irregularity or impediment, as restricting rights, are subject to strict interpretation (cf. canon 19).
2. Only the baptized are bound by the said laws; this, however, does not prevent a fact which had place before baptism from being able to induce irregularity after baptism, as if someone had been insane before baptism. The impubes are not exempt from the law.
3. In doubt of law - that is, in doubt whether the law has been passed or extends itself to some case - the law does not urge. In doubt of fact - that is, in doubt whether the fact which carries an irregularity or impediment with it took place, or was such as is supposed by the law - the law likewise does not urge; for it is a question of doubt of a fact founding a prohibiting law (St. Alphonsus, VII, 422, 432; t. I, n. 228);[1] moreover, in the latter doubt the Bishop can dispense for precaution (cf. canon 15).
4. Ignorance of irregularities, whether from delict or from defect, and of impediments, does not excuse from them (canon 988).

[1] Sacred Congregation of the Council, June 27, 1857 (A.S.S. I, p. 350).

623 IV. Multiplication. Irregularities and impediments are multiplied from their different causes, but not from the repetition of the same cause, unless it is a question of irregularity from voluntary homicide (canon 989). It is said:

1. From their different causes; as if someone is illegitimate and perpetrates homicide. Yet note that formally different causes suffice, and that several formally different causes can be contained in one and the same physical act; as if someone by the same blow were to kill another and attempt to take his own life.

2. Unless it is a question of irregularity from voluntary homicide. Procurement of abortion does not come under the name of homicide; for canon 985, 4° distinguishes this from homicide, and the law is of strict interpretation. But craniotomy and similar cruel killings of an infant are comprehended under that name.

Article II. Irregularities in Particular

Of irregularities, some are from defect, others from delict.

§ I. Irregularities from Defect

624 By force of canon 984 the following are irregular from defect:

I. From defect of birth: "Illegitimates, whether the illegitimacy is public or occult, unless they have been legitimated or have professed solemn vows" (cited canon, n. 1). Now:

1. Who are illegitimate, see in the treatise on matrimony.

2. Irregularity from defect of birth is removed: 1° by legitimation, about which later; 2° by dispensation (n. 644); 3° by solemn religious profession. This removes the irregularity, but does not legitimate; hence an illegitimate person solemnly professed cannot be constituted major Superior in his Religion (canon 504).

Note. Illegitimates cannot be admitted into the Seminary (canon 1363, § 1); nevertheless legitimation by the subsequent marriage of the parents suffices.[1]

[1] Pontifical Commission, July 13, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 365).

625 II. From defect of body: "Those defective in body who cannot safely by reason of weakness, or decently by reason of deformity, perform the ministry of the altar. Yet to impede the exercise of an Order legitimately received, a graver defect is required; nor because of this defect are acts prohibited which can rightly be placed" (cited canon, n. 2°). Therefore the following are irregular:

1. Those who by reason of weakness cannot safely perform the ministry of the altar. To this class belong: 1° those lacking the index finger or thumb, that is, the customary fingers with which the host is broken; likewise those who have hands so trembling that there is danger of spilling the Blood; likewise those lacking either arm or either hand; 2° the deaf who cannot hear the responding minister; but deafness supervening upon the priesthood does not stand in the way of the celebration of Mass; 3° the mute, likewise those stammering so much that they cannot pronounce whole words, or cannot except with great difficulty, so that they provoke laughter; 4° the blind, likewise the partially blind, who cannot read except very large characters; but not one who lacks only one eye, provided it is not the left eye, or the eye of the Canon, and provided the deformity is removed by a glass eye.[1] But if the eye of the Canon is lacking, a dispensation can be given if the other eye is sufficiently fit for reading the Canon without deformity (St. Alphonsus, VII, 404-409).

2. Those who by reason of deformity cannot decently perform the ministry of the altar. To this class belong: 1° those deprived of a conspicuous member, unless the deformity is removed by an artificial member. Those who lack the three rear fingers are irregular for receiving Orders, but not for exercising them; 2° those having a conspicuous member very deformed, whether the deformity arises from nature or from disease, for example from leprosy. Deformity of the legs can ordinarily be sufficiently covered by a cassock; 3° the monstrous, such as pygmies, the very hunchbacked, and hermaphrodites; yet the latter defect does not induce irregularity if it is occult and the male sex prevails. Likewise those notably limping are irregular (St. Alphonsus, VII, 410-412).

Note 1. Since all Orders, even first tonsure, are ordered to the priesthood, one excluded from the priesthood must also be regarded as excluded from the other Orders.

Note 2. To impede the exercise of an Order legitimately received a graver defect is required than to impede the reception of an Order (canon 984, 2°). Moreover, one who by reason of some defect is impeded from some exercise of an Order received is not therefore impeded from acts which can rightly be placed (canon 984, 2°); so that, for example, a blind priest can well hear confessions.

Note 3. In doubt whether some defect stands in the way of the reception or exercise of an Order, the Ordinary should be consulted (St. Alphonsus, VII, 414).

[1] With respect to partially blind priests, the Sacred Congregation of Rites established the following on January 12, 1921:

1. A partially blind priest, or one laboring under such weakness of visual power, whether accidentally or habitually, that he can read only very large type, can obtain from the Supreme Pontiff or the Sacred Congregation of Rites, unless the Bishop has been furnished with an apostolic faculty, a dispensation to celebrate either the votive Mass of the Blessed Virgin Mary or the Mass which they call the daily Mass of the Dead.

2. The conditions added in the instrument of a privilege of this kind are not mere matters of rituality and style, but obligatory in conscience.

3. If in the privilege it is said: Provided the petitioner is not entirely blind, and meanwhile he becomes blind, then he must abstain from celebrating Mass until he has obtained a new indult; and once this has been obtained, he is bound under grave obligation to use the assistance of another priest, although perhaps this obligation was not expressly added in the indult. After these things noted by the Sacred Congregation, the rules to be followed in celebration follow (A.A.S. 1921, p. 154-156).

626 III. From defect of mind: "Those who are or have been epileptic, insane, or possessed by a demon; but if after receiving Orders they have become such and it is certainly established that they are now free, the Ordinary can again permit his subjects the exercise of the Orders received" (canon 984, 3°).

1. Epilepsy must be taken in the strict sense, so that it does not comprehend a certain disease of the stomach which carries with it certain signs of epilepsy. Furthermore, if the disease supervenes upon the priesthood and recurs rarely, for example only once in a month, without emission of sounds, foaming, and notable contraction of the body, the priest will be able to celebrate privately, with a fasting priest joined to him who may complete the Mass when the disease comes on (St. Alphonsus, VIII, 399). There are also those who judge that one who had been freed from epilepsy before puberty is not irregular. But this opinion is with difficulty composed with the words of the law, which states absolutely: "Those who are or have been epileptic."

2. Insanity is understood which flows from a permanent cause; but an insane person is irregular even if he has lucid intervals.

3. Possession by a demon; concerning which, see t. I, n. 700.

4. Just as those healed cannot receive Orders without the permission of the Holy See, so neither can they receive a higher Order without the same permission.

5. Under the name of Ordinary, of which the cited canon speaks, come both the Ordinary of the place and the major Superior in an exempt clerical religion (canon 198, § 1).

627 IV. From defect of sacrament: "Bigamists, namely those who have successively contracted two or more valid marriages" (canon 984, 4°). "It is said: from defect of sacrament, because he who has married two wives cannot aptly signify the union of Christ with the Church, His one spouse" (St. Alphonsus, VII, 436). This irregularity, at least with respect to some major Orders, is of apostolic origin, according to these words of St. Paul: "Therefore a Bishop must be irreproachable, the husband of one wife... Let deacons be husbands of one wife."[1]

For irregularity it suffices that several marriages have been validly contracted; it is not required, however, that they have been consummated.

Note. One who before Baptism successively contracted several valid marriages seems, after Baptism has been received, to become irregular.

[1] 1 Tim. 3:2, 12.

628 V. From defect of reputation: "Those who are marked by infamy of law" (canon 984, 5°). It is called an irregularity from defect, because the infamy itself which induces irregularity is not a delict. What infamy of law is and who contract it, see in the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties.

629 VI. From defect of mildness: "The judge who has pronounced sentence of death" (canon 984, 6°). If a capital sentence has been established collegially, those judges are irregular who agreed to the capital penalty, not the others who cast a contrary vote. Furthermore this irregularity is not to be extended to a region where sentence of death, although pronounced, is nevertheless no longer carried into execution; nor to the case in which a leader in war orders someone to be killed without any military council having been held, because he does not proceed as judge. Nor are jurors irregular, since they pronounce sentence only about the truth of the fact, but do not establish the penalty.

Moreover, from defect of mildness the following is irregular: "Those who have undertaken the office of executioner and their voluntary and immediate ministers in the execution of a capital sentence" (canon 984, 7°). Among these are not counted: 1° soldiers who kill the enemy in battle, or by command of the leader or of a military council kill a guilty person, because they are not said to have undertaken the office of executioner; 2° those who, for example, erect the scaffold or lead the one condemned to death to the place of punishment, because they are not immediate ministers of the executioner; but indeed those who, for example, place the head of the condemned man under the machine, etc. (St. Alphonsus, VII, 461-468).

§ II. Irregularities from Delict

630 Preliminary points. In order that a delict may produce irregularity, it is required that it be a grave sin, perpetrated after baptism, except the case of which under II, and external (canon 986). It is said sin:

1. Grave; hence whatever excuses from mortal sin also excuses from irregularity. Of this kind is ignorance of the very law prohibiting the act. Grave fear, even only relatively such, necessity, indeed even grave inconvenience, generally excuse from observing a merely ecclesiastical law, and therefore bring it about that one is immune from irregularity who, from grave fear, necessity, or by reason of grave inconvenience, places an act forbidden by ecclesiastical law alone (cf. canon 2205, § 2).
2. Perpetrated after baptism; since it is not fitting that account be taken of a sin which is judged to have been entirely destroyed by baptism.

Now by force of canon 985, the following are irregular from delict:

631 I. Apostates from the faith, heretics, schismatics (canon 985, 1°); concerning whom there was discussion in t. I, n. 492. One who is a heretic in good faith does not contract irregularity; but since good faith is judged to be absent for the external forum, a dispensation is needed.

632 II. Those who, except in a case of extreme necessity, have allowed baptism to be conferred on them by non-Catholics in any way (canon 985, 2°). It is said:

1. By non-Catholics; under this name come heretics, schismatics, and, according to some, even unbelievers, since they, equally with heretics and schismatics, are truly non-Catholics. Others, and indeed most, exclude unbelievers.
2. In any way, that is, whether some rite, heretical or Catholic, was employed, or was not employed.
3. Have allowed, that is, those who asked, or at least permitted, that baptism be conferred on them by a non-Catholic.

633 III. Those who have dared to attempt marriage or to place only the civil act, either themselves being bound by the matrimonial bond, or by sacred Order, or by religious vows even simple and temporary; or with a woman bound by the same vows or joined in valid marriage (canon 985, 3°). Those attempt marriage who, conscious of a diriment impediment, approach the minister of the Church; those place the civil act who enter into civil marriage, as it is called. It is said have dared; hence, since the words of the law are judged to contain nothing useless, any diminution of imputability seems to exempt from irregularity (cf. canon 2229, § 2); except, however, diminution of imputability which flows from ignorance of the irregularity (canon 988). Therefore the following are irregular:

1. Those who, themselves bound by the matrimonial bond or by sacred Order or by religious vows, even simple and temporary, have dared to attempt marriage or place only the civil act.
2. Those who, although not bound by the matrimonial bond or by sacred Order or by religious vows, have dared to attempt marriage or place only the civil act with a woman bound by religious vows, even simple and temporary, or joined in valid marriage.

634 IV. Those who have perpetrated voluntary homicide or procured the abortion of a human fetus, the effect following, and all cooperating (canon 985, 4°).

1. Homicide is understood as committed positively and with grave fault; not, however, as merely permitted, although without sufficient cause.
2. What is understood by procurement of abortion, see in the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties.
3. The words the effect following and cooperators are referred both to homicide and to procurement of abortion. With respect to the effect, it is required that this follow from the force inflicted, not from care perhaps omitted. As regards cooperators, just as the old law, so also the new law is judged to regard only positive cooperators, or those who by command, counsel, consent, or help cooperate in homicide or procurement of abortion; likewise those who by false testimony or unjust sentence cooperate in homicide; finally those who voluntarily fight in an unjust war. This last point is said theoretically, since scarcely ever is there sufficient certainty about the injustice of a war. Negative cooperators are immune from irregularity, even if from justice they are bound to impede homicide or procurement of abortion (St. Alphonsus, VII, 367-376).

635 V. Those who have mutilated themselves or others, or have attempted to take their own life (canon 985, 5°). Mutilation is understood as the cutting off of a member, but not merely its weakening or wounding. But a cutting off of a member objectively and subjectively gravely culpable is required; when this is had, we explained in t. I, n. 526.

636 VI. Clerics exercising the medical or surgical art forbidden to them, if death follows therefrom (canon 985, 6°). It is required that the cleric gravely offend against the law which prohibits him the medical or surgical art, and that death follow from the art exercised as from its cause; hence irregularity is absent if death, for example, is to be attributed to the bad treatment of another physician who had been called in.

637 VII. Those who place an act of Order reserved to clerics constituted in sacred Order, either lacking that Order, or prohibited from its exercise by a canonical penalty, whether personal, medicinal or vindicative, or local (canon 985, 7°). The matter concerns an act of Order - not of mere jurisdiction - and of the greater or sacred Order. Considering the tenor of the canon, it seems to make no difference whether the act is placed solemnly or not, that is, with or without the insignia proper to the Order. Yet if it is placed solemnly, grave matter will more easily be had, which in the case, as in every irregularity from delict, is required. Now the following contract irregularity:

1. All, both clerics and laymen, who place an act of sacred Order while lacking the Order whose act they place; as if a simple priest were to ordain a cleric.
2. All, both clerics and laymen, who place an act of sacred Order from whose exercise they are prohibited by a canonical penalty, whether personal, medicinal or vindicative, or local; as if a priest were to celebrate in an interdicted place. But it is required that someone be impeded from the exercise of Order by force of a contracted penalty, not by a mere prohibition. Hence one who, for example, was ordained by a non-Catholic in good faith and exercises the Order without dispensation, is not irregular, although, until he has received dispensation, he is prohibited from the exercise of the Order so received.

Corollary I. The following are irregular: a priest who ministers Confirmation or performs consecrations, etc.; likewise a deacon who celebrates Mass, sacramentally absolves, or ministers Extreme Unction; likewise a subdeacon who solemnly baptizes or in solemn Mass, although without stole, acts as deacon or with stole sings the Gospel; likewise a minor cleric who in solemn Mass acts as subdeacon, that is, does all those things which are proper to the subdeacon, or with maniple sings the Epistle. But if he sings the Epistle without maniple, although he assists clothed in a tunicle, yet not doing those things which are proper to the subdeacon, he does not contract irregularity, because such assistance was declared licit by the Sacred Congregation of Rites.[1] Three things are proper to the subdeacon: to pour water into the chalice before the offertory; to touch the chalice or remove and replace the pall; to wipe the chalice after the ablution.

Corollary II. The following are not irregular: a priest who hears confessions without jurisdiction, because he does not place an act of Order which he lacks; nor a priest who, lacking the required faculty, grants a dispensation, because he places an act of mere jurisdiction; nor a deacon who solemnly baptizes or distributes the Holy Eucharist without the required commission, because, since the Order of Diaconate is ordered in some way to the said acts, he does not place an act of Order which he lacks; nor a minor cleric who without the insignia proper to the Order exercises a higher minor Order, apart from the Exorcistate; nor, as is clear, an inferior cleric who in solemn Mass without maniple fulfills several parts of the subdeacon which, namely, are permitted to him; nor finally, as is likewise clear, a layman who exercises the Acolytate or Lectorate according to today's approved practice.

Note. The Sacred Consistorial Congregation, by the decree Magni semper,[2] established certain laws for priests emigrating from Europe or from the shores of the Mediterranean to America or the Philippine Islands. If they rashly violate these, according to n. 16 of the same decree they remain suspended from divine things by the fact itself; and by violating this censure they fall into irregularity, absolution from which is reserved to the same Sacred Congregation, that is, to the Holy See.[3]

[1] March 19, 1906 (A.S.S. XXXIX, p. 119).

[2] December 30, 1918.

[3] Vermeersch-Creusen, Epitome, II, n. 258.

Article III. Impediments in Particular

638 The following are simply impeded:

I. Children of non-Catholics, so long as the parents remain in their error (canon 987, 1°).

1. By the name children are understood only descendants in the first degree; and this now also holds if the father is non-Catholic.[1]
2. Under the name of non-Catholics come heretics and schismatics; most authors exclude unbelievers.
3. It suffices that either parent be non-Catholic, even if the mixed marriage was contracted with dispensation.[2]
4. The impediment ceases by the conversion of the parents. It is disputed whether it ceases by the death of the parents; but it seems to be denied, because that had no place in the old law, from which in doubt there must be no departure.

[1] Pontifical Commission, July 14, 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 528).

[2] Pontifical Commission, October 16, 1919 (A.A.S. 1919, p. 478).

639 II. Men having a wife (canon 987, 2°). Without dispensation these cannot receive even a minor Order or tonsure itself, even if they are perpetually separated. But a married man who without apostolic dispensation has received major Orders, although in good faith, is prohibited from the exercise of those Orders (canon 132, § 3). Now:

1. A dispensation is not granted to a married man unless the wife consents and is prepared to enter religion or to emit a vow of chastity, at least for the time of the life of her consort, or unless the wife has perpetually lost the right to the conjugal debt.[1]

2. A spouse who has received sacred Order is prohibited from the use of marriage (canon 1114).

[1] Ecclesiastical law, c. 4-6 X, 3, 32; Decree of Gratian, C. 27, q. 2, c. 19-26.

640 III. Those who hold an office or administration forbidden to clerics and for which they must render accounts, until, after the office and administration have been laid aside and the accounts rendered, they have become free (canon 987, 3°). Such an office is discharged, for example, by treasurers and depositaries of public money, notaries, tutors, curators (St. Alphonsus, III, 838). After an Order has been received, offices of this kind can be accepted only with the permission of the Ordinary (cf. canon 139, § 3).

641 IV. Slaves in slavery properly so called, before liberty has been accepted (canon 987, 4°).

V. Those who are bound by civil law to ordinary military service, before they have completed it (canon 987, 5°).

1. Those who by the law itself are called to care for the sick are not said to be bound to military service.

2. Annual exercises to which citizens are bound after ordinary service has been completed do not pertain to ordinary military service.[1]

3. Those are also judged still bound by law to military service who perhaps will be called to military service, but are not yet called, either because they are unequal in age, or because they have been declared temporarily unfit.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Religious, January 1, 1911 (A.A.S. 1911, p. 37).

[2] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 344-345).

642 VI. Neophytes until, in the judgment of the Ordinary, they have been sufficiently proved (canon 987, 6°). Those are called neophytes who were converted to the faith in adult age and recently baptized; but not heretics recently converted to the faith who had at least probably been validly baptized. The establishment of this impediment corresponds to these words of St. Paul: "Therefore a Bishop must be... not a neophyte, lest, being lifted up into pride, he fall into the judgment of the devil."[1]

[1] 1 Tim. 3:2-6.

643 VII. Those who labor under infamy of fact, while it endures, in the judgment of the Ordinary (canon 987, 7°). When infamy of fact is contracted, see in the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties (cf. canon 2293, § 3).

Article IV. Cessation of Irregularities and Impediments

Certain irregularities, for example that which arises from defect of body (n. 625), and likewise simple impediments, cease when the cause ceases. The irregularity which is from defect of birth ceases either by legitimation or by solemn religious profession (n. 624). But all irregularities and all simple impediments can cease through dispensation; about this more must be said.

644 I. Power of dispensing. 1. Ordinaries can by themselves or through another dispense their subjects from all irregularities arising from occult delict, excepting that which arises from voluntary homicide or abortion, or another brought to the judicial forum (canon 990, § 1). Now under the name of Ordinaries come both Ordinaries of places and major Superiors of an exempt clerical religion (canon 488, 8°). An irregularity is brought to the judicial forum when the party is either summoned to court or cited, or spontaneously presents himself before the judge (canon 1711).

2. Any confessor can dispense from irregularities arising from delict in more urgent occult cases - excepting, however, voluntary homicide or abortion and others brought to the judicial forum - in which the Ordinary cannot be approached and danger of grave harm or infamy threatens, but only for this purpose, that the penitent may licitly be able to exercise Orders already received (canon 990, § 2). Under the name of confessor comes everyone who enjoys sacramental jurisdiction. But he can dispense those to whom his jurisdiction extends, and this, as is now commonly admitted, even outside confession.

3. By common privilege: 1° Regular Prelates, with respect to their subjects, enjoy the same faculty which belongs to Bishops by common law, according to what was said under 1.[1] 2° Regular confessors possess a similar faculty with respect to seculars (St. Alphonsus, VI, 355; De privilegiis, n. 104).

4. By proper or communicated privilege, Regular Ordinaries can dispense all their own from every irregularity. This power, which is sometimes reserved to the Superior General, is valid only for the internal forum alone, if the irregularity has arisen from voluntary homicide.[2] Indeed every year, on Monday after the first Sunday of Lent, local Superiors of Regulars, by themselves or through confessors to whom they have committed this, can dispense their subjects, even novices, living within the cloister under obedience, in every irregularity contracted on any occasion or from any cause.[3] So Vermeersch-Creusen.[4]

Yet note that, if it is a question of enormous excess or defect, recourse must be had to the Holy See, according to the norm of the ancient law stating: In a general grant there do not "come those things which someone would not likely grant in particular."[5]

Note. The Sacred Consistorial Congregation, in the Decree Redeuntibus, established these things:

"1° To all Ordinaries of places and of religious there is granted the faculty of dispensing from irregularity from defect of body with their priests returning from military service, as often as from the written testimony of the master of ceremonies who has subjected the priest to examination it is plainly established that he can, without another's help, observe with decorum all the necessary rites prescribed in the celebration of Mass; the conscience of the same Ordinaries being burdened concerning this. But in graver or doubtful cases, and as often as it is a question of those not promoted to the priesthood, recourse must be had to the Holy See.

"2° Likewise to all Ordinaries there is granted the faculty of dispensing, at least for precaution, from the irregularity which formerly was called by canonists from defect of mildness, as often as priests, clerics, and students of seminaries or religious institutes have fallen into it not from their own act but from necessity, namely compelled to take up arms and perhaps to inflict death or mutilation. But as often as it is a question of clerics in sacred Orders who, not compelled by necessity of the laws, have offered themselves of their own accord to take up arms, or have taken them up, recourse must be had to the Holy See for dispensation, with the prescription of canon 188, n. 6° remaining firm."[6]

Finally the same Sacred Congregation responded affirmatively to the doubt: "Whether clerics in sacred Orders assigned to the assistance of wounded or sick soldiers, who from this ministry preferred of their own accord to pass over to fighting military service, yet without inflicting death or mutilation, are bound, according to the mind of the Decree Redeuntibus, to obtain a dispensation from the Holy See in order to be restored to the exercise of sacred ministry."[7]

Since it is not clear that a true irregularity is had in the foregoing, a dispensation is not required except for precaution; or, too, the word dispensation can be taken in a broader sense, namely for permission; and this permission is prescribed so that someone who perhaps became unworthy in war may not exercise ecclesiastical functions.

[1] Sixtus IV, Constitution Regimini universalis, August 31, 1474, n. 14; Julius II, Constitution Virtute conspicuos, July 28, 1506, n. 27; Paul III, Constitution Licet debitum, October 18, 1549, n. 27; Gregory XIV, Constitution Illius qui, September 21, 1591, n. 27; Leo XII, Constitution Plura inter, July 11, 1826, n. 2.

[2] Cf. Pius V, Constitution Dum ad Congregationem, June 13, 1571.

[3] Cf. Paul III, Brief Exponi nobis super, March 12, 1545.

[4] Epitome Iuris Canonici, II, 261.

[5] Rule 81 in VI; cf. Clement IV, Constitution Virtute conspicuos, July 21, 1265, n. 11.

[6] October 25, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 481).

[7] March 28, 1919 (A.A.S. 1919, p. 177).

645 II. Petition for dispensation. In prayers for dispensation from irregularities and impediments, all irregularities and impediments must be indicated; indeed, if it is a question of irregularity from voluntary homicide, even the number of delicts must be expressed (canon 991). In the case in which recourse must be had to the Holy See, the prayers should be directed to the Congregation of the Holy Office, if it is a question of irregularities arising from delict against the Faith, against Baptism, against Matrimony, except the single case in which someone not yet a cleric attempted marriage with a woman joined in valid marriage, and against Order, if it is a question of those who have been dismissed by the Holy Office with a canonical penalty or censure and have violated it, or of the impediment of children born of non-Catholics and of neophytes. In other cases the prayers should be directed, for seculars, to the Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments; for religious, to the Sacred Congregation of Religious; but for all occult cases recourse can be had to the Sacred Penitentiary.

646 III. Interpretation of dispensation. 1. A general dispensation is valid - besides for the irregularities and impediments expressed - also for those concealed in good faith, with the exception of irregularity from voluntary homicide or abortion, from cooperation in the aforesaid, and from another brought to the judicial forum; there is also excepted the case in which a number of homicides lower than the number of delicts has been expressed, although in good faith. In this case the dispensation is altogether invalid, or effects nothing, whether it is a question of a general dispensation or of a particular one (canon 991, §§ 1 and 2).

2. A general dispensation for Orders is valid also for major Orders; and the dispensed person can obtain non-consistorial benefices, even with cure of souls,[1] but cannot be nominated Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, Bishop, Abbot or Prelate nullius, or major Superior in an exempt clerical religion.

[1] Ecclesiastical benefices are called: 1° consistorial, those which are usually conferred in Consistory; the rest non-consistorial; 5° with cure of souls or without cure of souls, according as they have care of souls annexed or not (canon 1411, 1°, 5°).

647 IV. Manner of dispensing. A dispensation granted in the non-sacramental internal forum is to be committed to writing; and there must be a record of it in the secret book of the Curia (canon 991, § 4). For the rest, it does not matter in what form the dispensation is granted; therefore this or a similar form can be used: I dispense you in the irregularity, or irregularities, which you have contracted for this or that cause (St. Alphonsus, VII, 353).

Dissertation IV. On Those Things which Regard Both the Ministration and the Reception of Order

Following the Code, we shall treat first of those things which must precede sacred ordination, then of the rites and ceremonies, next of the time and place of sacred ordination, and finally of the notation and testimony of ordination performed.

Part I. On Those Things which Must Precede Ordination

In setting out those things which must precede ordination, account must be taken both of the Code and of the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments[1] and of the Sacred Congregation of Religious.[2] The matters to be attended to regard the petition of the ordinand, inquiries, testimonies to be brought forward, examination, denunciations, and spiritual exercises.

[1] December 27, 1930 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 120 sq.).

[2] December 1, 1931 (A.A.S. 1932, p. 74 sq.).

648 I. Petition of the ordinand. All, both seculars and religious, who are to be promoted to Orders are to disclose their purpose before ordination at an opportune time, either personally or through others, to the Bishop or to another who in this matter acts in the place of the Bishop (canon 992); and these things are determined more fully in the cited Instructions as follows:

1. Secular ordinands:

a) As the time approaches in which candidates are going to receive first tonsure and minor Orders, they themselves are to present, at least two months beforehand, to the rector of the seminary a written petition, composed and signed by their own hand, in which they candidly signify that with a wholly free and spontaneous will they ask for first tonsure and afterward minor Orders. The said petition, to which there must be added an attestation concerning Baptism received and the sacrament of Confirmation received, is presented to the Bishop by the same rector of the Seminary, together with his personal information about the petitioner's suitability for the clerical state.

b) Before the Subdiaconate, likewise before the Diaconate and Presbyterate, they must write with their own hand a declaration, confirmed by oath, in which they acknowledge that they approach the Order with complete freedom and that they have duly considered all burdens annexed to it. The tenor of the declaration to be written and confirmed is found in A.A.S. 1931, p. 127.

2. Religious ordinands:

a) While they are still in the novitiate, before profession of temporary vows, which must altogether precede promotion to tonsure and minor Orders, they are to present to the Superior a written petition in which, in express words, they give testimony concerning their vocation to the religious and clerical state, and at the same time disclose a firm purpose of perpetually binding themselves to the clerical service in the religious state. The said petition and declaration are to be preserved in the archive.

b) Before the Subdiaconate, and in Orders of solemn vows before the emission of those vows, they must present to the Superior a testimony subscribed by their own hand and confirmed by the faith of an oath before the Superior; the tenor of the said testimony is found in A.A.S. 1932, p. 80.

649 II. Inquiries. 1. With respect to secular ordinands, the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments prescribes:

a) Before the conferral of first tonsure and minor Orders, the Ordinary will remit the candidate's petition to the rector of the Seminary or to another, with a mandate of inquiring into the suitability and qualities of the petitioner. To this end, the rector will hear the prefects and teachers of the students not only separately, but also convoked together. Furthermore, the pastor of the candidate and of his family should be heard; likewise others, if it is judged opportune, according to the norms added to the Instruction. Finally, the mind of the candidates must be explored individually by the proper Bishop or, if he is impeded, by the Vicar General, or by the rector of the Seminary, or even by those who are deputed to protect the discipline of the whole seminary.

b) Before the Subdiaconate a new investigation is to be instituted, which, however, taking account of the inquiry already previously instituted, is to inquire concerning the candidate's morals and his moral qualities.

c) Before the Diaconate and Presbyterate it is usually sufficient to keep before one's eyes the inquiries already performed, unless meanwhile new circumstances must be weighed which force one to doubt the sincere purpose of the candidate, or his moral suitability for observing the burdens and carrying out the obligations received with Sacred Orders. But if the Bishop, before someone is initiated to the Diaconate or to the priesthood, has as certain from the confessions of the one to be promoted or from other certain indications and proofs received, that he is truly destitute of a sacred vocation, he should not omit to approach the Holy See, candidly and plainly reporting the state of the matter, or the arguments by which a vehement doubt is fostered concerning the suitability of the subdeacon or deacon for bearing greater burdens worthily and faithfully. The matter is indeed of such great moment that the conscience of Ordinaries remains gravely burdened by this obligation, so that the danger may be removed of imposing hands on a deacon or priest who is unequal to sustaining the most grave burden of Sacred Orders.

2. With respect to religious ordinands the Sacred Congregation of Religious prescribes:

a) Before the minor Orders, the Superiors of religious are to institute an inquiry concerning each candidate, and are not to allow anyone to ascend to Orders so long as the requisites in the one to be promoted have not been established for them by careful scrutiny. In order to obtain this more certainly, they should seek the testimony of the Master of spirit and of others to whom, because of special frequency with the students, it has fallen to know well their life and morals. Concerning the inquiries made and the result of the scrutiny, a proper document is to be drawn up and preserved in the archive. Finally, the Superior himself, either by himself or through another endowed with knowledge and prudence and suited to gaining the confidence of the young men, should take care to question them, so that at last he may be made more certain that they freely and knowingly desire Orders in the religious state.

b) Before the Subdiaconate the Superiors must institute a new inquiry concerning the aforesaid. In order to accomplish this, they should again inspect the documents of the inquiry already performed and preserved in the archive, and compare new testimonies concerning morals and spiritual qualities with the old, so that they may well know how the young men have conducted themselves from first profession, both in religious discipline and in progress in clerical studies.

c) Before the Diaconate and Presbyterate there is no need to require such broad information and new testimonies; nevertheless Superiors should keep watch and see whether, in the interval from the conferral of one sacred Order to another, new things have happened which either disclose a doubtful vocation to the priesthood, or show none at all. In this case, after a very diligent investigation has been performed and the counsel of prudent men has been used, let them entirely forbid the reception of the new Order, and report the matter to this Sacred Congregation, by which, for individual cases, what shall have seemed more opportune in the Lord will be decreed.

650 III. Testimonies to be brought forward. 1. Seculars or religious who, as pertains to ordination, are governed by the law of seculars, are to bring forward from canon 993:

a) The testimony of the last ordination, or, if it is a question of first tonsure, of Baptism and Confirmation received.

b) Testimony concerning studies completed, required for the individual Orders according to the norm of canon 976 (n. 615).

c) The testimony of the rector of the Seminary, or of the priest to whom the candidate was commended outside the Seminary, concerning the good morals of the same candidate.

d) Testimonial letters of the Ordinary of the place in which the one to be promoted has stayed for so much time that he could have contracted a canonical impediment there. Now the time in which the one to be promoted could have contracted a canonical impediment is, regularly, for soldiers three months after puberty, and for others six months after puberty; but the ordaining Bishop, according to his prudence, can require testimonial letters even because of a shorter time of residence, and also because of time which preceded puberty. If the Ordinary of the place has not sufficiently known the one to be promoted either by himself or through others, so that he can testify that during the time in which he stayed in his territory he contracted no canonical impediment, or if the one to be promoted has wandered through so many dioceses that it becomes impossible or too difficult to seek all testimonial letters, let the Ordinary provide at least through a supplementary oath to be made by the one to be promoted. If after testimonial letters have been obtained and before the ordination has been performed, the one to be promoted has again stayed in the same territory for the aforesaid space of time, new testimonial letters of the Ordinary of the place are necessary (canon 994).

e) Testimonial letters of the religious major Superior, if the one to be promoted is enrolled in some religious institute.

2. Religious who are not governed by the law of seculars must likewise bring forward testimonial letters, namely dimissorial letters which also contain testimonies, according to these words of canon 995: "The religious Superior also, in his dimissorial letters, must testify not only that the one to be promoted has emitted religious profession and belongs to the family of the religious house subject to him, but also concerning studies completed and the other things required by law. The Bishop, after receiving these dimissorial letters, does not need other testimonial letters."

651 IV. Examination. 1. Each one to be promoted, whether secular or religious, must undergo a previous and diligent examination concerning the very Order to be received. But those to be promoted to sacred Orders are also to make trial in other treatises of sacred theology (canon 996, §§ 1 and 2).

2. It belongs to Bishops to establish by what method, before what examiners, and in what treatises of sacred theology those to be promoted must make trial (canon 996, § 3). Under the name of Bishops here also come an Abbot or Prelate nullius, a Vicar and Prefect Apostolic (canon 957, § 1).

3. This examination, whether for secular clerics or for religious, is received by the local Ordinary who ordains by proper right, or gives dimissorial letters; however, for a just cause, he can also commit it to the Bishop who is to ordain, if that Bishop is willing to undertake this burden (canon 997, § 1). But the Bishop who ordains another's subject, whether secular or religious, with legitimate dimissorial letters by which it is asserted that the candidate was examined according to the norm of § 1 and found suitable, can acquiesce in this attestation, but he is not bound to do so; and if according to his conscience he judges that the candidate is not suitable, he is not to promote him (canon 997, § 2). It is said:

a) For religious. Regulars are not excepted; but a privilege by which some are exempted from episcopal examination has remained intact.

b) Who ordains by proper right; namely, by force of canons 956, 957 (n. 601), and 965 (n. 602). The reception of the examination then also belongs to the Bishop of the diocese in which is situated the religious house to whose family the ordinand belongs, when it is a question of religious who can be dismissed by Superiors to any Bishop.

c) Or gives dimissorial letters: namely, according to canon 958 (n. 601); but not one who gives them by force of canon 964, 2° and 3°, because he does not come under the name of local Ordinary (canon 198, § 2).

d) But the Bishop, etc.; under which name here too come an Abbot or Prelate nullius, a Vicar and Prefect Apostolic (canons 215, § 2; 957, § 1).

652 V. Denunciations. 1. The names of those to be promoted to the individual sacred Orders, except religious of perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, are to be publicly announced in the parochial church of each candidate (canon 998, § 1). But the publication is to be made on a feast day of precept in church during the solemnities of Masses, or on another day and hour when a greater attendance of the people is had in church (canon 998, § 2); but the Ordinary, according to his prudence, can both dispense from this publication for a just cause, and command that it be performed also in other churches, and substitute for the publication a public posting at the doors of the church for several days, among which at least one feast day is comprehended (canon 998, § 3). Now the parochial church is the parochial church of the parish in which the candidate has domicile or quasi-domicile, or, if he is a vagabond, actually stays. If someone has several proper parishes, publication is to be made in several parochial churches.

2. If within six months the candidate has not been promoted, the publication is to be repeated, unless something else seems right to the Ordinary (canon 998, § 2).

3. All the faithful are bound by obligation to reveal to the Ordinary or pastor before sacred ordination impediments to sacred Orders, if they know any (canon 999).

4. To the pastor who performs the publication, and also to another if this seems expedient, the Ordinary is to entrust the task of diligently inquiring from trustworthy persons concerning the morals and life of the ordinands, and of transmitting to the Curia testimonial letters referring to the investigation itself and the publication. The same Ordinary should not omit to make other inquiries, even private ones, if he has judged this necessary or opportune (canon 1000).

653 VI. Spiritual exercises. 1. Those who are to be promoted to first tonsure and minor Orders are to spend at least three entire days in spiritual exercises; but those who are to be promoted to sacred Orders, at least six entire days. But if some within a half-year are to be promoted to several major Orders, the Ordinary can reduce the time of exercises for ordination to the Diaconate, yet not below three entire days (canon 1001, § 1). If some receive major Orders at a short interval, spiritual exercises for six entire days are always to be set before the sacred Order which is first to be conferred; before the other Orders, at least one day, if this can be done.[1]

2. If, after the exercises have been completed, sacred ordination is deferred beyond a half-year for any cause, the exercises are to be repeated; otherwise the Ordinary is to judge whether they are to be repeated or not (canon 1001, § 2). Ordinary is understood as the Ordinary of the place, and, if it is a question of an exempt clerical religious institute, the major Superior (canon 198).
3. Religious should perform these spiritual exercises in their own house or in another according to the prudent judgment of the Superior; seculars, however, in the Seminary or in another pious or religious house designated by the Bishop (canon 1001, § 3).
4. The Bishop is to be made certain of the spiritual exercises performed by testimony of the Superior of the house in which they were performed; or, if it is a question of religious, by attestation of the major Superior (canon 1001, § 4).

[1] Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, April 27, 1928 (A.A.S. 1928, p. 359).

Part II. On the Rites and Ceremonies of Sacred Ordination

654 I. In conferring any Order whatever, the minister is to observe exactly the proper rites described in the Roman Pontifical or in other ritual books approved by the Church, which it is licit in no way to omit or invert (canon 1002).

II. The Mass of ordination or of episcopal consecration must always be celebrated by the minister of ordination or consecration himself (canon 1003).

III. If someone, already promoted to some Orders in the oriental rite, has obtained from the Apostolic See an indult for receiving higher Orders in the Latin rite, he must first receive in the Latin rite the Orders which he has not received in the oriental rite (canon 1004).

IV. New priests must recite the Mass together with the Bishop, beginning from the Oblation, or from the words Suscipe Sancte Pater. Those things which are sung by the Bishop are read by them.[1] Concerning the intention to be formed by them, see the treatise on the Holy Eucharist, n. 160.

V. All promoted to major Orders are bound by the obligation of receiving Holy Communion in the ordination Mass itself (canon 1005). Therefore those promoted to minor Orders are not bound by the obligation. For the rest, priests are certainly bound under grave obligation, since it is a question of completing the sacrifice by them; with respect to the others, the grave obligation is not sufficiently established (St. Alphonsus, VI, 801).

VI. The obedience which priests promise to the Bishop in ordination is understood as that which is owed according to the canons. Nevertheless, there remains for them the liberty of embracing the religious state, unless the Church would suffer grave detriment from the departure (St. Alphonsus, VI, 828),[2] or the ordinand, by institution of the Holy See, is bound by oath to devote his work to the good of his diocese or of the missions (canon 542, 1°).

VII. Finally, the minister of ordination at the end enjoins these things on the ordained: "Let each one promoted to first tonsure or to the four minor Orders say once the seven penitential psalms with the Litanies, versicles, and prayers. Those promoted to the Subdiaconate or Diaconate, the nocturn of that day. But those ordained to the Presbyterate, after your first Mass, say three other Masses, namely one of the Holy Spirit, another of Blessed Mary ever Virgin, and the third for the faithful departed." Now that by these words a true obligation is imposed seems to be deduced from the very tenor of the words and from the accurate assignment of the matter; but a grave obligation is not sufficiently signified (St. Alphonsus, VI, 829). For the rest, note:

1. By the Nocturn of that day is understood the single Nocturn of the feria or the first Nocturn of Sunday or of a feast, according as the ordination took place on a feria, feast, or Sunday; nevertheless the Bishop can also assign another Nocturn instead of the first.[3] For the Nocturn the Psalms with antiphons suffice, without readings, invitatory, and hymn.[4]
2. The Masses to be said must be votive Masses, unless a feast of the Blessed Virgin Mary occurs or the Mass to be said is of the Holy Spirit. They must be said, moreover, as soon as it is licit for them to be said. But since only the quality of the Mass is prescribed, the application is free and therefore a stipend can be received for them (St. Alphonsus, VI, 829).

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, November 12, 1831, ad 11, n. 2682; September 20, 1749, n. 2404.

[2] Benedict XIV, Constitution Ex quo dilectus, January 14, 1747.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, June 27, 1899, n. 4042.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Rites, July 10, 1893.

Part III. On the Time and Place of Sacred Ordination

655 I. Time. 1. Episcopal consecration must be conferred within the solemnities of Masses, on a Sunday or on the birthday of the Apostles (canon 1006, § 1).

2. Ordinations in sacred Orders are to be celebrated within the solemnities of Masses on the Saturdays of the Four Times, on the Saturday before Passion Sunday, and on Holy Saturday (canon 1006, § 2). Yet if a grave cause intervenes, the Bishop can have them also on any Sunday or feast day of precept (canon 1006, § 3). A feast day of precept is understood, whether local or universal, even if it is not in force in the place of ordination; suppressed feast days are excluded, since in reality they are not feast days of precept.
3. First tonsure can be conferred on any day and hour; minor Orders on individual Sundays and double feasts, yet in the morning (canon 1006, § 4).
4. A custom against the times of ordinations prescribed in the preceding paragraphs is reproved; and these are also to be observed when a Bishop of the Latin rite, by apostolic indult, ordains a cleric of an oriental rite, or conversely (canon 1006, § 5). Now Regulars enjoy, whether directly or by force of communication, the privilege of receiving Orders, even sacred Orders, outside the times established by law.[1]

It is disputed, however, whether the privilege must be restricted to Sundays and feast days of precept, or can be extended to all days. Some teach that the privilege must be taken in the restricted sense, both because "in a general grant those things do not come which someone would not likely grant in particular";[2] and because from the responses of Sacred Congregations it is drawn that the words outside the times, where there is discussion of a faculty or indult, and therefore by parity of reason also where there is discussion of a privilege, must be taken in this sense: that nevertheless a Sunday or feast day of precept must be chosen,[3] yet a revoked feast is not excluded.[4] The said responses, as being particular and not published, indeed do not directly bind all others; nevertheless they seem to bind them indirectly, insofar as the sense of the privilege is drawn from them. Others judge that the privilege is extended to all days, since on the one hand the obvious sense of the words outside the times manifestly favors the more benign opinion, and on the other hand the sense of the privilege is not drawn with sufficient certainty from the said responses of the Sacred Congregations, which are particular and not published, nor expressly speak about privilege. While the doubt stands, since it is a question of a privilege, we adhere in practice to the more benign opinion (cf. canon 68).

It is further disputed what sort of feast days are understood if some privilege is expressly restricted to feast days. Some think that any double feast is also understood, both because days of this kind also come under the name feast in the Liturgy. But more probably only feast days of precept are understood, yet including revoked feasts. The reason is that only these are called feast days in Canon Law, as is drawn both from the Council of Trent[5] and from several responses of Sacred Congregations[6] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 797, dub. 4; De privilegiis, n. 116).

[1] Sixtus IV, Constitution Sedes Apostolica, February 1, 1476; Pius V, Constitution Religionis zelus, March 30, 1571.

[2] Rule of Law 81 in VI.

[3] Cf. Gasparri, cited work, nn. 52 and 72.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Rites, November 2, 1831; Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, July 19, 1838 (Collectio, n. 873).

[5] Session 24, cap. 1, De reformatione.

[6] In Nouvelle Revue Theologique 1883, p. 387, 495; cf. Aertnys-Damen, II, 578, qu. 2°.

656 II. Place. 1. A Bishop outside his proper territory, without the permission of the Ordinary of the place, cannot confer Orders in whose conferral pontificals are exercised, with the prescription of canon 239, § 1, n. 15 remaining intact[1] (canon 1008). Now to exercise pontificals in law is to perform sacred functions which, from liturgical laws, require pontifical insignia, that is, the staff and miter (canon 337, § 3). But pontifical insignia are required in the conferral of first tonsure and minor Orders when they are conferred within the solemnities of Masses.

2. General ordinations are to be publicly celebrated in the cathedral church, the canons of the church being called and present; but if in another place of the diocese, the clergy of the place being present, the more worthy church, insofar as it can be done, should be approached. But the Bishop is not prohibited, if a just cause persuades, from having particular ordinations also in other churches and likewise in the oratory of the episcopal house, or of the Seminary, or of a religious house (canon 1009, §§ 1 and 2). General ordinations are those which, for all suitable persons who desire to be ordained, take place at the times established by law, that is, on the Saturdays of the Four Times, on the Saturday before Passion Sunday, and on Holy Saturday (canon 1006, § 2); likewise, as some add, considering canon 1006, § 3, on any Sunday or feast day of precept.[2] Particular ordinations are those which are done outside the times established by law, or at least are not conferred for all suitable persons who desire to be ordained.

3. First tonsure and minor Orders can also be conferred in private oratories (canon 1009, § 3).

[1] Considering the cited canon, Cardinals enjoy the faculty of performing pontificals with throne and baldachin in all churches outside the City, after the Ordinary has been forewarned, if the church is a cathedral.

[2] Vermeersch-Creusen, Epitome Iuris Canonici, II, 270.

Part IV. On the Notation and Testimony of Ordination Performed

657 I. When the ordination has been completed, the names of the individual ordained persons and of the ordaining minister, the place and day of ordination, are to be noted in a special book, to be diligently kept in the Curia of the place of ordination, and all the documents of the individual ordinations are to be accurately preserved (canon 1010, § 1).

II. To each of the ordained there is to be given an authentic testimony of the ordination received; those who have been promoted by an outside Bishop with dimissorial letters are to show it to their proper Ordinary for the notation of the ordination in a special book to be preserved in the archive (canon 1010, § 2).

III. Furthermore, the local Ordinary, if it is a question of those ordained from the secular clergy, or the major Superior, if of religious ordained with his dimissorial letters, is to transmit notice of the celebrated ordination of each subdeacon to the pastor of baptism, who is to note it in his book of the baptized (canon 1011).

Scholion. On Penal Sanctions

658 The following are established:

I. With respect to the minister. They incur by the fact itself suspension for a year from conferral of Orders, reserved to the Apostolic See: 1° those who have ordained another's subject without the dimissorial letters of the proper Ordinary; 2° those who have ordained their own subject, who stayed elsewhere for so much time that he could have contracted a canonical impediment there, without due testimonial letters; 3° those who have promoted someone to major Orders without a canonical title; 4° those who, without prejudice to legitimate privilege, have promoted a religious belonging to a family which is outside the territory of the ordaining Bishop himself, even with dimissorial letters of the proper Superior, unless it has been legitimately proved that some one of the cases occurs of which in canon 966[1] (canon 2373).

II. With respect to the subject. 1. They contract by the fact itself suspension from divine things, reserved to the Apostolic See, who presume to receive Orders from one excommunicated, suspended, or interdicted after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, or from a notorious apostate, heretic, or schismatic; but one who in good faith has been ordained by any of these persons lacks the exercise of the Order thus received until he is dispensed (canon 2372). Dispensation from this suspension must be sought from the Holy Office, but it is scarcely, or hardly at all, granted.

2. One who maliciously approaches Orders without letters, or with false dimissorial letters, or before the canonical age, or by leap, is by the fact itself suspended from the Order received; but one who does so without testimonial letters, or while held by some censure, irregularity, or other impediment, is to be punished with grave penalties according to the circumstances of things (canon 2374).

III. With respect to minister and subject. 1. A Bishop consecrating someone as Bishop, the assisting Bishops or, in place of Bishops, the assisting priests, and the one who receives consecration without an apostolic mandate, are suspended by the law itself until the Apostolic See has dispensed them (canon 2370).

2. All, even those increased with episcopal dignity, who knowingly have promoted to Orders through simony or have been promoted, or have ministered or received other sacraments, are suspected of heresy; clerics, furthermore, incur suspension reserved to the Apostolic See (canon 2371).

IV. With respect to others. 1. A Vicar Capitular granting dimissorial letters for ordination against the prescription of canon 958, § 1, n. 3,[2] by the fact itself lies under suspension from divine things (canon 2409).

2. Religious Superiors who, against the prescription of canons 965-967,[3] have presumed to send their subjects to an outside Bishop to be ordained, are by the fact itself suspended for a month from the celebration of Mass (canon 2410).

[1] Cf. n. 602.

[2] Cf. n. 601.

[3] Cf. n. 602.

Treatise VIII. On Matrimony

(St. Thomas, Supplement, qq. 41-68; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 831-1148; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 18).[1]

We shall speak first of those things which customarily or necessarily precede matrimony; then of matrimony itself.

[1] Cf. Encyclical of Leo XIII, Arcanum, February 10, 1880; Encyclical of Pius XI, Casti connubii, December 31, 1930; Sanchez, Disputationum de S. Matrimonio libri decem; Feye, De impedimentis et dispensationibus matrim.; Gasparri, Tractatus canonicus de matrimonio; Wernz-Vidal, Ius canonicum, t. V, Ius matrimoniale; Desmet, De sponsalibus et matrimonio; Vlaming, Praelectiones iuris matrimonii.

Dissertation I. On Those Things which Customarily or Necessarily Precede Matrimony

The things which customarily or necessarily precede matrimony are: 1° betrothals; 2° the examination concerning free status; 3° publications; 4° prenuptial instruction; 5° the reception of the sacraments.

Part I. On Betrothals

We shall treat first of the notion, division, fittingness, and governance of betrothals, then of their form, then of their effects, and finally of the dissolution of betrothals.

Section I. On the Notion, Division, Fittingness, and Governance of Betrothals

659 I. The notion of betrothals. Betrothals[1] are the mutual promise of matrimony between one man and one woman who are capable. It is said:

1. A promise. Therefore a desire, a mere purpose, or a simple negotiation about entering matrimony does not suffice.
2. Mutual. Therefore it is not sufficient that only one party promise, even if the other accepts the promise; but a counter-promise also is required (canon 1017, § 1). As is clear from what has been said, betrothals constitute a contract, and indeed an onerous one; hence for them, as for every contract of this kind, consent is required:

a) Internal. If it is not internal, consent or volition is lacking in reality. Therefore a fictitious promise does not suffice, that is, one made externally but without the mind of promising. One who wishes to enter betrothals, but has the mind of not binding himself, seems not to enter betrothals, because he excludes that without which the contract cannot exist (cf. vol. I, n. 834). But one who wishes to enter betrothals acts validly, even if he has the mind of not fulfilling the obligation (cf. ibid.). In addition, one who has promised fictitiously is guilty of fraud, and therefore is bound to prevent or compensate the damage; even, if this cannot be done in another way, by now promising truly (St. Alphonsus VI, 832, 833).

b) Fully deliberate; for only an act of this kind can produce an obligation and the acquisition of a right. Hence betrothals entered, for example, in drunkenness, by one half-insane, are invalid; likewise betrothals made from a sudden movement of passion can be invalid (St. Alphonsus VI, 831).

c) Sufficiently free from error; wherefore it is enough to note:

α) Error concerning the person with whom betrothals are entered renders these betrothals invalid. The reason is that in betrothals the person constitutes the object of the contract. But error concerning the object of a contract invalidates the contract (vol. I, n. 836).

β) For the same reason, error concerning a quality or circumstances of the person with whom betrothals are entered renders these betrothals invalid if the error redounds into error concerning the person. Otherwise it does not invalidate them, because consent to the object of the contract is not lacking; nevertheless it renders them rescindable if, had the error not existed, the betrothals would not have been entered; practically, if the error concerns a notable defect. These things indeed do not of themselves hold for all onerous contracts, but with regard to betrothals they are admitted in law, as will be explained later (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 18, n. 2).

d) Sufficiently free from fear. Fear which so disturbs the use of reason that the act is not fully deliberate invalidates betrothals (vol. I, n. 840). These things set aside:

α) Fear, whether arising from within, or from a necessary cause, or inflicted justly or unjustly by a free cause, does not invalidate betrothals. The reason is that fear does not prevent the contracting party from furnishing perfect consent. But every contract is intrinsically constituted by perfect consent (St. Alphonsus VI, 844; cf. vol. I, n. 840).

Objection. Grave fear, inflicted unjustly and for extorting consent, invalidates betrothals at least by canon law, just as it invalidates matrimony (canon 1087, § 1), according to that rule: connected things ought to have the same reckoning.

Response. The assertion seems to have to be denied; for since the application of the assigned rule is in itself rather difficult, the Code certainly, if it had wished the rule to be applied, would have stated that betrothals are invalidated by the said fear in the same way as matrimony.

β) Fear renders betrothals rescindable if it has been inflicted both unjustly and by the other contracting party, and has given cause to the contract. If one of the assigned conditions is lacking, fear does not render betrothals rescindable (vol. I, n. 840).

e) External, namely insofar as it must be made known to the other party. Of itself, however, it is indifferent whether it is manifested by words, in writing, or by a sign, for example by a nod. But, with positive law considered, it is required that the legitimate form, to be explained later, be observed (St. Alphonsus VI, 838).

f) Made known to the other party, as was explained in vol. I, n. 834.

g) Made known by the promisor or in his name (vol. I, ibid.).

h) Simultaneous, the one with the other, because otherwise they do not truly agree into one. Of itself, however, it suffices that one consent while the consent previously given by the other persists (vol. I, n. 834).

3. Of matrimony; others say of future matrimony, so that betrothals may be more expressly distinguished from matrimony not yet consummated, which formerly came under the name of betrothals concerning the present, while betrothals properly so called were called betrothals concerning the future.

4. Between one man and one woman. Hence there would not be betrothals if someone promised matrimony to two at the same time.

5. Capable, that is, it is required that the promisors be both actually capable of promising matrimony and at least later capable of contracting it; these things, however, need explanation, which we shall add in the corollaries.

[1] Betrothals are so called from promising, namely from the practice of the Romans, by which one who wished to take a girl as wife addressed her father or guardian with the solemn formula: "Do you promise?" and he responded: "I promise." She who was promised was the bride, that is, the promised one; he to whom she was promised was the bridegroom; he who promised was the sponsor; the whole contract was betrothals; the day on which it was entered was called sponsal.

660 Corollary I. Betrothals entered by those who are held by a diriment or prohibitive impediment are to be judged thus:

1. If they are entered absolutely, they are invalid; for then matrimony is not reached insofar as it is valid and licit. The same must be said if they are referred to a time at which the impediment has not yet ceased.

2. If they are referred to the time at which the impediment has ceased:

a) They are valid if they are entered under the condition of an impediment removed without dispensation. Hence if someone says: "I shall contract with you if you have been converted to the Catholic faith," he is bound to wait for a reasonable time; and if the other is converted to the faith, the betrothals become absolute. Yet it is especially disputed whether these things also hold for the impediment of bond, namely when a married person promises matrimony to someone under the condition of the matrimonial bond being dissolved by death. Many judge that betrothals of this kind are invalid, because just as a subsequent matrimony extinguishes betrothals entered with a third person, so an antecedent matrimony ought to prevent valid betrothals from being entered with a third person. But the antecedent seems to have to be rejected, as we shall say in n. 677.

b) If they are entered under the condition of an impediment removed by dispensation, for example if someone says: "I shall contract with you if the Church dispenses," it is more disputed whether they are valid and consequently, when the dispensation has been obtained, become absolute by that very fact. Now then:

α) It seems that an affirmative answer is to be given if the dispensation can reasonably be expected, and it is a question of a matrimony which neither under a moral respect is dangerous, nor of itself injurious to the sacrament; for example, if someone should enter betrothals with his niece. The reason is that the promise regards matrimony insofar as it is valid and honorable in the full sense. The positive law, which, with certain declarations considered, formerly seems to have stood in the way, no longer seems to have to be urged, since the Code is silent.

β) It seems that a negative answer is to be given if it is a question of a matrimony which remains full of danger and of itself inflicts injury upon the sacrament; for example, if someone should enter betrothals with a heretic. The reason is that, as it seems, an obligation to enter such a matrimony cannot arise.[1]

Corollary II. Betrothals entered by children without the knowledge of their parents are of themselves contracted illicitly; nevertheless they are valid, unless the matrimony itself is illicit for them. Likewise betrothals contracted against the will of parents are valid or invalid according as the matrimony itself which is promised must be held licit or illicit (St. Thomas II-II, q. 104, a. 5; Supplement, q. 47, a. 6; St. Alphonsus VI, 849, 851).

Corollary III. Betrothals, just like other contracts, can also be entered through a procurator (n. 666); likewise by letters, if only the law of nature is considered, but not if canon law is considered (n. 666).

[1] The Holy Office, December 12, 1888, responded: "Betrothals between one Catholic party and the other schismatic or heretical party are illicit and therefore invalid, unless they are celebrated after previous legitimate dispensation" (Collectanea, n. 1696).

661 II. Division of betrothals. Betrothals are distinguished into:

1. Solemn and non-solemn, according as the legitimate form is or is not observed.
2. Absolute and conditional, according as they are neither suspended by a condition concerning the future nor made less firm by a resolutory condition; or are entered under some one of the aforesaid conditions.
3. Confirmed and bare or simple, according as an oath or earnest money or other stipulations, for example penalties against those withdrawing, are or are not added.

662 III. Fittingness of betrothals. Betrothals indeed are not prescribed; nevertheless the contract of betrothals is "decent and fitting before the celebration of matrimony. For in this way the betrothed obtain the opportunity of examining their morals and character. For since it is a question of entering matrimony, which induces a perpetual and indissoluble bond, the greatest circumspection and mature deliberation are needed, lest, if persons unequal in morals are joined to one another in perpetuity, marriages should obtain unhappy outcomes. Moreover, it is necessary that certain preparations precede the celebration of nuptials; and lest the delay thence arising render uncertain the hope of future matrimony, the betrothal pledge is aptly interposed. Furthermore, when betrothals are arranged, there is an easy occasion for the consent of parents, or of those who have authority over the betrothed, to intervene. Although that consent is not necessary at least for validity, nevertheless it is useful in the highest degree, and clandestine betrothals or inconsiderate negotiations are already wont of themselves to offend parents (cf. the cited c. 1.3. CXXX. q. 5). Finally, when betrothals have been publicly celebrated a just time before matrimony, impediments which perhaps stand in the way of matrimony are more easily detected."[1]

[1] Wernz-Vidal, Ius canonicum, t. V, n. 81.

663 IV. Governance of betrothals. Since betrothals by their nature are ordered to matrimony, their governance belongs to the same persons to whom the governance of matrimony belongs, that is, if it is a question of baptized persons, to the Church (n. 718). Now only the Supreme Pontiff enjoys legislative power in it, so that Bishops cannot, for example, establish impediments of betrothals. Nevertheless judicial power belongs to them, or the power of judging betrothal cases. What belongs to the pastor is explained in n. 670.[1]

[1] Cf. n. 670.

Section II. On the Form of Betrothals

664 The legitimate form of betrothals, likewise of a unilateral promise, is set forth in these words: A promise of matrimony, whether unilateral or bilateral or betrothal, is invalid for both forums unless it has been made by a writing signed by the parties and either by the pastor or the local Ordinary, or by at least two witnesses (canon 1017, § 1). If both parties or either party does not know how or cannot write, for validity this is to be noted in the writing itself and another witness is to be added, who signs the writing with the pastor or local Ordinary, or with the two witnesses of whom in § 1 (canon 1017, § 2).

665 I. Explanation of the legitimate form. For the legitimate form of betrothals it is required: 1° that it be contracted by writing; 2° that the day, month, and year of the contract entered be affixed; 3° that the writing be duly signed.

1. That it be contracted by writing, in other words, either one or both parties must promise matrimony to the other in writing. But if the promise is made under a condition, likewise if a time is added for ending the obligation, these seem necessarily to have to be expressed; for they so alter the promise that, if they are omitted, it is not designated according to its substantial elements. Other stipulations of some moment also are usefully expressed. Moreover, it is not required that the parties themselves draw up the writing; nor does anything prohibit a determined formula from being printed, or made lithographically or in another way, for the common use of contracting parties. The signature, however, is to be made as will soon be explained.

2. The day, month, and year on which the betrothals are entered are to be affixed. The affixing of a false date stands in the way of the value of the contract; since in that case the date is not in reality affixed. Some, however, relying on the analogy of civil law, judge that betrothals are valid if the inscription of the false date arose from an involuntary error, and the true date can be drawn from the context.

It is doubted whether or not the affixing also of the place in which the promise is made is required for validity. For the affirmative opinion there militates first, that custom interprets the signing of the date in such a way that the place also is affixed. Next, where there is question of betrothals signed by the pastor or by the Ordinary, the affixing of the place is very greatly conducive to a document which can firmly prove the validity of the betrothals, since for the aforesaid persons to sign validly it is required that they perform this within the place of their territory. That the Sacred Congregation of the Council, when it responded that the date had to be added, was silent about the affixing of the place is perhaps explained by the fact that it was not asked about it. Since the matter is doubtful, the affixing of the place should not in practice be omitted.[1]

3. That the writing be duly signed. On this point observe:

a) The writing of itself must be signed either by the parties together with the pastor or local Ordinary, or by the parties together with two witnesses. If both parties or either party does not know how or cannot write, for validity this is to be noted in the writing itself and another witness is to be employed, who is joined either as a second witness to the pastor or Ordinary, or as a third witness to the other witnesses. It is not required and it does not suffice that the party who does not know how or cannot write affix a mark in place of name and surname. It suffices that one witness be added, whether both parties or either party does not know how or cannot write, since the law speaks only of another witness to be added. The party who alone can write seems not to be bound to sign. For the obvious sense of the law sufficiently insinuates that the signature of the pastor, or of two witnesses, and of the added witness suffices. Nevertheless, on account of some doubt, it is expedient to follow the safer course.

One does not know how to write who is ignorant of letters; one cannot write who is physically impeded from writing. One who affixes his name while guided by the hand of another seems to sign validly if he is only helped, so that he himself exists as the principal cause. But if someone is like a mere instrument, for example because he has in no way been taught the method of writing or has a hand suffering from perfect paralysis, he affixes his name invalidly. Likewise one who uses a typewriter signs invalidly; for he must be said to print rather than to write. In addition, that manner of signing is destitute of every sign of authenticity. For the same reasons one signs invalidly who employs an instrument which reproduces the name in the likeness of an engraved character.

Who come under the name of pastor and local Ordinary, see n. 734. Now the pastor seems to sign validly even if he has not yet obtained possession of the benefice, since the law, where it speaks of the promise of matrimony, does not speak of a requirement of this kind, and requires only that one be pastor. For the same reason, the same seems to have to be said of a pastor excommunicated by sentence, or interdicted, or suspended from office, or declared such. But the pastor and local Ordinary cannot grant to another, for example to a vicar or secretary, the faculty of signing the promise of matrimony as an authorizing witness.[2]

As witnesses there can be employed any who, with the law of nature considered, are capable of giving testimony.[3] Hence infidels, heretics, women, and those under puberty are not excepted, although, where Catholics can be had, it is not fitting that heretics or infidels be employed. It is clear that even the pastor and Ordinary can be taken as common witnesses.

b) The pastor or local Ordinary taken as an authorizing witness is bound to sign the writing within his own territory. But this also suffices. Therefore it is not required that the pastor or Ordinary who is employed be proper to either contracting party, for example by reason of domicile; but it is required and suffices, both for validity and for liceity, that he be the pastor or Ordinary of the place in which he signs the contract.[4]

c) The parties are bound to sign the writing in one context with the pastor or Ordinary, or with the two witnesses;[5] in other words, it is required that each be present to all the others as they sign.

[1] Sacred Congregation of the Council, July 27, 1908, to II. This and similar responses were mere explanations of law previously existing and inserted into the Code; hence we judge that they persist, with canon 6, 2°, and canon 23 considered.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, March 30, 1908, to VI.

[3] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, March 12, 1910, to IV.

[4] Sacred Congregation of the Council, March 30, 1908, to VII.

[5] Sacred Congregation of the Council, July 27, 1908, to I.

666 As custom has it in civil contracts, so also it is expedient that the betrothal contract be read aloud before it is signed. Likewise it is useful that the document which contains the contract be preserved with the pastor or Ordinary of the place who signed it, while a copy is nevertheless handed to each party.

Corollary. Since the parties are bound to sign the writing in one context with the pastor or local Ordinary, or with two witnesses, betrothals cannot be contracted between absent persons except through a procurator. That they can be entered through a procurator follows from the fact that otherwise provision would not have been made for contracting betrothals by those who cannot meet with one another. Next, unless the contrary is established, it must be judged that with regard to contracts the faculty persists of doing through another what one can do through oneself. As to the manner of employing a procurator, however, it is expedient to observe what canon 1089 establishes concerning marriages to be contracted through a procurator.[1]

[1] As matrimony, so says the cited canon, is validly entered through a procurator, there is required a special mandate to contract with a certain person, signed by the mandator and either by the pastor or Ordinary of the place in which the mandate is made, or by a priest delegated by either, or by at least two witnesses. If the mandator does not know how to write, this is to be noted in the mandate itself and another witness is to be added who also signs the writing; otherwise the mandate is invalid. If, before the procurator has contracted in the name of the mandator, the latter has revoked the mandate or fallen into insanity, the matrimony is invalid, although either the procurator or the other contracting party may have been ignorant of these things. For matrimony to be valid, the procurator must perform his office personally.

667 II. Necessity of the legitimate form. a) A promise of matrimony, whether bilateral or betrothal, or unilateral, made without the statutory form, is void or invalid for both forums (canon 1017, § 1).

Therefore informal promises made after the statutory form, as being wholly void, of themselves induce no obligation either of justice or of fidelity. I said of themselves; for it cannot be denied that, accidentally, an obligation can arise from an informal promise. Thus, for example, one would be bound to restore damage who deceitfully entered betrothals with a person ignorant of the invalidating law, and by acting thus was the cause why the other party suffered damage. Likewise one would be bound by the obligation of restitution who deceitfully had intercourse with a betrothed woman who judged that the private betrothals entered by her were valid. Finally, one who after informal betrothals had been entered no longer wished to enter matrimony would be bound to warn the other party, who would be foreseen as about to make expenses for the future matrimony, etc.

Question. Whether an informal promise of betrothals is also invalid?

Response. We judge that this must be denied, because the law speaks only of a promise of matrimony; the force of this argument is increased by the fact that an invalidating law is to be interpreted strictly (cf. canon 19).

b) Although an informal promise of matrimony is invalid, nevertheless it does not seem illicit. For the end of the legislator is sufficiently obtained by the mere invalidation of the informal promise, without a prohibition being added. Add that a law which not only invalidated but also prohibited informal promises would provide occasion for innumerable and continual transgressions, and therefore would not be conducive to the common good.

668 III. Subjects of the legitimate form. The following are subject to the form of betrothals:

1. Catholics of the Latin rite, not of the Oriental rite (canon 1), as is clear.
2. Baptized non-Catholics. It is indeed true that heretics and schismatics were immune from the Pian law, even insofar as it regarded betrothals; but the Code repeats that immunity only with respect to marriages. It is also true that heretics and schismatics, according to many, are not held by many ecclesiastical laws;[1] but they extend this immunity only to laws which more nearly regard the sanctification of souls rather than public order. Finally, the special reason which holds for exemption from the form of celebration of matrimony, namely the preventing of concubinage, cannot be urged here.

Corollary. Catholics of the Latin rite are subject to the form whether they enter betrothals among themselves, or with a Catholic of the Oriental rite, or with a non-Catholic, baptized or not baptized. Baptized non-Catholics are subject to the form whether they contract betrothals among themselves, or with a Catholic, or with a non-Catholic, baptized or not baptized. The non-baptized are not subject to the form if they enter betrothals among themselves; but they are subject to it if they do so with a baptized person.

[1] We abstract from the question whether or not this opinion is sufficiently founded (cf. vol. I, n. 129).

669

Forms of Betrothals

I.

Betrothals signed by the contracting parties and the pastor.

James..... son of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... and Anna..... daughter of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... by these letters contract betrothals.

At Rome, on the day..... of the month..... of the year.....

Signature of the bridegroom

Signature of the bride

Signature of the pastor

II.

Betrothals signed by the contracting parties and two witnesses.

James..... son of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... and Anna..... daughter of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... by these letters contract betrothals.

At Rome, on the day..... of the month..... of the year.....

Signature of the bridegroom

Signature of the bride

Signature of the first witness.

Signature of the other witness.

III.

Betrothals signed by the pastor and a witness.

James..... son of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... and Anna..... daughter of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... by these letters contract betrothals. The contracting parties, or one of the contracting parties, N.N., cannot write. Hence N.N., son of....., has been taken as witness.

At Rome, on the day..... of the month..... of the year.....

(Signature of the party who can write.)

Signature of the pastor

Signature of the witness taken.

IV.

Betrothals signed by three witnesses.

James..... son of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... and Anna..... daughter of..... and..... born on the day..... of the month..... of the year..... and living in..... by these letters contract betrothals. The contracting parties, or one of the contracting parties, N.N., cannot write. Hence N.N., son of....., has been taken as third witness.

At Rome, on the day..... of the month..... of the year.....

(Signature of the party who can write.)

Signature of the first witness

Signature of the second witness

Signature of the third witness.

Section III. On the Effects of Betrothals

Chapter I. On Absolute Betrothals

670 The effects of betrothals are distinguished into natural and canonical. The natural effects are: 1° the obligation of entering matrimony; 2° incapacity validly to contract betrothals with a third person; 3° incapacity licitly to contract matrimony with a third person; 4° the obligation of carrying on betrothal conversation with the bride or bridegroom; 5° the obligation of avoiding betrothal conversation, and still more lustful acts, with another. There is added 6° a canonical effect situated in this, that an action is given, not indeed for seeking the celebration of matrimony, but for the reparation of damages, if any are owed (canon 1017, § 3).

I. The obligation of entering matrimony; and indeed an obligation of commutative justice, and a grave one. The obligation must be fulfilled: if the time for fulfilling has been prefixed, at this time; if it has not been prefixed, at the time when the other party reasonably asks for matrimony. If the other party through shame or fear does not ask, it is not licit to wait beyond a reasonable time (St. Alphonsus VI, 845). Thus the matter stands of itself; for by reason of a just cause it is licit to defer nuptials. Moreover, commonly it is to be advised that the betrothed enter matrimony as soon as it can conveniently be done, lest namely they remain longer in danger of sin.

What if one party refuses to enter matrimony, but the other urges the betrothals?

Response 1. The confessor, if the refusing party truly brings forward a just cause, can pronounce that he or she can withdraw from the betrothals. If the party brings forward a more or less doubtful cause, or, to take the matter practically, if he or she brings forward changed affection as the cause, there will be added a founded fear lest the matrimony have a bad outcome; this fear constitutes a cause for withdrawing from betrothals (n. 680). If a cause for withdrawing is in reality lacking, the confessor should proceed by advising rather than by commanding; at times also a dispensation can be obtained from the Holy See (n. 681).

Response 2. The pastor should furthermore keep before his eyes these words of canon 1017, § 3: "From a promise, although it is valid and no just cause excuses from fulfilling it, no action is given for seeking the celebration of matrimony; nevertheless one is given for the reparation of damages, if any are owed." This action, however, is of mixed forum and does not suspend the celebration of matrimony with another.[1]

II. Incapacity validly to contract betrothals with another person. Therefore betrothals of this kind are not only illicit, but also destitute of every value, unless they are contracted under the condition: "If the prior betrothals are dissolved." The reason is that no one can confer on someone a right in a thing after he has already granted a right in it to another. But if intercourse has followed upon betrothals entered with another, the prior bride does not lose her right. Nevertheless she should be advised to yield her right spontaneously, unless she herself would suffer notable damage from it, or regard the very matrimony not contracted as a grave damage (St. Alphonsus VI, 848).

III. Incapacity licitly to contract matrimony with another; which is clear.

IV. The obligation of carrying on betrothal conversation with the bride or bridegroom, namely according to the circumstances and honest morals of the region; which likewise is clear.

V. The obligation of avoiding betrothal conversation, and still more acts of lust, for example fornication, with another. Here, however, it is disputed whether fornication with a third person of itself takes on the nature of injustice, and of grave injustice. Now with St. Alphonsus (VI, 847) the nature of grave injustice is denied with sufficient probability, because the arguments of the adversaries prove the matter in no way, as will be clear from the objections to be discussed.

Objection 1. Fornication renders the promised thing, that is, the body in order to matrimony, notably worse.

Response. First, what the adversaries suppose is deservedly called into doubt, namely that by betrothals there is induced an obligation of justice of handing over the body such as it was at the time of the promise. If it is a question of another promise, this will sometimes be clear from the circumstances; but in the case at hand the matter seems doubtful. Next, it is by no means clear that the body is rendered notably worse in order to matrimony by fornication.

Objection 2. Fornication is at least implicitly excluded by the betrothal contract, so that fornication is opposed to the contract and therefore to justice.

Response. It is not clear that fornication is excluded by the betrothal contract itself. In addition, if the assertion is admitted, the same seems to have to be said about immodest touches committed with another person, so that these too would be opposed to justice.

Note 1. As was said above, from betrothals, even if they are valid and here and now bind, no action is given for seeking the celebration of matrimony, but one is indeed given for the reparation of damages, if any are owed (canon 1017, § 3; p. 508).

Note 2. Effect of a unilateral promise. A unilateral promise of matrimony is presumed to have induced a grave obligation of justice. For an obligation of this kind is judged to have been undertaken if, as we suppose to have taken place, witnesses or a public writing are added to the promise. As to an action arising from a unilateral promise, however, the things said under the note concerning an action arising from betrothals hold, as is clear from the documents cited there.

[1] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 345).

Chapter II. On Conditional Betrothals

671 I. Betrothals under a condition concerning the past or the present are valid or not valid according as the condition has been fulfilled or has not been fulfilled. Those who doubt about the fulfillment are bound to inquire into the truth, and meanwhile to abstain from betrothals and matrimony with a third person.

II. Betrothals under a condition concerning the future are to be judged thus:

1. If the condition is resolutory,[1] the betrothals are valid from the beginning, but, when the condition has been fulfilled, they are dissolved by that very fact.
2. If the condition is suspensive and honorable,[2] the following must be said:

a) While the condition has neither been fulfilled nor definitively failed, the betrothals remain in suspense. Nevertheless the parties are bound to wait and not maliciously to impede, indeed honestly to procure, the event of the condition. Betrothals entered with a third person would be invalid, unless they were made under the condition: "if the prior conditional betrothals definitively fail." The reason is that betrothals of this kind would regard an illicit thing.

b) When the condition has been fulfilled, the betrothals by that very fact become absolute, without prejudice, however, to what was said concerning the condition: "If ecclesiastical authority dispenses" (n. 660). Except the case in which either party legitimately revoked consent before the condition was fulfilled. But what if consent was illegitimately revoked before the condition was fulfilled? In the case, the obligation of entering matrimony certainly remains, not however by force of the betrothals, which cannot be perfected when the will has ceased, but by force of the obligation of repairing the injury (vol. I, n. 848).

c) When the condition has definitively failed, the betrothals fall. Yet one who maliciously impeded the fulfillment of the condition is bound to repair the right of the injured party; and the injured party has a right to true consent.

3. If the condition is suspensive and base,[3] these things hold:

a) While the condition has not yet been fulfilled, the betrothals more probably remain in suspense. Nevertheless each party can and must revoke consent; and when consent has been revoked by either party, the contract altogether vanishes.

b) When the condition has been fulfilled, and consent has not been revoked, the betrothals more probably become absolute (vol. I, n. 849, compared with n. 833).

[1] "I promise you matrimony, but if that matter does not succeed, I shall be free."

[2] "I promise you matrimony if the parents consent."

[3] "I promise you matrimony if you admit intercourse."

Scholion. On Accidental Elements of Betrothals

672 I. A penalty is added to betrothals if the parties agree that something is to be paid by the one withdrawing. A stipulation of a penalty to be paid by one withdrawing justly is illicit and invalid, as being injurious to the freedom of matrimony. But a penalty established against one withdrawing unjustly is valid and licit (St. Alphonsus VI, 853, q. 1). Appeal can no longer be made to positive law, from which many, while others contradicted, were drawing the contrary, since the Code is silent about it.

II. A mode is a burden added by one party to a perfected betrothal contract and accepted by the other.[1] A mode differs from a suspensive condition. For the latter brings it about that the contract is not perfected before the condition has been fulfilled, while an added mode supposes a perfected contract. Nevertheless the added mode can be intended in such a way that, if the other party does not fulfill it, neither is the prior party bound to sustain the betrothals.

III. Earnest money is a thing given to the other party in pledge of future matrimony. When matrimony follows, the earnest money can be reclaimed, unless the mind of the betrothed was contrary. If matrimony does not follow, it must be restored by the one withdrawing unjustly, but can be kept by the other party. If one withdraws justly from the betrothals, custom has it that each party restore the earnest money received (St. Alphonsus VI, 852).

IV. Iocalia are gifts given to the other party, not as a pledge of future matrimony, but as a sign of love and under the hope of nuptials. When matrimony follows, they can be retained. If matrimony does not follow, they must be restored by the one by whose fault the matrimony is not contracted, except if they are small and are not reclaimed by the other party; but they can be retained by the other party. If through the fault of no one matrimony is omitted, custom has it that each party restore the iocalia received, perhaps excepting smaller ones.

V. An oath added to valid betrothals, or to a valid unilateral promise, adds to the obligation of justice an obligation of religion. When the betrothals fall, the obligation of the oath falls (canon 1318, § 1).

An oath added to invalid betrothals, or to an invalid unilateral promise, for example from defect of legitimate form, is invalid, because the accessory follows the principal (canon 1318, § 1).

[1] "I promise you matrimony; you, however, must do this or that."

Section IV. On the Dissolution of Betrothals

Preliminary note. Of the causes for dissolving betrothals, some by their own force dissolve or extinguish them; others furnish to both parties, or to one party, the right of dissolving or rescinding them. In addition, the causes have force even if the betrothals have been confirmed by oath. They are:

673 I. Mutual consent, sufficiently free from error, fraud, and fear (St. Alphonsus VI, 855, 856).

674 II. A notable defect pre-existing the betrothals and afterwards detected; likewise a notable change supervening upon the betrothals, which render matrimony more burdensome, and, if they had been known or foreseen, would have deterred from the betrothals. The reason is drawn from this, that betrothals, as ordered to matrimony, which carries with it a perpetual society of life, are judged to have been contracted under the condition: "provided the matter is as it appears, and is not changed for the worse"; or at least with the right retained of dissolving them if the aforesaid condition is not fulfilled (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 43, a. 3, ad 3; St. Alphonsus VI, 86). Indeed, even a prudent and persistent suspicion of a notable defect or change suffices, because it is a grave inconvenience to contract with such a suspicion.

In the cases set forth, the dissolution of betrothals can be made by one party or by both, according as one or both would suffer inconvenience if, notwithstanding the change, matrimony were contracted. Commonly, however, the inconvenience will not follow for the party who has suffered the change, but for the other alone.

The defect and change can concern goods: 1° of the body, as if there is detected or supervenes a grave and incurable disease, or stinking breath, notable deformity, loss of sight or hearing, etc.; 2° of the soul, as if the bridegroom is detected to be, or becomes, irreligious, drunken, a gambler, prodigal, harsh in morals, etc.; 3° of fortune, as if the bridegroom or bride is detected to be, or becomes, poor, or is frustrated of a great inheritance or expected lucrative office, etc. And these things indeed are admitted by all, because in the cases set forth the detected defect and the supervening change render matrimony more burdensome. But:

It is disputed whether a notable supervening change furnishes the right of withdrawing when, if it had been foreseen, it indeed would have impeded the betrothals, but nevertheless does not render matrimony more burdensome; for example, if an unexpected and rich inheritance comes to someone. Now a sufficiently probable opinion affirms, because each person is presumed to have contracted betrothals under the condition: "provided no notable change supervenes." Add that, according to common estimation, the neglect of great gain is equated with grave damage; and this being posited, from the acceptance of men the change of which we speak is morally the same as that which renders matrimony more difficult. Finally, in the case in which a rich inheritance comes to someone, there enters a disparity of condition, which, as will be said under III, involves a cause for dissolving betrothals. St. Alphonsus would not indeed praise, but neither would he condemn, the one who, when marriage with an exceedingly better bride has been offered, should choose this bride (VI, 876).

Note. A party laboring under an occult defect is bound to manifest this to the other party before the betrothals or, once the betrothals have been contracted, before the nuptials, as follows: 1° "If the defect would render the nuptials pernicious, as if it were infamy, leprosy, the French disease, or another contagious disease, he is bound to manifest it or to withdraw from the nuptials, unless the other party labors under the same defect. The reason is that, just as one sins against justice who sells harmful merchandise to another who believes it good, so a fortiori one does who wishes to contract matrimony with a pernicious defect. 2° But if the defect would not render the nuptials harmful, but only less desirable, namely if the bride were poor though she is thought rich, ignoble though noble, deformed though beautiful, corrupted though a virgin, then, although she herself cannot deceive the man by pretending that she is immune from such a defect, nevertheless she is not bound to manifest the defect; but even when questioned she can dissemble by answering equivocally" (St. Alphonsus VI, 864-865). Thus custom has it. If, however, there is grave danger that the defect may afterwards be detected and provoke grave discords, it is to be advised that it be manifested (St. Alphonsus, ibid.).

Disparity of condition and the dissent of parents are partly referred to the cause set forth.

675 III. Disparity of condition, whether arising from disparity of status, or from nobility, or from disparity of fortune:

a) If it is so great that the matrimony is illicit because of dishonor to the family, the betrothals are null from the beginning.

b) If it is not so great, but nevertheless notable, the betrothals are valid and of themselves irrescindable, if the parties contracted them with knowledge of the disparity. If it is afterwards detected, or supervenes after the betrothals have been contracted, these can commonly be rescinded.

676 IV. The dissent of parents operates thus:

1. Due dissent, namely because the matrimony is illicit, argues that the betrothals were null from the beginning (St. Alphonsus III, 644; VI, 851, 877).

Here it is customary to ask whether a prodigal promise of matrimony as such, that is, one made to a bridegroom or bride of much inferior condition or fortune, but without dishonor to the family, is illicit and invalid, as being about an illicit thing. To this question we respond with St. Alphonsus (VI, 851): If no reason honors a promise of this kind, it regards a venially evil thing, and therefore is null. "Nevertheless, since the fault of prodigality is not more than venial, any middling just cause can remove the vice of prodigality. Hence the bridegroom who marries an unequal woman will be sufficiently excused if he knows in her some special prerogative, namely of providence, devotion, great honesty, or even of some natural endowment, on account of which the bridegroom judges that he will lead a quiet life with her. Hence it is inferred that scarcely can a case occur in which the bridegroom would not be bound to marry her, because very rarely will there be lacking some one of these causes which will excuse the fault of prodigality."

2. Reasonable dissent, although not due, will often be a reason why it is licit to rescind betrothals. Almost the same must be said about less reasonable and continuing dissent, so that hope of removing it is lacking; in which case children often will be able, especially if the dissent was not foreseen, to withdraw from the betrothals, namely on account of the inconveniences joined to their execution and the evils to be feared. Nevertheless, commonly they are not bound to this, the more so because, once matrimony has been contracted, the inconveniences not so rarely vanish.

677 V. Violation of fidelity furnishes to the innocent party the right of withdrawing, while the guilty party remains bound until the innocent party has used his or her right. To this are referred:

1. Courtship with a third person, or frequenting with a view to matrimony. A fortiori:
2. Betrothals attempted with a third person, or even a gratuitous promise of matrimony made to a third person.
3. Matrimony entered with a third person. Here, however, it is disputed whether by matrimony of this kind the betrothal obligation is extinguished on both sides, or whether for the unfaithful betrothed the obligation is only suspended, namely during the matrimony. Now with St. Alphonsus (VI, 875) and others, against many, it seems that one must say that for the unfaithful party the obligation is only suspended. The reason is that an obligation contracted, if an impediment is placed illegitimately, is not extinguished except by an impediment which by its nature is simply indissoluble. But matrimony is not by its nature simply indissoluble. Indeed, by its proper nature it cannot be dissolved by the authority of the spouses, but it can be dissolved in another way, for example by the death of a spouse. This is confirmed from the fact that matrimony does not extinguish, but only suspends, the obligation of a vow of religion, so that the one vowing, when the spouse has died, is bound to fulfill the vow (St. Alphonsus, ibid.).

Objection. In the case of a vow, the supervening bond is of a different nature, while the bond of matrimony is of the same nature as the bond of betrothals.

Response. This seems to make no difference; in other words, only this must be considered, whether or not the subsequent bond is by its nature simply indissoluble; because the nature of an obligation as such carries with it that it must always be fulfilled as long as it can be fulfilled. Hence if the subsequent bond is temporal, the obligation is only suspended.

4. Fornication; concerning which several things must be noted.

a) Antecedent fornication of the bride, afterwards detected, gives to the bridegroom the right of withdrawing; and this holds even if the bride was oppressed by force, because according to common estimation she is of less worth than she was thought to be. Antecedent fornication of the bridegroom, detected after the betrothals, confers on the bride the right of withdrawing: 1° if the bridegroom is detected to have acted thus frequently; 2° if he has received offspring from another; 3° if it is hard for the particular bride to marry a man who has fornicated even once (St. Alphonsus VI, 861). I said "for the particular bride"; namely, it must be considered in what manner the bride is to be judged to have contracted the betrothals. Now a bride to whom it matters little whether or not the bridegroom had previously fornicated is not judged to have entered betrothals under the condition: "provided the bridegroom is not detected to have committed fornication."

b) Subsequent fornication of either party gives to the other party the right of withdrawing. This holds even if the bride was oppressed by force, since according to common estimation she has been made of less worth, so that a notable change has supervened which renders matrimony more burdensome. If both parties have fornicated, the bridegroom, as is now commonly admitted, can withdraw. But it is disputed whether of itself the same is licit for the bride. Most of the older authors deny, relying on this reason: the fornication of the bride is judged both far more shameful and consequently also a graver delict than the fornication of the bridegroom, so that an uncompensated excess favors only the bridegroom. There are, however, those who judge that in many regions, according to common estimation, the bridegroom is rendered almost as contemptible by fornication as the bride, perhaps the lowest common populace excepted; and if this is admitted, the subsequent fornication of both also furnishes to the bride the right of withdrawing.

Corollary. The things said about fornication hold almost also for immodest touches with a third person, especially if they are more frequent or are done with several persons. Indeed, familiarity with a third person can be such that it furnishes to the other party the right of withdrawing, the more so because in this whole matter attention must also be given to a founded fear that fidelity may afterwards be violated. Finally, the aforesaid things are also to be applied to other graver crimes perpetrated by the bridegroom or bride, for example homicide, bestiality, heresy (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 43, a. 3, ad 6; St. Alphonsus VI, 860).

5. The departure of either party into a distant region, from which return cannot be hoped for soon, if it happens while the other party is unaware or unwilling, gives to this party the right of marrying another. The reason is that the long expectation of some good involves a notable diminution of happiness (St. Alphonsus VI, 860).

6. Delay of matrimony produces these effects:

a) If the term is prefixed solely for urging the obligation, the party prepared can withdraw: 1° if the other party delays matrimony without a just cause, because by acting thus he or she violates fidelity; 2° if he or she delays justly, but with grave inconvenience to the prepared party, which can be prevented by withdrawing.

b) If the term is prefixed for ending the obligation: 1° if both parties have been at fault, each party is free, both because of the stipulation added to the contract and because each party seems to have yielded his or her right; 2° if neither party has been at fault, each seems free, namely with the stipulation added to the contract considered; 3° if one party has been at fault, certainly the other party is freed; but it is disputed whether the prior party also is free if the other urges matrimony. Now commonly it seems to have to be denied, because no one is judged to have bound himself in such a way that the obligation ceases even if he himself is the cause why it was not fulfilled (St. Alphonsus VI, 867, 868).

The term is commonly prefixed for urging the obligation; yet sometimes the contrary can be drawn from the tenor or from the circumstances.

678 VI. Election of a more perfect state; concerning which both the liceity of choosing a more perfect state and the effect of the election made must be explained.

1. Liceity of choosing a more perfect state. Notwithstanding betrothals, it is licit to choose a more perfect state, as follows:

a) It is licit to choose the religious state. The reason is drawn from the fact that in betrothals there is a tacit condition: "Unless I shall have chosen the religious state"[1] (St. Alphonsus VI, 870, dub. 1). Likewise it is licit to emit a vow of choosing the religious state; for it is licit to vow what it is licit to perform.

b) It is disputed whether it is licit: 1° to choose the clerical state; 2° to emit a private vow of perpetual chastity. It is affirmed with sufficient probability, because there is probably in betrothals the tacit condition: "Unless I shall have chosen a more perfect state" (St. Alphonsus VI, 873). It is illicit to choose mere celibacy without a vow of perpetual chastity; for one who has promised matrimony is not judged to have retained the right of not marrying.

Furthermore, the election, of itself licit, of a more perfect state is illicit: 1° if someone obtained intercourse under the promise of matrimony; 2° if someone is bound to repair damage which can be repaired by matrimony alone; 3° if someone does not proceed sincerely, namely from desire of a more perfect state, but fraudulently, for example so that he or she may be freed from the betrothals and, after obtaining a dispensation, may marry another (St. Alphonsus VI, 873; III, 649).

2. Effects of the election made. a) The election of any more perfect state, even of mere celibacy, frees the other party; both because the one choosing the more perfect state renounces the betrothals, and because, when one party withdraws voluntarily, the other party by that very fact recovers liberty (St. Alphonsus VI, 873).

b) Religious profession itself and the reception itself of major Order extinguish the betrothals, or free both parties. The reason is that they constitute a state which cannot be composed with the execution of the betrothals and is of itself perpetual. It is disputed whether the same effects are produced, or whether for the receding party they only suspend the obligation, by: 1° the emission of a vow of chastity to be observed perpetually in the world; 2° mere entrance into Religion; 3° mere entrance into a seminary; 4° reception of minor Order; 5° vows alone of entering Religion, or of embracing major Order, or of emitting a private vow of perpetual chastity. Nevertheless it seems one must say that at least entrance into Religion or a seminary, likewise the reception of minor Order and vows alone of entering Religion, of receiving Sacred Orders, or of emitting a vow of chastity, only suspend the betrothals for the one entering or vowing, because through those things a state of itself perpetual is not yet undertaken (St. Alphonsus VI, 870-873).

[1] Cf. chapters 2 and 7, De conversione coniugatorum.

679 VII. A supervening diriment impediment. 1. If an indispensable and perpetual impediment supervenes, that is, one in which a dispensation cannot be given or hoped for, for example impotence, the betrothals fall for both parties. Nevertheless the party who, conscious that the impediment would arise, caused it, must compensate the damage that will follow for the other party.

2. If an impediment supervenes which indeed is indispensable but temporal, namely the impediment of bond, the betrothals are dissolved for the party to whom fidelity has been violated; for the other party they are more probably only suspended, as was said in n. 677. Meanwhile this party is bound to reparation of the damage inflicted on the other party.

3. If a dispensable impediment supervenes, the party who did not induce the impediment is freed. The party who gave cause to the impediment, if indeed he or she acted conscious that the impediment would arise, must procure a dispensation, even with grave inconvenience; but if he or she was ignorant of the impediment, after the manner of an inculpable debtor from contract, more probably he or she is bound to ask for a dispensation if it can conveniently be obtained; indeed even with grave inconvenience, if the damage of defloration must be repaired or infamy prevented (St. Alphonsus VI, 857, 858).

Concerning a supervening prohibitive impediment, for example a vow, etc., enough has been said in n. 678.

680 VIII. Founded fear that the matrimony will be unhappy. For no one is judged to have bound himself to a burden of this kind.[1]

[1] Austrian Instruction, February 2, 1856.

681 IX. Dispensation can be granted by the Supreme Pontiff, as is clear both from the fact that he can dissolve the firmer bond of ratified matrimony (canon 1119), and from the practice of the Holy See. Inferior Prelates lack this power; nevertheless, when the cause has been examined and is manifest, they can declare or judge that betrothals are invalid, dissolved, or rescindable. For dispensation a just cause is required; and in general this can be said to be present if from the dispensation greater goods are foreseen than from the execution of the betrothals.

Note. One who without a just cause withdraws, or unjustly has introduced a cause for withdrawing, is bound to compensate damage arising from his or her unjust action; but not the gain to which the other party would have acquired a right only after the nuptials had been contracted.

Part II. The Examination, Especially concerning Free Status

682 "Before matrimony is celebrated, it must be certain that nothing stands in the way of its valid and licit celebration" (canon 1019, § 1). Now "in danger of death, if other proofs cannot be had, unless contrary indications are present, the sworn affirmation of the contracting parties that they have been baptized and are detained by no impediment suffices" (canon 1019, § 2). Outside danger, however, there must be certainty about these things according to the ordinary norm of law, and indeed both of common law and of particular law constituted by statutes or legitimate custom (cf. canon 1020, § 3).

With common law considered, an examination is prescribed, which is customarily called an examination concerning free status, because it especially regards that status.

I. The necessity of the examination is clear from canon 1020, § 1: "The pastor, to whom the right belongs of assisting at matrimony, is diligently to investigate beforehand, at an opportune time, whether anything stands in the way of contracting matrimony."

II. The examiner is the pastor to whom the right belongs of assisting at matrimony (canon 1020, § 1); but since generally the pastor of the bride assists at the matrimony, he in practice acts as examiner.

III. Matter of the examination. The pastor is to investigate:

1. Into the dwelling of the betrothed, if any doubt remains, namely so that he may judge whether in reality it belongs to him to assist at the matrimony, with canon 1097 considered (n. 736); in which parishes the publications are to be made (n. 686); whether either party is a vagrant, in which case license of assisting must be sought from the Ordinary (n. 695).
2. Into impediments which perhaps stand in the way of matrimony. "Then," says canon 1020, § 2, "he is also to question the bridegroom and the bride separately and cautiously, whether they are detained by any impediment."[1] This inquiry seems also to have to be performed if the pastor is morally certain about immunity from impediments. The inquiry especially regards public impediments; the investigation of occult impediments, which cohere with sin, seems able to be left to the confessor.
3. Into consent, namely, "whether they give it freely, especially the woman" (the cited canon).
4. Into baptism; for "unless baptism has been conferred in his own territory, the pastor is to require testimony of baptism from each party, or only from the Catholic party if it is a question of matrimony to be contracted with dispensation from the impediment of disparity of cult" (canon 1021, § 1).

An extract from the baptismal register can serve very greatly for detecting impediments, if there are any, for example of bond, consanguinity, etc.; that this end may be obtained more securely, it is especially to be advised that the testimony of baptism be of a more recent date.

5. Into Confirmation; for betrothed "Catholics who have not yet received the sacrament of Confirmation are to receive it before they are admitted to matrimony, if they can do this without grave inconvenience" (canon 1021, § 2).[2]
6. Into the requisites from civil law; namely, let him see whether the betrothed have fulfilled or can fulfill the requisites from law.

7. Into the consent of those whose consent is required, even with civil law alone considered. Moreover, "the pastor is gravely to exhort minor children of families not to enter nuptials without the knowledge of their parents or when their parents are reasonably unwilling; but if they refuse, he is not to assist at their matrimony unless he has first consulted the local Ordinary" (canon 1034). Civil law is especially to be attended to with regard to minors and soldiers.
8. Into Christian doctrine, "whether they have been sufficiently instructed in Christian doctrine, unless on account of the quality of the persons this last question appears useless" (canon 1020, § 2).[3]

Note. "It belongs to the local Ordinary to give special norms for an investigation of this kind by the pastor" (canon 1020, § 3).

[1] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 1.

[2] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 14.

[3] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 1; Constitution of Benedict XIV, Nimiam licentiam, May 18, 1743, n. 10; Instruction of the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, July 7, 1921 (A.A.S., p. 348).

Part III. Publications

683 Publications are understood as public announcements by which the faithful are informed of nuptials to be contracted by certain persons, made for this end, that one who knows an impediment of matrimony may disclose it to the pastor. Publications are also called announcements, proclamations, banns.[1] The following are to be considered:

[1] Bannum is a German word which signifies: 1° a place of jurisdiction, for example the bann of Rome; 2° the exercise of jurisdiction by public edict, for example by proclamation of matrimony.

684 I. Existence of the law. "It is to be publicly announced by the pastor between whom matrimony is to be contracted" (canon 1022).[1] Nevertheless "publications are not to be made for marriages which are contracted with dispensation from the impediment of disparity of cult or mixed religion, unless the local Ordinary, according to his prudence, scandal being removed, has judged it opportune to permit them, provided that apostolic dispensation has preceded and mention of the religion of the non-Catholic party is omitted" (canon 1026).

[1] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 6.

685 II. The object of the law is set forth in canons 1023-1025 inclusive, especially canon 1024: "Publications are to be made on three continuous Sundays and other feasts of precept in church during the solemnities of Masses, or during other divine offices to which the people frequently come." The following must be explained:

686

1. Parish of the publications. The publications must be made in the parish of the betrothed, as is deduced from the fact that they are to be made by the proper pastor (canon 1023, § 1). Now the parish of the betrothed is that in which they have domicile or quasi-domicile (canon 94, § 1), or, if it is a question of vagrants or of those who have only diocesan domicile or quasi-domicile, actual residence (canon 94, §§ 2 and 3). If a party has stayed in another place[1] for six months after having attained puberty,[2] the pastor is to set forth the matter to the Ordinary, who according to his prudence is either to require publications to be made there, or to prescribe that other proofs or conjectures concerning freedom of status be gathered (canon 1023, § 2).[3] If there is some suspicion of a contracted impediment, the pastor is to consult the Ordinary even for a shorter stay; and the Ordinary is not to permit the matrimony unless first the suspicion is removed according to the norm of § 2 (canon 1023, § 3). Finally, particular statutes are to be observed which regard publications and are not opposed to common law; these commonly especially regard marriages of soldiers and vagrants.

a) If the betrothed belong to one and the same parish, the publications are to be made in that parish alone.

b) If the betrothed belong to different parishes, the publications must be made in both.[4]

c) If either party or both belong to several parishes, the publications must be made in each parish.

d) The marriages of minor children are proclaimed both in the quasi-domicile which they perhaps have acquired and in the domicile of those under whose power they are subject; for they necessarily retain this (canon 93, § 1).

e) The marriages of adult children are also to be published in the domicile of the parents, unless they have renounced this. But concerning this renunciation it is often difficult to be certain, so that doubt remains whether or not they are to be announced in the domicile of the parents. In practice, one who follows the current practice is safe.

f) The marriages of vagrants, besides in the parish in which they have actual residence, in some places by force of particular law must also be announced in the parish of origin, or at least in that in which they have stayed longer.[5]

g) The marriages of soldiers, besides in their proper parish, in some places by force of particular law must also be proclaimed in the parish in which they actually stay.

[1] It is not said "elsewhere in a parish," so that the precept does not have force if it is a question of another parish of the same place.

[2] A minor, if male, is judged pubescent from the completed fourteenth year; if female, from the completed twelfth year (canon 88, § 2).

[3] The Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918, to the doubt: If a party, after attaining puberty, has stayed for more than six months in very distant and remote regions, from which, in order that regular attestation of freedom of status may be had, a longer time is required, while nevertheless the celebration of matrimony is urgent, does the oath of the party with the testimony of two, or if two cannot be had, at least of one, who stayed with him or her in those regions, suffice in the case for making freedom of status certain? responded that the matter is remitted to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, who can prescribe other proofs, not excluding a supplementary oath, according to the norm of canon 1023, § 2 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 345); cf. Instruction of the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, June 4, 1921, under 4° (A.A.S. 1921, p. 348).

[4] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 7.

[5] Thus, for example, in the Netherlands (Provincial Council of Utrecht, p. 123).

687

2. The person publishing. Publications of matrimony must be made by the proper pastor (canon 1023, § 1). He, however, can also satisfy the law through another, for example through a vicar, through any other priest, through a deacon, etc. Nevertheless it is less fitting to use a layman or even a simple cleric.

688

3. Number of publications. Publications must be made three times, as is clear from what is to be said under 4.

689

4. Time of the publications. They must be made:

a) On Sundays and other feasts of precept, whether general or particular, and this even if perhaps only the obligation of hearing Mass persists. But it is doubtful whether publications can be made on general feasts in those places where the said feasts do not have force. On suppressed feasts publications cannot of themselves be made; but just as the local Ordinary can dispense from publications for a legitimate cause (canon 1028), so also for a just cause in particular cases he can permit them to be made on abrogated feasts, provided solemn offices must be held as before, and the attendance of the people at church is frequent.[1]

b) On continuous Sundays and other feasts of precept, that is, succeeding one another in such a way that no other Sunday or feast is interposed. As to the practice of making publications only on Sundays, while omitting feasts occurring within the week, if it is immemorial, it can be tolerated by the Ordinary if it cannot prudently be removed (canon 5). But if three feast days should immediately succeed one another, the practice seems licit that on those days at most two publications be made. For since otherwise the time for revealing impediments is so brief, the letter of the law is deservedly judged not to have to be urged. If, however, all the announcements are made on three continuous and suitable days, the obligation is satisfied (cf. St. Alphonsus VI, 992).

Note. Publications are not prohibited during the closed time.

c) During the solemnities of Masses, that is, during the parochial or principal Mass, as authors commonly taught, or during other divine offices to which the people frequently come, for example in a private Mass, in Vespers or Lauds, as they are called; but not, as it seems, in offices at which a determined class of the faithful, for example members of some Congregation, rather than "the people," is present. Moreover, it suffices that the publications be made in one of the suitable offices.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, June 17, 1780; April 19, 1823.

690

5. Place of the publications. They must be made in church (canon 1024); under this name here comes primarily the parish church, as follows from the fact that they must be performed by the pastor (canon 1023, § 1). Yet it seems that they can also be made in a filial church which has a territory separated from the territory of the mother church, namely for those who belong to the territory of that church.[1] Finally, accidentally they can be made in a church or chapel which for a time holds the place of the parish church, or in which extraordinary divine offices for the parishioners are celebrated.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of the Council, in the Cologne case, in Revue Theologique francaise 1901, p. 117.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, July 1, 1724; Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 8.

691

6. Manner of making the publications. The formula is set forth by the Roman Ritual, and it must be observed at least as to substance. Finally, it is clear that the announcements are to be made in the vernacular language, and with a living and clear voice.

Note. The local Ordinary can, for his territory, substitute for publications the public affixing, at the doors of the parish church or another church, of the names of the contracting parties for a space of at least eight days, yet in such a way that, in this space, two feast days of precept are included (canon 1025).

692 III. Gravity of the law. The precept obliges even if the pastor is certain about the free status of those about to marry. For it is founded on the presumption of common danger, so that it does not cease even if in a particular case the absence of danger is established. The obligation, however, is grave from its genus. Therefore it is a grave sin: 1° to omit all announcements; 2° to omit two, or to neglect the greater part of the precept. It is light to omit one (St. Alphonsus VI, 990), likewise, for example, to make two announcements outside the church, etc., provided nevertheless that there is a sufficiently large concourse of people.

693 IV. Dispensation. 1. The person competent to dispense, besides the Supreme Pontiff, is the proper local Ordinary, who can dispense from publications even to be made in another diocese (canon 1028, § 1). Furthermore, in many dioceses, by delegation of the Bishop, the faculty of dispensing at least from one or even two publications has been granted to Deans. If there are several proper Ordinaries, for example if those about to marry belong to different dioceses, the one in whose diocese the matrimony is celebrated has the right of dispensing; but if the matrimony is entered outside their proper dioceses, any proper Ordinary can dispense (canon 1028, § 2).

2. A cause for dispensing is certainly required, and indeed, if the one dispensing is inferior to the Holy See, it is required for validity (canon 84, § 1). Since the law is grave, a grave and urgent cause also is required; but it is more easily licit to dispense from one or two publications than from all. For dispensation from all, a most grave cause is required.[1]

The causes are customarily distinguished into necessary, that is, such as those in which dispensation ought to be granted, and gracious, that is, such as those in which it can be granted but ought not be granted.

a) Necessary causes are enumerated by St. Alphonsus (VI, 1005): 1° "If there is probable fear lest the matrimony be maliciously impeded; ... 2° if the matrimony is necessary for avoiding damage or infamy of the contracting parties or offspring; namely, if defloration has preceded, and there is fear lest the man change his will. Likewise, if one of the betrothed were at the point of death and there were offspring to be legitimated; ... 3° if danger of soul, body, or fortune is imminent; ... 4° if the bridegroom is immediately about to set out far away, and the necessity of contracting is urgent on account of one of the causes described above; 5° if the parents or guardian intend that the virgin marry an unworthy man"; 6° if the closed time is near at hand, and on the one hand nuptials then cannot be entered without scandal, while on the other hand the matrimony cannot conveniently be deferred, etc.

b) A gracious cause is present if the dispensation seems useful or reasonable, as if it is a question of the marriage of great princes; if dispensation is sought by a man of great merit, for whom to deny it would be grave; if those about to marry are old or of very disparate condition; indeed, in the case, embarrassment can be so great that it is a necessary cause for dispensing (St. Alphonsus VI, 1006). Moreover, Bishops are generally warned not to dispense easily.[2]

3. Things to be observed in the petition for dispensation. It is sought by the pastor who assists at the matrimony; but by the confessor if the matrimony must be contracted or convalidated secretly. The petition is made in the name of those about to marry. In the supplication there are to be expressed: 1° the names, surnames, parish, and commonly also diocese of the petitioners; with regard to widows or widowers, it is expedient that the name and surname of the deceased spouse be added; 2° what is sought, namely whether dispensation from one, two, or all announcements; 3° the cause why dispensation is sought; 4° the Ordinary is to be made certain of the truth of the cause, into which namely the very person who petitions for dispensation is bound to inquire.[3]

[1] Cf. Constitution of Benedict XIV, Nimiam licentiam.

[2] Constitution of Benedict XIV, Satis vobis, November 17, 1741.

[3] Let the formula of supplication be: Most Excellent and Most Reverend Lord, Peter N. and Anna N. humbly seek from Your Excellency dispensation from one, or from two, or from all announcements. The cause is... After diligent examination, I have found and testify that the things set forth are true, Your Excellency's most humble servant, N.N., pastor at N.

694 V. A cause excusing from announcements is had when on the one hand there is a true necessity of entering matrimony, and on the other hand dispensation cannot be obtained in time or cannot be sought without danger of violating the sacramental seal. Now the necessity of entering matrimony is commonly present if one of the necessary causes for dispensing enumerated above is had. Nevertheless, let the matter be treated cautiously and prudently, and if dispensation can be obtained in time, it is to be sought (St. Alphonsus VI, 1003 under 7, 1007 dub. 2).

695 VI. Things to be noted. Once the investigations and publications have been completed, the following things are to be attended to:

1. The pastor is not to assist at matrimony before he has received all necessary documents (canon 1030, § 1), namely testimony of baptism perhaps conferred elsewhere (p. 518), testimony of investigations and publications perhaps instituted elsewhere (n. 686), testimony of the license of the Ordinary or his delegate if it is a question of a vagrant (p. 524), and, according to the circumstances, testimony of the death of the previous consort, etc. A document of Confirmation is not required, although Catholics, before they are admitted to matrimony, must receive that sacrament if they can do this without grave inconvenience (canon 1021, § 2).

If, with the nuptial day pressing and unable conveniently to be deferred, the testimonial letters have not yet been received, the pastor, insofar as can be done, is to take care that they are received. If time is lacking, recourse is to be made, if it can be done, to the Ordinary; otherwise the pastor proceeds by epikeia, provided he is certain about free status.

2. Furthermore, the pastor is not to assist, unless a reasonable cause requires otherwise, before three days have elapsed from the last publication (canon 1030). According to canon 34, § 3, 3°, the day of the last publication is not computed in these three. If matrimony has not been contracted within six months, the publications are to be repeated, unless it seems otherwise to the local Ordinary (canon 1030, § 2).

3. When doubt has arisen about the existence of some impediment: 1° the pastor is to investigate the matter more accurately, by questioning under oath at least two trustworthy witnesses, provided it is not a question of an impediment from knowledge of which infamy would arise for the parties, and, if it is necessary, the parties themselves also; 2° he is to perform or complete the publications, if the doubt arose before the publications had been begun or completed; 3° he is not to assist at matrimony without consulting the Ordinary, if he has prudently judged that the doubt still remains (canon 1031, § 1).

4. When a certain impediment has been detected, one must proceed thus:

a) If the impediment is occult, the pastor is to perform or finish the publications, and is to bring the matter, while suppressing the names, to the local Ordinary or to the Sacred Penitentiary (canon 1031, § 2, 1°). But if everything is already prepared for the nuptials and the matrimony cannot be deferred without probable danger of grave evil until a dispensation is obtained from the Holy See, and not even the local Ordinary can be approached, or cannot be approached except with danger of violation of secrecy, the pastor is to proceed according to the norm of canon 1045, as will be explained later.

b) If the impediment is public and is detected before the publications have been begun, the pastor is not to proceed further until the impediment is removed, even if he knows that dispensation has been obtained only for the forum of conscience; if it is detected after the first or second publication, the pastor is to complete the publications and bring the matter to the Ordinary (canon 1031, § 2, 2°).

5. Finally, if no impediment has been detected, neither doubtful nor certain, the pastor, after the publications have been completed, is to admit the parties to the celebration of matrimony (canon 1031, § 2, 3°).

Question. What if the pastor or the Ordinary alone knows an impediment, and matrimony is publicly sought?

Response 1. The pastor cannot assist at the matrimony, lest he concur in an invalid matrimony and in the grave inconveniences perhaps to follow from it; these are to be prevented even more by the pastor than by others (St. Alphonsus VI, 1002).

Response 2. The Ordinary, for the same reason, cannot give a sentence in favor of the matrimony. Nor does it stand in the way that by preventing the matrimony he acts as judge and witness; "because someone can well be judge and witness when it is a question of impeding sin" (St. Alphonsus VI, 1002).

Question. What if the impediment is detected in sacramental confession?

Response 1. If the impediment is public, the confessor is to warn the penitent about the necessity of dispensation and send him or her to the pastor; or, if the confessor is the pastor, he is to warn the penitent to manifest the impediment to him outside confession.

Response 2. If the impediment is occult, the confessor likewise generally is to warn the penitent about the necessity of dispensation, and he himself can obtain it for the forum of conscience. I said generally, because the penitent can sometimes be left in good faith, according to what was said in n. 396.

6. In order that the validity of matrimony to be contracted by vagrants may be consulted the more, canon 1032 establishes: "Except in a case of necessity, the pastor is never to assist at the marriage of vagrants of whom in canon 91 unless, after the matter has been brought to the local Ordinary or to a priest delegated by him, he has obtained license to assist." Now:

a) Under the name of vagrants there certainly come those who, having uncertain seats, lack domicile, quasi-domicile, and monthly residence.

It is disputed whether those too are comprehended who are destitute of domicile and quasi-domicile, but not of monthly residence. Now they seem to be comprehended, because canon 1032 expressly speaks of "the matrimony of vagrants of whom in canon 91." Now, with canon 91 considered, those of whom we speak are vagrants.

Objection. Canon 1097, § 1, 2° distinguishes those who enjoy monthly residence from vagrants.

Response. With canons 1032 and 1097, § 1, 2° considered, it seems that one must concede and say that the word vagrants in canon 1032 is used in a broader sense, and in canon 1097, § 1, 2° in a more restricted sense.

b) The Ordinary whose license is required is the Ordinary of the place in which the matrimony is contracted.

c) The aforesaid license is required even if only one party is a vagrant. This is deduced from the end of the law, namely of preventing invalid marriages; and this end is urgent whether both parties or only one is a vagrant.

d) License is not required in a case of necessity, for example if there is danger that the parties, if license is awaited, would contract merely civilly; if there is necessity of undertaking a long journey, which is so urgent that time for obtaining license does not remain, etc.

Scholion I. On the Obligation of the Faithful

696 I. All the faithful are bound to reveal impediments, if they know any, to the pastor or Ordinary before the celebration of matrimony (canon 1027); this obligation, as is drawn from the nature of the thing prescribed, is of itself grave. It is said:

1. If they know any, that is, if they have certain or probable knowledge of a diriment or prohibitive impediment. Therefore one is not bound who heard the matter from a person not worthy of trust, unless there is hope of further detecting the truth (St. Alphonsus VI, 994).
2. They are bound to reveal impediments before the celebration of matrimony to the pastor or local Ordinary. But one who warns those about to marry that a dispensation must be sought or that matrimony must not be entered, foreseeing that the warning will be beneficial, satisfies the obligation. Indeed, if it is a question of an infamous impediment, he must first give the aforesaid warning, unless hope of fruit is lacking, or another cause excusing from the warning is present (St. Alphonsus, ibid.).

II. The following are excused from the obligation set forth:

1. One who knows that a dispensation has been obtained or sought, or at least will be sought.
2. One who cannot reveal the impediment without grave inconvenience to himself or his own, or to the community, is excused from the burden of revelation, although he can be bound to warn those about to marry.
3. One who knows an impediment under secrecy is excused thus:

a) If the secret is natural or promised, he is not excused, because the reverence due to the sacrament and the avoidance of evils arising from invalid matrimony prevail over the obligation annexed of itself to the said secrets. And this holds even if an oath has been added (St. Alphonsus VI, 994).

b) If the secret is committed, and it is a question of one who is not bound by force of office to keep the secret, he is not excused for the reason given above. But one who by force of office is bound to keep the secret is excused, because the common good, to which it is of the highest interest that such a secret be kept, prevails over the reverence of itself due to the sacrament and over the avoidance of the evils which are annexed to invalid matrimony.

Scholion II. On the Obligation of the Confessor

697 I. If the confessor detects an impediment which requires dispensation for the external forum, let him send the penitent to the pastor. If the confessor himself is the pastor of the penitent, let him exhort the penitent to open the impediment to him outside confession.

II. If the confessor detects an occult impediment, let him generally warn the penitent about the necessity of dispensation, and, if the penitent consents, he can obtain it for the forum of conscience. The faculty of the confessor sometimes to dispense will be spoken of later.

Part IV. Prenuptial Instruction

698 I. The necessity and matter of instruction are set forth in canon 1033: "Let the pastor not omit, according to the diverse condition of the persons, to teach the betrothed:

1. "The sanctity of the sacrament of matrimony," that is, the nature and dignity of matrimony, and the manner of preparing themselves worthily for the reception of the sacrament; wherefore "let him vehemently exhort them, before the celebration of matrimony, to confess their sins diligently and piously receive the Most Holy Eucharist."
2. "The mutual obligations of spouses," especially the licit use of matrimony.
3. "The obligations of parents toward offspring," especially the manner of conferring Baptism in a case of necessity. Likewise:
4. At least the first elements of Christian doctrine, if the bridegroom or bride are found ignorant; "but if they refuse this instruction, there is no place for rejecting them from matrimony, according to the norm of canon 1066," that is, let him assist only if a grave cause is urgent, concerning which, if it can be done, let him consult the Ordinary.[1]

II. Instructor and time of instructing. The instruction is to be made by the pastor (canon 1033), for example on the occasion of the examination of the betrothed, and generally before proceeding to the publications. But instruction concerning the use of matrimony and the manner of baptizing in a case of necessity is to be made a little before or immediately after the matrimony has been contracted. For an example of instruction, see our little work whose title is On the Virtue of Chastity and the Opposed Vices.

[1] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 14; Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 345).

Part V. Reception of the Sacraments

699 I. With divine law considered, of itself there is no obligation to confess before matrimony. It suffices to have recovered the state of grace, if perhaps lost, by an act of perfect contrition (n. 43). Likewise, as is clear, of itself there is no obligation of receiving the Holy Eucharist. Accidentally, with regard to each sacrament, there can be an obligation, especially by reason of avoiding scandal.[1]

II. With common ecclesiastical law considered, likewise the obligation is lacking. This is deduced from canon 1033, which decrees only: "Let the pastor vehemently exhort the betrothed that before the celebration of matrimony they diligently confess their sins and receive the Most Holy Eucharist." Thus also the Roman Ritual.[2]

Nevertheless, canon 1066 should be noted: If a public sinner or one notoriously bound by censure has first refused to approach sacramental confession or to be reconciled with the Church, the pastor is not to assist at his or her matrimony unless a grave cause is urgent, concerning which, if it can be done, he is to consult the Ordinary.

III. It is disputed whether or not particular law can impose reception of the sacraments.[3] But certainly it cannot convert neglect of reception into an impediment of matrimony itself; for this power belongs only to the supreme ecclesiastical power (canon 1038, § 2).

IV. With regard to Confirmation, canon 1021, § 2 establishes: Catholics who have not yet received the sacrament of Confirmation are to receive it before they are admitted to matrimony, if they can do this without grave inconvenience.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, April 17, 1820; Sacred Congregation of the Council, August 28, 1852.

[2] Title VII, chapter 1, n. 14.

[3] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 14.

Dissertation II. On Matrimony Itself

Matrimony can be both merely a contract, as the matrimony of non-baptized persons, and a contract which at the same time is a sacrament, as matrimony entered by baptized persons. Namely, Christ elevated to the dignity of a sacrament the very contract which existed from the beginning of the human race. Now many of the things to be said hold both for matrimony which is merely a contract and for that which is also a sacrament. Hence before we speak specifically about matrimony insofar as it is a sacrament, we shall first discuss matrimony in general. Therefore let there be:

Part I. On Matrimony in General

We shall speak first of its nature, then of its division, then of its institution, ends, goods, honesty, and governance, finally of its properties, and last of all of the effects of matrimony.

Section I. On the Nature of Matrimony

Chapter I. Summary Exposition

700 Matrimony can be considered in becoming and in completed fact.

I. Matrimony in becoming is an onerous contract, by which a capable man and woman hand over and accept the right over the body, exclusive and perpetual, in order to acts of themselves apt for generation (cf. canon 1081). It is said:

1. An onerous contract; by these words the constitutive act of matrimony is indicated, according to these words of canon 1081, § 1: "Matrimony is made by the consent of the parties, legitimately manifested between persons capable by law; and this consent cannot be supplied by any human power."
2. A capable man and woman; by these words the subject of matrimony is assigned, namely a man and a woman who actually enjoy the use of reason and are not bound by a diriment impediment (cf. canon 1081, § 1).
3. Hand over and accept the right over the body, exclusive and perpetual, in order to acts of themselves apt for generation; these things will be more fully developed in their own place. Behold the essential object of the matrimonial contract, into which therefore the will must necessarily be borne. But once consent has been given to this object, matrimony is constituted by that very fact, without intercourse being added, as many formerly judged. Thus Nicholas I in the Responses to the Consultations of the Bulgarians,[1] Innocent III in c. 22 De Sponsalibus,[2] Eugene IV in the Decree for the Armenians,[3] etc. Thus also canon 1081, § 1, just cited. And it is confirmed from the fact that certainly a true matrimony was contracted between the Blessed Virgin Mary and St. Joseph, without intercourse nevertheless having been added (St. Alphonsus VI, 879).

Corollary. The reciprocal right over the body of the consort, and that exclusive and perpetual, is the true and sole essential object of the matrimonial contract. Hence marriages which are called for a time, or by way of experiment, or friendly marriages, are not true marriages.[4]

The communion of table, bed, and dwelling belongs only to integrity; union of minds and goods not even to integrity, but only to a good outcome or to the better being.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 334.

[2] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 404.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 703.

[4] Encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 558).

701 II. Matrimony in completed fact is the very conjunction itself, or the permanent bond, which arises from the contract.

This definition of matrimony is customarily handed down, almost taken from Roman law: the marital conjunction of a capable man and woman, retaining or carrying with it an undivided society of life. In this definition the word conjunction, taken actively, denotes matrimony in becoming; taken passively, matrimony in completed fact. By undivided society of life, however, the unity and indissolubility of matrimony are designated.

Corollary. Matrimony, even when abstraction has been made from the character of sacrament, belongs not only to the order of justice and temperance, but also to the order of religion. Thus Leo XIII teaches in the Encyclical Arcanum,[3] where matrimony is said to be "by its nature, by its force, of its own accord sacred." Thus also Pius XI teaches.[4] The same is drawn from the fact that the end of matrimony is not only the procreation and education of children as such, but as servants of God. Indeed, from the beginning God, by a primitive supernatural ordination, put into every matrimony the character of an adumbration of the supernatural union both of the Divine Word with human nature and of Christ with the Church; which Innocent III,[5] Honorius III,[6] Leo XIII,[7] and Pius XI[8] teach.

[1] Cf. De Smet, op. cit., n. 193; Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1905, p. 12 sq.; Revue du clerge francais, t. 1, p. 745 sq.

[2] Matrimony is derived, according to some, from the words mother and office, because it is especially the office of the mother to generate and educate offspring; according to others, from the word mother alone, "for monium is a mere extension of the word, as from father comes patrimony, from holy comes sanctimony" (Forcellini, Totius latinitatis lexicon, under Matrimony). It is denominated from the mother rather than the father because the burdens of matrimony, namely conception and birth of offspring, belong to the mother, likewise especially, at least, education. Matrimony is also called coniugium from joining together, consortium from with and lot, nuptials and connubium from veiling, because girls formerly covered or veiled the head before they were handed over to a man.

[3] February 10, 1880.

[4] Encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 570).

[5] Chapter Gaudemus, De divortiis (Decretals, book 4, title 19, c. 8).

[6] Chapter Ex parte tua, De transactionibus (Decretals, book 1, title 36, c. 11).

[7] Encyclical Arcanum.

[8] Encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 552).

Chapter II. Fuller Exposition

The fuller exposition is contained chiefly in the development of the properties of matrimonial consent itself. Now on each side there is required consent that is true, fully deliberate, sufficiently free from ignorance, error, force, and fear, external, made known to the other party, and simultaneous. It is said:

702 I. True or internal, in other words, there is required an act of the will of contracting matrimony (cf. canons 1081 and 1086).

In the internal forum, one asserting that he or she consented only fictitiously must be believed according to the truthfulness of the person. In the external forum, fiction is not admitted unless it is proved (canon 1086, § 1); and this commonly will be very difficult.

One who consents fictitiously sins against justice unless he is unjustly forced to matrimony; but with sufficient probability he does not commit sacrilege unless there is abuse of the sacred rite. The reason is that, because of defect of consent, the sacrament which could be violated is lacking (St. Alphonsus VI, 62). But he is bound: 1° to abstain from those things which are licit only for spouses; 2° not to contract matrimony with another before an ecclesiastical judge has declared according to the norm prescribed by law that the prior nuptials were null; 3° to repair the damage caused by the fiction, unless someone has been unjustly forced to matrimony. Now commonly he cannot repair the damage except by now consenting truly. The reason is that the deceived party commonly will not be able to enter another matrimony, because the fiction, and therefore the nullity of the prior nuptials, commonly will not be able to be proved. And from this very fact another reason for now consenting truly is added, namely the danger of incontinence which otherwise would arise from a cohabitation to be prolonged. Finally, if perhaps offspring has been received, the good of this offspring also requires matrimony. Nevertheless, one who consented fictitiously is excused from furnishing true consent: 1° if he was unjustly forced to matrimony, in which case he is not even bound to repair the damage; 2° if the other party also consented fictitiously, or if that party renounced his or her right; 3° if much greater damages are foreseen as about to arise from a true matrimony, in which case the damage must be repaired in another way (St. Alphonsus VI, 887, 1113).

703 II. Fully deliberate; as was said about contracts generally (vol. I, n. 834). Hence a matrimony contracted by one insane, sleeping, or plainly drunk would be invalid. With regard to those half-drunk and those more or less foolish, the validity will easily be doubtful. The insane who have lucid intervals are sometimes, at that time, sufficiently in possession of reason; nevertheless, as St. Thomas teaches (Supplement, q. 58, a. 2), "it is not safe that he contract matrimony, because he would not know how to educate offspring." Sometimes, however, matrimony of this kind is rightly commended, for example for legitimating offspring. Meanwhile this kind of matrimony will more easily be advised where the man is insane in this way than where the woman is, on account of the greater danger to offspring on the part of an insane woman. If each is insane in this way, matrimony between them can scarcely, or hardly at all, be licit. If some just cause for admitting such an insane person to matrimony seems to be present, the matter will prudently be brought to the Ordinary.[1]

[1] Thus approximately Dens, De matrimonio, n. 97.

704 III. Sufficiently free from ignorance; concerning which observe that ignorance differs from error. Ignorance is the mere defect of knowledge, and does not import an opinion or judgment; error, however, imports an opinion or judgment, and a false one. Now ignorance of the matrimonial object invalidates consent, because the will is not borne toward the unknown. Hence:

Corollary I. Those who are ignorant that matrimony is a permanent society between man and woman for procreating children contract invalidly (canon 1082, § 1). This ignorance is not presumed after puberty (canon 1082, § 2). It is said permanent; by this word indissolubility properly so called, or the essential property of matrimony, is not understood; otherwise the Code would also make mention of other equally essential properties, for example unity. But there is understood some permanence which must last more or less, and is supposed in every society.

Corollary II. Those who are ignorant that the procreation of offspring is obtained by means of bodily union seem to contract invalidly, because there is ignorance of the object, that is, of the right over the body in order to procreating children.

Corollary III. Those who are ignorant only of the mode of union or intercourse have sufficient knowledge of the object, because the said ignorance does not prevent them, by explicitly handing over the right over the body in order to procreation, from at least implicitly handing over the right to acts of themselves apt for generation. Thus also the Sacred Congregation of the Council.[1] The aforesaid things hold even if someone, once the truth was known, would not have entered matrimony, since the question is not what someone would have done, but what he did.

[1] March 15, 1856; December 18, 1869.

705 IV. Sufficiently free from error. Error can regard the object of matrimony or its properties, the person or that person's qualities, and finally the value of the matrimony. Now:

1. Error concerning the object of matrimony invalidates the matrimonial contract, because then the will is borne toward an object diverse from the object of the matrimonial contract, so that consent to the object of matrimony is lacking.

Corollary I. The following contract invalidly: 1° those who judge that matrimony is not ordered to procreating children; 2° those who judge that children are procreated in a way other than by bodily union, for example by union of minds.

Corollary II. Those who err only concerning the mode of bodily union contract validly.

2. Simple error concerning the unity or dissolubility of matrimony, or its sacramental dignity, even if it gives cause to the contract, does not vitiate consent (canon 1084). The reason is that in the case there is not error concerning the object of the matrimonial contract taken simply, but only concerning that which in the object is quasi-secondary or consequent; in other words, one does not err concerning the right over the body of the consort, but either concerning the exclusive or perpetual right, or concerning the dignity intrinsic to matrimonial consent. But such error does not prevent the one consenting to the right over the body from consenting at least implicitly to the exclusive and perpetual right, and to the dignity intrinsic to the consent (cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 51, a. 2, ad 2). It was said:

a) Simple error; for one contracts invalidly if either or both parties by a positive act of the will exclude some essential property of matrimony (canon 1086, § 2), or, if it is a question of baptized persons, the sacramentality of matrimony. Hence the Holy See has several times declared invalid the marriages of those heretics who, with the rite by which they enter nuptials considered, explicitly or implicitly stipulate that matrimony will be dissolved in the case of adultery.[1]

b) Even if it gives cause to the contract; for the question is only what someone did, not what he would have done if the error had been absent.

3. Error concerning the person renders matrimony invalid (canon 1083, § 1); and this holds whether the error is invincible or vincible, antecedent or giving cause to the contract, or merely concomitant. The reason is that in the case consent is borne toward an object diverse from the object of the present contract: for consent regards the right over the body, for example, of Peter, while the object of the present contract is the right over the body, for example, of Paul. Therefore consent to the object of this contract is lacking.

4. Error concerning a quality[2] of a person commonly does not invalidate matrimony; and this holds even if the error gave cause to the contract and was induced by fraud. The reason is that such error does not prevent consent to the substance of the object. Canon 1083, § 2 is consonant.

I said commonly does not invalidate matrimony; for it invalidates it:

a) If error of quality redounds into error of person (canon 1083, § 2, 1°). But this has place when the quality about which there is error distinguishes the person from every other, and the contracting party determines for himself the person with whom he intends to contract precisely through that quality; as if someone intends to contract with the first-born daughter of a prince, and externally contracts with another whom he erroneously thinks to be the first-born (St. Alphonsus VI, 1010, 1013, 1015).

b) If a free person contracts matrimony with a person whom he thinks free, while on the contrary that person is a slave, with slavery properly so called. Thus by force of positive ecclesiastical law (canon 1083, § 2, 2°). But slavery properly so called is required, that is, one which extends so far that a human being can be bought and sold like an irrational animal, according to works (St. Alphonsus VI, 1017, 1018; vol. I, p. 537).

Question. Whether the matrimony is valid if a free unbelieving person, from error, married a faithful person who is a slave?

Response. Many deny, because the law does not distinguish. Others affirm, because the impediment in the case seems to affect no party: not the unbelieving party, because he or she is not subject to the Church; nor the faithful party, since the impediment seems to have been constituted in favor only of the free party who errs.

5. Finally, knowledge or opinion of the nullity of the matrimony does not necessarily exclude matrimonial consent (canon 1085). The reason is that such knowledge or opinion does not necessarily prevent someone, as far as is from himself, from having the will to contract. If the case occurs, one must see whether the contracting party in fact, as far as was from himself, intended matrimony. But if that had place, the matrimony was valid at once if the opinion was false; if it was true, the matrimony can afterwards be convalidated. But if the contracting party, with knowledge or opinion of nullity, intends concubinage or a simple civil ceremony, consent is lacking. I said intends, because it does not stand in the way of validity that someone merely judges[3] it to be concubinage or a mere ceremony. In practice one more easily doubts about the intention of contracting true matrimony if it is a question of well-instructed Catholics who for some reason contract merely civilly, see a mere ceremony in a matrimony of this kind, and therefore more easily do not seek matrimony properly so called but only legal convenience. Indifferent and not well-instructed Catholics are more easily presumed to contract validly; a fortiori non-Catholics.[4]

[1] Holy Office, April 6, 1843 (Collectanea, n. 965).

[2] If the one erring binds his consent to the quality as to a condition without which not, the matrimony is certainly invalid; not, however, by reason of error, but on account of the lacking condition.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, October 1, 1785 (Collectanea, n. 580).

[4] Holy Office, July 2, 1897, to the Archbishop of Cologne.

706 V. Sufficiently free from force and fear. Concerning this canon 1087 says: "Matrimony entered by reason of force or grave fear inflicted from without and unjustly, from which, in order that one may free himself, he is compelled to choose matrimony, is also invalid. No other fear, even if it gives cause to the contract, carries with it the nullity of matrimony." Therefore:

1. Absolute force renders matrimony invalid; since in the case the external act is posited under physical coercion, with the mind resisting completely, consent of the will is lacking. With regard to force or violence in a qualified sense (vol. I, n. 28), the things said about the full deliberation required, and the things to be said about fear, suffice.

2. With regard to fear,[1] these things hold:

a) Grave fear, inflicted from without and unjustly, from which, in order that one may free himself, he is compelled to choose matrimony, dirimently impedes this matrimony (canon 1087, § 1), at least by canon law. It is said:

α) Grave fear; either absolutely or relatively to the person on whom the fear has been inflicted. It makes no difference whether someone fears a grave evil for himself or for those intimately joined to him.

β) Inflicted from without; that is, by a free cause. Hence, for example, a matrimony entered from fear lest life otherwise be hard would be valid.

γ) Inflicted unjustly. Now fear is certainly inflicted unjustly if someone uses an unjust means, or by an unjust means extorts matrimony whether owed or not owed, or, as others state the same thing, if the one inflicting fear does not have the right of executing what he threatens; as if a father, who catches a young man acting basely with his daughter, threatens him with death unless he marries her.

It is disputed whether fear is inflicted unjustly if someone by a means not unjust in itself extorts matrimony not owed, or if the one inflicting fear indeed has the right of executing what he threatens, but does not have a right to matrimony; as if a girl should threaten a young homicidal man that she will denounce him to the judge unless he marries her, or if a physician, who is bound only from charity to undertake the care of a sick girl, denies his help unless the girl marries him.

Response. Some affirm, because one acts unjustly who through grave fear tries to obtain that to which he has no right, for example matrimony. Others deny, because one does not act unjustly who offers to another a means, for example the choice of matrimony, by which he may avoid a damage which can be inflicted on him without injustice. But it seems one must distinguish thus: If the avoidance of the imminent evil, for example denunciation to the judge or denial of medical care, is esteemed to be of as much value as the choice of matrimony, the answer seems to have to be denied, because an unjust pact is not had. Otherwise, if the avoidance of the imminent evil is not worth so much, then the pact is unjust (cf. St. Alphonsus VI, 1051, 1053).

δ) From which, in order that one may free himself, he is compelled to choose matrimony. These things are certainly verified, and therefore the matrimony is certainly invalidated, if fear is inflicted for extorting matrimony with the one inflicting the fear. Likewise it seems invalid if fear is inflicted for extorting matrimony with someone other than the one inflicting the fear, because there is in reality coercion to matrimony itself.

But it is controverted whether it is necessary that fear be inflicted for extorting matrimony, or whether the intention of matrimony on the part of the one fearing the evil suffices, who in matrimony sees a necessary remedy against a greater evil to be avoided. Some deny that fear inflicted for extorting matrimony is required, and draw the reason from the tenor of the Code, "from which in order that one, etc." But the affirmative answer seems to have to be given, because before the Code it was taught with sufficient commonness that fear inflicted for extorting matrimony was required. Now the Code is not presumed to have departed from the old disposition unless the tenor of the law sufficiently signifies this; and the latter does not have place, since the canon can well be harmonized with the old disposition and be understood thus: "from which, in order that one may free himself, he is compelled to choose matrimony," namely because the fear is inflicted precisely for extorting matrimony. If fear is inflicted for another end, one is not so properly compelled to the choice of matrimony (St. Alphonsus VI, 1049).

ε) At least by canon law. It is disputed whether also by natural law, so that the described fear would also invalidate the marriages of unbelievers. Some deny, because fear does not impede consent simply voluntary into the contract. Others affirm, because a contract caused by gravely injurious fear and irrescindable, and therefore such that the grave injury which was the cause of the contract cannot be repaired, seems to have to be excluded. But if the prior opinion is admitted, such a contract would be had, namely matrimony, since it cannot be rescinded. St. Thomas admits the latter opinion (Supplement, q. 47, a. 3; cf. St. Alphonsus VI, 1054; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 18, n. 64).

Objection. If the latter opinion is admitted, even fear not inflicted for extorting matrimony would invalidate it, because such fear would also involve an injury which could no longer be repaired.

Response. Fear not inflicted for extorting matrimony indeed involves an injury, but one independent of matrimony, of which it was only the occasion, not the cause; but an injury independent of matrimony can be repaired even if the matrimony is valid and can no longer be rescinded.

Question. Whether, with canon law alone considered, matrimony is valid if the party who suffered fear is an unbeliever?

Response. Many deny, because the law does not distinguish. Others affirm, because the impediment in the case seems to affect no party: not the unbelieving party, because he or she is not subject to the Church; nor the faithful party, since the impediment seems to have been constituted in favor only of the party who suffered fear.

With natural law considered, the said matrimony is held by many to be invalid, according to the things set forth.

b) No other fear, for example light fear, or grave fear but justly inflicted, carries with it the nullity of matrimony, even if it gives cause to the contract (canon 1087, § 2). This is clear if the speech is about fear justly inflicted; if it is a question of fear lightly unjust, it is deduced from the fact that, on the one hand, fear does not impede simply voluntary consent, and on the other hand the reparation of a light injury is not to be valued so highly that on account of it, if excluded, the contract must be called invalid (St. Alphonsus VI, 1055). Furthermore note:

α) One who through grave and unjust fear forces another to matrimony sins gravely both against justice and, on account of the nullity of the sacrament, against religion. Therefore he is bound to repair the injury, even, if it cannot be repaired in another way, by convalidating the matrimony, at the will of the one who suffered fear (St. Alphonsus VI, 1057).

β) The Church never dispenses in the impediment of fear, because the dispensation would confirm the injury inflicted on the party who suffered fear, and would bring it about that the one inflicting fear would receive advantage from his crime.

How matrimony contracted from fear can be convalidated will be explained later.

[1] What fear is and in how many ways it is distinguished, see vol. I, nn. 838 and 839.

707 VI. External or manifest (canon 1081, § 1); this quality is required both because matrimony is a contract (vol. I, n. 834), and so that it may be a sacrament, for a sacrament does not subsist without a sensible sign. If someone consented externally but not internally, to revalidate the matrimony it suffices afterwards to supply internal consent. Moreover, for validity it does not matter whether consent is expressed by words or by another sign, for example by a nod. Indeed, of itself even silence, for example on the part of the bride, with the circumstances considered, can be a manifestation of consent.

As to liceity, however, from the precept of the Church it is required that "the spouses express matrimonial consent by words; nor is it licit for them to use equivalent signs if they can speak" (canon 1088, § 2). This obligation seems grave.

708 VII. Made known to the other party; and indeed by the contracting party or in his name, as was explained in vol. I, n. 834.

709 VIII. Simultaneous, because otherwise they do not truly consent into one. Nevertheless it suffices that one consent while the consent of the other persists (vol. I, n. 834).

Corollary I. Matrimony, like other contracts, can also be contracted between absent persons, for example through a mere messenger, by letters, by means of telephone or telegraph. But this now cannot be done by those who are bound by the ecclesiastical form, for "to contract matrimony validly it is necessary that the contracting parties be present either personally or through a procurator" (canon 1088, § 1).

Corollary II. Matrimony, just like other contracts, can also be entered through a procurator (the cited canon). But from canon 1089, without prejudice to diocesan statutes added on this matter,[1] for matrimony to be validly entered through a procurator, it is required:

1° That the procurator have a special mandate to contract with a certain person (§ 1).

2° That the mandate be signed by the mandator and either by the pastor or Ordinary of the place in which the mandate is made, or by a priest delegated by either, or by at least two witnesses. If the mandator does not know how to write, this is to be noted in the mandate itself and another witness is to be added, who also signs the writing; otherwise the mandate is invalid (§ 2).

3° That, before the procurator has contracted in the name of the mandator, the latter has not revoked the mandate nor fallen into insanity; because then the matrimony is invalid, although either the procurator or the other contracting party may have been ignorant of these things (§ 3).

4° That the procurator perform his office personally (§ 4). Hence the procurator cannot delegate another, nor, as it seems, can this faculty be granted to him by the mandator.

Note. When matrimony is to be contracted through a procurator or through an interpreter, the pastor is not to assist unless there is a just cause and it is in no way licit to doubt about the authenticity of the mandate or the trustworthiness of the interpreter, after having obtained, if time permits, the license of the Ordinary (canon 1091).

[1] Statutes added on this matter do not regard validity.

Scholion. On Conditional Matrimony

Of the conditions which can be added to the matrimonial contract, some are not repugnant to the substance of matrimony,[1] others are repugnant to it as restricting the rights essentially annexed to matrimony.[2] We shall speak of each separately; and after these have been treated, we shall add certain things about matrimony under mode, cause, or demonstration.

[1] I contract with you if you are a virgin.

[2] I contract with you if you abstain from intercourse.

710 I. Conditions not repugnant to the substance of matrimony. 1. Matrimony under a condition concerning the past[1] or the present[2] is valid or not valid according as the condition has been fulfilled or not fulfilled (canon 1092, 4°). But the licit use of matrimony is suspended until there is certainty about the fulfillment (St. Alphonsus VI, 890).

2. Matrimony under a condition concerning the future is to be judged thus:

a) If the condition is concerning the future necessary[3], when it is known as such, the matrimony is valid at once, unless the contracting parties intend to suspend the matrimony until the event of the condition. In the external forum this condition is held as not added (canon 1092, 1°), that is, the matrimony is judged valid at once unless the suspensive intention is proved (St. Alphonsus VI, 891).

b) If the condition is concerning the future impossible,[4] when it is known as such, the matrimony is null if it is seriously placed. In the external forum this condition likewise is held as not added (canon 1092, 1°), or the contracting party is presumed to have willed matrimony until the contrary is proved (St. Alphonsus VI, 891).

c) If the condition is concerning the future contingent, the following must be said:

α) If the condition is licit,[5] the validity of the matrimony is suspended (canon 1092, 3°; St. Alphonsus VI, 892).

β) If the condition is base[6] and is seriously placed, according to many the matrimony is simply null, but more probably only the validity is suspended (vol. I, n. 849). In the external forum this condition too is held as not added (canon 1092, 1°; St. Alphonsus VI, 891).

[1] I contract with you if you have done this or that.

[2] I contract with you if you are noble.

[3] I contract with you if the sun will rise tomorrow.

[4] I contract with you if you extinguish the sun.

[5] I contract with you if the parents have died.

[6] I contract with you if you have admitted intercourse.

711 II. Conditions repugnant to the substance of matrimony. Concerning these canon 1092, 2° says: "A condition once placed and not revoked, if it concerns the future against the substance of matrimony, renders it invalid." Gregory IX hands down the same doctrine more fully: "If conditions against the substance of marriage are inserted, for example if one says to the other: I contract with you, if you avoid generation of offspring; or: until I find another richer in honor or means; or: if for gain you hand yourself over to be adulterated, the matrimonial contract, however favorable it may be, lacks effect."[1] Therefore:

1. Conditions against the substance of matrimony are those which are repugnant to the object of the matrimonial contract, that is:

a) Either to the right over the body of the consort, in other words, to the right to acts of themselves apt for generation, as if you say: I contract with you if you abstain from intercourse; if you perform it onanistically.

b) Or to the exclusive right over the body of the consort, or to the unity of matrimony, as if you say: I contract with you if you hand yourself over to be adulterated for gain.

c) Or to the perpetual right over the body of the consort, or to the indissolubility of matrimony, as if you say: I contract with you if, after one or another offspring has been procreated, you abstain from intercourse, or from intercourse rightly performed; or: We contract until domestic life is disturbed or until we marry others, and similar things (St. Alphonsus VI, 881, 882).

Corollary I. Conditions which are opposed to the moral or religious good of offspring are not against the substance of matrimony, and therefore do not invalidate it; as if you say: I contract with you if you educate the offspring in unbelief, in heresy. The reason for the assertion is that the said condition is not repugnant to the object of the matrimonial contract. Add that the Church has indeed reproved marriages of this kind, but has never declared them invalid. Finally, if the contrary opinion were admitted, even marriages contracted under the condition of educating offspring in other delicts would be invalid; and so far as I know no one has admitted this.

Corollary II. Nor are conditions which are opposed to the physical good of offspring against the substance of matrimony, as if you say: I contract with you if you procure an abortion, if you cast away or kill the child once born. The reason again is that not even a condition of this kind is repugnant to the object of the contract.

2. The conditions set forth under 1 are repugnant to the substance of matrimony if they truly remove or diminish the right itself to arise from the matrimonial contract, or if they are placed as to be fulfilled from justice, or if they are brought into a pact, or at least are so intended that the contracting party positively intends to contract in such a way and not otherwise. The reason is that the said conditions understood thus prevent consent to the object of the matrimonial contract (n. 700).

If the aforesaid conditions are not brought into a pact, and neither party in another way restricts consent to the object of the matrimonial contract, the matrimony is valid. Therefore the following do not stand in the way of validity:

a) A mere will or purpose, or even some agreement without a pact, whether of abstaining from intercourse, or of performing it onanistically, or of procreating one or another offspring and abusing matrimony otherwise, or of abstaining from intercourse rightly performed until they have arrived at better fortune, etc.

b) The mere purpose of preserving perpetual continence in matrimony.

c) A simple promise, by which the contracting parties bind themselves from fidelity alone to preserve continence.

d) A vow of preserving chastity, by which either or both parties bind themselves, or attempt to bind themselves, to God alone.

Question 1. Whether a condition made by pact of preserving perpetual continence is repugnant to the substance of matrimony and therefore invalidates it?

Response. Some affirm, because matrimony essentially hands over the right to the use of the body of the consort. But this right is excluded by the aforesaid pact. Therefore such a pact destroys the object of the matrimonial contract.[2]

Others judge that matrimony of this kind can be valid, because that pact can be so intended that it leaves the radical or bound right, excluding only the expedit right to the use of the body. But, they say, the former alone, not the latter, belongs to the substance of matrimony; and they think this must be drawn from the fact that, while the conjugal bond remains, the expedit right is lost through adultery, or even through a pact of preserving chastity entered after matrimony has been contracted (cf. St. Alphonsus VI, 881, 1°, 882, 1°).

Question 2. Whether a condition made by pact of abstaining from intercourse for a time, for example until they have arrived at better fortune, or of having intercourse only when conception is less probable, is repugnant to the substance of matrimony and therefore invalidates it?

Response. Speaking theoretically, one can respond what was responded to the preceding question. But in practice it is to be observed: 1° in the case in which there is a true pact, and it, as commonly happens, is not added from a motive of virtue, the matrimony is invalid, since in practice both the expedit and the radical right are limited.

Note. "Pastors should never admit these conditional marriages without a most urgent cause, on account of the many inconveniences and difficulties which can afterwards occur against their validity" (St. Alphonsus VI, 892).

[1] C. ult. De conditionibus appositis in desponsatione vel in aliis contractibus; cf. Collectanea de Propaganda Fide, n. 222, n. 100, 1327 to doubt 3, 1465.

[2] Some undeservedly try to prove this opinion from the fact that the Blessed Virgin Mary, who had vowed perpetual virginity, in order licitly to contract with St. Joseph, had to enter a pact of preserving chastity. For to contract licitly it sufficed that she knew certainly, whether naturally or by revelation, for example concerning virginity never to be lost, that her spouse would not use matrimony.

712 III. Matrimony entered under a mode is valid. For a mode supposes a contract complete in its being, to which it is added. Nevertheless matrimony is invalid: 1° if the mode, or rather quasi-mode, added is repugnant to the substance of matrimony and is brought into a pact, as: "I contract with you, but you must abstain from right intercourse"; 2° if both parties or either party positively intends that he or she be bound only in that way, and not otherwise. The reason is that then something substantial of the object is excluded, so that consent to it is lacking. But in these cases it is not a question of a mode properly so called, since, as was said, it supposes a completed contract.

Note. Matrimonial consent once furnished perseveres until it is revoked; and it is presumed to persevere until its revocation is established. This holds even if the matrimony was entered invalidly by reason of an impediment (canon 1093).

Section II. On the Division of Matrimony

713 Matrimony is chiefly divided:

I. Into valid or true, and invalid. Invalid matrimony is called putative if it has been celebrated in good faith by at least one party, until each party becomes certain of its nullity (canon 1015, § 4).[1]

II. Into legitimate, ratified, and ratified and consummated.

1. Legitimate is called: valid matrimony between non-baptized persons (canon 1015, § 3).
2. Ratified is: valid matrimony between baptized persons, not yet completed by consummation (canon 1015, § 1).[2] Under the name of ratified matrimony also seems to come matrimony validly contracted between non-baptized persons and persisting after the baptism of both spouses. But in canon law there does not seem to come under the name of ratified matrimony a matrimony validly contracted either between a baptized party and a non-baptized party, or between non-baptized parties of whom only one is baptized. Whether the said marriages are or are not a sacrament does not seem to matter, because it is a question of a canonical notion rather than of a theological fact.

3. Ratified and consummated is called valid matrimony between baptized persons if between the spouses there has taken place the conjugal act to which the matrimonial contract by its nature is ordered, and by which spouses become one flesh (canon 1015, § 1). But that the notion of consummation may be more fully developed, I note these things:

a) Only valid matrimony can be consummated, or consummation presupposes valid matrimony.

b) Matrimony is certainly consummated by intercourse, that is, by penetration, whether perfect or partial, of the female vessel together with effusion of seed in it.

c) It is disputed whether matrimony is consummated if male seed is deposited at the vulva and is received within the female vessel. Some affirm, especially if offspring arises, because in this way the spouses are made one flesh. But it seems that it must be denied altogether, because consummation is made by the conjugal act to which the conjugal contract is by its nature ordered; but an act of this kind is lacking in the posited hypothesis, since an act from which generation does not follow except accidentally, of which sort is the depositing of seed at the vulva, cannot be called the conjugal act to which the conjugal contract is by its nature ordered; in a word, there is lacking an act of itself apt for generation (St. Thomas, In IV, dist. 41, q. un., a. 1, sol. 4, ad 2).

d) A fortiori matrimony is not consummated if seed is introduced into the vagina merely by chance, for example on the occasion of pollution, or by means of artificial fecundation, as it is called.

e) Once matrimony has been celebrated, if the spouses have cohabited together, consummation is presumed until the contrary is proved (canon 1015, § 2).

III. Into public and secret, or of conscience. Public is that which is celebrated "in the face of the Church," as it is said, or with the usual publicity. Secret or of conscience is that which is celebrated with announcements omitted and secretly, according to the norm of canons 1105-1107 (canon 1104), about which it will be said later. Note also clandestine matrimony, as it was formerly called, that is, matrimony which was contracted without the legitimate form being employed, or without pastor and witnesses. Nowadays matrimony of this kind cannot be contracted validly except among non-Catholics (canon 1099, § 2).

IV. Into ecclesiastical and civil. Ecclesiastical is that which is entered according to ecclesiastical laws; civil, that which is contracted according to civil laws. The latter is called merely civil if ecclesiastical matrimony is entirely neglected.

Finally, and this it helps to note for completeness, morganatic matrimony is called that which a noble man contracts with a person of inferior condition, by this pact: that the wife and offspring to be received from her receive only a certain part from the goods of the man, and are excluded from the other goods and from the titles and dignities of the man. Matrimony of this kind especially had place among the Germans; it was called, as it seems, ad morganaticam, on account of the portion of goods which was granted to the wife on the second day of the marriage, and which in German is called Morgengabe.[3]

[1] The Code does not speak of matrimony which was formerly called presumed; hence it is judged already to have vanished.

[2] Ratified is said, that is, ratified or confirmed by the sacrament (chapter 7 De divortiis; St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 59, a. 5, ad 1).

[3] Cf. Staatslexikon, s.v. Ebenburtigkeit.

Section III. On the Institution, Ends, Goods, Honesty, and Governance of Matrimony

714 I. Institution of matrimony. God Almighty instituted matrimony, insofar as it is merely a contract, in the very creation of male and female. For he willed, as is clear even from the very capacity and inclination of male and female for generating, that the human race be preserved and propagated, and this fittingly, that is, in such a way that provision is of itself made for the preservation and education of offspring. But this does not happen fittingly except through those who are joined by the matrimonial bond. In addition, God also promulgated by positive law matrimony, instituted in creation itself and promulgated through the light of reason, namely through the mouth of Adam, who, led by divine instinct, declared: "This now is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh; she shall be called Woman, because she was taken from man. Wherefore a man shall leave his father and mother, and shall cling to his wife; and they shall be two in one flesh."[1] Finally, God himself, after he had already instituted matrimony, solemnly signified that it is ordered to propagating the human race: "Increase and multiply."[2]

Concerning the institution of matrimony insofar as it is a sacrament, see n. 729.

Note. Insofar as God wills that the human race be propagated through matrimony, and to that end communicated to human nature the capacity and inclination for generating, matrimony is customarily called an office of nature.

[1] Gen. 2:23-24.

[2] Gen. 1:28.

715 II. Ends of matrimony. The primary end of matrimony is the procreation and education of offspring; the secondary end is mutual aid and the remedy of concupiscence (canon 1013, § 1). The assigned ends are the intrinsic ends of matrimony, to which several extrinsic ends can be added, which can be intended by the contracting parties. Therefore:

1. The intrinsic ends are:

a) Procreation and education of offspring; these constitute the principal end. Education, however, is understood as education both according to the body and according to the soul, and in the worship of God (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 59, a. 2; n. 701).[1]

b) Mutual aid, which is a secondary end together with the end to be assigned under c).

c) The remedy of concupiscence, or its mastery. The Apostle assigns this end in these words: "But because of fornication, let each man have his own wife";[2] and: "For it is better to marry than to burn."[3] Matrimony attains this end both by quieting concupiscence through conjugal acts, and, insofar as it is a sacrament, by the power of sacramental grace, by which spouses use matrimony rightly and guard against illicit things both in and outside matrimony.[4]

2. Multiple extrinsic ends are licitly intended by contracting parties, for example heirs to be left, splendor of family,[5] peace to be established, health of body, etc. (St. Alphonsus VI, 881-883).

[1] Encyclical Casti connubii, December 31, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 144).

[2] 1 Cor. 7:2.

[3] 1 Cor. 7:9.

[4] Buys, Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1930, pp. 326 and 333.

[5] Cf. Roman Catechism, q. 13.

716 III. Goods of matrimony. A threefold good of matrimony is customarily assigned, and is also assigned by Pius XI,[1] namely:

1. The good of offspring, which consists in the conception, birth, and education of offspring both as to the body and as to the soul, and, as to the soul, both spiritual and religious (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 59, a. 2).
2. The good of faith or fidelity, which is situated in this: that the debt is neither denied to the consort nor permitted to anyone else, and that not even to the consort is granted what, as contrary to divine laws and most alien from conjugal fidelity, can never be granted.
3. The good of the sacrament, by which are denoted both the indissolubility of the bond and the elevation of the matrimonial contract into an efficacious sign of grace.

[1] Encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 543).

717 IV. Honesty of matrimony; concerning which note:

1. Matrimony is objectively honorable. This is clear first from the fact that God instituted it, Christ raised it to the dignity of a sacrament, and Sacred Scripture commends it.[1] It is clear next from the fact that it is the single means of fittingly obtaining the propagation of the human race willed by God (n. 714); likewise from the fact that matrimony is ordered "not only to propagating the human race, but to begetting offspring for the Church, citizens of the saints and members of the household of God; namely, that a people might be procreated and educated for the worship and religion of the true God and of Christ our Savior."[2]

Corollary. All who are capable of matrimony can contract matrimony, unless they are prohibited by law (canon 1035). This also holds concerning those who can procreate only miserable offspring. "It is certainly not lawful," says Pius XI, "to burden with grave fault those men, otherwise capable of matrimony, who, even after all care and diligence have been employed, are conjectured to beget only defective offspring, if they contract marriage, although often matrimony must be dissuaded for them."[3]

Nor can the aforesaid persons of themselves, at least practically, be accused of light fault; for with regard to offspring, it is always better for the offspring to be thus than not to be;[4] and with regard to the inconveniences that will arise for society and family, it is not established that the most valid right of contracting matrimony does not prevail over the avoidance of those inconveniences. Add that even those of whom we speak, by procreating offspring, however miserable, conduce to the good of the species (vol. I, n. 740). This is confirmed by the practice of the Church, which in no way keeps the said persons from matrimony (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 64, a. 1, ad 4; St. Alphonsus VI, 951).

Whether the State can forbid matrimony to some will be explained under V.

2. Matrimony, although it is objectively honorable, does not oblige individual persons, because only that precept obliges individual persons which of itself and first regards the good of individuals. But the precept of matrimony of itself and first does not regard the good of individuals, but the good of the multitude or species (St. Thomas, Contra Gentiles, book 3, ch. 137; II-II, q. 152, a. 2). Accidentally there can be an obligation, for example if someone has procreated offspring from some woman.

There are those who judge that the law of matrimony was imposed on the human race; this does not please others, because one cannot grasp a precept which does not oblige determinate persons and cannot be fulfilled by the community as such. Moreover, God can reach, and does reach, the willed end without a precept, that is, the propagation of the human race, namely by implanting in human nature the capacity and vehement inclination for generating.

Objection. From the fact that some power is conferred on man, an obligation of using it is rightly deduced. But the generative power is conferred on individual persons.

Response. The major, besides the fact that it must be distinguished in multiple ways, certainly is to be denied if it is a question of a power conferred for the good of the species, because it suffices that many use it. "Namely, from divine providence," says St. Thomas, "those things are given to man which are necessary for the whole species, and yet it is not necessary that every man use each one of them. For the industry of building and the power for fighting have been given to man, and yet it is not necessary that all be builders or soldiers. Similarly, although the power of generating and those things which are ordered to its act have been provided for man by God, nevertheless it is not necessary that every man intend the act of generation" (Contra Gentiles, book 3, ch. 136).

3. Matrimony, however honorable it is, nevertheless must be placed after virginity and chaste celibacy; likewise chaste widowhood after second nuptials.

The former has been proved and vindicated against objections in the treatise on the offices of clerics (vol. I, n. 1168); the latter is clear from canon 1142, and rests on the same principles.[5]

[1] 1 Cor. 7:9, 28, 36, 39; 1 Tim. 4:1-3; 5:14; Eph. 5:22-23; Heb. 13:4.

[2] Encyclical of Leo XIII, Arcanum, February 10, 1880; Encyclical of Pius XI, Casti connubii, December 31, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 544).

[3] Encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 565).

[4] Cf. our little work On the Virtue of Chastity and the Opposed Vices, n. 98.

[5] Cf. our little work On the Virtue of Chastity and the Opposed Vices, nn. 18-19.

718 V. That the governance of matrimony may be distinctly explained, two things must be distinguished: 1° the marriages of baptized persons and of non-baptized persons; 2° the bond itself, namely its validity and liceity, and its effects, set forth in n. 724.

1. Marriages of baptized persons. The marriage of baptized persons is governed not only by divine law, but also by canon law (canon 1016), and not by civil law. This is clear both from innumerable ecclesiastical documents,[1] and from the fact that the marriage of baptized persons is a sacrament. But the governance of the sacraments belongs to the Church alone.

Corollary I. The Church can establish diriment and impedient impediments (canons 1016, 1038), and by her own right treat cases which regard the bond, that is, its validity and liceity, its inseparable effects, likewise its separable ecclesiastical effects (canon 1960), and, if they are treated incidentally and accessorily, even merely civil effects (canon 1961).

Corollary II. The civil State is bound to recognize the rights of the Church and the things established by her. But it cannot, with regard to the marriages of baptized persons, establish diriment or prohibitive impediments; nor treat cases which regard the bond of those marriages, their inseparable effects, and their separable ecclesiastical effects. It is competent, however, concerning the merely civil effects of matrimony (canon 1016), and concerning cases about those same effects, if they are treated principally (canon 1961). Likewise it can, not by reason of matrimony considered in itself, but for the sake of protecting social order, prescribe certain formalities, for example the registration of marriage in the registers of civil status, and punish by civil penalties, for example monetary fines or the withdrawal of certain merely civil effects, spouses who have neglected those formalities; nevertheless it cannot establish conditions without whose fulfillment matrimony by baptized persons cannot be entered.

Corollary III. The civil legislator cannot simply forbid matrimony to any baptized person. This follows from the things said above. Yet he can require that, for example, those bound to military service abstain from matrimony for a time; nor by this is there conceded to the civil State a faculty of establishing impediments properly so called, or impediments directly impeding matrimony. For such a disposition cannot be made by reason of matrimony itself, but so that social order may be provided for; hence one who transgresses these things does not sin against religion, as does one who does not observe ecclesiastical statutes. Besides this, the civil State can sometimes indirectly keep someone from matrimony, for example by casting a guilty person into prison.

Corollary IV. Of itself there is no obligation of observing civil laws which exceed the power of the civil legislator. Accidentally, however, there is commonly such an obligation, namely so that disturbance and damages otherwise going to follow for the spouses and offspring may be forestalled.

2. Marriages of non-baptized persons. The marriage of non-baptized persons is governed not only by divine law, but also by civil law, and not by ecclesiastical law. This is clear both from the documents to be assigned in Corollary I, and from the fact that the common good requires that the matrimonial contract be governed by positive human law. But the governance of the matrimonial contract entered by non-baptized persons does not belong to the Church, because she lacks power over non-baptized persons. Therefore it remains that it belongs to the civil legislator, and not to the Church. Let him beware, however, lest he exceed the limits of his power, for example by simply forbidding matrimony to some, etc., matters which we shall set forth more fully in the corollaries.

Corollary I. The civil legislator can, much more probably, establish impediments, both prohibitive ones properly so called and diriment ones, between non-baptized persons; likewise he can treat cases regarding those marriages.[2] For, first, the public good seems to require that laws looking to this be able to be enacted. But besides civil rulers no competent legislator can be assigned who would be able to frame such laws.

The major is clear: a) from the fact that the Church herself judged such laws necessary with regard to the marriages of her subjects; b) from the common practice of peoples somewhat cultivated;[3] c) from the fact that it is especially fitting that some marriages be illicit and invalid which, considered under natural law alone, would be valid, for example marriages entered before marriageable age or without any public form.

The minor follows first from the fact that the competent legislator is not the Church, to whom infidels are not subject; nor another religious authority, since such an authority does not exist, or at least is not legitimate. Therefore it remains that we say that the said power belongs to the civil legislator. A second argument is drawn from the solutions of the Holy Office[4] and of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide.[5] The power set forth is usually called devolutive, because power over matrimony, as being a sacred thing, belongs of itself to the religious power alone.

Corollary II. The civil legislator cannot absolutely forbid matrimony to a non-baptized person who is capable of matrimony, for example for reasons called eugenic.[6] So Leo XIII[7] and Pius XI.[8] The reason is that the right of contracting matrimony is older than the State itself, and therefore must rather be protected by the State, as being destined for the good of citizens, but cannot be extinguished by it. Add that human authority cannot directly impede the good of the species, that is, enact a law with the end that procreation be impeded. But if the prohibition has place, practically it is made for that end. The major is drawn from the fact that the good of the species is not subordinated to the end of the civil State.

Corollary III. The civil legislator cannot render anyone, even a non-baptized person, incapable of matrimony, for example by the means assigned in note 6. So Pius XI[9] and the Holy Office.[10] Add the reasons just brought forward in Corollary II. Add that neither can public authority directly mutilate an innocent person (vol. I, n. 740).[11]

But insofar as the civil legislator can deprive a criminal, as punishment, of the generative faculty, this has been set forth in vol. I, n. 742.

Corollary IV. The civil legislator cannot, as we think, prescribe a medical inspection to be carried out before nuptials, unless a grave abuse would counsel it. For a matter which is an impediment to liberty in this matter, and so intimately affects an individual affair, ought not to be imposed except for a most grave cause, practically for a true abuse. But a true abuse - I am not speaking of particular cases - will not easily have place, nor will it easily be established. Hence these things should be left to parents, or even to those about to marry, who, if they please, can request the testimony of an approved physician.

[1] Cf. Council of Trent, session 24, canons 3, 4, 9, 12; constitution of Pius VI Auctorem fidei; Syllabus of Pius IX, propositions 68-70, 74; constitution of Leo XIII Arcanum.

[2] Cf. Resemans, De competentia civili.

[3] Cf. Esmein, Le Mariage, I, p. 343.

[4] October 29, 1739; September 20, 1854.

[5] October 8, 1631; June 26, 1820.

[6] The eugenic system intends the improvement of the race, and, to obtain that end, promotes laws which forbid matrimony to some or render them incapable of generating, for example through vasectomy in men, tubectomy or salpingectomy in women, etc.

[7] Encyclical Rerum novarum, May 15, 1891.

[8] Encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 564).

[9] Encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, pp. 564 and 565).

[10] March 31, 1931.

[11] Encyclical Casti connubii, loc. cit.

Section IV. On the Properties of Matrimony

Two properties of matrimony especially are assigned, namely unity and indissolubility; and these indeed are essential, and in Christian matrimony obtain a peculiar firmness (canon 1013, § 2).

Chapter I. On the Unity of Matrimony

719 The unity of matrimony consists in the conjunction of only one man with only one woman, that is, monogamy. Opposed to unity are simultaneous polyandry, which is the simultaneous conjunction of one woman with several men, and simultaneous polygamy, which is the simultaneous conjunction of one man with several women. Now:

I. Simultaneous polyandry is prohibited by natural law; both because natural law is opposed to several heads in the same society, and because the education of offspring, which belongs to the primary ends of matrimony, is ruined. For the care both of father and of mother is required for the education of offspring. But from the fact that several men use the same wife, uncertainty arises as to who is the father of the offspring to be born; and this uncertainty will bring it about that no one has care of the offspring (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 65, a. 1, ad 8).

II. Polygamy is prohibited by natural law. That it is prohibited to Christians is of faith from the Council of Trent;[1] that it is prohibited to all is clear from Sacred Scripture.[2] But that it is prohibited to all by natural law is gathered from the fact that it is opposed to the secondary ends of matrimony; namely, to mutual help, which will suffer detriment from the lack of peaceful cohabitation; and to the quieting of concupiscence on the part of the wives, to each of whom the debt will not be rendered sufficiently. There are added the Instruction of the Holy Office,[3] and canon 1013, § 2, which counts unity among the essential properties of matrimony.

In the Old Law polygamy, besides for the reason alleged by Christ, that is, because of hardness of heart, was also conceded by God, so that the human race, and especially the Jewish race, might be multiplied more quickly (cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 65, a. 2). The said concession also seems to have been extended to the nations. But Christ the Lord removed the aforesaid concession,[4] so that in the evangelical law simultaneous polygamy is wholly and everywhere prohibited.

[1] Session 24, canon 2.

[2] Matthew 19:4 sq.

[3] June 20, 1866 (Collectanea, 1354).

[4] Matthew 19:4 sq.

Chapter II. On the Indissolubility of Matrimony

720 Indissolubility is the property by force of which the bond of matrimony, while the spouses are living, cannot be dissolved.

Indissolubility is distinguished as twofold, intrinsic and extrinsic. Intrinsic indissolubility consists in this, that matrimony cannot be dissolved by the cause through which it arose, that is, by the consent of the contracting parties. Matrimony is said to be extrinsically indissoluble insofar as it is not dissolved by God and cannot be dissolved by another external cause. Therefore matrimony is extrinsically soluble insofar as God has either established that in some case it will be dissolved by the fact itself, or has bestowed on some power the faculty of dissolving it. Now:

I. Every marriage is entirely intrinsically indissoluble, that is, it can never be dissolved by the consent of the contracting parties. This is clear from Sacred Scripture,[1] from the Council of Trent,[2] from proposition 67 proscribed by Pius IX in the Syllabus of Errors,[3] and from the encyclical of Pius XI Casti connubii;[4] likewise from reason. Matrimony, as a natural society, must of itself be apt for the ends of matrimony, to which education belongs. But soluble matrimony is not of itself apt for education; for such a marriage would greatly harm education, which requires a prolonged union of the parents and demands that parents leave goods to their children. Add that solubility is opposed to the very close friendship proper to matrimony, and exposes the morals of married persons to dangers (St. Thomas, Contra Gentiles, book 3, ch. 123; Supplement, q. 67, a. 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 956). Add besides that the matrimony of Christians, by the fact that it has been raised to the dignity of a sacrament, has received a new firmness.

II. With regard to extrinsic indissolubility, first note that the faculty of dissolving any marriage whatever by its own authority belongs to no human power; for no human power can by its own authority dissolve a right established by a higher power, such as is the natural law, by force of which matrimony cannot be dissolved. Hence if some human power can dissolve certain marriages, it cannot do this except in the name of God, or by vicarious power, as it is called. With these preliminary points established, concerning the extrinsic indissolubility of matrimony the following are laid down:

1. Matrimony between baptized persons:

a) If it is consummated, it is entirely indissoluble. This is clear 1° from ecclesiastical documents, that is, from canons of Councils and Synods, from decrees of the Holy See,[5] and from canon 1118, which declares: "A valid ratified and consummated marriage cannot be dissolved by any human power and by no cause, except death." It is deduced 2° from the fact that the Church has never used such a power. The reason is that ratified and consummated matrimony, by God's ordinance, perfectly represents the indissoluble union of Christ with the Church (p. 553).

Objection. Christ the Lord, when promulgating in the Gospel the indissolubility of Christian matrimony, nevertheless made an exception for the case of adultery: "But I say to you, that whoever shall put away his wife, except for fornication, and shall marry another, commits adultery" (Matthew 19:9). Therefore, in the case of adultery by one spouse, marriages even of baptized persons can be dissolved. So the Greek schismatics and most Protestants.

Response. As is clear from the context and from the parallel passages (Mark 10:11; Luke 16:18; 1 Corinthians 7:10, 11), Christ proclaimed the absolute indissolubility of the matrimonial bond, even for the case of adultery. Therefore he added absolutely: "And he who shall marry her that has been put away commits adultery."

Therefore it must be said that the exceptive clause "except for fornication" affects only the prior part of the sentence, "Whoever shall put away his wife, commits adultery" (or: "causes her to commit adultery," Matthew 5:32), but not the other part of the sentence: "Whoever shall marry another commits adultery."

Christ, therefore, when the Pharisees ask, "Is it lawful for a man to put away his wife for any cause whatever?" answers that it is indeed lawful to put away a wife for the cause of fornication; nevertheless it is never lawful to put away a wife in such a way that one marries another wife while the former is living. In other words, Christ teaches that in the case of adultery by one spouse separation, as they say, with regard to bed and cohabitation, is lawful, but that the matrimonial bond itself is not dissolved.

b) If it is not consummated, it is dissolved both by law itself through solemn religious profession, and by dispensation from the Apostolic See granted for a just cause, with both parties asking, or with one of the two asking even if the other is unwilling (canon 1119). It is said:

alpha) Through solemn religious profession; this is recognized in the law of the Decretals both by Alexander III[6] and by Innocent III,[7] and is of faith from the Council of Trent.[8] Moreover note well that the said force does not belong to simple profession, even one emitted in the Society of Jesus or by nuns, nor to the reception of Order itself, nor to the vow of chastity solemnized in the reception of Order.[9] Finally, since the marriage is not dissolved except at the very moment of solemn profession, the other party cannot pass to new nuptials before it is emitted.

It is disputed whether solemn religious profession dissolves marriage by ecclesiastical law[10] or by divine positive law.[11] Now it seems to dissolve it by ecclesiastical law, and not by divine positive law. For, first, the opinion which asserts divine positive law is not proved, although such an assertion would seem to have to be proved. Next, a priori it seems little probable that a thing which belongs solely to an ecclesiastical institution, namely the solemnity of vows,[12] would by divine law have the force of dissolving matrimony. Then, solemn and simple vow seem not to differ in nature or substance;[13] and, this being supposed, it is difficult to admit that an irritant force concerning matrimony belongs by divine law to the former, when the same cannot be affirmed of the latter. Finally solemn profession, considering only divine positive law, does not dirimently impede matrimony to be contracted, so that the later marriage, considering that law alone, can be reconciled with solemn profession; and, this being supposed, it can scarcely be admitted that a marriage already contracted, attending to divine positive law alone, is dissolved by solemn profession.

Objection. The Council of Trent declares: "If anyone says that a ratified but not consummated marriage is not dissolved through solemn religious profession by one of the spouses, let him be anathema."[14] Hence the dissolution of the said marriage through solemn profession is a dogmatic, immutable truth. But if you admit ecclesiastical law, solemn profession can be deprived of the privilege.

Response. The opposed canon of the Council of Trent proves divine law no more than canon 9, session 13 and canon 2, session 23 prove the Easter precept and minor Orders to be of divine law. The cited canons condemn the errors of heretics with regard to the statutes of the Church; namely, those who deny force to the said statutes deny the power of the Church, which is heretical.[15]

Note. Solemn religious profession does not seem to dissolve a marriage entered between non-baptized persons and consummated in infidelity, even if after conversion it has not been consummated; since it is clear from no ecclesiastical document that such force belongs to the said profession, although those who judge that marriage is dissolved by natural law or by divine positive law through solemn profession ascribe the aforesaid force to it with greater right than others do.[16] beta) Through dispensation granted by the Apostolic See for a just cause. This is clear from the constant practice of the Church.[17] A just cause is required, however, because the Church proceeds by vicarious power; and just causes are, for example, notable error of quality in contracting marriage; voluntary and too-protracted delay by one spouse in consummating the marriage; extraordinary and implacable enmities of the spouses; supervening disease, especially that which impedes the use of marriage; supervening crime, especially if a lengthy punishment of imprisonment is inflicted on the delinquent; probable impotence of one spouse, which nevertheless cannot be proved either to have been antecedent or to be perpetual; asserted but not sufficiently proved nullity of the marriage, for example under the head of force and fear, joined with certainty of non-consummation.[18] If the case and cause seem to occur, the matter should be referred to the Ordinary and through him recourse should be had to the Holy See, namely so that useless wanderings about may be avoided.

Note. A dispensation granted by the Holy See concerning a ratified and non-consummated marriage, or a permission made for passage to other nuptials on account of the presumed death of a spouse, always carries with it a dispensation from the impediment arising from adultery with a promise or attempted celebration of marriage, if there should be need of one (canon 1053).

2. Matrimony between a baptized party and a non-baptized party:

a) If it is not consummated, it is dissolved - as has been said concerning marriage entered between baptized persons - both by law itself through solemn religious profession, and by dispensation from the Apostolic See granted for a just cause (canon 1119).

b) If it is consummated, it likewise very probably can be dissolved by the Holy See, according to the doctrine soon to be handed down, by which any marriage can be dissolved by the Supreme Pontiff which has not been consummated after the baptism of both parties, except only the marriage of which neither party is baptized.

3. Matrimony between non-baptized persons:

a) If neither party is converted to the faith, that is, baptized, it is also extrinsically indissoluble. For a marriage of this kind cannot be dissolved: not by civil power, since it cannot dissolve the natural law (p. 548); not by the Supreme Pontiff, since he lacks power, even vicarious power, over infidels; nor by force of any law by which God has established that in some case marriage will be dissolved. In the Old Law, indeed, there had been conceded to the Jews the faculty of giving a bill of repudiation for dismissing wives, and this faculty also seems to have been extended to the nations.[19] But Christ the Lord revoked the bill of repudiation and restored to matrimony its primitive indissolubility, as is clear from Matthew.[20]

b) If one party is converted to the faith:

alpha) It is dissolved, the requisite conditions being fulfilled, in favor of the faith from the Pauline privilege (canon 1120, § 1), or in the case of the Apostle, as it is called; the Pauline privilege will be discussed particularly in the scholion.

Likewise it can be dissolved by the Holy See: certainly, if the marriage has not been consummated after conversion; very probably, even if it has been consummated after conversion. This follows from the things to be said under c).

c) If both parties are converted to the faith, it can be dissolved by the Holy See: certainly, if the marriage has not been consummated after the conversion or baptism of one of the converts; very probably, even if it has been consummated after the conversion of one of the converts; but not if it has been consummated after the conversion of both. It is said:

alpha) Certainly, if it has not been consummated after the baptism of one of the converts. For from ecclesiastical documents, especially from the constitution of Gregory XIII Populis ac nationibus,[21] it is deduced that marriages of this kind can be dissolved. But they are not dissolved by force of the Pauline privilege, which does not regard the marriage of two converted infidels (n. 721).

The major is proved: the constitution of Gregory XIII decrees: "Considering that marriages of this kind contracted among infidels are indeed true, yet are not to be judged so ratified that, when necessity counsels, they cannot be dissolved... we grant the faculty of dispensing,... so that they may be able to contract marriage with any one of the faithful... provided that it is established... that the absent spouse cannot be lawfully admonished.... And these marriages indeed, even if afterwards it should become known that the former infidel spouses could not declare their will because they were justly impeded, and that they had even been converted to the faith at the time of the second marriage already contracted, nevertheless must never be rescinded, but are valid and firm." But these things must at least hold if the marriage was not consummated after the baptism of one of the converts.

beta) Very probably, even if it has been consummated after the conversion of one of the converts. So authors now rather commonly. The reason seems to be that in this case matrimony - as not yet both elevated to a sacrament on the part of each party and consummated after the sacrament received by each party - does not perfectly represent the union of Christ with the Church, and therefore lacks full firmness.[22] gamma) But not if it has been consummated after the conversion or baptism of both parties. This is deduced first from the fact that in this case there seems to be a ratified marriage (n. 713) and, as is supposed, a consummated one; next from the fact that the Church has never dissolved marriages of this kind. There is added the consensus of theologians and canonists.

Conclusion. The Supreme Pontiff, provided that at least one of the spouses is baptized, can by vicarious power and from a proportionate cause dissolve every marriage which was not consummated after the baptism of both parties.

In proving the things on which the aforesaid conclusion rests, we have relied only on divine documents, that is, Sacred Scripture, and ecclesiastical documents. But it is helpful to illustrate the intrinsic reason in these terms: the indissolubility of marriage arises from a twofold source, from natural law and from divine positive law: from natural law, insofar as both the good of offspring and the good of the contracting parties require indissolubility; from divine positive law, insofar as matrimony established by God was a foreshadowing of that divine and indissoluble union between Christ and the Church; and this foreshadowing or mystical signification is implanted not only in the sacrament of matrimony, but, as the Supreme Pontiffs[23] and theologians bear witness, in every marriage. Yet it is implanted more perfectly in the sacrament of matrimony than in a marriage which is not a sacrament, because the sacred element which is more present in the sacrament of matrimony is more apt to receive the character of representing that sacred union.[24] Furthermore, it is implanted more perfectly in a marriage which is not a sacrament when it has been consummated than when it has not been consummated; likewise more perfectly in sacramental matrimony when consummated than when not consummated,[25] because the bond which has been ratified by the real handing over of the flesh is more apt to receive the character of foreshadowing that perfect union of Christ with the Church; indeed sacramental matrimony, not yet consummated, according to authors represents the more dissoluble union of Christ with the soul. And these things seem sufficiently to exhibit the reason for the different degree of indissolubility.

[1] Mark 10:11; Luke 16:18; 1 Corinthians 7:10, 11.

[2] Session 24.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1767.

[4] A.A.S. 1930, pp. 550-556, 558, 572-576.

[5] Cf. De Smet, De sponsalibus et matrimonio, n. 358, 359.

[6] C. 2 (4) and 7, X, III, 32.

[7] C. 14, X, III, 32.

[8] Session 24, canon 6.

[9] Cf. De Smet, op. cit., nn. 336, 337.

[10] Understand, however, a vicarious ecclesiastical law, so to speak, because the Church cannot dissolve marriage except by vicarious power; see p. 548.

[11] St. Bellarmine (De monachis, book 2, ch. 38) and others judge that marriage is dissolved by solemn profession by force of natural law, that is, from the very nature of solemn profession.

[12] De officiis religiosorum, t. I, n. 1218.

[13] Session 24, canon 6.

[14] Session 24, canon 6.

[15] Aertnys-Damen, op. cit. II, n. 924; Gasparri, op. cit., n. 1082.

[16] Cf. De Smet, op. cit., n. 339.

[17] Cf. De Smet, op. cit., nn. 328, 332.

[18] Vlaming, op. cit., n. 606.

[19] In the Old Law there was divorce with regard to the bond. For: 1° a repudiated wife could marry another man; 2° when the other man had died, the former husband could not receive her as wife, but she was not prohibited from marrying another (Deuteronomy 24:1-4).

[20] Chapter 19:3 sq.

[21] January 25, 1585.

[22] Cf. encyclical of Pius XI Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 552).

[23] Leo XIII, encyclical Arcanum; Pius XI, encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 570).

[24] Ephesians 5:32.

[25] Encyclical of Pius XI Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, pp. 552, 570).

Scholion I. On the Pauline Privilege

721 A lawful marriage between non-baptized persons, even if consummated, is dissolved in favor of the faith from the Pauline privilege (canon 1120, § 1), or in the case of the Apostle, as it is called; about this one must deal more fully.

I. Summary notion of the privilege. The privilege consists in this, that a spouse who in infidelity entered marriage with another infidel can, after receiving Baptism, if the other party persists in infidelity and departs, pass to new nuptials. By the new nuptials the prior marriage, even if it was consummated, is dissolved.

II. The existence of the privilege is clear from these words of St. Paul: "If any brother has an unbelieving wife, and she consents to dwell with him, let him not put her away. And if any faithful woman has an unbelieving husband, and he consents to dwell with her, let her not put away her husband. For the unbelieving husband is sanctified by the faithful woman, and the unbelieving woman is sanctified by the faithful husband; otherwise your children would be unclean, but now they are holy. But if the unbeliever departs, let him depart; for the brother or sister is not subject to servitude in such things; but God has called us in peace."[1]

It is disputed whether the Apostle merely promulgated a privilege established by God, or instituted it by force of a special faculty granted by Christ to the Apostles.

To the former opinion, which St. Alphonsus (VI, 955) and very many authors embrace, there are favorable the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide[2] and the Holy Office, which several times taught the origin of the privilege "granted by Christ the Lord and promulgated through the Apostle Paul."[3]

III. Conditions of the privilege. In order that, by force of the Pauline privilege, it may be lawful to pass to new nuptials, it is required: 1° that the marriage have been contracted between two infidels; 2° that one of the spouses be converted to the Christian religion; 3° that the other spouse persist in infidelity up to the new nuptials; 4° that the other spouse, after the Baptism of the faithful party, depart from that party physically or morally; 5° that through an interpellation the departure be established, unless the Apostolic See has declared otherwise. It is said:

1. That the marriage have been contracted between two infidels (canon 1120, § 1).[4] Hence there is no place for the privilege: 1° if a baptized person in the Catholic Church, after obtaining a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of cult, has contracted with an infidel (canon 1120, § 2); 2° if a baptized non-Catholic has contracted nuptials with an infidel; and this holds even if the said non-Catholic is converted to the Catholic Church (cf. canon 1120, § 1). Some indeed judge that a baptized non-Catholic who embraces the Catholic religion can enjoy the privilege, because he is truly converted.[5] But this seems to have to be denied, because conversion has always been understood of Baptism.[6]

Objection 1. Canon 1120, § 2 declares: "This privilege does not obtain in marriage entered between a baptized party and a non-baptized party with a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of cult." Therefore it obtains in a marriage entered between a baptized party and a non-baptized party without a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of cult, as if a schismatic or heretical party contracts with a non-baptized party.

Response. From the fact that the former does not obtain, it is not necessarily deduced that the latter obtains; that this in fact cannot be deduced follows from those things by which it is proved that it is required that the marriage have been contracted between two infidels, that is, from Sacred Scripture,[7] from the responses of the Holy Office,[8] and from the obvious sense of canon 1120, § 1.

Objection 2. The Church has in fact dispensed in a marriage between a non-baptized party and a party baptized in schism or in heresy.

Response. Let that pass; for the question is not about a dispensation granted by the Church, but about the Pauline privilege.

2. That one of the spouses be converted to the Christian religion, that is, be baptized, and this either in the Catholic Church or in some Christian sect. It is said:

a) Be baptized; hence even catechumens before Baptism cannot enjoy the privilege.[9]

b) Either in the Catholic Church or in some Christian sect. A few deny this and judge that it is required that the infidel spouse be converted to the Catholic faith; and they rely both on the words of Paul "brother," "sister," "faithful," and on chapter 6 De divortiis, where it is said: If the other "is converted to the Catholic faith." But Tradition teaches that the foundation of the privilege is the sacrament of faith, or Baptism.[10] If the Baptism of the converted party is doubtful, for the most part the difficulty is removed by repeating Baptism conditionally; for in the case of doubtful Baptism there can be no place for the Pauline privilege.[11] If a doubt about Baptism or its validity arises after the new marriage has been contracted, recourse should be had to the Holy Office.

3. That the other spouse persist in infidelity up to the new nuptials, that is, not be baptized. As soon as the other spouse also is baptized, the new marriage can no longer be entered.[12]

4. That the other spouse, after the Baptism of the faithful party, depart from that party physically or morally. Therefore it does not suffice that the infidel party not be baptized, but departure is also required; and indeed departure after the Baptism of the faithful party; departure before Baptism does not suffice. Moreover, both physical and moral departure suffices.

a) One departs physically: 1° who for any cause whatever is unwilling to cohabit. This departure, however, does not suffice if the faithful party, after receiving Baptism, has furnished to the infidel party a just cause of departing (canon 1123).[13] I said after Baptism, because Baptism washes away all past things. One departs physically: 2° who indeed wishes to cohabit, but is physically impeded from it, provided he is not impeded because of a cause placed by the faithful party after Baptism. The case is present, for example, if the infidel party is detained in prison and there is no hope that he will soon be freed. This is denied by some, who require a malicious departure; but the response of the Holy Office is opposed to this opinion.[14]

b) One departs morally: 1° who is unwilling to cohabit without insult to the Creator, for example if the infidel party inflicts a formal injury on religion, or importunately excites the faithful party to sins of irreligion, lust, etc., or prevents the faithful party from fulfilling the precepts of religion, or refuses that the offspring be educated religiously. One departs morally: 2° who is unwilling to cohabit peacefully, for example if the infidel party treats the other spouse cruelly without just cause, or does not renounce concubinage, or - as it seems should be added - more often commits adultery, or by other continued vices reduces conjugal life to servitude (St. Alphonsus VI, 956).

The fact that the infidel spouse previously cohabited without insult to the Creator and peacefully does not prevent there being place for the privilege, if the infidel afterwards departs physically or morally; and this holds even if the faithful spouse after Baptism again consummated the marriage with the infidel party (canon 1124).

5. That the departure be established by interpellation, unless the Apostolic See has declared otherwise (canon 1121).

a) It is doubtful by what law interpellation is required;[15] likewise whether it is necessary for the validity of the new marriage. Favoring the affirmative opinion are these words of canon 1121, § 1: "Before the converted spouse validly contracts..., he must... interpellate the non-baptized party."[16] Furthermore, the interpellations must regularly be made after Baptism.[17] But the infidel party must be asked: 1° whether he or she also wishes to be converted and receive Baptism; 2° whether at least he or she wishes to cohabit with the converted party peacefully, without insult to the Creator (canon 1121, § 1, 1° and 2°).

b) Interpellations should regularly be made, in at least summary and extrajudicial form, by authority of the Ordinary of the converted spouse. By that Ordinary there are also to be granted to the infidel spouse, if indeed he has requested them, delays for deliberating, yet with the warning that if the delays pass uselessly, the response will be presumed negative. Interpellations also made privately by the converted party himself are valid, indeed they are also licit, if the form prescribed above cannot be observed; nevertheless, in this case, for the external forum, these interpellations must be established by at least two witnesses or by another legitimate mode of proof (canon 1122). A single interpellation suffices, so that repetition is a matter of mere charity.[18] Indeed interpellation need not even then be repeated when the infidel spouse previously lived peacefully with the faithful spouse, but afterwards departs.

c) Interpellation must be made unless the Apostolic See has declared otherwise. Besides this, Bishops, Vicars, and Prefects Apostolic are commonly granted the faculty of dispensing in certain circumstances.

Note. Those things which regard matrimony in the constitutions of Paul III Altitudo, June 1, 1537; of St. Pius V Romani Pontificis, August 2, 1571; and of Gregory XIII Populis, January 25, 1585, and which were written for particular places, are extended also to other regions in the same circumstances (canon 1125). It is said to other regions, that is, everywhere on earth, in the same circumstances. Now:

1° Paul III decrees "that polygamists who before conversion had several wives according to their customs, and do not remember which one they first took, once converted to the faith, may take one of them whom they wish, so that they may contract matrimony with her by words concerning the present, as is the custom; but those who do remember which one they first took, having dismissed the others, are to retain her. And we grant to them that those joined even in the third degree both of consanguinity and of affinity are not excluded from contracting marriages." The same holds concerning a woman who lived in polyandry.

2° Pius V declares that the same persons, even if they remember which was the first wife, may remain, the others having been dismissed, with the wife who was baptized with them. Nevertheless the first wife, if she is known to some, seems first to have to be interpellated as to whether she wishes to be converted. The text of Pius V does not indeed expressly declare this, but it is counseled by formula n. 23 of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, where in the same case the faculty of dispensing is granted to Ordinaries under this condition, that the lawful wife of the convert has expressly refused conversion. It suffices, however, to interpellate the former wife, if she is known, as to whether she wishes to be converted; the other interpellation concerning peaceful cohabitation can be omitted.

3° Gregory XIII grants to local Ordinaries, pastors, and confessors of the Society of Jesus[19] the faculty of dispensing with converted infidels, so that, the infidel spouse having been left, they may marry any one of the faithful, with the consent of the infidel in no way required or the response not waited for, "provided it is established, even summarily and extrajudicially, that the absent spouse, as was stated, cannot lawfully be admonished, or that, once admonished, he has not signified his will within the time fixed in that admonition." Many conclude from various responses of the Holy Office that these faculties can be extended to the case where it is established that interpellation will be useless.[20] The Supreme Pontiff adds: "and these marriages indeed, even if afterwards it should become known that the former infidel spouses could not declare their will because they were justly impeded, and had also been converted to the faith at the time of the second marriage contracted, nevertheless we decree that they must never be rescinded, but are valid and firm, and that the offspring to be received from them will be legitimate."

IV. Use of the privilege. 1. If the infidel who has been interpellated denies either conversion and due cohabitation, or due cohabitation alone and not conversion; likewise if he responds that he indeed wishes to cohabit peacefully, but is impeded from carrying out his will, the faithful spouse can pass to new nuptials (canon 1123), provided nevertheless that, if the infidel spouse admits conversion, the faithful spouse enters the nuptials before the Baptism of that spouse. Besides, for liceity it is required that the Ordinary or his delegate have declared that one can proceed to the use of the privilege.

2. If the infidel responds nothing, it must be seen whether the interpellation reached him and whether he could easily respond, so that departure can be gathered from the denied response. If the matter remains doubtful, and no fruit is hoped from a repeated interpellation, a dispensation from interpellation should be obtained.

3. The faithful spouse can enter new nuptials with a Catholic person only (cf. canons 1123, 1124). Unless a dispensation is obtained, marriage with a heretical person will be illicit; with an infidel, because of disparity of cult, it will be invalid. Moreover note:

a) If the infidel admits both conversion and due cohabitation, the faithful spouse, as is clear, is bound to cohabit with him.

b) If the infidel admits due cohabitation, but not conversion, the faithful spouse indeed cannot contract a new marriage; nevertheless, equally as the faithful spouse whose other party has fallen into heresy, he can institute divorce from bed and cohabitation, after a warning has first been given and after he has awaited conversion for a reasonable time. This is the doctrine and practice of the Church.[21]

4. By the new nuptials the prior marriage is dissolved, so that the infidel party after those nuptials have been contracted, not before, can validly contract a new marriage (canon 1126; St. Alphonsus VI, 957).[22] That the prior marriage is dissolved through solemn profession which the faithful spouse may perhaps emit is denied rather commonly. Finally, the new nuptials are held by the Church as first nuptials, so that the faithful spouse is not judged a bigamist.

[1] 1 Corinthians 7:12-15.

[2] Collectanea, n. 1305 sq.

[3] For example, in the Instruction to the Vicar Apostolic of Natal, July 11, 1866 (Collectanea, n. 1295).

[4] Holy Office to the Bishop of Cochin, August 5, 1759, ad 4 (Collectanea, n. 421); in Nanking, March 5, 1852 (Collectanea, n. 1070).

[5] Ami du Clerge, 1921, p. 69 sq. and p. 234 sq.

[6] Cf. Gregorianum, 1923, p. 241 sq. and p. 329 sq.

[7] 1 Corinthians 7:12-15.

[8] August 5, 1759, ad 4 (Collectanea, n. 421); March 5, 1852 (Collectanea, n. 1070).

[9] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, January 16, 1803 (Collectanea, n. 665).

[10] C. Gaudemus, 8, De Divortiis.

[11] Holy Office, March 13, 1901; cf. Gregorianum, loc. cit.; Holy Office, March 8, 1911. Nevertheless the Supreme Pontiff can, the requisite conditions being fulfilled, by vicarious power dissolve the marriage previously entered (n. 722).

[12] Holy Office, August 5, 1759, ad 2 (Collectanea, n. 421); Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, January 30, 1807 (Collectanea, n. 690).

[13] July 8, 1891 (Collectanea, n. 1760).

[14] Holy Office, December 14, 1848, ad 2 (Collectanea, n. 1036).

[15] Holy Office, August 5, 1759 (Collectanea, n. 924); July 4, 1855 (Collectanea, n. 950).

[16] Cf. Holy Office, September 16, 1824 (Collectanea, n. 784); June 12, 1850 (Collectanea, n. 1044).

[17] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, January 17, 1836, ad 1 (Collectanea, n. 845).

[18] Holy Office, April 13, 1859 (Collectanea, n. 1175); June 3, 1874 (Collectanea, n. 1415); Holy Office, June 12, 1850, ad 1 (Collectanea, n. 1044).

[19] "With canon 1125 considered, the faculty now seems to be extended to all confessors" (Aertnys-Damen, II, 922, question 1°).

[20] Cf. Vermeersch, De casu Apostoli, n. 77.

[21] Cf. Wernz-Vidal, n. 702.

[22] Constitution of Benedict XIV Postremo mense, February 28, 1747.

Scholion II. On the Privilege of Faith

722 The privilege of faith in a doubtful matter enjoys the favor of law (canon 1127). It is said:

I. The privilege of faith. Now the privilege of faith is the privilege which, by force of the Church's power of dissolving certain marriages, is granted to one converted to the faith, in relation to marriage.

II. In a doubtful matter, that is, in a matter doubtful after diligent examination has been undertaken; once this has been undertaken, the case is present:

1. If there is doubt about the fact or about the validity of a marriage entered before Baptism.
2. If there is doubt which was the first wife among several taken before Baptism.
3. If there is doubt whether the requisites are present so that the convert, by force of the Pauline privilege, can contract a new marriage with a Catholic person. If, however, the doubt regards the interpellations, and no fruit is hoped from their repetition, a dispensation from the interpellations must be obtained.
4. If there is doubt about the fact or about the validity of Baptism received by one party; but not if each party was baptized with doubtful validity. For the legislator, in declaring the principle established by canon 1127, does not distinguish between consummated and non-consummated marriages, so that, if in the latter hypothesis he does not regard consummated marriages, neither is he to be judged to regard the other species, in other words, no marriages. But in the latter hypothesis he does not regard consummated marriages, because these in that hypothesis are probably ratified and consummated, that is, entirely indissoluble. Therefore in the latter hypothesis he regards no marriages, or the principle cannot be applied.

III. It enjoys the favor of law, that is, in the cases set forth the converted party has the right of choosing what favors him in relation to marriage. Hence:

1. In doubt about the validity of a marriage contracted before Baptism, he can enter a new marriage.
2. In doubt which was the first wife, he can take whichever he prefers from the wives whom he assumed before Baptism.
3. In doubt about the requisites so that the convert can enter a new marriage with a Catholic party, he has the right of doing this.
4. In doubt about the fact or about the validity of Baptism received in the Catholic Church, he can contract a new marriage.

Note. Nevertheless, in each of the doubts set forth, recourse must be had to the Holy Office, so that it may examine the case (canon 247, § 3), or to another to whom that faculty may perhaps have been granted.

Scholion III. On the Favor of Law which Belongs to Matrimony

723 Matrimony enjoys the favor of law; therefore in doubt one must stand for the validity of matrimony until the contrary is proved, with due regard for the prescription of canon 1127 (canon 1014). It is said:

I. It enjoys the favor of law, that is, the favor which matrimony enjoys is a favor of law, not a favor of law and by law, so that demonstration of the contrary is admitted; but what a favor of law involves will now be explained.

II. Therefore in doubt one must stand for the validity of matrimony until the contrary is proved. Understand a doubt persisting after diligent examination. This being supposed:

1. In a doubt of law, that is, in doubt whether the marriage celebrated is valid, it is to be held as valid until nullity is proved.
2. In a doubt of fact, one must stand for the marriage entered when the bond between the parties enjoys the name and possession of marriage, in other words, is publicly held as a marriage.

The reason is that the good of offspring and the common good demand that marriages persist as long as they are not certainly null (St. Alphonsus VI, 903 sq.).

3. With due regard for the prescription of canon 1127; and, with that canon considered, if either of the infidel spouses is converted, and there is doubt about the validity of the marriage entered before Baptism, a new marriage can be permitted by the competent authority (n. 722).

Section V. On the Effects of Matrimony

724 I. Division of effects. The effects of matrimony are divided:

1. By reason of connection, into inseparable and separable effects. Inseparable effects are those which spontaneously and necessarily flow from valid matrimony. Such are, for example, that true spouses must be held as such; that there arises between the spouses a bond by its nature perpetual and exclusive (canon 1110); that each spouse from the very beginning of matrimony has an equal right and duty with regard to the acts proper to conjugal life (canon 1111), etc. Separable effects are those which accrue to matrimony accidentally or extrinsically; and they are called ecclesiastical or civil, according as they draw their origin from canon law or from civil law. Ecclesiastical effects are, for example, that, unless something else has been provided by special law, the wife becomes a participant in the status of the husband with regard to canonical effects (canon 1112), the right of ecclesiastical patronage granted to the father of a family, etc. Civil effects are, for example, nobility coming to the other spouse or to offspring, the right of political suffrage belonging to the father of a family.

2. By reason of the participants, into effects common to each spouse, and effects proper to the husband, to the wife, or to the children.

II. The different effects of matrimony. 1. Effects common to each spouse are:

a) A bond by its nature perpetual and exclusive (canon 1110).

b) An equal right and duty with regard to the acts proper to conjugal life (canon 1111).

c) The obligation of caring according to one's powers for the education of offspring, both religious and moral and physical and civil, and also of providing for their temporal good (canon 1113).

2. Effects proper to the husband are: marital power over the wife, and the power of the father over the children.

3. Effects proper to the wife are: subjection to the husband; likewise participation in the status of the husband with regard to canonical effects, unless by special law something else has been provided (canon 1112), for example that she enjoys the domicile of her husband (canon 93, § 1), etc.

4. The effect especially proper to children is legitimacy; but concerning this and concerning matters akin to it, because they recur so often, we shall speak particularly in the scholion.

Scholion. On Legitimacy and Matters Akin to It

We shall speak of legitimacy, of legitimate children, of illegitimate children, and of legitimation.

725 I. Legitimacy is the quality of legitimate or legitimated offspring, which produces certain determinate effects to be set forth later.

726 II. Legitimate children. With natural law considered, legitimate children are those conceived from a valid marriage. But with canon law considered, legitimate children are, with the things to be excepted excepted:

1. Those conceived from a valid or putative marriage.[1] It is said from a marriage, that is, from a mother joined in marriage and from the man to whom she is joined in marriage (canon 1114).

2. Those born from a valid or putative marriage, even if the parents at the time of conception had not yet entered marriage.

3. Those carried in the womb while there is a marriage between the pregnant woman and the father of the offspring, even if conception had place before the marriage, and the father or mother dies before the birth of the offspring, so that the offspring was neither conceived nor born from marriage. The aforesaid are to be called legitimate because of parity of reason, or, if you prefer, because of the formal equality of this case with the case of offspring merely born from marriage; hence canon 1114 is judged to comprehend them also.

I said with the things to be excepted excepted, because those are illegitimate who were conceived or born from a valid or putative marriage of parents for whom, because of solemn profession or a sacred Order received, the use of a previously contracted marriage was prohibited at the time of conception

(canon 1114). Note: previously contracted; hence offspring born from a marriage entered between one bound by solemn vow and another, but with a dispensation, even if perhaps conceived before the marriage, is not illegitimate, because it is not a question of a marriage contracted before the vow. Moreover note:

a) Those conceived or born in marriage, that is, from a mother joined in marriage, are held to have been conceived or born from marriage, that is, from the mother and from the man to whom she is joined in marriage, and therefore are held as legitimate, unless the contrary is proved by evident arguments (canon 1115, § 1). This is proved, for example, by showing that intercourse did not have place during the time useful for conception, that is, from the 300th day to the 180th day before birth,[2] for example because of illness or because of absence. The declaration of the man or of the woman, even if confirmed by oath, does not suffice. I said: they are held as legitimate, but not of themselves from an ordinary presumption of law, since this is restricted only to some. Namely:

b) Those conceived or born in marriage are presumed to have been conceived or born from marriage, and consequently are presumed legitimate, if they were born at least after six months from the day the marriage was celebrated, or within ten months from the day conjugal life was dissolved (canon 1115, § 2). If a child is born within six months from the day conjugal life was dissolved, and the man at once denied that the offspring born was his, and other things also support the truth of the assertion, the presumption favors the man, and the burden of proving that he, that is, the man, is the father, rests on the other party.

c) In doubt whether offspring was conceived or born in marriage, for example exposed children, it seems that the offspring must be held legitimate; since it seems it must be held as conceived and born in marriage, and likewise from marriage, because a delict is not presumed; this being supposed, it must also be held legitimate unless the contrary is proved.

[1] An invalid marriage is called putative if it was celebrated in good faith by at least one party, until each party becomes certain of its nullity (canon 1015, § 4). It is disputed whether a marriage invalid because of defect of form can ever be held as putative.

[2] The useful time is computed in this way because birth commonly has place between 180 and 300 days after conception.

727 III. Illegitimate children. 1. Notion. Illegitimate children are: 1° those who were neither conceived nor born from a valid or putative marriage, nor carried in the womb while there was a marriage between the pregnant woman and the father of the offspring; 2° those conceived or born from a valid or putative marriage of parents for whom, because of solemn profession or because an Order had been received, the use of the previously contracted marriage was prohibited at the time of conception.

2. Division. Illegitimate children are distinguished into natural and spurious. Natural children are those who were procreated by parents who at the time either of conception or of birth or in the interval between the two could have been joined by valid marriage; moreover it suffices that they could have been so joined through a dispensation obtained.

Spurious children are those who were procreated by parents who, because of a diriment impediment not removed during the whole time from conception up to birth, could not have contracted valid marriage with each other.

Spurious children are subdivided into adulterine, sacrilegious, incestuous, nefarious, and simply spurious. Adulterine children are those born from adultery; sacrilegious, those born from a solemnly professed man or woman, or from a cleric constituted in sacred orders; incestuous, those born from consanguineous or affinal relatives in the prohibited degrees; nefarious, those procreated from consanguineous persons in the direct line. The rest are called simply spurious.

3. The effects of illegitimacy are:

a) Illegitimate persons are irregular by defect (canon 984, 1°), and therefore can licitly receive neither orders, whether major or minor, nor tonsure, and they are prohibited from exercising orders received (canon 968); hence they also cannot be admitted by the Ordinary into the seminary (canon 1363, § 1).

b) Illegitimate persons are kept from the Cardinalate (canon 232, § 2, 1°), from the Episcopate (canon 331, § 1, 1°), from the office of Abbot or Prelate nullius (canon 320, § 2), or from the office of major Superior in religious institutes (canon 504; cf. canon 488, 8°).

c) Illegitimate persons destined for the priesthood, as being irregular, cannot be admitted to the novitiate (canon 542, 2°).

[1] Cf. Schmitz, Die Stellung der unehelichen Kinder im geltenden kanonischen Recht; Mulders in Ned. Kath. Stemmen, 1931, p. 15 sq. and p. 33 sq.

728 IV. Legitimation. 1. Modes of legitimating. Legitimation is made, or can be made, as follows:

a) Through the subsequent marriage of the parents, whether true or putative, whether newly contracted or convalidated, even if not consummated, offspring is made legitimate, provided the parents were able to contract marriage with each other at the time of conception, or of pregnancy, or of birth (canon 1116), in other words, natural offspring is made legitimate. Therefore observe that offspring is also legitimated if a parent, after another marriage, contracts nuptials with the other parent of the offspring. Nevertheless, it is required that each be a parent of the offspring; but the consent of the offspring is not demanded; indeed legitimation would have place even if the offspring itself opposed its legitimation.

b) Through a dispensation granted over a diriment impediment, whether from ordinary power or from delegated power through a general indult, simply spurious and incestuous offspring is legitimated by that very fact, if any has already been born or conceived; it is not legitimated through a dispensation granted from delegated power through a rescript in particular cases (canon 1051). It is said:

alpha) Through a dispensation granted either from ordinary power or from delegated power through a general indult. The case obtains if the Holy See dispenses in gracious form, that is, without an executor; likewise if the Ordinary dispenses by force of canon 1043 or canon 1045, or of quinquennial faculties; likewise if the pastor dispenses by force of canon 1044 or canon 1045, § 3; likewise if the Holy See indeed dispenses in commissorial form, but with a necessary executor required, because then the Holy See itself also dispenses (vol. I, n. 209). In the case, however, with the formulas which the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments uses being considered, it is imposed on the executor that he "decree and declare the offspring legitimate."

beta) Simply spurious and incestuous offspring is legitimated. Adulterine and sacrilegious offspring are excepted; nefarious offspring is not legitimated, because in such a marriage a dispensation is not granted.

gamma) If any has already been born or conceived: understand, as is clear, offspring which is truly illegitimate. Hence by offspring already conceived is to be understood offspring already conceived, but neither born nor carried in the womb after the marriage with dispensation was contracted or convalidated; for if it is born, or at least carried in the womb, after the marriage so contracted or convalidated, the offspring is legitimate, and therefore is not legitimated. But by dispensation there is legitimated offspring born before the dispensation; likewise offspring born after the dispensation but before marriage, whether this marriage is afterwards contracted, or is not contracted because of death, or, so others say, because of a cause independent of the will of the petitioners, or, so others say, for any cause whatever. The obvious sense of the law, which declares that offspring is legitimated by dispensation from the impediment, favors the last opinion.

delta) It is not legitimated through a dispensation granted from delegated power through a rescript in particular cases; this obtains, for example, if the Holy See dispenses in commissorial form with a voluntary executor required. For then the executor is delegated to dispense through a particular rescript.

Corollary I. If a diriment impediment to marriage is removed without dispensation, for example by the passage of time if the impediment of age was standing in the way, offspring is not legitimated by the very fact that the marriage is convalidated; rather there is need of a special rescript.[1]

Corollary II. Where marriage is sanated in the root, illegitimate offspring is legitimated by force of the sanated marriage, if it is a question of natural offspring; by force of the dispensation which sanation in the root carries with it, if there is question of simply spurious or incestuous offspring.

c) Through a special rescript of the Holy See any illegitimate offspring can be legitimated. A rescript of this kind is granted for the external forum by the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments or, if one party is non-Catholic, by the Holy Office; for the internal forum, by the Sacred Penitentiary.

2. Effects of legitimation. a) Children legitimated through subsequent marriage, as regards canonical effects, are in all things equated with legitimate children, unless something else has been expressly provided (canon 1117). Now it has been expressly provided that children, even if they have been legitimated through subsequent marriage, are kept from the Cardinalate (canon 232, § 2, 1°), from the Episcopate, and from the dignity of Abbot or Prelate nullius (canons 331, § 1, 1°; 320, § 2).

b) Children legitimated through dispensation or through a special rescript of the Holy See seem to be equated in all things with legitimate children, unless something else has been provided by common law or in the grant of the dispensation or in the special rescript. Now by common law it has been provided that children legitimated through dispensation or through a special rescript are kept from the Cardinalate, from the Episcopate, and from the dignity of Abbot or Prelate nullius (canon 331, § 1, 1°; canon 320, § 2). This must be deduced from the fact that canon 331, § 1, 1° declares: "legitimated even through subsequent marriage"; hence a fortiori if a son has been legitimated in another way.

c) If an illegitimate person is legitimated through sanation in the root, all effects of illegitimacy are removed, unless something else has been provided in the written grant. For sanation in the root carries with it, by a fiction of law, that the marriage is judged to have been valid from the beginning, as regards canonical effects (canon 1138), one of which certainly is the legitimacy of offspring. Hence those legitimated in this way are not of themselves kept even from the Cardinalate, the Episcopate, and the dignity of Abbot or Prelate nullius.

Note 1. Particular effects of illegitimacy, for example irregularity in relation to receiving Orders, can also be removed through dispensation. Besides, some particular effects are also removed in another way: thus, for example, irregularity for receiving Orders is also removed through solemn religious profession, but not inability, for example, for the office of major Superior (canon 504).

Note 2. It is very expedient that the legitimation of offspring and the mode by which this has been granted be noted by the pastor in the baptismal book, and therefore be signified to the respective pastor by the one who has obtained the legitimation.

[1] Pontifical Commission, December 6 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 25).

Part II. On Matrimony, Insofar as It Is a Sacrament, Particularly

We shall speak first of the sacrament of matrimony considered in itself, then of the ministration and form of celebration, finally of the reception of the sacrament of matrimony.

Section I. On the Sacrament of Matrimony Considered in Itself

One must treat of the existence, essence, and effects of the sacrament of matrimony.

Chapter I. On the Existence of the Sacrament of Matrimony

729 Matrimony is a true sacrament. This proposition is of faith, for example from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that matrimony is not truly and properly one of the seven sacraments of the evangelical law, instituted by Christ the Lord, but invented by men in the Church, and that it does not confer grace, let him be anathema."[1]

Note 1. The time of the institution of this sacrament by Christ is uncertain. Some judge that it was instituted at the wedding at Cana;[2] others, when Christ established the indissolubility of Matrimony;[3] finally others, after the Resurrection, at the time when the Lord conversed with his disciples, speaking of the kingdom of God.[4]

Note 2. Matrimony in the Old Law not only was not an efficacious sign of grace, but does not seem to be counted among the sacraments of the Old Law, that is, among the signs of grace then existing. "But matrimony," says St. Thomas, "was indeed in the Old Law insofar as it was for the office of nature, but not insofar as it is the sacrament of the conjunction of Christ and the Church, which had not yet been made; hence also in the Old Law a bill of repudiation was given, which is contrary to the nature of a sacrament" (I-II, q. 102, a. 5, ad 3).

[1] Session 24, canon 1.

[2] John 2.

[3] Matthew 19:4.

[4] Acts 1:3.

Chapter II. On the Essence of the Sacrament of Matrimony

730 I. Contract and sacrament in Christian marriage cannot be separated, so that a matrimonial contract between Christians cannot exist without being a sacrament. So teach Pius VI in the letter to the Bishop of Motula;[1] Pius IX in the Apostolic letter to the king of Sardinia;[2] Leo XIII in the encyclical Arcanum;[3] and the same is gathered from the Council of Trent[4] and from canon 1012, § 2.

II. The matrimonial contract constitutes the whole nature of the sacrament, so that neither the blessing of the priest, nor indeed even his presence, belongs to its essence. This follows from canon 1012, § 1; likewise from the Council of Trent, which declared that clandestine marriages, that is, marriages not contracted before the pastor and witnesses, were ratified and true marriages as long as the Church had not made them invalid[5] (St. Thomas, In IV, dist. 26, q. 2, a. 1, ad 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 897, 898).

III. The matter and form of the sacrament of matrimony are:

1. The remote matter is the bodies of the contracting parties, or rather the mutual right over the body of the other. This right is called remote matter in the sense that it is the matter about which the matrimonial contract is concerned (St. Alphonsus VI, 880).

2. The proximate matter and form is the consent itself expressed by words or by another sign. Namely, here the proximate matter is consent insofar as it signifies mutual handing over, and the form is consent insofar as it expresses mutual acceptance. So Benedict XIV in the letter Paucis abhinc to the Archbishop of Goa.[6] And indeed, since the matrimonial contract itself, as has been proved, constitutes marriage, the matter, that is, the determinable part, and the form, that is, the determining part, must necessarily be found in the contract itself or in the expressed consent. Now in every contract the handing over of the thing, as being the beginning of the contract, is the determinable part or matter; but acceptance, as being the completion of the contract, is the determining part or form (St. Alphonsus VI, 880, 897).

Corollary. The nature of the sacrament is in matrimony in fieri, that is, in the contract which is now placed or obtains its effect. This follows from the things said. It is disputed whether the nature of the sacrament is also in matrimony in facto esse, that is, in the bond; in other words, whether matrimony, after the contract has been entered, persists in its being as a sacrament, after the likeness of the Holy Eucharist. Concerning this opinion Pius XI in the encyclical Casti connubii[7] says thus: "Therefore let them [the spouses] meditate on these words of St. Cardinal Robert Bellarmine, full indeed of solid consolation, who, with other theologians of great name, thus piously thinks and writes: 'The Sacrament of Marriage can be considered in two ways: in one way, while it is being made; in another way, while it remains after it has been made. For it is a sacrament similar to the Eucharist, which is a sacrament not only while it is being made, but also while it remains; for while the spouses live, their society is always the sacrament of Christ and the Church.'"

Question 1. Whether a marriage between two infidels, after Baptism has been received by each spouse, becomes a sacrament.

Response. Some simply deny it; others affirm it, but among these some require that the spouses elicit new consent, or approve the prior consent by words, nods, or marital intercourse; others think it suffices that the consent not be retracted; others abstract from the influence of consent, and judge that the marriage by the very fact that Baptism is received becomes a sacrament. Now it seems that it must be said that the said marriage truly becomes a sacrament; both because on the one hand it must be admitted that the married Ephesians to whom Paul directed his epistle truly received the sacrament of matrimony,[8] and on the other hand it cannot be admitted that they entered marriage only after receiving Baptism; and because marriages of infidels, consummated after Baptism has been received by each party, seem to be entirely indissoluble (p. 552), which also seems to have to be ascribed to their sacramentality (pp. 552 and 553). Moreover, the opinion is preferable which teaches that the reception of Baptism itself suffices for the marriage to become a sacrament, or for the sacrament, which was already present in potency, to pass into act (cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 59, a. 2, ad 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 897).

Question 2. Whether the marriage of an infidel party who is baptized becomes a sacrament if the other party is not baptized; likewise whether a marriage which a faithful person validly contracts with an infidel is a sacrament.

Response. Concerning each case there is dispute. Some deny it, because just as the contract, so also the sacrament will be either in each party or in neither party. But it is not in the infidel party; therefore neither is it in the faithful party. Others probably affirm it, because their opinion is not repugnant: one and the same contract can be a sign conferring grace for the one who is capable of the sacrament, but only potentially for the one who because of a defect extrinsic to the contract is not yet capable of the sacrament.

[1] September 16, 1788.

[2] September 19, 1852.

[3] February 10, 1880.

[4] Decree on the reform of Matrimony, chapter 1.

[5] Session 24, Decree on the reform of Matrimony, chapter 1.

[6] March 19, 1758.

[7] A.A.S. 1930, p. 583.

[8] Ephesians 5.

Chapter III. On the Effects of the Sacrament of Matrimony

731 The effects of the sacrament of matrimony are:

I. Sanctifying grace, of itself second grace or an increase of grace, accidentally more probably first grace (n. 6). There is attached an increase of the virtues and of the gifts of the Holy Spirit.

II. Sacramental grace; namely, the grace which the sacrament of matrimony confers is unitive of souls and restraining of concupiscence, having annexed to it a claim to actual graces for the duties of matrimony to be duly fulfilled, notably for raising and educating offspring in honor of God.

Section II. On the Ministration of the Sacrament of Matrimony and the Form of its Celebration

732 I. Ministration of the sacrament. Concerning this, it suffices to have noted: the ministers of the sacrament are the contracting parties themselves. This is established from the Council of Florence, which says thus: "The efficient cause of matrimony regularly is mutual consent expressed by words concerning the present."[1] The reason is that contract and sacrament are identified. Hence those who effect the contract also effect the sacrament (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 45, a. 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 897).

[1] Session 24, Decree on the reform of Matrimony, chapter 1.

733 II. Form of the celebration of the sacrament. The priest, although he is not the minister of the sacrament, is nevertheless called the minister of the celebration, insofar as he assists the marriage to be contracted as a qualified witness and performs other things necessary for validity.

The Holy Tridentine Synod had established the solemn form necessary for validity in the chapter Tametsi in these words: "Those who shall attempt to contract marriage otherwise than in the presence of the pastor, or another priest with the permission of that pastor or of the Ordinary, and of two or three witnesses, the Holy Synod renders entirely incapable of contracting in this way, and decrees that contracts of this kind are invalid and null."[1] This legislation remained until April 19, 1908,[2] on which day the decree Ne temere, "On Betrothals and Matrimony," began to be in force, issued by the Sacred Congregation of the Council on August 2, 1907, by special mandate of Pius X. Then from May 19, 1918, the new Code of Canon Law has force, which left the Pian law untouched in most things, but changed it in certain things. But it is clear that marriages and betrothals contracted under the earlier legislation must be judged according to that legislation. Now, about to set forth the manner of celebrating marriage, we shall speak first of the juridic form, then of the liturgical form of celebrating marriage, with a scholion added on the form to be observed in celebrating marriage by a Catholic party with a non-Catholic party; then of the time and place of the celebration of marriage; and finally of the things to be observed after the celebration of marriage, that is, of the registration of the marriage celebrated.

[1] Session 24, Decree on the reform of Matrimony, chapter 1.

[2] For Chinese regions, until April 11, 1909 (Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 29, 1908).

Chapter I. On the Juridic Form

The juridic form is distinguished as twofold, ordinary and extraordinary. Hence we shall treat first of the ordinary juridic form, then of the extraordinary juridic form, and then of those who are subject to the aforesaid forms.

Article I. On the Ordinary Juridic Form

We shall hand down first a summary exposition, then a fuller exposition of the juridic form.

§ I. Summary Exposition

734 The ordinary juridic form, required for the validity of marriage, is that it be contracted before the pastor or local Ordinary or a priest delegated by either of them, and at least two witnesses (canon 1094). But the presence of those assisting must be simultaneous, physical, and moral. It is said:

I. That it be contracted before the pastor or local Ordinary or a priest delegated by either of them. Now:

1. Under the name of pastor here come:

a) The priest to whom a parish has been conferred as a title, with the care of souls to be exercised under the authority of the local Ordinary (canon 451, § 1).

b) The actual parochial vicar, who supplies the place of the moral person to whom habitual care belongs (cf. canon 471).

c) Quasi-pastors, who govern quasi-parishes.[1]

d) Chaplains of soldiers, whether major or minor, insofar as they are equated with pastors; this is gathered from the particular prescriptions of the Holy See (canon 451, § 3).

e) Chaplains or rectors of pious places of any kind exempt from parochial care, provided that full parochial power has been committed to them, are counted as pastors, but only for the persons entrusted to them and in the place over which they preside.[2] The power belongs exclusively to the rector if the place is entirely exempt; otherwise it is cumulative with the pastor of the place (cf. canon 464, § 2).

f) Parochial vicars who are furnished with full parochial power, namely:

alpha) A substituted vicar holding the place in all things of a pastor absent for more than a week, approved by the Ordinary (canon 465, §§ 4 and 5; canon 474). The substitute, if he is the vicar of a religious pastor, must also be approved by the religious Superior, but this is not required for the validity of assistance.[3] beta) A supplying priest who takes the place in all things of a pastor departing for a sudden and grave cause for more than a week (canon 465, § 5; canon 474),[4] but not a supplying priest of a pastor departing for a shorter time.

gamma) A supplying priest designated by the Ordinary and exercising in all things the place of a pastor who, by sentence, is to be deprived of the benefice, but who has recourse to the Holy See (canon 474; canon 1923, § 2).

delta) A vicar administrator, namely one constituted when a parish is vacant, formerly called deservitor (canon 472, 1°). epsilon) A vicar cooperator, the first or the older in office, or the nearer pastor; likewise the superior of the house who, before the appointment of an administrator, meanwhile assumes the governance of the parish, unless provision has been made otherwise (canon 472, § 2).

eta) An assistant vicar constituted by the local Ordinary who supplies in all things the place of a pastor unequal to duly carrying out his duties (canon 475).

Note 1. A vicar cooperator, of whom canon 476 speaks, of himself does not come under the name of pastor, although he enjoys general delegation. For, as is clear from the terms themselves, he is without the power proper to a pastor, that is, ordinary power, and has only delegated power.

Note 2. In mission regions where there are not quasi-parishes, all missionaries are cooperators of the Vicar or Prefect, and therefore with his delegation, whether general or particular, they can validly and licitly assist at marriage.[5]

Note 3. In mission regions where several missionaries divide some part of the territory among themselves into distinct stations, which they administer under one Superior of the central station, that superior is not held as quasi-pastor of the whole territory unless the care of souls of the whole district is truly and immediately committed to him.

2. Under the name of local Ordinary in law come, unless someone is expressly excepted, besides the Roman Pontiff, each for his own territory: the residential Bishop, Abbot or Prelate nullius and their Vicar General, Administrator, Vicar and Prefect Apostolic, and likewise those who, when the aforesaid are lacking, succeed meanwhile in governance by prescription of law or by approved constitutions (canon 198).

3. A priest delegated by either of them; concerning these, particular mention is made in n. 737 sq.

4. And at least two witnesses. Now:

a) As regards validity, persons of any kind can be taken as witnesses, provided they actually enjoy the use of reason and are capable of testifying. Nor does canon 1757, § 1 stand in the way, since it indeed excludes the impubescent, but speaks only of witnesses in judgment. Heretics, excommunicated persons, and infamous persons are not licitly employed. Particularly with regard to heretics, the Holy

Office[6] declared "that they are not to be employed; nevertheless they can be tolerated by the Ordinary for a grave cause, provided scandal is absent."

b) Neither for validity nor of itself for liceity is it required that the witnesses designated have been warned beforehand or asked about the marriage to be contracted. Practically, however, they should be determined and asked before the marriage, because after the nuptials have been entered their names must be recorded by the pastor. The fact that the witnesses are forced does not impair validity.

c) It does not seem to be required that witnesses be formally assumed, in other words, that the contracting parties employ them as such, or at least contract conscious of their presence; rather it suffices that the witnesses can testify to the marriage contracted. For this opinion is favored both by the text of the law, which requires only that the marriage be contracted before witnesses, and by its end, which is that witnesses can testify to the contract of marriage. This end is indeed obtained even through witnesses who have not been formally employed. There is added the response of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide.[7]

II. The presence of those assisting must be simultaneous, physical, and moral. It is said:

1. Simultaneous. For it is required that all be able to testify to one and the same act of marrying. Moreover, that a presence of this kind is required is sufficiently signified by the words: "Before the pastor... and at least two witnesses."
2. Physical or bodily. For it is established that the marriage must be contracted "before the pastor and at least two witnesses." But physical presence is not constituted by communication set up by means of telephone or telescope.
3. Moral, or such that at least from the circumstances they perceive that marriage is being contracted between these persons. This can be done even if someone lacks hearing or sight, but not if he is deprived of both sight and hearing.

[1] Parts of an apostolic vicariate and apostolic prefecture, if a particular rector has been assigned to them, are called quasi-parishes (canon 216, § 3). But the erection of a quasi-parish is made by decree of the Ordinary, in which the limits of the territory are clearly described; and once it has been constituted, the rights and obligations of the quasi-pastor immediately arise.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 1, 1908, ad X.

[3] Cf. Pontifical Commission, July 14, 1922, V, ad 1-3 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 527).

[4] Cf. Pontifical Commission, July 14, 1922, V, ad 4 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 527).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, July 25, 1920.

[6] August 19, 1891.

[7] July 2, 1827, ad II (Collectanea, n. 794).

§ II. Fuller Exposition

We shall present the fuller exposition by speaking first of the requisites for a pastor or local Ordinary to assist validly at marriage, then of the requisites for them to assist licitly, and finally of the delegation of another priest to assist.

POINT I.

[1] Cf. encyclical Casti connubii (A.A.S. 1930, p. 554); cf. our little work On the Form of the Promise and Celebration of Matrimony, 5th ed.

Point I. On the Requisites for a Pastor or Local Ordinary to Assist Validly at Marriage

735 In order that a pastor or local Ordinary assist validly at marriage, it is required: 1° that they have obtained canonical possession of the benefice or have entered the office; 2° that they not be excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended from office by sentence, or declared such; 3° that they assist within the boundaries of their territory, in which nevertheless they validly take part in the marriages both of subjects and of non-subjects; 4° that, constrained neither by force nor by grave fear, they request and receive the consent of the contracting parties (canon 1095, § 1). It is said:

I. That they have obtained canonical possession of the benefice or have entered the office. Now:

1. Residential Bishops take canonical possession of the diocese as soon as, in the diocese itself, either personally or through a procurator, they have shown the apostolic letters to the Chapter of the cathedral church, in the presence of the secretary of the Chapter or the Chancellor of the Curia, who will record the matter in the acts (canon 334, § 3).
2. With regard to pastors, canon 1444, § 1 is to be attended to: "Induction into possession of a benefice is to be made according to the manner prescribed by particular law, or received by legitimate custom, unless for a just cause the Ordinary has expressly dispensed in writing from that manner or rite; in which case this dispensation takes the place of possession taken."

Note. Possession of a benefice can also be taken through a procurator having a special mandate (canon 1445).

3. One who does not have a benefice but only an office, as a Vicar General, enters his office by the very fact that he begins to exercise it.

II. That they not be excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended from office by sentence, or declared such. Therefore it does not suffice that someone has incurred one of the enumerated penalties, but it is required that either he has been condemned to it by a judge, or that he has been declared to have incurred it. With regard to suspension, note that the faculty is removed only by suspension from office, not by another suspension. Yet a suspension laid down generally also includes suspension from office, unless something else is established (canon 2278, § 2).

III. That they assist within the boundaries of their territory, in which nevertheless they validly take part in the marriages both of subjects and of non-subjects. Therefore the competence of the pastor and Ordinary, as regards valid assistance, is so annexed to territory that within the boundaries of their territory they validly take part in the marriage of all, even of non-subjects; outside those boundaries, in the marriage of no one, not even of subjects. Besides, observe:

1. The local Ordinary and pastor validly assist in houses and churches, even exempt ones, of religious which are situated in their territory, because the aforesaid houses and churches are exempt only by reason of persons.[1] For licit assistance the permission of the regular Prelate is required.
2. Pastors who have territory common with another pastor or with other pastors validly assist at the marriage of all within the territory which is common to them with others.[2]
3. Those who, in territory assigned to other pastors, have some persons or families, or persons of a determined rite, or a group of persons, for example soldiers, subject to themselves, can take part in the marriages of subjects throughout the whole alien territory, but not in the marriages of others;[3] indeed they seem able to assist everywhere at the marriage of subjects. Whether other pastors also can do this within their territory is to be gathered from the statutes of the Holy See.

4. Chaplains or rectors of pious places of any kind exempt from parochial care, provided that full parochial power has been committed to them, are counted as pastors, but only for the persons entrusted to them and in the place over which they preside.[4] Whether the said faculty belongs to the rector exclusively or cumulatively with the pastor is to be deduced from the prescription of authority (cf. canon 464, § 2).

IV. That, constrained neither by force nor by grave fear, they request and receive the consent of the contracting parties; concerning which note:

1. Grave fear is understood as fear of grave harm, and one inflicted from without, that is, by a free cause. It does not matter whether it is inflicted by the parties themselves or by another. But there seems to be required fear inflicted for extorting assistance; yet it does not seem to matter whether it is inflicted justly or unjustly, because the law does not distinguish between just and unjust fear. Except, however, fear justly inflicted which is within the sphere or line of the law itself, and which is ordered to protecting the law itself. Hence assistance given is valid, whether because the Bishop compels an unwilling pastor by penalties to due assistance, or because those about to marry threaten that they will denounce to the Ordinary a pastor who unjustly denies assistance. For it cannot be admitted that fear of this kind is comprehended by the law according to the mind of the legislator.
2. That they request the consent of the contracting parties. Therefore it does not suffice that those about to marry emit matrimonial consent before the minister, but it is required that he previously and formally have requested the consent. Yet for validity it does not matter whether he does this personally or through an interpreter, by words or by writing, by nod or by another sign. Moreover, with regard to marriages here and now illicit, observe that the request for consent of itself does not involve an invitation to enter marriage, but a mere investigation whether those about to marry wish to contract marriage, so that only material cooperation is furnished.
3. And receive the consent of the contracting parties. This happens by the very fact that those about to marry, after the request has been made, emit consent, with the minister knowing that it is being emitted.

If marriage is celebrated by proxy, the pastor should request and receive consent from the proxy.

POINT II.

[1] Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, March 12, 1910, ad VIII.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 1, 1908, ad VIII.

[3] Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 1, 1908, ad IX.

[4] Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 1, 1908, ad X.

Point II. On the Requisites for a Pastor or Local Ordinary to Assist Licitly at Marriage

736 In order that a pastor or local Ordinary assist licitly, it is required: 1° that the free status of the contracting parties be established, and indeed according to the norm of law; 2° that there be established the domicile or quasi-domicile, or monthly residence, or, if it is a question of a vagrant, the actual residence of either contracting party in the place of marriage.

If neither party has in the place of marriage, but each or either party about to contract has elsewhere, a domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly residence, the permission of the pastor or Ordinary of the domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly residence is needed. If neither has elsewhere a domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly residence, no one's permission is required; and this holds even if each or either has actual residence elsewhere.

In any case it is to be held as the rule that marriage be celebrated before the pastor of the bride, unless a just cause excuses; but the marriages of Catholics of mixed rite, unless something else has been provided by particular law, are to be celebrated in the rite of the man and before his pastor.

Finally, a pastor who assists at marriage without the permission required by law does not make the stole fees his own, and he is to remit them to the proper pastor of the contracting parties (canon 1097). It is said:

I. In order that a pastor or local Ordinary assist licitly, it is required: 1° that the free status of the contracting parties be established, and indeed according to the norm of law; concerning these things compare what was said in n. 682; it is required 2° that there be established the domicile or quasi-domicile, or monthly residence, or, if it is a question of a vagrant, the actual residence of either contracting party in the place of marriage. It is said:

1. Domicile or quasi-domicile. The notion, division, acquisition, and loss both of domicile and of quasi-domicile have been set forth in vol. I, n. 123. It is helpful here to add the following:

a) Someone can have two, indeed several, proper domiciles, namely by living equally in different places with the intention of acting thus perpetually. But whether someone lives equally in several places or not is to be judged more from the manner in which he has established himself here or there than from equality of time during which he stays in different parishes. It is certain that mathematically equal residence is not required.

b) Someone can have a proper domicile and a proper quasi-domicile, for example if, for a cause requiring at least six months, he goes elsewhere with the intention, once the business is finished, of returning to the place of perpetual habitation.

c) Someone can more probably have two proper quasi-domiciles; for example if a person goes to Rome in order to pursue studies there for four years, and meanwhile betakes himself to another place with the intention of remaining there for seven months and then returning to Rome. In the case he has a quasi-domicile in that other place, as is clear; likewise he retains the quasi-domicile at Rome, because it is not lost except by departure from the place with the intention of not returning.

d) A wife and a minor who has passed infancy can have legal domicile in one place and proper quasi-domicile in another.

e) A wife after the death of her husband and a minor who has become of age retain: the former, the domicile of the husband; the latter, the domicile of the one to whom he was subject. They retain, I say, that domicile, formerly legal, as voluntary, as long as they preserve the intention of remaining there.

2. Monthly residence; concerning which note:

a) The fact of monthly residence is required, but also suffices. The intention of extending residence through a month neither suffices nor is required; only the fact, and in no way the mind, is attended to, as is deduced both from the character of this legislation and from the words employed. Nor is habitation required, but residence suffices, whether in the manner of an inhabitant or in the manner of a guest, worker, etc. Besides this, residence must be taken according to common estimation. Now: 1° one who inhabits some place, for example in the paternal home, according to common estimation resides there, even if daily, either by day or by night, he spends time elsewhere, as if by day or by night he works in the factory of another municipality; 2° one who inhabits nowhere, but is accustomed to spend the day in one place and the night elsewhere, is rather said to reside where he is accustomed to spend the night. Finally, it is all the same whether someone resides in a place as a Catholic or as a non-Catholic.[1]

b) The time of monthly residence is to be computed thus. Since a starting term is assigned, a month is taken as it is in the calendar, for example from February 1 up to February 28 or 29. And because the starting term does not coincide, or at least is not judged by law to coincide, with the beginning of the day, the first day is not computed, and the time is ended when the last day of the same number has been completed, for example from March 25 up to April 25 completed. But if the month lacks a day of the same number, the time is ended when the last day of the month has been completed, for example from January 30 up to February 28 or 29 completed (canon 34, § 3, 1°, 3°, 4°).

c) Residence must be continuous, at least morally. Now absence of one or another day and night does not seem to stand in the way of continuity. And this holds rather probably even if someone has gone away with the intention of not returning; for intention, as was said above, seems in no way to have to be attended to. Besides this, if absence of one or another day does not stand in the way of continuation, neither must it be compensated by other days added.

d) Finally, it is clear that residence must be continued up to the contracting of marriage. Otherwise there is not monthly residence, but there was monthly residence.

3. Actual residence. By this is understood, as is clear from canon 1097, § 1, 3°, residence for a time of some moment, so that someone can be said to have somewhere a seat of residence. Now residence of this kind by either of the contracting parties suffices if it is a question of a vagrant, that is, of one who nowhere has domicile or quasi-domicile. But if it is a question of a vagrant, it suffices whether both parties or only one party is vagrant. Note, however, that in this case there is required for assisting the permission of the Bishop or his delegate, of which canon 1032 speaks (n. 695).

4. The place of marriage with respect to the pastor is the parish committed to him; with respect to the Bishop, Vicar, and Prefect Apostolic, it is both any parish of the diocese, or respectively quasi-parish of the vicariate or prefecture, and the diocese, vicariate, or prefecture as such.

II. If neither party has in the place of marriage, but each or either party about to contract has elsewhere, a domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly residence, the permission of the pastor or Ordinary of the domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly residence is needed. If neither has elsewhere a domicile or quasi-domicile or monthly residence, no one's permission is required, and this holds even if each or either has actual residence elsewhere. I said:

1. No one's permission is required; except, however, that permission of which canon 1032 speaks (n. 695).

2. And this holds even if each or either has actual residence elsewhere. For in the case there is not required the permission of the pastor or Ordinary of domicile, quasi-domicile, or monthly residence, because these are not had; nor the permission of the pastor or Ordinary of actual residence, because it is prescribed nowhere. Therefore the pastor of the place in which the vagrant is licitly assists, always with due regard for the permission of which canon 1032 speaks (n. 695). Moreover note:

a) The required permission can be granted as much orally as in writing, as much expressly as tacitly. Permission reasonably presumed also suffices, if it cannot conveniently be sought; in which case, however, it is fitting after the fact to warn the proper pastor. Finally, in a case of grave necessity no permission is required, for example if without grave inconvenience permission cannot be obtained in time. The reason is that the permission of which we speak is not delegation, which is necessary for validity.

b) Nothing prevents pastors of some city from conferring on one another, for the sake of convenience, a general permission of assisting.

III. In any case it is to be held as the rule that marriage be celebrated before the pastor of the bride, unless a just cause excuses; but the marriages of Catholics of mixed rite, unless something else has been provided by particular law, are to be celebrated in the rite of the man and before his pastor. Now the law of celebrating marriage before the pastor of the bride does not oblige under grave sin; indeed there are those who, unless particular law presses the matter more urgently, recognize no obligation strictly so called. But any just cause excuses; and if it is present, there is no obligation of seeking permission from the pastor of the bride, although it is fitting to warn him.

IV. Finally, a pastor who assists at marriage without the permission required by law does not make the stole fees his own, and he is to remit them to the proper pastor of the contracting parties.

Stole fees are understood as those things which are owed to the pastor as such from the celebration of marriage in that parish; to these do not belong the Mass stipend, gifts given by the contracting parties from friendship, etc.

This penalty of latae sententiae, which is incurred even before a declaratory sentence, regards only pastors, not delegated priests; nor is this penalty incurred by a pastor who took part in the marriage of vagrants without recourse to the Bishop; nor by a pastor who took part in marriage while the pastor of the bride was passed over without just cause.

If several proper pastors are had, the pastor of the bride seems to be preferred to the pastor of the bridegroom. If the bride has several pastors, the stole rights are to be divided among the different pastors (cf. canon 1236, § 2).

Finally, one who without just cause remitted the stole fees in part or whole is not bound to restitution. He is not bound by force of ecclesiastical law, which is not understood of fruits not received. Nor is he bound by force of natural law, since he did not impede another either from a good to which he already had a right, or by an unjust means from a good to which he did not yet have a right. Yet he must restore who "has defrauded to such a point that the stole fees which would be given by the contracting parties he has arranged to be presented to himself under another title, for example, of a Mass stipend, because thus he is deservedly judged virtually to have received the stole fees; and therefore he is bound to remit them to the proper pastor of the contracting parties."[2]

POINT III.

[1] Cf. response of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, January 28, 1906, by which assistance given by a certain pastor is declared illicit, not because one party before conversion had resided in his parish, but because the residence was interrupted.

[2] Van de Burct-Schaepman, n. 241.

Point III. On the Delegation of Another Priest to Assist at Marriage

737 I. Notion of delegation. Delegation, or the granting of permission validly to assist at marriage, is the act by which an authorizable witness of marriage, that is, a witness who can furnish legal authority to the act at which he is present, substitutes another for himself. But just as assistance furnished by the substituting person himself is not truly an act of jurisdiction, so also the granting of permission to assist does not involve the communication or delegation of true jurisdiction. Yet it is commonly called delegation, because it is done according to the norm of delegation, and almost the same principles as those of true delegation are applied to it.

II. Who can delegate? The pastor and the local Ordinary who can themselves validly assist at marriage are able to delegate (canon 1095, § 2). It is said:

1. The pastor and the local Ordinary; who come under the name of pastor and local Ordinary, see n. 734. All those assigned there can delegate another.[1]
2. Who can themselves validly assist at marriage. Hence they cannot delegate another before they have obtained canonical possession of the benefice or have entered the office; nor can they do this if by sentence they have been excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended from office, or declared such. Besides, the pastor and local Ordinary are able only to grant to another the faculty to assist within the boundaries of their territory, since outside the aforesaid boundaries they themselves do not validly assist.

III. To what extent can a delegate subdelegate? It is doubtful whether the rules of delegation assigned in canon 199 can be applied here, because the cited canon treats of delegation of jurisdiction properly so called, whereas here the discussion is about a bare ministry. But these things are certain:

1. A vicar cooperator who has been delegated generally by the pastor or local Ordinary to assist at marriages can subdelegate another determined priest to assist at a determined marriage.[2]
2. A priest delegated to assist at a determined marriage can receive from the pastor or local Ordinary delegating him permission to subdelegate another determined priest to assist at the same marriage.[3]

IV. The person to be delegated or subdelegated. Delegation or subdelegation must be made to a determined priest for a determined marriage. A vicar cooperator, however, can be delegated generally for the parish to which he is attached (canon 1096, § 1). It is said:

1. To a priest, whether he is approved or is not approved for the care of souls, for preaching, or for hearing confessions.
2. Determined. Hence permission granted to an entirely indeterminate priest would be invalid, for example if the pastor were to establish: "I make the faculty of assisting at marriage to one of my vicars," with no vicar determined individually. Nor would permission given to the spouses of choosing whichever priest they prefer be valid. Likewise a pastor would act invalidly who delegated, for example, one of the members of a community to be designated by the Superior,[4] or made the faculty for the spouses to contract before Peter and Paul, according as they would choose one or the other. Designation can be made either by designation of office, for example: "I make the faculty of assisting at this or that marriage to the Rector of the succursal church in N."; or by designation of name. Moreover:

a) It is not required that the one to be delegated be known to the delegating person, provided he is determined in himself.

b) Nothing prevents several priests from being designated; the legislator only intends to exclude delegation of an indeterminate person. Thus a pastor can delegate, for example, all his vicars or even all priests now having care in the deanery. Yet it is difficult to determine how far these can be extended; therefore one must beware lest the marriage be exposed to danger of nullity.

3. For a determined marriage. Hence permission given, for example, to assist at all marriages or at a certain category of marriages, or at those which perhaps will be contracted in this or that month, would be invalid. But delegation made for several determined marriages would be valid.

4. A vicar cooperator, however, can be delegated generally for the parish to which he is attached, for example to assist at all marriages or at a certain category of marriages. Note, however, that he is not delegated by common law itself.[5]

V. Things to be observed in delegation or subdelegation. 1. In order that delegation or subdelegation be valid, there is required an act truly placed, free, expressed, and known and accepted by the one to be delegated or subdelegated, as we shall explain. It is said:

a) Truly placed. Therefore a presumed or interpretative granting does not suffice, nor mere tolerance, since tolerance as such does not involve an act of granting.

b) Free, that is, deliberately placed. Note, however, that fear does not stand in the way of freedom, nor under the new law is delegation extorted by grave fear invalid. It is indeed true that assistance furnished by a pastor or delegate from grave fear is deprived of value; but from that it does not follow that delegation made from grave fear is invalid. Error then only impairs the value of delegation when it is substantial, that is, when it concerns the person to be delegated or the persons about to marry; and even then it does not impede validity if the delegating person has the will of granting the permission in some way. Moreover, error is not substantial if it regards only the name and not the person himself. Besides, it is commonly noted that error concerning the quality of the person to be delegated or of one about to marry, likewise concerning the cause of the granting, stands in the way of validity in the case in which the quality or cause was intended as a condition without which there would be no delegation; but in that hypothesis it is rather the defect of the condition than error which impairs validity.

c) Expressed (canon 1096, § 1), whether orally or in writing or by other equivalent positive signs. Therefore tacitly given permission no longer suffices.

d) Known and accepted by the one to be delegated, as follows: knowledge and acceptance are not required if delegation or subdelegation is granted by statute or law; nor, more probably, if the delegate or subdelegate is subject to the delegating or subdelegating person. Otherwise the matter is more doubtful. Some deny that knowledge and acceptance are required, because, with canon 37 considered, a rescript is valid before its acceptance, unless something else is established; but a grant made by one who is not the Ordinary is not a rescript. Others affirm it, because delegation is like a donation, which must be accepted.

2. In order that delegation or subdelegation be licit, the pastor or local Ordinary should not grant permission unless all things which the law establishes for proving freedom of status have been fulfilled (canon 1096, § 2). Yet do not apply this to the general delegation which is made to a vicar cooperator.[6]

VI. Things to be observed by the delegate and subdelegate. 1. In order that the delegate or subdelegate validly take part in the nuptials, he should proceed in the same manner as the pastor. Therefore he must not be excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended from office by sentence, or declared such; he must assist at the marriage within the boundaries of the territory of the delegating person; and constrained neither by force nor by grave fear he must request and receive the consent of the contracting parties. It is sufficiently clear that these things must be observed, although the law does not expressly apply them to the delegate.

2. In order that he assist licitly, let him observe the things which the pastor or local Ordinary is bound to observe, insofar as they are committed to him.

Corollary. Although the faculty of assisting is not jurisdiction properly so called, nevertheless it is so akin to it that it is admitted in law that the things which have been said about supplied jurisdiction (vol. I, n. 103) are also to be applied to the aforesaid faculty.

[1] Pontifical Commission, May 20, 1923, ad V (A.A.S. 1924, p. 114).

[2] Pontifical Commission, December 28, 1927, ad IV (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

[3] Pontifical Commission, December 28, 1927, ad IV (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

[4] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, March 12, 1910, ad VI, b.

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, March 12, 1910, ad VI, b and c.

[6] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, March 12, 1910, ad VI, c.

Article II. On the Extraordinary Juridic Form

With canon 1098 considered, marriage can be contracted before witnesses alone in a twofold case, namely: 1° if danger of death is present and a competent priest cannot be had or approached without grave inconvenience; 2° if a competent priest cannot be had or approached without grave inconvenience, and it is prudently foreseen that this condition of affairs will last for a month.

738 I. The former case is had if danger of death is present and a competent priest cannot be had or approached without grave inconvenience. Therefore there is required:

1. That danger of death be present. Grave danger suffices, or such danger as suffices for Viaticum to be administered. It is all the same whether the danger arises from illness or threatens from another cause, for example from shipwreck or from a dangerous operation to be undergone. Finally, it suffices that the danger threatens either party.

2. That a competent priest cannot be had or approached without grave inconvenience. It is said:

a) A competent priest, that is, the Ordinary or pastor of that territory, or a priest delegated by either of them.

b) Cannot be had or approached, that is, so that the competent priest can neither come nor be approached, or even if he comes or is approached, nevertheless cannot assist at the marriage without grave inconvenience.[1]

c) Without grave inconvenience, that is, it is required that the things said under b) be physically or morally impossible. Now:

alpha) Impossibility can arise from lack of a priest, from their scarcity, from distance, from persecution, from a law which threatens punishment to the assisting minister, from an epidemic, from negligence of the minister who refuses to make the customary visitations, or even refuses to come or to assist, from the reputation of a penitent to be preserved.[2] beta) Personal impossibility suffices and is required. It suffices, so that common or local impossibility is not required; it is required, so that common or local impossibility does not suffice if personal impossibility is excluded.[3] gamma) Besides this, the case would be present if, with the Ordinary, pastor, and delegated priest lacking, another priest could obtain the faculty of assisting only by a less customary means; and to means of this kind belong telegraph, telephone, and automobile. I said concerning the faculty of assisting to be obtained: for if a priest furnished with the faculty in such a place can easily be summoned,[4] this must be done, even if, for example, he could be summoned in time only by telephone.

delta) Finally note that the case has place even if the opportunity of having a competent priest has been culpably neglected, provided that here and now the opportunity has ceased.

Corollary. The case is present if danger of death is present and the competent priest, by assisting at the nuptials, would expose himself to punishment with civil law considered.

[1] Pontifical Commission, July 25, 1931 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 388); by this declaration the question is settled which, with the declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, January 31, 1916, and of the Pontifical Commission, March 10, 1928, considered, had not yet been decided.

[2] For example, a confessor in the confession of a penitent discovers that he is fostering perverse relations with a person from whom he cannot or does not wish to be separated, so that it is expedient for them to be joined in marriage. In the case the penitent is not bound to grant, nor is the confessor bound to seek from the penitent, permission for obtaining delegation, if the condition of the penitent is unknown and from the delegation obtained suspicion against the penitent could fall on the delegating person.

[3] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, July 21, 1908, ad V; Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, March 13, 1910, ad I and II.

[4] Sacred Congregation of the Council, July 27, 1908, ad V.

739 II. The latter case is had if a competent priest cannot be had or approached without grave inconvenience, and it is prudently foreseen that this condition of affairs will last for a month. It is said:

1. That a competent minister cannot be had or approached without grave inconvenience; these things have been set forth under I, 2.
2. That it is prudently foreseen, etc.; that is, moral certainty, at least broad, is had about the continuance of the same condition of affairs. The fact of the minister's absence does not suffice.[1]

3. That this condition of affairs will last for a month. Now, since in this case a starting term is assigned, a month is taken as it is in the calendar. And because the starting term does not coincide, or at least is not judged by law to coincide, with the beginning of the day, the first day is not computed, and the time is ended when the last day of the same number has been completed. But if the month lacks a day of the same number, the time is ended when the last day of the month has been completed. Hence if, for example, those about to marry began from March 25 to be in the required circumstances and foresaw that a missionary would arrive on April 25, they could not validly contract before witnesses alone (canon 34, § 3, 1°, 3°, 4°).

Corollary I. The case is again present if the competent minister, by assisting at the nuptials, would expose himself to punishment with civil law considered.

Corollary II. Even one who in fraud of the law betakes himself to a region where he cannot have or approach a competent minister can contract marriage before witnesses alone, provided that this condition of affairs is prudently foreseen to last for a month. Indeed, of itself he does not even seem to act illicitly, because it is permitted to place the cause by which one is exempted from the law.

[1] Pontifical Commission, November 10, 1925 (A.A.S. 1925, p. 582).

740 III. Things to be observed in each case. 1. For validity it is required that the presence of the witnesses be simultaneous, physical, and moral (n. 734).

2. In each case, if another priest is at hand who can be present, he must be called and assist at the marriage together with the witnesses, with due regard for the validity of the marriage before witnesses alone (canon 1098, 2°).

3. The spouses should emit matrimonial consent; but it is not necessary that the witnesses or priest request the consent.[1]

What if on the one hand necessity is urgent, but on the other hand not even the extraordinary form can be used?

Response 1. If danger of death is present, dispensation can be made in the form, as will be explained later.

Response 2. Outside danger of death, and also in danger of death if one who can dispense in the form is lacking, the circumstances can be such that marriage, by epikeia, can be celebrated even without witnesses; for example, if otherwise someone would have to abstain from entering marriage always or for a very long time, or would be exposed to danger of grave infamy, or, as many wish, would be in most grave danger of eternal damnation (St. Alphonsus VI, 613).

[1] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, June 23, 1830 (Collectanea, n. 816).

Article III. On Those who Are Subject to the Juridic Forms

741 I. Subjects of the juridic forms. The following are subject to the juridic forms:

1. Those baptized in the Catholic Church, even if afterwards they have defected from her (canon 1099, § 1, 1°). Except those baptized in the Catholic Church but born of non-Catholics, who from infancy[1] grew up in heresy or schism or infidelity or without any religion (canon 1099, § 2). It is said:

a) Baptized in the Catholic Church. Now those are judged such who were baptized with the intention that they be ascribed to the Catholic Church. This is done if they are baptized in order to the Catholic Church, whether 1° from their own intention, or 2° from the intention, even merely interpretative, of both parents or of either parent or of another to whom the infant to be baptized is subject, even if perhaps the intention of the one baptizing is different; as if the infant of Catholic parents in a case of necessity were baptized by a heretical midwife. The same 3° seems to have to be said if the infant is baptized in order to the Catholic Church from the intention alone of one baptizing legitimately or licitly, even if those who have charge of the infant dissent; as if a Catholic maidservant baptized an infant of infidels placed in danger of death.

b) Born of non-Catholics. Now:

alpha) Under the name of non-Catholics here also come apostates.[2] beta) It suffices that either parent be non-Catholic; and this holds even if the cautions according to the norm of canons 1061 and 1071 have been furnished. So from the declaration of the Pontifical Commission; and the same Pontifical Commission responded that this declaration is declarative, not extensive.[3]

2. Those baptized in a heretical or schismatic sect, but converted to the Catholic Church, even if afterwards they have defected from her (canon 1099, § 1, 1°). Those who were baptized in a heretical or schismatic sect but were educated in the Catholic faith from infancy by parents meanwhile converted, are bound by the law as soon as, having obtained the use of reason, they showed themselves Catholics. According to others, they are converted to the Catholic Church together with the parents.

Corollary. Those who are subject to the juridic forms are bound by them whether they contract with one another or contract with someone who of himself is immune from the aforesaid form. And this holds even if they enter nuptials with a non-Catholic after obtaining a dispensation from the impediment of mixed religion or disparity of cult (canon 1099).[4] Therefore the principle which commonly obtained before the Pian law no longer holds: the immune party communicates his immunity to the other party. But this principle holds: the bound party communicates his bond to the other party.

[1] That is, already before the completion of the seventh year (canon 88, § 3).

[2] Pontifical Commission, February 17, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 195).

[3] July 20, 1929 (A.A.S. 1929, p. 513); July 25, 1931 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 388).

[4] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, March 28, 1908, ad I.

742 II. Those immune from the juridic forms. Immune from the juridic forms of themselves are:

1. Non-baptized persons.
2. Those baptized in a heretical or schismatic sect, even of Oriental rite, and not converted to the Catholic Church.
3. Those baptized in the Catholic Church, but born of non-Catholics, and from infancy educated in heresy or schism or infidelity or without any religion.
4. Catholics of Oriental rite.[1]

Corollary. Those who are immune from the juridic forms are not bound to the same forms only when they contract with someone who is likewise immune;[2] otherwise, if they contract with a person who is bound to the juridic forms, they are bound (canon 1099).

Here some ask whether a marriage is valid which, after a dispensation in disparity of cult has been obtained, is contracted with the form of civil law neglected, that law by that very fact invalidating a marriage entered without the form.

Most deny it, because the non-baptized party, as being subject to civil law, cannot contract validly without the form having been used. But in order that marriage be valid, it is required that each party be able validly to enter it. Yet the contrary opinion, although in no way certain, is not without probability. For since the marriage of a faithful person is entirely subject to the Church and can be fully governed by her, it is not improbably said that the impediment of civil law, insofar as it regards a marriage to be contracted by an infidel with a faithful person, does not have force, or at least can be removed by the Church. In a word: the power of the Church over the faithful person redounds to the infidel, insofar as the latter is about to contract with the faithful person.[3]

Note. The exemption from the law formerly in force for Germany and Hungary by force of the constitution Provida was abrogated from May 19, 1918, as a particular law contrary to canon 1099. So, with canon 6 considered.[4] There are added the responses of the President of the Pontifical Commission[5] and a similar one of the Pontifical Commission itself.[6]

[1] Canon 1; Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 1, 1908, ad I. The Ruthenians are excepted who belong to the dioceses of the Galician province, namely Lviv, Przemysl, and Stanislaviv; to them the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide extended the decree Ne temere on May 5, 1911. Likewise, by decree of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, August 18, 1913, Canadian Ruthenians are excepted, namely from the indicated day for ten years. Besides this, note that not all Catholics who live in the East are Catholics of Oriental rite.

[2] If, however, they contract with a person of this kind, they are always immune from the juridic forms. The law indeed declares that the following are not bound to the form of marriage: 1° non-Catholics, if they contract with one another; 2° those born of non-Catholics, even if baptized in the Catholic Church, who from infancy grew up in heresy or schism or infidelity or without any religion, whenever they contract with a non-Catholic party. But these things are not to be taken so literally that a marriage entered by the aforesaid, for example with a Catholic of Oriental rite, without the Catholic form, would be held invalid.

[3] This opinion is defended by Resemans, De competentia civili in vinculo coniugali infidelium, p. 2; Gasparri, n. 306.

[4] March 30, 1918.

[5] In Vlaming, op. cit., n. 226, note.

[6] The source gives only the abbreviated reference here.

Chapter II. On the Liturgical Form

The liturgical form is constituted both by the rite of celebration and by the rite of blessing, or the solemn blessing of nuptials, as it is called. Hence:

Article I. On the Rite of Celebration

743 Outside a case of necessity, in the celebration of marriage the rites prescribed in the ritual books approved by the Church, or received by laudable customs, are to be observed (canon 1100).[1] It is said:

I. Are to be observed; by these words a true obligation is understood, in conformity with the Council of Trent.[2] Moreover, the obligation is grave from its kind; concerning which St. Alphonsus notes that the omission of the words "I join you," etc., is rather probably light (VI, 899, 1094).

II. Rites... received. Now the rite from the Roman Ritual[3] to be observed here is this:

The pastor, vested in surplice and white stole,[4] should ask the man and woman about consent, each one individually in this way, in the vernacular speech: "N., do you wish to take N. here present as your lawful wife, according to the rite of Holy Mother Church?"[5] Let the bridegroom respond: "I do." Then let the priest ask the bride: "N., do you wish to take N. here present as your lawful husband, according to the rite of Holy Mother Church?" Let the bride respond: "I do."

Once the mutual consent has been understood, let the priest bid them join right hands with one another, saying: "I join you in matrimony. In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen."[6] Afterwards let him sprinkle them with holy water.

Then let him bless the ring.[7] Next let the priest sprinkle the ring with holy water in the form of a cross; and the bridegroom, having received the ring from the hand of the priest, places it on the ring finger of the bride's left hand, with the priest saying: "In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen." Then let him add the versicles and the prayer Respice.

When these things have been completed, if the nuptials are to be blessed, the pastor should celebrate the Mass for the Bridegroom and Bride, as in the Roman Missal, with all things prescribed there being observed.[8] The rite of the said blessing must now be discussed.

[1] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 2, n. 6.

[2] Session 7, canon 13, on the Sacraments in general.

[3] Title VII, chapter 2, nn. 1-3.

[4] If Mass immediately follows after the rite of celebration has been completed, the priest should put on the chasuble in addition to the alb and stole (Sacred Congregation of Rites, August 31, 1867, ad III, n. 3158).

[5] "Or he may use other words according to the received rite of each place" (Roman Ritual, loc. cit., n. 2). "When several are joined at the same time, after first receiving the consent of each and duly celebrating each Marriage, and after the pastor has said for each, 'I join you in matrimony,' etc., the blessings are made once in the plural number" (Roman Ritual, loc. cit., n. 5).

[6] See note 5.

[7] The blessing of the ring is not to be omitted in second nuptials (cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, August 27, 1836, ad II, n. 2743), even if the same ring had already been used and blessed in order to another marriage. "When several are joined at the same time... nothing prevents the blessings of the rings and the remaining blessings from being made in common by general words" (Holy Office, September 1, 1841, 7, Collectanea, n. 938). If the nuptial ring is lost or broken, a new one can be blessed with the same form of the Roman Ritual. In not a few other dioceses, for example in Germany and in the East, a ring is blessed for each spouse.

[8] Roman Ritual, loc. cit., n. 4.

Article II. On the Rite of Blessing, or on the Solemn Blessing of Nuptials

744 I. Notion of the solemn blessing. The solemn blessing of nuptials, which is found in the Mass inscribed "Mass for Bridegroom and Bride," consists of three prayers, namely Propitiare, Deus qui potestate, and Deus Abraham. The first two are said immediately after the Pater noster, the third before the prayer Placeat tibi, Sancta Trinitas.

II. Nuptials which can be blessed. All nuptials can be blessed, except: 1° marriages between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party (canon 1102, § 2); 2° if it is a question of a woman to whom the solemn blessing has once been given (canon 1143); 3° if there is question of a man who has once received the solemn blessing, unless a contrary custom is in force, for this must be observed;[2] 4° if it is a question of marriage with one notoriously excommunicated.[3]

III. Obligation of the solemn blessing. For the faithful there seems to be an obligation of requesting the solemn blessing on the occasion of marriage or afterwards. But the obligation lies upon the pastor of taking care that the faithful receive it at the time of the nuptials or shortly after. Yet the obligation of each is only light; indeed, if the spouses have already lived for a long time in marriage, a true obligation seems to be absent.

1. The obligation of the faithful seems to be deduced from the response of the Holy Office which speaks of "the precept of the Church."[4]
2. The obligation of the pastor follows from canon 1101, § 1, from the Roman Ritual,[5] from several responses of the Sacred Congregations,[6] and from the obligation of the faithful.
3. That the obligation is only light is admitted rather commonly (St. Alphonsus VI, 984, 988). That the obligation is absent if the spouses have already lived for a long time in marriage seems to have to be deduced from these words of canon 1101, § 1: "which can be given to them even after they have lived for a long time in marriage." If, however, it is requested, the pastor is bound to grant it.[7]

IV. At what time can the solemn blessing be imparted? 1. The solemn blessing cannot be given except within Mass (canon 1101, § 1).[8]

2. It can be imparted on all days, except:

a) During the closed time (canon 1101, § 1), that is, from the first Sunday of Advent up to and including the day of the Nativity of the Lord, and from Ash Wednesday up to and including Easter Sunday (canon 1108, § 2). Yet local Ordinaries can, with due regard for liturgical laws, permit it even in the aforesaid times for a just cause, with the spouses warned that they abstain from excessive pomp (canon 1108, § 3).[9] If the nuptials are celebrated during the closed time, with the nuptial blessing not granted by the Ordinary, the Mass with its proper blessing is deferred to the day on which, outside the closed time, the Mass for Bridegroom and Bride or its commemoration is permitted.[10]

b) On the day of the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed.[11]

c) If only one Mass is celebrated on a day on which a funeral Mass must be said which cannot be deferred.

d) During a general local interdict (canon 2271, 2°); likewise in a parish church, during a particular local interdict laid upon that church (canon 2272, § 3, 2°).[12]

V. Who can impart the solemn blessing? Only that priest, either himself or through another, can give the solemn blessing who can validly and licitly assist at the marriage (canon 1101, § 2). Moreover, it is not prohibited that one person take part in the marriage, and another celebrate the Mass and also impart the solemn blessing - not another, for example a deacon.

VI. Things to be noted. 1. On days on which the Mass "for Bridegroom and Bride" is permitted, this Mass must be said,[13] and it is illicit to add the nuptial blessing to the Mass of the office of the day; but when the said Mass is prohibited, the nuptial blessing is added to the Mass of the office of the day.

2. Within the same Mass several persons can receive the nuptial blessing, with the formulas of the blessing changed and pronounced only once.[14]

3. Although there is no obligation of communicating within the nuptial Mass, nevertheless the spouses are to be exhorted to communicate in the said Mass, or at least on that day.[15]

[1] We follow our little work On the Form of the Promise and Celebration of Matrimony.

[2] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 18. The Holy See, however, sometimes permits that special prayers be recited over a widow already blessed; see the formula in the Roman Ritual, Appendix on Matrimony II.

[3] Roman Ritual, loc. cit.; rescript of Pius VI to Cardinal de Franckenberg, July 13, 1782; Sacred Penitentiary, December 10, 1860.

[4] July 6, 1817 (Collectanea, n. 725).

[5] Roman Ritual, loc. cit., n. 16.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, September 21, 1843, ad II (Collectanea, n. 971); Holy Office, August 31, 1881 (Collectanea, n. 1457).

[7] Holy Office, August 31, 1881 (Collectanea, n. 1457).

[8] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 16; Sacred Congregation of Rites, June 23, 1853 (n. 1557); August 14, 1858 (n. 3079); Holy Office, August 31, 1881. The Holy See sometimes permits that, when Mass is not said, the nuptial blessing be granted outside Mass, according to the formula of the Roman Ritual, On Matrimony I.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Rites, September 25, 1875, ad I (n. 3380).

[10] Roman Missal, Additions and Variations II, n. 2.

[11] Roman Missal, Rubrics in the votive Mass for Bridegroom and Bride.

[12] Holy Office, September 3, 1817 (Collectanea, n. 726).

[13] Holy Office, September 1, 1841, 5° (Collectanea, n. 938).

[14] Sacred Congregation of Rites, June 23, 1853, ad I (n. 3016); June 30, 1896, ad VI (n. 3922).

[15] Sacred Congregation of Rites, March 21, 1874 (n. 3329); June 30, 1896, ad VI (n. 3922).

Scholion. On the Form to Be Observed in Marriage Between a Catholic Party and a Non-Catholic Party

745 I. Juridic form. Marriages between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party are subject to the same juridic form as marriages between Catholics, not excluding the interrogation concerning consent (n. 735).

The disposition introduced by the Decree issued by the Holy Office on January 21, 1912, approved by Pius X on June 23, 1912, and promulgated in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis on July 1 of the same year - that disposition, I say, by force of which the request and reception of consent could sometimes be omitted by the assisting minister in some places - has been removed; and indeed by canon 1102 compared with canon 1095, § 1. So also a private response of the Holy Office[1] and the Pontifical Commission.[2]

[1] November 26, 1919 (in Linzer Quartalschrift, p. 249).

[2] March 10, 1928 (A.A.S. 1928, p. 120).

746 II. Liturgical form, or sacred rites, must be entirely omitted. Yet the Ordinary can, for forestalling graver evils, permit some one of the customary ecclesiastical ceremonies, always excluding the celebration of Mass (canon 1102, § 2). Therefore:

1. Among other things there are prohibited: 1° the use of sacred vesture, for example, surplice and stole, but not the cassock, silk cincture, and vestments customary for prelates; 2° a sermon, but not certain hortatory words in the manner of a mere address; 3° the blessing of the ring; 4° the blessing of the nuptials.

2. The Ordinary can permit some ceremony for avoiding graver evils, for example if otherwise it were to be feared that the spouses would go to a heretical minister, neglect the cautions, or that the Catholic party would pass over to a heretical sect.[1] But the celebration of Mass must always be excluded. Under the name of celebration of Mass comes not only the Mass "for Bridegroom and Bride" with its prayers and blessings, but also a private Mass which, after the marriage, is so celebrated before the spouses and their companions, even if no distinct seat is given to the spouses, that it must be held as a complement of the marriage ceremony.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, December 4, 1862.

[2] Holy Office, January 17, 1872 (Collectanea, n. 1379); Pontifical Commission, November 10, 1925, ad VIII (A.A.S. 1925, p. 583).

Chapter III. On the Time and Place of the Celebration of Marriage

747 I. Time. Marriage can be contracted at any time of the year (canon 1108, § 1). But when the solemn blessing of nuptials is forbidden, see n. 744.

748 II. Place. 1. Marriage between Catholics should be celebrated in the parish church; but in another church or oratory, whether public or semi-public, it can be celebrated only with the permission of the local Ordinary or the pastor (canon 1109, § 1).

2. Local Ordinaries can permit marriage to be celebrated in private homes only in some extraordinary case and with a just and reasonable cause always present; but in churches or oratories either of a Seminary or of religious women, Ordinaries should not permit this unless necessity is urgent and suitable precautions have been employed (canon 1109, § 2).

3. But marriages between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party are to be celebrated outside the church; but if the Ordinary prudently judges that this cannot be observed without graver evils arising, it is committed to his prudent judgment to dispense in this matter, with the prescription of canon 1102, § 2 nevertheless remaining firm[1] (canon 1109, § 3).

[1] The cited canon excludes the celebration of Mass.

Chapter IV. On the Things to Be Observed After the Celebration of Marriage, or on the Registration of a Celebrated Marriage

Registration must be made in both the book of marriages and the book of the baptized.

749 I. Registration in the book of marriages (canon 1103, § 1). The cited canon indicates who must register, when, and what must be registered.

1. The pastor or the one holding his place must register, and indeed the pastor of the place or parish in which the marriage was contracted. Therefore the obligation does not lie upon the Ordinary who assisted at the marriage, nor upon the proper pastor who took part in the nuptials of his subject in another's parish, nor upon another who was delegated to assist. But from the fact that the words "with his own hand"[1] are no longer found in the law, it seems to have to be deduced that these are to be held as a directive rather than a preceptive rule. Nevertheless, the rule is most strongly commended.[2]

2. Registration must be made as soon as possible,[3] that is, as that expression is usually understood, at least within three days. Yet it is preferable that it be made on the same day, indeed immediately after the celebration of marriage or the Mass which followed.

3. There must be registered the names and surnames of the spouses and witnesses, the place, parish, year, month, and day of the marriage, the name of the pastor or other one who assisted, and other things according to the formula assigned by the Roman Ritual[4] or by the proper Ordinary. It is also useful afterwards to note the convalidation or dissolution of the marriage, if perhaps they have had place. Finally, it is expedient to write the year and day not by arithmetical signs, but in complete words, as several civil codes establish. The registration must be made in the book of marriages, not on entirely separate sheets.

4. Finally, as regards the gravity of the obligation, the obligation of registering marriages, and indeed in the book, is grave, so that only physical or moral impossibility excuses from it; as if the pastor in a particular case cannot know the true name of the married person.[5] Hence a pastor also would sin gravely who exposed himself to grave danger of omitting the registration. The obligation of completing it as soon as possible is of itself light, so that, with the danger of omitting it excluded, even a longer delay would not seem to involve grave fault.

[1] Title VII, chapter 2, n. 7 has these words: "When the marriage has been celebrated, the pastor or the one who holds his place should record in the book of marriages the names of the spouses and of the witnesses, and other things according to the prescribed formula; and this even if another priest, delegated either by himself or by the Ordinary, celebrated the Marriage."

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, March 12, 1910, ad IX, responded to the Bishop of Mangalore, who was asking the faculty of permitting a marriage to be recorded by the delegate: "For the favor, to the prudence and conscience of the Bishop"; these words certainly signify the importance of the directive rule.

[3] This word was substituted for the word statim, which occurred in the decree Ne temere.

[4] Title XII, chapter 4.

[5] Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments to the Bishop of Roseau, March 12, 1910, ad 9.

750 II. Registration in the book of the baptized (canon 1103, § 2). The end of this law is that marriages perhaps previously contracted by those about to marry, and the impediment of bond and affinity following from them, may more easily be detected. For with marriages noted in the books of the baptized, a person formerly married will not be able to bring a testimony of Baptism without at the same time bringing a testimony of his marriage formerly contracted, at least if an extract from the book of the baptized is brought which is of recent date (n. 682). But the registration in the book of the baptized is to be made thus:

1. If each or either spouse was baptized in the same parish in which the nuptials are entered, in the margin of the place where Baptism is noted let it be inserted that he or she contracted marriage in this parish in such year, month, and day, with the names, surnames, and age of the other party with whom he or she entered the nuptials added - as others add - and likewise the names and surnames both of the parents of the other party and of the witnesses of the marriage. It would also suffice to add in the margin of the place where Baptism is noted: "He entered nuptials with N. N. Cf. the book of marriages." Those who judge that all the aforesaid things are to be added rely on the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments of March 6, 1911,[1] which imposes on the pastor of the marriage the obligation of reporting all these things to the pastor of Baptism, for the purpose indeed that "the marriage be entered in the book of the baptized"; from this they deduce that all the things are to be inserted in the book of the baptized. Others think that all the enumerated things must be reported to the pastor of Baptism for the purpose that the marriage can be duly assigned in the book of the baptized; but that it be duly assigned does not require that all things reported be added.

2. If each or either spouse was baptized elsewhere:[2]

a) The pastor of the marriage, either personally or through the episcopal curia, his own or that of the pastor who baptized, will report the contracted marriage to the pastor or pastors both of the Baptism of the bridegroom and of the Baptism of the bride. But that report "should bring with it the written names and surnames of the spouses and of their parents, the age of the contracting parties, the place and day of the nuptials, the names and surnames of the witnesses who were present, and should have the subscribed name of the pastor with the parish seal added."[3] Besides this, the reporting pastor will laudably ask that he be made certain that the report was received. Finally, the report is to be transmitted through the chancery of the local Ordinary.[4]

b) The pastor of Baptism to whom the report has been transmitted should insert all things accurately in the book of the baptized, or at least duly note the marriage; and "if it should perhaps happen that... the pastor of Baptism, on receiving the report of the marriage, discovers that either contracting party is already bound by other nuptials, he will signify the matter as quickly as possible to the pastor of the attempted marriage."[5]

"Observe, if the marriage was mixed, that care must be taken only concerning the Catholic party that the marriage be registered in the book of the baptized.

"If the place of Baptism is unknown, let at least the diocese in which Baptism was conferred be investigated, whether it is learned or reasonably presumed from the birth or other circumstances. The Ordinary of that diocese, once made certain of the marriage, will then be able to complete the inquiry and to take care that the marriage be entered in the baptismal registers."

Moreover, the registration of marriages in the book of the baptized, likewise the law of taking care that the registration can be made by the pastor of Baptism, is not merely of counsel, but of precept and of grave precept, as is gathered both from the grave end of the law and from the cited Instruction.[6]

[1] March 6, 1911 (A.A.S. 1911, p. 102). That Instruction, which was issued "so that the things prescribed in n. IX, § 2 of the mentioned Decree (Ne temere) may be duly observed," is probably to be held as determinative of an existing law rather than as a new law. Hence we judge that it persists, with canons 6, 4° and 23 considered.

[2] "Or if the book of the baptized is kept by another pastor, for example by the pastor of the mother church on account of the dismemberment of the parish" (Van de Burct-Schaepmann, 237).

[3] Cited Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments.

[4] Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, July 27, 1921 (A.A.S. 1921, p. 348).

[5] Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, March 6, 1911.

[6] Vermeersch, op. cit., n. 8; the Instruction has these words: "Ordinaries should diligently watch that these prescriptions are religiously observed, and if they find any transgressors, they should take care to recall them to duty, canonical penalties also being employed where there is need."

751 III. Registration of marriage contracted in extraordinary form (canon 1103, § 3). Marriages contracted according to the norm of canon 1098 (n. 738 sq.) must likewise be noted in both the book of marriages and the book of the baptized. Now:

1. The priest, if he assisted at the marriage, is bound in solidum with the contracting parties to take care that the due registrations be made. In the same way the witnesses are bound with the contracting parties, if witnesses alone took part in the marriage.
2. In order that the obligation be satisfied, the marriage must be reported in the manner set forth above: 1° to the pastor of the place in which the marriage was contracted; according to others, to the pastor who regularly ought to have assisted in the ordinary case, that is, to the pastor of the domicile of each spouse or of the domicile of the bride;[1] 2° to the pastor of the Baptism of the spouses.

If the marriage is contracted in a place where there is no parish or quasi-parish, the report is to be made to the local Ordinary.[2]

Note. If the law of the sacramental seal prohibits the marriage from being noted in the public books of marriages and of the baptized, and the good of the legitimated offspring requires that the marriage be able to be proved in the external forum, with the consent of those whose interest it is, let it be registered as marriages of conscience, about which one must now speak.

[1] Choupin, n. 73, note 2.

[2] Vermeersch, n. 83.

Scholion. On Marriage of Conscience

752 Canons 1104-1107 pertain here, which present the law constituted in the Constitution of Benedict XIV Satis vobis,[1] and therefore are to be interpreted according to the norm of this Constitution. But since the matter concerns liceity, the conditions reported in the said Constitution are left rather as directive norms for the prudence of Ordinaries.

I. Notion. A marriage of conscience is one which is contracted with the announcements omitted and secretly (canon 1104). But it is contracted according to the ordinary or extraordinary juridic form, as the circumstances bear.

II. Liceity. A marriage of conscience cannot be permitted except by license of the local Ordinary and only from a most grave and most urgent cause. The Vicar General cannot give this license unless he has a special mandate (canon 1104). The reason is that from nuptials of this kind very grave inconveniences can follow, such as danger of polygamy or adultery, danger of scandal from public cohabitation, danger that the offspring may be held and treated as illegitimate.

A most grave and most urgent cause will be present if a man and woman living in concubinage are reputed true spouses; if a nobleman wishes to contract with a woman of non-noble condition, and from a known marriage very grave inconveniences are imminent; if a man and woman cannot contract civilly and, if marriage is passed over, they are in grave danger of salvation, etc. If there is danger in delay, for instance if the case concerns a hidden concubinary who is dying, one can proceed without the license of the Ordinary.

III. Things to be observed. 1. The pastor of either contracting party ought to assist at the marriage; or, if for a grave cause another priest is to be deputed in his place, let one be chosen by the Bishop who is commended by probity, doctrine, and skill in fulfilling the office. Besides this, two or three faithful witnesses are to be chosen, lest any knowledge or rumor of the celebration arise.

2. The pastor or deputed priest, before he takes part in the marriage, is bound to admonish those about to marry concerning their obligations toward the offspring to be begotten, both as regards Baptism and the reporting of it, and as regards religious education and the enjoyment of temporal goods.

3. Once the marriage has been celebrated, he must without delay exhibit to the Bishop a written document of the marriage celebrated before himself, with the names of the contracting parties, the witnesses, the place, and the time.[2]

4. Permission for the celebration of a marriage of conscience carries with it the promise and grave obligation of keeping secrecy on the part of the assisting priest, the witnesses, the Ordinary and his successors, and also of one spouse if the other does not consent to disclosure (canon 1105). The obligation of this promise on the part of the Ordinary does not extend to the case in which either some scandal or grave injury against the sanctity of marriage is imminent from the observance of secrecy, or the parents do not take care that the children received from such a marriage be baptized, or take care that they be baptized with false names expressed, while meanwhile they do not furnish the Ordinary within thirty days with notice of the offspring received and baptized, with a sincere indication of the parents, or neglect the Christian education of the children (canon 1106).

5. The spouses are bound within thirty days from the birth, either personally or through another, for example through the pastor, to make the Ordinary certain concerning the offspring born and baptized. But the Ordinary must take care that in a secret book, distinct from the book of marriages, it be noted that such offspring, baptized on such a day and in such a place, is legitimate (Benedict XIV, Satis vobis; cited canon).

IV. Registration. A marriage of conscience is not to be noted in the customary book of marriages and of the baptized, but in a special book to be kept in the secret archive of the Curia (canon 1107).

[1] November 17, 1741.

[2] Constitution of Benedict XIV Satis vobis, November 17, 1741.

Section III. On the Reception of the Sacrament of Marriage

753 In order that the sacrament of marriage be validly and licitly received, besides the use of reason and sufficient knowledge of the matrimonial contract (p. 531 sq.), it is required that the one receiving it be in the state of grace and immune from impediments. Therefore "the pastor should not omit prudently to instruct the people concerning the sacrament of marriage and its impediments" (canon 1018).

I. State of grace. 1. That the state of grace is required is clear from the fact that marriage is a sacrament of the living, or is ordered to increasing grace, and therefore supposes grace (n. 43).[1]

2. The state of grace perhaps lost can be recovered either through confession or through an act of contrition (n. 43).

II. Immunity from impediments. Therefore it is useful first to note these things beforehand:

1. The validity of marriages is to be judged according to the law in force at the time when they were contracted.

2. Marriages invalid because of an impediment in force before the Code and abrogated by the Code were not convalidated by the promulgation of the Code itself, but according to the circumstances must be convalidated either by simple convalidation or by sanation in the root,[2] which will be explained later. Nevertheless, as is drawn from the nature of the matter, dispensation is not required if the question concerns an abrogated impediment.[3]

With these things noted, we shall speak first of impediments in general, then of impedient impediments in particular, then of diriment impediments in particular, and finally of the dispensation of impediments.

[1] In a proxy or interpreter the state of grace is not required, as is clear, because they do not receive the sacrament.

[2] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 346).

[3] Thus the response of the President of the Pontifical Commission (cf. Periodica IX, p. 154).

Chapter I. On Impediments in General

754 I. Notion. An impediment, taken in the broader sense, is a circumstance which prevents marriage from being able to be contracted licitly or even validly. In the strict sense, it is a circumstance which prevents this by law, not by mere precept. A particular precept or prohibition can indeed render someone's marriage illicit, but it is not called an impediment in Canon Law (cf. canon 1039, § 1 and 2).

755 II. Division. Impediments are divided:

1. By reason of cause, into impediments of divine law and of human law, and of the latter either ecclesiastical or civil.

2. By reason of extent, into absolute and relative, according as they prevent marriage with any person whatever or only with certain persons. Of the former kind are, for example, bond, age, etc.; of the latter kind are, for example, consanguinity, affinity, etc.

3. By reason of effect, into impedient and diriment. An impedient impediment contains a grave prohibition of contracting marriage; nevertheless the marriage is not rendered invalid if, notwithstanding the impediment, it is contracted (canon 1036, § 1). A diriment impediment both gravely prohibits a marriage to be contracted and prevents it from being contracted validly (canon 1036, § 2). Although the impediment is present only on one side, nevertheless it renders the marriage either illicit or invalid (canon 1036, § 3).

4. By reason of duration, into temporary and perpetual. The former are those which cease by the passage of time, such as age; or at least can cease without dispensation, such as mixed religion. The latter are those which either cannot cease at all or cannot cease without dispensation, such as consanguinity.

5. By reason of demonstrability, into public and occult. An impediment is judged public if it can be proved in the external forum;[1] otherwise it is occult (canon 1037).

An impediment is called public by its nature insofar as it rests upon a fact which is public of itself; of this kind are, for example, the impediment of age, of legitimate consanguinity, etc. It is called public by fact insofar as the fact from which the impediment arises can be legitimately proved, or by prescription of law does not need proof. The word "fact" is used; but to the fact, if the discussion concerns a delict carrying an impediment with it, culpability also pertains; however, it is not required that it be known that an impediment arises from some fact.[2]

An impediment occult by its nature is an impediment which rests upon a fact occult of itself, of which kind are, for example, impotence, illegitimate consanguinity, etc. An impediment of this sort ought to be held as truly occult only when the fact cannot be legitimately proved.

6. By reason of the degree of knowledge, into certain and doubtful, according as prudent doubt is excluded or not excluded. A doubt can be a doubt of law only, or a doubt of fact only, or a doubt of law and fact. Besides this, a doubt of law can turn upon divine law, or human law, whether ecclesiastical or civil.

7. By reason of gravity, into impediments of the lesser degree and of the greater degree (canon 1042); of these we shall speak in their own place.

8. By reason of dispensation, into dispensable and indispensable, according as they are often or at least sometimes removed by the Church, or cannot be removed by her, or at least are scarcely ever taken away.

9. By reason of the forum in which dispensation is granted, at least of itself, into impediments of the external forum and of the internal forum. I said at least of itself, because in some circumstances impediments which pertain to the external forum can also be taken away in the internal forum, as will be explained in its own place.

[1] As regards proof, canon 1791 should be attended to: the deposition of one witness does not make full proof, unless he is a qualified witness who deposes concerning matters done by reason of office. If under the faith of an oath two or three persons, above every exception, firmly agreeing with one another, testify in court concerning some matter or fact from their own knowledge, sufficient proof is had; unless in some cause the judge, because of the very great gravity of the matter or because of indications which introduce some doubt concerning the truth of the matter asserted, judges fuller proof necessary (canon 1791).

[2] Pontifical Commission, June 25, 1932 (A.A.S. 1932, p. 284).

756 III. The subject to whom power concerning impediments belongs. 1. It belongs to the supreme ecclesiastical authority alone to declare authentically when divine law impedes or dirimently invalidates marriage (canon 1038, § 1).

2. The same supreme authority exclusively has the right to establish other impediments, impedient or diriment, for the baptized, by way of law, whether universal or particular (canon 1038, § 2).

Note. Local Ordinaries can forbid marriages in a particular case to all actually staying in their territory and to their subjects even outside the boundaries of their territory, but only for a time, from a just cause, and while that cause endures. Only the Apostolic See can add an invalidating clause to a prohibition (canon 1039). It says "from a just cause"; but just causes are: a founded suspicion of a diriment or impedient impediment; a founded fear that the marriage will give occasion to enmities, scandal, or other inconveniences, etc. (St. Alphonsus VI, 982). A pastor cannot forbid a marriage even in a particular case; but if the marriage is illicit, he can and must abstain from assistance and meanwhile refer the matter to the Ordinary.

3. Except the Roman Pontiff, no one can abrogate impediments of ecclesiastical law, whether impedient or diriment, or derogate from them; likewise no one can dispense in them unless this power has been granted by common law or by a special indult from the Apostolic See (canon 1040).[1] To what extent the power of dispensing has been granted to Ordinaries and priests by common law will be stated later (cf. canons 15, 1313, 1043-1045, 81).

Note. A custom introducing a new impediment or contrary to existing impediments is reprobated (canon 1041). Therefore: 1° if at present a custom contrary to existing impediments is in force, it is to be corrected as a corruption of law, and must not be permitted to revive in the future (canon 5); 2° if in the future a custom arises introducing a new impediment or contrary to existing impediments, it is not reasonable (canon 27, § 2), and therefore cannot obtain the force of law or abrogate impediments or derogate from them.

[1] Constitution of Pius VI Auctorem fidei, August 28, 1794 (props. 59, 60); Pius IX, Syllabus of Errors (prop. 58).

757 IV. The passive subject of impediments. 1. All human beings are bound by impediments of divine law, whether natural or positive.

2. As regards impediments of ecclesiastical law, these things hold:

a) In general, all baptized persons are bound by impediments of ecclesiastical law, even non-Catholics, as is clear from the Constitution of Benedict XIV Matrimonia and Singulari nobis; likewise from the practice of the Church in revalidating marriages entered by heretics in heresy with an impediment; finally from the fact that exemption is clear from no source, nor is it suggested by the Code of Canon Law; and this presses all the more because the Code expressly exempts non-Catholics from the form of marriage.

b) Infidels after Baptism are bound not only by impediments whose cause was placed after Baptism, which is clear, but also by those impediments whose cause was placed before Baptism, if the foundation of the impediment is a natural bond, such as consanguinity. Otherwise one must speak if the foundation is to be placed in the mind of the Church, as in the impediment of spiritual relationship. If the foundation of the impediment is a certain civil bond, as in legal relationship, the matter seems doubtful.

c) Those certainly but doubtfully validly baptized seem to be held by ecclesiastical impediments; this is deduced from the argument proposed in vol. I, n. 130. There is added a response of the Holy Office[1] which in its obvious sense favors this opinion, although others understand it of the presumption by which a baptism doubtfully valid is presumed to have been conferred duly.[2] If the fact of Baptism is doubtful, the question is solved with more difficulty (vol. I, n. 130).

Corollary I. A marriage between a faithful person bound by an ecclesiastical impediment and an infidel is illicit or invalid according as the impediment is impedient or diriment, because it is sufficient for the effect of the impediment that it be present on one side only (canon 1036, § 3).

Corollary II. A marriage between an infidel bound by a civil diriment impediment and a faithful person, according to several authors, is invalid even after dispensation in disparity of cult; for since one party is incapable, the reason given above holds. Nevertheless, the contrary opinion is not without foundation, according to what was said in n. 742.

[1] February 4, 1891 (Collectanea, n. 1746).

[2] Cf. Holy Office, July 14, 1880 (Collectanea, n. 1536).

758 V. Causes excusing from a diriment impediment. 1. Ignorance, even invincible, does not exempt from a diriment impediment. For canon 16, § 1 declares: "No ignorance of invalidating or incapacitating laws excuses from them, unless something else is expressly stated."[1] There had been dispute about an impediment of crime unknown to the person; but since nothing else is stated, every doubt has been removed.

2. Nor does grave inconvenience or necessity excuse from a diriment impediment. The reason is that the common good requires that invalidating laws retain their force, even if the invalidation is unknown or the act cannot be avoided without grave inconvenience (St. Alphonsus VI, 1079). Nevertheless, it is not clear that in an altogether extraordinary case there is no place for epikeia, for instance if, while the impediment of disparity of cult presses, the faithful in some region could not enter marriage.[2]

Question. To what extent is it licit to enter marriage with a doubtful diriment impediment?

Response 1. It is not licit if the matter concerns an impediment of divine law, whether natural or positive, whether the doubt is of law or of fact.[3] The reason is that the matrimonial contract, since it is a sacred contract and, if it is entered by the faithful, is a sacrament, cannot be exposed to danger of nullity (St. Alphonsus VI, 902, q. 3). Therefore, for example, an infidel brother and sister, although they are not held by the impediment of consanguinity insofar as it is ecclesiastical, cannot enter marriage, because there is a doubt of law concerning the natural impediment; likewise even infidels are not permitted to enter nuptials in a doubt of fact, for example whether the parties are consanguineous in some degree of the direct line or in the first degree of the collateral line. There is added, as regards the faithful, that the said marriages are certainly opposed by a diriment impediment to marriage, from which dispensation is never given (canon 1076, § 3).[4]

The case of doubtful impotence is excepted, however, whether by doubt of law or by doubt of fact (canon 1068, § 2): by doubt of law, for example where organs are lacking which probably are required for a valid marriage; by doubt of fact, namely if it is not known whether copula between such persons is possible or not. The reason for the exception is that the theoretically probable right of marrying prevails over the reverence owed of itself to the matrimonial contract, or because the inconvenience of not marrying is so great that, in order to avoid it, it is licit to neglect the reverence owed of itself to the said contract (St. Alphonsus VI, 1102).

Response 2. If the matter concerns an impediment of ecclesiastical law, a distinction must be made.

1° In a doubt of law it is licit to contract: for "laws, even invalidating and incapacitating laws, do not oblige in a doubt of law" (canon 15). This certainly holds if there is common or fairly common doubt concerning the existence of the impediment. Whether the rule holds, "Whenever non-existence is probable, the impediment does not oblige," even though many deny the probability - whether that rule holds, I say, can seem doubtful to someone. The reason for doubting is taken from the fact that a rule of this kind would give occasion to invalid marriages; for there is danger lest many regard as probable what is not truly probable, and thus, being disposed in mind, permit marriage to be contracted without dispensation.[5]

2° In a doubt of fact it is not licit to contract, but dispensation must be sought, at least for caution. Otherwise the marriage is exposed to danger of nullity. But the Church grants to Ordinaries the faculty of dispensing in doubts of this kind, if the matter concerns impediments in which the Roman Pontiff is accustomed to dispense (canon 15); these things also hold, as is clear, if the matter concerns convalidating a marriage already contracted. If, however, the doubt turns upon Baptism, what will be said concerning disparity of cult should be attended to.

[1] Holy Office, July 4, 1855 (Collectanea, n. 1114); December 9, 1874 (Collectanea, n. 1427); February 4, 1891 (Collectanea, n. 1746).

[2] Cf. Holy Office, June 4, 1851 (Collectanea, n. 1062).

[3] A doubt of law is one which regards the law itself of the impediment, for example whether this or that condition is required for inducing the impediment. A doubt of fact is one which regards the fact on which the rise of the impediment or its continuance depends.

[4] Cf. Holy Office, April 6, 1906. If infidels have entered such a marriage, the fact stands; nor after conversion can an obligation of separation of itself be imposed. The Holy See, however, can permit new nuptials, either, if only one has been converted, by declaring liberty from the prior bond in favor of the faith, or by dispensing for caution from the bond contracted in infidelity, provided the marriage has not been consummated after the Baptism of both.

[5] Thus, for example, some hold it as probable that the impediment of spiritual relationship between sponsor and baptized person does not arise from private Baptism. Thus many authors held as probable that the Constitution Provida persisted even after the Code of Canon Law; but it seems certain that marriages entered since the Code came into force according to the norm of the said Constitution are invalid.

Chapter II. On Impedient Impediments in Particular (canons 1058-1066)

Three impedient impediments are enumerated in Canon Law, namely simple vow, legal relationship, and mixed religion.

Article I. Simple Vow

759 A simple vow of virginity, of perfect chastity, of not marrying, of receiving sacred Orders, and of embracing the religious state impedes marriage. No simple vow invalidates marriage, unless invalidation has been established for some persons by a special prescription of the Apostolic See (canon 1058); as Gregory XIII[1] established, as regards contracting marriage, for simple vows emitted in the Society of Jesus. Therefore:

I. Five vows impede marriage, that is, render it gravely illicit, namely:

1. A vow of virginity strictly taken. One bound by a vow of this kind cannot enter marriage, because he exposes himself to the proximate danger of injuring the vow, indeed he renders its fulfillment practically impossible to himself.
2. A simple vow[2] of perfect chastity, whether emitted privately or in a Congregation or Order. This vow effects that every act, external as well as internal, contrary to chastity is opposed to religion. One who has emitted such a vow cannot contract nuptials, because equally with one bound by a vow of virginity he exposes himself to the proximate danger of violating the vow, indeed renders its execution impossible.

3. A vow of not marrying or of celibacy, as is clear.

4. A vow of receiving sacred Orders; because marriage renders the execution of such a vow impossible, for married persons are kept from sacred Orders (canon 987, 2°).

5. A vow of embracing the religious state, whether in an Order or in a Congregation; for nuptials render the execution of the vow impossible, because married persons are invalidly admitted to the novitiate (canon 542, 1°).

Note. Vows of not marrying, of virginity, and of chastity are often confused by those vowing; so much so that those who have emitted one of these vows have for the most part understood a vow of chastity. In doubt, the one vowing should be asked what he intended. If the doubt persists, inquiry into the motive which moved him to vow can shed light. One who was impelled by the will to decline the burdens of marriage is presumed to have vowed celibacy; one by the desire of obtaining the aureole of virgins, virginity; one by love of purity, chastity.

II. If someone has contracted marriage without dispensation from an impedient vow:

1. Practically, it is preferable to obtain dispensation as soon as possible.

2. Theoretically, these things hold:

a) One who has vowed virginity cannot ask for the debt as long as virginity has been preserved; nevertheless he is bound at once to render it to the other party legitimately asking. Once the debt has been rendered, he can also ask; similarly, after the marriage has been dissolved after virginity has been lost, he can contract new nuptials. For in each case virginity is lost and the vow collapses.

b) One who has vowed perfect chastity cannot ask for the debt unless the other party is in danger of incontinence. He is bound to render the debt as long as the other party retains an unimpeded right over the spouse and licitly asks; he cannot render it if the other party has lost the unimpeded right over the spouse, whether by voluntary cessation or by adultery. If the other party asks illicitly, because that party itself is bound by a vow of chastity, he can, but is not bound to, render the debt (St. Alphonsus VI, 944). After the marriage is dissolved, he cannot enter new nuptials if the vow was perpetual and has not been totally taken away by dispensation.

c) One who has emitted a vow of not marrying can ask and render the debt, because fulfillment of the vow has become impossible. After the marriage is dissolved, the vow seems to revive.

d) One who has vowed reception of sacred Orders or entrance into the religious state is bound to execute the vow if the other party consents, or has been deprived in perpetuity of the right of asking, and execution of the vow is morally possible. Otherwise he can ask and render the debt.

[1] Constitution Ascendente Domino, May 25, 1584.

[2] A solemn vow of chastity - likewise a simple vow of chastity emitted in the Society of Jesus - constitutes a diriment impediment of marriage.

Article II. Legal Relationship

760 I. Notion. Legal relationship is a relationship of persons which comes from legitimate adoption, that is, adoption made according to the norm of civil law.

II. Existence of the impediment. In those regions where by civil law legal relationship arising from adoption renders nuptials illicit, by canon law also the marriage is illicit (canon 1059). But to know whether and between whom this impediment exists, one must have recourse to the civil laws of the country and decide according to their norm.

Where civil law either does not admit adoption or states nothing about the impediment, there is no impediment.

Corollary. No impediment exists in Holland, Austria, Lusitania, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, England, and in general in its colonies (including the Canadian dominion, Australia, India, Transvaal, etc.), in the Republic of Ecuador, Argentina, Costa Rica, Chile (as it seems), Mexico, Nicaragua, San Salvador, and Uruguay. A merely impedient impediment is had in Germany, Hungary, Switzerland, Venezuela; likewise, at least practically, in France, Belgium, Luxembourg, and Romania; if the matter is doubtful, practically the impediment is absent.[1]

[1] Cf. Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis II, n. 703; De Smet, op. cit., n. 499; Wernz-Vidal, op. cit., n. 191; Gury-Ferreres, II, n. 1051.

Article III. Mixed Religion

761 I. Notion of the impediment. The impediment of mixed religion is understood as the impediment which exists between two baptized persons, of whom one is Catholic, while the other is enrolled in a heretical or schismatic sect (canon 1060). Marriages contracted between such persons are called mixed. It is said:

1. Between two baptized persons. If one was baptized in the Catholic Church and the other party is not baptized, there is the impediment of disparity of cult; if one party was baptized, but not in the Catholic Church, while the other is not baptized, no canonical impediment is had.
2. Of whom one party is Catholic, whether he or she was baptized in relation to the Catholic Church or was converted to it. Moreover, the person is still judged Catholic who has cast off the Catholic faith even externally, but has not been enrolled in a non-Catholic sect.
3. While the other is enrolled in a heretical or schismatic sect. It is not enough that the person be enrolled in a sect, for example, an atheistic one.

Corollary. One who has cast off the Catholic faith even externally, but has not been enrolled in a non-Catholic sect, is not held by the canonical impediment of mixed religion if he wishes to enter marriage with a Catholic; he is held by it if he wishes to contract with a party enrolled in a heretical or schismatic sect.[1]

[1] Ter Haar, op. cit., pp. 1-2.

762 II. Existence of the impediment. Mixed marriages are most severely prohibited by ecclesiastical law, and very often they are forbidden also by divine law itself (St. Alphonsus VI, 56, 1044; Homo Apostolicus, tract 14, n. 6).

1. They are most severely prohibited by ecclesiastical law; this is clear from innumerable ecclesiastical documents,[1] and is expressly declared by canon 1060.

2. Very often they are forbidden also by divine law itself, namely because: 1° they involve communion in sacred things with heretics; 2° everywhere they create danger to the religion of the Catholic party;[2] 3° everywhere they are an impediment to the good education of the children.[3] There is added that they favor indifferentism and obstruct the desired union of the spouses.[4]

[1] Cf. Apostolic Letter of Clement XIII, November 16, 1763 (Collectanea, n. 1421); Apostolic Letter of Pius VIII, March 25, 1830 (Collectanea, n. 1426); Apostolic Letter of Gregory XVI, April 30, 1841 (Collectanea, n. 1428); Constitution of Leo XIII Arcanum (§ 26), February 10, 1880; Encyclical of Pius XI Casti connubii, December 31, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 570), and others cited by Ter Haar, op. cit.

[2] Cited encyclical.

[3] Cited encyclical.

[4] Cited encyclical.

763 III. Cessation of the impediment. 1. The divine prohibition ceases when the proximate danger ceases which threatens, from the mixed marriage, the religion of the Catholic party and the education of the offspring, and when a cause occurs which renders honorable: 1° communion in sacred things with a heretic, which mixed marriage involves, insofar, namely, as both together confect and receive the sacrament;[1] 2° the petition of a sacrament from an unworthy person; and 3° the administration of it to an unworthy person.[2] The proximate danger of which we have spoken can be absent or can cease when, for example, the character of those about to marry is considered, or the particular circumstances which especially favor the religious condition of the Catholic party and the Catholic education of the offspring, or a cause for seeking such a marriage which effects that the danger is not approached rashly.

2. The ecclesiastical prohibition ceases through dispensation. But the power of dispensing of itself belongs to the Supreme Pontiff alone, not to Bishops, unless it has been specially granted to them (canon 1040).

[1] Many do not admit communion in sacred things. But Gregory XVI in his letter to the Bishops of Hungary, April 30, 1841, wrote: "It is sufficiently and more than sufficiently established what the Church has perpetually thought concerning marriages between Catholics and non-Catholics. Namely, she has always held nuptials of this kind to be entirely illicit and wholly pernicious, both on account of shameful communion in divine things, and..." etc. The reason is that the heretical party, even though he or she has furnished the cautions, is to be presumed to contract with an intention that is itself heretical.

[2] On the ministration of this sacrament to an unworthy person, see n. 769 sq.

764 IV. The requisites without which dispensation is not granted are set forth in canon 1061: the Church does not dispense from the impediment of mixed religion unless: 1° just and grave causes urge; 2° the non-Catholic spouse has furnished a caution concerning removing from the Catholic spouse the danger of perversion, and each spouse concerning all the offspring being baptized and educated only as Catholic; 3° moral certainty is had concerning the fulfillment of the cautions; 4° the cautions are regularly required in writing. Therefore three things are required absolutely, the fourth regularly. Therefore:

1. Just and grave causes must urge. Thus the cited canon and other ecclesiastical documents.[2] The reason is that, in order that the faithful be permitted to expose themselves to grave dangers of faith and morals, even under opportune cautions, some grave inconvenience otherwise not avoidable must be imminent.[3]

The cause must be proportioned to this very grave law, with attention also to the common good, which from an entered mixed marriage will easily suffer detriment from the fact that occasion is thus furnished for other mixed marriages. Indeed Benedict XIV teaches that dispensation is not to be granted except "some grave and usually public cause intervening";[4] though this, as regards a public cause, has nowadays been mitigated. Practically one can speak thus:

a) "Causes which regard private advantages more, for example mature age, narrowness of place, insufficiency of dowry, the good of peace, betrothals contracted in good faith on account of which it would be feared that the bride would remain unmarried and defamed - according to the mind of the Holy See, these do not easily suffice of themselves";[5] nor, one can add, does a great affection toward the other party, or a higher social condition to be obtained through mixed marriage. Nevertheless, "from our practice account is taken of those same causes, provided other circumstances of things concur, by which weight is added to them."[6]

b) Among sufficient causes these are usually numbered: 1° if a non-Catholic prince, with the cautions used, wishes to marry a Catholic woman, and great advantages for the Catholic religion would be hoped for from this; 2° if there is probable hope that some non-Catholic family, inclining to the true faith, may through the mixed marriage return to the Church; 3° if the mixed marriage is the only remedy so that children already begotten from another mixed marriage may be educated in the Catholic religion; 4° if great scandals arising from the defamation of a girl already made pregnant by a heretic or in some other way cannot be avoided except through a mixed marriage; 5° if in some region Catholics are few, and at the same time safe and free to profess the faith, while the heterodox are very many; 6° if the heretical party is prepared to promise in writing or before witnesses, with the promise confirmed by oath, that after the nuptials have been entered he or she will embrace the Catholic faith; likewise if the heretical party is already accustomed to go to a teacher, male or female, who teaches him or her the Catholic faith, and seems to do this with a sincere desire of knowing the truth; 7° if the mixed marriage will put an end to the base concubinage of those wishing to marry; 8° if through the mixed marriage it can be obtained that offspring, whether already born or to be born from the fornication of the parties, be baptized and educated as Catholic; 9° if there is a prudent fear that the Catholic party may go over to the heretics, or contract a merely civil marriage or a marriage before a non-Catholic minister.[7] Nevertheless, in the last case moral certainty concerning the fulfillment of the cautions will not easily be had.

c) That one of the cited causes is present does not prevent the Ordinary from being able, or even being bound, to deny the dispensation if, from its concession, the common good will suffer detriment.[8] Nevertheless, the practice of never dispensing, whatever cause may be present, seems to be opposed to the mind of the Church.

Corollary I. A dispensation given by an Ordinary without grave cause is invalid according to canon 84, § 1: "From an ecclesiastical law one is not to dispense without a just and reasonable cause, with consideration had of the gravity of the law from which dispensation is made; otherwise a dispensation given by an inferior is illicit and invalid."

Corollary II. One who without grave cause wishes to enter a mixed marriage, even though he says that he does not wish to contract otherwise than with dispensation, at least objectively sins gravely. For "the Church does not dispense from the impediment of mixed religion unless just and grave causes urge" (canon 1061, § 1, 1°). Hence the one of whom we speak wills a thing prohibited by the Church under grave obligation. There is added that in the case the grave danger which everywhere threatens the Catholic party and the offspring from a mixed marriage will scarcely cease, and therefore the divine prohibition also persists. The same must be said of one who wishes to enter a mixed marriage while the only grave cause on which the Church relies is the fear of a marriage being contracted without dispensation. The reason is that he illegitimately morally compels the Church to dispense in a matter so grave. Add that, especially in this hypothesis, proximate danger of spiritual harm both for the Catholic party and for the offspring will scarcely be lacking.

2. The prescribed cautions must be furnished. But the cautions to be furnished are: 1° that the non-Catholic party emit a promise of removing from the Catholic spouse the danger of perversion; 2° that each spouse promise that all the offspring will be baptized and educated only as Catholic. But the cautions are regularly to be required in writing. It is said:

a) The prescribed cautions must be furnished, and indeed in such a way that they are never omitted,[9] not even in the article of death (canon 1043).[10]

b) Each spouse must promise that all the offspring will be baptized and educated only as Catholic; this you should understand both of offspring to be born and of offspring previously born from these same persons. If the offspring already born was begotten either from a preceding marriage or from illegitimate intercourse with a third person, let action be taken according to the rescript of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide[11] to the Bishop of Haarlem: "Although care is to be taken according to one's powers that the children, if there are any born from a preceding marriage of the non-Catholic party, be instructed in the Catholic religion, nevertheless this is not to be absolutely required for granting the dispensation, unless the same children were born from another mixed marriage and the parent did not observe the prior conditions."

c) The cautions are regularly to be required in writing, as canon 1061, § 2 has it. Always "the presentation of the cautions should be notorious, or at least such that it can be notorious, in order to remove every scandal."[12]

The Holy Office,[13] to the question: "Whether the assertion of the Catholic party, given under oath, that the non-Catholic party had pledged faith to him or her concerning the conditions to be fulfilled, suffices" - responded: "Of itself and generally, in the negative, and according to the mind. The mind is: that if in some extraordinary case such circumstances concur that the Bishop can obtain moral certainty for himself both concerning the sincerity of cautions of this kind for the present and concerning their fulfillment for the future, and wholly special reasons are present which prevent the cautions from being furnished in the customary way, it is left to his conscience and prudence. Otherwise, notwithstanding the royal decree, the opportune cautions are to be furnished in writing, just as has been done up to now; nor is dispensation to be given unless the Bishop is morally certain that they will be fulfilled." Besides this, observe:

alpha) In those regions in which the cautions have force also in the civil forum, provided they are furnished in civil form, dispensation is not to be granted unless the cautions have been furnished in that form; otherwise a dispensation granted by those who dispense by indult is invalid.[14] beta) The cautions are to be required before dispensation is sought.

gamma) A dispensation granted by an Ordinary without cautions is invalid. For canon 1061 declares: "The Church does not dispense unless..." etc.; once this is posited, it cannot be admitted that she has granted to an inferior the faculty of dispensing without cautions. Then the Holy Office[15] declares invalid a dispensation in disparity of cult granted without cautions; this you will rightly apply to a dispensation in mixed religion, all the more because canon 1071, as regards the requisites for dispensation in disparity of cult, refers to canon 1061, which speaks of the requisites for dispensing in mixed religion. There is added the decree of the Holy Office[16] just cited.

3. Moral certainty must be had concerning the fulfillment of the cautions. Thus the cited canon and other ecclesiastical documents.[17] But the required moral certainty is understood as broad moral certainty, or the state of one opining, so that doubt strictly so called does not suffice. The Church requires the certainty set forth because she does not remove her prohibition unless she judges that the divine prohibition has ceased. But she cannot so judge unless she is morally certain concerning the fulfillment of the cautions. Besides this, note:

a) The required certainty is obtained by considering, along with the promise, either the special character of those promising, or the circumstances which favor the fulfillment of the cautions, or both. But since the question concerns both a promise which, as one regarding almost the whole of life, will be fulfilled with great difficulty, and since, as sad experience teaches, a very great part of those promising do not stand by their promises, the promise taken nakedly, that is, abstraction being made from the character of those about to marry and from the circumstances, whether of the persons in question or of places, etc., cannot found moral certainty.

b) It can be disputed whether a dispensation granted by an Ordinary who is not morally certain concerning the fulfillment of the cautions is valid. For on the one hand, it is admitted with difficulty that the validity of a dispensation depends upon the state of mind of the one dispensing. On the other hand, to the grant of the faculty of dispensing to Ordinaries is added the clause: "provided that first, regularly, according to the prescription of the Code of Canon Law, canon 1061, § 2, provision has been wholly made for the conditions required by the Church, and the Right Reverend Ordinary himself is morally certain that they will be fulfilled." But the word "provided that" denotes that validity is regarded. Moreover, the fact that the dispensation would be invalid would not prevent the marriage from being contracted validly.

c) A pastor who himself is not morally certain concerning the fulfillment of the cautions cannot simply recommend the dispensation; but if he proceeds further, he is bound to propose his doubt to the Ordinary.

[1] Ter Haar, De matrimoniis mixtis eorumque remediis.

[2] Pius VII in letters to the Archbishop of Mainz, October 8, 1803; Pius VIII in letters to the Bishops of Rhenania and Westphalia, March 25, 1830; Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, March 11, 1868 (Collectanea, n. 1324).

[3] Cf. Instruction of the Secretariat of State, March 27, 1830 (Collectanea, n. 811, note).

[4] De Synodo Dioecesana, book 9, chapter 3, n. 5.

[5] Bangen, Praelectiones iuris matrimonialis I, 217.

[6] Bangen, Praelectiones iuris matrimonialis I, loc. cit.

[7] Vlaming, Praelectiones iuris matrimonialis, I, n. 217.

[8] Cf. Instruction of the Secretariat of State, March 27, 1830 (Collectanea, n. 811, note).

[9] Secretariat of State, November 15, 1858 (Collectanea, n. 1169).

[10] Holy Office, March 18, 1891 (Collectanea, n. 1750; cf. June 21, 1912).

[11] March 20, 1899.

[12] Holy Office, July 29, 1880.

[13] December 10, 1902 (Collectanea, n. 2155).

[14] Holy Office, January 20, 1932 (A.A.S. 1932, p. 25). Regions of this kind are Bavaria and Hungary (Wernz-Vidal, op. cit., n. 170, note 33).

[15] June 21, 1912.

[16] January 20, 1932 (A.A.S. 1932, p. 25).

[17] Holy Office, February 17, 1875; June 6, 1879 (Collectanea, n. 1433); July 29, 1880; December 10, 1902.

765 V. Obligations of the parties. 1. The Catholic spouse is held by the obligation of prudently taking care of the conversion of the non-Catholic spouse (canon 1062), for instance by prayer and by the example of a truly religious life.

2. Even if dispensation has been obtained from the Church concerning the impediment of mixed religion, the spouses cannot, either before or after the marriage entered before the Church, also approach, whether personally or through a proxy, a non-Catholic minister as one assigned to sacred things, in order to give or renew matrimonial consent (canon 1063, § 1). Otherwise they commit not only the grave sin of sacrilege, namely on account of communion in sacred things with heretics, but the Catholic party also falls into excommunication reserved to the Ordinary.[1] Nevertheless, it is not disapproved that, when civil law commands it, the spouses present themselves also before a non-Catholic minister functioning only in the office of a civil official, and this only for completing the civil act, for the sake of civil effects (canon 1063, § 3).

Note. One who has been absolved in the internal forum from the excommunication of which we have spoken can use himself as such also in acts of the external forum; but unless the grant of absolution is proved, or at least legitimately presumed, in the external forum, the censure can be urged by the Superiors of the external forum, whom the guilty person must obey, until absolution has been had in the same forum (canon 2251). Therefore, if the delict has remained occult, absolution in the forum of conscience is certainly safe.

[1] It is not beside the point to add here the whole of canon 2319: "Catholics are subject to excommunication latae sententiae reserved to the Ordinary: 1° those who enter marriage before a non-Catholic minister against the prescription of canon 1063; 2° those who are united in marriage with an explicit or implicit pact that all or some offspring be educated outside the Catholic Church; 3° those who knowingly presume to offer their children to be baptized by non-Catholic ministers; 4° parents, or those holding the place of parents, who knowingly hand over their children to be educated or instructed in a non-Catholic religion. Those of whom § 1, nn. 2-4 speaks are besides suspected of heresy."

766 VI. Obligation of pastors of souls to forestall mixed marriages.

1. "Ordinaries and other pastors of souls should deter the faithful from mixed nuptials as much as they can" (canon 1064, 1°). But the means of deterring the faithful are:

a) Opportune instructions, both public and private: public, for example, instructions established on a determined Sunday or Sundays at each fixed Mass; admonitions added in the explanation of the Catechism, likewise in meetings of sodalities; sermons on mixed marriages in Missions and other spiritual exercises; private, for example, in the sacrament of Penance, in the visitation of the parish;

finally, if they know that someone is thinking of contracting nuptials of this kind, by warning him and diligently exhorting him not to carry it out.[1]

b) To turn Catholics away from too much familiarity with heretics; "otherwise it will more easily happen that heterodox friends, visiting Catholic friends at home, first touch even their sisters with some relationship, then pursue them with love, and finally desire to marry them. A similar thing must be said concerning heterodox female friends of daughters of families."[2]

c) The erection of purely Catholic social associations.

d) A series of instructions on the Catholic religion given to the non-Catholic bridegroom; this practice was begun in the United States of North America and is continued with great success.[3]

2. "If they are unable to prevent them," that is, mixed nuptials, "they should take care with every effort that they are not contracted against the laws of God and the Church" (canon 1064, 2°). Indeed, if the circumstances of the diocese or parish are such that, by denying dispensation or concurrence for obtaining it, mixed marriages can for the most part be prevented, this means also should be used, all the more because in such a case, with attention to the common good - which must be attended to, as natural law dictates - a sufficiently just and grave cause for dispensing is lacking.

Thus also Cardinals Gasparri and van Rossum;[3] namely, according to the aforesaid men, the sense of canon 1064, 2° is this: if pastors of souls are unable to prevent mixed nuptials either by particular means or by a severe practice, let them take care with every effort that they are not contracted against the laws of God and the Church. "At least it must be said," Ter Haar adds,[4] "that a stricter practice from epikeia and according to the mind of the legislator does not stand in the way of this canon. For the Church wills that superiors use the faculty of dispensing only prudently and for the common good."

[1] Provincial Council of Utrecht, p. 127.

[2] Vlaming, Praelectiones iuris matrimonialis I, 230.

[3] Cf. the booklet Efficax antidotum ad matrimonia mixta praecavenda, by M. V. Kelly and J. B. Geniesse; but especially Ter Haar, op. cit., nn. 91-117. The Vicar General of the Bishop of 's-Hertogenbosch asked His Eminence Cardinal van Rossum: "Whether the practice hitherto observed in our diocese should be abandoned, namely of never seeking dispensation in the impediment of mixed religion except in quite extraordinary cases?" To these things His Eminence responded: "That practice hitherto observed, by which mixed marriages are so strongly and with such happy success restrained, can also in the future be observed in Holland with a safe conscience. To abandon it would be the same as promoting those unhappy marriages. This is foreign to the sense of the said canon. In order to procure greater certainty for Your Reverence in this very grave point, I myself approached the President of the Commission appointed to interpret the Code, with whom I communicated your letter on this matter. His Eminence Cardinal Gasparri fully agreed with me, using this brief argument: Does that practice prevent mixed marriages? (I answered: Without doubt.) If it is so, the matter fits perfectly with the prescription of canon 1064, 2°: If they are unable to prevent them" (Ned. Kath. Stemmen, 1919, p. 13).

[4] Op. cit., n. 139.

767 VII. Obligation of the confessor. A confessor who knows that a penitent is seeking a mixed marriage should, everywhere and with every effort, dissuade that marriage. If the penitent refuses to comply with the counsel, one must proceed thus:

1. If some cause exists on the part of the penitent, and it is such as is acknowledged by the local Ordinary, the penitent, the things to be posited having been posited, is to be absolved and referred to the pastor. The same must be said if the confessor does not know whether the cause alleged by the penitent is acknowledged by the Ordinary or not.

2. If the cause which exists on the part of the penitent is not acknowledged by the local Ordinary, a distinction must be made:

a) If, once dispensation is denied, there is no fear of a civil marriage, the penitent is to be warned; and if he does not desist from the marriage, he is not to be absolved.

b) If, once dispensation is denied, there is fear of a civil marriage, one must speak thus:

alpha) If that cause is acknowledged by the Ordinary, the penitent is indeed of himself to be warned concerning the grave sin which he is about to commit (p. 605); but if no hope of fruit is hoped for, he should be left in good faith, the things to be posited having been posited, absolved, and referred to the pastor.

beta) If that cause is not acknowledged by the Ordinary, on account of the common good, the penitent is to be warned; and if he is willing to renounce the mixed marriage, the things to be posited having been posited, he is to be absolved. If he refuses, absolution cannot be granted.

We have repeatedly spoken of a cause acknowledged by the local Ordinary; for it belongs to him to judge what norm of acting, as regards causes, should seem to be followed in his diocese.

We have likewise repeatedly said that the penitent, the things to be posited having been posited, is of itself to be absolved and referred to the pastor. By these words we intend that absolution is not to be denied; for we freely admit that often absolution is better deferred until the penitent has arranged the matter with the pastor.

VIII. Assistance to be given at a mixed marriage. 1. If the pastor knows certainly that the parties have already contracted before a heretical minister as such, or as one assigned to sacred things, or that they are about to contract in that way, he should not assist at their marriage except for most grave causes, scandal having been removed, and the Ordinary having first been consulted (canon 1063, § 2). But if those about to marry neither manifest a depraved intention, nor are otherwise certainly foreseen to be about to contract before a heretical minister as such, nor question the pastor, he, if there is no hope of fruit, can be silent.[1]

2. Announcements must be omitted unless the local Ordinary, in his prudence and with scandal removed, has judged it opportune to permit them, provided Apostolic dispensation has preceded and mention of the religion of the non-Catholic party is omitted (canon 1026; p. 605).

[1] Instruction of the Holy Office, February 17, 1864 (Collectanea, n. 1247); December 12, 1888 (Collectanea, n. 1696).

768 IX. Obligations to be fulfilled after a mixed marriage has been contracted. "When mixed nuptials have been celebrated, whether in their own territory or in another, they should diligently watch that the spouses faithfully fulfill the promises made" (canon 1064, 3°). But if the Catholic party should perhaps object that he or she is prevented by a pact from taking care that all the offspring be baptized and educated as Catholic, let that person be taught that a pact of this kind is invalid. Besides this, these things are to be observed:

1. If the mixed marriage was contracted illicitly but validly - which could especially have had place before the decree Ne temere concerning the form of marriage:

a) The Catholic party is not to be admitted to the sacraments unless first he or she is sorry for the sin committed, and has been absolved from penalties perhaps contracted; there will be discussion of penalties later.

The Holy Office says thus: "As regards valid marriages, they can be admitted to receiving the sacraments without prior renewal of consent, but are to be kept from receiving them until they have given true signs of repentance, and have promised that they will take care with all their strength both of the conversion of the heretical party and of the education in the Catholic religion of all offspring born and perhaps to be born, and finally until they have obtained absolution from incurred censures together with salutary penances, in the case in which they contracted before a heretical minister."[1]

b) The pastor should take care that at least the Catholic party furnish the cautions in the external forum, and that these be sent to the Bishop.[2]

c) The Catholic father should use the paternal power which civil law grants to him over minor sons and daughters.[3]

d) The Catholic mother should likewise use paternal power if, with the circumstances considered, for instance because the father has been deprived of the said power, that power belongs to her.[3]

e) The Catholic spouse should use: 1° the right which perhaps a special agreement entered into gives to him or her; 2° the right, perhaps granted by law[3] or agreement, of appointing a Catholic person who, after the spouse's death, will carry out the guardianship of the children.

2. If the marriage was contracted invalidly - for example, because the juridic form was not observed - then, the things to be posited having been posited, it must be convalidated; but there will be discussion of convalidation later.

Corollary. The Catholic party who does not do what is necessary and morally possible so that all the offspring be educated as Catholic is unworthy of absolution, both because he or she gravely fails in duty and because he or she gives grave scandal.

[1] August 23, 1877 (Collectanea, n. 1478).

[2] Holy Office, March 12, 1881.

[3] Thus, for example, Dutch law.

Scholion. On Marriage with an Unworthy Person

It remains for us to treat the prohibitions which are not reckoned among impediments properly so called, but are committed to the judgment of the Ordinary and pastors.

769 I. Notion. By the name of unworthy persons here are understood those of whom canons 1065 and 1066 speak, that is: 1° those who have notoriously cast off the Catholic faith, even if they have not gone over to a non-Catholic sect; 2° those who have been enrolled in societies condemned by the Church; 3° public sinners; 4° those notoriously bound by a censure.

1. One casts off the Catholic faith who has wished his name to be erased from the registers of Catholics; who by repeated attacks professes that he rejects the dogmas of faith, etc.[1]

2. Societies condemned by the Church are Masonic sects or other associations of the same kind which plot against the Church or legitimate civil powers (canon 2335), but not societies which are merely prohibited or dangerous.

3. Who are included under the name of public sinners, see n. 28.

4. Those notoriously bound by a censure are the personally interdicted, and those notoriously excommunicated or suspended.

II. Marriage with an unworthy person. The faithful are also to be deterred from contracting marriage with those who notoriously have either cast off the Catholic faith, even if they have not gone over to a non-Catholic sect, or have been enrolled in societies condemned by the Church (canon 1065, § 1). These things are also to be applied to public sinners and to those notoriously bound by a censure, unless they are converted.

III. Assistance at the marriage of an unworthy person. 1. A pastor should not assist at the nuptials of those who have cast off the Catholic faith or have been enrolled in a condemned society unless the Ordinary has been consulted; and the Ordinary, after inspecting all the circumstances of the matter, will be able to permit him to take part in the marriage, provided a grave cause urges and, according to his prudent judgment, the Ordinary judges that sufficient provision has been made for the Catholic education of all the offspring and for the removal of the danger of perversion of the other spouse (canon 1065, § 2).

2. If a public sinner or one notoriously bound by a censure has first refused to approach sacramental confession or to be reconciled with the Church, the pastor should not assist at that person's marriage unless a grave cause urges, concerning which, if it can be done, he should consult the Ordinary (canon 1066). As regards public sinners, the Ordinary should everywhere grant license if only one or the other remains publicly in sin. If each is a public sinner and denies confession, the Ordinary should permit assistance when graver evils are to be feared from denial, such as concubinage to be begun or continued, merely civil marriage, etc.

[1] Vermeersch, Epitome Iuris Canonici II, n. 335.

Chapter III. On Diriment Impediments in Particular

Thirteen diriment impediments are established in Canon Law, namely: age, impotence, bond, disparity of cult, sacred Order, solemn vows and sometimes simple vows, abduction, crime, consanguinity, affinity, public propriety, spiritual relationship, legal relationship.

Article I. Age

770 I. By natural law a determinate age is not required for the validity of marriage, but it suffices that someone has arrived at the use of reason, knows the nature of marriage sufficiently, and will have the power of coeundi in due time (St. Alphonsus VI).

II. By canon law, "a man before the completion of the sixteenth year of age, and a woman likewise before the completion of the fourteenth, cannot enter a valid marriage" (canon 1067, § 1). Years are to be taken as they are in the calendar; and since the terminus a quo is judged by law not to coincide with the beginning of the day, the first day is not to be counted, and the time is ended when the last day of the same number has been completed (canon 34, § 3).

But the impediment was established by the Church because she presumes that before the indicated years of age there is lacking at least the more mature discretion with which it is fitting to enter nuptials.

Corollary I. One who has attained the assigned age contracts validly, even if he or she does not yet have actual power for copula; by natural law the power which will be present in due time suffices. But the use of marriage is prohibited until each party has obtained actual power of coeundi, or at least there is hope of coeundi duly (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Corollary II. In doubt concerning age - which easily occurs in Mission regions - recourse should be had to the Ordinary, who can dispense in a doubt of fact. Sometimes the missionaries themselves receive the faculty of dispensing.

Corollary III. Although a marriage contracted after the aforesaid age is valid, nevertheless pastors of souls should take care to turn youths away from it before the age at which, according to the received customs of the region, marriage is usually entered (canon 1067, § 2). Therefore in colder regions it is rarely expedient that a young man contract nuptials before the twentieth year of age, or a girl before the eighteenth; indeed it is preferable to wait for the age of mature nubility, everywhere between the twentieth and twenty-fourth year, because otherwise spouses can harm themselves and their offspring. Once mature nubility has been obtained, one must of itself abstain from excessive delay of nuptials.

Article II. Impotence

771 I. Notion. Impotence is the incapacity of completing copula, or copula of itself apt for generation. But copula of itself apt for generation consists in this: that the man, having entered the female vagina by natural force, that is, by an erect member and not artificially, there pours forth true semen. And so a man is impotent when he cannot naturally enter the female vagina and emit true semen into it; but a woman is impotent when she cannot receive semen in her vagina (St. Alphonsus VI, 1095).

Impotence differs from sterility, which is the incapacity of generating, or which leaves possible copula of itself apt for generation, but in fact necessarily infertile because of a physical defect. Sterile persons are: 1° men who can indeed produce and emit semen, but semen deprived of spermatozoids and therefore not procreative, as occurs among youths up to about the seventeenth or eighteenth year, among old men, and among men laboring under certain diseases; 2° women who can indeed receive male semen, but cannot retain any of the semen; likewise, commonly, women who have passed the critical age, as it is called, 45-50 years. But concerning others there is dispute whether they are impotent or sterile, as will be explained presently.

772 II. Division. Impotence is distinguished:

1. Into natural and accidental, according as it proceeds from a natural defect, as from a defect of the genitals, or from an extrinsic cause, as from malefice.
2. Into antecedent and supervening, according as it precedes marriage contracted, or supervenes upon it.
3. Into perpetual and temporary. Perpetual impotence is that which cannot be removed either without a miracle, or without sin, or without grave danger of death. Temporary impotence is that which will cease either by the passage of time, or can be removed by an honorable means and without grave danger of death.
4. Into absolute and relative, according as it excludes the capacity of coeundi with any woman whatever, or only with a determinate person or determinate persons (St. Alphonsus VI, 1095).

5. Into certain and doubtful; and doubtful impotence can be doubtful by a doubt of law or of fact (n. 758, note 1).[1]

[1] Cf. Eschbach, Disputationes physiologico-theologicae, disp. 1, cap. 7; Antonelli, De conceptu impotentiae.

773 III. Existence of the impediment. 1. Antecedent and perpetual impotence, whether on the part of the man or on the part of the woman, whether known to the other party or not, whether absolute or relative, diriments marriage by the very law of nature (canon 1068, § 1); and indeed absolutely, or with all persons, if it is absolute; if it is relative, with the determinate person or determinate persons. The reason is that such an impotent person cannot hand over to the other party the right essential to marriage, that is, the right to copula of itself apt for generation (St. Alphonsus VI, 1095).

2. Temporary impotence does not diriment marriage, because such an impotent person can hand over the right to copula with the obligation of admitting it when the impotence has ceased (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). Hence the marriages of the non-pubescent are not diriment by the law of nature, but only by ecclesiastical law. Hence a marriage entered, for example, by a woman who because of narrowness cannot have copula is valid if the woman can be rendered apt by incision or a non-dangerous operation, or by frequent use; otherwise, if this cannot be done without danger to life (St. Alphonsus VI, 1096).[1]

3. Sterility neither diriments nor impedes marriage (canon 1068, § 3). The reason is that it does not take away the object of the matrimonial contract, that is, the right to copula of itself apt for generation (St. Alphonsus VI, 1095).

[1] Suppose that the woman underwent a medical operation and became apt: does the marriage hold? Response 1. If that operation was truly dangerous, the marriage did not convalidate, but renewal of consent is necessary (St. Alphonsus VI, 1096). Response 2. If the operation was certainly light, the marriage was and remains valid. Response 3. If - something which can occur not rarely - it is doubtful whether danger was present or not, at least for caution let a private renewal of consent be made (Lehmkuhl, Theol. Mor., II, n. 976).

774 IV. Cases of impotence. The following are impotent:

1. A man who lacks the male member.[1]

2. One who is deprived of both testicles.[2] For men of this sort, although at least sometimes they can penetrate the vagina and ejaculate some liquid, nevertheless cannot produce true semen. The same must be said of one who has testicles broken, bruised, or wholly atrophied or dried up, because he cannot elaborate semen.

3. One who is so frigid that he cannot erect the male member, or so ardent that he always pours forth the whole semen before he can penetrate the female vessel. But the aforementioned impotences are rarely perpetual, so that commonly they do not diriment marriage.

4. One who pours forth semen not at the extremity of the member but near its root, so that he can indeed enter into the female vessel, but cannot inject semen into it.

5. One who has undergone vasectomy.[3] For he is impotent who cannot posit an act of itself apt for generation, in other words, who cannot penetrate the vagina together with effusion of semen into it. But one who has undergone vasectomy cannot posit an act of this sort, as follows from its nature, described in the note.

6. A woman who lacks a vagina or has it closed at the very entrance. There is dispute concerning a woman who has a vagina closed in this way near the uterus. But she seems to be called impotent, because the vagina is like a flaccid canal open on both sides, so that a vagina closed near the uterus is substantially vitiated, and therefore in the stated case a properly so-called vagina seems to be lacking. The responses of the Sacred Congregation of the Council favor this in the Salernitana,[4] in the Verulana,[5] and in the Monasteriensis.[6] Namely, those responses declare null the marriage of a woman who lacked a uterus but had a short vagina closed near the uterus. But lack of a uterus does not seem to obstruct potency, as will be said under 9; therefore it remains that the closing of the vagina is the obstacle. For the rest, the stated impotences, if they can be cured without grave danger, are only temporary.

7. A woman who indeed has an open vagina but one so narrow that the male member cannot enter it. Some few, indeed, judge that in this case impotence is absent, or in other words, that it suffices that the man can deposit male semen at the exterior part of the vulva, or at least, the vulva having been penetrated, at the orifice or entrance of the vagina. But these opinions seem wholly to be rejected. For first, chapter 6, title 15, de frigidis et maleficiatis, declares that the impediment of impotence is had if a man cannot penetrate the woman's vagina. Next, for potency there is required aptitude for consummating marriage in that mode by which generation can follow of itself and not only by accident (cf. canon 1081, § 2). But from the deposition of semen either at the exterior part of the vulva or at the orifice of the vagina, generation does not seem to follow except by accident. Finally, this opinion is recommended by the fact that in the stated case there is lacking the faculty of consummating marriage according to the mode instituted by nature, that is, by penetrating the vagina. St. Thomas so thinks (In IV, dist. 41, q. un., a. 1, sol. 4, ad 2), and St. Alphonsus teaches the same at least implicitly (VI, 1075-1097). But the fact that the vagina can be penetrated only partially does not constitute impotence, or does not prevent there from being an act or copula of itself apt for generation. This is first deduced from the fact that copula which, as to substance, follows the mode indicated by nature, must be judged of itself apt for generation. But the copula of which we have spoken follows, as to substance, the mode indicated by nature; for it involves some penetration of the vagina, and more perfect and less perfect penetration differ only according to more and less, or are judged substantially similar to each other. Add that no theologian up to this point has taught that those who cannot coire more perfectly are impotent; indeed, the practice of the Roman Curia supposes that they are potent.

8. A woman who suffers from vaginismus, that is, hyperesthesia of the vaginal nerves, by which she cannot endure the contact of the man.

9. There is dispute whether a woman is impotent who lacks a uterus or ovaries, or who has the aforesaid organs wholly atrophied[7] or dried up. Now a woman of this sort seems to be potent, because for potency it suffices that one be capable of copula of itself apt for generation. But the copula of which the stated woman is capable is of itself apt for generation, or in other words, from itself or by its nature it is ordered to generation, although generation in fact cannot follow because of the defect of another organ required for it. Therefore all things are present which are required for generation insofar as generation depends on human action; once that action has been posited, the act of nature begins. This opinion is confirmed by the fact that, if the contrary opinion is admitted, or if capacity for generating is required for potency, it would also have to be admitted - something admitted with difficulty - that many men and many women, as being totally impotent for generating, are incapable of marriage: for example, men who have semen irremediably vitiated, and women who have ovaries irremediably inert. That there are many such persons in advanced age cannot be denied, although which persons are such cannot be determined with certainty.[8]

This controversy cannot be decided by authority. "Since authors dispute," says the Sacred Congregation of the Council,[9] "whether a marriage entered with a woman lacking ovaries is valid or not, and since ecclesiastical authority has not yet defined this question, and indeed the Congregation of the Holy Office has several times declared in particular cases, when the matter concerned a marriage to be contracted, that this is not an impediment,[10] but when the matter concerned a marriage already contracted, that the spouses are not to be disturbed, now in practical reality it does not seem opportune to institute a process for declaring the nullity of marriage from defect of ovaries in a woman." The Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments[11] indeed permitted marriage to a woman for whom, after the matters set forth and the express attestation of a surgeon were considered, the ovaries had certainly and completely been excised; but it can be said that, while the theoretical doubt stands, the marriage was declared licit for practice, without the theoretical question thereby being settled.

What has been said concerning a woman deprived of ovaries, you should also apply to a woman who has undergone oophorectomy, that is, resection or division of the canal by which male semen is carried to the ovaries, and ova to the womb.

10. Finally it is evident that a woman is impotent who cannot be fertilized except artificially, supposing artificial fertilization properly so called.[12]

11. It belongs to physicians to decide whether hermaphrodites[13] or androgynes can contract, and according to which sex (St. Alphonsus VI, 1095).

[1] He is called an ectomus if his male member has been cut off.

[2] Constitution of Sixtus V, Cum frequenter, June 22, 1587. From those deprived of both testicles must be distinguished those apparently such, or cryptorchids, who carry their testicles in the groins and can produce true semen, although infertile.

[3] Vasectomy consists in this: after an incision has been made through the scrotum, the organ carrying the semen elaborated by the testicles is resected, so that the path to ejaculation is broken off for the semen. One who has undergone vasectomy can indeed produce semen, but cannot pour it into the vagina, nor secrete it internally, since it is absorbed by the body (cf. De Smet, De spons. et Matrim., n. 550). Moreover he can preserve the erectibility of the male member and penetrate the vagina, indeed even ejaculate a certain liquid; but this liquid is not, as follows from what has been said, true semen, but some watery humor secreted by the prostate gland (cf. De Smet, op. cit., n. 550).

[4] March 21, 1863.

[5] January 24 and June 22, 1871.

[6] December 16, 1899.

[7] Note that complete atrophy can scarcely be established; hence, even in the opinion of those who hold perfect atrophy of the ovaries to be a cause of impotence, scarcely anyone can be barred from nuptials.

[8] Cf. Collectanea Brugenses, 1910, p. 701.

[9] December 16, 1905.

[10] Holy Office, February 3, 1887; July 23, 1890 (Collectanea, n. 1733); July 31, 1895 (Collectanea, n. 1007).

[11] April 2, 1907.

[12] It consists in this: that the physician receives in a little vessel male semen poured forth by the man solitarily or onanistically, and by means of a syringe pours it into the woman's genitals. In this case copula is lacking, so that a woman who cannot be fertilized except in such a way is incapable of copula and therefore impotent.

[13] That is, those who, besides the perfect organs of one sex, display some essential thing of the other, or who are endowed incompletely and monstrously with the organs of both sexes. But more commonly it happens that persons are born apparently hermaphrodites: namely boys who, since they still have testicles hidden in the abdomen, imitate in part the female sex; or girls who, having obtained a more extended clitoris, seem to be endowed with a male member (cf. Eschbach, op. cit., p. 53).

775 V. Effects of impotence. The discussion concerns perpetual impotence, since it alone diriments marriage. But a distinction must be made between certain impotence and doubtful impotence.

1. The effects of certain perpetual impotence are:

a) Before marriage has been entered. If impotence is certain, marriage must be abstained from, since it is certainly null.

b) After marriage has been entered. If perpetual and certain impotence certainly preexisted the marriage, the marriage is certainly null. In the case, of itself, separation from bed must be instituted at once; but it can be preferable that the parties be left in good faith. Separation from cohabitation cannot be instituted by private authority, and therefore the case must be submitted to the ecclesiastical judge, unless it can be permitted - which, when danger of sin is absent, can be permitted - that they cohabit as brother and sister (St. Alphonsus VI, 1101). Once the case has been brought to the judge, one proceeds according to the norm of canons 1975-1981; if the impotence is certainly established, the nullity of the marriage is pronounced; if it is not wholly established, but the non-consummation of the marriage is established, the Holy See is accustomed, with the requisite things having been placed, to dissolve for caution a ratified and non-consummated marriage.

2. The effects of doubtful perpetual impotence are:

a) Before marriage has been entered. In a doubt either of law or of fact, marriage is permitted (canon 1068, § 2). In a doubt of fact, that is, in a doubt concerning the fact which, if established, would certainly mean that impotence was present, the truth, if it can conveniently be done, must be investigated, for example by consulting experts. If the doubt persists, it is lawful to enter nuptials, after warning the other party, however, concerning the probable impotence (cited canon), but only under condition (St. Alphonsus VI, 1102; n. 758).

b) After marriage has been entered. In a doubt of law the use of marriage can be continued. In a doubt of fact not yet investigated, the truth must of itself be investigated, namely if there is hope of finding it; although commonly it is preferable to keep silence about the obligation. Practically, with respect to a spouse who complains of the impossibility of performing copula duly, these things hold: it is lawful for him to make trial as long as there is hope of coeundi duly, with emission of semen outside the vessel permitted if it is going to take place.[1] Meanwhile let him be advised to consult a physician. When hope of coeundi duly is wholly lacking, the case, with the things to be observed being observed, should be referred to the Ordinary, if it is known that the spouses wish for separation and for a declaration of the nullity of the marriage. If the spouses do not wish separation and are in good faith, it will often be preferable to leave them in good faith; if they are not in good faith, and danger of sin is absent or can be removed, it can be permitted that they live as brother and sister[2] (St. Alphonsus VI, 1101).

Corollary. The confessor should not inquire into impotence unless a founded doubt has arisen; but questions should be put very moderately and prudently, lest he disturb prematurely the good faith of the penitent regarding the validity and use of marriage.

[1] Cf. chapter 5, de frigidis et maleficiatis.

[2] Cf. chapter 5, de frigidis et maleficiatis; Sacred Congregation of the Council, December 15, 1877.

Article III. Bond

776 I. Notion. By the impediment of bond is understood the bond of a valid marriage; while that bond endures, another marriage cannot validly be contracted.

II. Existence of the impediment. The bond diriments marriage by divine law, both natural and positive; this follows from what was said concerning the unity and indissolubility of marriage (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 65, a. 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 1060). The impediment is confirmed by ecclesiastical law (canon 1069).

III. Cessation of the impediment. The impediment ceases through the dissolution of the matrimonial bond. In what ways this can happen, apart from the death of the other party, see n. 720 and following.

777 IV. Requisites in order that it be lawful to pass to new nuptials. Although the prior marriage is invalid or dissolved for any cause whatever, it is not therefore lawful to contract another before the nullity or dissolution of the prior marriage is legitimately and certainly established (canon 1069, § 2). Therefore it is required that concerning the nullity or dissolution of the prior marriage: 1° it be certainly established; 2° it be legitimately established. It must be certainly established, because it is not lawful to expose oneself either to the danger of inflicting injury upon the prior or possessing marriage, or to the danger of contracting the new marriage invalidly (St. Alphonsus VI, 981, 1060). It must be legitimately established because, since the matter concerns the external forum, private certainty does not suffice. Now:

1. In the case of nullity of marriage there is required a sentence of the competent ecclesiastical judge, rendered and announced with the order of law being observed. But spouses have the right of contracting new nuptials after ten days have elapsed from the announcement of the second sentence (canon 1987).

"When from a certain and authentic document, which is subject to no contradiction or exception, the existence of an impediment of disparity of cult, order, solemn vow of chastity, ligamen, consanguinity, affinity, or spiritual relationship has been established, and at the same time it has appeared with like certainty that a dispensation upon these impediments has not been given, in these cases, with the solemnities so far enumerated being omitted, the Ordinary, the parties having been cited, can declare the nullity of the marriage, but with the intervention of the defender of the bond" (canon 1990; cf. also canons 1991 and 1992). Indeed, if the union does not even have the appearance of marriage, as a merely civil marriage entered by persons subject to the ecclesiastical juridic form, the Ordinary, or even the pastor after consulting the Ordinary, can permit new nuptials, with every juridic formality being omitted and without intervention of the defender of the bond.[1] Finally, if in the judgment of the Ordinary the first marriage is certainly null, and in the place is unknown to all, we judge that for the internal forum the spouses are not to be disturbed in a second marriage contracted in good faith.[2]

Note. The Holy Office responded to the Bishops of Tonkin:[3] "But if, after suitable investigations have been made, it is established that infidels entered marriage without observing those things which by the law or custom of the kingdom are required for validity, and one or the other of them comes to baptism and wishes to enter nuptials with a faithful person, those nuptials are not to be permitted unless license has been obtained from the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, or unless an interpellation made of the prior spouse has fallen to no effect."

2. In the case of dissolution of marriage by Pontifical dispensation or by religious profession, there is required an authentic document of the dispensation granted or of the profession made; if there is question of religious profession, the non-consummation of the marriage must also legitimately be evident.

3. In the case of dissolution of marriage by the death of the other party, the required certainty is first obtained through evidence of a public fact. But how it is to be acquired in a case in which the said evidence is lacking is set forth by the Instruction of the Holy Office.[4] In view of it, first note that merely negative proofs, such as absence alone, however long continued, do not suffice,[5] unlike what holds in civil law for several nations. Therefore positive proofs are required. Now:

a) Before others, "an authentic document must by all means be sought with diligent care: namely, one drawn from the registers of the parish or hospital or military service, or even, if it cannot be had from ecclesiastical authority, from the civil government of the place in which, as is supposed, the person died" (cited Instruction, n. 2; cf. canon 1813, § 1, 4°).

b) If the document is lacking, it must be seen whether two witnesses can be had who are trustworthy, sworn, and who depose concerning their own fact, knew the deceased, and agree with each other concerning the place and cause of death and the other substantial circumstances (cited Instruction, n. 3; cf. canons 1791 and 1828).

c) In default of two witnesses, even one witness is admitted, "provided that that witness is endowed with the conditions enumerated in n. 3, is subject to no exception, and moreover his deposition is supported by other grave aids, and at least nothing is found in his testimony which is not congruous and wholly probable" (cited Instruction, n. 4).

d) In default of any witness, "proof of death from conjectures, indications, and circumstances of any kind must certainly be procured by a careful and very cautious investigation, namely so that, with several things collected from here and there and their nature weighed..., the judgment of a prudent man can be moved to affirm death by the greatest probability, or moral certainty" (cited Instruction, n. 6).

e) Report also, aided by other supports, constitutes an argument concerning death, under these conditions, namely: that it be proved by at least two trustworthy and sworn witnesses, who depose concerning the reasonable cause of the report itself, whether they received it from the greater and sounder part of the people, and whether they themselves think rightly concerning the same report; nor must there be doubt that it was stirred up by those for whose benefit inquiry is being made (cited Instruction, n. 8).

If the matter remains doubtful, and if there is hope of success, let the Ordinary have recourse to the Holy See.

Corollary I. If someone, after waiting in vain for the return of the other party for several years, in bad faith marries another, the spouses must be separated.[6]

Corollary II. If persons, after waiting in vain for the return of the other party, judged that party to be dead, and in good faith entered new nuptials, the spouses should be left in good faith until news is had of the life of the other party.[7]

Corollary III. If the death of the prior spouse is legitimately and certainly established, the pastor can assist at the new nuptials without recourse to the Ordinary, unless there is question of vagi. If some doubt remains, the Ordinary should be consulted; and this must regularly be done if death cannot be proved except in the way set forth under d or e.

[1] Pontifical Commission, October 16, 1919, ad XVII (A.A.S. 1919, p. 476).

[2] Gasparri, I, n. 633.

[3] September 24, 1915.

[4] May 13, 1868.

[5] Rescript of Pius VI to the Archbishop of Prague, July 11, 1788; cf. Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, March 22, 1865, ad 1 (Collectanea, n. 1272).

[6] Holy Office, March 22, 1865 (Collectanea, n. 1272, ad 1).

[7] Holy Office, March 22, 1865 (Collectanea, n. 1272, ad 1).

778

4. Permission, made by the Holy See, to pass to other nuptials because of the presumed death of the spouse always carries with it dispensation from the impediment arising from adultery with promise or attempted marriage, if any such dispensation is needed, but by no means dispensation from the impediment of which canon 1075, nn. 2, 3 treats (canon 1053).[1]

[1] Canon 1075, nn. 2, 3 treats of adultery with murder of a spouse and of murder of a spouse alone.

779 V. Penalty against bigamists. Bigamists, that is, those who, notwithstanding the conjugal bond, have attempted another marriage, even one merely civil, as they say, are infamous by the fact itself; and if, after the Ordinary's warning has been spurned, they persist in the illicit concubinage, they are to be excommunicated or punished with personal interdict according to the different gravity of guilt (canon 2356). Moreover, from infamy there arises irregularity (canon 984, 5°); if copula has followed, there arises the impediment of crime (canon 1075); the children are adulterine or, after the legitimate other party has died, illegitimate. The bigamists themselves - if the crime is public - are public sinners, and therefore, unless they repent, are to be barred from the sacraments (canon 855), from the office of sponsor (canon 765), and from ecclesiastical burial (canon 1240); besides this, the woman delivered of a child is to lack the blessing after childbirth.

Article IV. Disparity of Cult

780 I. Notion. By disparity of cult is understood the diversity of religion which exists between a party baptized in the Catholic Church, or converted to it from heresy or schism, and a non-baptized party. It does not matter whether the non-baptized party is pagan, Jewish, Mohammedan, or even a catechumen (cf. canon 1070, § 1). What is understood by the words "baptized in the Catholic Church," see n. 741.

II. Existence of the impediment. 1. By divine law, marriages between a baptized and a non-baptized party are prohibited for the same reasons as mixed marriages (n. 762; St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 59, a. 1).

2. By ecclesiastical law, a marriage contracted by a non-baptized person with a person baptized in the Catholic Church or converted to it from heresy or schism is null (canon 1070, § 1). Therefore, from the new Code in force, that is, from the day May 19, 1918, the impediment does not exist between a party who has been baptized, but not in the Catholic Church and not converted to it from heresy or schism, and a non-baptized party;[1] and this holds even if the non-baptized party is Catholic, or rather is regarded as Catholic.

Corollary I. Those baptized in the Catholic Church are subject to the impediment even if they were born of non-Catholics and educated non-Catholically. For the Code indeed exempts such persons from the juridic form of marriage (n. 742), but from this it does not follow that they are also exempt from the impediment of disparity of cult. There is added a response of the Holy Office - published in the letters of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide dated April 1, 1922[2] - which favors the opinion defended.

Corollary II. The divine natural prohibition extends itself further than the ecclesiastical diriment impediment; the former regards all baptized persons, the latter only those baptized in the Catholic Church or converted to it from heresy or schism. I said "divine-natural prohibition," since it is disputed whether divine positive law prohibits marriages of the faithful with infidels (cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 59, a. 1, ad 1).

Corollary III. The diriment impediment of disparity of cult is in force everywhere, even in regions recently converted to the Catholic faith.[3]

III. Cessation of the impediment. The divine prohibition ceases almost as was said concerning mixed religion (n. 763). The ecclesiastical diriment impediment ceases through dispensation. But the power of dispensing outside mission places is rarely granted to Bishops.

IV. The requisites in order that a dispensation be granted are the same as those which are required for dispensation in mixed religion (canon 1071; n. 764). When marriage is to be contracted with a Hebrew party, the Holy Office adds to the dispensation the clause: "And provided that neither before nor after the marriage entered before the Catholic pastor do the parties go to a rabbi to celebrate marriage by the Jewish rite."

Note 1. The Holy Office, June 21, 1912, declared: 1° that dispensation upon the impediment of disparity of cult is never granted unless all the conditions "or cautions" have been expressed; 2° that a dispensation upon the impediment of disparity of cult imparted by one having power from the Holy See, without the prescribed cautions having been required, or with them repudiated, is invalid; 3° that the nullity of the marriage can be declared by the Ordinary himself when it is evident that the dispensation was thus invalidly granted.

Note 2. The Church, in dispensing upon the impediment of disparity of cult, is no longer understood, as before,[4] to dispense from the impediments from which the non-Catholic party is exempt;[5] indeed, it seems that already from the new Code these things held.[6]

Note 3. With regard to the declaration of nullity of marriage because of disparity of cult, what was said concerning the impediment of ligamen holds (p. 619; canon 1990).[7]

V. Obligations of those about to marry, etc. With regard to the obligations of those about to marry, of pastors of souls in forestalling marriages of this sort, of the confessor with respect to a penitent seeking such a marriage, likewise with regard to assistance to be given to marriages of this sort, and with regard to the obligation respecting a marriage contracted, the same things are to be observed as if there is question of a mixed marriage (canon 1071; n. 765 and following).

[1] From this it is also clear how this rather frequent case is to be resolved: Caius and Titia, non-Catholic spouses, are separated from each other by civil divorce. Titia, so that she may marry Sempronius, a Catholic, again, herself also desires to be joined to the Catholic Church. To set aside the impediment of bond by which she still seems bound to Caius, she proves in the forum of the Church that she certainly was not baptized in her sect, or certainly was baptized invalidly, while Caius was baptized. In such a case can the ecclesiastical judge decide that the prior marriage was invalid because of disparity of cult between Caius and Titia? I respond: if their marriage was celebrated before the day May 19, 1918, affirmatively; but if afterward, negatively (Vlaming, op. cit., I, n. 289).

[2] Cf. Archiv fur katholisches Kirchenrecht, 1927, p. 180.

[3] Constitution of Benedict XIV, Singulari nobis, February 9, 1749.

[4] Holy Office, September 16, 1824 (Collectanea, n. 1235).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, May 20, 1931 (in Periodica de re morali, etc., 1932, p. 16).

[6] Cf. the cited response of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide.

[7] Cf. Pontifical Commission, October 16, 1919, ad 17 (A.A.S. 1919, p. 476 sq.).

781 VI. Cases of doubtful baptism. There is question either of a marriage to be contracted, or not yet contracted, or of a marriage already contracted.

1. When marriage has not yet been contracted, one must proceed in this way:

a) If there is question of a marriage to be contracted by a Catholic doubtfully validly baptized with a non-baptized person, the Catholic, with the things to be observed being observed, should be rebaptized under condition, and a dispensation in the impediment of disparity of cult should be requested. If because of the circumstances one cannot proceed to the repetition, under condition, of baptism, there is had a doubtful impediment by a doubt of fact, in which the Ordinary can dispense (canon 15).

b) If there is question of a marriage to be contracted by a Catholic with a non-Catholic person doubtfully baptized or doubtfully validly baptized, one must act thus:

If the non-Catholic wishes to be converted, with the things to be observed being observed, let him be rebaptized under condition; once this has been done, the impediment no longer subsists.

If the non-Catholic does not wish to be converted, it is not lawful to rebaptize him under condition,[1] and so to remove the impediment which perhaps exists. What therefore must be done? In the case there are present two impediments doubtful by a doubt of fact - namely of mixed religion and of disparity of cult - in which the Ordinary can dispense (canon 15). But, with approved practice considered, it is not lawful to put an end to the case in this way. In circumstances of this sort the truth must first be inquired into, so that it may be known whether there is need of a dispensation from mixed religion or from disparity of cult. If the doubt is not sufficiently solved, let a dispensation from mixed religion and, for caution, from disparity of cult be requested; indeed, it suffices to request a dispensation from mixed religion, because the Holy See joins to a dispensation from that impediment a dispensation for caution from the impediment of disparity of cult.

In inquiring into the truth, first let it be seen whether the matter can be proved directly, namely by documents or by witnesses.[2] If direct arguments are lacking or do not make full faith, recourse should be had to indirect proof taken from presumptions; in carrying out this business, the norms which follow hold:

a) In doubt concerning the fact of baptism, from a response of the Holy Office:[3]

1° Baptism should not be presumed if the non-Catholic party had parents belonging to a sect which rejects Baptism, or in which Baptism is conferred only on adults; likewise if he had parents who professed that they wished to belong to no sect, and that they honored the Supreme Being rather by upright morals, as they say, than by any special cult.

2° Baptism should be presumed if the parents belonged to a sect which holds Baptism necessary, or in which at least ordinarily it is conferred on children, and the same parents were zealous in their sect; likewise, if only one of the parents, who had the chief role in education, was zealous in his sect, which holds Baptism as necessary, provided that the other spouse is not then known to have been positively opposed to the conferral of Baptism.

3° But if each parent was negligent in the sect, or belonged to a sect which indeed retains Baptism but does not hold it as necessary; likewise if, after inquiry has been made, it is unknown or not sufficiently established whether that one parent had the chief role in education who, in his sect holding Baptism necessary, was zealous, in these cases recourse must be had to the Holy See.

b) In doubt concerning the validity of baptism, from a response of the Holy Office:[4]

1° With regard to heretics whose Rituals prescribe the conferral of Baptism without the necessary use of essential matter and form, the particular case must be examined.

2° With regard to others, who baptize validly according to their Rituals, Baptism must be judged valid. But if the doubt persists even in the first case, Baptism must be judged valid in order to the validity of marriage.

3° But if it is certainly known that there is no Baptism according to the actual custom of that sect, the marriage is null.

2. When marriage has been contracted, because of the favor of law one must stand for the value of the marriage until it is certainly proved that one party was baptized and the other was not baptized (canon 1070, § 2, compared also with canon 1014); understand: that one party was baptized in the Catholic Church, or was converted to it from heresy or schism. Hence a marriage is to be presumed valid:

a) Between a party certainly baptized Catholicly and a party doubtfully baptized.

b) Between two parties doubtfully baptized Catholicly.

c) Between a party doubtfully baptized Catholicly and a party certainly not baptized.

Objection. If one party was doubtfully baptized Catholicly, and the other certainly was not baptized, one cannot stand for the value of the marriage. For doubtful baptism in order to marriage is presumed valid.[5]

Response. The assertion concerning doubtful baptism, insofar as there is question of a contracted marriage, seems unable to be reconciled with the clear text of canon 1070, § 2 and canon 1014, and therefore no longer holds.

[1] Holy Office, April 3, 1878.

[2] To prove that baptism was conferred, if prejudice is done to no one, one witness above every exception is sufficient, or the oath of the baptized person himself, if he received baptism at adult age (canon 779).

[3] August 1, 1883 (Collectanea, n. 662).

[4] November 17, 1830 (Collectanea, n. 649).

[5] Holy Office, September 9, 1868; July 7, 1880; August 1, 1883, etc.

Article V. Sacred Order

782 I. Major or sacred Orders, that is, the Episcopate, Presbyterate, Diaconate, and Subdiaconate, diriment marriage (canon 1072, compared with canons 949 and 950).[1] There is dispute concerning those who received sacred Order without sufficient knowledge of the obligation of celibacy, or compelled by grave fear. For the rest, canon 214, § 1 states: "A cleric who, compelled by grave fear, received a sacred Order and afterwards, once the fear was removed, did not ratify the same ordination at least tacitly through exercise of the Order, while nevertheless wishing by such an act to subject himself to clerical obligations, is to be reduced to the lay state by sentence of a judge, once the coercion and defect of ratification have been legitimately proved, without any obligations of celibacy and of the canonical hours."

Minor clerics can indeed enter nuptials, but, unless the marriage was null by reason of force or fear inflicted upon them, they fall by the law itself from the clerical state (canon 132, § 2).

II. Sacred Order as such does not diriment marriage by divine law, whether natural[2] or positive, but merely by ecclesiastical law. Not by divine natural law, that is, by force of the nature of sacred Order. For this is not absolutely incompatible with obligations essential to sacred Order, as is evident from approved practice in the Eastern Church and from dispensations granted by the Church; and those dispensations furnish a new argument, because the Church cannot dispense in divine natural law. Nor by divine positive law, that is, law founded in a special disposition of Christ. This is likewise deduced from approved practice and dispensations, of which there has just been discussion. It remains therefore, as we shall say, that sacred Order as such diriments marriage by ecclesiastical law alone. I said as such; for there is dispute whether the solemn vow of chastity, which according to many is attached to sacred Order, diriments marriage by divine law. Concerning this, see below (n. 784), where we adhere to the opinion which derives the invalidating force of a solemn vow from ecclesiastical law alone.

III. The Church established the diriment impediment by reason of the Order itself; in other words, she annexed the impediment to the Order itself. Whether she also annexed it to the vow is disputed. By reason of the Order itself, as is evident from the fact that canon 1072 constitutes those placed in sacred Order absolutely incapable, so that even those who excluded the vow would be held by the impediment. It is disputed whether the Church also annexed the impediment to the vow, if it is emitted. Now it seems that this must be affirmed, if one considers both the things which Boniface VIII established in the single chapter de voto et voti redemptione, III, 15, in the Sext; and the authority of other Pontiffs in the single chapter, title 6, de voto, in the Extravagants of John XXII; and the Constitution

Inter praeteritos of Benedict XIV, § 41, December 5, 1749, with proposition 72[3] proscribed in the Syllabus of Pius IX also being compared. I said "if it is emitted" (St. Alphonsus VI, 808, 809). For:

It is disputed, first, whether there has existed a law of emitting a vow in the reception of sacred Order. Now Wernz-Vidal, in order to prove its existence, speaks thus: "Certainly from the ancient tradition of the Western Church, from Gregory the Great onward, men were not admitted to major Orders unless they previously professed chastity. This profession according to the obvious meaning contains a true vow of perfect chastity. But by no solid argument can that fact, already in itself rather unbelievable, be demonstrated: that the Latin Church, having abandoned her ancient and more perfect practice of exacting celibacy also from a vow of perfect chastity, adopted the less perfect discipline of the Greeks, who impose upon a celibate cleric approaching major Orders the obligation of chastity by ecclesiastical law alone. Nor can adversaries assign by some probable reason the time when at last that wondrous change of ancient discipline was made. Therefore the singular prerogative and dignity of the secular clergy of the Latin Church, by which it follows the evangelical counsel of chastity in the more perfect form and mode of a vow, is to be retained with all force and constancy."[4]

It is disputed, secondly, whether the law of emitting a vow in the reception of sacred Order continued to be in force after the new Code. This may seem doubtful to someone, because the stated law is with difficulty drawn out of the Code, and therefore, with canon 6, 6° considered, seems to have been abolished.

Nevertheless the law seems to persist: both because canon 6, 6° does not seem applicable to the stated law, as introduced by custom;[5] and because the word sacrilege occurring in canon 132, § 1 can regard also the vow annexed and to be annexed to the Order; and once this is admitted, the law is contained at least implicitly in the Code; and because at least because of doubt one must not depart from the old law (canon 6, 4°).

IV. The penalties established against major clerics attempting marriage are:

1. Excommunication latae sententiae, simply reserved to the Apostolic See; clerics moreover, if after having been warned during the time determined beforehand by the Ordinary according to the diversity of circumstances, they have not repented, are to be degraded (canon 2388, § 1).
2. Irregularity (canon 985, 3°).
3. Loss of office (canon 188, 5°).

Note. The penalties set forth have been established also against those who contract merely civilly, although an act of this sort lacks even the appearance of marriage (cited canon).

V. The Church never dispenses in the impediment of Order with Bishops, scarcely ever with presbyters, and not easily with deacons and subdeacons.

But whenever a dispensation is granted, it is enjoined upon the cleric that, reduced to the lay state, he in no way exercise the Orders received. By this injunction the fundamental principle of the Latin Church is preserved, namely, that clerics "cannot attend at the same time to pleasures and carnal desires and to ecclesiastical services." So chapter 3, de conversione coniugatorum (III, 32). But the obligation of reciting the Divine Office is commuted into other works of piety.[6]

[1] Council of Trent, session 24, canon 9.

[2] That is, by reason of the character of the Order itself.

[3] "Boniface VIII was the first to assert that a vow of chastity emitted in ordination renders nuptials null."

[4] Op. cit., n. 284.

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, January 10, 1920.

[6] Vlaming, I, n. 301.

Scholion. On Sacred Order in the Eastern Churches

783 I. Sacred or major Order also in the Eastern Churches constitutes an impediment of marriage; in other words, major clerics after ordination cannot enter marriage, neither a first marriage nor, after the death of the first wife, a second.[1] Except, with regard to Maronites and Syrians, the Subdiaconate, since they do not reckon it among the major Orders.

II. Sacred Order constitutes a diriment impediment: 1° for Italo-Greeks;[2] 2° for Ruthenians, at least with regard to presbyters;[3] 3° for Maronites and Syrians with regard to deacons and presbyters;[4] 4° for Romanians;[5] 5° most probably, not to say certainly, for the other churches. For first, Benedict XIV adheres to this opinion in the Constitution Eo quamvis.[6] Next, the style of the Roman Curia embraces this opinion; namely, as Benedict XIV admits in the Constitution Anno vertente of June 19, 1750,[7] this opinion was already received in his time among the Roman tribunals and is in force now. Then, in the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide to the Bishop of the province of Alba Iulia,[8] marriage after Subdiaconate is said to be attempted, that is, contracted invalidly. Finally, there is added the consensus of the Orientals themselves, both Catholic and schismatic. But the fact that Benedict XIV in the Constitution Anno vertente pronounces that this controversy has not yet been defined by any apostolic decree does not prevent the opinion defended from being called almost certain.[9]

[1] Nevertheless married men can receive the sacred Orders of Subdiaconate, Diaconate, and Presbyterate, and, once these have been received, use the marriage entered before ordination. But married men cannot be admitted to the Episcopate without dispensation, nor can they, once made Bishops, use a marriage perhaps contracted previously (canon 13 of the Trullan Council; Benedict XIV, Constitution Etsi pastoralis).

[2] Canon 6 of the Trullan Council (692).

[3] Synod of the Ruthenians, 1720.

[4] Synod of Lebanon (1736); Synod of Sciarf (1888).

[5] Provincial Synod of the Romanians, 1883.

[6] May 4, 1745.

[7] June 19, 1750.

[8] March 24, 1858.

[9] Wernz-Vidal, op. cit., n. 286.

Article VI. Religion

784 I. Religious who have professed solemn vows,[1] or simple vows to which, by special prescription of the Apostolic See, the force of invalidating nuptials has been added, invalidly attempt marriage (canon 1073). Force of this sort has been added to simple vows emitted by scholastics in the Society of Jesus, as is evident from the Constitutions of Gregory XIII Quanto fructuosius[2] and Ascendente Domino.[3] Insofar as in the reception of the Subdiaconate a solemn vow of chastity is emitted which diriments marriage, see n. 782.

It is disputed whether a solemn vow diriments marriage by divine law, whether natural, that is, by its own force, or positive, or by ecclesiastical law. Now it seems to diriment marriage by ecclesiastical law alone: both because the former opinion is proved by no argument, although such force of a solemn vow is not to be asserted without an argument; and because Leo XIII,[4] by reckoning the impediment of religion among ecclesiastical impediments, in the obvious sense excludes divine law; and because a solemn and a simple vow do not seem to differ in nature or substance (vol. I, n. 1218). Once this is posited, it is admitted with difficulty that invalidating force regarding marriage belongs to the former, since the same cannot be affirmed of the latter.

II. The penalties established against religious attempting marriage are:

1. Excommunication. "Regulars or nuns after a solemn vow of chastity, and likewise all presuming to contract marriage, even only civilly, with one of the aforesaid persons, incur excommunication latae sententiae simply reserved to the Apostolic See... But if they are professed of perpetual simple vows, whether in Orders or in religious Congregations, all, as above, are held by excommunication latae sententiae reserved to the Ordinary" (canon 2388).
2. Irregularity for those who are bound by religious vows, even simple and temporary vows (canon 985, 3°).
3. Dismissal from religion. Religious are to be held by that very fact as legitimately dismissed if they attempt or contract marriage or even a civil bond, as they say (canon 646, § 1, 3°).
4. If religious have been constituted in sacred Orders, they are moreover held by loss of office (canon 188, 5°), and if, after they have been warned during the time determined beforehand by the Ordinary according to the diversity of circumstances, they have not repented, they are to be degraded (canon 2388, § 1).

Note. The penalties set forth have been established also against those who contract merely civilly (cited canon).

III. Today the Church dispenses in solemn religious profession not only for a cause which concerns the public good, but also for a very grave cause regarding private good. Nevertheless a solemn vow of chastity is commonly not totally removed by the Holy See, but in such a way that the dispensed person, outside the licit use of marriage, also sins against the vow, and the faculty of marrying is restricted to one marriage.

IV. Things to be noted. 1. One who, having obtained an indult of secularization, leaves religion remains freed from vows, while the burdens annexed to major Order stand firm if he was in sacred Orders (canon 640, § 1, 2°); therefore the aforesaid indult does not remove the diriment impediment of sacred Order.

2. The solemnity of vows is extinguished by that very fact in one who legitimately pronounces simple vows in another religious Congregation, unless something else is expressly provided in the apostolic indult (canon 636); and by the fact that the solemnity of vows is extinguished, the force of invalidating marriage also ceases.

[1] A vow is solemn if it has been recognized as such by the Church; otherwise it is simple (canon 1308, § 2). But the Church recognizes as solemn the perpetual vows emitted in some religious Order, whether by regulars or by nuns. Nevertheless, although the vows of nuns are solemn by institute, for some places by prescription of the Apostolic See they are simple (canon 488, 2° and 7°).

[2] February 1, 1583.

[3] May 25, 1584.

[4] Letters of the Holy Office, February 20, 1888 (Collectanea, n. 1685).

Article VII. Raptus

785 With canon 1074 considered, a twofold raptus can be distinguished, properly so called and less properly so called; each diriments marriage.

I. Notion of raptus properly so called. Raptus properly so called as an impediment is: the violent abduction of a woman, with marriage in view, and her retention under the power of the abductor.

II. Existence of the impediment. Between a male abductor and a woman abducted with marriage in view, as long as she has remained in the power of the abductor, no marriage can stand (canon 1074, § 1).

III. The required conditions are evident from the notion handed down. Namely, there is required:

1. Abduction, that is, from place to place; for example, from city to city, from street into house, from one house into another (St. Alphonsus VI, 1107), or even from one room into another, if the house is very large and is the domicile of several families.

2. Violent abduction. Unjust moral force, or unjust fear inflicted upon the woman, suffices. Therefore there is required the abduction of a woman unwilling or resisting. Nevertheless the impediment seems also to be present if a woman, deceived by fraud or circumvented by deceitful solicitations, indeed follows the man, but does not know and does not will that she is being abducted for the purpose of entering marriage.[1] The impediment is not present if the woman consents to the abduction so that she may freely enter nuptials with the abductor; and this holds even if she is still subject to parents or tutors and they are unwilling (St. Alphonsus VI, 1107).

Here, however, it can be asked whether fear inflicted for the purpose that the woman be abducted for marriage is always unjust, namely even if there is question of a betrothed woman who without just cause refuses to enter marriage. Several affirm this, because the aforesaid manner of acting is unjust at least as to mode, namely insofar as no one by private authority can coerce a betrothed woman to nuptials in such a way. But this cannot be said universally; or it can happen that this is done without injustice, for example, if a betrothed man by fear of an evil which it is lawful to inflict abducts a betrothed woman unjustly refusing, so that at last he may arrive at the marriage owed to him.

3. Of a woman, whether honorable or corrupted, whether virgin or widow. But the impediment is not had if a woman abducts a man (St. Alphonsus VI, 1107).

4. For the sake of contracting marriage. Therefore the impediment of raptus is not had if a woman is abducted, for example, for the sake of acquiring money or solely for satisfying lust (canon 1074, § 1).

5. And her detention under the power of the abductor; namely, the impediment lasts as long as the woman remains in the power of the abductor, even if now she freely consents to the nuptials themselves.

IV. Cessation of the impediment. But if the abducted woman, separated from the abductor and established in a safe and free place, has consented to have him as husband, the impediment ceases (canon 1074, § 2).[2]

V. Notion of raptus less properly so called. Raptus less properly so called as an impediment is: the violent retention of a woman in the place where she stays or to which she has freely gone, with marriage in view.

VI. Existence of the impediment. "With regard to the nullity of marriage, violent retention of the woman is held equivalent to raptus, namely when a man violently detains a woman with marriage in view in the place where she stays or to which she has freely gone" (canon 1074, § 3).

VII. The required conditions, after what has been said, scarcely need any exposition. Namely, there is required: 1° violent retention, that is, either by physical force or by moral force, namely unjust fear; 2° of a woman, as was said concerning raptus properly so called; 3° in the place where she stays or to which she has freely gone. If she is retained in a place to which she has been led violently, the impediment of raptus properly so called subsists; 4° with marriage in view.

VIII. Cessation of the impediment takes place in the same way as cessation of the impediment of raptus properly so called.

Note 1. It makes no difference whether one violently abducts or detains the woman by himself or through another.

Note 2. The impediment of raptus, both properly and less properly so called, although directly it touches only the faithful party, nevertheless indirectly also affects the infidel party. And so it exists even between an infidel and a faithful person, and this whether the abducted woman is faithful or infidel.

IX. The penalties established are: One who, with marriage in view or for the sake of satisfying lust, has abducted by force or deceit an unwilling woman, or a consenting woman of minor age but with the parents or tutors unaware or contradicting, is by the law itself to be held excluded from legitimate ecclesiastical acts, and moreover is to be punished with other penalties according to the gravity of the fault (canon 2353). Note especially that the penalty does not touch raptus less properly so called, but it does touch several who have not contracted the impediment of raptus properly so called.

X. Dispensation. Although the impediment of raptus and quasi-raptus is of ecclesiastical law, nevertheless the Church dispenses in it only very rarely, namely by permitting the abductor or quasi-abductor to enter nuptials with the abducted or quasi-abducted woman not yet established in a safe place. Furthermore, if the impediment has ceased, according to the common opinion it is not lawful for the pastor to assist at the marriage except by license of the Ordinary, to whom it belongs to judge concerning the cessation of the impediment.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, June 25 and August 27, 1864.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, August 20, 1769; March 14, 1772; Council of Trent, session 24, de reformatione matrimonii, chapter 6.

Article VIII. Crime

786 The impediment of crime arises from two crimes, namely adultery and spouse-murder, and indeed, with certain conditions fulfilled, in four cases. But the cases according to canon 1075 are: 1° adultery with a mutual promise of marriage; 2° adultery with attempted marriage; 3° adultery with spouse-murder; 4° spouse-murder alone.

§ I. Adultery with a Promise of Marriage

787 Canon 1075, 1° states: "They cannot validly contract marriage who, while the same legitimate marriage endures, have consummated adultery between themselves and have mutually given faith to each other concerning marriage to be entered." Therefore two things must concur: adultery and the promise of marriage, and indeed they must concur or be joined while the same legitimate marriage endures.

I. The adultery must be:

1. True. Hence it is required that at least one or the other spouse be joined in a valid marriage. For the rest, it does not matter whether the marriage is consummated or only ratified.
2. Consummated, namely by copula of itself apt for generation.
3. Formal on each side, and this in such a way that by both, at least one and the same marriage has had injury inflicted upon it. Hence it is required that each party know at least the matrimonial state of one and the same person; but it is not required that each know the marriage of the other; nor is it sufficient that each know himself or herself to be joined in marriage.

Let there be cases: Peter, unmarried, has relations with Anna, a married woman, while ignorant of her marriage. There is not adultery formal on both sides. Paul, married, has copula with Rose, married; but neither knew the other's marriage. Injury is not inflicted upon one and the same marriage. Henry, married, and Bertha, married, commit adultery. Henry knows Bertha's marriage, but Bertha is ignorant of Henry's marriage. Each party inflicts injury upon the same marriage (St. Alphonsus VI, 1036). But the reason why injury must be inflicted upon the same marriage by both spouses is this: that the impediment was established lest hope of marriage lead to plotting the death of a spouse by the common design of each.

II. The promise must be:

1. True. Therefore desire does not suffice, nor, as is more commonly taught, a fictitious promise. For "faith given" is required; moreover, since we are dealing with odious things, the law must be interpreted strictly, and therefore concerning a promise properly so called (St. Alphonsus VI, 1039).
2. Duly intimated and accepted. For thus a promise is perfected or completed. Hence the silence of the other party does not suffice of itself (St. Alphonsus VI, 1037).
3. Absolute, or, if it is not absolute, conditional, as follows: If the promise was made under a condition concerning the present or concerning the past, it is required that the condition exist. If it was made under a suspensive condition concerning the future, the condition must be fulfilled, and indeed, as is more commonly taught, before the death of the innocent spouse. The reason why the condition must exist or be fulfilled is this: because otherwise there is not simply a promise; yet such a promise is judged to be required, since we are dealing with odious things (St. Alphonsus VI, 1040). But the suspensive condition must be fulfilled before the death of the innocent spouse, because otherwise there is not simply a promise which gives occasion for plotting the death of the spouse.

4. Mutual; for canon 1075, 1° declares: "and they have mutually given faith to each other."

5. It is required, with sufficient probability, that it be a promise concerning marriage to be entered after the death of the spouse. For the cited canon speaks of marriage to be entered. But a promise about marrying while the prior spouse is living is rather a promise about attempting marriage. Hence we judge that the impediment does not subsist if, for example, Peter promises Anna, a married woman, that he will enter marriage after she has obtained a civil divorce.

6. Finally, it is required with sufficient probability either that each, while promising, knew that one or the other was married, or that the promise, after that knowledge was received, was expressly or tacitly[1] confirmed. The reason is that both the promise and the adultery must give occasion for seeking the death of the innocent spouse.

III. Joining of adultery and promise. Adultery and promise must have place while the same legitimate marriage endures; therefore they must have existed together, and this while the same legitimate marriage persisted. But it does not matter whether the promise precedes the adultery or the reverse.

1. They must have existed together. Hence if the promise preceded the adultery, it is required that it was not revoked before the adultery. But that it is revoked after the adultery has been committed effects nothing, because they already existed together.

2. They must have existed together while the same spouse was living. Hence the impediment does not arise if, for example, Peter, while his prior marriage stands, had copula with Anna, unmarried, and promises marriage to her during the time of his second marriage.

[1] For example, Peter promises marriage to Anna while ignorant of her marriage. Afterwards, once Anna's marriage has become known, moved by the promise made, he commits adultery with her.

§ II. Adultery with Attempted Marriage

788 Canon 1075, 1° states: "They cannot validly contract marriage who, while the same legitimate marriage endures, have consummated adultery between themselves and... have attempted that marriage itself, even by a merely civil act." Therefore there are required:

I. Adultery, and of the sort set forth in n. 787.

II. Attempted marriage. By this is understood here an act by which two persons, knowing that because of the impediment of ligamen they cannot enter another valid marriage, truly offer conjugal consent to each other. It is required that each be conscious of the impediment, because each must attempt marriage. For the rest, with regard to the consent to be offered, it is the same whether it is offered in the form required by law or without it, even if it is done merely civilly. Mere concubinage as such does not involve matrimonial consent, although it can give occasion for offering it, or even, with the custom of the place considered, carry it with itself.[1]

III. The joining between adultery and attempted marriage must be the same as between adultery and the promise of marriage (n. 787).

Corollary. All those who, after a validly contracted marriage, seek and obtain a civil divorce, and then contract and consummate another civil marriage, incur this impediment; and therefore, although the prior marriage has been dissolved, they cannot enter marriage without a dispensation.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, January 14, 1844.

[2] Vlaming, I, n. 318.

§ III. Adultery with Spouse-Murder

789 Canon 1075, 2° states: "They cannot validly contract who, likewise while the same legitimate marriage endures, have consummated adultery between themselves and one of them has perpetrated spouse-murder." Therefore there are required:

I. Adultery. But this must not only be, as was set forth in n. 787, true, consummated, formal on both sides, and formally injurious to the same spouse; it must also be such with respect to precisely that spouse who is killed. In other words, here it does not suffice that the matrimonial state of one or the other be known to each, but moreover it is required that the matrimonial state of that one whose spouse is killed be known to each. For, with the end of the law considered,[1] it seems to be required that adultery, and indeed the adultery of each party, influence the killing of the spouse. But this does not have place if one or the other party is ignorant of the matrimonial state of the spouse killed. There is added that the ancient law speaks of adultery injurious with respect to the spouse killed (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 18, n. 63, where he requires "that each adulterer be conscious of the prior marriage," that is, of the marriage which was dissolved by the killing of one spouse).

II. Spouse-murder; concerning which it must be observed:

1. Plotting of death perpetrated by one or the other accomplice in adultery suffices, whether physically or morally.
2. Death must truly have followed, and from that plotting.
3. The plotting must have proceeded from the intention of marrying the accomplice in adultery. "Hence it is inferred that if a man kills his wife so that he may enjoy the adulteress more freely, or for another cause, even if that woman consented to the homicide but without intention of marriage, the impediment is not contracted" (St. Alphonsus VI, 1036). For the rest, here it is certainly not necessary that that intention be present in both adulterers, since the plotting of both is not required. But it is disputed whether the stated intention must be manifested to the accomplice in adultery. Now this seems to be denied, because in this case the law does not require mutual conspiracy. Nevertheless the intention seems to have to be externalized, as they say, because the Church cannot, or at least is not accustomed to, make laws concerning merely internal acts (St. Alphonsus VI, 1034).

III. Joining between adultery and spouse-murder. 1. Adultery and spouse-murder must be committed while the same legitimate marriage stands.

2. It is disputed whether adultery must have preceded not only the death of the spouse, but also the physical plotting of death, for example the administering of poison or the infliction of a wound. Now this is affirmed with sufficient probability, because, with the end of the law considered, the impediment seems to have been established lest the adultery of each should influence the killing of the innocent spouse (p. 634). Once this is posited, it is necessary that the adultery precede the physical plotting of death itself (St. Alphonsus VI, 1036, 2°). I said, however, "physical plotting," because the impediment arises even if the adultery follows the moral plotting, provided that it precedes the physical.

[1] The end of the law is lest adultery give occasion for preparing the death of the innocent spouse.

§ IV. Spouse-Murder Alone

790 Canon 1075, 3° states: "They cannot validly contract marriage who by mutual physical or moral cooperation, even without adultery, have brought death upon a spouse." Therefore there are required:

I. Cooperation or plotting of the spouse's death, and that mutual. It is the same whether each party has influenced the death physically or morally, or one physically and the other morally. Therefore command, persuasion, and approval also suffice, but not approval of spouse-murder already perpetrated. There are also those who judge that simple consent to spouse-murder to be perpetrated does not suffice, because the word moral cooperation is not sufficiently verified;[1] others, however, think otherwise for the contrary reason.

II. Cooperation or plotting done from the intention of marrying, and indeed marrying the accomplice. For although the aforesaid condition is not expressed in the law, nevertheless it is gathered from the end of the law, namely lest one come to spouse-murder through hope of marriage with the accomplice (St. Alphonsus VI, 1033). But:

It is disputed, first, whether the aforesaid intention must be in each of those plotting. Most deny this, because the end of the law consists in this: that the occasion of plotting against the life of the legitimate spouse be removed. That occasion is sufficiently taken if even one of those plotting had, in the plotting, the intention of marrying the accomplice. The Austrian Instruction, § 37, openly favors this opinion. A few affirm it, because just as each must cooperate in the spouse-murder, so almost consequently it seems required that each come to the crime through hope of marriage. The pastoral Instruction of Eichstatt seems to favor this opinion.

It is disputed, secondly, whether the intention of marrying must be manifested to the other party before the spouse-murder. Now this is affirmed with sufficient probability, because otherwise that intention would not influence the fact that the mutual plotting was done through hope of marriage. But the manifestation can be made both by words and by gifts, familiarities, and similar things (St. Alphonsus VI, 1034).

III. Death must have followed, and indeed from the plotting set forth. It does not suffice that death, although attempted, followed, for example, from the negligence of the wounded person, or from the inexperience or lack of care of the surgeon.

Question 1. How is the impediment of crime multiplied?

Response. It is multiplied: 1° if one of the species of the impediment is verified with regard to several marriages;[2] 2° if several species of the impediment are verified with regard to one marriage,[3] although some judge that in the case in which promise and attempted marriage concur with adultery, there is added only a circumstance to be expressed, but the impediment is not multiplied; 3° if several species of the impediment are verified with regard to several marriages;[4] 4° if, with adultery concurring to constitute the impediment, each party is married,[5] although some again judge that in this case there is added only a circumstance to be expressed, but the impediment is not multiplied.

Question 2. To what extent are infidels bound by the impediment of crime?

Response 1. If each accomplice is an infidel, the impediment does not arise, even if they are afterwards converted.[6]

Response 2. If one accomplice is a faithful person and the other an infidel, the impediment arises if the faithful person also posited those things which are required for the impediment. Therefore the first species of the impediment arises if the faithful person, marriage having been promised, commits adultery with the infidel; the second species, if the faithful person commits adultery and attempts marriage with the infidel; the third species, if the faithful person perpetrates the killing; the fourth species, if the faithful person was a participant in the plotting (St. Alphonsus VI, 1037).

Response 3. If one of the requisites for the impediment had place in infidelity, and the other after Baptism, the impediment does not arise. Except if the promise or attempted marriage happened in infidelity, but the parties after Baptism persevere in it and commit adultery.

Question 3. To what extent can a dispensation be obtained in the impediment of crime?

Response. A dispensation, when a proportionate cause is present, is granted. Nevertheless, if the impediment arises from public spouse-murder, whether one or both plotted, outside danger of death dispensation can scarcely be hoped for.[7]

Note. A dispensation given by the Holy See upon a ratified and non-consummated marriage, or permission made for passage to other nuptials because of the presumed death of a spouse, always carries with it dispensation from the impediment arising from adultery with promise or attempted marriage, if any such is needed, but by no means dispensation from the impediment of which canon 1075, nn. 2, 3 treats, that is, from the impediment of crime of the third and fourth species (canon 1053).

Warning. "Suspicion of an impediment contracted can sometimes be moved by those who during the prior marriage committed adulteries; who a little after the death of the prior spouse fly to second nuptials, especially if the prior spouse was sick for a long time before death; a male servant who is about to enter marriage with his recently widowed mistress; or a recently widowed man who is about to contract marriage with his female servant or with his wife's sister, etc.

With regard to the manner of inquiring, one must proceed cautiously. Concerning occult adultery, it can be asked, for example, whether he already had familiarity with that person while the prior spouse was living; whether he ever indulged too much familiarity with her. If adultery had place with her, let him be asked further whether already then there was speech between them about a future marriage, etc. Concerning occult spouse-murder, it can be asked whether he at any time desired the death of the prior spouse; whether he gave any cause for that person's death. From the responses a prudent confessor will easily detect guilt or innocence."[8]

[1] So, for example, d'Annibale, III, § 447.

[2] For example, Peter first, while his marriage with Anna stands, promises marriage to Titia and commits adultery with her; then, while his marriage with Bertha stands, he again promises marriage to Titia and commits adultery with her.

[3] For example, Peter, while his marriage with Anna stands, promises marriage to Titia and commits adultery with her; then he kills Anna.

[4] For example, Peter, while his marriage with Anna stands, promises marriage to Titia and commits adultery with her; then he kills Anna. The same Peter, while his marriage with Bertha stands, again promises marriage to Titia and commits adultery with her; then he kills Bertha.

[5] For example, Peter and Titia, being married, mutually promise marriage to each other and commit adultery.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, August 23, 1852, ad 5 (Collectanea, n. 1079).

[7] Benedict XIV, Constitution Pastor Bonus, April 13, 1744.

[8] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 745.

Article IX. Consanguinity

We shall speak first about consanguinity according to itself, then about consanguinity insofar as it is an impediment of marriage.

§ I. On Consanguinity according to Itself

791 I. Notion. Consanguinity is nearness between persons arising from this: that by carnal generation they descend either one from the other or jointly from the same proximate stock. It is called "proximate"; for remotely all human beings descend from one Adam or Noah, and yet for that reason they are not called consanguineous. Consanguinity is computed by lines and degrees (canon 96, § 1). Therefore, so that the definition handed down may be more fully developed, three things must be attended to in consanguinity: namely stock, line, and degree.

1. Stock is that person from whom others proceed as from a common proximate root. Commonly the stock consists of two persons, namely parents; sometimes of one person alone, namely if someone begot offspring from several persons.

2. Line is a series of persons descending from the same proximate stock. A twofold line is distinguished: direct and oblique.

The direct line is a series of persons of whom one proceeds from another, either immediately or mediately. It is called descending or ascending according as the series is numbered by descending from those begetting to those begotten, or by ascending from those begotten to those begetting.

The oblique line, transverse or collateral, is a series of persons who proceed from a common proximate stock, but not one from another, as brother and sister, maternal uncle and niece. It is distinguished into equal and unequal, according as two persons are distant from the common proximate stock by an equal degree or distance, as brother and sister, or by an unequal one, as maternal uncle and niece.

3. Degree is the measure of distance of one person from another. But degrees are computed thus:

a) In the direct line there are as many degrees as generations, or as many persons with the stock removed (canon 96, § 2). Thus, for example, a son is distant from his father by one degree, from his grandfather by two degrees. And both civil law and ecclesiastical law follow this mode of computing degrees in the direct line. Otherwise one must speak in the collateral line.

b) In the equal collateral line there are as many degrees as generations in one tract of the line, or there are as many degrees as persons in one tract, with the stock removed. Hence, for example, two brothers are consanguineous in the first degree, two first cousins in the second degree of the equal collateral line.

c) In the unequal collateral line there are as many degrees as generations in the longer tract, or as many degrees as persons in the longer tract, with the stock removed. Thus, for example, a maternal uncle and niece are consanguineous in the second degree of the unequal collateral line.[1] Degrees are computed according to the longer series because the reason of nearness and distance of collateral blood-relatives is taken from the fact that they are united in the common proximate stock. Hence they cannot be more united among themselves than they are united with the stock. But this would occur if the computation had to be made according to the shorter series.

But so that consanguinity may be perfectly exhibited, both the nearer and the more remote degree must be indicated. This is done, for example, if there is question of a maternal uncle and niece, by saying: they are consanguineous in the second degree mixed with the first, or touching the first.

Note. Civil laws which for the direct line follow the same mode of computing as ecclesiastical law, in the collateral line compute the generations of each tract, or the persons of each tract, with the stock removed. Hence, for example, two brothers are consanguineous in the second degree, two first cousins in the fourth, a maternal uncle and niece in the third degree. This mode of computing must be attended to when there is question of civil matter, for example, of the civil effects of marriage, as of hereditary succession.

II. Division. Consanguinity is divided:

1. Into legitimate and illegitimate, according as it arises from conjugal copula or from illicit intercourse. But since in each case there is a natural communion of blood, this division is not attended to in order to contracting marriage.
2. Into full and less full. The former exists among those who have father and mother as common stock; the latter among those who have only father or mother as common stock. The former are called full siblings; the latter consanguineous or uterine, according as father alone or mother alone is their common stock. But neither is this distinction attended to with regard to the impediment.
3. Into agnation and cognation, according as the communion of blood is transmitted through the masculine or feminine line. Those joined in the former way are called agnates; those joined in the latter way cognates.
4. Into simple and multiple. The former is had when two persons have only one common stock and ascend to the stock by only one way. The latter exists when each party has a double or multiple common stock, or each or one of the parties ascends to the same stock by a double or multiple way.
5. Into consanguinity of the direct line and of the oblique line, as was set forth on p. 637.

III. Mode of finding the degrees. The degree of consanguinity is found by making a genealogical tree. This is done thus: if the common stock is known, write that person's name on paper, then below him here and there the names of those descending from him through each line, until you arrive at the persons whose degree of consanguinity is being sought.

If the stock is unknown, first write the names of those whose consanguinity must be detected, then above the name of each put the names of the ascendants, until you arrive at the common stock. Let the schema be:

Benedict

1 Henry Mary 1 2 Robert Rose 2 3 Peter Jacoba 3

Peter and Jacoba are consanguineous in the third degree of the equal collateral line. Peter and Rose are in the third degree of the unequal collateral line, or - so that the consanguinity may be determined in every respect - in the third degree mixed with the second, or in the third degree touching the second.

[1] An unequal degree in the collateral line is called a mixed degree.

792 IV. Multiplication of consanguinity can occur in two ways: 1° by reason of the double or multiple way by which one or the other, or each, of the blood-relatives descends from one common stock; 2° by reason of a double or multiple common stock.

Three causes of multiplication are assigned:

1. The first cause of multiple consanguinity between two persons is that someone among their ascendants has offspring from a person consanguineous to himself. From this cause, indeed, multiple consanguinity can follow both in the first and in the second way: in the second, namely, insofar as besides the nearer common stock there is also another, more remote, common stock, to which one ascends without each line passing through the nearer common stock.[1]

Let the schema for double consanguinity with one common stock be:

Peter

1
2 Luke

1 Rose 1 1 (1) Mark 1 1 (2) Andrew ..... X ..... Clara 2

3 Mary

(3) Lucius 3

1, 1 Nilus

It is asked in what degree, by how manifold a consanguinity, and by what mode of multiplication Lucius and Mary are joined. From this schema it is evident that Andrew and Clara, that is, the father and mother of Lucius, were joined to each other in the second equal degree from the common stock Peter. But hence it happens that their son Lucius is bound with Mary in the third equal degree, not by a single consanguinity, but by a double one, yet not by a consanguinity of double stock but only of one common stock.

For double consanguinity with a double common stock from the same cause, let the schema be:

Mark

1 Luke

2 Mary

Jacob 1

..... X ..... | 3 Peter (2)

2 Paul (1)

(1) Vincent 2 | (2) Flavia 3

It is asked in what degree, by how manifold a consanguinity, and by what mode of multiplication Peter and Flavia are joined. From this schema it is evident that Paul and Mary, namely the father and mother of Peter, were joined to each other in the second equal degree from the common stock Mark. Hence it happens that their son Peter is bound with Flavia in the third equal degree, insofar as Peter descends from the common stock Mark through Mary and Luke, while Flavia descends from him through Vincent and Jacob. Yet the same persons are at the same time joined in the second equal degree from the common stock Jacob, insofar as Peter descends from the common stock Jacob through his father Paul, while Flavia descends from him through Vincent. But since Peter ascends to the more remote stock Mark not only through the nearer common stock Jacob, but also by another way, through Mary and Luke, which does not pass through that nearer stock Jacob, therefore between Peter and Flavia there is a consanguinity of double stock.

The following causes always carry with them multiplication of consanguinity by reason of double or multiple stock.

2. The second cause is that persons consanguineous among themselves have begotten offspring from persons consanguineous among themselves. For example:

Anthony Charles

1 Lucretia ... X ... Paul 1 1 Peter ... X ... Mary 1

2 Jacob (2) (2) Flavia 2

3 Robert (3) (3) Magdalene 3

In this schema there are two brothers, Peter and Paul, who respectively contracted marriage with Mary and Lucretia, two sisters. Hence it happens that the descendants of each of those marriages are mutually doubly consanguineous, by reason of a double common stock: namely, by reason both of Anthony, who is their grandfather or great-grandfather on the father's or grandfather's side, and of Charles, who is their grandfather or great-grandfather on the mother's or grandmother's side. And thus Jacob and Flavia are consanguineous in a double second equal degree; Robert and Magdalene in a double third equal degree.

3. The third cause is that someone successively had offspring from several persons consanguineous among themselves. For example:

John

1 Mary ... X ... Peter ... X ... Anna 1 | | 2 Andrew (1) (1) Robert 2 | | 3 Rosalia (2) (2) Aloysius 3

In this schema John is the father of the sisters Mary and Anna, whom Peter successively knows, and from there the others descend. Therefore Rosalia and Aloysius are doubly consanguineous: first indeed in the second equal degree of the collateral line from the common stock Peter, and then also in the third equal degree of the collateral line from the common stock John.

V. The mode of detecting every consanguinity which exists between two persons is this: let a genealogy of each be made through all ascendants, both fathers and mothers, up to the third degree inclusive. Then apply these things:

1. Persons who occur in each genealogy constitute, individually, the common stock of those whose consanguinity is being sought. Note, however, that a common father and mother constitute one stock.

2. As often as the same person recurs in the same genealogy, so often is consanguinity multiplied, because by so many ways one ascends to that stock.

[1] Cf. Holy Office, March 11, 1896, and February 24, 1899 (Collectanea Brugenses, I, p. 376, and IV, p. 422 sq.).

Scholion. Names of Blood-Relatives

793 There are:

I. In the direct ascending line.

1. Father (vader, padre, pere, father, Vater) and Mother (moeder, madre, mere, mother, Mutter).
2. Grandfather (grootvader, nonno or avolo, aieul or grand-pere, grandfather, Grossvater) and Grandmother (grootmoeder, nonna or avola, aieule or grand-mere, grandmother, Grossmutter).
3. Great-grandfather (overgrootvader, bisnonno or bisavolo, bisaieul, great-grandfather, Urgrossvater) and Great-grandmother (overgrootmoeder, bisnonna or bisavola, bisaieule, great-grandmother, Urgrossmutter).
4. Great-great-grandfather (bet-overgrootvader, trisnonno or trisavolo, trisaieul, grand great-grandfather, Ururgrossvater) and Great-great-grandmother (bet-overgrootmoeder, trisnonna or trisavola, trisaieule, grand great-grandmother, Ururgrossmutter).

II. In the direct descending line.

1. Son (zoon, figlio, fils, son, Sohn) and Daughter (dochter, figlia, fille, daughter, Tochter).
2. Grandson (kleinzoon, nepote, petit-fils, grandson, Enkel) and Granddaughter (kleindochter, nepote, petite-fille, granddaughter, Enkelin).
3. Great-grandson (achterkleinzoon, pronepote, arriere petit-fils, great-grandson, Urenkel) and Great-granddaughter (achterkleindochter, pronepote, arriere petite-fille, great-granddaughter, Urenkelin).
4. Great-great-grandson[1] (abnepote, bisarriere petit-fils, grand great-grandson, Ururenkel) and Great-great-granddaughter[1] (abnepote, bisarriere petite-fille, grand great-granddaughter, Ururenkelin).

III. In the equal collateral line.

1. Brother and sister.[2]
2. Patrueles = children of brothers (volle neven en nichten, cugini carnali, cousins germains, first cousins, Geschwisterkinder or Vettern or Basen).

Consobrini = children of sisters, as above.

3. Sobrini (achterneef, nipote in secondo grado, arriere neveu or petit-neveu, great-nephew, Urneffe) and Sobrinae (achternicht, nipote in secondo grado, arriere-niece or petite-niece, great-niece, Urnichte).

IV. In the unequal collateral line.

1. In the second degree touching the first there are:

a) On one side, namely in the first degree:

a) Paternal uncle (patruus) = father's brother (oom van vaderszijde, zio paterno, oncle paternel, paternal uncle, Onkel).

b) Paternal aunt (amita) = father's sister (tante van vaderszijde, zia paterna, tante paternelle, paternal aunt, Tante).

c) Maternal uncle (avunculus) = mother's brother (oom van moederszijde, zio materno, oncle maternel, maternal uncle, Oheim).

d) Maternal aunt (matertera) = mother's sister (tante van moederszijde, zia materna, tante maternelle, maternal aunt, Muhme).

b) On the other side, namely in the second degree:

a) Nephew (nepos) = son of a brother or sister (neef, nipote, neveu, nephew, Neffe).

b) Niece (neptis) = daughter of a brother or sister (nicht, nipote, niece, niece, Nichte).

2. In the third degree touching the first there are:

a) On one side, namely in the first degree:

a) Great paternal uncle (patruus magnus) = grandfather's brother (oud-oom van vaderszijde, fratello dell'avolo, grand-oncle paternel, great uncle, Grossonkel).

b) Great paternal aunt (amita magna) = grandfather's sister (oud-tante van vaderszijde, sorella dell'avolo, grand-tante paternelle, great aunt, Grosstante).

c) Great maternal uncle (avunculus magnus) = grandmother's brother (oud-oom van moederszijde, fratello dell'avola, grand-oncle maternel, grandmother's brother, Grossoheim).

d) Great maternal aunt (matertera magna) = grandmother's sister (oud-tante van moederszijde, sorella dell'avola, grand-tante maternelle, grandmother's sister, Grossmuhme).

b) On the other side, namely in the third degree:

a) Great-nephew (pronepos) = son of a nephew (achterneef, nipote in secondo grado, arriere neveu or petit-neveu, great-nephew, Urneffe).

b) Great-niece (proneptis) = daughter of a nephew (achternicht, nipote in secondo grado, arriere niece or petite-niece, great-niece, Urnichte).

[1] In Dutch it is indicated by circumlocution.

[2] Brothers and sisters are called: 1° full siblings, if they were born from the same father and from the same mother; 2° consanguineous, if from the same father but from a different mother; 3° uterine, if from the same mother but from a different father.

§ II. On Consanguinity Insofar as It Is an Impediment of Marriage

794 I. The reasons for the established impediment are:

1. Reverence owed to blood-relatives. "Naturally a man owes a certain honor to parents, and consequently to those blood-relatives who draw their origin from the same parents from nearby... But it is manifest according to the things said above (q. 142, art. 4, and q. 151, art. 4) that in venereal acts there especially consists a certain baseness contrary to honor; whence men are ashamed concerning these things; and therefore it is unfitting that such venereal commingling should take place between such persons mutually" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 154, a. 9).

2. The danger of lust to be forestalled. "Persons joined by blood must live together mutually; whence if men were not kept away from venereal commingling, too much opportunity of venereal commingling would be given to human beings, and thus the souls of human beings would be made too soft by lust" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.).

3. Friendship to be promoted. "For while a man takes a wife from outside, all the blood-relatives of the wife are joined to him by a certain special friendship, as if they were his own blood-relatives" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.).

4. Physical harms to be averted from offspring. Now some judge that consanguinity by itself alone produces harmful effects;[1] others deny this,[2] but concede that morbid qualities, which are found in families after the manner of a certain inheritance, are transmitted more easily and in a more intense degree through marriages between blood-relatives.[3]

[1] According to Dr. Rillet the effects of marriages of this sort are: sterility, abortion, monstrosity, epilepsy, imbecility, deaf-mutism, paralysis, etc. According to Dr. Boudin, in the city of Berlin, out of 10,000 Catholics there are found 3 deaf-mutes, out of the same number of Protestants 6, out of the same number of Jews 27. But among the latter blood-relatives are more joined in marriage, and Protestants more than Catholics, as all know (Eschbach, op. cit., p. 100; cf. Garnier, Le Mariage, p. 81; Devey, Des dangers des mariages consanguins; De Katholiek, 1884, p. 30, 173 sq.).

[2] So Dr. Surbled, who for the sake of argument relates these things: "The very precise observations collected on the island of Batz, isolated off Roscoff in Brittany, whose inhabitants, almost all relatives, truly form only one same family under the same bell-tower, demonstrate without reply that consanguineous unions give a strong, robust race, remarkably fruitful and endowed with longevity" (La morale dans ses rapports avec la medecine de l'hygiene, vol. I, chap. XVI).

[3] Dr. Garnier: "Consanguinity must not... be confused with heredity or the transmission of diseases, affections, and constitutional defects, apparent or hidden... This danger exists for all unions tainted by any hereditary defect, for parents transmit to their children, by generation, the morbid predispositions with which they are affected, as they do their qualities and their defects, their physical and moral resemblance. But notable differences are observed in this regard in the results. In unions between unrelated persons, the reaction of contrary, opposed elements tends to neutralize and annihilate morbid germs; all great physicians have observed this, in effect, that chronic, hereditary affections, the deformities of a family, are extinguished and disappear in successive generations through well-made crossings." (Le Mariage, article "Mariages consanguins"). Dr. Surbled: "Performed between diathetic or degenerate persons, a consanguineous union is indubitably pernicious, deplorable, and can give only bad fruits; it unites weakened, sick, deviated constitutions... The grave diseases of ancestors, constitutional diatheses, as is known, have only too manifest a tendency to be transmitted in families. Now morbid consanguinity comes to strengthen this tendency and to accumulate elements of destruction in the generations which succeed one another" (loc. cit.).

795 II. The existence and scope of the impediment are established by these things:

1. In the direct line of consanguinity, marriage is invalid between all ascendants and descendants, both legitimate and natural (canon 1076, § 1). With regard to natural law, consanguinity certainly diriments marriage in the first degree of the direct line, and more probably in every degree. For marriage, which introduces a certain equality, is opposed to the relation of superiority and inferiority which exists between ascendants and descendants.

2. In the collateral line marriage is invalid up to the third degree inclusive (canon 1076, § 2).

With regard to natural law, consanguinity beyond the first degree does not diriment marriage.[1] Concerning the first degree itself, brother and sister, there is dispute. Several judge that such marriages are invalid, apart from the necessity of propagating the human race through the sons and daughters of Adam.[2] But they judge thus both because such marriages obstruct the primary end of marriage, since depraved offspring are accustomed to arise from them; and because admitted validity would give occasion for lust among persons living in the same house. Others admit the contrary, or at least call the matter into doubt, and respond that the integrity of offspring pertains only accidentally to the good of the species, to which marriage is ordered; and that the other reason does not seem so urgent that from it one may conclude to defect of validity.

As to positive law, there are those who judge that marriage between brother and sister is diriment by divine positive law. Others, however, rather deny this, because the Mosaic law has been abrogated, and the evangelical law says nothing concerning it.

Corollary. Marriage between infidels who are blood-relatives, whether in the first degree of the collateral line or in a further degree than the first degree of the direct line, is doubtfully valid. Hence if each, or one or the other, is converted to the faith, the Holy See must be approached.

3. The impediment of consanguinity was restricted by Leo XIII[3] for Indians and Negroes[4] in Latin America and in the Philippine Islands to the second degree of the collateral line. From the declaration of August 16, 1898, this also holds for all the Antilles and the other islands of the Caribbean Sea. We judge that, from the intention of the Legislator, the aforesaid disposition is governed by the law of privilege rather than by the law of a particular law, and therefore, although it is contrary to the general law, it persists.

III. Multiplication of the impediment. Before the current Code, the impediment was multiplied as often as consanguinity itself; but now the matrimonial impediment is multiplied only as often as the common stock is multiplied, or there are as many impediments as there are common stocks (canon 1076, § 2).

IV. Dispensation. The Church cannot dispense in the first degree of the direct line, since it constitutes an impediment of natural law. It is doubtful whether she can dispense in the other degrees of the direct line and in the first degree of the collateral line. In practice, she never dispenses in the aforesaid degrees. Hence canon 1076, § 3: "Marriage is never to be permitted if there is any doubt whether the parties are consanguineous in some degree of the direct line or in the first degree of the collateral line." From this it follows: 1° it can never be permitted to anyone, for example Peter, to marry either a person with whose mother he had copula at such a time before the daughter's birth that every danger of marrying his own daughter is not excluded; or a person with whose mother his father, that is, Peter's father, had copula at such a time before the daughter's birth that every danger of marrying his own sister is not excluded.[5] 2° A Bishop or priest who can dispense in ecclesiastical impediments in danger of death or if all things are ready for nuptials cannot dispense from these impediments. In the other degrees of the collateral line the Church dispenses if a proportionately grave cause is present.

[1] Chapter 8, de divortiis.

[2] In this case there is not a dispensation in the law of nature, because due order requires that the good of an inferior order yield to the good of a superior order.

[3] Constitution Trans oceanum, April 18, 1897.

[4] Who come under the name of Indians and Negroes is taught by the Sacred Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs, May 24, 1898: "Under the name of Indians and Negroes, besides the Indians and Negroes themselves, are also included those who were begotten from an Indian or Negro man and a European woman, or a woman of European blood, and likewise those who were begotten from a European man and an Indian or Negro woman, and therefore are called Mixed, Mestizos, or Mulattoes, and have an absolute half of European blood. But those are not included who draw origin from Indians or Negroes only through a great-grandfather or grandmother, and who are called Quarterones, as having only a fourth part of Indian or Negro blood; and much less those who draw origin from Indians or Negroes only through a great-great-grandfather or great-great-grandmother and are commonly called Puchueles or Pucueles. Moreover, by the name of Indians and Negroes are also understood Africans, Asians, and Oceanians, provided they are not of European blood and are staying in Latin America, although they were not born there."

[5] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918, ad 5 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 346).

Article X. Affinity

796 I. Notion. Affinity is the relationship which arises from a valid marriage, whether ratified only or ratified and consummated, between the man and the blood-relatives of the woman, and likewise between the woman and the blood-relatives of the husband (canon 97, § 1 and § 2). It is said:

1. From a valid marriage. Therefore affinity does not arise from a marriage invalid in any way. Nevertheless affinity is presumed to be present for the external forum if the invalidity of the marriage is not proved (cf. canons 1086, § 1; 1972).
2. Whether ratified only or ratified and consummated. Therefore, in order that affinity arise, it is required and sufficient that the marriage be ratified.

Corollary I. Affinity canonically taken does not arise from a legitimate marriage, i.e., a marriage of infidels, because, with canon 1015, § 1 considered, it is not a ratified marriage. That infidels are not bound by the impediment of affinity is clear, because they are not subject to the Church.

Corollary II. Affinity canonically taken does not seem to arise either from a marriage between a faithful party and an infidel party, or from a marriage contracted between two infidel parties, of whom only one or the other is baptized. The reason is that the aforesaid marriages do not seem to come under the name of a ratified marriage (n. 713); at least there is a doubt of law concerning the existence of the impediment.

Corollary III. Affinity canonically taken arises from a marriage contracted between two infidel parties and, after the baptism of both, persisting, because it comes under the name of a ratified marriage (n. 713).

3. Between the man and the blood-relatives of the wife, and likewise between the woman and the blood-relatives of the husband. Therefore: 1° those who have entered marriage are not affines between themselves. 2° The blood-relatives of the man and the blood-relatives of the woman are not affines between themselves; this is usually expressed in these words: Affinity does not go out beyond those who are joined. 3° The man becomes affine only toward the blood-relatives, and therefore not toward the affines, of the woman; likewise the woman becomes affine toward the blood-relatives of the man, but not toward his affines; this is usually expressed in these words: Affinity does not beget affinity (St. Alphonsus VI, 1069). Moreover, given a marriage either ratified only or ratified and consummated, affinity also exists with respect to the infidel blood-relatives of the other party. Hence, for example, a widower from a ratified marriage cannot, without dispensation, enter nuptials with an infidel who is blood-related within the determined degrees to his deceased Catholic wife.

II. Line and degree of affinity. Affinity is computed in such a way that those who are blood-relatives of the man are, in the same line and degree, affines of the woman, and vice versa (canon 97, § 3). Hence, for example, one who has entered a valid marriage with Anna, the mother of Rosa, becomes affine to

Rosa in the first degree of the direct line, because Rosa is related by blood to Anna in the same line and the same degree; one who contracted with Titia, the paternal aunt of Clara, is affine to Clara in the second degree touching the first in the collateral line, because Clara is related by blood to Titia in the same line and the same degree.[1]

Corollary. From what has been said it follows that two persons can be at once blood-relatives and affines. Thus, for example, one who entered marriage with Bertha, his blood-relative, is both a blood-relative and an affine to Bertha's sister.

III. Existence and scope of the impediment. Affinity in the direct line diriments marriage in any degree; in the collateral line up to the second degree inclusive (canon 1077, § 1). Hence today a widower is not bound by this impediment in the collateral line except with regard to the sisters of his deceased wife (degree 1), paternal aunts, maternal aunts, daughters of a brother or sister (degrees 1 and 2), paternal cousins, paternal-aunt's daughters, and maternal cousins (degree 2); similarly a widow is bound only with regard to the brothers of her deceased husband (degree 1), paternal uncles, maternal uncles, sons of a brother or sister (degrees 1 and 2), paternal cousins, paternal-uncle's sons, and maternal cousins (degree 2).[2] But note that the more remote degree draws the nearer to itself; wherefore affinity is not contracted by one party with the other party's blood-relatives in the third degree, even if this degree perhaps is mixed with the second or first.

Corollary I. "Two brothers can marry two sisters; father and son can marry mother and daughter. A stepson can marry the mother, daughter, or sister of his stepmother; and conversely a stepdaughter can marry the father, son, or brother of her stepfather. The surviving spouses of a deceased brother and sister can contract marriage between themselves. The son of the husband and the daughter of the wife, begotten from prior marriages, can enter marriage between themselves. Someone can successively marry two widows whose deceased husbands were full brothers" (St. Alphonsus VI, 1069).[3]

Corollary II. The impediment of affinity persists even if the marriage is dissolved by death or by another cause.

[1] Before the Code of Canon Law, affinity arose not from marriage as such, but from perfect copula, whether free or violent, whether licit or conjugal, or illicit, as fornication or adultery.

[2] Vlaming, n. 349.

[3] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 763.

797 IV. Multiplication of the impediment of affinity. The impediment is multiplied: 1° as often as the impediment of consanguinity from which it proceeds is multiplied; 2° by repeated successive marriage with a blood-relative of the deceased spouse (canon 1077, § 2). It is said:

1. As often as the impediment of consanguinity from which it proceeds is multiplied; understand this as often as, or when, some person was multiply related by blood to the prior spouse because of a multiple common stock. The case occurs, for example, when the deceased wife of a man was at once the maternal aunt and paternal aunt, or maternal aunt and niece, of that person with whom the man intends to enter nuptials.
2. By repeated successive marriage with a blood-relative of the deceased spouse; for example, Peter successively and validly married Mary and Anna, sisters of Rosa; now he is doubly affine to Rosa in the first degree of the collateral line.

Before the Code of Canon Law, affinity from matrimonial copula dirimented marriage up to the fourth degree inclusive of each line; from fornicatory copula, up to the second degree inclusive of each line.

V. The law by which affinity diriments marriage. Affinity diriments marriage by ecclesiastical law alone; and this, which previously was called into doubt by some, holds even concerning affinity in the first degree of the direct line, indeed even if consummation of the marriage has occurred. It is proved: 1° from canon 1043, which enumerates the aforesaid affinity among impediments of ecclesiastical law; 2° from the fact that the Holy Office[1] absolutely declared: Affinity which is naturally contracted in infidelity from copula, whether licit or illicit, is not an impediment for marriages which are entered in infidelity; 3° from the fact that the Church has already dispensed even in the aforesaid affinity.

VI. Dispensation in affinity of the collateral line is granted for proportionate causes to be assigned later. But in affinity of the direct line, at least in the first degree, it is ordinarily not granted. We have mentioned above the fact of a dispensation granted, though after the marriage had been contracted.[2]

[1] August 26, 1891 (Collectanea, n. 1766); cf. Holy Office, September 4, 1743; February 20, 1888 (Collectanea, n. 1685).

[2] Rescript of the Sacred Penitentiary, December 2, 1911 (Nouvelle Revue Theologique 1912, p. 528).

Scholion. Names of Affines

798 I. In the direct line:

1. Socer = father of the husband or wife (schoonvader, suocero, beau-pere, father-in-law, Schwiegervater).

Socrus = mother of the husband or wife (schoonmoeder, suocera, belle-mere, mother-in-law, Schwiegermutter).

2. Gener = husband of a daughter (schoonzoon, genero, gendre, son-in-law, Schwiegersohn).

Nurus = wife of a son (schoondochter, nuora, belle-fille, daughter-in-law, Schwiegertochter).

3. Vitricus = husband of the mother (stiefvader, padrigno, beau-pere, stepfather, Stiefvater).

Noverca = wife of the father (stiefmoeder, matrigna, belle-mere [maratre], stepmother, Stiefmutter).

4. Privignus = son from a prior marriage of the other party (stiefzoon, figliastro, beau-fils, stepson, Stiefsohn).

Privigna = daughter from a prior marriage of the other party (stiefdochter, figliastra, belle-fille, stepdaughter, Stieftochter).

II. In the collateral line:

1. Levir = brother of the other party (zwager or schoonbroeder, cognato, beau-frere, brother-in-law, Schwager).

Glos = sister of the other party (zwagerin or schoonzuster or snaar, cognata, belle-soeur, sister-in-law, Schwagerin).

2. Sororius = husband of a sister (as was said of levir).

Fratria = wife of a brother (as was said of glos).

Article XI. Public Honesty

799 I. Notion. Public honesty is a certain relationship arising from an invalid marriage, whether consummated or not, and from public or notorious concubinage, between the man and the blood-relatives of the woman, and likewise between the woman and the blood-relatives of the man (canon 1078).[1] It is said:

1. From an invalid marriage, i.e., invalid in any way whatever, whether from a diriment impediment, from defect of legitimate form, or, as it seems, from defect of consent. The reason is that the canon does not distinguish. I said, however, "as it seems" with regard to defect of consent, because the old legislation, according to which a marriage invalid because of defect of consent did not introduce the impediment, gives some persons a reason for doubting.

A merely civil marriage, independently of cohabitation, does not suffice,[2] because in the mind of the Church it lacks even the appearance of marriage.[3] If cohabitation is added, the impediment arises insofar as public or notorious concubinage is added. To what extent this is added will be clear from what must now be said.

2. From public or notorious concubinage. Merely presumed concubinage (cf. canon 133, § 4) does not suffice; nor does occult concubinage. Moreover, note:

a) Concubinage is understood as a relation after the manner of marriage between a man and a woman. Moreover, for concubinage there are required:

Alpha) A permanent or stable relation. For this it certainly suffices if they cohabit; likewise if the woman lives at the man's expense and in a place where he can easily approach her; likewise between two persons between whom intercourse is so frequent and exclusive that it is equivalent to the case just assigned. It does not suffice if the intercourse, however frequent, is not exclusive on the woman's part (a prostitute); nor does carnal intercourse suffice if it is indeed protracted for a long time, but is exercised only from time to time.

Beta) A relation bearing the appearance of a conjugal relation; such a relation exists, for example, in those who have entered what is called a friendly marriage.

Gamma) It is disputed whether carnal intercourse is required or not. But the negative opinion seems to be admitted, and to be drawn from analogy with an invalid marriage, in which abstraction is also made from copula; likewise from comparison with the impediment of affinity, which arises from true marriage as such.[4]

b) Concubinage is public if it has been divulged, or if it has happened or exists in such circumstances that it can and ought prudently to be judged that it will easily be divulged (canon 2197, 1°).

c) Concubinage is notorious by notoriety of law after the sentence of a competent judge which has passed into a thing adjudged, or if the guilty party has confessed it in writing or orally before a competent judge, whether spontaneously or when questioned by the judge (canon 2197, 2°). Concubinage is notorious by notoriety of fact if it is publicly known and was committed in such circumstances that it can be concealed by no tergiversation and excused by no support of law.

Note. This impediment is called that of public honesty because it accords with public honesty; indeed, it is less decent for a man to contract nuptials with the blood-relatives of the other party with whom he contracted a marriage, even though invalid, or lived in public concubinage.

II. Line and degree of public honesty. That relationship is computed in such a way that those who are blood-relatives of the man are, in the same line and degree, relatives of the woman, and vice versa.

III. Existence and scope of the impediment. Public honesty diriments nuptials in the first and second degree of the direct line between the man and the blood-relatives of the woman, and vice versa (canon 1078). Thus, for example, a man cannot contract with the mother or grandmother, nor with the daughter or granddaughter, of a woman with whom he lived in an invalid marriage or in public concubinage.

IV. Multiplication of the impediment. Although the Code is silent concerning the multiplication of this impediment, just as it is silent concerning the multiplication of the impediment of crime, nevertheless it seems that multiplication must be admitted when the titles are multiplied, i.e., marriage or concubinage. Suppose, for example, that Peter lived successively in public concubinage with Anna and Mary, daughters of Christina; the impediment of public honesty between Peter and Christina is multiplied.

V. Dispensation of the impediment. Public honesty in the second degree is an impediment of lesser degree; otherwise it is of greater degree, and therefore dispensation from the impediment is more difficult.

Corollary I. The impediment persists even if the invalid marriage or public or notorious concubinage has ceased.[5]

Corollary II. When an invalid marriage has been convalidated, and likewise when concubinage has been turned into marriage, the impediment of affinity is added, while the impediment of public honesty also, more probably, persists;[6] nevertheless in practice, since it is inferior to affinity, it is to be less attended to.[7]

[1] Before the Code of Canon Law, public honesty arose from betrothals and from ratified marriage. Having arisen from betrothals, it dirimented marriage in the first degree of each line; from ratified marriage, up to the fourth degree inclusive of each line.

[2] Pontifical Commission, March 12, 1929, ad 2 (A.A.S. 1929, p. 170).

[3] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, March 13, 1879 (A.S.S. XII, p. 147; XIII, p. 126).

[4] Cf. Mulders in Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen 1927, p. 181.

[5] Sacred Congregation of the Council, July 6, 1658; December 3, 1667; February 28, 1885.

[6] Sacred Congregation of the Council in the Brixiensis case, December 3, 1667.

[7] Cf. Mulders, in Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1927, p. 183.

800 Corollary III. Insofar as the impediment of public honesty arises from an invalid marriage or concubinage of infidels, it is determined by the following:

1° The impediment does not arise from the marriage or concubinage of two non-baptized persons, because "those who have not received baptism are not bound by merely ecclesiastical laws" (canon 12). But it does arise if the invalid marriage or concubinage endures after the baptism of each party. It is disputed among authors whether the impediment arises if each is baptized after the invalid marriage or concubinage has ceased.[1] But while a public doubt stands, at least by force of canon 15 the impediment can be held as not having arisen.

2° The impediment arises from the marriage or concubinage of a party baptized either from the beginning of the union, or while the union still endures, with a non-baptized party. Thus authors teach almost commonly, relying on this principle: that a disposition directly affecting the baptized party also indirectly affects the non-baptized party, unless the contrary is expressly established. There is added the fact that the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda so declared concerning the impediment of crime.[2]

Note that in order that a marriage to be contracted be dirimented in fact, it is required that at least one of those who enter the marriage be subject to the Church through Baptism. Hence it is rightly established: the impediment of public honesty:

a) Directly diriments the marriage of a baptized party with a person blood-related in the first or second degree of the direct line to the other non-baptized party, whether that blood-related person is baptized or is not baptized.

b) Indirectly diriments the marriage of a non-baptized party with a baptized person blood-related to the other baptized party.

c) It does not diriment the marriage of a non-baptized party with a non-baptized person blood-related to the other baptized party; for in that case neither of the contracting parties is subject to the Church.[3]

[1] Cf. Mulders, loc. cit.

[2] August 23, 1852 (Collectanea, n. 1079).

[3] Mulders, loc. cit.

Article XII. Spiritual Relationship

801 I. Notion. Spiritual relationship is a certain relationship which comes from the ministration and reception of Baptism and Confirmation. Namely, since a human being is spiritually begotten in Baptism and spiritually perfected in Confirmation, therefore spiritual paternity is contracted by those who concur in these sacraments, i.e., by the minister of Baptism and by the sponsors in each sacrament, with respect to the baptized or confirmed person (canons 768, 769, 797).

II. Existence and scope of the impediment. Only spiritual relationship from Baptism diriments marriage, and indeed: 1° between the one baptizing and the baptized person; 2° between the sponsor of baptism and the baptized person (canon 1079). One who performs the office of sponsor through a procurator contracts the impediment himself alone, not the procurator. Therefore the impediment does not exist between the one baptizing and the sponsors, nor between the sponsors among themselves. Moreover, it is in force by ecclesiastical law alone.[1]

III. The required conditions are:

1. On the part of baptism it is required that it be truly and validly conferred. Therefore it does not arise from ceremonies supplied later (canon 762, § 2), nor from Baptism invalidly conferred.

Question 1. Whether the impediment arises from private baptism.

Response. With regard to the one baptizing, all affirm. But there is dispute, or at least there was dispute, with regard to sponsors. Yet it seems that it must likewise be affirmed entirely. For: 1° the law does not distinguish between private and solemn baptism (canon 768). 2° The cited canon has these words: "From baptism only the baptizer and the sponsor contract spiritual relationship with the baptized person." But the words "from baptism," with respect to the baptizer, must be understood of both solemn and private baptism; therefore the same must be said with respect to the sponsor. 3° Canon 762, § 2 says thus: "Even in private baptism a sponsor, if he can easily be had, is to be employed; if he was not present, he is to be employed when the ceremonies of baptism are supplied, but in this case he contracts no spiritual relationship." Therefore, in the prior case, i.e., if the sponsor was present at private baptism, he contracts spiritual relationship. 4° Spiritual regeneration, which is the foundation of the impediment, also arises from private Baptism. The responses of the Sacred Congregation of the Council also concur.[2]

Question 2. Whether the impediment arises from baptism conferred doubtfully or doubtfully validly.

Response. With regard to the sponsor, it must be denied, unless, when baptism is repeated under condition, the same sponsor was employed in each baptism. Outside this case neither the sponsor who was present at the former baptism, nor the one who was present at the later, contracts spiritual relationship (canon 763, § 2); and this holds even if afterward the nullity of one baptism and the validity of the other are established. The same, by analogy, seems to be said of the one baptizing, although the cited canon speaks only of the sponsor.

2. On the part of the one baptizing it is required that he himself be baptized; otherwise the ecclesiastical impediment does not affect him, nor does it seem to affect the other party. For since spiritual relationship is situated in a mutual relation, it seems to affect either each party or neither. Nor does the impediment arise if someone not yet baptized conferred Baptism on someone and afterward himself receives Baptism (n. 757).
3. On the part of the sponsors there are required those things which are necessary for the validity of sponsorship according to what was explained in n. 84.

IV. Multiplication of the impediment can arise only from the fact that someone both baptizes the same person and receives him as sponsor through a procurator.

V. Dispensation of the impediment. It suffices to note that the impediment of spiritual relationship is numbered among impediments of lesser degree (canon 1042).

Note. Spiritual relationship contracted before Pentecost of the year 1918 beyond the limits now defined by the new Code in canon 768 does not cease ipso facto from the aforesaid day of Pentecost with regard to all effects, but only ceases to be an impediment to marriage[3] (cf. n. 86).

[1] Before the Code of Canon Law, the impediment was in force: 1° between the one baptizing or confirming and the baptized or confirmed person and the latter's parents; 2° between the sponsor of Baptism or Confirmation and the baptized or confirmed person and the latter's parents.

[2] April 17, 1603; May 28, 1677; March 5, 1678. The Council of Trent indeed speaks of those who receive from the sacred font; by this it seemed to some that only solemn Baptism was signified. But nothing prevents Baptism as such from being understood by that word, especially because the Council in the preceding words had spoken of those who receive from Baptism. But if you deny this, I would say that the adversaries insisted too much on the letter of the law, against the mind of the legislator, sufficiently clear from the arguments already adduced before the Code of Canon Law.

[3] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918).

Article XIII. Legal Relationship

802 I. The notion was explained in n. 760.

II. Existence of the impediment. Those who by civil law are held incapable of entering nuptials between themselves because of legal relationship arising from adoption cannot, by force of canon law, validly contract marriage between themselves (canon 1080). In order to know whether and between whom this impediment exists, recourse must be had to the civil laws of the country, and the matter must be decided according to their norm.

The diriment impediment is in force in Italy, Spain, Brazil, Bolivia, Colombia, Guatemala, and Peru.[1]

[1] Wernz-Vidal, op. cit., n. 191; Aertnys-Damen, op. cit., II, n. 771.

Chapter IV. On Dispensation from Impediments

We shall speak first of the power, then of the causes of dispensing, then of the petition, and finally of the execution of the dispensation.

Article I. On the Power of Dispensing

§ I. On the Power of the Supreme Pontiff

803 I. The Supreme Pontiff can dispense in all impediments of ecclesiastical law; indeed, since he himself is the legislator, he can validly dispense in them even without a cause. He cannot dispense in impediments of absolute divine law, whether natural or positive, for example in the impediment of impotence. Nevertheless, by vicarious power he can remove certain impediments of conditioned divine law, i.e., those arising from a human will, for example in vows, betrothals, and ratified marriage (St. Alphonsus VI, nn. 1118-1120).

II. In fact the Supreme Pontiff dispenses: 1° never in impediments concerning which it is doubted whether they are of divine law, namely lest he probably strike against a higher law. But the aforesaid impediments are: consanguinity in the direct line beyond the first degree (p. 645), and consanguinity in the first degree of the collateral line (p. 645). Moreover, the Church never dispenses in the impediment of the episcopate; scarcely ever in the impediments of the presbyterate, raptus, and public spouse-murder. In the others she dispenses more or less with difficulty according to the nature of the impediment, as will be explained later.

III. The Supreme Pontiff dispenses through different organs for different impediments, namely:

1. The Congregation of the Holy Office dispenses in the impediments of disparity of cult and mixed religion (canons 247, § 3; 249, § 1), and likewise in those things which perhaps concur with the aforesaid impediments.[2] Moreover, it alone takes cognizance of those matters which, whether directly or indirectly, in law or in fact, turn upon the Pauline privilege (canon 247, § 3).
2. The Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments dispenses, for the external forum, in public impediments which are not occult in fact; likewise in public impediments which are occult in fact but exposed to danger of manifestation; likewise, according to the circumstances, in public impediments which are occult in fact and not exposed to danger of manifestation.
3. The Sacred Penitentiary dispenses for the internal forum in occult impediments; likewise, according to the circumstances, in public impediments which are occult in fact and not exposed to danger of manifestation;[3] likewise it convalidates a dispensation granted by the Sacred Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, but invalidly, because of a concealed circumstance which had necessarily to be manifested and which still remains occult. In addition, the Sacred Penitentiary is also the competent tribunal for the faithful of the oriental rites.[4] Finally, recourse can also be had to the Sacred Penitentiary in the case in which the dispensation exceeds the ordinary faculties of the Major Penitentiary; for he can obtain extraordinary power from the Holy See.[5]

4. The Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide procures dispensations for each forum for places subject to it (cf. canon 252), although even in these places recourse can be had to the Sacred Penitentiary for the internal forum.

5. The Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Church "enjoys all the faculties which the other Congregations possess for Churches of the Latin rite, while nevertheless the right of the Congregation of the Holy Office remains intact according to the norm of canon 247" (canon 257, § 4).

6. In the case in which a twofold impediment, one public and one occult, stands in the way of marriage, or an occult circumstance which must necessarily be manifested, a twofold supplication is to be drawn up: one for the public impediment to the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, the other to the Sacred Penitentiary, as will be explained later.

[1] Although an Ecumenical Council also enjoys the power of dispensing, no discussion is undertaken concerning it, because in fact it is not exercised by a Council.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Consistory, January 21, 1910 (A.A.S. 1910, p. 56).

[3] Cf. Archiv fur katholisches Kirchenrecht, 1922, p. 1 sq.

[4] Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Church, June 26, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 394).

[5] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 787.

§ II. On the Power of Local Ordinaries

Preliminary note. Besides the Roman Pontiff, no one can abrogate impediments of ecclesiastical law, whether impeding or diriment, or derogate from them; likewise no one can dispense in the same impediments, unless this power has been granted by common law or by a special indult from the Apostolic See (canon 1040). Moreover:

804 I. By force of common law, local Ordinaries can dispense as follows:

1. The Ordinary of the place can dispense in impediments which are doubtful by doubt of fact, if there is question of impediments in which the Roman Pontiff is accustomed to dispense (canon 15). He can use this faculty with regard to subjects by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile wherever they are staying, and likewise with regard to vagi actually staying in his territory (canons 201 and 94).

2. When danger of death urges, local Ordinaries can dispense, for providing for conscience and, if the case warrants, for the legitimation of offspring: 1° concerning the form to be observed in the celebration of marriage; 2° concerning all impediments of ecclesiastical law, except the impediments of sacred presbyterate and of affinity in the direct line when the marriage has been consummated. They can dispense their own subjects dwelling anywhere and all actually staying in their own territory. Nevertheless it is required that scandal be removed, and, if the dispensation is granted concerning disparity of cult or mixed religion, that the customary cautions be furnished before the dispensation (canon 1043). It is said:

a) When danger of death urges. The article of death, or a most grave danger of it, is not required; but a grave danger suffices, i.e., such as is required for administering Viaticum. Nor does it matter whether the danger arises from disease or threatens from another cause, for example from shipwreck or from a dangerous operation to be undergone. Finally, it suffices that the danger threaten one or the other contracting party, whether the one who is bound by the impediment or the other.[1] It is no longer required, as formerly, that approaching the Holy See be impossible, since that limitation is no longer added.

b) They can dispense, and indeed both for contracting and for convalidating marriage; but they cannot, by force of common law, sanate a marriage in the root (canon 1141).

c) For providing for conscience and, if the case warrants, for the legitimation of offspring. Therefore it is required that provision be able to be made either for conscience or for the legitimation of offspring, or for both. Either cause taken separately suffices, as is already clear from the words of the canon: "and, if the case warrants, for the legitimation of offspring." I said:

Alpha) Either provision can be made for conscience, namely of both parties or of one or the other party. Moreover, this reason will occur for the most part if the parties about to marry are joined in a merely civil marriage or at least are living in concubinage. It is likewise present if, granted that they neither live in concubinage nor are joined merely civilly, nevertheless such bad relations exist between them that separation has become impossible or difficult. Nor, however, should it be deduced from this that in such a case only sins of the flesh are to be attended to; for the reason of providing for conscience can also arise from another source, for example if it is hoped that the dying person, once marriage has been contracted, will lay aside hatred against the other party or against the other party's blood-relatives, etc.[2] Indeed it is rightly said that the case is present as often as an obligation of marrying has been contracted in itself, for example by contracting betrothals or by seducing the other party under promise of marriage, even if accidentally the obligation should be absent. The Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments[3] declared that the faculty which it had granted on May 14, 1909 was valid not only concerning concubinarii, but also if another cause is present for providing for conscience.

Beta) Or provision can be made for the legitimation of offspring. For legitimation, whether in the ecclesiastical forum or, a few add, in the civil forum alone. Of offspring, i.e., either already born or only conceived. Provision can be made; now from the marriage to be contracted, offspring already conceived and not yet born is born legitimate (canon 1116); by dispensation from the impediment, provision is made for offspring already born, except adulterine or sacrilegious offspring (canon 1031). Yet there are those who in the case do not exclude even adulterine or sacrilegious offspring from legitimation.

d) Concerning the form and concerning all impediments of ecclesiastical law, both diriment and merely impedient, both public and occult, and also multiple, except the impediments of sacred presbyterate and of affinity in the direct line when the marriage has been consummated. Likewise they cannot dispense in impediments concerning which it is doubted whether they are of divine law or not, i.e., in consanguinity in the direct line beyond the first degree, and in consanguinity in the first degree of the collateral line (p. 645). In addition:

Alpha) The power conferred regards each forum, or the dispensation granted is valid for each forum (canon 203, § 3).

Beta) The power also extends itself to vows, for example of not marrying, of virginity, of perfect chastity, etc., although these too are impediments of divine law, yet founded on a human act. The reason is that the Church herself has power over vows, and is judged to have conferred it in these circumstances. A solemn vow, as diriment, is of merely ecclesiastical law.[4]

Gamma) Finally, the power also extends itself to betrothals, because in these circumstances the Church is not undeservedly presumed to have provided for the dying person insofar as she can prudently provide for him; once this is posited, it is reasonably affirmed that the power which the Church has over betrothals has also been conferred. Moreover, betrothals in the posited hypothesis commonly do not bind, because for the most part the other party can be presumed to yield his or her right.

e) Their own subjects dwelling anywhere, i.e., subjects by reason either of domicile or of quasi-domicile.

f) And all actually staying in their own territory, whether vagi or peregrini.

If the parties about to marry are of different dioceses, and there is question of an impediment common to each, such as consanguinity, it suffices that one or the other party be subject to the one dispensing by reason of domicile or quasi-domicile, or be staying in the territory of the one dispensing (St. Alphonsus VI, 1142).[5]

g) That scandal be removed. These words involve only a circumstance of granting the dispensation, and therefore are not judged to be required for validity.

h) That the customary cautions be furnished before the dispensation, if the dispensation is granted concerning disparity of cult or mixed religion. But the cautions are required for the validity of the dispensation (p. 606).

What if the non-Catholic party refuses to furnish the cautions?

Response. Dispensation from the impediment seems excluded, when, besides the tenor of canon 1043, those things which we noted on p. 605 are considered; but recourse to epikeia is not excluded. Once this is admitted, if the Catholic party promises that he or she will provide according to his or her powers for the whole offspring to be educated in a Catholic manner, it is permitted, the cautions of the non-Catholic party being passed over, to proceed to marriage. Thus, saving a better judgment.

[1] Holy Office, July 1, 1891 (Collectanea de Propaganda Fide, n. 1758).

[2] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, May 14, 1909 (A.A.S. 1909, p. 468†) and August 16, 1909 (A.A.S. 1909, p. 656).

[3] August 16, 1909 (A.A.S. 1909, p. 656).

[4] We note these things more by reason of the pastor, the priest assisting according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2, and the confessor, concerning whom there will soon be discussion, than by reason of the local Ordinary, who even in ordinary circumstances can dispense in most vows.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, September 9, 1861 (Collectanea, n. 1222).

805

3. As often as an impediment is detected when all things are already prepared for the nuptials, local Ordinaries can dispense, the things that must be posited being posited, concerning all impediments of which in canon 1043, the same persons and under the same clauses of which in the cited canon (canon 1045, § 1). It is said:

a) As often as an impediment is detected when all things are already prepared for the nuptials. Ecclesiastical nuptials are understood, to be celebrated according to the norm of ecclesiastical law, with publications, examination of the betrothed, etc., having first been made; not civil nuptials or nuptials to be entered before a non-Catholic minister. Moreover, it is not required that the impediment had previously been altogether unknown; it suffices that then for the first time it has been brought to the knowledge of the pastor or Ordinary. Nor is the power of dispensing absent in the case in which the parties about to marry in bad faith concealed the impediment, even in order to obtain a dispensation more easily at the last moment. For the end of the law is not only the good of the parties about to marry, but also the avoidance of grave public evil.

b) They can dispense, and indeed both for contracting and, as canon 1045, § 2 establishes, for convalidating marriage.

c) The things that must be posited being posited; namely, it is required that the marriage cannot be deferred without probable danger of grave evil until a dispensation is obtained from the Holy See. It is said:

Alpha) Of grave evil; but an evil of any kind is understood: infamy, scandal of a merely civil marriage, impossibility of obtaining separation if there is question of concubinarii, etc.

Beta) Until a dispensation is obtained from the Holy See. Therefore recall that there is no obligation of recurring by telegraph or telephone,[1] or of using an automobile or airplane; but that a suitable time can be held to be about fifteen days for Italy, twenty to thirty for other regions of Europe, and forty to fifty days for overseas regions.[2]

d) Concerning all impediments of which in canon 1043 (p. 657). It is disputed whether they can dispense also concerning the form. Some deny this, both because clandestinity is not numbered among the impediments by the Code, and because the preceding canons (1043 and 1044) distinguish the form from impediments. Others affirm it; first because clandestinity was formerly counted among impediments; then because canon 1045 seems to be nothing other than an application of canon 81, by force of which an Ordinary can dispense from all ecclesiastical laws where recourse to the Holy See is difficult and at the same time there is danger of grave harm in delay, provided there is question of a dispensation which the Holy See is accustomed to grant. This opinion is sufficiently probable, and therefore the Church at least supplies.

e) The same persons of whom in canon 1043, i.e., both their own subjects dwelling anywhere and all actually staying in their own territory. With regard to the latter, there is indeed dispute concerning peregrini; but it is affirmed sufficiently probably, because the power seems to regard all whose marriage the Ordinary validly assists, all the more because, in the posited hypothesis, the nuptials are imminent. But he validly assists at the marriage of peregrini.

f) Under the same clauses of which in canon 1043, i.e., it is required that scandal be removed and that cautions be furnished if the dispensation is granted concerning disparity of cult or mixed religion (p. 658).

4. In ordinary circumstances, the Ordinary of the place by force of common law:

a) Can dispense in the impediment of a non-reserved vow, provided the dispensation does not injure a right acquired by others (canon 1313). Now the non-reserved vows impeding marriage are: the vow of virginity, of not marrying, of receiving sacred orders, and of embracing the religious state (canon 1058, § 1); likewise the private vow of perfect chastity and the vow of entering a religion of solemn vows which were not emitted both absolutely and after the completed eighteenth year of age (canon 1309). But the local Ordinary can use this faculty with regard to subjects dwelling anywhere, and with regard to peregrini and vagi actually staying in his territory (canon 1313, n. 1, compared with 94, § 2 and 201, § 3).

b) He can dispense by a certain epikeia, but only insofar as it is necessary, in private reserved vows, "if there is not easy access to the Pope, and in delay there is danger of grave harm; either spiritual, as of violation of the vow, scandal, quarrels, or another sin; or danger of temporal harm, one's own or another's, namely grave infamy of the woman, and similar things" (St. Alphonsus III, 258; cf. canon 81). We said insofar as it is necessary; hence, "if one bound by a vow of chastity is dispensed so that he may marry a certain woman in order to repair her honor, he cannot marry another" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). But the private vows reserved to the Apostolic See are only the vow of perfect and perpetual chastity, and the vow of entering a religion of solemn vows, which were emitted absolutely and after the completed eighteenth year of age (canon 1309). But the power extends itself to the same persons whom we designated under a).

[1] Pontifical Commission, March 1, 1921 (A.A.S. 1921, p. 178).

[2] Secretariat of State, December 16, 1891; Holy Office, August 14, 1892; Pontifical Commission, November 12, 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 662).

806 II. What local Ordinaries can do by force of special indults must be drawn from the tenor of the indults themselves, whether general or particular. General indults are granted for the internal forum by the schedule of the Sacred Penitentiary, which generally are for five years; for the external forum, by the Holy Office for mixed religion, disparity of cult, and sanation in the root; for other impediments, by the Sacred Consistorial Congregation, or through the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide for those subject to it.

Question. Whether the Ordinary of the place can delegate faculties to another, whether in whole or in part, whether habitually or for an act.

Response 1. Certainly he can delegate faculties granted by special indults, whether general or particular, unless the industry of the person has been chosen or subdelegation prohibited (canon 199, § 2).

Response 2. There is dispute with regard to faculties of common law. Some deny it, because the aforesaid faculties, as not emanating from the nature of the office, are not formally annexed to the office, and therefore are not ordinary but delegated by law. But it seems that it must be affirmed, because, with canon 197, § 1 considered, it suffices that the faculty be annexed to the office by the law itself, whether it is said to emanate or is said not to emanate from the nature of the office. But the faculties concerning which there is question are annexed to the office by the law itself. At least the Church supplies.

§ III. On the Power of the Pastor and of the Priest Assisting at Marriage according to the Norm of Canon 1098, N. 2

807 I. When danger of death urges, both the pastor and the priest who assists at marriage according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2, can dispense, the things that must be posited being posited, concerning the form and all impediments of which in canon 1043. They can dispense, I say: the pastor his own subjects dwelling anywhere and all actually staying in his own territory; the assisting priest those whose marriage he assists; nevertheless, by both, the things to be observed being observed (canon 1044). It is said:

1. They can dispense, and indeed both for contracting and for convalidating marriage.
2. The things that must be posited being posited; namely, it is required that not even the local Ordinary can be approached. If the Vicar General can be approached, this must be done, because he comes under the name of the local Ordinary. If another delegated by the Ordinary, who can dispense, is present or can be approached, they are not bound to have recourse to him, because he is not the Ordinary of the place.
3. Nevertheless, by both, the things to be observed being observed, i.e., they can dispense with scandal removed and cautions furnished, if the dispensation is granted concerning disparity of cult or mixed religion (p. 658).

Note. The pastor or assisting priest dispenses for both the external and internal forum.

If the impediment is public, the dispensation is to be granted publicly, i.e., at least before witnesses, unless it is granted concerning the form; and then the pastor or assisting priest is immediately to inform the local Ordinary about the dispensation granted, and it is to be noted in the marriage book (canon 1046).

If the impediment is occult, the pastor or assisting priest dispenses in the non-sacramental internal forum; and the dispensation granted is to be noted in the secret book of marriages, preserved in the episcopal curia, nor is another dispensation for the external forum necessary, even if afterward the occult impediment becomes public (canon 1047).

II. As often as an impediment is detected when all things are already prepared for the nuptials, the pastor, and likewise the priest assisting at marriage according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2, can dispense, the things that must be posited being posited, concerning all impediments of which in canon 1043, but only for occult cases. They can dispense, I say, the same persons of whom in canon 1044, nevertheless by both, the things to be observed being observed (canon 1045, § 3, compared with 1045, §§ 1 and 2).

1. They can dispense both for contracting and for convalidating marriage (canon 1045, § 3, compared with 1045, § 2).
2. The things that must be posited being posited; namely, it is required that the marriage cannot be deferred without probable danger of grave evil, and that the local Ordinary either cannot be approached, or cannot be approached without danger of violation of secrecy.
3. Concerning all impediments of which in canon 1043; likewise, sufficiently probably, concerning the form (p. 657).

4. But only for occult cases. By occult cases are understood cases in which the impediment, of whatever nature it may be, is at least occult in fact.[2]
5. Nevertheless, by both, the things to be observed being observed, i.e., they can dispense with scandal removed and cautions furnished, if the dispensation is granted concerning disparity of cult or mixed religion (p. 658).

Note. The pastor or assisting priest dispenses for both the external and internal forum. But since there is question of occult cases, the dispensation is to be granted in the non-sacramental internal forum; and the dispensation granted is to be noted in the secret book of marriages, preserved in the episcopal curia, nor is another dispensation for the external forum necessary, even if afterward the occult impediment becomes public (canon 1047).

Question 1. Whether a priest delegated by the pastor to assist at marriage has the same faculty of dispensing as the pastor himself.

Response. Some affirm, because the delegate as it were puts on the person of the one delegating, and therefore in these circumstances the same power is presumed to have been granted to him. Others better deny it, because canons 1044 and 1045 are silent concerning him, indeed implicitly exclude him by determining to whom the faculty of dispensing is granted. In practice, when delegating someone to assist, the pastor should grant him the faculty of dispensing as a precaution.

Question 2. Whether the pastor can delegate his faculty to another.

Response. Some deny it, because the aforesaid faculty does not emanate from the office itself, and therefore is not formally annexed to it, but is delegated by law. But it seems that it must be affirmed, because, with canon 197, § 1 considered, for ordinary power it suffices that the faculty be annexed to the office by the law itself, whether it emanates from it or does not emanate from it. At least the Church supplies.

Question 3. Whether the priest assisting according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2 can delegate his faculty to another.

Response. It must be denied, because as such he lacks an office, and therefore has only delegated power; and because he is delegated by law, he cannot subdelegate. Moreover, a faculty of delegating of this sort would not come into use for him, because another priest assisting in this way also receives the faculty from law; these things also hold concerning the confessor.

[1] There is discussion of the cases in which marriage can be contracted before witnesses alone (n. 738 sq.).

[2] Pontifical Commission, December 28, 1927, ad III (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

§ IV. On the Power of the Confessor

808 The confessor sufficiently probably enjoys the same power of dispensing as the pastor and the priest assisting at marriage according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2. The reason is taken from the fact that canon 1044 declares: "The same faculty of dispensing is possessed both by the pastor and by the priest who assists at marriage according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2, and by the confessor." And canon 1045, § 3: "In the same circumstances of things, all of whom in canon 1044 enjoy the same faculty." According to this opinion, therefore, this one distinction is held between the confessor and the pastor and assisting priest: that the confessor can dispense in the internal forum alone, and that sacramental (canon 1044). This opinion, because of the reason adduced, is at least probable with probability of law, and therefore, the Church supplying, safe in practice. Nevertheless observe:

1. A dispensation granted in the sacramental internal forum is not valid for the external forum, even if perhaps the impediment becomes public. Hence:
2. If the impediment is public in fact, and likewise if it is public by nature but occult in fact, yet disclosure is feared, the confessor should see to it that the penitent seeks a dispensation for the external forum, and therefore has recourse to the pastor or his delegate, unless the confessor himself can arrange the whole matter in some way, for example by asking for the manifestation of the impediment outside confession; once this has been done, he will be able to dispense him either as pastor, or, delegation having been requested, as one delegated by the pastor, or, according to the circumstances, as the priest assisting according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2.
3. If the impediment is occult in fact and disclosure is not feared, the confessor should at least bring it about that the penitent permits the informing of the Ordinary and the notation of the marriage in the secret book preserved in the episcopal curia. But it is better to arrange the whole matter as was said under 2.
4. Finally, the confessor cannot delegate his faculty to another, because as such he lacks a canonical office and therefore ordinary power, as was said of the priest assisting according to the norm of canon 1098, n. 2.

Scholion. Things to Be Noted Regarding the Power of Dispensing 809 I. Regarding the interpretation of power.

1. Ordinary power of dispensing and power delegated for the whole range of affairs is to be interpreted broadly; any other power strictly (canons 50; 66, § 1; 200, § 1).
2. To one to whom power has been delegated are also understood to have been granted those things without which the same power could not be exercised (canon 200, § 1); wherefore in the faculty of dispensing there is also included the power of absolving from ecclesiastical penalties, if any perhaps stand in the way, but only for the effect of obtaining the dispensation (canon 66, § 3). Nevertheless, when a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been issued, one excommunicated, personally interdicted, or suspended cannot validly obtain any pontifical favor unless mention of the excommunication is made in the pontifical rescript (canons 2265, § 2; 2275, 3°; 2283).
3. In marriages either contracted or to be contracted, one who enjoys a general indult of dispensing concerning some certain impediment can, unless something else is expressly prescribed in the indult itself, dispense concerning it even if the same impediment is multiple (canon 1049, § 1).
4. One who has a general indult of dispensing concerning several impediments of diverse species, whether diriment or impedient, can dispense concerning the same impediments, even public ones, occurring in one and the same case (canon 1049, § 2).

II. Regarding the use of power.

1. Power conferred for the internal forum can also be exercised in the extra-sacramental internal forum, unless the sacramental forum is required (canon 202, § 2).

2. If the forum for which the power was given has not been expressed, the power is understood to have been granted for each forum, unless from the nature of the matter itself something else is clear (canon 202, § 3).
3. If at any time, with an impediment or public impediments concerning which someone can dispense from an indult, another impediment concurs concerning which he cannot dispense, the Apostolic See must be approached for all; if, however, the impediment or impediments concerning which he can dispense are discovered after the dispensation has been obtained from the Holy See, he will be able to use his faculties (canon 1050).
4. If a petition for dispensation has been sent to the Holy See, local Ordinaries are not to use their faculties, if they have any (canon 1048), unless from a grave and urgent cause; and in this case they should immediately warn the Superior about the matter (canon 204, § 2).
5. If an Ordinary dispenses from an Apostolic indult, he should observe all the rules which the Roman Curia is accustomed to observe.[1]
6. Those who grant a dispensation from power delegated by the Apostolic See should make express mention in the same dispensation of the pontifical indult (canon 1051).
7. Unless the rescript of the Sacred Penitentiary provides otherwise, a dispensation granted in the non-sacramental internal forum concerning an occult impediment is to be noted in a book to be preserved diligently in the secret archive of the Curia of which in canon 379 (canon 1047).

III. Regarding the forum for which the dispensation is valid. A dispensation granted for the external forum is valid also for the internal forum, but not conversely (cf. canon 202, § 1). Nevertheless canon 1047, after the words just cited, "Unless the rescript of the Sacred Penitentiary provides otherwise, a dispensation granted in the non-sacramental internal forum concerning an occult impediment is to be noted in a book to be preserved diligently in the secret archive of the Curia of which in canon 379"; after these words, I say, continues thus: "nor is another dispensation for the external forum necessary, even if afterward the occult impediment becomes public; but it is necessary if the dispensation had been granted only in the sacramental internal forum."

IV. Regarding cessation of power. Unless in their grant the industry of the person has been chosen, or something else has been expressly provided, habitual faculties granted by the Apostolic See to a Bishop or to others of whom in canon 198, § 1 do not vanish when the right of the Ordinary to whom they were granted has been resolved, even if he himself had begun to execute them, but pass to the Ordinaries who succeed him in governance (canon 66, § 2). The cited canon adds: Likewise those granted to a Bishop also belong to the Vicar General.

[1] Sacred Penitentiary, June 1, 1858.

Article II. On the Causes of Dispensing

810 I. Notion. A cause of dispensing, taken generally, is the reason which moves the superior to dispense. But a canonical cause is one which is recognized by law itself, whether written or customary.

II. Necessity of a cause. A dispensation granted without a just cause, even by the legislator himself, is always illicit; and if it is granted by an inferior, it is also invalid (canon 84, § 1).

III. Division of causes. Causes are divided:

1. Into canonical and non-canonical, according as they are legitimately recognized as true causes, or are not recognized, although perhaps they can impel one to dispense.
2. Into final and impulsive. Final causes are those which suffice of themselves, or which efficaciously move the superior, and without which the dispensation would either not be granted at all, or would be granted in another form or under certain conditions and limitations. Impulsive causes are those which do not suffice of themselves, and without which nevertheless the dispensation would be granted, and indeed in the same form.
3. Into honest and infamous, according as they do not rest, or do rest, upon a delict or at least upon the defamation of the parties about to marry.

811 IV. The enumeration and exposition of causes are chiefly contained in the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide.[1] The principal ones are:

1. "Narrowness of place, whether absolute or relative, only by reason of the female petitioner, namely when in the place of origin or even of domicile the kinship of the woman has been so propagated that she cannot find another of equal condition whom she may marry, unless he is a blood-relative or affine, while it would be hard for her to leave her homeland."

Moreover:

a) The place of the female petitioner must be narrow. Hence this cause cannot be alleged simply if it exists only on the part of the man. Besides, the female petitioner must be honorable, even if perhaps she is poor or of lower condition.

b) By place is not understood a parish or civil community, but any aggregation of inhabitants, such as a city, suburb, town, village, or hamlet, sufficiently distinct from other neighboring aggregations, so that one place can contain several parishes, and one parish several places. But if the aggregation is distinct from its neighbors in name and in fact, it does not harm the cause that it is a short distance from the others. Otherwise, as if there is question of a suburb, it is required that it be about twenty minutes distant from the city or village.[2] In addition, in computing distance, account must also be taken of the difficulty of the roads.

c) A place is judged narrow when it does not contain more than 1,500 Catholic inhabitants.[3] Namely, infidels, heretics, and schismatics are not counted; but impious and unbelieving Catholics must be counted. But if the place is larger, yet the woman because of higher qualities cannot easily obtain a man of equal condition, narrowness of place is not indeed alleged simply, but that higher quality itself should be expressed, with the approximate number added of men of the same quality living in the place.

d) It suffices that the place of origin or of domicile be narrow. If one differs from the other and each is narrow, likewise if the place of the bridegroom is the same as the place of the bride or at least narrow, this is usefully expressed. It does not suffice if the place of quasi-domicile is narrow and the female petitioner at the same time has a domicile elsewhere. But when she has no domicile elsewhere, or, having a domicile elsewhere, does not live in it, it can suffice if residence in the place of quasi-domicile is notable and sufficiently firm. Therefore this narrowness of the place of quasi-domicile should be expressed in the supplication, with mention made of the domicile.

e) It is required that the woman be unable to find in the place, whether of origin or domicile, another man of equal condition. It is said: 1° in the place, so that the cause remains even if a man can be had from another place; 2° another of equal condition, which is to be understood broadly, concerning state, age, wealth, religious mind, morals, etc.; 3° be unable to find. It suffices that now she is asked by no one of equal condition, even if previously she had been asked. But if only one or another of equal condition offers himself, the Holy See will easily dispense, although the cause does not exist simply.

2. "The over-adult age of the woman, if, namely, having already passed the twenty-fourth year of age, she has thus far not found a man of equal condition whom she can marry. But this cause does not favor a widow who desires to pass to other nuptials."

a) The female petitioner must not be a widow (cf. nevertheless cause 5).

b) It is required that at the time when the dispensation is granted she has completed the twenty-fourth year. If she has only reached it, the cause as such does not subsist; but the Holy See can nevertheless dispense from benignity. If she notably exceeds the required age, this should be expressed so that the dispensation may be granted more easily. Yet some judge that age beyond the fortieth year does not constitute a cause which suffices of itself.

c) That the female petitioner could have found another man of equal condition no longer prevents the cause from being alleged.[4]

3. "Deficiency or insufficiency of dowry; if namely the woman does not actually have so great a dowry that she can marry an outsider of equal condition, who is neither a blood-relative nor an affine, in her own place in which she stays. This cause urges more if the woman exists as altogether undowered, and a blood-relative or affine is prepared to take her as wife or even suitably to endow her fully."

4. "Lawsuits already arisen concerning succession to goods, or grave and imminent danger of the same. If a woman sustains a grave lawsuit concerning succession to goods of great importance, and no one is present who would take a lawsuit of this kind upon himself and prosecute it at his own expense, except him who desires to take her as wife, a dispensation is customarily granted; for it is in the interest of the republic that lawsuits be extinguished. Closely connected with this is another cause, namely, dowry involved in lawsuits, when the woman is destitute of another man by whose help she may be able to recover her goods. But a cause of this kind suffices only for more remote degrees."

5. "The poverty of a widow who is burdened with numerous offspring, and a man promises to support her. But sometimes help is given to a widow by the remedy of dispensation for this cause alone, that she is younger and is in danger of incontinence."

a) If the children are several and younger, it is better to express the number and age so that the dispensation may be obtained more easily. If the widow is sickly, younger, deprived of parents, etc., these things should be opened up for the same reason.

b) When the widow is not burdened with numerous offspring, this cause does not exist. Nevertheless, if she is younger, about thirty years old, or indeed more advanced in age but in danger of incontinence, hope of obtaining a dispensation is not lacking. Nor is it lacking if there is question of a widower, even one having only a single offspring.

6. "The good of peace; under this name come not only treaties between kingdoms and princes, but also the extinction of grave enmities, quarrels, and civil hatreds. This cause is adduced either for extinguishing grave enmities which have arisen between the blood-relatives or affines of the contracting parties and which would be altogether composed by the celebration of the marriage; or when grave enmities have been in force between the blood-relatives or affines of the contracting parties, and, although peace has already been entered between them, nevertheless the celebration of the marriage would conduce greatly to the confirmation of that peace."

a) Under the name of enmities, more serious lawsuits can also be comprehended.

b) Enmities and lawsuits are understood which arose from elsewhere than from the cause of the intended marriage. Nevertheless, the avoidance of enmities or lawsuits foreseen and to be forestalled by marriage can also be alleged.

7. "Excessive, suspect, dangerous familiarity, and also cohabitation under the same roof, which cannot easily be impeded."

These things do not seem to be understood in such a way that dangerous familiarity or cohabitation which is not suspect is not judged to be a cause for seeking a dispensation; all the more because otherwise this seventh cause is not sufficiently distinguished from the ninth cause. The former seems chiefly to rest upon danger of sinning, the latter upon infamy.

8. "Copula previously had with a blood-relative or affine or another person laboring under an impediment, and pregnancy and therefore legitimation of offspring, so that provision may be made for the good of the offspring itself and for the honor of the woman, who otherwise would remain unmarried. This indeed is one of the more urgent causes."

a) These things are commonly understood of public copula or copula soon to be divulged. Nevertheless even occult copula can be alleged, if it is in the woman's interest to marry the man with whom she had copula, for example because of further dangers of incontinence or quarrels between the families of the petitioners to be forestalled.

b) It is said, "who otherwise would remain unmarried"; there can be added: or would not obtain a man of equal condition.

9. "Infamy of the woman arising from suspicion that she, being too familiar with her blood-relative or affine, has been known by the same, although the suspicion is false; namely when, unless marriage is contracted, the woman would remain gravely defamed or unmarried, or would have to marry a man of unequal condition, or grave harms would arise."

10. "Revalidation of a marriage which was contracted in good faith and publicly, with the form observed...; because its dissolution can scarcely take place without public scandal and grave harm, especially to the woman. But if the betrothed entered nuptials in bad faith, they in no way deserve the grace of dispensation, as the Council of Trent disposes."

a) It is said in good faith, namely at least on the part of one or the other.

b) Today in a case of bad faith a dispensation is granted more easily than formerly.

11. "Danger of mixed marriage, or of marriage to be celebrated before a non-Catholic minister. When there is danger that those wishing to contract marriage in some degree, even one of the greater degrees, because of denial of the dispensation, may approach a non-Catholic minister for celebrating the nuptials, with the authority of the Church spurned, a just cause of dispensing is found, because there is present not only the gravest scandal of the faithful, but also fear of perversion and defection from the faith of those acting in this way and despising matrimonial impediments, especially in regions where heresies run riot with impunity." Likewise a dispensation can be granted "to those Catholics who put forward no other motive than mad love, and at the same time it is foreseen that, if the dispensation is denied, they will enter marriage before an infidel judge... The same must be said of the danger that the Catholic party might dare to celebrate marriage with a non-Catholic."

There is question of a particular danger, for example with the character of the parties about to marry considered, not only of a common danger which arises from the fact that somewhere there are many heretics and many mixed marriages have already been contracted. Nevertheless a common danger can be an impulsive cause. It should be indicated whence the existence of the danger is deduced.

12. "Danger of incestuous concubinage. From the above-mentioned Instruction of the year 1822 it is clear that the remedy of dispensation is to be applied lest someone be defiled in concubinage with public scandal and evident danger to eternal salvation."

13. "Danger of civil marriage. From what has been said it follows that the probable danger that those who seek a dispensation, if it is not obtained, are going to celebrate only a civil marriage, as they say, is a legitimate cause of dispensing."

14. "Removal of grave scandals"; under this name are comprehended not only sins of lust, but also other sins, such as hatreds, etc.

15. "Cessation of public concubinage."

16. "Excellence of merits, when someone has deserved very well of religion either by fighting against the enemies of the Catholic faith, or by liberality toward the Church, or by learning, virtue, or in some other way."

a) Great merits are understood, the species of which is to be indicated. To the doubt whether, in defect of other causes, the offering of some alms in favor of the poor and of the church can be held as a legitimate and sufficient cause, the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, April 1, 1816, responded: Negative. Moreover, the merits of ancestors can also be alleged; indeed, even strangers can bring forward their merits in order to obtain a dispensation for a client.

b) To this can be referred the case in which noble petitioners, or at least petitioners of a very honorable family, being unable or unwilling to allege any canonical cause, simply allege their state and the quality of their family, asking that they be dispensed "from certain reasonable causes moving their mind." When a dispensation of this kind, which because of defect of some expressed cause is called "without cause," is granted to petitioners of this kind, a certain greater pecuniary composition is imposed on them, to be expended by the Supreme Pontiff for pious uses. Nevertheless, a dispensation cannot be sought in this way from the Sacred Penitentiary, nor from the Bishop, although the latter may be equipped with delegated faculties.[5]

The cited Instruction concludes with these words: "These are the more common and more important causes which are customarily adduced for obtaining matrimonial dispensations; concerning them theologians and interpreters of the sacred canons treat copiously." Therefore there are also other causes, of which some are less common, while others are indeed less powerful, but nevertheless are judged impulsive; indeed, taken together they can suffice.

Less common causes are, for example, royal dignity; princely prerogative; conservation of an illustrious family in the same blood; conservation of goods in the same illustrious family. For it is in the interest of the public good that an illustrious family not perish or fall from its state.[6]

Less powerful causes, but nevertheless impulsive, are, for example, conservation of goods in a non-illustrious family; orphanhood of a girl, i.e., a girl deprived of one or both parents; a girl who, by contracting with a blood-relative, could assist poor or sickly parents; a girl who, because of deformity, physical infirmity, illegitimate birth, or the infamy of her family, would scarcely find a husband not joined to her; the condition of a ward, i.e., of a girl whose interest it is to marry a man joined to her; narrowness of place or insufficiency of patrimony with regard to the man; over-adult age with regard to a widow; notable improvement of fortune with regard to a girl otherwise sufficiently endowed; parents of the petitioners burdened, besides the male or female petitioner, with several other children; mixture of goods, or the inconveniences which would follow the division of goods hitherto mixed; contiguous goods of the petitioners; vehement desire of the parents; special equality of condition between the petitioners; nuptials already prepared in ignorance of the impediment.[7]

[1] May 9, 1877 (Collectanea, n. 1470); the praised Instruction enumerates 16 causes; but 28 causes are listed by the catalogue contained in the document inscribed: Formulae Apostolicae Datariae pro matrimoniis iussu Em. Card. Caietani Aloisi Masella reformatae.

[2] Sacred Dataria to the Sacred Congregation of the Council, March 8, 1884; cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, July 8, 1876.

[3] Sacred Dataria, August 30, 1847; March 8, 1884.

[4] Sacred Penitentiary, April 5, 1902.

[5] Vlaming, II, n. 438.

[6] Pompen, n. 50.

[7] Vlaming, II, n. 439.

812 V. Cause required for dispensation. Generally, dispensation is granted more easily in affinity than in consanguinity, more easily in public honesty than in affinity. Moreover:

1. A most grave cause or several grave causes are required by: age required by ecclesiastical law; crime when each party or one or the other is plotting; a degree of consanguinity with which the first is mixed; the first degree of affinity in the transverse line.[1]
2. Less grave causes, indeed any of the canonical causes, suffice for impediments of lesser degree, which are: 1° consanguinity in the third degree of the collateral line; 2° affinity in the second degree of the collateral line; 3° public honesty in the second degree; 4° spiritual relationship; 5° crime from adultery with promise of marriage or attempted marriage, even by a merely civil act (canon 1042, § 1).

All impediments not listed here are of greater degree, both diriment and merely impedient; and since no impedient impediment is numbered among impediments of lesser degree, all are of greater degree (cf. canon 1042, § 3).

Several authors indeed judge that the distinction between impediments of greater degree and lesser degree is to be applied only to diriment impediments. But this is little approved, since the whole chapter to which canon 1042 belongs treats of impediments in general.

3. The other impediments require a grave cause.

Note. It should be advised that one who seeks a dispensation set forth all the causes which militate for granting the dispensation.

[1] Vlaming, II, n. 440.

Article III. On the Petition for a Dispensation

§ I. On the Person Petitioning

813 Although petitioners can recur immediately to the Superior, nevertheless in ordinary practice the dispensation is petitioned in their name by the pastor or by the confessor: by the pastor, if the dispensation must be sought for the external forum; by the confessor, if it must be sought for the internal forum. Hence the confessor who detects an impediment whose dispensation must be sought for the external forum should send the penitent back to the pastor. I said:

I. The pastor should petition for a dispensation which must be sought for the external forum; when, however, a dispensation must be sought for the external forum has been explained on p. 655. In the case in which the petitioners belong to different parishes, whether of the same or of different dioceses, the dispensation is to be petitioned:

1. If the impediment is proper to one or to both parties, for instance if one or both are bound by a public vow, through the respective pastor. But if the petitioners belong to different dioceses, he should recur to their respective Bishop.
2. If the impediment is common or correlative, as when there is question of consanguinity, affinity, etc., by common usage the pastor of the bride is accustomed to petition for the dispensation; nevertheless he should not omit to ask the pastor of the bridegroom whether he thinks anything should be noted. But if the petitioners are of different dioceses, the dispensation of one Bishop suffices, because when the impediment is removed on the part of one, the other party also becomes free.[1] Finally, if one party is non-Catholic, the dispensation should be petitioned by the pastor of the Catholic party, and recourse should be had to this party's Bishop.

II. The confessor should petition for a dispensation which must be sought for the internal forum. When, however, a dispensation must be sought for the internal forum has been explained on p. 655. Besides:

1. If the impediment is proper to one or to both parties, for instance if one or both are bound by a private vow, the dispensation should be petitioned through the respective confessor, and therefore by the same confessor if both petitioners approach the same confessor.
2. If the impediment is common, as when there is question of the impediment of crime, the dispensation should be petitioned by the confessor who has detected the impediment, unless the confessor of the other party has already undertaken that matter.

III. The pastor or confessor should petition for the dispensation in the name of those about to marry, and indeed: 1° if the impediment is proper to one party, in the name of this one alone; 2° if it is proper to both parties, in the name of the bridegroom and in the name of the bride individually; 3° if it is common or correlative, in the name of both parties together. If, however, only one party is Catholic, it should be petitioned in this one's name alone.

Finally, a dispensation can also be petitioned with the parties unaware; nevertheless it should not be petitioned in this way unless it is better that the impediment not be made manifest to them except together with the dispensation obtained (St. Alphonsus VI, 1145).

[1] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, September 4, 1839.

§ II. On the Person to Be Approached for the Petition

814 I. If there is question of a dispensation to be granted for the public forum, and it can be granted by the Ordinary, it should be sought from him. If it cannot be granted by the Ordinary, the petition should nevertheless be sent to the Ordinary, who is to transmit it to the Holy See.

II. If the matter is of a dispensation to be granted for the internal forum, and it can be given by the Ordinary, it should likewise be obtained from him. Except the case in which the infamy of the petitioners or the sacramental seal stands in the way, and the consent of those whose interest is involved is lacking (n. 817); in that case recourse should be had to the Sacred Penitentiary.

III. If a dispensation must be sought for both forums, one should proceed as is explained in n. 817.

Note. A petition to be directed to the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments or to the Congregation of Propaganda Fide should begin: "Most Blessed Father"; one to be directed to the Sacred Penitentiary: "Most Blessed Father," or "Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord," or also "Most Eminent Prince." The outside address should be: for letters to the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments: To the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord Cardinal N., Prefect of the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, Rome (these things are to be expressed in a living language); for letters to the Congregation of Propaganda Fide: To the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord Cardinal N., Prefect of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide, Rome (these likewise in a living language); for letters to the Sacred Penitentiary: To the Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord N., Cardinal Major Penitentiary, Rome (again in a living language). Finally, the letters are to be transmitted after the postal expenses have been paid.

§ III. On Drafting the Petition

815 Letters to be directed to the Sacred Congregations can be composed in Latin, Italian, French, German, Spanish, English, and Portuguese; letters to the Sacred Penitentiary can be composed in any language. Nevertheless it is better to use the Latin language.

With these points noted, we will speak specifically of those things which, with the style of the Curia considered, that is, with the will and practice of the Congregation to which the petition is directed considered, must be expressed, and which are contained especially in the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide dated May 9, 1877. First, however, we will speak of the petition by which a dispensation is sought for the external forum; then of the petition by which a dispensation is obtained for the internal forum; finally of the petition which regards a marriage invalidly contracted.

Point I. On the Petition by which a Dispensation Is Sought for the External Forum

The things to be expressed regard: 1° the persons of the petitioners; 2° the impediments; 3° various circumstances; 4° the cause or causes for dispensing; 5° the state of fortune of the petitioners.

816 I. The persons of the petitioners. There should be expressed:

1. The name and surname of the petitioners, each to be written distinctly and clearly and without any abbreviation of letters.

2. The diocese of origin or of actual domicile of the petitioners.

817 II. The impediments. There should be expressed:

1. "The species, even the lowest species, of the impediment; whether it is consanguinity or affinity; in the impediment of public honesty, whether it took its origin from an invalid marriage or from public or notorious concubinage; in the impediment of crime, whether it came from spouse-killing with a promise of marriage, or from spouse-killing with adultery, or from adultery alone with a promise or attempted marriage; in spiritual relationship, whether it is between the sponsor and the baptized person or between the baptizer and the baptized person."[1]

2. The degree of consanguinity or affinity or public honesty, and whether it is simple or mixed, not only the more remote degree but also the nearer one, as also the line, whether it is direct or transverse, and likewise whether the petitioners are joined by a double bond of consanguinity, both on the father's side and on the mother's side.[2]

3. The number of impediments, for example if there is double or multiple consanguinity or affinity, or any other impediment whatever, whether diriment or impedient. Therefore if several impediments concur, ordinarily all must be expressed in one and the same petition.[3] The reason is that the more numerous the impediments are, the more difficultly a dispensation is granted; wherefore all must be opened at least to one dispenser (St. Alphonsus VI, 1139). Conformably to this doctrine:

a) If even one of the impediments can be relaxed by the Holy See alone, ordinarily the Holy See must be approached for all (canon 1050). I said "ordinarily"; for, with the cited canon considered: 1° If with an impediment from which the Holy See alone can dispense there concurs either a public impediment from which the Ordinary can dispense by ordinary power, or an occult impediment from which he can dispense in any way whatsoever, then the Ordinary can dispense separately in the impediment of his competence, recourse having been made to the Holy See for the other impediment. 2° If the impediments over which the Ordinary can dispense are discovered after the dispensation has been obtained from the Holy See, the Ordinary will always be able to use his faculties, that is, even if with the impediment to be relaxed by the Holy See there concurs a public impediment in which the Ordinary can dispense by indult. It is said "after the dispensation has been obtained," that is, after the rescript of dispensation has been received, whether in gracious form or, as it seems should be added, in commissory form, because even in this case the dispensation seems able to be said to have been obtained from the Holy See.

b) If a public impediment and an occult impediment which cannot be opened without infamy or injury of the seal stand in the way of marriage, a twofold petition is needed, one for the external forum, the other for the internal forum, unless the petitioners permit all things to be manifested for the external forum. In that hypothesis, in the petition for the external forum only the public impediments should be expressed; in the petition for the internal forum both the public and the occult impediments should be expressed, adding that a dispensation from the public impediments has been or will be sought for the external forum.

If both petitions cannot be sent to the same Ordinary without infamy of the petitioners or injury of the seal, either consent should be sought for expressing all things in the petition for the external forum, in which case there should be added that this is done by consent given;[4] or the petition for the internal forum should be sent directly to the Sacred Penitentiary.[5]

[1] Cited Instruction.

[2] Cited Instruction.

[3] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, April 15, 1853, and canon 1050.

[4] Vlaming notes: "That practice, namely, of making mention of the occult impediment in the supplication for the external forum, pleases me especially little because I do not see how it will not happen that mention of the occult impediment will then occur also in the rescript; but rescripts of the external forum are customarily preserved in the parochial archive or elsewhere; thus therefore the occult impediment, for the most part arising from sin (crime) or at least pertaining to the forum of conscience (a private vow), is in a certain way handed down to posterity" (II, n. 447).

[5] According to what was said under a), public impediments in which the Ordinary can dispense by ordinary power are not necessarily expressed in the petition; indeed, it is even disputed whether this is ever required for validity.

818 III. Circumstances. 1. Circumstances of age and condition are not to be expressed except insofar as they are alleged as a cause for dispensing.

2. The same must be said concerning copula perhaps admitted; and by force of the decree of the Holy Office of June 25, 1885 this also holds concerning incestuous copula, which formerly had to be expressed even if it was not alleged as a cause. From the same decree, the hope or malicious intention of obtaining a dispensation more easily by copula or some other crime must now not be expressed, at least if copula is alleged as a mere circumstance; if it is alleged as a cause, it is disputed whether the malicious intention must be expressed. Some affirm this, because the Decree of the year 1885 explicitly speaks only of copula and malicious intention as mere circumstances, but not of the case in which copula is alleged as a cause of dispensation. Others deny it, with both the benign mind of the Holy See and the formulas of dispensations considered, in which there is no mention of malicious intention, even if copula has been alleged as a cause. Whatever the case, by force of the decree of the Holy Office of March 18, 1891, "matrimonial dispensations over any impediment whatever, whether there is question of marriages invalidly contracted or to be contracted, are valid, even if copula or the plan and intention of obtaining the grace more easily through it have been kept silent."

3. The circumstance of offspring, whether already born or conceived, must be expressed only insofar as this is necessary for legitimating the offspring; that is, it must be expressed: 1° if there is offspring already born or to be born before the subsequent marriage, and there is question of adulterine or sacrilegious offspring, because it is legitimated neither by subsequent marriage (canon 1116) nor by dispensation (canon 1031); 2° if there is offspring already born or to be born before the dispensation has been fulminated, and there is question of a dispensation to be granted by rescript in a particular case, because even in this case the offspring is legitimated neither by subsequent marriage nor by dispensation (the cited canons).

4. The circumstance of a marriage to be contracted or already contracted invalidly. If it has already been contracted, several things must be added, as is explained in n. 822.

819 IV. The causes for dispensing should be set forth clearly and briefly.

820 V. The state of fortune must sometimes be expressed, for instance so that the Congregation may be able to judge in what form it should dispense: in the form of the poor or in the form of the rich, or, setting aside form, altogether gratis. If it is granted in the form of the poor, a minimal tax or composition[1] is required, which is determined with the nature and degree of the impediment considered, together with an agency fee proportioned to the tax. If it is granted in the form of the rich, a tax is required which is determined with the nature and degree of the impediment and the fortune of the petitioners considered, together with an agency fee proportioned to the tax. If the petitioners are "miserable," as it is said, nothing at all is required. Moreover, the tax or composition is imposed both by way of a fine to recompense the wound inflicted on the law by the dispensation, and so that the Holy See may be able to pay the stipends of officials or promote other good works. Therefore:

1. The state of fortune must be expressed in obtaining dispensations from the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, which observes the distinction between rescripts in the form of the rich and in the form of the poor. It should be set forth how much the male petitioner and the female petitioner possess in reality, and what they hope for from the succession of ascendants, debts, however, being deducted; nevertheless one must not proceed scrupulously. In addition, a dispensation granted in the form of the poor is valid even if the petitioners are not poor;[2] nevertheless they are bound to pay or supply the rights defrauded.

Note. In practice the state of fortune is rather often expressed in letters directed to the Ordinary, through whom the dispensation is obtained from the Holy See.

2. The state of fortune is not expressed for dispensations to be obtained from the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide or from the Sacred Penitentiary; these Congregations do not impose a tax or composition.[3] Only postal expenses must be paid and, unless the rescript is obtained through a person residing at Rome and conducting the business of the Bishop, the rights of the Agent. Nor must the state of fortune be expressed for dispensations to be sought from the Holy Office, which requires a fixed tax and also grants reduction for circumstances. Moreover, although in the cases explained the state of fortune need not be expressed, and even poverty erroneously or falsely alleged does not obstruct the value of the dispensation, nevertheless the petitioners, as we noted above, must pay or supply the rights defrauded.
3. Nor must the state of fortune be expressed if the dispensation is obtained from the Bishop; namely, "except for some modest payment by title of chancery expenses in dispensations for non-poor persons, local Ordinaries or their officials, any contrary custom being reprobated, cannot, on the occasion of a dispensation granted, exact any emolument, unless this faculty has been expressly given to them by the Holy See; and if they have exacted it, they are bound to restitution" (canon 1056).[4]

[1] The distinction between tax and composition has practically been removed; likewise the distinction between the truly poor and the almost poor.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, September 9, 1679; Sacred Penitentiary, August 7 and December 3, 1852; Ordo servandus, part 1, chapter XI, 3°.

[3] Ordo servandus, part 1, chapter XI, 150; the other part, chapter VIII, article 1, 3°.

[4] A privilege perhaps conceded in this matter perseveres even after the Code has been introduced (canon 4).

Point II. On the Petition by which a Dispensation Is Sought for the Internal Forum

821 The same things are to be expressed as in the petition for the external forum, with these exceptions. The petitioners are designated by fictitious names, for example Titius and Bertha. The diocese of the petitioners and the state of fortune are omitted; but the place to which the rescript is to be sent should be accurately indicated.

For convenience there follow:

Forms Of Petitions.

I.

For The External Forum.

(Your Most Reverend Excellency).[1]

Peter N., of the diocese of N., and Anna N., my parishioner, desire to enter marriage; but they are bound by the impediment of consanguinity in the second degree touching the first. They humbly petition that a dispensation be granted to them. (If offspring has been born or conceived, let there be added: They also obtain the legitimation of the offspring.)

The causes are:

And God...

N. N., pastor at... Diocese...

II.

For The Internal Forum.

Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord.

Caius and Caia desire to enter marriage; but they are bound by the impediment of consanguinity in the second degree touching the first, a dispensation from which impediment is being sought in another petition for the external forum. Besides, they are held by an occult impediment contracted from adultery and from a promise of future marriage made mutually to each other during the marriage by which one or the other, or both, parties were formerly bound. They humbly petition that a dispensation be granted to them.

The impediment is altogether occult.

The causes are:

May Your Eminence deign to direct the response to me, the undersigned confessor.

[1] If the Ordinary is able to dispense.

Point III. On the Petition which Regards a Marriage Invalidly Contracted 822 I. First, these things hold: If a dispensation is sought for the external forum, those things must be expressed which we said must be expressed in the petition for the external forum; if a dispensation is sought for the internal forum, those things must be indicated which we noted must be indicated in the petition for the internal forum.

II. Then, concerning the marriage itself, various things must be expressed according as there is question of simple convalidation or of sanation in the root (n. 830 sq. and 833).

1. If there is question of simple convalidation, there must be opened whether the petitioners, or one or the other, contracted the marriage in good or bad faith; whether, with the banns having been published, or if omitted, whether with the banns duly dispensed, they contracted according to juridical form; finally whether both, or one or the other, consummated the marriage in good or bad faith.[1]

2. If there is question of sanation in the root, besides those things to be indicated for obtaining simple convalidation, it should be indicated whether the conditions required for acquiring sanation in the root are present (n. 833).

[1] Cited Instruction, p. 673.

Scholion. On Healing Defects of a Dispensation

823 I. A dispensation can be vitiated, that is, rendered void, either by subreption or concealment of the truth, or by obreption or exposition of what is false.

II. A dispensation is in fact rendered void or is not rendered void as follows:

1. No dispensation is rendered void because of an error in the name of the person to whom or by whom it is granted, or of the place in which that person remains, or of the thing of which there is question, provided that, in the judgment of the Ordinary, there is no doubt about the person or the thing itself (canon 47).

2. A dispensation granted from a lesser impediment (n. 812) is rendered void by no defect either of obreption or of subreption; and this holds even if the sole final cause set forth in the prayers was false (canon 1054). Likewise and a fortiori the dispensation is valid even if the sole final cause set forth in the prayers ceased before the concession or fulmination of the dispensation. In addition, since no obreption or subreption obstructs validity, a dispensation from a lesser impediment is valid even when another impediment, whether of the same or of another species, has been kept silent; hence in the case only a supplementary dispensation is required for that other impediment.

3. A dispensation from the impediment of consanguinity or affinity, granted in some degree of impediment, is valid, although an error about the degree crept into the petition or the concession, provided the degree really existing is lower, or although another impediment of the same species in an equal or lower degree has been kept silent (canon 1052).

Corollary. If the dispensation was given in an impediment of a greater degree and an impediment, whether of another species or of the same species in a higher degree, has been kept silent, the dispensation is invalid, and a new dispensation of all the impediments is required.

4. Even if there is question of an impediment of greater degree, concealment of the truth or subreption does not obstruct the validity of the dispensation, provided those things have been expressed which, according to the style of the Curia, must be expressed for validity; nor does exposition of what is false or obreption obstruct it, provided either the sole cause proposed or at least one motivating cause from among several proposed causes is true (canon 42). In doubt whether a cause falsely alleged is motivating or impulsive, and likewise whether a motivating cause is true or false, one must stand for the validity of the dispensation (St. Alphonsus VI, 1133). Finally, as was said under 2, a dispensation from a lesser impediment is valid even if the sole motivating cause set forth in the prayers is false.

5. A dispensation in an occult impediment is void if the impediment is not occult, except in a dispensation in an impediment of lesser degree.

Note. For a dispensation to be valid, it suffices that those things which must be expressed for validity be present: in rescripts without an executor, at the time when the rescript is given; in other rescripts, at the time of execution (canon 41).

824 III. When a defect of the dispensation has been detected, letters Perinde valere, that is, letters by which the defect is healed and it is declared that the letters of dispensation are valid just as if they had been valid from the beginning, should be petitioned if they can be obtained. I said, "if they can be obtained"; wherefore note that letters of this kind are not granted if a final cause has been falsely alleged, unless both the false cause and the one which truly exists tend to the same end. Otherwise a simply new dispensation is required. Besides, concerning the petitioning of letters Perinde valere, observe:

1. In the petition: 1° the prior petition is repeated substantially or integrally, with the substance of the prior grace also added; 2° the cause of nullity is indicated, adding whether perchance a marriage has been entered in the meantime; 3° convalidation of the dispensation is to be obtained, and a new dispensation if another impediment has been added.

2. The petition must be made for the external forum or for the internal forum or for both forums, as follows:

a) Even if the prior dispensation was sought for the external forum alone, but the defect pertains to the internal forum, convalidation should be sought in the internal forum, and indeed in the way in which the petition is made if a public and an occult impediment stand in the way of marriage (n. 817).

b) If the prior dispensation was sought for the internal forum alone: 1° if the defect pertains to the same forum, convalidation should be sought for the same internal forum; 2° if the defect pertains to the external forum, a dispensation should be sought for this same forum, but convalidation of the dispensation obtained should be sought for the internal forum.

c) If the prior dispensation was sought for both forums, a public defect must be healed for both forums, an occult one for the internal forum alone.

3. The Bishop cannot grant letters Perinde valere for convalidating a dispensation granted by the Holy See, even if he himself could have granted the dispensation (cf. canon 1050). Except: 1° when and insofar as he has received a special indult; 2° the case of urgent necessity, so that recourse cannot be had to the Holy See (cf. canon 1045, § 1; canon 81).

IV. If the letters Perinde valere are invalid, letters Perinde valere upon another perinde valere must be petitioned.

Warning.

The Council of Trent says thus: "In contracting marriages, either no dispensation at all is to be given, or rarely, and that from a cause and gratis."[1] Moreover, although this practice has been mitigated, dispensations are nevertheless wounds inflicted on ecclesiastical discipline.[2] Hence pastors and confessors should observe these words of the Provincial Council of Utrecht: "Let them beware especially lest they themselves furnish the occasion for marriages among the impeded, by too easily suggesting the counsel of petitioning for a dispensation and the hope of obtaining it."[3]

[1] Session 24, De reformatione matrimonii, chapter 5.

[2] Cf. rescript of Pius VII to the Bishops of France, February 19, 1809.

[3] P. 179.

Article IV. On the Execution of a Dispensation

825 Dispensations can be granted either in gracious form or in commissory form. It is said to be granted in gracious form when the Superior to whom the petition is directed himself grants the dispensation or applies it to the petitioners; hence a concession of this kind is made without an executor, and has effect from the moment when the letters were given (canon 38). A dispensation is said to be granted in commissory form when the Superior commits the execution of the dispensation to another. The person to whom the execution is committed is called the executor; the whole business to be fulfilled by him is called execution; the part of the business which consists in applying the dispensation is called fulmination. Concerning execution, the following hold:

I. The executor of a dispensation performs his office invalidly before he has received the letters and recognized their authenticity and integrity, unless previous knowledge of them has been transmitted to him by the authority of the rescriptor (canon 53). Besides, note:

1. The executor of dispensations can substitute another for himself according to his prudent judgment, unless substitution has been prohibited or the person of the substitute has been predefined (canon 57, § 1).
2. Any dispensations whatever can be committed to execution also by the successor of the executor in dignity or office, unless the industry of the person has been chosen (canon 58).
3. Through the vacancy of the Apostolic See or of the diocese, no dispensation of the same Apostolic See or of the Ordinary perishes (canon 61).
4. The Ordinary of the petitioners, to whom a dispensation over a public impediment has been committed, should execute the dispensation even if the betrothed have departed into another diocese before the execution of the dispensation, and are not going to return, provided the Ordinary of the place in which they desire to contract marriage is advised (canon 1055).

II. If in the rescript of dispensation the mere ministry of execution is committed, the execution of the rescript cannot be denied unless either it is manifestly clear that the rescript is null by a defect of subreption or obreption, or conditions are placed in the rescript which the executor knows have not been fulfilled, or the one who obtained the rescript seems, in the judgment of the executor, so unworthy that the concession of the grace will be an offense to others; and if this last thing happens, the executor, the execution having been interrupted, should immediately make the rescriptor more certain about the matter (canon 54, § 1). But if in the rescript of dispensation the concession of the grace is committed to the executor, it belongs to him, according to his prudent judgment and conscience, to grant or deny the grace (canon 54, § 2).

826 III. The execution of a dispensation includes verification of the prayers, fulfillment of clauses, and certain other things to be observed.

1. Verification of the prayers. This consists in the executor's investigating whether or not the things contained in the rescript of dispensation agree with the case as it stands at the time of execution (canon 38), and indeed agree insofar as that is required for the validity of the rescript. To what extent this is required for the validity of the rescript is clear from what was said in n. 823. In a word: for validity, the truth of those things suffices which had to be expressed for validity. Besides, note:

a) Verification is required only for liceity; indeed it does not press if, as happens, it has already taken place before, and the executor is certain that the matters have not changed. In the case it suffices to investigate whether the tenor of the rescript corresponds to the things set forth in the petition.[1]

b) Verification is instituted: for the external forum, for example by questioning the petitioners and witnesses, consulting the parochial books, etc.; for the internal forum, by questioning the penitent. Verification for the external forum can also be instituted through another.

2. Clauses to be fulfilled; moreover, the principal clauses are:[2]

a) In rescripts of the Holy Office, if it dispenses in the impediment of disparity of worship or mixed religion, there is added the clause: provided first that regularly, according to the prescription of canon 1061, § 2, sufficient provision has altogether been made for the conditions required by the Church, and the Ordinary himself is morally certain that these conditions will be fulfilled, namely on the part of the non-Catholic spouse concerning removing from the Catholic party the danger of perversion, and on the part of both persons about to marry concerning all offspring of each sex being altogether baptized and educated in the sanctity of the Catholic religion. This clause is essential. The clause concerning the obligation of warning those about to marry that they also cannot approach a non-Catholic minister to give or renew matrimonial consent is now not essential, but only preceptive.

b) In rescripts of the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments:

a) If the things set forth are true. This clause is essential insofar as the truth of those things which had to be expressed for validity is required (n. 823).

b) The canonical prescriptions being observed. This clause is essential or merely preceptive according as the prescriptions themselves are essential or preceptive, according to what has been said and what remains to be said.

c) Provided that no scandal intervenes. The clause does not seem to be essential. Moreover, a continuous occasion should be removed by separation if it is voluntary; if it is necessary, it should be rendered remote.[3]

d) A salutary penance having been imposed on the petitioners. The clause is merely preceptive.

e) Provided that no doubt underlies the matter that the spouse could be offspring generated by the other of the contracting parties. This clause is essential, and in a dispensation in the impediment of public honesty is understood if it is not expressed (cf. canon 1076, § 3).[4]

c) In rescripts of the Sacred Penitentiary:

a) His or her confession having first been heard, or only in sacramental confession. This clause imports that, for validity, it is required that sacramental confession be instituted and that the dispensation be fulminated in confession. Nevertheless the dispensation is not invalid because the confession is sacrilegious or invalid; nor is absolution required[5] (St. Alphonsus, 1143).

b) Provided that the impediment is occult. The clause is essential.

c) Provided that letters of dispensation over the public impediment have been obtained and the nullity coming from the foregoing remains occult, namely until the nuptials. The clause is essential and is added when a public impediment concurs with an occult one.

d) A grave, or long, or perpetual salutary penance having been enjoined. The clause is merely preceptive; moreover, a penance distinct from the sacramental penance is understood. A long penance is, for example, a penance of one year; a perpetual penance regards the whole life (St. Alphonsus VI, 1143).

"In predefining the quality, gravity, duration, etc., of the penance, let him exceed neither the limits of severity nor those of humanity, and let him take account of the condition, age, infirmity, office, sex, etc., of those on whom the penalty is to be imposed."[6] If the penitent does not accept the penance, commutation should be obtained; and if this is foreseen, it should be manifested in the petition.

e) Other things having been enjoined which must be enjoined by law, that is, according to the principles of moral theology, for example scandal to be removed, restitution to be made, etc. This clause is likewise merely preceptive.

3. And certain other things to be observed. a) Previous absolution from censures is not required for the validity of the dispensation, unless someone has been censured by a declaratory or condemnatory sentence brought against him (canon 36, § 2); nor is it clear that it is required for liceity. If a sentence has intervened, the censured person cannot validly receive a dispensation unless mention of the censure is made in the pontifical rescript (canon 2265, § 2; 2275, 3°; 2283). Besides, in the case in which absolution from censure has place, the customary form of absolving from censures and sins suffices, that is, the one which is used in sacramental judgment. If absolution from sins cannot be given, for instance because the penitent is indisposed, the absolution from sins being omitted, only absolution from censures is first given.

Note. In the faculty of dispensing is also included the power of absolving from ecclesiastical penalties if any perchance stand in the way, but only for the effect of obtaining the dispensation (canon 66, § 3; n. 809).

b) The executor must accomplish the fulmination itself for the external forum in writing (canon 56); likewise it is better that he accomplish it in this way if the fulmination is made in the non-sacramental internal forum. In the sacramental internal forum it is to be made by living voice and to a person present. It is made to one person only if the impediment affects only one party, for example a vow; if the impediment is common to both parties, it is to be made to both parties, whether the same or a different confessor is chosen by the petitioners.[7] If a different confessor is chosen, "the prior confessor, after the dispensation has been granted to one according to the form of the letters, must hand over the letters of the Sacred Penitentiary, closed, to the penitent, so that through him they may be handed over to the other party, who likewise should have the same letters executed with him or her through another confessor, whose duty it will be in a case of this kind, when the business has been completed, to tear up the letters."[8] Nevertheless, even in this hypothesis the fulmination upon the other party is required only for liceity, and for a grave cause, for instance because the other party refuses to confess, it can be omitted.

A determinate form by which the fulmination is made is not required. If, however, someone grants a dispensation by power delegated from the Apostolic See, he should make express mention of the pontifical indult (canon 1057).

c) After the dispensation has been fulminated, if mention is made in the document concerning legitimation, legitimation of the offspring follows; this can be made in any form. Fittingly one of these forms, taken from Benedict XIV, is used for fulmination and legitimation.[9]

For a marriage to be contracted: After the customary form of absolution, the confessor can proceed thus: "And besides, by Apostolic Authority, or by the authority of the Most Reverend Bishop N., specially delegated to me, I dispense with you over the impediment, which he here expresses, for example, of the second degree of affinity, so that, notwithstanding the aforesaid impediment, you may licitly be able to contract marriage publicly with the woman whom you intend to marry, the ecclesiastical form having been observed, to consummate it, and to remain in it; and by the same Apostolic Authority I declare the offspring already received, if there is any, and to be received from this union legitimate. In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

For convalidating a marriage already contracted (n. 829 sq.): "Besides, by Apostolic Authority, or by the authority of the Most Reverend Bishop N., specially delegated to me, I dispense with you over the impediment... by which, being bound, you contracted marriage nullly, so that, notwithstanding the aforesaid impediment, you may licitly be able to contract marriage anew with your putative spouse, consent being renewed, to consummate it, and to remain in it; and I declare the offspring already received and to be received from this union legitimate. In the name," etc.

For a marriage to be healed in the root (n. 833): "Besides, by Apostolic Authority, etc.... I heal in its root the marriage contracted by you with N., and I declare the offspring already received and to be received from this union legitimate. In the name," etc.

d) After the fulmination has been completed, these things are to be observed:

a) Rescripts of dispensations granted for the external forum should be deposited in the diocesan archive (cf. canon 375, § 1), and the executory letters in the parochial archive.

b) Unless the rescript of the Sacred Penitentiary provides otherwise, a dispensation granted in the non-sacramental internal forum over an occult impediment should be noted in the book to be carefully kept in the secret archive of the Curia, of which canon 379 treats; nor is another dispensation for the external forum necessary, even if afterward the occult impediment becomes public; but it is necessary if the dispensation had been granted only in the sacramental internal forum (canon 1047).

c) Rescripts by which a dispensation has been granted for the sacramental internal forum are to be torn up or burned, and this according to the rescripts of the Sacred Penitentiary "under latae sententiae excommunication." The obligation must be fulfilled at least within three days after the execution of the dispensation (St. Alphonsus VI, 1143). Nevertheless, the confessor is not prohibited from retaining a transcribed text; in that case he should omit the day and year.

[1] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, April 27, 1886; Holy Office, August 28, 1895.

[2] Cf. Aertnys-Damen II, n. 802 sq.

[3] Sacred Penitentiary, April 27, 1886.

[4] Cf. Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 346).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, January 6, 1797 (collection, n. 633); December 18, 1878; Sacred Penitentiary, May 19, 1834; January 4, 1839.

[6] Sacred Penitentiary, April 8, 1890.

[7] Sacred Penitentiary, November 15, 1778.

[8] Response of the Sacred Penitentiary cited.

[9] Benedict XIV, Institutiones ecclesiasticae 87, n. 81.

Appendix I. On Invalid Marriage

827 If any marriage is found to be invalid, the case must be provided for in different ways according to the circumstances: namely, either by leaving the parties in good faith, or by permitting them to live as brother and sister, or by declaring the nullity of the marriage, or by convalidating the marriage. Which mode ought to be chosen will be clear from what is to be said. Ordinarily, however, one must recur either to a declaration of the nullity of the marriage, or, and especially indeed, to convalidation of the marriage. Hence:

Part I. On the Declaration of the Nullity of an Invalid Marriage

828 I. One must regularly proceed to the declaration of the nullity of an invalid marriage: 1° if convalidation cannot have place, because the impediment cannot be removed; 2° if, all things considered, it is better for the parties to be separated.

II. The competent judge in this cause is the judge of the place in which the marriage was celebrated, or in which the respondent party, or, if one is non-Catholic, the Catholic party, has a domicile or quasi-domicile (canon 1964). Nevertheless, recourse can also be had to the Holy See.

1. The tribunal to be constituted by the Ordinary consists of three judges (canon 1576, § 1), to whom are added the "defender of the bond," as it is called, and an actuary.
2. The tribunal must proceed collegially and render sentence by the greater part of the votes (canon 1577, § 1).
3. If sentence is rendered for the nullity of the marriage, appeal should be made to a higher tribunal, different according to the circumstances (canon 1986; compare canon 1594, §§ 1 and 2).[1]
4. After the second sentence, which has confirmed the nullity of the marriage, if the defender of the bond in the grade of appeal has not believed according to his conscience that appeal should be made, the spouses have the right, ten days having elapsed from the notification of the sentence, of contracting new nuptials (canon 1987).
5. Canon 1990 establishes when the solemnities enumerated can be omitted: "When from a certain and authentic document, which is subject to no contradiction or exception, there has been established the existence of an impediment of disparity of worship, order, solemn vow of chastity, bond, consanguinity, affinity, or spiritual relationship, and at the same time with equal certainty it has appeared that a dispensation over these impediments was not given, in these cases, the solemnities enumerated up to this point having been passed over, the Ordinary, the parties having been cited, will be able to declare the nullity of the marriage, with the intervention, however, of the defender of the bond." Nevertheless, canons 1991 and 1992 should be consulted.
6. A marriage between two Catholics or between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party, contracted either merely civilly or by a non-Catholic rite, can be declared null by the Ordinary, or by the pastor after the Ordinary has been consulted, after only the investigation of which canon 1019 sq. treats has first been made.[2]

[1] Appeal can also be made to the Sacred Rota (canon 1599, § 1, 1°).

[2] Pontifical Commission, October 16, 1919, to 17 (A.A.S. 1919, p. 479); March 23, 1919 (Archiv fuer katholisches Kirchenrecht 1919, p. 64).

Part II. On the Convalidation of an Invalid Marriage

829 The convalidation of an invalid marriage can take place in two ways: by simple convalidation and by sanation in the root, as it is called.[1] These differ especially in this, that simple convalidation, contrary to sanation in the root, requires renewal of consent, to be furnished at least by one party, as will be clear from what is to be said.

[1] Note that marriages, if any are null by reason of impediments abrogated by the new Code, were in no way convalidated by the promulgation itself of the Code. Thus Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918, IV, 7 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 346).

Section I. Simple Convalidation

Three cases of convalidation can be distinguished according to the threefold cause of the nullity of the marriage, namely, on account of a diriment impediment, on account of a defect of consent, and on account of a defect of juridical form.

Chapter I. On the Convalidation of a Marriage Invalid on Account of a Diriment Impediment

830 I. Requisites for convalidation. From canon 1133, § 1, for convalidating a marriage void on account of a diriment impediment, there is required:

1. That the impediment cease, or be removed by dispensation.[1]

2. That at least the party conscious of the impediment renew consent. Moreover:

a) Renewal of consent is required by ecclesiastical law for validity, even if at the beginning each party furnished consent and did not afterward revoke it (canon 1133, § 2).

b) Renewal of consent is required only by ecclesiastical law, but not by natural law. This is clear both from the practice of the Church sometimes remitting renewal of consent and from the fact that matrimonial consent furnished and enduring ought of itself, by the very fact that the impediment or obstacle is removed, to become efficacious.

Some except a marriage or matrimonial consent to which an impediment of natural or divine law stood opposed, and judge that a marriage of this kind cannot be convalidated except by the new consent of each party. But first, every intrinsic reason for admitting the aforesaid exception is lacking. Then the Sacred Penitentiary, in the Paris case, April 25, 1895, sanated in the root a marriage to which an impediment of natural law had stood opposed after the cessation of the impediment. Nevertheless, a difficulty arises from the fact that the Holy Office, March 2, 1904, declared: "A marriage contracted with an impediment of natural or divine law cannot be sanated in the root." But one can answer that, according to the mind of the Holy Office, that cannot be done insofar as the Church cannot remove an impediment of this kind; and this removal is the condition without which sanation cannot have place. Besides, de facto, if a marriage has been contracted with an impediment of natural or divine law, even if afterward the impediment has ceased, the Church does not remit renewal of consent, not even from the moment of the cessation of the impediment (canon 1139, § 2).

c) Renewal of consent must be a new act of the will toward a marriage which is known to have been null from the beginning (canon 1134). Therefore a new act of the will is required, and one independent of the prior consent, that is, not merely confirmatory of the prior consent, but posited with knowledge of the nullity of the marriage.

II. Form to be observed. 1. If the impediment is public, consent must be renewed by both parties in the form prescribed by law (canon 1135, § 1). If one party refuses renewal in the prescribed form, a dispensation from form should be sought; if one party refuses the very renewal of consent, either it should be petitioned that only one party must renew consent, or that sanation in the root be granted. Nevertheless, in individual cases scandal should be removed by making known the convalidation of the marriage.

2. If it is occult and known to both parties, it is enough that consent be renewed by both parties privately and secretly (canon 1135, § 2). If one party refuses renewal of consent, either it should be petitioned that only one party must renew consent, or that sanation in the root be granted.

3. If it is occult and unknown to one party, it is enough that the party conscious of the impediment alone renew consent privately and secretly, provided the other perseveres in the consent furnished (canon 1135, § 3). Moreover, as canon 1093 has it, although a marriage has been entered invalidly by reason of an impediment, the consent furnished is presumed to persevere until its revocation has been established.

[1] The impediments of age, abduction, bond, and disparity of worship can cease.

Chapter II. On the Convalidation of a Marriage Invalid on Account of Defect of Consent 831 Preliminary note. Here belong marriages null on account of defect of discretion, error, fear, fiction, or a condition repugnant to the substance of marriage.

I. Requisites for convalidation. A marriage void on account of defect of consent is convalidated if the party who had not consented now consents, provided the consent furnished by the other party perseveres (canon 1136, § 1). In the case it is not required that the party who had consented renew consent, because for a contract it suffices that the consent of both parties morally coexist. This obtains if the consent of one perseveres until the other furnishes consent (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 47, a. 4, ad 2; St. Alphonsus VI, 1114).

II. Form to be observed. From canon 1136, §§ 2 and 3:

1. If the defect of consent was merely internal, it is enough that the party who had not consented consent interiorly.

2. If it was also external, it is necessary also to manifest consent externally, and indeed in this way:

a) If the defect was secret, it suffices to manifest consent privately and secretly, that is, between the parties alone.

b) If the defect was public, consent must be manifested in the form prescribed by law. If in the case the party who did not consent refuses to manifest consent in the form prescribed by law, a dispensation from form should be sought, and scandal should be removed by making known the convalidation of the marriage.

Chapter III. On the Convalidation of a Marriage Invalid on Account of Defect of Form

832 Preliminary note. Here belong, for example, marriages entered merely civilly by those who are bound to ecclesiastical form. Moreover:

A marriage null on account of defect of form, in order that it become valid, must be contracted anew in legitimate form (canon 1137); and indeed, as regards liceity, publicly or occultly, according as the nullity is public or occult.

If the nullity is public, and both parties or one or the other refuses publicly or in the face of the Church to renew consent, it can be permitted by the Ordinary that the marriage be contracted, for example, in the house of the pastor before only the pastor and witnesses. Scandal, however, should be removed by making known the convalidation of the marriage.

If one party refuses to renew consent in legitimate form, a dispensation from form should be sought.

If one party refuses to renew consent, sanation in the root should be sought. In every case, however, scandal, if it is present, should be removed by making known the convalidation of the marriage.

If both parties refuse to renew consent or to renew it in legitimate form, the Church does not grant sanation in the root.

Note. Concerning the drafting of a petition for convalidation of a marriage, see n. 822. For convenience there follow:

Forms Of Petitions.

I.

For The External Forum.

Most Blessed Father.

(Your Most Reverend Excellency).[1]

Peter N., of the diocese of N., and Anna N., my parishioner, entered marriage in the form prescribed by law. Afterward the public impediment of affinity in the second degree of the collateral line became known. They humbly ask for a dispensation, so that the invalidly contracted marriage may be convalidated. (If offspring has been born or conceived, let there be added: They also obtain the legitimation of the offspring.)

And God...

N. N., pastor at... Diocese...

II.

For The Internal Forum.

Most Eminent and Most Reverend Lord.

Caius and Caia in good faith entered marriage in the form prescribed by law. Afterward, however, in the internal forum an occult impediment became known, contracted from adultery and from a promise of future marriage mutually made to each other during the marriage by which one or the other, or both, parties were formerly bound.

That the marriage, whose nullity is known to both, or to one or the other, party, may be convalidated, the confessor humbly asks that the impediment be removed.

May Your Eminence deign to direct the response to me, the undersigned confessor.

[1] If the Ordinary is able to dispense.

Section II. Sanation in the Root

833 I. Notion. "Sanation in the root of a marriage is the convalidation of the same marriage, carrying with it, besides the dispensation or cessation of the impediment, dispensation from the law concerning renewal of consent, and retrotraction by fiction of law, concerning canonical effects, into the past" (canon 1138, § 1). Therefore sanation in the root involves three things:

1. It removes the impediment, unless it has already ceased.
2. It dispenses from the law of renewing consent, or permits the marriage to be convalidated by force of the prior consent, that is, although neither party renews consent.[1] The convalidation, however, takes place from the moment of the concession of the grace (canon 1138, § 2).
3. It effects that the canonical effects, especially the legitimacy of offspring, belong to the sanated marriage not only now, but by fiction of law are so attributed to it as if the marriage had already been valid in the past; indeed, the retrotraction is understood to have been made to the beginning of the marriage, unless something else is expressly provided (canon 1138, § 2).

Therefore sanation in the root differs from simple convalidation: 1° because the former requires renewal of consent from neither party, while the latter requires that consent be renewed at least by one party; 2° the former so attributes canonical effects to the sanated marriage as if they had already previously been annexed to it, while the latter lacks this efficacy.

Note. Dispensation from the law concerning renewal of consent can also be granted with only one party or with both parties unaware (canon 1138, § 3).

II. Possibility of sanation in the root. Any marriage entered with the naturally sufficient consent of both parties, but juridically inefficacious on account of a diriment impediment of ecclesiastical law or on account of defect of legitimate form, can be sanated in the root, provided consent perseveres (canon 1139, § 1). The same must be said of a marriage invalid on account of a diriment impediment of natural or divine law (n. 830). But a marriage contracted with an impediment of natural or divine law, even if afterward the impediment has ceased, the Church does not sanate in the root, not even from the moment of the cessation of the impediment (canon 1138, § 2).

III. Requisites that a marriage can be sanated in the root. For validity it is required:

1. That each party furnished consent and that it was truly matrimonial consent (canon 1140, § 1). Therefore merely fornicary consent does not suffice, nor civil marriage if it was entered as a mere civil ceremony, but not as marriage. But if consent indeed was lacking from the beginning, but afterward was furnished, sanation can be granted from the moment of the consent furnished (canon 1140, § 2).
2. That each party persevere in consent, or that neither party has revoked it (canon 1140, § 1). But that one or both parties would revoke consent if they knew the nullity of the marriage is not yet revocation; indeed, not even separation from bed and board necessarily involves revocation.[2]

IV. Subject of the power of sanating in the root. Sanation in the root can be granted only by the Apostolic See (canon 1141). The Apostolic See, however, grants it through the Holy Office, or the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, or through the Sacred Penitentiary, according as the case bears (n. 803). Nevertheless special indults also are customarily granted to others;[3] but the power of dispensing in some impediment does not import the power of sanating in the root.

V. Petition for sanation in the root. It is to be sought if, on the one hand, it seems that the convalidation of some marriage must altogether be provided for, but on the other hand one must abstain from simple convalidation. Therefore it should be sought: 1° if in some place many marriages have been entered invalidly, so that renewal of consent would be liable to many inconveniences; 2° if the things required for simple convalidation are foreseen to be lacking, for instance if the party who, according to the laws of simple convalidation, is bound to renew consent or to renew it in legitimate form refuses to perform this, provided the other party is well disposed.

If each party is in good faith, and neither can be warned without inconvenience, the petition for sanation can be omitted and the parties can be left in good faith; although, if the nullity of the marriage came from the fault of others, for example of the pastor or Ordinary, the Church easily grants sanation, so that then it is expedient to seek it (cf. canon 1138, § 3).

Note. Concerning the drafting of a petition for sanation in the root, see n. 822. For convenience there follow:

Forms Of Petitions.

I.

For The External Forum.

Most Blessed Father.

Peter N., of the diocese of N., and Anna N., my parishioner, in good faith entered marriage in the form prescribed by law. Afterward the public impediment of consanguinity in the third degree of the collateral line was detected and became known to both parties. The consent of each endures. But since the man refuses to renew consent in the form prescribed by law, the woman humbly requests sanation in the root. (If offspring has been born or conceived, let there be added: and the legitimation of the offspring received.)

And God...

N. N., pastor at... Diocese...

II.

For The Internal Forum.

Most Blessed Father.

Caius and Caia had contracted marriage in good faith in the form prescribed by law. Afterward, however, in the internal forum an occult impediment became known, contracted from adultery and from a promise of future marriage mutually made to each other during the marriage by which one or the other, or both, parties were formerly bound. Caia fears that Caius, who is ignorant of the impediment, would refuse to renew consent even privately and secretly. Hence she humbly petitions that Your Holiness would wish to grant sanation in the root of the present marriage and to direct the response to me, the undersigned confessor. (If offspring has been born or conceived, let there be added after the word "marriage": and the legitimation of the offspring received.)

And God...

[1] Therefore it heals the root, that is, consent vitiated from the beginning or inefficacious because of an impediment.

[2] Some ask whether consent given by one in possession of reason perseveres after the consenting person has fallen into perpetual insanity. Moreover, it seems it must be denied, because consent seems to fail in a person of this kind, as in a dead person (cf. canon 1089, § 3).

[3] Cf. Form II, minor faculties of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, n. 15 (Vermeersch, Commentarius, n. 93).

Scholion I. On the Convalidation of an Invalid Marriage Between a Catholic Party and a Non-Catholic Party

834 We suppose that the marriage is invalid either on account of disparity of worship and defect of form, or on account of defect of form alone. Now, so that a marriage of this kind may be convalidated:

I. First, the things to be posited having been posited, a dispensation should be sought either from the diriment impediment of disparity of worship or from the impedient impediment of mixed religion. Then the marriage should be contracted in legitimate form, and indeed, as regards liceity, publicly or occultly, according as the nullity is public or occult.

If the nullity is public and the non-Catholic party refuses publicly to renew consent, the Ordinary can permit the marriage to be contracted before only the pastor and witnesses.

If the non-Catholic party refuses to renew consent in legitimate form, a dispensation from form should be sought.

If the non-Catholic party refuses to renew consent, sanation in the root should be sought if there is hope of obtaining it, according to what is soon to be said.

II. I said that, the things to be posited having been posited, a dispensation from the impediment of disparity of worship or mixed religion is to be sought. For in order that the said dispensation can be obtained, both the cautions must be furnished and moral certainty must be had concerning the fulfillment of the cautions.

But what if either the non-Catholic party refuses to furnish the cautions, or moral certainty is not had concerning the fulfillment of the cautions?

Response. In the case an ordinary dispensation is excluded; and it seems excluded even in danger of death;[1] hence one must recur to sanation in the root if there is hope of obtaining it, that is, if it is morally certain that the non-Catholic party will not impede the Catholic education of all offspring, both born and to be born. For although sanation in the root can be expected even if the non-Catholic party refuses to furnish the cautions,[2] nevertheless, if the aforesaid moral certainty is lacking, sanation in the root cannot be expected.[3]

What, therefore, if even that moral certainty is lacking?

Response 1. Outside danger of death, the cause is hopeless.

Response 2. In danger of death, dispensation and sanation in the root alike seem excluded,[4] but not recourse to epikeia; namely, if the Catholic party promises that he or she will provide according to his or her strength for the Catholic education of all offspring, one should proceed to the convalidation of the marriage, the consent of at least the Catholic party having been renewed (cf. St. Alphonsus VI, 613).

[1] Cf. canons 1043, 1061; likewise the things which we noted on p. 605.

[2] Holy Office, April 12, 1899 (collection, n. 2042); December 22, 1916 (A.A.S. 1917, p. 13).

[3] Holy Office, July 1, 1930 (in Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1931, p. 168; 1932, p. 68). Moreover, this is clear from the fact that to the faculties of the Congregation of Propaganda Fide concerning sanation in the root of mixed marriage there is now added the clause: "provided it is morally certain that the non-Catholic party will not impede the Catholic education of all offspring, both born and to be born."

[4] Besides, concerning sanation in the root, which even in danger of death cannot be granted without a special indult, the opportunity of receiving a timely response will easily be lacking.

Scholion II. On the Inscription of a Convalidated Marriage

835 The inscription of a convalidated marriage should be made in this way:

I. Convalidation in the external forum should be noted in the customary register of marriages and in the book of the baptized. If the prior marriage has already been inscribed in the usual way, it can either be noted anew with reference to the prior marriage, or all things can be noted in the margin of the prior inscription.

II. Convalidation in the internal forum should be noted in the secret register of the episcopal Chancery, unless the sacramental seal stands in the way. If that stands in the way and the good of the offspring requires inscription, with the license of the penitent or penitents the notation should have place.

Scholion III. On the Mode of Handling a Case of Convalidation

836 If the pastor or confessor detects that some marriage is certainly invalid, one should proceed thus:

I. If both are unaware of the nullity, ordinarily on account of the danger of incontinence or of some other inconvenience they should be left in good faith for a time. Meanwhile, if the impediment has ceased or is dispensable, simple convalidation or sanation in the root should be procured according to the circumstances.

II. If each party is conscious of the nullity, one should proceed thus:

1. If the nullity is occult to others, the spouses must immediately be separated from bed. Meanwhile, if the impediment has ceased or is dispensable, convalidation should be procured as soon as possible. If the impediment is indispensable, recourse should be had to the Ordinary, who should judge what kind of separation seems to be procured.
2. If the nullity is public, the spouses must at once be separated even from cohabitation. Meanwhile, recourse should be had to the Ordinary either for convalidation or for a declaration of nullity, if it is impossible or not expedient to procure convalidation. That the spouses do not wish to be separated for a time does not prevent convalidation from being able to be obtained.

III. If only one party is conscious of the nullity, the other party, if it can be done without grave inconvenience, must be warned, and the spouses must be separated at least from bed; then convalidation should be procured as soon as possible. If the other party cannot be warned without grave inconvenience, the warning can be omitted, but the rendering of the debt must be avoided until convalidation has been procured, for instance by undertaking a journey, by excusing oneself under some pretext.

But what if only the wife knows the nullity, and on the one hand convalidation cannot be obtained in time, even with canon 1045 considered, while on the other hand copula cannot be avoided without very grave inconvenience?

Response. In the case, according to several authors, by epikeia it can be judged that the ecclesiastical impediment has ceased, so that the spouse, by renewing consent either explicitly or by conduct, through copula, can convalidate the marriage and render the debt. Nevertheless, for greater caution, recourse should be had as soon as possible to the competent power (St. Alphonsus VI, 613).

Appendix II. On the Separation of Spouses

837 Separation of spouses or divorce is distinguished as threefold: namely, dissolution of the bond itself or full divorce; separation from bed and copula; and separation from bed, board, and cohabitation. The latter is called semi-full divorce.

Part I. On Full Divorce

To what extent the matrimonial bond itself can be dissolved we said in n. 720 sq. But the two cases explained theoretically in that place we will make clearer for the sake of practice. Namely, from a just cause the Church can dissolve: 1° marriage between baptized persons which has not been consummated; 2° marriage between a baptized party and a non-baptized party, for instance if the baptized party, heresy or schism having been rejected, or the non-baptized party through baptism, is converted to the Catholic Church.

Section I. On the Dissolution of Marriage Between Baptized Persons, Not Consummated

838 I. Reasons for petitioning the dissolution of marriage between baptized persons, not consummated, are, for example: doubtful impotence, or impotence doubtfully antecedent or doubtfully perpetual and difficultly curable; supervening impotence; infirmity impeding the use of marriage; grave error concerning a quality of the person, detected after marriage; grave and continual discords between the parties; an infamous delict perpetrated by one party, especially if a sentence of a judge followed; danger of perversion; civil divorce, especially with celebration of a new civil marriage; probable nullity of the marriage, but which cannot be sufficiently proved, for instance on account of fear applied, on account of a condition added to the consent; malicious departure.[1]

II. The mode of obtaining dissolution is presented summarily in these points:[2]

1. Only the spouses have the right of petitioning for a dispensation over a ratified and non-consummated marriage (canon 1973).
2. The petition to be directed to the Supreme Pontiff should be transmitted to the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments; moreover, it should be directed through one's own Ordinary.
3. The Ordinary cannot instruct the process unless the Apostolic See has given him the faculty (canon 1963, § 1).
4. The Ordinary will take care to constitute the tribunal as soon as he can, employing for this purpose the ministers constituted in his Curia, or also others. A collegiate tribunal of three judges is not required; however, an instructing judge, a defender of the bond, and an actuary are required.
5. The tribunal should especially inquire: 1° into the legitimate causes of dispensation; 2° into the non-consummation of the marriage.
6. When the process has been finished, all the acts together with the vote of the Bishop and of the defender of the bond are to be transmitted to the Congregation, and the sentence of the Supreme Pontiff himself is to be awaited.

[1] De Smet, op. cit., n. 330; Vlaming, op. cit., II, n. 606.

[2] The Decree of the Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments, May 7, 1923, established the rules to be observed (A.A.S. 1923, pp. 389-436).

Section II. On the Dissolution of Marriage Between a Baptized Party and a Non-Baptized Party

839 I. The petition to be directed to the Supreme Pontiff should be transmitted to the Holy Office, to which this cause is committed.

II. The conditions required so that a marriage between a baptized party and a non-baptized party may be dissolved are:

1. If the non-baptized party desires to be converted to the Catholic Church, he or she should first be baptized, so as to be subjected to the jurisdiction of the Church. Besides, it is required that after receiving baptism he or she has not had copula with the spouse; otherwise there would be a marriage consummated after the baptism of both parties, which cannot be dissolved by the Church. In addition, juridical proof is demanded by which it is proved that baptism had in no way previously been conferred, or had been conferred invalidly.
2. If the baptized party wishes to be converted to the Church, he or she must first in fact be converted to it.
3. Finally, other things are to be inserted into the petition; these indeed will be investigated and inserted by the one to whom this matter is committed.

Part II. On Semi-Full Divorce

The following words of canon 1128 teach that semi-full divorce or separation from bed, board, and cohabitation is of itself illicit, but licit from a just cause: "Spouses must preserve the communion of conjugal life, unless a just cause excuses them." Among the just causes on account of which it is licit to institute or petition semi-full divorce, some confer the right of perpetual separation, others of themselves confer the right only of temporary separation. We will examine the individual causes of each species.

840 I. The causes of perpetual separation are adultery and the mutual consent of the spouses for conversion to a more perfect state.

1. Adultery furnishes to the innocent spouse the right of perpetual separation. This is clear from Sacred Scripture,[1] which, while excluding dissolution of the bond (n. 720), indicates perpetual separation. It is further clear from Tradition,[2] and from the fact that someone vainly demands that faith be kept with him by one to whom he refuses to keep the faith furnished by himself.[3] Hence canon 1129, § 1: "Because of the adultery of a spouse, the other spouse, the bond remaining, has the right of dissolving, even in perpetuity, the communion of life, unless he consented to the crime, or gave cause for it, or expressly or tacitly condoned it, or also himself committed the same crime" (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 62, a. 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 960). Moreover, adultery must be: consummated, formal, morally certain, not approved, not compensated, not condoned. It is said:

a) Consummated through copula of itself apt for generation, not merely begun through kisses, touches, embraces, etc.; nor, since here carnal union with a third person is considered, does mere lying together or union of bodies, or onanistic copula, suffice.

b) Formal, not committed by oppression or in good faith (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 62, a. 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 960; Homo Apostolicus, tract 18, n. 95).

c) Morally certain. Certainty of this kind can also arise from indications, conjectures, and vehement presumptions (St. Alphonsus VI, 961; Homo Apostolicus, tract 18, n. 93).

d) Not approved, that is, it is required that the other did not consent to the adultery nor directly give cause for it; not, however, that he or she did not furnish an indirect cause for it, for instance by denying the debt, by treating the spouse badly (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 62, a. 1; St. Alphonsus VI, 966).

e) Not compensated by adultery committed by the other party before the sentence of divorce was issued by the ecclesiastical judge. It does not matter that one committed adultery more often than the other, or that the crime of one is occult and that of the other public. But if, after adultery has been committed by both, one comes to his senses while the other continues in adultery, the one who is amended can with sufficient probability institute divorce (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

f) Not condoned either expressly or tacitly. "Tacit condonation is had if the innocent spouse, after he has been made more certain concerning the crime of adultery, has freely associated with the other spouse with marital affection; moreover it is presumed unless within six months he has expelled or left the adulterous spouse, or has made a legitimate accusation" (canon 1129, § 2).

Sodomy with a third person and bestiality are equated with adultery, because what is considered here is present, namely carnal union with a third person. Otherwise one must speak concerning sodomy perpetrated with the spouse (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 62, a. 1, ad 4; St. Alphonsus VI, 962, question 2°).

Corollary I. The innocent spouse is not bound of himself to institute divorce; incidentally he can be bound either on account of hope of amending the guilty one, or on account of avoiding scandal arising from the fact that someone would seem to consent to the continued adulteries of the spouse. Practically, however, an obligation will scarcely be present, with the inconveniences also about to follow considered (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 62, a. 2; St. Alphonsus VI, 963, 964).

Corollary II. The innocent party, whether he or she has departed by sentence of a judge or by his or her own authority, is never bound to receive the adulterer, however amended, or to return to him or her (canon 1130), unless the innocent party commits adultery before the sentence of divorce has been issued by the ecclesiastical judge. After this sentence has been issued, the obligation is sufficiently probably lacking according to that maxim, "What has once been well decided... ought not to be reconsidered by any repetition" (St. Alphonsus VI, 965; 967, doubt 2; Homo Apostolicus, tract 18, n. 96). Nevertheless it is always laudable to receive the penitent one back into favor.

Corollary III. The innocent spouse can admit or recall the adulterous party, unless with the innocent spouse's consent the latter has taken up a state contrary to marriage (canon 1130), namely sacred Orders or Religion. If, however, the adulterous wife prudently fears cruelties, she is not bound to return (St. Alphonsus VI, 976).

2. Mutual consent confers the right of perpetual separation in a twofold case:

a) If one or both parties emit perpetual religious profession, with the other party consenting; but in order that religious profession be valid, a dispensation of the Holy See is required (canon 542, 1°). Once religious profession has been emitted in this way, neither ever has the right of returning to the other or summoning the other.

b) If the husband receives sacred Orders, with the wife consenting; but in order that the reception be licit, a dispensation of the Holy See is required (canon 987, 2°). The reception of Order without the consent of the spouse is likewise illicit, indeed in such a way that the husband can be compelled to return and to abstain from all acts of Order.

In occurring cases, the Holy See can establish conditions for the other party who does not enter Religion, or for the wife whose husband receives sacred Orders; common law now prescribes nothing.

[1] Matthew 5:32; 19:9; Mark 10:11; Luke 16:18; 1 Corinthians 7:11-12.

[2] The Dogmatic theologians should be consulted.

[3] Rule of Law 75 in VI.

841 II. Causes of temporary separation. 1. Causes of this kind are comprehended by canon 1131, § 1: If one spouse has given his name to a non-Catholic sect; if he has educated the offspring non-Catholically; if he leads a criminal and ignominious life; if he causes grave danger, whether of soul or of body, to the other; if by cruelties he renders common life too difficult: these and other things of this kind are for the other spouse so many legitimate causes of departing. It is said:

a) If he has given his name to a non-Catholic sect. Therefore it is required that he be formally joined to a sect, whether of infidels, or heretical, or schismatic, and that after the marriage has been entered.

b) If he has educated the offspring non-Catholically.

c) If he leads a criminal and ignominious life, as if he joins himself to a band of robbers.

d) If he causes grave danger, whether of soul or of body, to the other. Danger of soul, for example if he solicits to heresy, poisoning, etc. Add if the husband introduces others into the house with danger that they may tempt to adultery. Or if he wishes to exercise sodomy with the wife, even if she refused to consent (St. Alphonsus VI, 973). Danger of body, to which belongs, for example, a contagious disease of the spouse, unless, which today more easily has place, the danger can be removed in another way (St. Alphonsus VI, 973).

e) If by cruelties he renders common life too difficult, for example by treating the consort cruelly. Mere beating, however, unless it is grave and happens several times, is ordinarily not judged among common people to be a just cause for withdrawing. Besides, it suffices that a grave evil be prudently feared (St. Alphonsus VI, 970, 971, question 3°). To this can also be referred insanity from which danger is imminent to the spouse; likewise very troublesome cohabitation, namely on account of grave and frequent insults or quarrels, especially if they bring in a just fear of a greater evil. Here, however, as was likewise said concerning cruelty, the condition of the persons is considered (St. Alphonsus VI, 971, question 3°).

f) And other things of this kind, for example malicious desertion by the spouse.

2. All these causes of themselves furnish only the right of temporary separation. Wherefore canon 1131, § 2 says: In all these cases, when the cause of separation ceases, the custom of life must be restored; but if the separation was pronounced by the Ordinary for a definite or indefinite time, the innocent spouse is not bound to this except by decree of the Ordinary or when the time has been completed.

842 III. The authority by which separation is to be instituted. 1. Adultery, provided it is certain, confers the right of instituting separation by one's own authority (cf. canons 1129, § 1; 1130). Nevertheless, for the sake of avoiding scandal, ordinarily the authority of the ecclesiastical judge must be invoked, unless the adultery is notorious by law or by fact, although even then ordinarily it is expedient to seek the intervention of the ecclesiastical judge. And this is to be advised all the more because, when adultery is neither notorious nor legitimately proved, the judge can compel the spouses to cohabitation; but one must obey the judge, yet not render the debt to the adulterous spouse (St. Alphonsus VI, 968).

2. Mutual consent requires the intervention of Ecclesiastical Authority, as was said in n. 840.

3. Other causes require the authority of the local Ordinary, unless they are certainly established and there is danger in delay; in that case separation can be instituted by one's own authority (canon 1131, § 1).

Finally, separation from bed alone can take place either by mutual consent, according to these words of the Apostle: "Do not defraud one another, except perhaps by consent and for a time, that you may give yourselves to prayer,"[1] or, if a just cause exists, for example a contagious disease, by the authority of one spouse. The same must be said of a separation not of long duration from bed and cohabitation, for instance to undertake a journey.

Note 1. The ecclesiastical judge in causes of separation of which canon 1131, § 1 treats can proceed without a judicial process, even in the second grade or instance.[2]

Note 2. In several dioceses the faculty has been granted to vicars forane of granting separation from bed and cohabitation for a time.

Note 3. Those who improperly instituted separation by their own authority can be left in good faith and admitted to the sacraments, if hope of fruit is absent and scandal is not feared. Besides, note that a wife illegitimately expelled by her husband is not numbered among those who are separated by their own authority.

[1] 1 Corinthians 7:5.

[2] Pontifical Commission, July 25, 1932 (A.A.S. 1932, p. 284).

843 IV. Consequences of separation legitimately instituted. 1. When separation has been instituted, the children must be educated with the innocent spouse; and if one of the spouses is non-Catholic, with the Catholic spouse, unless in either case the Ordinary, for the good of the children themselves, their Catholic education always preserved, has decreed otherwise (canon 1132).

2. The innocent spouse, perpetual separation having been legitimately instituted, can with a dispensation of the Holy See enter Religion or receive sacred Orders; the guilty one cannot do this unless the other either has already changed state by professing Religion or receiving sacred Orders, or consents expressly, or tacitly, for instance by refusing reconciliation repeatedly demanded (St. Alphonsus VI, 969).

3. Separated spouses can restore common life by private authority, and this holds even if the sentence of separation was issued by an ecclesiastical judge.

844 Question 1. Whether it is ever licit to petition for civil divorce.[1]

Response 1. If the marriage is invalid from any cause whatever and has been declared such by competent ecclesiastical authority, it is licit, by petitioning, to intend and obtain civil liberty.[2]

Response 2. If the marriage is valid, the things to be posited having been posited, it is likewise licit if the law in force does not intend the dissolution of the bond. If it intends the dissolution of the bond, it is disputed; but a sufficiently probable opinion affirms it, because the petitioner can abstract from the intention of the legislator, and as a Catholic, for we are speaking of such a person, must be judged to abstract from it. This being posited, the petitioner, as we will immediately say, does not seek something which cannot be furnished by the judge without sin. I said "the things to be posited having been posited," that is, with the approval of the competent ecclesiastical authority first had, insofar as this is required according to what was said in n. 842. I said "can abstract from the intention of the legislator," just as he can and must abstract if there is question of an invalid marriage.

Question 2. Whether a judge can ever render a sentence of divorce if there is question of a valid marriage.

Response 1. If the law intends the dissolution of the bond, it is disputed; but a sufficiently probable opinion affirms it. For the judge can abstract from the intention of the legislator and, as a Catholic, for we are speaking of such a person, he is judged to abstract from it. This being posited, his action is not evil in itself; nor does it involve approval, and therefore neither formal cooperation, of the action of the petitioners, who perhaps do not abstract from the intention of the legislator or who intend the dissolution of the bond. I said "can abstract from the intention of the legislator," just as he can and must abstract if there is question of an invalid marriage. Besides, a just cause for admitting material cooperation is already had from the fact that otherwise good men would have to abstain almost entirely from an office of such great importance.

The controversy does not seem able to be settled by authority. Some favorers of the more benign opinion appeal to the response given by the Holy Office to the Apostolic Nuncio of Belgium, September 14, 1866. But if you admit that by Belgian law the dissolution of the bond was originally regarded, the sense of the law already for a long time seems to have been so changed by usage that the law rather permits one to act as if the bond were dissolved than itself intends to dissolve the bond. Favorers of the stricter opinion chiefly allege responses of the Holy Office, June 25, 1885 and May 27, 1886; but the adversaries respond that these were probably given by reason of peculiar circumstances.[3]

Corollary I. Advocates of themselves speak licitly for divorce only insofar as the spouses licitly petition for it. If they petition illicitly, the advocate is not excused except on account of a most grave cause.

Corollary II. Where separation from bed and cohabitation suffices for the intended end, divorce of itself cannot be petitioned. Nevertheless it is licit on account of a very grave cause; for instance if, when divorce is petitioned, the whole offspring will be entrusted to the religious spouse, but if it is not petitioned, a part of the children certainly or probably will be entrusted to the irreligious spouse.

Corollary III. Pastors and confessors should for the most part endeavor to turn the faithful away from the plan of obtaining divorce, and to exhort the separated to restore common life, namely on account of the danger of incontinence which rather often is imminent to each party. There is added the fact that the education of the offspring easily suffers detriment; indeed the fear that the offspring, wholly or in part, may be adjudged to a pernicious spouse can be a reason on account of which one must abstain from divorce or from a lesser separation.

[1] Cf. Duynstee, Burgerlijk Recht en zielzorg, n. 76.

[2] Holy Office, September 9, 1824.

[3] De Smet, op. cit., n. 399.

Appendix III. On Civil Marriage

845 I. Notion. Civil marriage strictly taken is a true marriage contracted or attempted according to civil law before a civil official. Broadly taken it is the formality performed before a civil official, or notification made to a civil official of a marriage already contracted, made in order to acquire civil effects for the marriage.

II. Morality. We are speaking of the marriage of Christians; for as regards the marriage of infidels, which is subject to the civil power, there is no difficulty.

1. The law of civil marriage is dishonorable insofar as, according to the mind of the legislator, it commands Christians to emit true consent before an official of the State, and to place civil marriage before ecclesiastical marriage. For the Church prescribes, and indeed for validity, that Christians furnish consent before their own minister; for liceity she commands that they contract before their own minister before they contract before the magistrate.[1] Nevertheless, practically:
2. Those about to marry can posit the civil act and place it before the ecclesiastical act, provided they intend nothing other than to perform the civil ceremony; indeed, ordinarily there is an obligation of acting in this way, namely so that they may provide for themselves, for the other spouse, and for the offspring[2] (St. Alphonsus II, 16).

3. Officials and witnesses licitly assist at the civil act as follows:

a) This is commonly affirmed if the legislator does not intend to touch the bond.

b) It is likewise licit, provided a proportionate cause underlies it, even if the legislator intends to touch the bond. And this holds even if those about to marry, who are held by a dispensable impediment, are foreseen not to be going afterward to contract true marriage.[3] Indeed, the same is sufficiently probably affirmed even if those about to marry cannot even contract a valid marriage on account of an indispensable impediment, for instance that of bond, which stands in the way. The reason is that the official and witnesses can abstract from the intention of the legislator, and therefore not assist with the intention of assisting true consent; this is not evil in itself. And since they can abstract, and therefore, as Catholics, for we are now speaking of them, truly do abstract and must be judged to abstract, their action does not involve approval, and therefore not formal cooperation, of the action of those about to marry, who perhaps do not abstract from the intention of the legislator or who intend true consent. I said that they can abstract from the intention of the legislator, just as those about to marry themselves can and must abstract from it.

This question, if an indispensable impediment stands in the way of the marriage, especially bond, is sharply disputed; moreover, it does not seem able to be settled by authority. Defenders of the stricter opinion appeal to the Sacred Penitentiary (November 28, 1883) and to the Holy Office (December 11, 1830 and May 27, 1886). But the Congregations "do not mark that assistance as intrinsically evil, which could be tolerated in no case. Besides, the first treats of missionaries, not of laypersons; the second was given for France soon after the law of divorce had been introduced; and the Sacred Penitentiary responded to a Bishop of Italy, where divorce in the civil forum is not yet in force, and a new marriage was evidently contracted after the religious marriage had been legitimately celebrated."[4] In a word: the Sacred Congregations perhaps responded in this way because they judged that, on account of special circumstances, no proportionate cause was given by which material cooperation would be made honorable.

One who admits the stricter opinion should leave officials in good faith, and should send those asking questions, on account of the importance of the matter, to the Ordinary.

[1] Cf. Letter of Leo XIII to the Bishop of Verona, February 8, 1893.

[2] Constitution of Benedict XIV Redditae sunt nobis, September 17, 1746; Instruction of the Sacred Penitentiary, January 15, 1866; Encyclical of Leo XIII Arcanum; Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, July 1, 1917.

[3] Cf. Instruction of the Sacred Penitentiary, January 15, 1866, which in the case responded that "Officials are to be directed according to the rules handed down by approved authors, and especially by St. Alphonsus de Liguori, concerning cooperators"; Instruction, March 29, 1885.

[4] Wernz-Vidal, op. cit., n. 591.

Book IV. On the Sanction of Christian Life, or on Ecclesiastical Penalties

(St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VII, nn. 1-340; Homo Apostolicus, tract 19, nn. 1-71).[1]

After in special moral theology we have treated of the due cultivation of virtues and of the principal means of obtaining the graces necessary for exercising this cultivation, there remains to be explained in what way the Church strives to sanction the observance of virtues and of means, or to coerce transgressions of precepts by established penalties. First and by way of preliminary, however, we will speak of those things which the Church punishes, or of delicts; then of the penalties by which she punishes delicts.

[1] Wernz, Ius Decretalium, VI; Hollweck, Die kirchlichen Strafgesetze; Chelodi, Ius poenale; Sole, De delictis et poenis; Lega, De delictis et poenis; Noldin-Schoenegger, De poenis ecclesiasticis; Vermeersch-Creusen, Epitome Iuris Canonici, III, n. 382 sq.

Treatise I. On Delicts

We will treat first of delict considered in itself; then of the juridic effects of delict; to these we will add a scholion on attempted delict.

Dissertation I. On Delict Considered in Itself

Part I. Summary Exposition

846 I. Nature. By the name of delict in ecclesiastical law is understood an external and morally imputable violation of law to which there has been added at least an indeterminate canonical sanction (canon 2195, § 1). By these words are indicated the three constitutive parts of a delict, namely: 1° violation of a canonically sanctioned law (the legal part); 2° external violation (the objective or social part); 3° morally imputable violation (the formal or subjective part).

1. Violation of law, that is, of a natural law or divine-positive law or ecclesiastical law. To the external and morally imputable violation of a canonically sanctioned precept the same things are applied which are said of delicts, unless something else appears from the circumstances (ibid., § 2). Moreover, violation of a canonically sanctioned law is required, because otherwise the Law does not speak of delict, but of mere transgression (cf. canon 2222, § 1).
2. External; for only an external sin violates, by reason of damage, as it is said, that is, either scandal or material damage, the social order of the Church, which alone merely ecclesiastical legislation regards. That an external but occult act, such as the secret utterance of heresy, is not perceived in the social order and therefore perhaps inflicts no damage on society, is incidental.
3. Morally imputable. What moral imputability is, see volume I, n. 58. By this property canonical delict differs from civil delict, which admits merely juridic fault. When and to what extent a delict is imputable will be said in Part II.

II. Quality and quantity. The quality of a delict is to be taken from the object of the law (canon 2196). Laws differ specifically according to the diverse formal motives from which they were issued; wherefore delicts differ specifically according to the diverse formal motive of the penal laws violated (cf. Theologia Fundamentalis, p. 299). The quantity of a delict must be measured not only from the diverse gravity of the law injured, but also from the greater or lesser imputability or damage inflicted (canon 2196), that is, from the three constitutive parts of the delict (cf. p. 703).

III. Division. From canon 2197 a delict is:

1. Public, if it has already been divulged, or happened or exists in such circumstances that it can and must prudently be judged that it will easily be divulged; that is, if it is such that it is about to become known, at least as an external fact, even if not as imputable, with the character and purpose of the persons who know the delict considered.
2. Notorious by notoriety of law, after the sentence of a competent judge which has passed into a judged matter,[1] or after the confession of the delinquent made in court according to the norm of canon 1750.[2]
3. Notorious by notoriety of fact, if it is publicly known and committed in such circumstances that it can be concealed by no tergiversation and excused by no suffrage of law.
4. Occult, which is not public; materially occult, if the delict itself is hidden; formally occult, if its imputability is hidden.

Note. A delict which injures only the law of the Church, by its nature only ecclesiastical authority prosecutes, with the help of the secular arm sometimes being required where the same authority has judged this necessary or opportune; a delict which injures only the law of civil society, by proper right and with the prescription of canon 120 preserved, civil authority punishes, although the Church is also competent over it by reason of sin; a delict which injures the law of both societies can be punished by each power (canon 2198). But in delicts of mixed forum Ordinaries should regularly not proceed when the guilty person is a layman and the civil magistrate, taking action against the guilty person, provides sufficiently for the public good (canon 1933, § 3).

[1] From canon 1902, a matter is considered judged: 1° by a double conforming sentence; 2° by a sentence not appealed within the useful time, or which, although appealed before the judge a quo, was deserted before the judge ad quem; 3° by a single definitive sentence from which no appeal is given according to the norm of canon 1880.

[2] Canon 1750 declares: The assertion concerning some fact, in writing or orally, made by one party against himself and for the adversary before a judge, either spontaneously or when the judge interrogates, is called a judicial confession.

Part II. Fuller Exposition

A fuller exposition of delict consists in a fuller explanation of the principal element by which delict is constituted, namely, imputability.

847 I. The formal causes of imputability are: 1° the malice of the delinquent; 2° the fault of the delinquent, whether in ignorance of the law or in omission of the diligence required so that the law may be observed (canon 2199).

1. Malice here is the deliberate will of violating the law; to it is opposed, on the part of the intellect, defect of knowledge, and on the part of the will, defect of liberty. Once the external violation of law has been posited, malice is presumed in the external forum until the contrary is proved (canon 2200).

Corollary I. Those who actually lack the use of reason are incapable of delict (canon 2201, § 1). The reason is that deliberation is absent.

Corollary II. Those habitually insane, although at times they have lucid intervals or seem sane in certain reasonings or acts, are nevertheless presumed incapable of delict (canon 2201, § 2). The reason is that deliberation in them is presumed to be absent until it is proved to be present.

Corollary III. A delict committed in voluntary drunkenness does not lack some imputability (canon 2201, § 3). This is clear if drunkenness does not wholly take away the use of reason; but if it wholly takes it away, the delict is imputed if it was foreseen at least in some measure (vol. I, n. 60). Besides, the imputability of a delict committed in voluntary drunkenness is less than when the same delict is committed by one who is fully master of himself, unless, however, drunkenness was sought precisely for perpetrating or excusing the delict. But when law is violated in involuntary drunkenness, imputability is wholly absent if drunkenness wholly takes away the use of reason; it is diminished if it takes it away only in part. The same should be said of other similar disturbances of mind (canon 2201, § 3), for example from morphine.

Corollary IV. Weakness of mind diminishes the imputability of a delict, but does not wholly remove it (canon 2201, § 4).

2. Ignorance of the violated law influences the imputability of the transgression in this way:

a) Inculpable ignorance removes the imputability of the transgression and consequently the delict (canon 2201, § 1).

b) Culpable ignorance diminishes imputability more or less according to the culpability of the ignorance itself (cited canon). Nevertheless, concerning affected ignorance it is disputed whether it increases or diminishes imputability (vol. I, n. 32).

Note 1. Ignorance of the penalty alone does not remove the imputability of the delict, but diminishes it somewhat (canon 2202, § 2).

Note 2. Those things which are established concerning ignorance, whether of the law or of the penalty, also hold concerning inadvertence[1] and concerning error[2] (canon 2202, § 3); likewise concerning ignorance of fact, for instance if someone strikes a cleric whom he certainly or probably holds to be a layman.

Note 3. Ignorance, or inadvertence or error concerning law or penalty or fact, is generally not presumed (canon 16, § 2).

3. Omission of due diligence. If someone has violated the law from omission of due diligence, the imputability is diminished in the manner to be determined from the circumstances by a prudent judge; but if he foresaw the matter and nevertheless omitted the cautions for avoiding it which any diligent person would have used, the fault is proximate to malice (canon 2203, § 1). Moreover, a fortuitous case which cannot be foreseen, or which when foreseen cannot be met, exempts from any imputability (canon 2203, § 2).

[1] It is actual ignorance in one who enjoys habitual knowledge.

[2] It is positive ignorance, or ignorance joined with the admission of what is false.

848 II. The causes modifying imputability are enumerated by the Code:

1. Minority. Minor age, unless something else is established, diminishes the imputability of a delict, and the more so the closer it approaches infancy (canon 2204). Moreover, moral persons (canon 100, §§ 1 and 2) are equated with minors also as regards imputability (cited canon, § 3).
2. Physical force which takes away every faculty of acting altogether excludes delict (canon 2205, § 1).
3. Grave fear, even only relatively grave, necessity, and even grave inconvenience, usually wholly remove delict if there is question of merely ecclesiastical laws. The said causes indeed diminish the imputability of the delict but do not remove it if the act is intrinsically evil or tends toward contempt of the faith or ecclesiastical authority or toward damage of souls (canon 2205, §§ 2 and 3).
4. Just defense. The cause of legitimate defense against an unjust aggressor, if due moderation is observed, wholly removes delict; otherwise it only diminishes imputability, as also does the cause of provocation (canon 2205, § 4), namely, one who provokes the aggressor also exceeds the moderation of defense. Besides, in excess of defense, not so rarely all fault is lacking.
5. Passion, if it has been voluntarily and deliberately excited or nourished, rather increases imputability; otherwise it diminishes it more or less according to the diverse heat of passion; and it wholly removes imputability if it precedes and impedes every deliberation of mind and consent of will (canon 2206).
6. Besides other aggravating circumstances,[1] a delict is increased: 1° according to the greater dignity of the person who commits the delict or who is offended by the delict; 2° from abuse of authority or office for perpetrating the delict (canon 2207).
7. Falling again into delict. A recidivist in the sense of the law is one who, after condemnation, again commits a delict of the same kind and in such circumstances of matters and especially of time that his pertinacity in evil will can prudently be conjectured (canon 2208, § 1). Moreover, one who has offended several times, even in a different kind, increases his culpability (canon 2208, § 2).

[1] Therefore the enumeration is not taxative.

849 III. Imputability of cooperators. In order that cooperation be canonically imputed, some malice or fault and some external influence upon the external fact of the delict are required. Concerning malice and fault, let the things said above be applied; concerning external influence, it must be noted that this is physical or moral, necessary or non-necessary, principal or accessory, positive or negative. Moreover, according to the varying influence upon the delict, the imputability of cooperators is varied as follows:

1. Those who with a common plan of delinquency physically concur together in a delict are all held guilty in the same way, unless the circumstances increase or diminish the culpability of someone (canon 2209, § 1).
2. In a delict which by its nature demands an accomplice, as for example a duel, each party is culpable in the same way, unless something else appears from the circumstances (canon 2209, § 2).
3. Of themselves, both the one mandating, who is the principal author of the delict, and others who induce to the consummation of the delict by persuading, consenting, or morally influencing in some other way, or who concur in this in any way whatever, for instance by physically cooperating, contract imputability not less than the executor of the delict, if the delict would not have been committed without their work (canon 2209, § 3), that is, if their influence was necessary.
4. If the influence of the aforesaid persons was not necessary but only rendered the delict easier, as one which would have been committed even without their concurrence, it carries with it lesser imputability (canon 2209, § 4).
5. One who has fully withdrawn his influence in perpetrating the delict by an opportune retraction is freed from all imputability, even if the executor nevertheless perpetrated the delict for other causes proper to himself; if he has not withdrawn it fully, retraction diminishes culpability but does not remove it (canon 2209, § 5). It is said "by an opportune retraction," namely one which is made at an opportune time and in an efficacious way. It is disputed whether retraction reinforced by arguments sufficiently destroys the influence of clothed counsel. It is probably affirmed (vol. I, n. 1000); wherefore in the case the executor must be judged to offend for causes proper to himself. But if the influence cannot be withdrawn unexpectedly, nevertheless an inculpably inefficacious retraction removes culpable participation in the consummated delict and consequently the imputability of this; but the culpable attempt of the delict remains (cf. n. 851), and, if the case bears it, some imputability for the damage and scandal which followed (canons 2213, § 3; 2235).
6. One who concurs in a delict only by neglecting his office is held by imputability proportioned to the obligation by which he was bound to impede the delict by his office (canon 2209, § 6).
7. Praise of a perpetrated delict, participation in its fruits, concealment and harboring of the delinquent, or other acts following upon a delict already fully completed: 1° can constitute new delicts, if namely they are punished by a penalty in law; besides, 2° they carry with them the imputability of the perpetrated delict if agreement had been made with the delinquent concerning those acts before the delict (canon 2209, § 7).

Dissertation II. On the Juridic Effects of Delict

850 I. From delict, with canon 2210 considered, there arises:

1. A penal action for declaring or inflicting a penalty and for seeking satisfaction.
2. A civil action for repairing damages, if the delict has inflicted damage on anyone. The canonists treat of these matters more broadly according to canons 1552-1959, on trials; only let canon 2210, § 2 be noted: The same judge in a criminal trial can at the instance of the injured party call the civil action to examination and define it.

II. All who concur in a delict according to the norm of canon 2209, §§ 1-3 (n. 849, 1, 2, 3), are held by obligation in solidum of repairing the expenses and damages which have befallen any persons whatever from the delict, although they have been condemned by the judge pro rata (canon 2211).

Scholion. On Attempted Delict

851 I. Notion. Whoever posits or omits acts which by their nature lead to the execution of a delict, but does not consummate the delict, commits an attempt of delict, whether because he deserted his plan or because he could not complete the delict on account of insufficiency or ineptitude of the means (canon 2212, § 1). It is said "acts which by their nature lead"; wherefore merely preparatory acts, such as buying poison or removing impediments, are not an attempt of delict. For this, namely, there is required the execution of the delict itself begun, as is said in canon 2213, § 3. If, all acts having been posited or omitted which by their nature lead to the execution of the delict and suffice for completing the delict, the effect has not followed from another cause, apart from the will of the agent, the attempt of delict is called by its proper name a frustrated delict (canon 2212, § 2). Finally, to the attempt of delict there approaches, and is juridically equated, the action of one who has tried to induce another to commit a delict, but ineffectively (canon 2212, § 3). Moreover, an attempted delict is not always a delict, but only if the attempt of delict is fined by a particular penalty in the law (ibid., § 4). Nevertheless, even a simple attempt of delict and a frustrated delict can be punished by force of canon 2235, as will be said below.

II. The imputability of attempt is less than that of the delict; however, it grows the more it approaches consummation (canon 2213, § 1). Likewise, a frustrated delict is more culpable than a simple attempt of delict (canon 2213, § 2). But one who spontaneously desists from the execution of the delict begun is freed from all imputability, if no damage or scandal has arisen from the attempt (canon 2213, § 3); otherwise this is imputed to him. Likewise, the execution of the delict begun, which by force of the legal sanction is a delict, is imputed also as such (canon 2212, § 4); wherefore, notwithstanding cessation from executing the deed, a penalty latae sententiae has already been contracted.

Treatise II. On the Penalties of Delict

We will treat first of penalties in general; then of penalties in species; then of penalties established for individual delicts.

Dissertation I. On Penalties in General

852 I. To the Church belongs the right, and that native and proper, and independent of any human authority, of coercing delinquents subject to her by penalties, both spiritual and even temporal (canon 2214, § 1). This is drawn from Sacred Scripture;[1] from the practice of the Apostles[2] and of the Church, even as regards temporal penalties;[3] from the Council of Trent;[4] from the nature of the Church, which is a perfect society and therefore enjoys legislative power. But legislative power carries with it coercive power, or the power of sanctioning laws, since without it legislative power would be unsuitable for securely attaining the end.

II. In the use of coercive power, the warning of the Council of Trent should be kept before one's eyes:[5]

"Let Bishops and other Ordinaries remember that they are pastors, not beaters, and that they ought so to preside over those subject to them that they do not dominate over them, but love them as sons and brothers, and labor by exhorting and warning to deter them from illicit things, lest, when they have offended, they be forced to coerce them with due penalties. Nevertheless, if it should happen that they sin in something through human frailty, that precept of the Apostle is to be observed by them, that they reprove, entreat, and rebuke them in all goodness and patience, since often benevolence does more toward correcting than austerity, exhortation more than threat, charity more than power. But if, on account of the gravity of the delict, the rod will be necessary, then rigor is to be used with meekness, judgment with mercy, severity with gentleness, so that discipline, salutary and necessary for the peoples, may be preserved without harshness, and those who have been corrected may be amended, or, if they are unwilling to come to their senses, others may be deterred from vices by the salutary example of action taken against them" (canon 2214, § 2).

With these things noted beforehand, we will speak first of the notion, division, imposition, and interpretation of penalties; then of the Superior having the power of punishing; then of the subject liable to the power of punishing; finally of the remission of penalties.

[1] Matthew 18:17-18.

[2] 1 Corinthians 5:3-5; 2 Thessalonians 3:14, etc.

[3] Whether the Church can punish certain most grave delicts with death or mutilation is disputed. More commonly it is denied, nor in her own forum has she ever used this power.

[4] Session 7, canon 14; session 14, canon 4; session 25, chapter 14, etc.

[5] Session 13, chapter 1.

Part I. On the Notion, Division, Imposition, and Interpretation of Penalties

853 I. Notion. An ecclesiastical penalty is the privation of some good, inflicted by legitimate authority for the correction of the delinquent and the punishment of the delict (canon 2215). It is said:

1. Of some good, that is, either spiritual or temporal or mixed, as a benefice is.
2. For the correction of the delinquent and the punishment of the delict. The amendment of the delinquent is not always the primary end of an ecclesiastical penalty, although the Church always ultimately intends the salvation of souls, and consequently also the amendment of delinquents. But proximately, besides amendment, she intends: to repair the injured order by taking vengeance concerning the delict; to render the delinquent incapable of further damage; to effect that others may have fear.

II. Division. Penalties are distinguished:

1. By reason of the primary end, into medicinal penalties or censures, vindicative penalties, and penal remedies and penances (canon 2216). Medicinal penalties or censures primarily intend the amendment of the delinquent. Vindicative penalties primarily regard vengeance concerning the delict. Penal remedies intend to forestall true delicts or further delicts; hence they either suppose only a transgression which nevertheless does not reach the nature of a delict, or regard a delict perhaps to be perpetrated, but not one already perpetrated. Especially under this head they are not penalties in the proper sense.
2. By reason of determination, a penalty is called determinate if it is established taxatively in the law itself or precept; indeterminate if it is left to the prudent judgment of the judge or Superior, whether by preceptive or facultative words (canon 2217, § 1, 1°).
3. By reason of the mode by which it is inflicted, a penalty is called latae sententiae if a determinate penalty has been added to the law or precept in such a way that it is incurred by the very fact of the delict committed, that is, without a condemnatory sentence or a new precept of infliction; nevertheless, a declaratory sentence is sometimes added, as will be said below. It is ferendae sententiae if it must be inflicted by a judge or Superior (canon 2217, § 1, 2°), namely through a condemnatory sentence or in the manner of a particular precept. It is clear that an indeterminate penalty is always ferendae sententiae.
4. By reason of the author, a penalty is called a iure, by law, if a determinate penalty is established in the law itself, whether it is latae sententiae or ferendae; ab homine, by man, if it is issued in the manner of a particular precept or by a condemnatory judicial sentence, even if established in the law. Wherefore a determinate penalty ferendae sententiae, added to a law, before the condemnatory sentence is only a iure; afterward it is at once a iure and ab homine, but is considered as ab homine (canon 2217, § 1, 3°). On this consideration depends the competence of remitting the penalty, as will be explained. A penalty latae sententiae to which a declaratory sentence has been added remains a iure.

The question whether a penalty established neither by law nor in the manner of a particular precept, but by a general precept, is a iure or ab homine is not solved by the Code. The more common opinion holds that it is a iure; and this is therefore also preferable, because it is the more benign interpretation (cf. canon 2219, § 1).

Note. A penalty is always understood as ferendae sententiae, unless it is expressly said that it is latae sententiae or contracted ipso facto or ipso iure, or unless other similar words are used (canon 2217, § 2).

III. Imposition of penalty. 1. In decreeing penalties, an equitable proportion with the delict is to be observed, with account taken of imputability, scandal, and damage; wherefore there must be considered not only the object and gravity of the law, but also the age, knowledge, training, sex, condition, state of mind of the delinquent, the dignity of the person who is offended by the delict or who commits the delict, the intended end, the place and time in which the delict was committed, whether the delinquent acted from an impulse of passion or on account of grave fear, whether he repented of the delict and himself strove to avoid its evil effects, and other similar things (canon 2218, § 1).

2. Not only those things which excuse from all imputability, but also those which excuse from grave imputability, likewise excuse from any penalty, both latae and ferendae sententiae, even in the external forum, if the excuse is established for the external forum (canon 2218, § 2), that is, proved.

3. A penalty should not be inflicted in the case of equal mutual injury; for, as canon 2218, § 3 has it: Mutual injury is compensated, unless one party must be condemned on account of the greater gravity of the injury inflicted by the same party, with the penalty diminished if the case bears it.

IV. Interpretation of penalty. In penalties the more benign interpretation is to be made (canon 2219, § 1). And canon 19 says: Laws which establish a penalty are subject to strict interpretation. Hence:

1. In a doubt of law concerning the existence of a penalty, namely, whether a certain penal law regards the fact perpetrated here and now, that penalty, if it is latae sententiae, is not incurred; if ferendae, it should not be inflicted. In a doubt of law concerning the quality of the penalty, namely, whether the law contains a penalty latae or ferendae sententiae, the penalty should be understood as ferendae sententiae; whether it is a iure or ab homine, it should be understood as a iure.[1] In a doubt of law concerning the quantity of one penalty, namely, whether the law prescribes a graver or a lighter penalty, the milder one should rather be decreed. In a doubt of law concerning the number of penalties, namely, whether one penalty or several penalties are to be applied, only one penalty is to be applied. But if it is doubted whether a penalty inflicted by a competent Superior is just or not, the penalty must be observed in each forum, except in the case of an appeal in suspensive. But a manifestly unjust penalty, as regards substance, and therefore manifestly invalid, is to be sustained in neither forum. On a doubt of fact, see n. 858.

[1] A doubt of law in this matter exists concerning a general penal precept, as was said above.

Part II. On the Superior Having the Power of Punishing

854 Ecclesiastical penal law treats only of a Superior who enjoys jurisdiction to be exercised in the external forum of the Church.[1] Moreover, insofar as this jurisdiction regards penalties, it is distinguished as twofold: non-judicial or voluntary, and judicial or necessary. The former in Penal Law confers the power of establishing penalties and applying them outside trial; the latter furnishes the power of applying, according to the norm of Law and indeed in trial, legitimately established penalties (cf. canon 2220, § 1).[2] With these things noted, we will speak first of the Superior having non-judicial jurisdiction, then of the Superior having judicial jurisdiction.

[1] In the internal forum the Church judges by a power not proper, but vicarious.

[2] Nevertheless you should not understand these things as if one who enjoys non-judicial jurisdiction of himself lacks judicial jurisdiction.

Section I. On the Superior Having Non-Judicial Jurisdiction

855 I. Superiors enjoying non-judicial jurisdiction are all and only those who possess the power of issuing laws or imposing precepts (canon 2220, § 1). Of this kind is, for example, the Ordinary of the place; but not the Vicar General without a special mandate. Whether or not a religious Superior also enjoys non-judicial jurisdiction depends on the question whether or not he can impose precepts by power of jurisdiction;[1] concerning this compare vol. I, n. 108.

II. Scope of non-judicial jurisdiction. 1. A Superior enjoying non-judicial jurisdiction can attach penalties to a law or precept issued by himself or by his predecessors (canon 2220, § 1). Besides, those who enjoy legislative power can furthermore, within the limits of their jurisdiction and on account of peculiar circumstances, fortify with a fitting penalty both divine law and ecclesiastical law issued by a higher power and in force in the territory, or aggravate the penalty established by law (canon 2221).

2. Even if no penalty has been annexed to a law, nevertheless a legitimate Superior enjoying non-judicial jurisdiction can, even without previous threat of a penalty, punish transgressions of the law with some just penalty if scandal perhaps given or the special gravity of the transgression bears this; otherwise the guilty person cannot be punished unless he has first been warned with the threat of a penalty latae or ferendae sententiae in the case of transgression and nevertheless, with grave fault according to canon 2218, § 2, has violated the law (canon 2222, § 1). The same must be said concerning inflicting a penalty graver than that indicated by statute or threat; namely, it cannot be inflicted except in a case of scandal or special gravity.

3. Even if it is only probable that a delict has been committed, or if the penal action for a certainly committed delict is prescribed (cf. canon 1703), nevertheless the same legitimate Superior has not only the right but also the office of not promoting a cleric concerning whose suitability there is no certainty, and, for avoiding scandal, of prohibiting the cleric the exercise of the sacred ministry or even of removing the same from office according to the norm of law. All these things in the case do not have the character of penalty (canon 2222, § 2). Otherwise, in the case of a merely probable delict (canon 2233, § 1) or of a prescribed penal action (canon 1703), he cannot inflict a penalty.

4. Finally, the same legitimate Superior can apply a penalty: either 1° outside trial by precept according to these words of canon 1933, § 4: Penance, penal remedy, excommunication, suspension, and interdict, provided the delict is certain, can also be inflicted in the manner of a precept outside trial; or 2° in trial by judicial sentence. Moreover, in order that a delict fall under criminal trial, it must be public (canon 1933, § 1); but when one must proceed against clerics according to canons 2168-2194, this is to be done outside trial, although the delicts are public (canon 2225).

Note. If a penalty latae or ferendae sententiae has been inflicted in the manner of a particular precept, it should ordinarily be declared or imposed in writing or before two witnesses, with the causes of the penalty indicated, preserving the prescription of canon 2193 (canon 2225), that is, unless "suspension from informed conscience" is inflicted (cf. n. 888).

[1] He can do this without doubt by dominative power; to this power also belongs coercive or punitive power. But this power of punishing is not touched upon in ecclesiastical Penal Law.

Section II. On the Superior Having Judicial Jurisdiction

856 First recall that judicial jurisdiction must be exercised in trial. Moreover:

I. In applying penalties, the judge cannot increase a determinate penalty unless extraordinary aggravating circumstances demand this (canon 2223, § 1). Thus the general rule. More specifically:

II. If the penalty is ferendae sententiae, these things are to be observed:

1. If the law in establishing a penalty ferendae sententiae uses facultative words, it is committed to the prudence and conscience of the judge to inflict it or, if the penalty was determinate, to temper it (canon 2223, § 2).

2. But if the law uses preceptive words, ordinarily the penalty must be inflicted; but it is committed to the conscience and prudence of the judge or Superior: 1° to defer the application of the penalty to a more opportune time, if greater evils are foreseen to be going to come from too hasty punishment of the guilty person; 2° to abstain from inflicting the penalty if the guilty person has been perfectly amended and has repaired the scandal, or has been sufficiently punished or is foreseen to be going to be punished by penalties sanctioned by civil authority; 3° to temper the determinate penalty, or in its place to employ some penal remedy or enjoin some penance, if a circumstance is given which notably diminishes imputability, or if indeed amendment of the guilty person is had or chastisement has been inflicted by civil authority, but the judge or Superior besides judges some milder punishment opportune (canon 2223, § 3; cf. canon 2309, § 4).[1]

Note. When a determinate vindicative penalty has been inflicted by condemnatory sentence, the judge can sometimes suspend its execution according to the norm of canon 2288 (n. 889). Hence in canon law the institution of "conditional condemnation" is assumed.

III. If the penalty is latae sententiae, it is indeed contracted at once; but sometimes there is given a sentence which is called declaratory, by which it is authoritatively declared that the delict has been perpetrated and consequently that the penalty has been contracted.[2] Moreover, to declare a penalty latae sententiae is generally committed to the prudence of the Superior; but whether at the instance of the party whose interest it is, or when the common good so requires, a declaratory sentence must be given (canon 2223, § 4).

IV. Concerning the number of penalties the Code establishes:

1. Ordinarily there are as many penalties as delicts (canon 2224, § 1). Moreover, even with ecclesiastical Penal Law considered, one commits a multiple delict: 1° who violates diverse penal laws, whether by one act or by several; but not one who once violates a law issued by several Superiors; 2° who violates a penal law through morally distinct acts (vol. I, n. 253 sq.).

It is disputed: 1° concerning him who violates a penal law through one morally single act, physically multiple, toward diverse persons, for example, one who from the same purpose steals successively but without moral interruption from several persons; 2° concerning him who violates a penal law through one morally single act, physically multiple, several times perfectly consummating the delict itself, for example, one who from the same impulse of passion several times commits carnal sacrilege by copula with the same person;[3] 3° concerning him who violates a penal law through one single physical act toward diverse persons, for example, one who by one physical act kills several clerics. But since, where there is question of penalties, the more benign side prevails, in disputed cases penalties are not to be multiplied.

2. If, however, on account of the number of delicts, there would be an excessive accumulation of penalties to be inflicted, it is left to the prudent judgment of the judge either to inflict the gravest penalty of all, with some penance or penal remedy added if the matter bears it, or to moderate the penalties within equitable bounds, with account taken of the number and gravity of the delicts (canon 2224, § 2).

3. Finally, if a penalty has been constituted both for an attempt of delict and for the consummated delict, when the latter has been admitted, only the penalty established for the consummated delict must be inflicted (canon 2224, § 3). It is said "inflicted"; for when, on account of the attempt, a penalty has already been contracted, and after a moral interruption the delict is consummated, the penalty established for this delict is also contracted. Otherwise, however, if the attempt and consummation coalesce into one.

Note. If a penalty is declared or inflicted by judicial sentence, the prescriptions of the canons concerning the pronouncing of a judicial sentence are to be observed; but if, as was already noted on p. 714, a penalty latae or ferendae sententiae has been inflicted in the manner of a particular precept, it should ordinarily be declared or imposed in writing or before two witnesses, with the causes of the penalty indicated, preserving the prescription of canon 2193 (canon 2225).

[1] If the delinquent did not commit grave sin, procedure can be taken against him only through a penal remedy so that true delicts may be forestalled, or some penance can be imposed on him.

[2] The usefulness of this is well demonstrated by the illustrious Wernz (op. cit., n. 62): "First, in certain penalties an obligation is induced in others toward the guilty person," for example, not receiving the Sacraments from him, "or at least the guilty person is deprived of certain rights which have reference to others. This obligation toward the guilty person cannot be urged, nor must the exercise of his rights be denied or impeded, unless the penalty incurred by him is certainly established" in the external forum; besides, because it would not be equitable that an occult delinquent should have to betray himself by observance of the penalty, the obligation of observing this penalty often does not press without a declaratory sentence.

[3] Sometimes one delict consists in a continuous stretch, for example concubinage, bigamy.

Part III. On the Subject Liable to the Power of Punishing

We shall see first who are subject to a penal law or precept, and to what extent; then what is required for someone actually to contract a penalty latae sententiae; next, what is required for someone to be able to be punished here and now with a penalty ferendae sententiae; finally, what, of what kind, and how great is the obligation of observing a penalty.

857 I. Subjects of a penal law or precept. One who is bound by a law or precept is liable to the penalty annexed to the law or precept, unless he is expressly exempted (canon 2226, § 1). To what extent someone is bound by a law or precept, especially a traveler and a vagrant, see vol. I, n. 126 sq. Nevertheless:

1. If after the perpetrated delict the penal law is changed, the law more favorable to the guilty person must be applied (ibid., § 2).
2. If after the perpetrated delict either the violated law or the attached penalty ceases through a later law, even a penalty inflicted or incurred ceases immediately; but a censure already contracted is excepted (ibid., § 3), because otherwise the end of the censure would not be attained.
3. A penalty, whether contracted or inflicted, binds the guilty person everywhere in the world, even when the right of the Superior has been resolved, unless something else is expressly provided (ibid., § 4); yet a penalty does not always extend itself to all places (cf. canons 2281, 2282). If, however, when the right of the Superior has been resolved, his precept also ceases, to which a penalty had been added, the penalty also must be said to cease, unless it is a censure already contracted.
4. Finally, certain persons are not wholly subject to penal law; namely, although they have committed a delict, a penalty can be inflicted or declared against those mentioned in canon 1557, § 1, only by the Roman Pontiff (canon 2227, § 1), that is:

a) "Against those who hold the supreme sovereignty of peoples and their sons and daughters, or those who have the right of immediately succeeding to the sovereignty." Physical persons are understood: monarchs, presidents of a republic, or others who exercise true sovereignty, and their spouses; not, however, moral persons, even though they have legislative power, nor Ministers of State.[1] Therefore the former do indeed contract a penalty latae sententiae of common law, as established by the Roman Pontiff, but against them it cannot be declared except by the Roman Pontiff.[2]

b) Against Cardinals; who furthermore, unless they are expressly named, are not comprehended under a penal law (canon 2227, § 2).

c) Against Legates of the Apostolic See, concerning whom what was said under a) is valid.

d) Against Bishops, even titular ones, who furthermore are excepted from penalties latae sententiae of suspension and interdict, unless they are expressly named. Therefore they do indeed contract an excommunication latae sententiae of common law, but the same applies as under a).

Note 1. Exempt religious are not bound by diocesan penal statutes unless, while illegitimately living outside the house, they have offended against a particular law of the diocese (canon 616, § 1); if they have offended while legitimately living outside the house, even if they have returned, they can nevertheless be punished by the local Ordinary (canon 616, § 2); finally, they are subject to the coercive power of the local Ordinary in all things in which religious are subject to him (cf. canon 619 and canon 2269, § 2), unless special privileges stand in the way.

Note 2. By force of canon 1, this Penal Law does not regard the Oriental Church; judicial controversies to be handled in judicial order which concern it are, by force of canon 257, § 3, remitted by the Congregation for the Oriental Church to a tribunal assigned by that Congregation, unless there is question of delicts reserved to the Congregation of the Holy Office (canon 247, § 2).

[1] Cf. Noval, op. cit., p. 37.

[2] Nor do penalties latae sententiae of particular law bind them, because "to be inflicted" is also said of a penalty latae sententiae inflicted in the manner of a precept (cf. canon 2225).

858 II. Requisites for someone actually to contract a penalty latae sententiae.

1. Requisites on the part of the delict. A penalty established by law is not incurred unless the delict has been perfect in its own kind according to the property of the words of the law (canon 2228). This condition regards the external part of the delict (n. 846); when the attempt of a delict is punished in law, consummation in the genus of attempt is required. Finally it must be observed that the property of the words requires strict interpretation; for example, the delict of homicide, which is punished by law, is not present unless death has followed. In doubt, whether of the external fact or of imputability, the penalty is not incurred, because from a doubtful cause no one is deprived by a certain right (cf. canon 2232, § 1: "who is conscious to himself of the delict").
2. Requisites on the part of the delinquent regard the formal part of the delict, or imputability. Therefore first recall that grave imputability is required[1] (canon 2218, § 2), but does not always suffice, for someone to be liable to a penalty. With these things attended to, certain things are noted or even established by the Code, of which some are general and regard ignorance and similar things which influence imputability; others concern the impubescent and cooperators.

a) General matters. alpha) Affected ignorance either of the law or of the penalty alone excuses from no penalties latae sententiae (canon 2229, § 1).

beta) If the law has the words: has presumed, has dared, knowingly, studiously, rashly, has acted deliberately, or other similar words which require full knowledge and deliberation, any diminution of imputability, whether on the part of the intellect or on the part of the will, exempts from penalties latae sententiae (canon 2229, § 2). It is said any diminution of imputability; hence even ignorance of the penalty, unless it is affected (cf. canon 2202, § 2); likewise even light fear.

gamma) If the law does not have those words:

1° Crass or supine ignorance of the law, or even of the penalty alone, exempts from no penalty latae sententiae. Ignorance of the law, or even of the penalty alone, which was not crass or supine excuses from medicinal penalties latae sententiae; but if the imputability of the delict is grave, it does not excuse from vindicative penalties latae sententiae (canon 2229, § 3, 1°, compared with canon 2218, § 2).

2° Drunkenness, omission of due diligence, weakness of mind, or impulse of passion, if, notwithstanding the diminution of imputability, the action is still gravely culpable, do not excuse from penalties latae sententiae (canon 2229, § 3, 2°).

3° Grave fear, if the delict tends toward contempt of the faith or of ecclesiastical authority or toward public harm of souls, in no way exempts from penalties latae sententiae (canon 2229, § 3, 3°). With these things attended to, grave fear outside the enumerated cases excuses from penalties latae sententiae, at least on account of doubt; the doubt is introduced by canon 2218, § 2.

Note. Although the guilty person according to the norm of § 3, n. 1, is not bound by censures latae sententiae, nevertheless this does not prevent him, if the matter bears it, from being affected by another congruous penalty or penance (canon 2229, § 4).

b) Impubescent persons are excused from penalties latae sententiae, and are to be corrected rather by educational punishments than by censures or other graver vindicative penalties; but pubescent persons who have induced them to violate the law or have concurred with them in the delict according to the norm of canon 2209, §§ 1-3 (n. 849), themselves indeed incur the penalty established by law (canon 2230). Note that an irregularity from delict can nevertheless be contracted by impubescent persons (canon 985).

c) Cooperators. If several have concurred in perpetrating a delict, although only one is named in the law, those also who are mentioned in canon 2209, §§ 1-3, are bound, unless the law has expressly provided otherwise, by the same penalty; the others, however, are not likewise bound, but are to be punished with another just penalty according to the prudent judgment of the Superior, unless the law establishes a particular penalty against them (canon 2231).

Question. To what extent, if there is question of a penalty latae sententiae, is a declaratory sentence required?

Response. A penalty latae sententiae, whether medicinal or vindicative, binds the delinquent who is conscious to himself of the delict by the fact itself in both forums; nevertheless, before a declaratory sentence, the delinquent is excused from observing the penalty whenever he cannot observe it without infamy, and in the external forum no one can exact from him the observance of that same penalty, unless the delict is notorious, the prescription of canon 2223, § 4, remaining firm (canon 2232, § 1; n. 856).

A declaratory sentence carries the penalty back to the moment of the committed delict (canon 2232, § 2); this is practical, for example, in the case of restitution to be made of fruits received, which therefore must be computed from the moment of the perpetrated delict (cf. canon 2280).[2]

[1] At least insofar as the defect of grave imputability excuses from any penalty in the internal forum, and also in the external forum if the defect is proved for the external forum (cited canon).

[2] On the contrary, if someone incurs excommunication latae sententiae and before the sentence acquires an office, after the sentence the acquisition is not rendered invalid, as Cerato thinks, p. 20; for only acquisition after the sentence is invalid (cf. canons 2265, § 1, 2°; 2266; 2296, § 2).

859 III. Requisites for someone to be able to be punished here and now with a penalty ferendae sententiae. No penalty can be inflicted unless: 1° it is certainly established that the delict has been committed; 2° it is certainly established that the delict has not been legitimately prescribed; 3° the guilty person, if there is question of inflicting a censure, persists in contumacy (canon 2233). It is said:

1. It is certainly established that the delict has been committed; but by what method the fact and imputability of the delict must be judged, see in the Code, book IV, title XIX, on criminal trial.
2. It is certainly established that the delict has not been legitimately prescribed. How a delict is prescribed is explained by canon 1703, compared, however, with canon 1555, § 1.[1]

3. If there is question of inflicting a censure, the guilty person is to be rebuked and warned to withdraw from contumacy, with a suitable time for repentance granted, if in the prudent judgment of the same judge or Superior the case bears this; if contumacy persists, the censure can be inflicted (canon 2233, § 2). What contumacy is, see n. 862. Formerly at least three warnings were prescribed, though for a just cause one sufficed (cf. now canons 649, 660). Under present law, however, it is left to the prudence of the Superior how many warnings he gives and also at what interval of time he gives them. Moreover, warnings are required for the validity of the censure; hence a censure ferendae sententiae cannot validly be applied to a delinquent unless after warnings he remains contumacious. On the canonical form cf. canon 2143.

Note 1. One who has committed several delicts must not only be punished more gravely, but also, if in the prudent judgment of the judge the matter bears it, must be subjected to vigilance or to another penal remedy (canon 2234).

Note 2. A frustrated delict or an attempt of delict, unless they are punished by law as distinct delicts, can be punished with a fitting penalty according to their gravity, unless the delinquent is freed from all imputability because he spontaneously desisted from the execution of the delict begun, and no harm or scandal followed from the attempt (canon 2235, compared with canon 2213, § 3).

[1] What the Superior can and must do in defect of this and of the prior condition, see n. 855; cf. canon 2222, § 2.

860 IV. Obligation of observing the penalty. A penalty seems to oblige from the motive of the law to which the sanction has been added. Moreover, the obligation is grave of its kind. Nevertheless, fear of extrinsic and proportionate harm excuses; hence, if the delict is not notorious, even infamy excuses from observing a penalty latae sententiae, for then infamy is an extrinsic inconvenience.

Part IV. On the Remission of Penalties

861 I. The act of remission. Medicinal penalties are remitted through absolution, vindicative penalties through dispensation (canon 2236, § 1).

II. Competent person. Remission of a penalty in general can be granted by him who issued the penalty, or by his competent Superior or successor, or by him to whom this power has been committed (canon 2236). It is said competent Superior, because superiority of precedence of itself does not include power over the jurisdiction of an inferior (cf. canon 271; canon 2236, § 1). Furthermore, the power of exempting from a law also carries with it the power of remitting a penalty annexed to the law (canon 2236, § 2). But a judge who by office applies a penalty constituted by a Superior cannot remit it once it has been applied (canon 2236, § 3). As to those to whom the power of remitting a penalty, whether as ordinary or as delegated, has been committed, we note from the Code:

1. The Ordinary can, by ordinary power, and hence also through one habitually delegated: 1° in public cases remit penalties latae sententiae established by common law, except: a) cases brought to the contentious forum; b) censures reserved to the Apostolic See; c) penalties of incapacity for benefices, offices, dignities, functions in the Church, active and passive voice, or deprivation of these, perpetual suspension, infamy of law, deprivation of the right of patronage and of a privilege or grace granted by the Apostolic See (canon 2237, § 1); 2° in occult cases, remit the same penalties, except censures reserved to the Apostolic See in the most special or special manner (canon 2237, § 2).
2. What any confessor or even any priest can do by a power delegated by law, see n. 865.
3. Besides, delegated power by privilege strictly so called is often given to Nuncios and others for remitting penalties, but only medicinal penalties. Concerning the privilege broadly so called of Cardinals regarding reserved censures, it is stated in its place.

Finally, there are those who can absolve from penalties with this single effect: that toward those punished they can use some privilege of dispensing, according to canon 66, § 3: "In the faculty of dispensing there is also included the power of absolving from ecclesiastical penalties, if any perhaps stand in the way, but only for the effect of obtaining the dispensation" (cf. canon 200, § 1). This is called absolution for the effect.

III. Mode of remitting. 1. For validity it is required that remission of a penalty not be extorted by force or grave fear (canon 2238). Moreover, error renders the act invalid if it concerns that which constitutes the substance of the act or falls upon a condition sine qua non (canon 104).

2. A penalty can validly be remitted to one present or absent, absolutely or under condition, in the external forum or in the internal forum only (canon 2239, § 1). It is said:

a) To one present or absent; nevertheless remission made in the internal-sacramental forum requires the person to be absolved or dispensed to be present.

b) Absolutely or under condition; even under a suspensive condition, for example: I remit the penalty, which will have effect when you have made restitution. Remission can also be granted unto reincidence, for example: if then you do not make restitution, you will fall again into the penalty which now I effectively remit.

c) In the external forum or in the internal forum only; concerning the effect of remission in the internal forum only, see canon 2251 (p. 730, V, 2).

3. Although a penalty can also be remitted orally, nevertheless if it was inflicted in writing, it is expedient that its remission also be granted in writing (canon 2239, § 3).

Note. A delinquent can not only be freed from a penalty through remission, but also can escape a penalty to be inflicted through prescription of the penal action, concerning which see canon 1703 (canon 2240).

Dissertation II. On Penalties in Species

According to the norm of the Code, here there will be discussion both of penalties taken in the proper sense, medicinal as well as vindicative, and of disciplinary means, or penal remedies and penances.

Part I. On Medicinal Penalties, or on Censures

We shall speak first of censures in general, then of censures in species.

Section I. On Censures in General

We shall treat first of the notion, multiplication, and division of censure; then of reservation; finally, of remission of censure.

Chapter I. On the Notion, Multiplication, and Division of Censure

862 I. Notion. Censure is a penalty by which a baptized man, delinquent and contumacious, is deprived of certain spiritual goods or goods annexed to spiritual things, until, withdrawing from contumacy, he is absolved (canon 2241, § 1). It is said:

1. Baptized, because the Church lacks jurisdiction over the non-baptized; against heretics and schismatics she can issue censures.
2. Delinquent and contumacious; these things will be explained more fully under II.
3. Until, withdrawing from contumacy, he is absolved. Namely, censure is a medicinal penalty, and therefore primarily intends the amendment of the guilty person; hence as soon as the delinquent withdraws from contumacy, he must be absolved (St. Alphonsus VII, 1).

Note. Censures, especially those latae sententiae, and most of all excommunication, are not to be inflicted except soberly and with great circumspection (canon 2241, § 2), "since, as the Council of Trent says,[1] experience teaches that if it is struck rashly or for light matters, it is rather despised than feared, and produces ruin rather than salvation."

II. A fuller exposition of the notion will show what things are required on the part both of the delict and of the delinquent, so that the penalty of censure may be decreed; and what things are required so that the delinquent may be absolved.

1. Requisites on the part of the delict. By censure there is punished only an external delict (n. 846), grave (n. 858), consummated (n. 858; St. Alphonsus VII, 31-34, 36; canon 2242, § 1). Note that a grave delict is required not only as to the external act, but also as to the internal act, so that whatever excuses from mortal sin also excuses from censure (n. 858), at least in the internal forum, because in the external forum malice is presumed.
2. The requisite on the part of the delinquent is contumacy (cited canon). Moreover:

a) If there is question of censures ferendae sententiae, one is contumacious who, notwithstanding the warnings mentioned in canon 2233, § 2 (n. 859), does not desist from the delict or refuses to do penance for the perpetrated delict with due reparation of damages and scandal (canon 2242, § 2).[2]

b) But to incur a censure latae sententiae, transgression of the law or precept to which the penalty latae sententiae is annexed suffices, unless the guilty person is excused from it by a legitimate cause (cited canon). It is disputed whether, in a case in which there is question of a censure which is not incurred unless the effect has followed, a transgression morally persisting until the effect has followed is required, so that the censure is not contracted by him who repents of the transgression before the effect. St. Alphonsus (VII, 40) and others affirm this, because a censure does not seem to be contracted by one who, at the moment at which according to the law it is contracted, is already no longer contumacious.

Note. Censure can also be issued against unknown delinquents (canon 2242, § 1), provided, however, that they are somehow determined; as happens, for example, in establishing censures latae sententiae. But a censure issued against an uncertain or indeterminate person would be invalid, for example: "I excommunicate one of the three authors of this crime."

3. The requisite for a delinquent to be absolved is that contumacy has ceased. Moreover, contumacy must be said to have ceased when the guilty person has truly repented of the committed delict and at the same time has given congruous satisfaction for damages and scandal, or at least has seriously promised it; but to judge whether the repentance is true, the satisfaction congruous, or the promise of the same serious or not, belongs to him from whom absolution from the censure is sought (canon 2242, § 3). Therefore the one absolving can sometimes require cautions, so that he may be certain of the serious conversion of the penitent.

Question. When does censure produce its effect, and to what extent is appeal or recourse admitted concerning a censure inflicted or threatened?

Response 1. Censures inflicted by judicial sentence carry execution with them as soon as they have been issued, and from them there is no appeal except in devolutive effect; likewise from censures inflicted in the manner of a precept there is recourse, but in devolutive effect only[3] (canon 2243, § 1).

Response 2. But appeal or recourse from a judicial sentence or precept threatening censures, even censures latae sententiae not yet contracted, suspends neither the sentence or precept nor the censures, if there is question of a matter in which law does not admit appeal or recourse even with suspensive effect; otherwise it suspends the censures, the obligation of observing what is commanded by the sentence or precept nevertheless remaining firm, unless the guilty person has lodged appeal or recourse not only from the penalty, but also from the sentence or precept itself (canon 2243, § 2).

III. Multiplication of censure. Since by several titles someone can be deprived of the same good, "not only diverse censures, but even a censure of the same species, can be multiplied in the same subject" (canon 2244, § 1). Moreover, according to the adage, as many penalties as delicts, the Code establishes:

1. A censure latae sententiae is multiplied: 1° if diverse delicts, each of which carries a censure with it, are committed by the same or by distinct action (p. 716, IV, 1, 1°); 2° if the same delict, punished with a censure, is repeated several times, so that there are several distinct delicts (p. 716, IV, 1, 2°); 3° if a delict, punished with diverse censures by distinct Superiors, is committed once or several times (canon 2244, § 2, 1°, 2°, 3°).

2. A censure ab homine (inflicted) is multiplied if several precepts, or several sentences, or several distinct parts of the same precept or sentence, each inflicts its own censure (canon 2244, § 3).

IV. Division. Censure, as was said of penalty in general (n. 853), is determinate or indeterminate, latae or ferendae sententiae, a iure or ab homine. Besides, censures are divided:

1. By reason of the deprivation of goods, into excommunication, suspension, and interdict; concerning these separately below.

2. By reason of the power of remitting, some are reserved, others non-reserved (canon 2245, § 1). We shall speak specifically of reservation.

[1] Session 25, chapter 3.

[2] An unknown delinquent must be warned by edict before a censure is inflicted, according to the norm of canon 1724, compared with canon 1720, 1 and 2 (cf. also canon 1717, 3).

[3] Recourse extends more broadly than appeal, since the former can be extrajudicial, but the latter cannot in present Law.

Chapter II. On Reservation of Censure

863 I. Notion of reservation. Reservation of censure is its evocation to the judgment of the Superior; therefore it limits the inferior's power of absolving (canon 893, §§ 1 and 2).

II. Power of reserving. Those same persons can reserve censures who can issue them (cited canon). Nevertheless, "if a censure is reserved to the Apostolic See, the Ordinary cannot issue another censure reserved to himself for the same delict" (canon 2247, § 1). In addition, canon 2246, § 1, admonishes: "Let no censure be reserved unless with attention to the peculiar gravity of the delicts and to the necessity of providing more suitably for ecclesiastical discipline and of healing the consciences of the faithful."

III. Reserved censures. 1. A censure ab homine (inflicted)[1] is reserved, and indeed to him who inflicted the censure or issued the sentence, or to his competent superior, or successor, or delegate (canon 2245, § 2).

2. Censures latae sententiae, established by law or by precept, are reserved if this is expressly said in the law or precept (canon 2245, § 4). Moreover, among censures reserved by law, some are reserved to the Ordinary, others to the Apostolic See (canon 2245, § 2). Among those reserved to the Apostolic See, some are reserved simply, others in a special manner, others in a most special manner (canon 2245, § 3).

IV. Interpretation of reservation. Reservation receives strict interpretation (canon 2246, § 2). Therefore reservation is not had in doubt whether the requisites are present so that it must be applied.

V. Effect of reservation of censure with respect to sin. Reservation of a censure impeding reception of the sacraments (n. 864) imports the reservation of the sin to which the censure is annexed (canon 2246, § 3). But a sin of this kind is said to be reserved by reason of the censure, not by reason of itself; hence, "if someone is excused from the censure or has been absolved from it, the reservation of the sin ceases entirely" (cited canon).

VI. Limits of reservation. Reservation of a censure in a particular territory does not exert its force outside the boundaries of that territory, even if the censured person goes out of the territory to obtain absolution; but a censure ab homine is reserved everywhere, so that the censured person can nowhere be absolved without the due faculties (canon 2247, § 2).

[1] Inflicted; for a censure latae sententiae added to a particular precept is indeed ab homine, but is not always reserved, as is said under III, 2.

Chapter III. On Remission of Censure

864 I. The act of remitting. Any censure, once contracted, is removed only by legitimate absolution (canon 2248, § 1). Besides, note:

1. A censure removed through absolution does not revive except in the case in which a burden imposed under penalty of reincidence has not been fulfilled (canon 2248, § 3).
2. If someone is held by several censures, he can be absolved from one, the others in no way being absolved (canon 2249, § 1).
3. One seeking absolution must indicate all cases; otherwise the particular absolution is valid only for the case expressed. But if the absolution, although a particular petition had been made, was general, it is valid also for cases withheld in good faith, except for a censure reserved to the Apostolic See in the most special manner, but not for those withheld in bad faith (canon 2249, § 2).
4. Regarding the connection of remission of censure with sacramental absolution, observe:

a) If there is question of a censure which does not impede reception of the Sacraments, for example of suspension, the censured person, duly disposed and withdrawing from contumacy, can be absolved from sins, the censure remaining firm (canon 2250, § 1).

b) But if there is question of a censure which impedes reception of the Sacraments, the censured person cannot be absolved from sins unless he has first been absolved from the censure (canon 2250, § 2). It is said cannot be absolved, that is, cannot be absolved licitly; but he is absolved validly unless the penitent knows that he cannot be licitly absolved and therefore is indisposed. If the censure is reserved, the sin to which the censure is annexed is also reserved; nevertheless, since it is not reserved by reason of itself, the confessor does not lack jurisdiction over it; hence absolution, even granted in bad faith, directly absolves the penitent even from the reserved sin, unless again the penitent knows that he cannot be licitly absolved and therefore is indisposed (St. Alphonsus VII, 158, 159).

865 II. Power of absolving. 1. In ordinary circumstances absolution can be granted as follows:

a) From a non-reserved censure, in the sacramental forum, any confessor can absolve; outside the sacramental forum, anyone who has jurisdiction over the guilty person in the external forum can absolve (canon 2253, n. 1).

b) From a censure ab homine, he who inflicted the censure or issued the sentence, or his competent Superior, or successor, or delegate, can absolve; moreover, he can grant absolution even if the guilty person has transferred his domicile or quasi-domicile elsewhere (canon 2253, 2°).

c) From a censure reserved by law, he who constituted the censure or to whom it is reserved can absolve, as can their successors or competent superiors or delegates. Therefore:

alpha) From a censure reserved to the Bishop or Ordinary, any Ordinary can absolve subjects; but the local Ordinary can absolve also travelers.[1] beta) From a censure reserved to the Apostolic See, both the Apostolic See itself can absolve, and others who have obtained from it the power of absolving, whether general if the censure is reserved simply,[2] or special if it is reserved in a special manner, or finally most special if it is reserved in a most special manner (canon 2253, n. 3).

Note. Cardinals, by force of privilege, validly absolve any penitents whatever throughout the world from all sins and censures, even reserved ones, except only censures reserved to the Apostolic See in the most special manner and those which are annexed to the revelation of the secret of the Holy Office (canon 239, § 1, 1° and 2°).[3] - The canon penitentiary, both of a cathedral church and of a collegiate church, obtains by law ordinary power, which however he cannot delegate to others, of absolving even from sins and censures reserved to the Bishop, in the diocese even outsiders, and diocesan persons even outside the territory of the diocese (canon 401, § 1). - Finally, a priest chosen by a Cardinal as confessor for himself and his household can absolve them from the same sins and censures from which Cardinals can absolve (canon 239, § 1, 2°). The same must be said, also as concerns cases reserved to the local Ordinary, of the priest whom the Bishop has chosen as confessor for himself and his household (canon 349, § 1, 1°).

2. In more urgent cases any confessor in the sacramental forum can absolve from censures latae sententiae reserved in any manner whatever, with the burden imposed under penalty of reincidence of having recourse, the name withheld, to the Superior and of standing by his commands (canon 2254, § 1). It is said:

a) In more urgent cases. A case is urgent if censures latae sententiae cannot be observed externally without danger of grave scandal or infamy, or if it is hard for the penitent to remain in the state of grave sin for the time necessary for the competent Superior to provide (cited canon).

b) From censures latae sententiae reserved in any manner whatever; therefore it is doubted whether the faculty extends itself to a censure ab homine, contracted by force of a particular precept, if it is latae sententiae. Now this seems to have to be denied; for if it extended itself to that censure, surely, just as in canon 2252, both it would be expressly named and mention would explicitly be made of it in the recourse to be instituted after absolution.

c) With the burden imposed, under penalty of reincidence, of having recourse. Moreover, recourse must be made within a month, at least by letter and through the confessor, if this can be done without grave inconvenience (cited canon).

d) To the Superior, that is, to the Sacred Penitentiary or to the Bishop or another superior endowed with the faculty (cited canon). But notice that recourse can then be made even to the Bishop only if he is endowed with the faculty.[4] Recourse cannot be made to just any subdelegate.[5]

e) And of standing by his commands; this likewise seems imposed under penalty of reincidence.[6]

Note 1. Nothing prevents the penitent, even after absolution accepted as above, and after recourse also has been made to the Superior, from approaching another confessor endowed with the faculty, and from obtaining absolution from him after the confession at least of the delict with the censure has been repeated. Once that absolution has been obtained, he may receive commands from the same confessor, without being bound thereafter to stand by other commands subsequently arriving on the part of the Superior (canon 2254, § 2).

Note 2. But if in some extraordinary case this recourse is morally impossible, then the confessor himself, except in the case of a censure contracted from true or fictitious absolution of an accomplice, can grant absolution without the burden mentioned above, nevertheless imposing those things which must be imposed by law, and imposing a congruous penance and satisfaction for the censure, so that the penitent, unless within a congruous time to be fixed beforehand by the confessor he has done penance and given satisfaction, falls back into the censure (canon 2254, § 3).

It is said: But if... this recourse is morally impossible. Moreover, it is morally impossible: 1° when "neither the confessor nor the penitent can send a letter to the Sacred Penitentiary and it is hard for the penitent to approach another confessor";[7] indeed, 2° when only the confessor can write, but it is morally impossible for the penitent to return to him, and it is hard to approach another confessor.[8]

It is said: Except in the case of a censure contracted from absolution of an accomplice. Hence the confessor cannot grant absolution to a priest offending in this way without the burden of having recourse; therefore the obligation remains until it has been fulfilled. But if both the confessor and the penitent here and now cannot satisfy the obligation physically or morally - suppose on account of sickness or inability to write - the penitent is excused until the impediment has ceased (n. 414).

For the formula of having recourse, see n. 415.

3. In danger of death, from whatever cause it proceeds, all priests, although not approved for confessions, validly and licitly absolve any penitents whatever from any sins or censures, however reserved and notorious, even if an approved priest is present; except, only as to liceity, the case of absolution of an accomplice when another priest is present (canon 882). Nevertheless:

a) Those who, placed in danger of death, have received absolution from some censure ab homine or from a censure reserved to the Apostolic See in the most special manner from a priest lacking the special faculty, are bound by the obligation of having recourse (canon 2252).

b) Recourse must be made to him who issued the censure, if there is question of a censure ab homine; to the Sacred Penitentiary or to the Bishop or another endowed with the faculty, if there is question of a censure a iure (cited canon).

c) Recourse obliges under penalty of reincidence (cited canon); moreover, it seems to press from the time of recovered health. Finally, one must stand by the commands received in the recourse (cited canon), and indeed, as it seems, under penalty of reincidence.[9]

Note. If one absolved from a reserved censure ab homine should prefer after recovered health to seek absolution again, for example from a delegate (canon 2245, § 2), rather than to have recourse to him who issued the censure, this is certainly licit for him.

4. Finally, regarding absolution from censure, let these things be noted concerning supplied jurisdiction:

a) In common error or in a positive and probable doubt, whether of law or of fact, the Church supplies for both the external and internal forum (canon 209).

b) When the power of absolving for the internal forum has been granted, an act placed through inadvertence after the time has elapsed or the number of cases has been exhausted is valid (canon 207, § 2).

c) If a confessor, ignorant of the reservation, absolves a penitent from censure and sin, the absolution from the censure is valid, provided it is not a censure ab homine or a censure reserved to the Apostolic See in the most special manner (canon 2247, § 3).

[1] Regular confessors have this power, but delegated by force of privilege, even those who are not Ordinaries or local Ordinaries.

[2] Ordinaries have this ordinary power in occult cases, as was said in n. 861.

[3] From canon 239, § 1, 2°, it seems to follow that Cardinals cannot delegate this power; otherwise this number 2° would be superfluous; indeed, because the privileges of canon 239 are to be judged personal (cf. II Monitor ecclesiasticus 1919, p. 308).

[4] Pontifical Commission, November 12, 1922, to VIII (A.A.S. 1922, p. 663).

[5] Cf. Holy Office, December 19, 1900.

[6] Response of the Holy See, March 30, 1892, to 3 (A.S.S. XXIV, p. 746).

[7] Holy Office, November 9, 1898 (Collectanea, n. 2023).

[8] Holy Office, September 5, 1900, compared with June 7, 1899 (Collectanea, nn. 2095, 2052). The danger that letters may be opened does not excuse from recourse, since inconveniences are sufficiently forestalled by suppression of the name and pronoun.

[9] Response of the Holy See, March 30, 1892, to 3 (A.S.S. XXIV, p. 746).

866 III. Obligation of absolving. Absolution cannot be denied as soon as the delinquent has withdrawn from contumacy according to the norm of canon 2242, § 3 (n. 862); moreover, the one absolving from a censure can, if the matter bears it, inflict a congruous vindicative penalty or penance for the perpetrated delict (canon 2248, § 2).

867 IV. Form of absolving. Absolution from censure in the sacramental forum is contained in the accustomed form of absolution from sins, prescribed in the ritual books;[1] in the non-sacramental forum it can be given in any manner whatever, but for absolution from excommunication it is regularly fitting to use the form handed down in the same books[2] (canon 2250, § 3).

[1] "May Our Lord Jesus Christ absolve you," etc.

[2] Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 3, n. 7: "May Our Lord Jesus Christ absolve you; and I, by His authority and by the authority committed to me by our most holy Lord the Pope (if he was delegated by the Pope), or: by the most reverend Bishop N., or by such-and-such Superior, absolve you from the bond of excommunication into which you have fallen (or: have been declared to have fallen), because of such-and-such deed (or: such-and-such cause, etc.); I restore you to the communion and union of the faithful, and to the holy Sacraments of the Church, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, + and of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

868 V. Effect of absolution in relation to the forum for which it is valid. 1. If absolution from censure is given in the external forum, it affects both forums (canon 2251).

2. If in the internal forum, the absolved person, scandal having been removed, can bear himself as such also in acts of the external forum; but unless the granting of absolution is proved or at least legitimately presumed in the external forum, the censure can be urged by Superiors of the external forum, whom the guilty person must obey, until absolution has been obtained in that same forum (cited canon).

Section II. On Censures in Species

869 Preliminary Note I. Censures are: 1° excommunication; 2° interdict; 3° suspension (canon 2255, § 1).

Preliminary Note II. Excommunication can affect only physical persons, and therefore, if at any time it is issued against a moral body, it is understood to affect the individuals who have concurred in the delict;[1] interdict and suspension can also affect a community as a moral person; excommunication and interdict can also affect lay persons; suspension, clerics only; interdict, also a place; excommunication is always a censure; interdict and suspension can be either censures or vindicative penalties, but in doubt they are presumed to be censures (canon 2255, § 2).

Preliminary Note III. In the canons which follow:

1° By the name divine offices are understood functions of the power of order which, by the institution of Christ or of the Church, are ordered to divine worship and can be performed by clerics alone (canon 2256, 1°). Mass, the chanting of the hours in choir, a public procession, solemn blessings and consecrations, Benediction with the Most Holy Sacrament, and other things of that kind are enumerated; a sermon also is a divine office, but no one is ever prohibited from assisting at it; cf. canon 2275, canon 2259, § 1.

2° By the name legitimate ecclesiastical acts are signified: to hold the office of administrator of ecclesiastical goods; to act as judge, auditor and relator, defender of the bond, promoter of justice and of the faith, notary and chancellor, messenger and apparitor, advocate and procurator in ecclesiastical causes; to hold the office of sponsor in the sacraments of baptism and confirmation; to cast a vote in ecclesiastical elections; to exercise the right of patronage (canon 2256, 2°).

[1] Concurrence according to the norm of canon 2231 seems to be intended.

Chapter I. On Excommunication

870 I. Notion. Excommunication is a censure by which someone is excluded from the communion of the faithful, with the effects which are enumerated in the canons which follow and which cannot be separated (canon 2257, § 1). That exclusion from ecclesiastical communion, that is, from participation in the goods whose dispensation has been committed to the Church, is among the greatest penalties, and is to be inflicted only with great circumspection (canon 2241, § 2); when it is inflicted or declared in judgment, it is reserved to a collegiate tribunal of three judges (canon 1576, § 1, 1°). It is also called anathema, especially if it is inflicted with the solemnities which are described in the Roman Pontifical[1] (canon 2257, § 2).

[1] Roman Pontifical, title The Order of Excommunicating and Absolving.

871 II. Division. Although on the one hand the effects of excommunication are inseparable from one another, and therefore cannot be separated at the judgment of the one inflicting the penalty, nevertheless by the law itself the effects of excommunication are increased after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence. Furthermore, for the benefit of the faithful the distinction between tolerated and to-be-avoided excommunicates has been introduced (cf. canon 2258, § 1).

1. Tolerated persons are those with whom it is permitted to the faithful to communicate fully in profane matters,[1] and in some sacred matters according to the rules to be handed down. This toleration is for the benefit of the faithful, because exclusion from the communion of the faithful of itself also includes civil communication with them.
2. To-be-avoided persons are those whom the baptized are bound to avoid both in profane and in sacred matters within the limits established by law. But no one is to be avoided unless: a) he has laid violent hands on the person of the Roman Pontiff, and he is to be avoided by the fact itself (canon 2343, § 1, 1°); b) he has been excommunicated by name by the Apostolic See, the excommunication has been publicly denounced, and in the decree or sentence it is expressly said that he must be avoided (canon 2258, § 2).

[1] Saving the natural law, which commands that the danger of perversion be avoided.

872 III. Nine effects are enumerated; moreover, the following are prohibited according to the norm of law:

1. Assistance at divine offices. Assistance is twofold, active and passive. One actively assists who in some way participates in the celebration of divine offices; hence even an inferior minister or one reciting in public psalmody. But singers and organists are not judged to concelebrate. One passively assists who is present but does not participate in the celebration. Therefore:

a) Any excommunicated person lacks the right of assisting, whether actively or passively, at divine offices, but not at the preaching of the word of God (canon 2259, § 1). Nevertheless he himself cannot preach. Moreover, an occult tolerated person by any assistance of itself sins only venially, or even, according to many, not at all, if there is question of passive assistance. A tolerated person after sentence, or one otherwise notorious, sins lightly by passive assistance; gravely by active assistance, if the matter is grave. A to-be-avoided person sins gravely by any assistance, if the matter is grave (St. Alphonsus VII, 173, 175, 177).

b) Regarding the expulsion of an excommunicated person, note:

alpha) Not only a to-be-avoided person, but also anyone after declaratory or condemnatory sentence, or otherwise notoriously excommunicated, is to be repelled from active assistance (canon 2259, § 2).

beta) A tolerated person can be repelled from passive assistance, since he lacks the right of assisting, but he need not be repelled. A to-be-avoided person must be expelled, or, if he cannot be expelled, the office must cease, provided this can be done without grave inconvenience (cited canon). Hence St. Alphonsus (VII, 177), concerning the Sacrifice of the Mass, says: "If he (the to-be-avoided person) cannot be expelled, the office must be omitted, even on a feast day; and the celebrant, if the Canon has not yet begun, must break off the Mass; if he has begun the Canon, he can, the others departing, either proceed with the sacred action or break it off, on account of the probability of each opinion;[1] if he has consecrated, the minister alone remaining, he must proceed up to Communion inclusive and complete the rest in the sacristy or another decent place," connected with the church.

Corollary I. Ignorance which is not gravely culpable, grave fear, and in general a grave extrinsic inconvenience excuses from observing the things set forth.

Corollary II. Prohibited passive assistance contains for the excommunicated person a dispensation from the precepts of hearing Mass, going to choir, and paschal confession. The last of these, however, presses the obligation of seeking absolution from the censure. Nevertheless he is bound privately, and if he is to be avoided, alone, to recite the canonical hours, if he is a cleric or a regular according to canon 610, § 3.

Corollary III. An excommunicated person is not prohibited from entering the Church at a time when the divine offices are not being celebrated, in order to pray privately (St. Alphonsus VII, 174).

2. Reception of sacraments and sacramentals.

a) Any excommunicated person cannot licitly receive the sacraments (canon 2260, § 1); but generally he receives them validly. I have said generally, for regarding the sacrament of Penance the things said in n. 864 are valid.

b) An excommunicated person after declaratory or condemnatory sentence[2] cannot licitly receive sacramentals. An occult tolerated person and one notorious by fact are not prohibited; but sacramentals do not profit these persons either, at least from the impetration of the Church, in whose prayer they do not participate. But exorcism can be performed licitly and validly by legitimate ministers upon any excommunicates (canon 1152). Likewise they seem always validly to receive constitutive sacramentals; for minor orders this follows from canon 968, § 1.

3. Ecclesiastical burial. This consists in the transfer of the body to the church, obsequies celebrated over it in the same church, and its deposition in a place legitimately deputed for burying the faithful departed (canon 1204). Now this ecclesiastical burial must be denied only to an excommunicated person after condemnatory or declaratory sentence, unless before death he has given some signs of penitence (canon 1240, § 1, 2°). Furthermore, to one excluded from ecclesiastical burial there must be denied both any funeral Mass, even an anniversary one, and other public funeral offices (canon 1241); concerning a private Mass to be celebrated for him, cf. n. 208. If the body of an excommunicated person after sentence, or of a to-be-avoided person, contrary to the statutes of the canons, has obtained burial in a church or cemetery, it must be exhumed by permission of the Ordinary, if this can be done without grave inconvenience and the body can certainly be distinguished from other bodies (canons 1172, § 1, 4°; 1175; 1207; 1242).

But if prohibited ecclesiastical burial is stubbornly demanded by others, even with grave threats, nevertheless "care must be taken that all things be done according to the norm of the sacred canons; but insofar as this cannot be obtained without danger of disturbances and scandal, the pastor, neither by himself nor through other priests, is to concur in any way in the funeral rites and burial."[3]

4. Confection and administration of sacraments and sacramentals. An excommunicated person is prohibited from licitly confecting and administering the Sacraments and Sacramentals, saving the exceptions which follow (canon 2261, § 1):

a) The faithful can, for any just cause, seek Sacraments and Sacramentals from an excommunicated person, especially if other ministers are lacking; and then the excommunicated person who is requested can minister them and is held by no obligation of inquiring into the cause from the one requesting (canon 2261, § 2).

b) But from excommunicated persons to be avoided, and also from other excommunicated persons after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence has intervened, the faithful can seek, in danger of death alone, both sacramental absolution according to the norm of canon 882 (n. 370) and 2252 (p. 729), and also, if other ministers are lacking, the other Sacraments and Sacramentals (canon 2261, § 3).

As regards validity: Sacraments are always validly ministered by any persons possessing the required power of order, unless special jurisdiction is required for this; likewise Sacramentals, unless a special faculty is required for them. But an excommunicated person cannot enjoy this faculty, as will be said below at canon 2263, although he validly uses it.

5. Participation in indulgences, etc. An excommunicated person does not become a participant in indulgences, suffrages, and public prayers of the Church (canon 2262, § 1). It is said:

a) Indulgences, whether those which are applied to the living by an act of jurisdiction, or those which are granted to the dead by way of suffrage.

b) Suffrages; by this name here there seem to be understood prayers and liturgical rites which are performed by sacred ministers, either alone or together with the faithful, for a deceased person or for all the departed.

c) Public prayers of the Church, that is, those which are poured forth by sacred ministers, either alone or together with the faithful, in the name of the Church, such as canonical recitations of the divine office, Litanies, etc.

Nevertheless, the following are not prohibited: 1° the faithful praying privately for an excommunicated person; 2° priests applying Mass privately and with scandal removed for him; but, if he is to be avoided, only for his conversion (canon 2262, § 2). Besides, by way of exception, the Church prays for these persons on Feria VI in Parasceve, in the prayer for heretics and schismatics.

6. The exercise of some acts, functions, and privileges, namely by force of canon 2263:

a) An excommunicated person is removed from legitimate ecclesiastical acts within the limits defined by law in their proper places (cf. canon 2256, n. 2; n. 869, prelim. III, 2°).

b) He cannot act in ecclesiastical causes except according to the norm of canon 1654.

c) He is prohibited from discharging ecclesiastical offices or functions, strictly so called, canon 145, and from enjoying privileges previously granted by the Church. Therefore he does not lose functions, unless he is to be avoided, cf. below canon 2266, and privileges. Privileges are understood as personal privileges, strictly or broadly so called, granted to a physical person, or to a religious institute or generally to a moral person for the benefit of physical persons; not, however, privileges of the clerical state (canon 123) or others granted principally for the benefit of the religious institute itself or of the moral person, for example the privilege of exemption; and indeed granted by any ecclesiastical law or Superior. Moreover, besides rights, habitual faculties are numbered with privileges, which are granted either in perpetuity or for a predefined time or a certain number of cases (canon 66, § 1); for example, the faculty of dispensing in matrimonial impediments, or the special faculty of attaching indulgences to sacred things by a blessing. An excommunicated person would indeed use these faculties validly, but illicitly.

7. Exercise of jurisdiction of the internal and external forum. An excommunicated person before sentence exercises jurisdiction validly but illicitly, unless he is requested by the faithful for a just cause. After sentence he exercises it invalidly and illicitly, unless he is requested according to the norm of canon 2261, § 3 (p. 734); then he acts validly and licitly. Therefore excommunicated persons who have not been requested illicitly or invalidly issue laws, delegate others, etc. (St. Alphonsus VII, 185). Nevertheless note that sometimes the invalidity of the act of jurisdiction does not prevent the validity of the external act placed, for example in the distribution of Sacraments.

8. Exercise and acquisition of some special rights. By force of canons 2265 and 2266:

a) An excommunicated person before sentence:

alpha) Validly, but illicitly, exercises the right of electing, presenting, and nominating.

beta) Validly, but illicitly, acquires dignities, offices, strictly so called, benefices, ecclesiastical pensions, or another function, broadly so called, in the Church.

gamma) Validly, but illicitly, is promoted to Orders, even minor ones, and first tonsure (canons 950; 968, § 1).

b) An excommunicated person after sentence:

alpha) Illicitly and invalidly exercises the right of electing, presenting, and nominating.

beta) Illicitly and invalidly acquires dignities, offices, strictly so called, benefices, ecclesiastical pensions, or another function, broadly so called, in the Church.

gamma) Validly, but illicitly, is promoted to Orders, even minor ones, and first tonsure.

delta) He cannot validly obtain any pontifical grace,[4] unless mention of the excommunication is made in the pontifical rescript.

epsilon) He remains deprived of the fruits of the dignity, office, benefice, pension, or function, if he has any in the Church.

c) A to-be-avoided person suffers the same effects as an excommunicated person after sentence; but in addition he remains deprived of the dignity itself, office, benefice, pension, or function.

9. Communion in profane matters. The faithful must avoid communion in profane matters with an excommunicated person to be avoided, unless there is question of a spouse, parents, children, servants, subjects, and generally unless a reasonable cause excuses (canon 2267). From the latter words it follows that the prohibition presses only under light sin. Nevertheless note canon 2338, § 2: those rendering any assistance or favor to an excommunicated person to be avoided in the delict on account of which he was excommunicated incur by the fact itself an excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See.[5]

[1] See, nevertheless, how the parallel case is resolved in canon 1173, § 2.

[2] The things which are valid concerning an excommunicated person after sentence must also be understood concerning a to-be-avoided person, although condemned by decree of the Apostolic See, but not concerning one notorious by fact.

[3] Sacred Penitentiary, December 10, 1860 (A.S.S. I, p. 563, question 21).

[4] There are also dispensations and privileges, according to canon 36, § 2; cf. the Order to be observed in the Sacred Congregations, September 20, 1908, Part II, chapter III, n. 6. If mention of the penalty is made, absolution for the effect is added.

[5] One gives favor who, although he becomes in no way a participant in the continued delict, nevertheless procures for the delinquent some material or moral advantage on account of it (Chelodi, op. cit., p. 80, 2).

873 IV. Violation of excommunication is a grave or light sin according as the excommunicated person places an act excluded by excommunication of grave or light importance. In addition, a cleric excommunicated in sacred orders, who places an act of order reserved to clerics constituted in sacred order, is irregular (canon 985, 7°). Finally, if someone, with hardened spirit, has wallowed for a year in the censure of excommunication, he is suspected of heresy (canon 2340, § 1).

Chapter II. On Interdict

874 I. Notion. Interdict is a censure by which the faithful, remaining in the communion of the Church, are prohibited from the sacred things which are enumerated in the canons which follow (canon 2268, § 1). It is said censure, but it can besides be inflicted as a vindicative penalty (n. 890). It is said sacred things; these are divine offices, Sacraments and Sacramentals, or ecclesiastical burial. Furthermore, those personally interdicted sometimes cannot exercise certain rights. The effects of interdict can be separated, so that it is left to the judgment of the Superior which privations he commands, unless it is an interdict established by common law.

875 II. Division. Interdict is: 1° personal or local;[1] 2° general or particular, according as the subjects of the penalty differ.

1. Interdict is personal when the use of sacred things is directly interdicted to the persons themselves; local, when the use of sacred things is indirectly interdicted to persons, because in certain places the dispensation or reception of sacred things is forbidden (cf. canon 2268, § 2).

2. It is general when it is issued against a group of persons, and is a general personal interdict; or against some territory, whose sacred and profane places it affects, and is a general local interdict. It is particular when it is issued against particular persons expressly designated, and is a particular personal interdict; or against particular sacred places, namely churches, altars, cemeteries, and is a particular local interdict.

Finally, a personal interdict can be issued at the same time both against a community as such and against the individual delinquent persons of some community, so that the interdict is at once general and particular.

[1] Formerly there existed a mixed or ambulatory interdict, which held any place during the presence of the interdicted person; now it has been abolished.

876 III. Author. 1. A general interdict against a diocese, whether against the territory or against the people, can be issued only by the Apostolic See or at its mandate (canon 2269, § 1).

2. A general interdict against a parish, and also any particular interdict against subject persons or places, can be issued by a Bishop (cited canon). A religious Superior cannot issue a local interdict, because his jurisdiction is only personal.

877 IV. Interpretation. 1. When a city is interdicted, accessory places, even exempt ones, and the cathedral church itself also remain interdicted; when a church is interdicted, contiguous chapels are interdicted, but not the cemetery; when a chapel is interdicted, the whole church is not interdicted, nor, when a cemetery is interdicted, is the church contiguous to it interdicted, but all oratories erected in the cemetery are interdicted (canon 2273).

2. A personal interdict follows the persons who are held by the interdict everywhere, so that in whatever place they suffer the effects of the penalty (canon 2269, § 2); but a general personal interdict does not hold infants and others not liable to penal law, nor arriving persons, travelers, and vagrants; but it does hold the innocent, and even the absent, who, for example by domicile, are members of the community. Furthermore, from the common and more benign interpretation, when the people are interdicted, the clergy are not of themselves judged interdicted; and also conversely, so that when the clergy are interdicted, the non-interdicted people can call other clerics. Likewise, when the clergy are interdicted, religious are not judged interdicted unless they have a secular benefice (St. Alphonsus VII, 331).

3. A local interdict does not press outside the interdicted place; but in the interdicted place all, even outsiders or exempt persons, a special privilege excluded, must observe it (cited canon). The reason is that it directly affects the territory, but indirectly the persons; nevertheless for the innocent and travelers, or even for infants, such an interdict does not have the character of a penalty, but of a disciplinary privation. The same is valid concerning the innocent in a personal interdict.

878 V. Effects of a local interdict. A local interdict, whether general or particular, prohibits in the place any divine office or sacred rite, with the following exceptions (canon 2270, § 1):

1. In every local interdict: 1° All sacraments and sacramentals can be ministered to the dying, with the things to be observed being observed; the chief of these are that the ministers not be impeded and solemnities be omitted (canon 2270, § 1, compared with canon 2271, 2°). 2° A local interdict is suspended on the day of the Nativity of the Lord, Easter, Pentecost, the Most Holy Body of Christ, and the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary into heaven,[1] and only the conferral of orders and the solemn nuptial blessing are prohibited (canon 2270, § 2). It is said on the day, so that the octave is excluded.

2. In a general local interdict, unless the decree expressly provides something else:

a) Clerics, provided they themselves are not personally interdicted, are permitted to perform privately all divine offices and sacred rites in any church or oratory, with closed doors, in a subdued voice, and without bells being rung (canon 2271, 1°).

b) But in the cathedral church, parochial churches, or in the church which is the only one in the town, and in those alone, there are permitted: the celebration of one Mass, reservation of the Most Holy Sacrament, administration of baptism, Eucharist, and penance, assistance at marriages, with the nuptial blessing excluded, funeral obsequies of the dead, any solemnity nevertheless being forbidden, the blessing of baptismal water and of sacred oils, and the preaching of the word of God. In these sacred functions, however, chant and pomp in sacred furnishings and the sound of bells, organs, or other musical instruments are prohibited; and sacred Viaticum is to be carried privately to the sick (canon 2271, 2°).

3. In a particular local interdict:

a) If the altar or chapel of some church has been interdicted, no sacred office or sacred rite is to be celebrated in them (canon 2272, § 1).

b) If the cemetery has been interdicted, the bodies of the faithful can indeed be buried there, but without any ecclesiastical rite (canon 2272, § 2).

c) If the church or oratory of some Chapter has been interdicted, and the Chapter has not been interdicted, because then nothing is permitted to it, the Chapter is permitted to perform all divine offices and sacred rites of its function privately, according to canon 2271, 1°, in any church or oratory, even in its own interdicted church or oratory, unless the decree of interdict commands that in another church or oratory the conventual Mass be celebrated and the canonical hours be publicly recited (canon 2272, § 3, 1°).

d) If the parochial church has been interdicted, it is permitted to perform in it all the things which above, canon 2271, 2°, were said concerning the cathedral church and other parochial churches under a general interdict, unless the decree of interdict substitutes another church for it during the time of the interdict (canon 2272, § 3, 2°).

[1] Furthermore in Spain on the day of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary by privilege of Leo X.

879 VI. Effects of personal interdict. Those personally interdicted by force of canon 2275:

a) Cannot celebrate divine offices or assist at them, except the preaching of the word of God; those passively assisting need not be expelled; but interdicted persons after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence has been issued, or otherwise notoriously interdicted, are to be repelled from active assistance which carries with it some participation in celebrating divine offices (cited canon, 1°).

b) They are prohibited from ministering and confecting Sacraments and Sacramentals, unless the interdicted person before sentence has been requested by the faithful, who may seek this for a just cause, especially if other ministers are lacking; or unless after sentence he has been requested in danger of death, either to absolve the faithful sacramentally, although another priest is present, or to give the other Sacraments and Sacramentals if other ministers are lacking.

c) They are prohibited from receiving the Sacraments; and after sentence they also receive Sacramentals illicitly, except exorcism (canon 1152); but an interdicted person also receives Sacramentals validly, because he communicates with the prayer of the Church.

d) They are also held by the prescription of canon 2265; therefore the things said on p. 735, 8, a) and b), alpha-delta, are to be applied to them.

e) After sentence they are deprived of ecclesiastical burial (cf. canon 1204), unless before death they have given some signs of penitence; and under the same restriction there must be denied to them both any funeral Mass, even an anniversary one, and other public funeral offices.

f) Finally, after sentence, a pastor or local Ordinary assists at marriage invalidly, whether by himself or through another (canon 1095). Before sentence he assists even licitly.

880 VII. Effects of an interdict issued because a community or college has perpetrated a delict. An interdict of this kind can be issued either against the individual delinquent persons, or against the community as such, or against the delinquent persons and the community (canon 2274, § 1). Now:

1. If the interdict has been issued against the individual delinquent persons, those persons, but not the innocent, are personally interdicted, and therefore are held by the things set forth under VI (canon 2274, § 2).
2. If the interdict has been issued against the community as such, the community or college cannot exercise any spiritual right which belongs to it (canon 2274, § 3). Spiritual rights are judged to be: the right of electing, presenting, conferring benefices, celebrating the divine office by office,[1] etc.; but not the right of administering goods and similar things.
3. If the interdict has been issued against the delinquents and against the community, the effects assigned under 1 and 2 are cumulated (canon 2274, § 4).

[1] For example, celebrating the conventual Mass and reciting the canonical hours in common, if there is question of a Chapter interdicted as such (canon 2272, § 3, 1°).

881 Question 1. To what extent does interdict redound upon the innocent?

Response 1. One who is subject to a local interdict, without having given cause for it and without being prohibited by another censure, can, if he is duly disposed, receive the Sacraments without absolution from the interdict or any other satisfaction; and indeed, in the interdicted place itself, those sacraments which are licitly administered there (canon 2276; cf. canon 2271, n. 878), or in another non-interdicted place, the other sacraments. Likewise he can freely go to other places so that he may assist at divine offices and be freed from the other privations of the local interdict.

Response 2. An innocent person, if an interdict is issued against the individual delinquents of the community of which he is a member, undergoes the effects of those personally interdicted only indirectly, because he cannot receive sacraments or other things from them. He himself is free in all things, and not even for the external forum does he need absolution in order to receive the Sacraments (canon 2276).

Response 3. An innocent person, being subject to an interdict against a community as such, cannot exercise the common rights of the community; but because he is not held by the censure, since it supposes a delict, he does not need absolution in order to receive the Sacraments (canon 2276).

Response 4. If the things placed under responses 2 and 3 are cumulated, the things said there are to be observed (cited canon).

Note. Those who have given cause for a local interdict or for an interdict against a community or college are by the fact itself personally interdicted (canon 2338, § 4).

Question 2. What does interdict from entrance into the church import?

Response. Interdict from entrance into the church, which is a certain part of a special personal interdict, does not deprive one of those goods which we indicated under VI, but from canon 2277 it carries with it the prohibition that one celebrate divine offices in church or assist at them, except preaching, or have ecclesiastical burial. Therefore he can, provided he is duly disposed, receive the Sacraments, even in church, when divine offices are not being celebrated; or celebrate divine offices or assist at them outside the church, taken in the strict sense according to canon 1161. But if he assists, actively or passively, in church, he need not be expelled; nor if he is buried in a sacred place is it necessary that the body be removed.

In present Law it is established in only three cases (canon 2329; canon 2338, § 3; canon 2339); it can be issued as a vindicative penalty.

882 VIII. Cessation of interdict. It is proper to interdict that, besides the modes common to all penalties, it also ceases when the interdicted place has been destroyed or the interdicted community extinguished. But it is clear of itself that absolution given in the internal forum never touches the local interdict itself, or a general personal interdict as such. One who without fault is subject to an interdict against a community is freed by the fact itself from this interdict when he ceases to be a member of the community; nor does he need absolution.

883 IX. Violation of interdict is a grave or light sin according as the act excluded by interdict is of grave or light importance (cf. St. Alphonsus VII, 336).

Chapter III. On Suspension

884 I. Notion. Suspension is a censure by which a cleric is prohibited from office or benefice, or from both (canon 2278, § 1). It is said:

1. Censure; but it can be inflicted as a vindicative penalty (canon 2255, § 2).
2. Cleric, because he alone is the subject of suspension; and indeed suspension can be issued against a community and members at the same time.

3. Office; this is understood strictly so called (canon 145, § 2), and is defined: a function constituted stably by divine or ecclesiastical ordination, to be conferred according to the norm of the sacred canons, carrying with it at least some participation in ecclesiastical power, whether of order or of jurisdiction (canon 145, § 1). But because the effects of suspension are maximally divisible (canon 2278), a cleric can by suspension be prohibited even from only part of the power either of order or of jurisdiction, as will be explained.

4. Benefice; moreover, an ecclesiastical benefice is defined as a juridic entity constituted or erected in perpetuity by competent ecclesiastical authority, consisting of a sacred office and the right of receiving revenues from the endowment annexed to the office (canon 1409). But in the penalty of suspension from benefice only the right of receiving revenues is considered, insofar as it is distinguished from the annexed office, as will also be clear below.

885 II. Division. Suspension can be distinguished into total and partial, according as it comprehends all or not all the effects of suspension. Partial suspension is chiefly divided into suspension from office alone and from benefice alone. Suspension from office is either from office simply or from some part of the office, for instance from jurisdiction, from divine things, etc.; these things will be clearer from what will be said concerning the effects of suspension.

886 III. Effects. The effects of suspension can be separated, but unless something else is established, suspension generally issued comprehends all the effects which are enumerated in the article on suspension; otherwise one must speak of suspension from office or from benefice, which comprehends only the effects of one or the other species. Regarding the effects in species, these things are established:

1. Suspension from office simply,[1] no limitation having been added, forbids every act both of the power of order and of jurisdiction, and also of mere administration belonging by office, except the administration of the goods of one's own benefice (canon 2279, § 1). For the administration of the goods of a benefice can be taken away only by an express clause, as is noted in canon 2280.

By force of canon 1095, a pastor or local Ordinary suspended from office, after sentence, assists at marriage invalidly, whether by himself or through another; before sentence he certainly assists validly, but perhaps illicitly by himself, because it seems to be an act of administration belonging by office. For the same reason other acts seem to be prohibited, such as the administration of Viaticum, solemn Baptism, etc. Preaching is not an act of jurisdiction strictly so called, nor, as it seems, of administration; but perhaps it is prohibited to one suspended from office as the exercise of the magisterium which belongs to him from granted jurisdiction.

2. Suspension from office partially carries these things with it:

a) Suspension from jurisdiction generally forbids every act of the power of jurisdiction for both forums, ordinary as well as delegated (canon 2279, § 2, 1°).[2] Jurisdiction is to be taken in the strict sense, so that it does not comprehend acts which require only mission or permission (canons 1328, 848, 748); likewise assistance at the contracting of marriage is not an act of true jurisdiction.

b) Suspension from divine things forbids every act of the power of order which someone obtains either through sacred ordination or through privilege (canon 2279, § 2, 2°). It is said through privilege, for instance the privilege of ministering Confirmation (canon 782, § 3).[3]

c) Suspension from orders forbids every act of the power of order received through ordination (cited canon, 3°), whether major or minor. "One thus suspended can exercise all acts of jurisdiction which do not require the actual use of order; therefore a Bishop suspended from orders only can approve Confessors, although he himself cannot absolve from sins";[4] namely, he acts illicitly or invalidly according to canon 2284.

d) Suspension from sacred orders forbids every act of the power of order received through ordination in sacred orders (cited canon, 4°); the same applies as under c).

e) Suspension from exercising a certain and definite order forbids every act of the designated order; moreover the suspended person is also prohibited from conferring the same order and from receiving a higher order and exercising it after it has been received after suspension (cited canon, 5°).

f) Suspension from conferring a certain and definite order forbids conferring that order, but not an inferior or higher one (cited canon, 6°).

g) Suspension from a certain and definite ministry, for example hearing confessions, or office, for example one with care of souls, forbids every act of that same ministry or office (cited canon, 7°).

h) Suspension from pontifical order forbids every act of the power of episcopal order (cited canon, 8°), for example the blessing of holy oils, conferral of Orders, even Tonsure, consecration of a church, Confirmation, etc.; but a Pontifical Mass is permitted.

i) Suspension from pontificals forbids the exercise of pontifical acts (cited canon, 9°), namely of those sacred functions which by liturgical laws require the pontifical insignia, that is, the staff and miter (canon 337, § 2). One suspended in such a way is indirectly prohibited from exercising acts of order which cannot be exercised without pontificals. Therefore this suspension directly or indirectly prohibits: Pontifical Mass and Vespers, solemn assistance at Mass, conferral of Orders, Tonsure excepted, which probably can be conferred without staff and miter, consecration of a Bishop, blessing of an Abbot, solemn blessing and consecration of virgins, blessing and coronation of kings, blessing or consecration of a church bell, consecration of a church, altar, sacred vessels, solemn blessing of the cornerstone and cemetery, solemn reconciliation of a church and cemetery, solemn Confirmation.[5]

3. Suspension from benefice deprives one of the fruits of the benefice, except habitation in the benefice buildings, but not of the right of administering the benefice goods, unless the decree or sentence of suspension expressly takes away from the suspended person the power itself of administering and assigns it to another (canon 2280, § 1). Fruits are understood as all temporal revenues which remain after the necessary expenses of the benefice have been deducted, namely for Mass obligations, taxes, etc. What things are comprehended in the fruits of the benefice depends on its very erection, according to canon 1410; therefore the question cannot generally be solved, as several authors today have retained from the old law, whether, for example, daily distributions are comprehended in the fruits; rather, what the law is will have to be gathered from the custom of places and from the express will of the one issuing the penalty.[6] See also canon 1412.

One suspended in such a way retains the right of administering the benefice goods, unless the decree or sentence of suspension expressly takes away the administration itself from the suspended person and assigns it to another (canon 2280, § 1). But if the suspended person truly needs it, he can retain those things which are necessary for his sustenance, if his penalty is vindicative; for this seems to be the benign mind of the Superior (cf. the parallel case, canon 2303, § 2); but not if the penalty is a censure, because its duration depends on the conversion of the delinquent (cf. St. Alphonsus VII, 316, doubt 1).

The suspended person must restore fruits illicitly received (cf. canon 2232, §§ 1 and 2); and, if need be, he can also be compelled to this restitution by canonical sanctions (canon 2280, § 2).

4. Suspension generally issued, or suspension from office or from benefice:

a) If it has been issued by the local Ordinary, it affects all offices or benefices which the cleric has in the diocese of the suspending Superior, unless something else appears (canon 2281); but the local Ordinary cannot suspend a cleric from a determinate office or benefice which is found in another diocese (canon 2282). It is expressly said: from a determinate office or benefice, because special suspensions, for example from orders, bind the guilty person everywhere (canon 2226, § 4); but if there is question of suspension from jurisdiction, only insofar as this depends on the Superior who inflicted the penalty.

b) If it is latae sententiae, imposed by common law, it affects all offices or benefices in whatever diocese they are possessed (canon 2282).

Note. The things which canon 2265 establishes concerning excommunication are also applicable to suspension (canon 2283). Hence to anyone suspended there are to be applied the things said on p. 735, n. 8, a) and b), alpha-delta.

5. If the censure of suspension which forbids administration of Sacraments and Sacramentals has been incurred, this prohibition does not press when, before sentence, he has been requested by the faithful, who may seek this for a just cause, especially if other ministers are lacking; or when, after sentence, he is requested in danger of death, either to absolve the faithful sacramentally, although another priest is present, or to give the other Sacraments and Sacramentals if other ministers are lacking. Besides, the things said on p. 734, 4, are to be applied, except the last clause, which is added from canon 2263 (canon 2284).

If the censure of suspension which prohibits an act of jurisdiction in the internal or external forum has been incurred, the things said under 6 are valid; nevertheless an act of jurisdiction is sometimes also invalid, namely if a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been issued, or if the Superior declares that he revokes the jurisdiction itself; and when this last has taken place, even in danger of death only the faithful can seek from the suspended person an act of jurisdiction, which then is valid and licit, always saving canon 884 on absolution of an accomplice (canon 2284).

6. If a community or college of clerics has committed a delict, suspension can be issued either against the individual delinquent persons, or against the community as such, or against the delinquent persons and the community (canon 2285, § 1). Moreover:

a) If the first, the canons of this article are to be observed (canon 2285, § 2), that is, the canons explained in this chapter.

b) If the second, the community is prohibited from the exercise of the spiritual rights which belong to it as a community (canon 2285, § 3). One who ceases to be a member of the suspended community is freed from suspension by the fact itself, and does not need absolution.

c) If the third, the effects are cumulated (canon 2285, § 4).

[1] Sometimes the prohibition does not press, namely when the suspended person is requested according to canon 2284, concerning which see below pp. 768-769, note 3.

[2] What happens if the suspended person is requested by the faithful will be said below; in the same place there will be discussion of the validity of prohibited acts (canon 2284).

[3] See again the limits of canon 2284.

[4] Aertnys-Damen, op. cit., II, 1023.

[5] Solemn is rather often added, because a simple priest can sometimes be delegated to perform several functions in a simpler manner without pontificals (canons 1156; 1163; 1170, § 2; 1205, § 1; 1207). Cf. also canon 294, § 2, as to which functions it is not licit for a Bishop to perform without pontificals, except Confirmation and Tonsure.

[6] Chelodi, op. cit., p. 51.

887 IV. Violation of suspension is a grave or light sin according as the suspended person places an act excluded by suspension of grave or light importance. In addition, a suspended person prohibited from the exercise of Sacred Order, who places an act of Order reserved to clerics constituted in Sacred Order, is irregular (canon 985, 7°).

Scholion. On Suspension from Informed Conscience

888 I. Notion. Suspension from informed conscience is suspension from office, whether total or partial, which is inflicted by the Ordinary by simple decree, by an extrajudicial way and without prior canonical warnings (cf. canons 2186, § 1; 2187). It is not licit to use this extraordinary remedy if the Ordinary can, without grave inconvenience, proceed against the subject according to the norm of law (canon 2186, § 2).

II. Mode of proceeding. A decree of this kind is to be given in writing, unless circumstances demand otherwise, with the day, month, and year designated; and in it:

1. It must be expressly said that the suspension is issued from informed conscience, or from causes known to the Ordinary himself;
2. The time of duration of the penalty must be indicated; moreover, the Ordinary should abstain from inflicting it in perpetuity. But it can be inflicted even as a censure, provided that in this case the cause for which the suspension is imposed is made known to the cleric;
3. The acts which are prohibited must be clearly indicated, if the suspension is inflicted not in whole but in part (canon 2188).

Note. If a cleric is suspended from an office in which another must be substituted in his place, for example, an administrator in the care of souls, the one who is substituted is to receive a wage from the fruits of the benefice to be determined according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary (canon 2189, § 1). A suspended cleric, if he feels burdened, can seek diminution of the pension from the immediate Superior who in the judicial way would be the judge of appeal (canon 2189, § 2).

III. The cause for proceeding in this way is a delict of the cleric: 1° so grave that it must be coerced by a penalty of this kind; 2° morally certain; that is, from investigations conducted the Ordinary must have gathered proofs of such a kind as make him certain that the cleric truly perpetrated the delict (canon 2190). Moreover, concerning the delict observe:

1. A just and legitimate cause is an occult delict (canon 2191, § 1; n. 846).

2. On account of a notorious delict, suspension from informed conscience can never be issued (canon 2191, § 2); but suspension from informed conscience is valid if from several delicts only one was occult (canon 2192).

3. In order that a public delict (n. 846) can be punished by suspension from informed conscience, it is necessary that some one of the following circumstances occur: 1° if upright and serious witnesses indeed disclose the delict to the Ordinary, but can by no means be induced to give testimony about it in trial, nor can the delict be proved in judicial process by other proofs; 2° if the cleric himself prevents, by threats or other means used, a judicial process from being instituted or, once begun, from being completed; 3° if impediments to carrying out the judicial process and issuing the sentence arise from adverse civil laws or from grave danger of scandal (canon 2191, § 3).

IV. Disclosure of the cause to the guilty person. 1. In the case of a censure, that is, of a medicinal penalty, the cause for which this suspension is imposed is to be made known to the cleric, so that he may know in what matter he is to be corrected and, once corrected, can seek absolution.

2. In the case of a vindicative penalty, it is left to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary whether to disclose or withhold from the cleric the cause of the suspension, or the delict, pastoral solicitude and charity nevertheless being used, so that, if he has judged that the delict should be made known to the cleric, the penalty, from the paternal admonitions which he has interposed, may serve not only for the expiation of guilt, but also for the amendment of the delinquent and the removal of the occasion of sin (canon 2193).

V. Recourse from a censure is given only in devolutive effect (canon 2243, § 1), but from a vindicative penalty also in suspensive effect (canon 2287).

If a cleric lodges recourse from a suspension inflicted on him, the Ordinary must send to the Apostolic See the proofs by which it is established that the cleric truly perpetrated the delict which can be punished by this extraordinary penalty (canon 2194).

Part II. On Vindicative Penalties

Section I. On Vindicative Penalties in General

889 I. Notion. Vindicative penalties are those which tend directly to the expiation of the delict, so that their remission does not depend on the cessation of the delinquent's contumacy (canon 2286).

II. Division. A vindicative penalty is distinguished:

1. By reason of the privation, into spiritual or mixed, or even merely temporal, because sometimes it deprives one of merely temporal goods; otherwise than a censure (n. 862).
2. By reason of the subject, into one common to all the faithful or special to clerics.
3. Finally, just as censure, so also a vindicative penalty is latae or ferendae sententiae, a iure or ab homine, determinate or indeterminate.

Note 1. From inflicted vindicative penalties there is given appeal or recourse in suspensive effect, unless something else is expressly provided in law (canon 2287).

Note 2. In canon law the so-called conditional condemnation is assumed; for canon 2288 establishes: if the guilty person is such that for the first time after a life laudably passed he has offended, it is remitted to the prudence of the judge to suspend the execution of the ordinary penalty inflicted by condemnatory sentence; yet on this condition, that if the guilty person within the next three years commits another delict of the same or another kind, he undergo the penalty due to each delict (canon 2288). With the three years having passed without crime, the guilty person is free from the effect of the condemnation. Nevertheless this conditional condemnation is not admitted: 1° in penalties of degradation, deposition, deprivation of office or benefice; 2° if the necessity of repairing scandal presses (cited canon).

III. Cessation. A vindicative penalty is ended:

1. By its expiation (canon 2289), and this mode corresponds to its nature.
2. By dispensation (cited canon); for this there is required a cause proportionate to the gravity of the penal law, because dispensation in a vindicative penalty is against the intention of the law; it is certainly also required that the guilty person be amended and that he have repaired damages and scandal according to his powers. Nor, when the dispensation sought has been denied, can the guilty person appeal, but only for a grave cause have extrajudicial recourse to the Superior.

Dispensation can be granted by: 1° him who issued the penal law or penalty; 2° his competent Superior or successor; 3° the person to whom the power of dispensing from the penalty or from the penal law has been committed (canons 2236; 2237; 2290). Moreover, this power has been committed as follows:

a) The Ordinary, by force of canon 2237, can by ordinary power: 1° in public cases remit vindicative penalties latae sententiae established by common law, except cases brought to the contentious forum, and penalties of incapacity for benefices, offices, dignities, functions in the Church, active and passive voice, or deprivation of these, perpetual suspension, infamy of law, deprivation of the right of patronage and of a privilege or grace granted by the Apostolic See; 2° in occult cases remit vindicative penalties latae sententiae established by common law and reserved in any manner whatever.

b) Any confessor can in the sacramental forum, in more urgent occult cases, namely, if from observance of a vindicative penalty latae sententiae the guilty person would betray himself with infamy and scandal: 1° suspend the obligation of observing the penalty, with the burden imposed of having recourse at least within a month by letter and through the confessor, if this can be done without grave inconvenience, the name withheld, to the Sacred Penitentiary or to the Bishop endowed with the faculty, and of standing by his commands; 2° dispense, if in some extraordinary case the aforesaid recourse is impossible, nevertheless imposing those things which by law must be imposed and imposing congruous penance and satisfaction for the penalty, so that the penitent, unless within a congruous time to be fixed beforehand by the confessor he has done penance and given satisfaction, falls back into the penalty (canon 2290, § 2, compared with canon 2254, § 3); that is, reincidence, although by its own nature it regards censures, nevertheless of itself does not prevent a Prelate from dispensing from a penalty under the condition that the dispensed person, if he does not perform something, is again bound by the bond of the same penalty.[1]

[1] Lega, op. cit., n. 135.

Section II. On Common Vindicative Penalties

890 From canon 2291, the vindicative penalties which can affect all the faithful according to the gravity of delicts, in the Church, especially,[1] are:

I. A local interdict and an interdict against a community or college, in perpetuity or for a predefined time or at the good pleasure of the Superior.

II. An interdict from entrance into the church, in perpetuity or for a predefined time or at the good pleasure of the Superior.

III. Penal transfer or suppression of an episcopal or parochial see; concerning this notice: 1° penal suppression or transfer of an episcopal see is reserved to the Roman Pontiff; 2° but that of a parochial see cannot be decreed by local Ordinaries except with the counsel of the Chapter (cf. canons 248, § 3; 1421; 1428).

IV. Infamy of law; concerning this note:

1. Infamy is either of law or of fact (canon 2293, § 1). Infamy of law is that which is established in cases expressed by common law (canon 2293, § 2). Infamy of fact is contracted when someone, on account of a perpetrated delict or on account of depraved morals, has lost good reputation among upright and serious faithful, the judgment concerning which belongs to the Ordinary (canon 2293, § 3).[2] Neither affects the delinquent's blood-relatives or affines; nevertheless infamy of fact arising from the deed of household members or blood-relatives with whom an irremovable pastor lives can be for him a canonical cause of removal (canon 2293, § 4).
2. One who labors under infamy of law is not only irregular from defect, but besides is incapable of obtaining benefices, pensions, offices, and ecclesiastical dignities, of performing legitimate ecclesiastical acts,[3] of exercising an ecclesiastical right or function, and finally must be barred from exercising ministry in sacred functions (canon 2294, § 1). One who labors under infamy of fact, as long as it endures in the judgment of the Ordinary, is simply impeded from receiving orders, and must also be repelled from ecclesiastical dignities, benefices, and offices strictly so called, from exercising sacred ministry, and from legitimate ecclesiastical acts (canon 2294, § 2); nevertheless he is not incapable, and therefore he validly acquires and acts.

3. Infamy of law ceases only by dispensation granted by the Apostolic See; infamy of fact ceases when, all circumstances having been weighed and especially by long amendment of the guilty person, good reputation among upright and serious faithful has been recovered in the prudent judgment of the Ordinary (canon 2295).

V. Deprivation of burial; concerning this observe:

1. What both ecclesiastical burial and deprivation of it import was said on p. 733.
2. All baptized persons are to be granted ecclesiastical burial unless they are expressly deprived of it by law (canon 1239, § 3). Catechumens who without any fault of their own die without baptism are to be numbered with the baptized (canon 1239, § 2).
3. Those who have died without baptism are not to be admitted to ecclesiastical burial (canon 1239, § 1); yet in them this does not have the character of a penalty. But by way of penalty, from canon 1240, § 1, the following are deprived of ecclesiastical burial, unless before death they have given some signs of penitence:[4]

a) Notorious apostates from the Christian faith, or those notoriously attached to a heretical or schismatic sect, or to a Masonic sect or other societies of the same kind.

b) Excommunicated or interdicted persons after condemnatory or declaratory sentence; from this it is clear that deprivation of ecclesiastical burial depends not only on common law, but also on particular law, for the Ordinary can establish these penalties.

c) Those who have killed themselves by deliberate plan; this plan is presumed in doubt, according to canon 2200, § 2.

d) Those who died in a duel or from a wound received from it.

e) Those who have commanded their body to be handed over to cremation.

f) Other public and manifest sinners, for example those who for a long time have contemned reception of the Sacraments.

Note. If some doubt occurs in the aforesaid cases, the Ordinary should be consulted if time permits; if the doubt remains, the body is to be handed over to ecclesiastical burial, yet in such a way that scandal is removed (canon 1240, § 2); cf. also the decision of the Sacred Penitentiary handed down on p. 734.

VI. Deprivation of Sacramentals.

VII. Deprivation or suspension for a time of a pension which is paid by the Church or from the goods of the Church, or of another ecclesiastical right or privilege (cf. canons 1429; 2161; 2299, § 3).

VIII. Removal from exercising legitimate ecclesiastical acts.

IX. Incapacity for ecclesiastical graces or functions in the Church which do not require the clerical state, or for obtaining academic degrees by ecclesiastical authority; concerning this notice:

1. If there is question of things for obtaining which capacity is established by common law,[5] the Apostolic See alone can inflict the penalty of incapacity (canon 2296, § 1).
2. Rights already acquired are not lost on account of supervening incapacity, unless the penalty of deprivation is added to this (canon 2296, § 2).

Note. The things said under 1 and 2 are said generally, and therefore are to be applied to incapacity, whether as it is an effect of infamy of law, or as it is a penalty common to the faithful under IX, or peculiar to clerics (canon 2298, 5°).

X. Deprivation or suspension for a time of a function, faculty, or grace already obtained.

XI. Deprivation of the right of precedence (canon 106), or of active and passive voice, or of the right of bearing titles of honor, vesture, or insignia which the Church has granted.

XII. Pecuniary fine. Pecuniary fines inflicted by common law, the expenditure of which is not predefined by the same law, and other fines established or to be established by particular law, local Ordinaries must expend for pious uses, not for the benefit of the episcopal or capitular table (canon 2297).

[1] Whence it is drawn that the enumeration is not taxative; therefore the Superior, the things to be observed being observed, can inflict a congruous penalty not contained in this series.

[2] Infamy of law alone is a true penalty, but not infamy of fact, as is also clear from the mode of cessation.

[3] "According to the norm of law" is understood (cf. canon 2263), because, for example, before sentence one infamous with infamy of law would be only illicitly a sponsor in the Sacraments, but after it invalidly (cf. canons 765, 766, 795, 796); concerning the right of patronage see canon 1470, § 4.

[4] It is not enough that one deprived of the senses has received absolution under condition, since this can be given although signs of penitence do not appear.

[5] For example, capacity for acquiring graces (canon 36).

Section III. On Vindicative Penalties Peculiar to Clerics

891 From canon 2298, the vindicative penalties which are applied to clerics alone are:

I. Prohibition of exercising the sacred ministry except in a certain church.

II. Suspension in perpetuity, or for a predefined time, or at the good pleasure of the Superior.

III. Penal transfer from an office or benefice obtained to a lower one; concerning this note: if a cleric obtains an irremovable benefice, he can be deprived of it as a penalty only in cases expressed by law; if it is removable, also for other reasonable causes (canon 2299, § 1).

IV. Deprivation of some right joined with a benefice or office; concerning this canon 2299, § 2, establishes: clerics obtaining benefices, offices, and dignities can also be prohibited for a certain time only from some ministry joined with them, for example the ministry of preaching, hearing confessions, etc.

V. Incapacity for all or for some dignities, offices, benefices, or other functions proper to clerics (cf. canon 2296).

VI. Penal deprivation of a benefice or office with or without pension; concerning this observe canon 2299, § 1, cited under III.

Note. Regarding numbers III, IV, and VI, note canon 2299, § 3: A cleric cannot be deprived of a benefice or pension by title of which he was ordained, unless provision is made from elsewhere for his honorable sustenance, saving the prescription of canons 2303, 2304.

VII. Prohibition of dwelling in a certain place or territory. The Ordinary can command as a penalty that a subject cleric remain outside a certain place or territory and dwell in a certain place or territory of his diocese; but he cannot prescribe that a cleric dwell in a certain place outside the boundaries of his diocese, unless the consent of the Ordinary of that place is added, or there is question of a house of penance or correction destined not only for diocesan clerics but also for outsiders, or of an exempt religious house, with the consent of its Superior (canon 2301). Nevertheless, both prescription and prohibition of dwelling in a certain place and placement in a house of penance or in a religious house, especially if they are going to endure for a long time, are to be imposed only in grave cases in which, in the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, these penalties are necessary for the amendment of the cleric or the repair of scandal (canon 2302).

VIII. Prescription of dwelling in a certain place or territory. See the things said under VII.

IX. Deprivation for a time of ecclesiastical habit. If a cleric gives grave scandals and, having been warned with threat of penalty, does not come to his senses, nor can the scandal be removed otherwise, he can meanwhile be deprived of the right of wearing ecclesiastical habit; this deprivation, while it endures, carries with it the prohibition of exercising any ecclesiastical ministries and deprivation of clerical privileges (canon 2300).

X. Deposition; concerning this we note:

1. Deposition, the obligations arising from the order received and clerical privileges remaining firm, carries with it both suspension from office and incapacity for any offices, dignities, benefices, pensions, functions in the Church, and also deprivation of those things which the guilty person has,[1] although he was ordained by title of them (canon 2303, § 1). But in this last case, if the cleric truly needs it, the Ordinary, according to his charity, should take care to provide for him in the better way possible, lest he be forced to beg with dishonor to the clerical state (canon 2303, § 2).
2. The penalty of deposition cannot be inflicted except in cases expressed by law (canon 2303, § 3); moreover, it must be inflicted before a tribunal of five judges (canon 1576, § 1, 2°).

The penalty of deposition is always ferendae sententiae; therefore a deposed person is subjected to the effects of suspension after sentence as regards the validity of acts of office.

XI. Perpetual deprivation of ecclesiastical habit is a special penalty of a deposed cleric; for if a deposed cleric does not give signs of amendment, and especially if he continues to give scandal and, having been warned, does not come to his senses, the Ordinary can perpetually deprive him of the right of wearing ecclesiastical habit (canon 2304, § 1); but only before a tribunal of five judges (canon 1576, § 1, 2°). This deprivation (canon 2304, § 2) carries with it deprivation of clerical privileges and cessation of the prescription by which the Ordinary according to his charity should take care to provide for him, if the cleric truly needs it. Nevertheless he is bound by the obligation of observing celibacy and the canonical hours.

XII. Degradation; concerning this the Code establishes:

1. Degradation contains in itself deposition, perpetual deprivation of ecclesiastical habit, and reduction of the cleric to the lay state (canon 2305, § 1). A degraded cleric in major orders is not bound to recite the canonical hours, but he is bound to observe celibacy (canons 135; 213, § 2); every degraded cleric besides is prohibited from wearing the tonsure (canon 213, § 1).

2. This penalty can be issued only because of a delict expressed in law, or if a cleric, already deposed and deprived of clerical habit, still continues to give grave scandal for a year (canon 2305, § 2). But there is not an obligation of proceeding in this way immediately after a year.[2] Besides, it must be inflicted in the same way as deposition and perpetual deprivation of ecclesiastical habit.
3. Degradation is either verbal or edictal, which is imposed by sentence alone, yet in such a way that it immediately has all its juridic effects without any execution; or real, if the solemnities prescribed in the Roman Pontifical are observed (canon 2305, § 3). But this real degradation adds no juridic effect to the penalty already inflicted.
4. Dispensation from the penalty of degradation inflicted on a cleric in major orders is reserved to the Holy See (canon 212, § 2); as regards dispensation from the penalty of deposition, the same is not established.

[1] Wherever, for it is a penalty of common law (cited canon, § 3).

[2] Against clerics in minor orders the Ordinary can proceed in an easier way, namely by decree; cf. canon 211, § 2, where the penalty of degradation is not even mentioned (cf. § 1). A cleric in minor orders dismissed in this way can be admitted again by the Ordinary according to canon 212, § 1, otherwise than a cleric in major orders (canon 212, § 2).

Part III. On Penal Remedies and Penances

These are disciplinary means of coercing delicts, which do not attain the character of penalty in the proper sense.

Section I. On Penal Remedies

892 I. Notion. A penal remedy is a canonical means of forestalling true delicts or further delicts. Because they import some penality, they suppose some transgression of law which nevertheless does not reach the character of a delict, and some fault, although not grave. The case is when a transgression for the transgressor is the occasion or danger of committing a true delict, or contains suspicion of that delict and thence scandal of the faithful, for example visits or familiarities of a cleric with persons of diverse sex.[1] Furthermore, sometimes a penal remedy is substituted for or added to a penalty, so that further delicts may be forestalled (canons 2223, § 3, 3°; 2224, § 2; 2234).

II. Penal remedies from canon 2306 are: 1° warning; 2° correction; 3° precept; 4° vigilance; this enumeration seems to be taxative.

1. Warning. Him who is in the proximate occasion of committing a delict, or upon whom, from an inquiry conducted, there falls grave suspicion of a committed delict, the Ordinary is to warn by himself or through an interposed person (canon 2307).
2. Correction. If from someone's conduct scandal or grave disturbance of order arises, there is place for correction, to be made by the Ordinary by himself or through an interposed person, even by letter, adapted to the particular conditions of the person and of the fact in question (canon 2308).

Regarding the mode of making warning and correction, the Code establishes:

a) Both warning and correction can be either public or secret (canon 2309, § 1).

b) Public correction or warning is to be made either before a notary or two witnesses, or by letter, yet in such a way that the reception and tenor of the letter are established from some document (canon 2309, § 2; cf. canon 2143, § 3).

c) Public correction can be made only against a guilty person convicted of or confessing a delict; and it is judicial if it is made by a judge sitting for tribunal or by the Ordinary before criminal process; extrajudicial if it is made in the manner of a precept outside judgment (canons 2309, § 3; 1933, § 4). The latter admits recourse; the former, appeal.

d) Judicial correction[2] either is had in place of a penalty, or is made to increase the penalty, especially if there is question of a recidivist (canon 2309, § 4).

e) Warning and correction, even if they were made secretly, must be established from some document to be preserved in the secret archive of the Curia (canon 2309, § 5).

f) Both correction and warning can be made once or several times, according to the judgment and prudence of the Superior (canon 2309, § 6).

3. A precept must accurately indicate, and this with threat of penalty in case of transgression, what the person forestalled must do or avoid. It is to be given after warnings and corrections have been made in vain, or if it is not licit to hope for effect from them (canon 2310); therefore if there is no hope of fruit, warnings or corrections can be omitted.

4. Vigilance. If the gravity of the case bears it, and especially if there is question of one who is in danger of relapsing into the same crime, the Ordinary is to subject him to vigilance (canon 2311, § 1). Vigilance can also be prescribed to increase a penalty, especially against recidivists (canon 2311, § 2; cf. canons 2234; 2224, § 2).

[1] Wernz, op. cit., n. 253.

[2] Cf. canons 1947-1953, which we leave to canonists to explain. Judicial correction cannot be made a third time against the same guilty person (canon 1949, § 1); when it must be omitted, see canon 1948.

Section II. On Penances

893 I. Notion. Penances in the external forum are imposed so that the delinquent may either escape a penalty or receive absolution or dispensation from a contracted penalty (canon 2312, § 1). In order that a penance can be imposed, grave imputability of a committed delict is nowhere required; nor is it required that there be a delict in the proper sense. That a transgression which does not reach the character of a delict suffices is clear first from the same canon, § 2, where this is insinuated by the words delict or transgression; then from canon 1313, § 2, according to which a penance can be joined by the Ordinary to a warning; but this does not prerequire a delict. Hence by reason of scandal given or danger of delict, and in other cases where amendment, for example of a cleric, is desired, the Ordinary can oblige him especially to make spiritual exercises, since these also have the character of a preventive remedy.[1]

II. Division. Penances are public or secret insofar as they must be fulfilled in a way easily knowable by others, for example an unusual pilgrimage, or can be fulfilled secretly, for example prayers to be recited. Moreover, on account of an occult delict or transgression, a public penance is never to be imposed (canon 2312, § 2).

III. Application. Penances are to be moderated not so much according to the quantity of the delict as according to the contrition of the penitent, with the qualities of persons and the circumstances of delicts weighed (canon 2312, § 3); for just as a penalty in the proper sense regards more the delict to be coerced or vindicated, so disciplinary penance regards more the disposition of the penitent, whether to be corrected or to be confirmed.

IV. The principal penances from canon 2313, § 1, are precepts:

1. Of reciting determinate prayers.
2. Of making some pious pilgrimage or other works of piety.
3. Of observing a particular fast.
4. Of expending alms for pious uses.
5. Of making spiritual exercises in a pious or religious house for some days.

The Ordinary, according to his prudence, can add these or other penances to the penal remedy of warning and correction (canon 2313, § 2), namely so that the guilty person may show his amendment by their fulfillment.

[1] Wernz, op. cit., n. 251.

Dissertation III. On Penalties Established for Individual Delicts

I note beforehand canon 6, n. 5: As regards penalties of which no mention is made in the Code, whether they are spiritual or temporal, medicinal or, as they say, vindicative, latae or ferendae sententiae, they are to be held as abrogated.

With these things noted, we shall speak chiefly of medicinal penalties, or censures, and of those latae sententiae; the others come less into use for confessors. Therefore one must treat first of excommunications, then of interdicts, finally of suspensions.

Part I. On Excommunications

Section I. Excommunications Reserved to the Roman Pontiff in the Most Special Manner

The following contract this excommunication:

I. One who has thrown away the consecrated species, or has taken them away or retained them for an evil end (canon 2320). It is said:

1. Consecrated species, whether of bread or wine, whether several or one, or consecrated particles.
2. Has thrown away, suppose by throwing the species onto the ground; but one who places the consecrated species upon the pall in order to remove the pyx does not incur the excommunication.
3. Has taken away or retained for an evil end, suppose to profane them. It also suffices that someone retain species taken away by another for an evil end. But one is not excommunicated who takes away or retains the species, for example, in order to adore them at home.

Note. The delinquent is suspected of heresy, infamous by the fact itself, and if a cleric, besides, is to be deposed (canon 2320).

II. One who has laid violent hands on the person of the Roman Pontiff (canon 2343). This canon must be interpreted broadly, since it regards the privilege of the canon, as it is called, insofar as it belongs to the Roman Pontiff; see the interpretation on p. 766.

Note. The delinquent is infamous by the fact itself, and if a cleric, besides, must be degraded (canon 2343).

894 III. One absolving, or pretending to absolve, an accomplice in a base sin incurs by the fact itself an excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See in the most special manner; and this even at the article of death, if another priest, although not approved for confessions, can receive the confession of the dying person without some grave infamy and scandal going to arise, except in the case in which the dying person refuses to confess to another. One absolving or pretending to absolve an accomplice who indeed does not confess the sin of complicity, from which he has not yet been absolved, does not escape the same excommunication if he behaves in this way because he was induced to do so by the accomplice-confessor, whether directly or indirectly (canon 2367); see the interpretation of this canon in n. 412 sq.

IV. A confessor who has presumed to violate the sacramental seal directly (canon 2369, § 1). A few judge that this censure is ferendae sententiae, because the word has presumed seems to remain ambiguous; moreover, in penalties the more benign interpretation must be made (canon 2219, § 1; p. 712). But the contrary seems altogether to have to be admitted, both because censures reserved to the Supreme Pontiff were always latae sententiae, and because, if the contrary opinion were admitted, the Bishop could issue the censure of which we speak, but could not absolve from it, as reserved to the Supreme Pontiff; which cannot be admitted according to the things said on p. 727, 1, c.

What a direct violation of the sacramental seal is, see n. 428.

Note 1. A confessor who has presumed to violate the sacramental seal only indirectly (n. 418) is to be suspended from the celebration of Mass and from hearing sacramental confessions, or even, according to the gravity of the delict, is to be declared incapable of receiving them, and in graver cases is also to be subjected to degradation (canon 2369, § 1).

Note 2. Whoever has rashly violated the prescription of canon 889, § 2,[1] is to be punished according to the gravity of the guilt with a salutary penalty, which can even be excommunication (canon 2369, § 2).

V. To this place can be referred:

1. Excommunications established for delicts which can be committed in electing the Supreme Pontiff, and which are contained in the Constitution of Pius X Vacante Sede Apostolica, December 25, 1904. Namely, those perpetrating delicts of this kind "can be absolved by no one, not even by the Major Penitentiary by force of any faculty, except by the Roman Pontiff, unless at the article of death" (cited Constitution, § 51).
2. The excommunication annexed to the revelation of the secret of the Holy Office (canon 239, § 1, 1°, compared with canon 243). Moreover, from the decree of the Sacred Consistorial Congregation, April 25, 1917, it follows that the same secret must be observed by those from whom information is requested concerning those to be promoted to the Episcopate.[2]

[1] That is, the interpreter and all others to whom knowledge of a confession has come in any way whatever, who by word or sign or in any other way and for any cause betray the sinner in any manner.

[2] A.A.S. 1917, p. 232; Aertnys-Damen, op. cit., II, n. 1044, note 2.

Section II. Excommunications Reserved to the Roman Pontiff in a Special Manner

895 This excommunication is contracted by:

I. All apostates from the Christian faith, and all and each heretics or schismatics (canon 2314, § 1, 1°, and § 2). This excommunication is reserved to the Apostolic See in a special manner only insofar as absolution is to be imparted in the forum of conscience (cited canon, § 3; cf. 3, b). Who come under the name of apostates, heretics, and schismatics, see canon 1325, § 2 and volume I, n. 492. Note, however, that it is required that apostasy, heresy, or schism be externally manifested. For the rest, observe:

1. As to apostates. Here belong both those who reject every religion, such as atheists, pantheists, naturalists, and so-called free-thinkers; and those who pass over, for example, to Judaism, Mohammedanism, or paganism; but not those who are only practically indifferent.
2. As to heretics. It is not required that someone be enrolled in some heretical sect. Those enrolled in a sect, however, are deemed, for the external forum, to have contracted the censure, although perhaps internally they are not formal heretics and therefore have not in fact contracted the censure (n. 862).
3. Schismatics. It is not required that someone be enrolled in a schismatic body; but neither is it enough that someone, even habitually, transgress special commands of the Supreme Pontiff. For the rest, note:

a) Unless they, namely apostates, heretics, or schismatics, having been warned, come to their senses, they are to be deprived of benefice, dignity, pension, office, or other function, if they have any in the Church; they are to be declared infamous; and clerics, after a repeated warning, are to be deposed (canon 2314, § 1, 2°). If they have given their name to a non-Catholic sect or publicly adhered to it, they are ipso facto infamous, and clerics ipso facto and without any declaration lose any offices whatever, and, after a warning has been given in vain, are to be degraded (canon 2314, § 1, 3°).

b) As to absolution from the excommunication set forth, observe:

alpha) Absolution to be imparted in the forum of conscience is reserved to the Apostolic See in a special manner (canon 2314, § 2). The faculty of absolving any penitents whatever, except heretics who purposely disseminate heresy among the faithful, from any censures and ecclesiastical penalties incurred on account of heresies externalized either with no one hearing or noticing, or before others, is customarily granted through the Sheet of the Sacred Penitentiary. Nevertheless it cannot be exercised except in the act of sacramental confession and for the forum of conscience only, after a secret abjuration has first been made before the confessor. Moreover, a salutary penance is to be imposed, together with frequency of the sacraments and the obligation of repairing the scandals caused. For the forum of conscience no form of abjuration seems prescribed; hence, for example, these words of the Profession of Faith at the end suffice: "I likewise condemn and reject any heresies whatever condemned by the Church."

beta) If the delict of apostasy, heresy, or schism has in any way been brought to the external forum of the local Ordinary, even by voluntary confession, that same Ordinary, but not the Vicar General without a special mandate, can by his ordinary authority absolve in the external forum the one who has come to his senses, after an abjuration juridically performed and with the other things to be observed by law observed; and one thus absolved can then be absolved from sin by any confessor in the forum of conscience. Abjuration is held to have been juridically performed when it is made before the local Ordinary himself or his delegate and at least two witnesses (canon 2314, § 2). As to the form of abjuration, in practice the Profession of Faith which is placed at the beginning of the Code suffices.

Question: whether those doubtfully baptized or doubtfully validly baptized, who are guilty of apostasy, heresy, or schism, are subject to excommunication.

Response: They are or are not subject to the excommunication according as in fact they were validly or not validly baptized. Since this here and now is doubtful, absolution is to be granted as a precaution if they are converted to the Church. If you object that those doubtfully baptized or doubtfully validly baptized are not subject to the laws of the Church, I answer: if it concerns laws which deprive someone of some good, they are subject or not subject to them according as valid baptism did or did not take place; if the discussion is of laws which regard an act, see volume I, n. 130.

II. One suspected of heresy who, having been warned and punished according to the norm of canon 2315, has not completely amended himself within six months from the penalty contracted (canon 2315). Moreover, the following are suspected of heresy:

1. Whoever in any way willingly and knowingly helps the propagation of heresy (canon 2316).
2. Whoever communicates in divine things with heretics by actively assisting at their rites (canon 2316; p. 732).
3. Those who enter marriage with an explicit or implicit agreement that all or some of the offspring be educated outside the Catholic Church (canon 2319, § 1, n. 2, § 2).
4. Those who knowingly presume to offer their children to non-Catholic ministers for baptism (ibid., n. 3).

5. Parents, or those holding their place, who knowingly hand over their children to be educated or instructed in a non-Catholic religion (ibid., n. 4).
6. Whoever has thrown away consecrated species or has taken them away or retained them for an evil purpose (canon 2320).
7. Those appealing from the laws or mandates and decrees of the Roman Pontiff to a Universal Council (canon 2332).
8. Whoever, with hardened spirit, has wallowed for a year in excommunication (canon 2340, § 1).
9. All, even those of episcopal dignity, who knowingly through simony have promoted someone to Orders or have been promoted, or have administered or received other Sacraments (canon 2371).

Section II. Excommunications Reserved to the Roman Pontiff in a Special Manner (continued)

III. After the work has been made public, publishers of books of apostates, heretics, and schismatics which defend apostasy, heresy, or schism; likewise those defending these same books or others prohibited by name through apostolic letters, or knowingly reading or retaining them without due permission (canon 2318, § 1). First, note that it is required that the work have been made public, in other words, that it have been multiplied for fairly common use, not merely for the use of a few, say only of students; a fortiori a manuscript is excluded. For the rest, it does not matter whether the work was multiplied by type, by polygraph, or by lithograph. Next it is required that the work made public constitute a book. The word "book" is to be taken as it was formerly taken (cf. canon 6, nn. 2-4), that is, for a literary work of a certain bulk and a certain unity. It is said to be of a certain bulk, for example, to choose a middle point among the different opinions, about eighty pages in octavo. Therefore a separately published letter or sermon, small pamphlets, newspapers or periodicals,[1] are excluded; but not periodical publications, whether taken separately, provided they are of sufficient bulk, or bound in fascicles,[2] and thus constituting the required unity. Moreover, the following are excommunicated:

1. Publishers of books of apostates, heretics, and schismatics which defend apostasy, heresy, or schism. It is said:

a) Publishers, namely those properly so called, so that the author of the book as such is not included, but he is included insofar as he procures the publication (canon 2209, § 3). Nor are the owner of the workshop, the typesetters, or those turning the press excommunicated; for they do not concur in the publication formally taken, that is, in the multiplication insofar as this is ordered to fairly common use, or at least they are not such that without their work the publication would not have taken place (cf. canon 2209, § 3).

b) Of apostates, etc. Thus books of infidels or Catholics are not included, even though perhaps they defend apostasy, etc. Yet one who defends apostasy, etc., is presumed to be an apostate, etc.; nor is it required that the author of the book be enrolled in an apostate sect, etc.

c) They defend, that is, with added arguments they defend or recommend; nevertheless it is not required that the book treat professedly of religion.

2. Those defending, or knowingly and without due permission reading or retaining, either the books mentioned under 1, or others prohibited by name through apostolic letters. As to the latter, some require that the apostolic letters have prohibited them under penalty of excommunication reserved to the Holy See. But neither the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis, which first established that censure, nor the cited and clear canon permits that condition to be added.

a) Defenders are, for example, those who prevent a book from being destroyed or denounced, one who praises the doctrine contained in the book, or who disapproves its condemnation; but not one who praises the style or genius of the author, or the good doctrine which is found in the book (St. Alphonsus, VII, 297).

b) Knowingly (n. 858) and without due permission reading; concerning this, observe: 1° formal reading is required, so that one who merely hears another reading is not included (St. Alphonsus, VII, 292), nor one who recites from memory what he formerly read, nor one who reads through a book while ignorant of the language; but a blind person who perceives the type with his fingers is included. 2° Reading of notable matter is required, considered either by quantity alone, as if you read two or three pages, or by quality, that is, by danger; in this case even a few lines can suffice, because in them there can be a danger of perversion (St. Alphonsus, VII, 284, 292).

c) Those retaining, namely knowingly and without due permission; moreover, for a notable time, say for three or four days (St. Alphonsus, VII, 295). For the rest, observe: it is all the same whether one retains his own book or another's; whether he retains the book with himself or with another who does not have the faculty; whether he understands the retained book or not. But one is excused who deposits the book with another who has the faculty, and does this with an agreement not to reclaim it except after permission has been obtained; likewise one who retains the book because he is awaiting either the required permission or an occasion of handing it over to the Superior (St. Alphonsus, VII, 295-298).

A bookbinder is indeed counted among those retaining, but is easily excused if he binds books for one having the faculty to read them, or has another just cause. Likewise the custodian of another's library escapes excommunication, unless he retains the books in his own room or house. Finally, where, as in religious houses, there is a common library, it is licit to keep prohibited books in a locked cabinet.

IV. One not promoted to the priestly order, if he simulates the celebration of Mass or hears a sacramental confession (canon 2322, 1°). It is said:

1. One not promoted to the priestly order. Thus the censure regards both a layman and a cleric who has not yet been raised to the priesthood, but not a priest, even though suspended or degraded.
2. If he simulates the celebration of Mass; that is, if he conducts himself in such a way that others judge that the Sacred Rite is being celebrated.
3. Or hears a sacramental confession. What sacramental confession is, see n. 430. It suffices to have heard a sacramental confession, even if absolution is omitted.

Note. If the delinquent mentioned under IV is a layman, he is to be deprived of a pension or function, if he has any in the Church, and is to be punished with other penalties according to the gravity of the fault; but a cleric is to be deposed (cited canon); each, if he has usurped other priestly functions, is to be punished by the Ordinary according to the gravity of the fault (canon 2322, § 2).

---

[1] Holy Office, April 21, 1880 (Collectanea, n. 1533).

[2] Holy Office, January 13, 1892 (Collectanea, n. 1777).

V. All and each, of whatever status, grade, or condition they may be, even royal, episcopal, or cardinalitial, who appeal from the laws, decrees, or mandates of the Roman Pontiff for the time being to a Universal Council (canon 2332).

1. All and each. The excommunication regards only physical persons, not moral persons.
2. From the laws, etc., of the Roman Pontiff for the time being, but not from the laws, etc., of a Sacred Congregation, unless the ordinance was issued by the express or special mandate of the Supreme Pontiff or approved by him in specific form; nor is an appeal from the laws, etc., of a deceased Supreme Pontiff sufficient.
3. To a Universal Council, whether present or future; but an appeal to a Provincial Council or to a future Pontiff is not sufficient.

Note. Those about whom the discussion is under V are also suspected of heresy. But Universities, Colleges, Chapters, or other moral persons, by whatever name they are called, incur an interdict likewise reserved to the Apostolic See in a special manner (canon 2332).

VI. Those having recourse to lay power in order to impede letters or any acts proceeding from the Apostolic See or from its Legates, or directly or indirectly prohibiting their promulgation or execution, or on account of them injuring or terrifying either those to whom the letters or acts pertain or others (canon 2333). Under the name of the Apostolic See also come the Congregations, Tribunals, and Offices through which the Roman Pontiff is accustomed to transact the business of the universal Church (canon 7). Under the name of Legates of the Holy See are included Legates a latere (cf. canon 266), Nuncios and Internuncios (cf. canon 267), and Apostolic Delegates (cf. canon 267). Moreover, the following are excommunicated:

1. Those having recourse to lay power in order to impede any letters or acts proceeding from the aforesaid. It is all the same whether someone has recourse by himself or through another, in writing or by living voice. As to the lay power to which recourse is had, certainly those who enjoy power of jurisdiction are understood, such as the Government, magistrates, and judges. The same seems to be said of those having recourse to persons who possess only administrative power, such as prefects of cities; for the law does not distinguish. Finally, it is required that it concern letters or acts already issued, so that one is not excommunicated who impedes them from being issued.
2. Those directly or indirectly prohibiting the promulgation or execution of the said letters or acts. Those prohibiting are understood to be those who enjoy public authority.[1] Promulgation, however, is taken in the proper sense; hence it is carefully to be distinguished from dissemination. Execution regards all things necessary for the letters or acts to have effect, such as the preparation of instruments by notaries and their notification to the parties.
3. Those injuring or terrifying, on account of the said letters or acts, either those to whom they are directed or others, that is, those to whom their promulgation or execution pertains. It is said injuring, namely gravely, and indeed in the goods of the body. It is disputed whether those injuring in goods of fortune or of the soul, or in honor or reputation, are included. Those denying this rely on the fact that injury properly taken regards the body. Given the controversy, we follow the negative part. Those are called terrifying who inflict very grave fear on someone.

It is more commonly taught that those terrifying are not excommunicated unless the effect has followed, that is, unless the letters or acts have in fact been impeded. It is disputed concerning those injuring; but without reason is a distinction admitted between those injuring and those terrifying.

VII. Those who issue laws, mandates, or decrees against the liberty or rights of the Church (canon 2334, § 1).

1. Those issuing laws, etc.; by this expression are included those who effectively concur in making laws, etc., such as ministers who propose laws, deputies who vote for them, the prince who confirms or promulgates them; likewise rulers of provinces or cities who issue a decree, and counselors who assent to it. The censure is contracted when the law has been promulgated, the decree issued, the mandate intimated. Neither notaries who enter laws, etc., into the acts, nor judges who see that they are observed, incur the excommunication.

2. Against the liberty or rights of the Church; these words must be taken in the broadest sense. Therefore those are excommunicated who issue laws, etc., against the right, for example, of teaching evangelical doctrine (canon 1322, § 2), of educating those who desire to devote themselves to ecclesiastical ministries (canon 1352), of founding schools of any discipline whatever, not only elementary, but also middle and higher schools (canon 1375), of requiring that the faithful not publish books which it has not beforehand reviewed by its own judgment, and of prohibiting, for a just cause, books published by anyone whatever (canon 1384, § 1), of freely and independently of civil power acquiring, retaining, and administering temporal goods for pursuing its own proper ends (canon 1495, § 1), which right also belongs to individual churches and other moral persons which have been erected as juridical persons by ecclesiastical authority (canon 1495, § 2), of requiring from the faithful those things which are necessary for divine worship, for the fitting support of clerics and other ministers, and for its remaining proper ends (canon 1496), of possessing its own cemeteries (canon 1206, § 1), of coercing delinquent subjects with penalties both spiritual and temporal (canon 2214, § 1), etc.

Note. Clerics who commit the delict just described are punished with the penalty of suspension or privation of the benefice, office, dignity, pension, or function itself, if perhaps they have any in the Church; religious, however, are punished with privation of office and of active and passive voice and with other penalties according to the norm of the constitutions (canon 2336, § 1).

VIII. Those who directly or indirectly impede the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, whether of the internal or external forum, by having recourse for this to any lay power (canon 2334, § 2). For this excommunication to be incurred, it is required:

1. That the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction be impeded. It is not enough to impede the exercise either of the power of order alone, or of merely administrative power, or of natural right. But it is all the same whether the exercise of jurisdiction of the internal forum or the external forum is impeded, whether it is impeded directly, say by acting, for example, against the Bishop, or indirectly, say by vexing officials.

2. That the exercise of ecclesiastical jurisdiction be impeded by means of recourse to any lay power. Therefore this excommunication does not affect a private person who impedes without recourse, nor a Superior or judge who executes or applies the law; but it does affect a Superior who impedes by means of recourse to a higher lay power. For the rest, it does not matter whether recourse is had to legislative power or only to judicial or executive power.

3. That the effect has followed; this is indicated by the very word "impeding."[2]

Note. Clerics who commit the delict discussed are punished with the penalty of suspension or privation of the benefice, office, dignity, or pension itself according to the norm of the constitutions (canon 2336, § 1).

---

[1] Formerly it was disputed whether those incurred excommunication who, by private authority, prohibited promulgation or execution. But since the legislator, aware of the controversy, did not change the wording of the law, the more benign, that is, the negative opinion, seems to be followed.

[2] Pontifical Commission, July 25, 1926 (A.A.S. 1926, p. 394).

IX. Whoever against the prescription of canon 120 has dared to drag before a lay judge any one of the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church or Legates of the Apostolic See, or major Officials of the Roman Curia for affairs pertaining to their function, or his own Ordinary (canon 2341). The prescription of canon 120, insofar as it must here be kept before the eyes, establishes that Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, Bishops, even titular ones, Legates of the Apostolic See, and major Officials of the Roman Curia cannot be summoned before a lay judge for affairs pertaining to their function without the permission of the Apostolic See, unless in some place by special concession there has been derogation at least in part from the privilege of forum (cf. volume I, n. 1153). For the rest, observe:

1. What the words "has dared" signify, see n. 858.
2. Under the name of those dragging do not come judges and other subordinate officials, but private persons who cause the persons mentioned to appear before a lay judge. Moreover, it is required that they be summoned as defendants, or that they be convened; it is not enough that they be summoned as witnesses. Finally, the major Officials of the Roman Curia, not others, must be summoned for affairs pertaining to their function.
3. Legates of the Apostolic See are Nuncios, Internuncios, and Apostolic Delegates. The major Officials of the Roman Curia are: a) the Assessor and Commissary of the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office; b) the Assessor and Substitute of the Sacred Consistorial Congregation; c) the Prelate Secretary and Substitute of the Sacred Congregation of Rites; d) the Prelate Secretary and Substitute of the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities; e) the Regent of the Sacred Penitentiary; f) the Prelate Secretary of the Apostolic Signatura or Auditor of the Most Holy One; g) the Prelate Auditors of the Sacred Roman Rota; h) the Regent and Substitute of the Apostolic Chancery; i) the Vice-Camerlengo of the Holy Roman Church and the Auditor General of the Reverend Apostolic Camera; k) the Substitute of the Secretariat of State; l) the Chancellor of Apostolic Briefs; m) all Prelate Secretaries and Undersecretaries of the other Congregations.
4. Under the name of Ordinary, since it is not said "local Ordinary," there also seems to be included the major Superior of an exempt clerical religious institute (canon 198, § 1).

In view of the word "dragging" and canons 2228 and 2242, § 1, it seems to be required that the summoned person actually appear before the judge.

X. Whoever has laid violent hands on the person of a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church or Legate of the Roman Pontiff, Patriarch, Archbishop, Bishop, even only a titular one (canon 2343, § 2, 1° and § 3). Violent laying on of hands imports an external injury, contained in deed and gravely sinful, whether against the body, or against liberty, say by imprisoning, or against dignity, say by tearing garments (St. Alphonsus, VII, 273). Moreover, it is required that one know the person on whom he inflicts injury to be a Cardinal, etc.

Note. Whoever has laid violent hands on the person of a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church or Legate of the Roman Pontiff is moreover ipso facto infamous and is deprived of benefices, offices, dignities, pensions, and any function whatever, if he has one in the Church (canon 2343, § 2, 2° and 3°).

XI. Those usurping or detaining, by themselves or through others, goods or rights pertaining to the Roman Church (canon 2345). Usurpers are those who occupy another's thing as due to themselves. Hence thieves and robbers are not included.[1] Those detaining are those who unjustly retain a thing usurped, or received from a usurper. This excommunication, however, does not affect those who usurp or detain goods or rights pertaining to churches other than the Roman Church.

Note. If the delinquents are clerics, they are moreover to be deprived of dignities, benefices, offices, and pensions, and declared incapable of them (canon 2345).

XII. All fabricators or falsifiers of letters, decrees, or rescripts of the Apostolic See, or those knowingly using the same letters, decrees, or rescripts (canon 2360, § 1). The following are excommunicated: 1° fabricators, that is, those who compose false letters, decrees, or rescripts; 2° falsifiers, that is, those who so adulterate letters, decrees, or rescripts of the Holy See that the sense is substantially changed; 3° those using such fabricated or adulterated letters, etc., even if they do not obtain the intended effect.

Note. Clerics committing the delict mentioned under XII are moreover to be coerced by other penalties, which can extend even to privation of benefice, office, dignity, and ecclesiastical pension; religious, however, are to be deprived of all offices which they have in religion and of active and passive voice, besides the other penalties established in the proper constitutions of each (canon 2360, § 2).

XIII. Whoever by himself or through others falsely denounces a confessor for the crime of solicitation before Superiors (canon 2363). It is said:

1. By himself or through others, namely "by wickedly procuring that this be done by others."[2]
2. For the crime of solicitation; concerning this see n. 416 sq.
3. Before Superiors, that is, before those to whom the denunciation must be made, namely before the local Ordinary or the Congregation of the Holy Office (n. 427).

Note 1. The delinquent cannot in any case be absolved from the contracted censure unless he has formally retracted the false denunciation and, as far as he can, repaired the damages, if any followed from it, with a grave and long-lasting penance moreover imposed (canon 2363). Thus before absolution there is required both formal retraction before those to whom the denunciation was made, and reparation of damages, insofar as this can be provided here and now; damages, I say, which followed, for example, from the confessor's suspension. In danger of death a retraction suffices, even one drawn up by the confessor, signed by the delinquent, and afterward to be handed over to the local Ordinary or the Congregation of the Holy Office; or, if necessity does not permit that, an oral retraction before two witnesses, for example, the confessor and another person, who can afterward communicate it to the judge. Finally, in a case in which absolution cannot be deferred without danger of infamy, a written retraction left with the confessor suffices; or, if even that cannot be provided, a serious promise of satisfying the obligation as soon as possible.

Note 2. Canon 2363 cited in note 1 is closed with these words: with the prescription of canon 894 remaining firm. Moreover, in view of the cited canon, the sin of false denunciation is the single sin reserved by reason of itself; therefore it is reserved and remains reserved, even if the censure has not been contracted, say because of ignorance, or has been remitted.

---

[1] Holy Office, March 9, 1870.

[2] Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae.

Section III. Excommunications Simply Reserved to the Roman Pontiff

896 This excommunication is contracted by:

I. Those making gain from indulgences (canon 2327). By force of this canon, those are excommunicated who, after receiving a price, gain profit either by granting, publishing, or causing indulgences to be published. It is required that the price have been accepted, but not that a simoniacal intention was present; it does not matter whether the price is expended on pious works. By force of this canon those are also excommunicated who, because of indulgences, sell for more objects enriched with indulgences.

Bishops also can contract this censure.

II. Those giving their name to a Masonic sect or to other associations of the same kind which machinate against the Church or legitimate civil powers (canon 2335). For the penalty to regard a certain association, it is required that it machinate against the Church or legitimate civil powers. It is disputed whether there are also required, as obtains in the Masonic sect, a strict bond by which members are united and a hidden organization. Some deny this, because they take the words "which machinate..." as merely explanatory of "of the same kind." Others affirm it, because they judge the words "of the same kind" to be taken in a broader sense, so that they also include the hidden organization which obtains in the Masonic sect. Given the doubt, we follow the milder opinion, the more so because if it were enough that an association machinated against the Church or legitimate civil powers, the legislator would certainly have omitted from the new Code the words "of the same kind," which gave occasion to the dispute. Hence canon 2335 certainly regards, besides the sect of Masons, the societies of the Carbonari,[1] Fenians,[2] Anarchists, Nihilists, and Internationalists; but not, although they are prohibited, socialist,[3] biblical,[4] clerico-liberal societies; nor the workers' societies called Odd Fellows,[5] Sons of Temperance, Knights of Pythias, Independent Order of Good Templars (Guttempler-Orden)[6] and societies which promote the cremation of human corpses.[7] Moreover:

1. Clerics who have committed the delict discussed under II are punished with the penalty of suspension or privation of the benefice, office, dignity, pension, or function itself, if perhaps they have any in the Church; religious, however, with privation of office and of active and passive voice and with other penalties according to the norm of the constitutions. In addition, clerics and religious giving their name to a Masonic sect and other similar associations must be denounced to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office (canon 2336).
2. The confessor to whom the faculty is granted of absolving from the censure set forth should require from the delinquent those things which the Holy See is accustomed to require: that they separate themselves entirely from the prohibited society and abjure it. But in a case in which great damage would flow from this for them, they can materially sustain the enrollment, but they are bound formally to renounce the society; and therefore: 1° let them promise that never again will it be the case that they involve themselves in any act of those societies, whether secret or public, and especially that they will never again pay the required contribution; 2° let scandal be removed in the best way that can be done; 3° let them be disposed in mind to withdraw their name if and when they can do this without grave damage.[8]

In the faculties of the Sacred Penitentiary it is established: 1° let them separate themselves entirely from the prohibited society and abjure it; 2° let them denounce ecclesiastical and religious persons, if they know any enrolled in it; 3° books, manuscripts, and signs pertaining to the same, if they retain any, let them hand over into your hands, to be cautiously transmitted to the Holy Office as soon as possible, or at least, if just and grave causes demand it, to be destroyed; 4° with a grave salutary penance joined according to the measure of the faults, together with frequency of sacramental confession and the obligation of repairing the scandals caused.

III. Those presuming, without due faculty, to absolve from an excommunication latae sententiae reserved to the Apostolic See in a most special or special manner (canon 2338, § 1). As to the word "presuming," see what was said in n. 858. For the rest, it is required that they actually absolve from the censure; it is not enough that they merely hear the delinquent or pretend to absolve him.

IV. Those furnishing any help or favor whatever to an excommunicated person to be avoided in the delict for which he was excommunicated; likewise clerics knowingly and spontaneously communicating with the same in divine things and receiving him in divine offices (canon 2338, § 2).

1. As to the former, it should be noted that it concerns a delict already committed, and therefore help or favor furnished by which someone can persist in the delict for which he was excommunicated.
2. As to the latter, observe: 1° since the law is to be interpreted strictly, religious do not come under the name of clerics unless they have received first tonsure (canon 108); 2° those communicating in divine offices are those who perform divine things with one to be avoided; 3° those receiving in divine offices are understood to be those who, enjoying the right or office of admitting to divine offices, admit an excommunicated person to be avoided to them.

V. If anyone against the prescription of canon 120 has dared to drag before a lay judge another, that is, not his own, Bishop, even merely titular, or an Abbot or Prelate nullius, or one of the supreme Superiors of religions of pontifical right (canon 2341). The prescription of canon 120, insofar as it must here be attended to, establishes that Bishops, even titular ones, Abbots or Prelates nullius, and supreme Superiors of religions of pontifical right cannot be summoned before a lay judge without the permission of the Apostolic See, unless in some place by special concession there has been derogation at least in part from the privilege of forum.

On the phrase "has dared," see n. 858; on the phrase "those dragging," p. 766.

Note. A cleric who, without having obtained permission from the local Ordinary, has dared to drag before a lay judge another person enjoying the privilege of forum, apart from those enumerated here and on p. 766 under IX, incurs ipso facto suspension from office reserved to the Ordinary; but a layman is to be punished by his own Ordinary with suitable penalties according to the gravity of the fault (canon 2341).

---

[1] Cf. Constitution of Pius VII, Ecclesiam, September 25, 1821, and Leo XII, Graviora, March 13, 1825.

[2] Cf. Holy Office, January 12, 1870.

[3] Encyclical of Leo XII, Quod Apostolici, December 28, 1878.

[4] Constitution of Pius IX, Qui pluribus, 1846.

[5] Syllabus, § 178.

[6] Holy Office, August 20, 1894.

[7] Holy Office, August 9, 1893; Holy Office, May 19, 1886.

[8] Holy Office, March 7, 1883 (Collectanea, n. 1593).

Section III. Excommunications Simply Reserved to the Roman Pontiff (continued)

VI. Those violating cloister, as follows; namely, the following are excommunicated:

1. Those violating the cloister of nuns, of whatever kind or condition or sex they may be, by entering their monasteries without legitimate permission, and likewise those introducing or admitting them (canon 2342, 1°). It concerns papal cloister. The following are excommunicated: 1° those entering without legitimate permission, that is, with the whole body, not with one foot only or one step; 2° those introducing those who violate cloister by entering without legitimate permission. Those also are included who introduce impuberes, since they too can violate cloister, although they do not contract the censure. There is doubt about those introducing persons lacking the use of reason, since these, strictly speaking, do not violate cloister. Given the doubt, we follow the milder opinion; 3° those admitting. They are understood to be those who, performing the office of guarding cloister, such as the prioress and the portress, receive those who violate cloister by entering without permission; for the rest, what has just been said about those introducing applies.

Note. If clerics violate the cloister of nuns, they are moreover to be suspended for a time to be defined by the Ordinary according to the gravity of the fault (canon 2342, 1°).

2. Women violating the cloister of male regulars; likewise Superiors and others, whoever they may be, introducing or admitting them of whatever age (canon 2342, 2°). It concerns the cloister of men who have pronounced solemn vows (cf. canon 488, 2° and 7°). The following are excommunicated: 1° women violating the cloister of male regulars; 2° those introducing, or 3° admitting, those who violate cloister by entering; also those introducing or admitting impuberes. There is doubt about those introducing or admitting persons lacking the use of reason, since these, strictly speaking, do not violate cloister; but it seems that it must be affirmed, since the canon says: of whatever age.

Note. Religious who introduce or admit are to be deprived of office, if they have one, and of active and passive voice (canon 2342, 2°).

3. Nuns illegitimately leaving the cloister against the prescriptions of canon 601 (canon 2342, 3°). The discussion is of papal cloister; it is required, however, that the nun leave with the whole body, not with one foot only or one step (St. Alphonsus, VII, 229).

VII. If anyone has presumed, by himself or through others, to convert and usurp for his own uses ecclesiastical goods of any kind, whether movable or immovable, corporeal or incorporeal, or to impede the fruits or revenues of the same from being received by those to whom they belong by law (canon 2346).

1. The disposition regards ecclesiastical goods belonging either to the universal Church or the Apostolic See, or to an ecclesiastical moral person.[1]

2. It is required either that someone, by himself or through another, usurp the said goods and convert them to his own uses, or that he impede their fruits from being received by those to whom they belong by law.

An usurper is one who occupies another's thing as due to himself.[2] Some now doubt concerning those who buy or lease goods already usurped. But "a change of the prior law is seriously doubtful, both because of the practice of the Holy See, which seems to be confirmed in the Constitution Si unquam of Pius XI, July 15, 1924, ad V,[3] and because of the nearly unanimous opinion of writers."[4] Hence one should not depart from the old law.

3. The excommunication persists as long as the one who has incurred the censure has not fully restored the goods themselves, removed the aforesaid impediment, and then obtained absolution from the Apostolic See (canon 2346).

Note. But if the delinquent was the patron of the same church or goods, he also exists ipso iure deprived of the right of patronage; but a cleric committing this delict or consenting to it is moreover deprived of any benefices whatever, is rendered incapable of any others whatever, and is suspended from the execution of his orders, even after full satisfaction and absolution, at the discretion of his Ordinary (cited canon).

VIII. Those perpetrating a duel, or simply provoking to it or accepting it, or furnishing any cooperation or favor whatever; and likewise those deliberately watching it and permitting it, or, as far as lies in them, not prohibiting it, of whatever dignity they may be (canon 2351, § 1). What a duel canonically accepted is, see volume I, n. 747. The following are excommunicated:

1. Those dueling; likewise those provoking and accepting, even if the duel did not follow.

2. Those furnishing cooperation or favor, provided the duel followed. It is required, however, that the favor or cooperation be sufficiently proximate and efficacious; hence, for example, those commanding and counseling are excommunicated; those who deliver or post the challenge; those who accompany the duelists and thus add courage to them; physicians and confessors assisting, even with the intention of giving help to the duelists if there is need; likewise if by agreement they remain with the same intention in a nearby place or house;[5] masters of arms who instruct those about to fight in order for the duel about which agreement has been made. But not sellers of weapons, nor public drivers who lead the duelists to the agreed place.

3. Those watching deliberately are understood to be those who approach the place of the duel in order to watch, so that they intensify the fight or add splendor to it; but not those who, arriving by chance, stop, or look from afar or from a hidden place.

4. Those permitting, or not prohibiting as far as lies in them, are understood to be those who enjoy authority, whether civil or military, but not private persons.

Note. The duelists themselves and those called their seconds are moreover ipso facto infamous (canon 2351, § 2). Those who die in a duel or from a wound received from it are deprived of ecclesiastical burial, unless before death they gave some signs of repentance (canon 1240, § 1, 4°).

IX. Clerics constituted in sacred orders or regulars or nuns after a solemn vow of chastity, and likewise all who presume to contract marriage, even only civilly, with any one of the aforesaid persons (canon 2388, § 1).

1. Concerning the word "presuming," compare what was said in n. 858. Knowledge in the act of contracting marriage is required; hence those who contracted ignorantly remain immune from the excommunication, even if afterward the ignorance ceases and they persist in the attempted marriage.
2. The excommunication is incurred even if the marriage is invalid also because of another impediment, say consanguinity;[6] likewise through civil marriage, even though invalid because of defect of form.[7]

Note. Delinquent clerics, moreover, if warned and if they do not come to their senses within a time predetermined by the Ordinary according to the diversity of circumstances, are to be degraded (canon 2388, § 1). In addition, because of tacit renunciation admitted by the law itself, any offices whatever of the cleric are vacant ipso facto and without any declaration (cited canon, canon 188, 5°).

X. Those perpetrating the delict of simony in any ecclesiastical offices, benefices, or dignities whatever (canon 2392, 1°). What simony is and how many kinds there are, see volume I, n. 620 sq.

1. Since the law does not distinguish, the excommunication affects simony of both divine and ecclesiastical law, both conventional and real and confidential (cf. canon 728), but not mental or merely internal simony.
2. It is disputed whether the law includes only offices strictly so called or also those broadly so called. For the rest, Bishops also, but not Cardinals, are liable to the penalty (canon 2227, § 2).

Note 1. Delinquents remain ipso facto deprived forever of the right of electing, presenting, and nominating, if they have any. If they are clerics, they are moreover suspended (canon 2393, 2° and 3°).

Note 2. The simoniacal contract itself and, if simony is committed concerning benefices, offices, or dignities, the subsequent provision lack all force, although the simony was committed by a third person, even without the knowledge of the one provided, provided this is not done in fraud of the same provided person or with him contradicting it. Therefore: 1° before any sentence of a judge, a thing simoniacally given and accepted, if it is capable of restitution and reverence due to the spiritual thing does not stand in the way, must be restored, and the benefice, office, or dignity must be resigned; 2° one simoniacally provided does not make the fruits his own; but if he has received them in good faith, it is permitted to the prudence of the judge or Ordinary to condone the fruits received to him wholly or in part (canon 729, 1° and 2°).

XI. A Vicar Capitular and all others, both of the Chapter and outsiders, who by themselves or through another have removed, destroyed, concealed, or substantially altered any document pertaining to the episcopal Curia (canon 2405). Under the name of document do not come books, precious things, and writings of lesser importance. For the rest, it is all the same whether the document was composed by the episcopal Curia or directed to it. But for the excommunication to be contracted, it is required that some damage follow from the removal, etc., of the document, or that prejudice be brought to the diocese or episcopal rights (cf. canon 435, § 3).

Note. Delinquents can also be punished by the Ordinary with privation of office or benefice (canon 2405).

---

[1] Those, however, who usurp or detain ecclesiastical goods pertaining to the Roman Church incur an excommunication reserved to the Roman Pontiff in a special manner (p. 767).

[2] Holy Office, March 9, 1870.

[3] A.A.S. 1924, p. 311.

[4] Creusen, Epitome, n. 546.

[5] Holy Office, May 28, 1884.

[6] Holy Office, January 13, 1892.

[7] Holy Office, December 22, 1880.

Section IV. Excommunications Reserved to Ordinaries

First recall these words of canon 198, § 1: In law, by the name of Ordinary are understood, unless someone is expressly excepted, besides the Roman Pontiff, for his own territory each residential Bishop, Abbot or Prelate nullius and their Vicar General, Administrator, Vicar and Prefect Apostolic, and likewise those who, when the aforesaid are lacking, meanwhile succeed to governance by prescription of law or from approved constitutions; but for their own subjects, major Superiors in exempt clerical religious institutes.

897 Moreover, the following contract an excommunication reserved to the Ordinary:

I. Catholics: 1° who enter marriage before a non-Catholic minister against the prescription of canon 1063, § 1; 2° who are united in marriage with an explicit or implicit agreement that all or some of the offspring be educated outside the Catholic Church; 3° who knowingly presume to offer their children to non-Catholic ministers for baptism; 4° parents or those holding the place of parents who knowingly hand over children to be educated or instructed in a non-Catholic religion (canon 2319, § 1).

1. The prescription of canon 1063, § 1 is this: "Even if a dispensation has been obtained from the Church over the impediment of mixed religion, the spouses cannot, either before or after the marriage entered before the Church, also approach, whether by themselves or by proxy, a non-Catholic minister as one dedicated to sacred rites, in order to give or renew matrimonial consent." Hence it is not prohibited, indeed as § 2 has it, "it is not disapproved that, when civil law commands it, the spouses present themselves, even before a non-Catholic minister, performing only the function of a civil official, and that only for accomplishing the civil act, for the sake of civil effects." The censure is contracted, however, whether matrimonial consent is entered or renewed before a non-Catholic minister as one dedicated to sacred rites.
2. An implicit agreement is had, for example, when the Catholic party obliges himself to fulfill all the wishes of the non-Catholic party concerning religious education. The excommunication is incurred at the moment at which the marriage is contracted with the agreement, whether previously entered and not retracted or now entered.
3. On the word "knowingly" see what was said in n. 858. Since it is said "their children," for example, a midwife who offered another's offspring to a non-Catholic minister for baptism would be immune from the excommunication. For the rest, the excommunication is incurred also in a case in which baptism would probably be conferred invalidly.
4. Those holding the place of parents can be tutors or even others who are endowed with the right and office of looking after education or instruction.

Note. Those mentioned under 2, 3, and 4 are moreover suspected of heresy (canon 2319, § 2).

II. Whoever makes false relics, or knowingly sells, distributes, or exposes them to the public veneration of the faithful (canon 2326). The word "knowingly" refers to the acts of selling, distributing, and exposing to public veneration. Since it concerns false relics, one does not incur the excommunication who distributes or exposes for veneration relics whose document of authenticity has perished, or concerning whose genuineness he doubts (cf. canon 1285).

III. Whoever has laid violent hands on the person of other clerics, that is, clerics inferior to Bishops, or of religious of either sex (canon 2343, § 4). What violent laying on of hands imports, see p. 766 under X. For the excommunication to be incurred, it is required that the delinquent lay hands on the person of another, not on his own person, and that he know that person to be a cleric, religious, etc. The persons whose violent handling is punished with excommunication are:

1. Clerics, that is, those who by at least first tonsure have been assigned to divine ministries (canon 108, § 1), and have not been deprived of the privileges of clerics; hence even excommunicated, suspended, interdicted, and deposed clerics (cf. canon 2303, § 1), but not those perpetually deprived of the right of wearing ecclesiastical habit (canon 2304, § 2), the degraded (canon 2305, § 1), and all who have legitimately been reduced or have returned from the clerical state to the lay state (canon 213, § 1).
2. Religious of either sex, that is, those who have pronounced vows, whether solemn or simple, perpetual or temporary, in some religion (canon 488, 7°).
3. Male and female novices (cf. canon 614), but not postulants.
4. Members of either sex without public vows, living in common under the governance of Superiors according to approved constitutions (canon 680).

Note. The Ordinary should moreover punish the delinquent with other penalties, if the matter requires it, according to his prudent judgment (canon 2343, § 4).

IV. Those procuring abortion, the mother not excepted, the effect having followed (canon 2350, § 1).

1. Abortion is to be taken in the strict sense, that is, for the ejection of a fetus not yet viable (volume I, n. 733). Therefore the so-called acceleration of birth, the ejection of a dead fetus or a mere mole, and the expulsion of received semen, likewise embryotomy and similar illicit operations, are excluded. But no distinction is to be made between an animated and an unanimated fetus.
2. Those procuring abortion are understood to be the mother and others, whether female or male, who intend abortion and either physically cause it, or by command or by fear induced cause another to cause it. It is said, who intend abortion; hence one is immune from excommunication who, not intending abortion, for example, strikes his wife from anger, even if he foresees abortion. It is said, either by command or etc.; but if you were to deny that those commanding and those inducing fear come under the name of procurers, nevertheless one commanding, as the principal author of the delict, and one inducing fear, as inducing to the delict, are subject to the excommunication. Counselors and others concurring proximately are not counted among procurers, although as cooperators they contract the excommunication if the delict would not have been committed without their work (canon 2209, § 3). Those selling means do not ordinarily incur excommunication, both because ordinarily even without their work, namely with another selling the means, the delict would have been perpetrated, and because the concurrence is remote.

3. The effect having followed, that is, certainly followed; hence in doubt whether a fetus or a mere mole, whether a living or dead fetus, was ejected, the excommunication does not hold.

Whether one whom it repents of the committed crime before the effect follows incurs the excommunication, see p. 723.

Note 1. If the delinquent is a cleric, he is moreover to be deposed (canon 2350, § 1).

Note 2. Those who have procured the abortion of a human fetus, the effect having followed, and all cooperators, are irregular from delict (canon 985, 4°).

V. A religious, apostate from religion, incurs by the law itself an excommunication reserved to his own major Superior, or, if the religion is lay or non-exempt, to the Ordinary of the place in which he is staying (canon 2385).

1. One is called an apostate from religion who is professed from perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, and who illegitimately leaves the religious house with the intention of not returning, or who, though having left legitimately, does not return with the intention of withdrawing himself from religious obedience (canon 644, § 1). The malicious intention mentioned in § 1 is presumed by law if the religious within a month has neither returned nor manifested to the Superior his intention of returning (canon 644, § 2).
2. The excommunication is reserved to his own major Superior if the religion is clerical exempt; if the religion is lay or non-exempt, it is reserved to the Ordinary of the place in which the delinquent is staying (canon 2385), that is, actually staying, even if he has domicile or quasi-domicile elsewhere.

Note. A religious apostate from religion is excluded from legitimate ecclesiastical acts and deprived of all privileges of his religion; and if he returns, he perpetually lacks active and passive voice, and moreover must be punished by the Superiors with other penalties according to the gravity of the fault, according to the norm of the constitutions (canon 2385).

VI. Professed members of perpetual simple vows, both in Orders and in religious Congregations, who presume to contract marriage even only civilly, both they themselves and all who contract with them (canon 2388, § 2). Note that the excommunication does not affect professed members of temporary vows. For the rest, see p. 772 under IX.

Section V. Excommunications Not Reserved

898 The following incur an excommunication not reserved:

I. Authors and publishers who, without due permission, arrange for the books of Sacred Scripture, or notes or commentaries on them, to be printed (canon 2318, § 2).

1. The excommunication regards both the books of Sacred Scripture themselves and notes or commentaries on them. The printing of one book suffices, but not of only a part; likewise the printing of notes or of a commentary on one book, even if they present entirely correct doctrine.
2. The excommunication affects both authors and publishers who, without due permission, arrange for either books or notes or commentaries to be printed; but not the owner of the workshop, typesetters, and those who distribute what has been printed.

II. Those who have dared to command or compel that infidels, apostates from the faith, or heretics, schismatics, or others, whether excommunicated or interdicted, be handed over to ecclesiastical burial against the prescription of canon 1240, § 1, 2° (canon 2339). Excommunicated and interdicted persons are understood after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence (canon 1240, § 1, 2°). Canon 1240, § 1, however, establishes that the persons enumerated in the cited canon are to be deprived of ecclesiastical burial, unless before death they gave some signs of repentance. For the rest, note:

1. On the phrase "have dared," see what was said in n. 858.
2. The excommunication regards the handing over of the enumerated persons to ecclesiastical burial. Ecclesiastical burial consists in the transfer of the corpse to the church, the funeral rites celebrated over it in the same place, and its deposition in a place legitimately deputed for burying the faithful departed (canon 1204). A place legitimately deputed for this is understood not only as a cemetery (canon 1205, § 1), but also a blessed tomb in an unblessed cemetery (canon 1206, § 3). Moreover, for incurring the censure, deposition, even if performed with a sacred rite, in a profane place does not suffice. It is disputed: 1° whether it is enough that the deceased be placed in a sacred place without a sacred rite; 2° whether it is enough that he be placed in a sacred place and with a sacred rite, or whether it is required that all the elements contained in canon 1204 be present. Those who deny that all these are required rely on the explanations of old authors, by which they think one must stand. But the obvious sense of the law so favors the more benign opinion that in practice we admit the opinion which requires all the elements contained in canon 1204 for excommunication.
3. The excommunication affects those commanding and compelling the enumerated persons to be handed over to ecclesiastical burial. Those commanding are those who order it by authority, whether public or private. Thus those burying or assisting at burial are not excommunicated.

Note. Those who spontaneously give burial to the persons enumerated above contract an interdict from entrance into a church reserved to the Ordinary (canon 2339).

III. All those in any way guilty, whether by giving, receiving, or furnishing consent, when the apostolic beneplacitum required in alienating ecclesiastical goods has knowingly been omitted (canon 2347, 3°).

1. The word "knowingly" refers both to those giving and to those receiving and furnishing consent.
2. The excommunication regards the perfected alienation of ecclesiastical goods for which the apostolic beneplacitum is required. Moreover:

a) Alienation now, as before, seems to be taken not only for alienation properly so called, by which bare or useful ownership of a thing is transferred to another, but also for alienation in a broader sense, by which ownership of a thing, whether bare or useful, is burdened (cf. canon 6). Alienations are: donation, sale, exchange, pledge, mortgage, imposition of a passive servitude, remission of an active servitude, compromise, settlement, lease. Perfect alienation, however, is required; hence, if in some place ownership of a sold thing is not transferred except by delivery, this must have been done for the excommunication to be incurred.

b) Ecclesiastical goods are temporal goods, whether corporeal, both immovable and movable, or incorporeal, which belong either to the universal Church and to the Apostolic See or to another moral person in the Church (canon 1497, § 1); the Sacred Congregation of the Council declared that public securities are not excluded.[1]

c) The apostolic beneplacitum is required: 1° Generally for alienating ecclesiastical goods which are either precious or exceed the value of thirty thousand lire or francs[2] (canon 1532, § 1, 1° and 2°), according to what was said and explained in volume I, n. 974. Nevertheless, bearer bonds, as they are called, can be exchanged for other bonds more safe, or at least equally safe and fruitful, with any kind of trade or negotiation excluded, and with the consent of the Ordinary, the diocesan Council of administration, and others whose interest it is (canon 1539, § 2). 2° The apostolic beneplacitum is required for leasing, if the value of the lease, considering, as it seems, the whole time for which the lease is established, exceeds thirty thousand lire or francs, and the lease is beyond nine years (canon 1541, § 2, 1°). A lease made under the condition, "If the apostolic beneplacitum is obtained," is in no way affected by the excommunication, because such a lease is not perfected before the condition is fulfilled, that is, before the beneplacitum is obtained.

3. The excommunication affects those giving, those receiving, and those furnishing consent. Those giving are understood to be those who by themselves or through others alienate goods, but not agents of those alienating, nor those who destroy or steal goods.[3] Those receiving are those for whose benefit the contract is entered. Those furnishing consent are excommunicated if their consent must be sought, which also applies to lay persons.

IV. All, shining with any dignity whatever, who in any way coerce either a man to embrace the clerical state, or a man or woman to enter religion or to emit religious profession, whether solemn or simple, whether perpetual or temporary (canon 2352).

1. The excommunication regards coercion:

a) Either to embracing the clerical state. The clerical state is embraced through reception of first tonsure (canon 108, § 1). Likewise he seems liable to the censure who would coerce someone to receive major orders (cf. canon 971).

b) Or to entering religion. Religion is a society approved by legitimate ecclesiastical authority, in which members, according to the proper laws of that same society, pronounce public vows, perpetual or temporary, though to be renewed after the time has elapsed, and thus tend to evangelical perfection (canon 488, 1°). It is all the same whether it concerns an Order or a Congregation, a clerical or lay religion, a religion of pontifical right or diocesan right. Entrance into religion is now made, as it seems to many, by admission to postulancy, and, where there is no postulancy, by admission to the novitiate. That admission to postulancy suffices seems to be drawn from the fact that the ancient law distinguished entrance into a monastery and reception of the habit, or entrance into the novitiate, and that it also punished with excommunication one who coerced someone to enter a monastery or to begin postulancy.

c) Or to emitting religious profession. One who would coerce someone both to enter religion and to emit profession would incur a twofold excommunication.

2. The excommunication affects all, even Bishops but not Cardinals (canon 2227, § 2), all, I say, coercing in any way, whether directly or indirectly, say by acting upon parents, whether by grave fear, importunate entreaties, or other means without which the effect would not have followed.

3. The excommunication is not incurred unless the effect has followed.

V. A faithful person who knowingly has omitted to denounce within a month the one by whom he was solicited, against the prescription of canon 904 (canon 2368, § 2). Canon 904 sets forth the obligation of denouncing in these words: According to the norm of the apostolic constitutions and especially of the Constitution of Benedict XIV Sacramentum poenitentiae, June 1, 1741, the penitent must denounce, within a month, to the local Ordinary or to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, the priest guilty of the delict of solicitation in confession; and the confessor must, with his conscience gravely burdened, warn the penitent of this burden. Moreover:

1. The excommunication regards omission of the denunciation to be made by the solicited person; concerning this denunciation, see n. 416 sq.
2. The excommunication affects only the solicited persons themselves, but not those who know that another has been solicited. Moreover, it is required that the solicited person knowingly omitted the denunciation; from this it follows that there can be a cause excusing from excommunication which does not excuse from the obligation of denouncing; namely, any cause diminishing imputability excuses from this excommunication (n. 858). An impubes is indeed bound by the obligation of denouncing, but not by the excommunication, unless after attaining puberty he omits the obligation.
3. The delinquent is not to be absolved unless after he has satisfied, or has seriously promised that he will satisfy (canon 2368, § 2). One absolved who seriously promised that he would satisfy the obligation, but afterward, with his will changed, does not satisfy, does not fall back into the excommunication, although the obligation of denouncing persists.

---

[1] January 17, 1906.

[2] Lest the value fluctuate too much, the value of gold money is safely attended to.

[3] Holy Office, March 2, 1870.

Part II. On Interdicts

899 Four interdicts latae sententiae are enumerated, namely:

I. Universities, colleges, chapters, or other moral persons, by whatever name they are called, who appeal from the laws, decrees, or mandates of the Roman Pontiff for the time being to a Universal Council, incur an interdict reserved to the Apostolic See in a special manner (canon 2332). This interdict affects the moral persons appealing; physical persons appealing in this way contract excommunication (p. 763). What an interdict issued against a moral person imports, however, see p. 740, VII and question 1.

II. They contract by the law itself an interdict from entrance into a church, until, at the judgment of the one whose sentence they have despised, they have made congruous satisfaction: those knowingly celebrating divine things or causing divine things to be celebrated in interdicted places; or admitting to the celebration of divine offices, which are forbidden by censure, clerics excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence (canon 2338, § 3).[1]

1. The word "knowingly" refers to those celebrating, to those causing divine offices to be celebrated, and to those admitting. Therefore the interdict affects:

a) Those knowingly celebrating or causing divine things to be celebrated (p. 731) in interdicted places, excepting, however, those divine things which can be done according to the norm of canons 2270-2272 (n. 878).

b) Those knowingly admitting, to the celebration of divine offices forbidden by censure, clerics excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended, against whom a declaratory or condemnatory sentence has been issued. Those admitting are understood to be those who have the office and right of admitting or repelling, such as a pastor or rector.

2. The interdict is to be removed, or rather seems to cease ipso facto, as soon as the delinquents have made congruous satisfaction at the judgment of the one whose sentence they have despised.[2] Thus judgment concerning congruous satisfaction belongs to him who interdicted the place or issued the declaratory or condemnatory sentence against the clerics who are admitted to divine offices.

III. Those who spontaneously give burial to infidels, apostates from the faith, or heretics, schismatics, or others, whether excommunicated or interdicted, against the prescription of canon 1240, § 1 (canon 2339), contract an interdict from entrance into a church reserved to the Ordinary. What canon 1240, § 1 prescribes, see p. 750. For the rest:

1. On the word "spontaneously," compare what was said in n. 858.
2. In what sense ecclesiastical burial is taken, see p. 778.
3. Those giving burial are understood to be clerics only, namely those whose role it is to perform all those things which pertain to ecclesiastical burial.

IV. Those who gave cause for a local interdict or an interdict against a community or college contract a personal interdict reserved to no one (canon 2338, § 4). But to what penalties persons personally interdicted are liable, see n. 879.

[1] This interdict, since it is neither perpetual, nor for a predefined time, nor at the pleasure of the Superior, seems to be a medicinal penalty, not a vindicative one (cf. canon 2291, 2°).

[2] Cf. Holy Office, February 1, 1871.

Part III. On Suspensions

Of suspensions now in force by law, some are medicinal penalties or censures, others are vindicative penalties (n. 2255, § 2).

Section I. On Suspensions which Are Censures or Medicinal Penalties

900 I. Clerics, even those raised to episcopal dignity, who knowingly through simony have promoted someone to Orders or have been promoted, or have administered or received other Sacraments, incur a suspension reserved to the Apostolic See (canon 2371).

1. The discussion is of a generally issued suspension (p. 742).
2. Simony is taken as explained on p. 773.
3. Under the name of order here also come first tonsure and episcopate (canon 950).
4. The word "knowingly" refers not only to the first part, but also to "have administered or received."

Note. Delinquents, even laymen, are moreover suspected of heresy (canon 2371).

II. Those who presume to receive orders from one excommunicated, suspended, or interdicted after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence, or from a notorious apostate, heretic, or schismatic, contract ipso facto suspension a divinis, reserved to the Apostolic See (canon 2372). Under the name of order here does not come first tonsure, since it confers no power from which someone can be suspended (cf. canon 950).

Note. One who in good faith has been ordained by one of those enumerated above lacks the exercise of the order thus received until he is dispensed (canon 2372). Here it is not a question of a penalty, since delict is absent, but of mere privation. The dispensation, however, in view of general principles, belongs to the proper Ordinary of the one ordained.

III. Until he obtains absolution from the Holy See, a religious dismissed for delicts less than those mentioned in canon 670 remains ipso facto suspended (canon 671, 1°).

IV. A cleric who, against the prescription of canon 120, has dared to drag before a lay judge another person enjoying the privilege of forum, namely apart from Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church or Legates of the Apostolic See, or major Officials of the Roman Curia for affairs pertaining to their function, or his own Ordinary, or another Bishop, even merely titular, or an Abbot or Prelate nullius, or major Superiors of religions of pontifical right, contracts ipso facto suspension from office reserved to the Ordinary (canon 2341). The prescription of canon 120, insofar as it must here be attended to, establishes that another person besides the enumerated persons cannot be summoned before a lay judge without the permission of the local Ordinary, namely of the place in which the case is being conducted.

On the word "dragging," see p. 766.

The Ordinary to whom the suspension is reserved is the proper Ordinary of the suspended person, not the local Ordinary whose permission had to be obtained.

Note. If the delinquent is a layman, he must be punished by the Superiors with other penalties according to the gravity of the fault, according to the norm of the constitutions (canon 2341).

V. A fugitive religious, if he is in sacred orders, contracts ipso facto a suspension reserved to his own major Superior (canon 2386), that is, a priest, deacon, or subdeacon. Under the name of religious here also come members in societies of men who imitate the manner of life of religious, living in common under the governance of Superiors according to approved constitutions, but are not bound by the three customary public vows, nor are they properly designated by the name religious[1] (cf. canon 673, § 1).

The discussion is of a generally issued suspension (p. 742).

Note. The whole canon 2386 establishes the following: A fugitive religious incurs ipso facto privation of office, if he has any in religion, and suspension reserved to his own major Superior, if he is in sacred orders; but when he returns, he is to be punished according to the constitutions, and if the constitutions make no provision concerning this, the major Superior is to inflict penalties according to the gravity of the fault.

VI. The following contract a suspension reserved to no one:

1. A priest who without necessary jurisdiction has presumed to hear sacramental confessions is ipso facto suspended a divinis (canon 2366). Without necessary jurisdiction, that is, without at least probable jurisdiction (cf. canon 209). What sacramental confession is, see n. 430. It is enough, however, that someone hear a confession of this kind, even if he does not absolve the penitent.
2. A priest who without necessary jurisdiction has presumed to absolve from reserved sins is ipso facto suspended from hearing confessions (canon 2366). The pronouncement of the form of absolution is required, however, and mere hearing of confession or fictitious absolution is not enough.
3. Whoever maliciously approaches orders without letters or with false dimissorial letters, or before canonical age, or by a leap, is ipso facto suspended from the order received (canon 2374). Under the name of order here does not come first tonsure, because it confers no power from which someone can be suspended (cf. canon 950).[2] "Maliciously" is equated with the words "has presumed," etc., about which see p. 718.
4. A cleric who has presumed to resign an ecclesiastical office, benefice, or dignity into the hands of laymen incurs ipso facto suspension a divinis (canon 2400).
5. An Abbot or Prelate nullius who, against the prescription of canon 322, § 2, has not received the blessing, is ipso facto suspended from jurisdiction (canon 2402). Canon 322, § 2 establishes: Abbots or Prelates nullius who, by apostolic prescription or from the constitutions of their own religion, must be blessed, should receive the blessing, within three months from receiving the apostolic letters and with legitimate impediment ceasing, from the Bishop whom they prefer.
6. A Vicar Capitular who grants dimissorial letters for ordination against the prescription of canon 958, § 1, n. 3, is ipso facto subject to suspension a divinis (canon 2409). From canon 958, § 1, n. 3, the Vicar Capitular can give dimissorial letters for seculars only with the consent of the Chapter after a year from the vacant see; but within the year only to those constrained by reason of a benefice received or to be received, or by reason of some certain office for which, because of the necessity of the diocese, provision must be made without delay.

---

[1] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 347).

[2] Whether the Episcopate is included, cf. Cerato, op. cit., p. 195.

Section II. On Suspensions which Are Vindicative Penalties

901 I. Until the Holy See has dispensed them, the following are suspended by the law itself: the Bishop consecrating someone as Bishop, the assisting Bishops or, in place of Bishops, the assisting priests, and the one who receives consecration without an apostolic mandate against the prescription of canon 953 (canon 2370). Canon 953 prescribes: Episcopal consecration is reserved to the Roman Pontiff, so that no Bishop may consecrate anyone as Bishop unless the pontifical mandate has first been established.

It concerns a generally issued suspension (p. 742), and one inflicted by way of vindicative penalty; this is clear from the fact that a censure or medicinal penalty is removed by absolution, but this suspension by dispensation of the Holy See (cf. canon 2236, § 1 and 2289).

The suspension among assisting priests affects only those who assist in place of Bishops, not others.

II. From canon 2373, the following ipso facto incur suspension for one year from the conferral of orders, reserved to the Apostolic See:

1. Those who, against the prescription of canon 955, have ordained another's subject without dimissorial letters of his own Ordinary. As to the prescription of canon 955, cf. n. 601. The suspension also affects one who confers first tonsure (cf. canon 950).
2. Those who, against the prescription of canon 993, n. 4, and canon 994, have ordained their own subject who had stayed elsewhere for so long a time that he could have contracted a canonical impediment there. Concerning the cited canons, see n. 650. The suspension also includes first tonsure (cf. canon 950).
3. Those who, against the prescription of canon 974, § 1, n. 7, have promoted someone to major orders without a canonical title (cf. n. 618).
4. Those who, without prejudice to legitimate privilege, have promoted a religious belonging to a family which is outside the territory of the ordaining Bishop, even with dimissorial letters of the proper Superior, unless it has been legitimately proved that some one of the cases occurs which are mentioned in canon 966 (cf. treatise on Order, n. 602).

Delinquents are suspended from the conferral of orders, with no order, indeed not even first tonsure and episcopal consecration, excepted (cf. canon 950).

III. A clerical religious whose profession has been declared null because of deceit committed by him, if he is constituted in major orders, remains ipso facto suspended until the Apostolic See has seen otherwise (canon 2387). Under the name of religious also comes a member of a society of clerical men living in common without vows; likewise under the name of profession comes the profession improperly so called, or that emitted by a member of the said society.[1]

Note. If the delinquent is constituted in minor orders, he is to be cast out from the clerical state (canon 2387).

IV. Chapters, convents, and all others to whom it pertains, admitting such elected, presented, or nominated persons before the exhibition of the letters, remain ipso facto suspended from the right of electing, nominating, or presenting at the pleasure of the Apostolic See (canon 2394, 3°). It concerns those who admit persons elected, presented, or nominated to an ecclesiastical benefice, office, or dignity, into possession or governance or administration of the same, before the elected, presented, or nominated persons have exhibited the necessary letters.

V. Religious Superiors who, against the prescription of canons 965-967, have presumed to send their subjects to another Bishop to be ordained are ipso facto suspended from the celebration of Mass for a month (canon 2410; cf. treatise on Order, n. 632). Under the name of religious Superiors also come Superiors of a society of men living in common without vows, if the society enjoys the right of granting dimissorial letters to its members.[2] Major Superiors are understood, and those exempt, to whom, namely, belongs the right of giving dimissorial letters.

The suspension is reserved to no one.

---

[1] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 347).

[2] Pontifical Commission, June 2-3, 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 347).

Addenda

Volume I, p. 330, n. 491, line 4: let it be read thus: Positive infidelity is when an unbaptized person knows that God has spoken, and nevertheless denies or doubts that which God has manifested; privative infidelity is when an unbaptized person doubts, etc.

Volume I, p. 664, scholion: in place of "debtors," let "creditors" be read.

Volume I, p. 733, n. 1093, line 23: let it be read thus: it likewise persists, if in some region or diocese a habitual dispensation has been granted by the Holy See, say for five years, from a feast day not suppressed; because the foundation of cessation falls away.

Volume II, p. 416: in place of Article III, let Section VII be read.

Volume II, p. 417: in place of Section VII, let Section VIII be read.

Volume II, p. 498: in place of "and the form of betrothals," let "the fittingness and governance of betrothals" be read.

Volume II, p. 543: in place of can. 132, § 5, let can. 732, § 1 be read; and in place of can. 732, §§ 2 and 3, let can. 752, § 3 and can. 754, § 3 be read.

Colophon (Volume II)

Printing house called "Les Presses Gruuthuuse," Bruges (Belgium).

Alphabetical Index to Volume II

A Abbot: faculty of a regular Abbot for conferring minor Orders by reason of governance, II, 602; an Abbot or Prelate nullius who does not receive the blessing at the due time is liable to penalties, 900, VI.

Ablution: In baptism, 54, 55; in the case in which the host has fallen, II, 274.

Abortion: II, 897, IV.

Abortive fetus: To what extent and how it is to be baptized, II, 92.

Abrupt interruption: Of Mass, II, 271, 4.

Absolution from censure: Censure is removed only by absolution, II, 864; power of absolving: in ordinary circumstances, 865, 1; in more urgent cases, 865, 2; in danger of death, 865, 3; obligation of absolving, 866; form of absolving, 867; effect of absolution in relation to the forum for which it is valid, 868.

Absolution from sins: Form of absolution, II, 340; essentials of the form, 341, 1; sense of the form, 341, 2; accidental elements of the form, 342; manner of pronouncing the form, 343, 344; absolution by telephone, 343, corollary II; by ear-tube, 343, corollary III; conditional absolution, 344; Absolution from reserved sins, 387.

Absolution of an accomplice: Withdrawal of jurisdiction over an accomplice, II, 404, 410; exceptions, 411; excommunication established against the one absolving, 412, 413; absolution from the excommunication contracted, 414, 415.

Accomplice: Whether the infamy of an accomplice to be avoided excuses from the integrity of confession, II, 328; inquiry into the name of an accomplice, 408. Cf. absolution of an accomplice.

Acolytate: Notion, II, 588; matter and form, 590.

Act of repenting: Notion, II, 275; necessity of means, 277; necessity of precept, 278; effects: remission of mortal sins, 280-282; conferral of sanctifying grace, 283; remission of venial sins, 284; remission of punishment, 285; revival of merits, 286.

Admission: to orders, II, 605.

Adoption: Impedient impediment of marriage, II, 760; or diriment impediment, 802.

Adult: Baptism of adults, II, 101, 102.

Affinity: Notion, II, 796; line and degree, 796, II; diriment impediment of marriage, 796, III; multiplication of it, 797; names of relatives by affinity, 798.

Afterbirth: Whether Baptism is valid in the afterbirth, II, 54.

Age: of communion, 157, 173; for reception of orders, 614; As a diriment impediment of marriage, II, 770.

Alb: To be used in Mass, II, 266.

Alienation: alienation of ecclesiastical goods without due permission is punished, II, 898, III.

Altar: II, 250; notion, 250, 1; construction, 250, 2; consecration, 250, 3; execration, 250, 4; title, 250, 5; Privilege of a portable altar, 246.

Altar cloths: II, 251.

Altar cross: II, 252.

Amice: To be used in Mass, II, 266.

Amniotic fluid: Whether it is valid matter of Baptism, II, 52.

Antependium: II, 254.

Antimensia: Celebration of Mass on them, II, 250.

Apostate: absolution from penalties, II, 895; Apostate from religion is liable to penalties, 897, V; likewise a fugitive religious, 900, V.

Apparently dead persons: Their confession, II, 477; anointing, ibid..

Appellants: Appellants from the Pope to a Universal Council are liable to penalties, II, 895, V; 899.

Application of indulgences: To the dead: power of granting indulgences for the dead, II, 502; requisites for one acquiring indulgences to apply them to the dead, 503; the measure according to which an indulgence comes to the dead, 504.

Application of Mass: Notion and division, II, 208, 1; power of applying, 208, 2; persons for whom it can be made, 208, 3; requisites for valid application, 208, 4; obligation of application, 211; subject and object of the obligation, 212, 213; by reason of precept or promise, 214.

Application of penalties: II, 853, III, 856; if it concerns the infliction of a censure, admonition must be premised, 859.

Attention: in confecting sacraments, II, 27.

Attrition: Notion, II, 296; it suffices in the reception of Baptism, 282, and Penance, 297; motives from which it can be elicited, 298.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

B Bad company: To what extent it is an occasion of sinning, II, 473.

Bad writings: how far they are an occasion of sinning, II, 472.

Baptism: Notion, II, 50; existence, 51; remote matter required for validity, 52; required for licitness, 53; proximate matter required for validity, 54; required for licitness, 55; form, 56; required for validity, 57; required for licitness, 58; effects, 61; necessity of means, 62; of precept, 73; Baptism of desire, 63-67; Baptism of blood, 68-72; Administration of baptism: minister, 74-78; rites and ceremonies, 79-81; sponsors, 82-86; time, 87; place, 88; annotation and proof, 89-90; Reception of baptism: person receiving, 90; infants, 91; abortive fetuses, 92; fetuses not yet brought forth, 93; monsters, 98; infants of non-Catholics, 99, 100; adults, 101, 102; the insane and the furious, 103; those doubtfully baptized, 104; exposed infants, 104, corollary II; those baptized by a layperson, 104, corollary III; converted heretics, 104, corollary IV; order to be observed in reconciling a heretic, 105; manner of receiving baptism, 106-109.

Baptismal font: II, 88.

Betrothals: Notion, II, 659; those entered by persons held by an impediment, 660; division, 661; fittingness, 662; governance, 663; form: exposition of the form, 664-666; necessity, 667; subjects of the form, 668; formulas, 669; effects, 670; conditional betrothals, 671; accidentals of betrothals, 672; dissolution of betrothals: by mutual consent, 673; because of a notable defect, 674; because of disparity of condition, 675; because of dissent of parents, 676; because of violation of fidelity, 677; because of the choice of a more perfect state, 678; because of a supervening impediment, 679; because of fear of an unhappy marriage, 680; by dispensation, 681.

Bicycle: Its use in carrying Communion, II, 170.

Bination: When it is lawful, II, 237; who can grant it, 238; to what extent it is lawful to receive a stipend for it, 217, note 2.

Blessing: Corporal, II, 256; of the pall, 257; of the purificator, 258; of vestments, 266.

Bond: Diriment impediment to marriage, II, 776-779.

Book: Excommunication of those publishing, defending, reading, or retaining certain books, II, 895, III.

Bourse / burse: Burse to be used in Mass, II, 260.

Boy: First Communion, II, 173; Viaticum, ibid.; confession of boys, 446; to what extent they are capable of grave sin, ibid., corollary II, III, 64.

Bread: Matter of the Most Holy Eucharist, II, 140; what kind is required for validity, 141; for liceity, 142; whether it is ever lawful to consecrate bread of another rite, ibid.; a priest of the Latin rite with unleavened bread, a priest of the Oriental rite with leavened bread, even to faithful of another rite, except in a case of necessity, 169.

Burial: What ecclesiastical burial imports, II, 872, 3; who are to be granted it, who are to be deprived of it, 890, V; those who compel persons excluded from ecclesiastical burial to be handed over to it are liable to penalties, 898, II; likewise those who spontaneously give them ecclesiastical burial, 899, III.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

C Caesarean section: Notion, II, 94; morality, 95; by whom it is to be performed, 96; mode of performing it, 97.

Candle: In Mass, II, 253.

Canon penitentiary: His sacramental jurisdiction is ordinary, II, 364; he cannot delegate it, 365, corollary I; his jurisdiction over reserved sins, 387.

Cardinals: Their sacramental jurisdiction, II, 364; they cannot delegate it, 365, corollary I; their jurisdiction over reserved sins, 387.

Carrying of Communion: II, 164, 2.

Case of the Apostle: II, 721.

Castrated man: He is incapable of marriage, II, 774.

Cautions: To be given in mixed marriage, II, 764; in marriage with an infidel, 780.

Celebration of marriage: Minister of the celebration, II, 732; ordinary juridic form required for validity, 733-735; requisites for liceity, 736; delegation for assisting at marriage, 737; extraordinary juridic form, 738-740; those subject to juridic forms, 741; those immune from juridic forms, 742; liturgical form: rite of celebration, 743; rite of blessing, 744; form to be observed in marriage between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party, 745-746; time of celebration, 747; place, 748; inscription of marriage, 749-751; celebration of marriage of conscience, 752.

Censure as penalty: Notion, II, 862; multiplication, ibid.; division, ibid.; reservation of censure, 863; remission of censure, 864-868; different censures, 869.

Ceremonial of Bishops: II, 27.

Ceremonies: supplying ceremonies in Baptism, II, 81; in Extreme Unction, 580.

Certificate: Denial of a certificate in confession, II, 438, question 5.

Chalice: II, 255.

Change: Of matter and form in the sacraments, II, 23.

Character: Effect of the sacraments, II, 8, 9; In baptism, 61; in confirmation, 115; in order, 597.

Chasuble: To be used in Mass, II, 266.

Chrism: In Confirmation, II, 112.

Church: Consecration and blessing of a church, II, 245; execration, 247; violation, ibid.; reconciliation, ibid. Visitation of a church for indulgences, 497, 557.

Circumstances: Circumstances to be declared in confession, II, 320, 3.

Civil marriage: Notion, II, 841; to what extent it is lawful to enter it or to assist at it as official or witness, ibid.; clerics and those solemnly professed who presume to contract marriage even only civilly are punished by excommunication simply reserved to the Pope, 896, IX; those professed of simple vows by excommunication reserved to the Ordinary, 897, VI.

Clandestinity: Clandestine marriages are generally invalid, II, 734 sq.

Clause: clauses in matrimonial dispensations, II, 826.

Cloister: penalties of those violating cloister, 896, VI.

Co-participants: In delict, II, 849.

Commissory: Grant of a matrimonial dispensation in commissory form, II, 825.

Communion: first Communion of children, II, 173; frequent and daily Communion, 182-185.

Commutation: commutation of sacramental satisfaction, II, 352-354.

Composition: For a matrimonial dispensation, II, 820.

Concelebration: II, 160.

Concubinage: Confession of concubinarians, II, 466, 467.

Condition: In the ministration of sacraments, II, 30-33; In the sacrament of Baptism, 104, 105; In the sacrament of Penance, 404; In betrothals, 672; In Matrimony, 710, 711.

Confession: Confession as part of the sacrament of Penance: notion, II, 307; division, 308; necessity, 309; to what extent generic confession suffices, 310; qualities of confession: let it be made to a priest as judge, 311; to a present priest, 312; secretly, 313; vocally, 314; whether a converted heretic is bound to confess integrally, 319. Cf. generic confession, confession of venial sins; Confession of children, 446; of the rude, dull, and semi-feeble, 447; of habituated persons, 449-454; of occasionaries, 455-474; of the dying, 475, 476; of apparently dead persons, 477; of baptized non-Catholics, 478.

Confession of venial sins: II, 294, 2, 338.

Confessor: Confessors to be deputed for a clerical religion of men, II, 374; for a religion of women, 376-378; for a society, both of men and of women, living in community without vows, 378; Qualities of confessors, 389; Duties of confessors: in confession: duty of questioning, 390-395; of instructing, 396; of judging sins, 397; of judging and promoting disposition, 398-401; of advising amendment of life, 402; of rendering sentence as to those certainly indisposed, 403; as to those doubtfully disposed, 404; as to those sufficiently certainly disposed, 405-407. Things to be avoided in confession: inquiry into the name of an accomplice, 408; absolution of an accomplice, 409-415, cf. absolution of an accomplice; solicitation to shameful things, 416-427, cf. solicitation, denunciation. After confession: duty of observing the sacramental seal, 428-440, cf. sacramental seal; duty of repairing admitted defects: defects concerning validity, 441; defects concerning integrity, 442; defects concerning an obligation to be imposed, 443.

Confirmation: Notion, II, 110; existence, 111; remote matter required for validity, 112; proximate matter required for validity, 113; required for liceity, 113; form, 114; effects, 115; necessity of means, 116; of precept, 117; Ministration of Confirmation: person ministering, 118; licitness of ministering, 119; obligation of ministering, 120; things to be observed in ministering, 121; annotation and proof, 122; Reception of Confirmation: person receiving, 123; age of reception, 124; things to be observed in reception, 125.

Conjugal murder: Diriment impediment of marriage, II, 790.

Consanguinity: Notion, II, 791; division, 791, II; manner of finding degrees, 791, III; multiplication, 792; names of blood relatives, 793; impediment of consanguinity, 794; multiplication of it, 795.

Consecrated species: Their reservation, II, 130-132; they should be fresh and frequently renewed, 132, 5; what if the number is not sufficient, 169; if one has fallen, 274; if after the ablution fragments or an entire Host is found, ibid.; if it is vomited, ibid.; penalties against abusers, 894.

Consecration: In Mass: minister of consecration, II, 160; requisites for valid consecration, 161; for licit consecration, 162; Consecration of a church, 245; of an altar, 250, 3; of sacred vessels, 255.

Consent: In betrothals, II, 659; In marriage, 702-709.

Contrition: Notion, II, 295; division, 296; what contrition is required in the sacrament of Penance, 297; properties of contrition: that it be true, 299, 1; internal, 299, 2; formal, 299, 3; supernatural, 299, 4; estimatively supreme, 299, 5; universal, 299, 6; external, 299, 7; relation of contrition to the other parts of the sacrament of Penance, 300; contrition as to venial sins, 306.

Contumacy: II, 862.

Convalidation: of invalid marriage because of a diriment impediment, II, 830; because of defect of consent, 831; because of defect of form, 832; sanation in the root, 833; convalidation of invalid marriage between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party, 834; inscription of convalidated marriage, 835; manner of handling a case of convalidation, 836.

Cooperator: Cooperator in delict, II, 849.

Corporal: II, 256.

Cough: As regards receiving Communion, II, 176.

Courtship: Their treatment, II, 468.

Crime: Diriment impediment of marriage, II, 786-790; adultery with promise of marriage, 787; adultery with attempted marriage, 788; adultery with conjugal murder, 789; conjugal murder alone, 790.

Crucifix of the Way of the Cross: Notion, II, 524; annexing of indulgences, 525; indulgences annexed and their acquisition, 526.

Cruelty: Cause of separation of spouses, II, 841.

Cruets: II, 262.

Custody of the Most Holy Eucharist: Licitness, II, 130; places, 131; manner, 132.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

D Dances: to what extent they are an occasion of sinning, II, 470.

Danger: Domestic dangers, II, 409.

Danger of death: What is understood by it, if the discussion is about Viaticum, II, 158; about confession, 370; about Extreme Unction, 581.

Deacon: Extraordinary minister of Baptism, II, 74; minister of exposition and reposition of the Most Holy Sacrament, 134; extraordinary minister of the dispensation of the Holy Eucharist, 163.

Deaf-mute: How far he is bound to confess in writing, II, 326; as regards gaining indulgences, 498, d.

Death: signs that death has occurred, II, 477.

Defects: To be corrected in the dispensation of the Holy Eucharist, II, 274; in the oblation of Mass, ibid.; in the ministration of orders, 594-596.

Degradation: Vindicative penalty of clerics, II, 891, XII.

Delay of absolution: II, 404.

Delegation: Delegation for assisting at marriage, II, 737.

Delict: Nature, quality, quantity, and division, II, 846; fuller exposition, 847-849, cf. imputability; effects of delict, 850; attempted delict, 851.

Denunciation: Denunciation of a confessor soliciting to shameful things: documents pertaining here, II, 416; who must be denounced, 417-419; who must denounce, 420, 421; manner of denouncing, 422; a penitent refusing cannot of himself be absolved, 424; manner of receiving the denunciation, 426; false denunciation, 427; requisites for a false denunciation to be reserved by reason of itself to the Holy See, 427, I; requisites for a false denunciation to have annexed to it excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Holy See, 427, II; absolution from false denunciation, 427, III; Denunciations to be premised to the ministration of orders, 652; Penalty established against a penitent who refuses to denounce a soliciting confessor, 898, V.

Deposition: Vindicative penalty of clerics, II, 891, X.

Devotion: Actual devotion in the reception of the Eucharist, II, 180.

Diaconate: Notion and institution, II, 588; it is a sacrament, 589; matter and form, 591.

Disparity of cult: Diriment impediment of marriage, II, 780 sq.

Dispensation: Dispensation in impediments of marriage, II, 803-826, cf. impediment of marriage.

Dispensation of the Eucharist: II, 163, 164; defects admitted in the dispensation, how they are to be corrected, 274.

Dissent: To what extent dissent of parents is a reason for not standing by betrothals, II, 676.

Divorce: Full divorce: dissolution of a ratified and non-consummated marriage, II, 838; dissolution of marriage between a baptized party and a non-baptized party, 839; Semi-full divorce: causes of perpetual separation, 840; causes of temporary separation, 841; authority by which separation must be instituted, 842, where separation from bed alone is also treated; consequences of separation, 843; to what extent it is lawful to petition for civil divorce, to pronounce it, or to speak for it, 844.

Duel: penalties, II, 896, VIII.

Dying person: Jurisdiction over the dying, II, 370; confession of the dying, 475, 476. Cf. the apparently dead.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

E Earnest-money: added to betrothals, II, 672.

Ecclesiastical garb: privation of ecclesiastical garb, II, 891, IX and XI.

Ecclesiastical penalty: The power of punishing belongs to the Church, II, 852; notion, 853; division, ibid.; infliction, ibid.; interpretation, ibid.; Superiors having the power of punishing, 854; Superiors enjoying non-judicial power, 855; what they can do, ibid.; Superiors enjoying judicial power, 856; things to be observed by them, ibid.; subjects to a penal law or precept, 857; requisites in order that one contract a penalty latae sententiae, 858; requisites in order that one can be punished by a penalty ferendae sententiae, 859; obligation of observing a penalty, 860; remission of penalties, 861; medicinal penalties or censures, 862-888, cf. censure; vindicative penalties, 889-891, cf. vindicative penalty.

Episcopate: Notion and institution, II, 588; it is a sacrament, 589; matter and form, 593.

Error: in betrothals, II, 659; in marriage, 705.

Examination: Of conscience, II, 329-331; To be undergone for obtaining sacramental jurisdiction, 366; To be undergone by those to be ordained, 651; Concerning the free state of persons about to marry, 682.

Exchange: To what extent exchange of intentions is lawful, II, 228.

Excommunication: Notion, II, 870; to be inflicted with great circumspection, ibid.; division, 871; effects, 872; violation of it, 873; excommunications reserved to the Pope in the most special manner, 894; reserved to the Pope in a special manner, 895; simply reserved, 896; reserved to the Ordinary, 897; non-reserved, 898.

Execration: Of a church and public oratory, II, 247.

Execution: of a matrimonial dispensation, II, 825, 826.

Exercises: To be premised to reception of orders, 653.

Exorcistate: Notion and institution, II, 588; it is not a sacrament, 589; matter and form, 590.

Exposed infants: To what extent they are to be baptized, II, 104, corollary II.

Exposition of the Most Holy Sacrament: II, 134.

Extraordinary: II, 374-378.

Extreme Unction: Notion, II, 563; existence, 564; even in the case of several anointings it is only one sacrament, 565; essence: remote matter required for validity, 566; required for liceity, 567; proximate matter required for validity, 568; required for liceity: outside the case of necessity, 569; in the case of necessity, 570; form, 571, 572; union of matter and form, 573; special character of Extreme Unction, 574; effects, 575; necessity: of means, 576; of precept, 577; Ministration of Extreme Unction: minister, 578; obligation, 579; things to be observed, 580; Reception of Extreme Unction: requisites for someone to be capable of receiving Extreme Unction, 581; applications, 582; what intention is required, 583; anointing of baptized non-Catholics, 584; manner of receiving Extreme Unction, 585; repeated reception, 586; how much it matters that a dying person be anointed, and indeed in good time, 587.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

F Favor: Favor of law, which belongs to marriage, II, 723.

Fear: in betrothals, II, 659; in matrimony, 706.

Fee: For matrimonial dispensation, II, 820.

Fetus: Baptism of an abortive fetus, II, 92; of a fetus not yet brought forth, 93.

Fiction: in the ministration of a sacrament, II, 17, 18; in betrothals, 659; in marriage, 702.

Final: What a final cause is, II, 810.

First Communion: II, 173.

Fleshy mole: Whether it is to be baptized, II, 92.

Form: Form of the sacraments, II, 3; the minister should duly unite matter and form, 22; substantial and accidental change of the form, 23; the form should be uttered by voice, 24. Cf. the individual sacraments.

Forty Hours: Supplication, II, 95.

Fruits: Fruits of the Mass, II, 205-208.

Fugitive religious: He is punished, II, 900, V.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

G General absolution: Granted with a plenary indulgence: notion, II, 533; grant of the indulgence, 534; acquisition of the indulgence, 535.

General confession: II, 335-337.

Generic confession: II, 310.

Governance: Of betrothals, II, 663; of the marriage of baptized persons, 718, 1; of the marriage of non-baptized persons, 718, 2; the civil legislator can establish impediments of matrimony between non-baptized persons, 718, corollary I; he cannot simply forbid marriage to anyone, ibid., corollary II; nor render anyone incapable of marriage, ibid., corollary III; what is to be said about prescribing a medical inspection, ibid., corollary IV.

Grace: Grace which the sacraments produce, II, 6; in Baptism, 61; in Confirmation, 115; in the Most Holy Eucharist, 151.

Gracious: Grant of a matrimonial dispensation in gracious form, II, 825.

Gradation: In receiving Orders, II, 616.

Gregorian altar: II, 513; circumstance of Gregorian Masses to be fulfilled, 222.

Gregorian Masses: II, 222.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

H Habituated person: Notion, II, 449; division, 450; absolution, 451-454.

Half-witted persons: As regards reception of the sacraments, II, 45; Communion, 174; confession, 447, II.

Hand towel: In Mass, 260.

Health: What kind of affliction of health is required so that Extreme Unction can be received, II, 581, 3.

Heretics: penalties of heretics, II, 895; absolution from penalties, II, 895; sacraments cannot be ministered to heretics, II, 28; what if they are in danger of death, 478, 584; to what extent they are bound by the juridic form of betrothals, 668; by the juridic form of marriage, 742; by impediments of marriage, 757.

Hermaphrodites: To what extent they are capable of marriage, II, 774, 11.

Heroic act of charity: Notion, II, 549; privileges annexed to it, 550.

Holy Saturday: Dispensation of Communion, II, 165; celebration of Mass, II, 248.

Host: How many and of what kind the consecrated hosts must be, II, 132, 3, 4. Requisites for valid consecration, 161; what if the ciborium was left outside the corporal, ibid.; what concerning doubtfully consecrated hosts, ibid.; requisites for licit consecration, 162; what if the hosts are brought after the Offertory, ibid..

Household members: The right of ministering Viaticum and Extreme Unction to household members of a clerical religious institute, II, 164, 3.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

I Ignorance: in betrothals, II, 659; in marriage, 704; with respect to the imputability of delict, 847; with respect to penalties, 858.

Illegitimate persons: II, 727; legitimation, 728.

Immersion: Baptism by immersion, II, 54.

Impediment: For Orders, II, 638-643.

Impediment of marriage: Notion, II, 754; division, 755; power of establishing impediments, 756; passive subject of impediments, 757; marriage between a faithful person bound by an impediment and an unfaithful person, 757, corollary I; between an unfaithful person bound by a civil impediment and a faithful person, ibid., corollary II; causes excusing from a diriment impediment, 758; to what extent it is lawful to enter marriage with a doubtful diriment impediment, ibid., question; Impeding impediments, 759-768, cf. simple vow, legal kinship, mixed religion; marriage with an unworthy person, 769; Diriment impediments, 770-802, cf. the individual impediments; Dispensation of impediments: dispensing power of the Supreme Pontiff and the organs through which he dispenses, 803; of local Ordinaries, 804-806; of the pastor and assisting priest, 807; of the confessor, 808; things to be observed, 809; causes for dispensing, 810-812; petition for dispensation: person petitioning, 813; person to be approached, 814; supplication to be composed, 815; for the external forum, 816-820; for the internal forum, 821; for convalidating marriage, 822; defects of a dispensation to be healed, 823, 824; execution of a dispensation, 825-826.

Impenitence: Sin of impenitence, II, 279.

Impotence: As a diriment impediment of marriage: notion, II, 771; division, 772; existence of the impediment, 773; cases of impotence, 774; effects of impotence both before and after marriage, 775.

Impulsive: What an impulsive cause is, II, 810.

Imputability: of delict, II, 847, 848; of cooperators, 849; attempted delict, 851.

Indisposed person: Who they are, II, 403; absolution must be denied to them, ibid..

Indissolubility of marriage: Notion and division, II, 720; marriage intrinsically indissoluble, 720, I; to what extent it is extrinsically indissoluble: marriage between a baptized party and a non-baptized party, 720, II, 2; marriage between non-baptized persons, 720, II, 3. Cf. Pauline privilege.

Indulgence: Notion, II, 481; existence, 482; division, 483; grant: power of granting, 484; subject of the power, 485; interpretation of the power, 486; use of the power, 487; publication of indulgences, 488; interpretation of indulgences, 489; faculty of blessing things with the application of indulgences, 490; Grant of indulgences: capable subject, 491; requisites for the capable subject to gain indulgences: intention, 492; works to be fulfilled considered generally, 493; works considered specifically, 494: confession, 495; Communion, 496; visitation of a church, 497; recitation of prayers, 498; commutation of works, 499; to what extent several indulgences can be acquired on the same day, 500; Application of indulgences to the souls in purgatory: power of granting indulgences for the dead, 502; requisites for the one acquiring indulgences to apply them to the dead, 503; measure according to which an indulgence comes to the dead, 504; Transfer of indulgences, 505; suspension of indulgences, 506; cessation of indulgences, 507.

Infamous persons: Persons infamous by law are irregular, II, 628.

Infamy: II, 860; infamy of law is a common vindicative penalty, 890; infamy of law and of fact, ibid..

Informity: Of the sacraments, II, 10; of the sacrament of Penance, 299, 6, corollary.

Inquiry: Into the name of an accomplice, II, 408; into those to be ordained, 649.

Instruction: Prenuptial instruction, II, 698.

Integrity: In confession: notion, II, 315; division, 316; necessity, 317; scope, 318-322; excusing causes, 325-328.

Intention: Notion, II, 14; in the reception of a sacrament, 39-41; in reception of the Holy Eucharist, 182; in reception of Order, 619.

Interdict: Notion, II, 874; division, 875; author, 876; interpretation, 877; effects of local interdict, 878; of personal interdict, 879; of an interdict issued because a community committed a delict, 880; cessation, 881; interdicts latae sententiae, 899.

Interpellation: In the Pauline privilege, II, 721, III.

Interpretation: Interpretation of ecclesiastical penal law, II, 853, IV.

Interpreter: Confession through an interpreter, II, 313.

Interrogation: Of a penitent by a confessor, II, 390-395.

Interruption: Of Mass, II, 271, 5.

Interstices: Between Orders, II, 617.

Irregularity: Notion, II, 620; origin, 621; interpretation, 622; multiplication, 623; irregularity from defect: of birth, 624; of body, 625; of mind, 626; of sacrament, 627; of reputation, 628; of lenity, 629; irregularity from delict, 630-637; cessation of irregularities and impediments, 644-647.

Iteration: Of a sacrament ministered doubtfully or doubtfully validly, II, 33; of Baptism, 104, 105; of confession, 332-334; of Extreme Unction, 586.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

J Jubilee: Notion, II, 551; division, 552; benefits of a jubilee: faculty of choosing a confessor, 554; special faculties of confessors, 555, 556; indulgence: prescribed works, 557, 558; relaxation of works, 559; suspension of indulgences and faculties on the occasion of a jubilee, 560.

Judge: whether it is lawful for a judge to pronounce divorce, II, 844.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

K Knowledge: Due knowledge in a confessor, II, 389; for Orders, 615; for matrimony, 698.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

L Lamp: Before the Most Holy Eucharist, II, 132, 4.

Lectorate: Notion and institution, II, 588; it is not a sacrament, 589; matter and form, 590.

Legal relationship: Notion, II, 760; As an impedient impediment of marriage, 760; As a diriment impediment of marriage, 802.

Legitimacy: II, 725.

Legitimate persons: II, 726; illegitimate, 727; legitimation, 728.

Legitimation: II, 728.

Letters: Dimissorial, required in ordination, II, 601, 602.

Lie: cf. concealment of the truth. A lie in confession, II, 323, 324.

Light: To be used in celebration of Mass, II, 253; to what extent electric or gas light is admitted in church, ibid..

Little bell: II, 263.

Little children: concerning reception of the sacraments, II, 42, 45; Baptism of infants, 91; of non-Catholic infants, 99, 100; of exposed infants, 104, corollary II.

Lunule: Of the monstrance, II, 132, 3.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

M Manifestation of an accomplice: It does not excuse from integrity of confession, II, 328.

Maniple: To be used in Mass, II, 266.

Manual: Manual stipends, II, 216; after the manner of manual stipends, ibid. Cf. stipend.

Marriage: Considered in general: notion of marriage in fieri, II, 700; in facto esse, 701; exposition of matrimonial consent, 702-709: consent should be true, 702; fully deliberate, 703; sufficiently free from ignorance, 704; sufficiently free from error, 705; sufficiently free from fear, 706; external, 707; intimated to the other party, 708; simultaneous, 709; marriage between absent persons, 709, corollary I; by proxy, 709, corollary II; Conditions: not repugnant to the substance, 710; repugnant to the substance, 711; opposite mode, 712; Division of marriage, 713; institution, 714; ends, 715; goods, 716; honesty and obligation, 717; governance, 718; Properties of marriage: unity, 719; indissolubility, 720; Pauline privilege, 721, cf. Pauline privilege; privilege of faith, 722; favor of law which belongs to marriage, 723; Effects of marriage, 724, cf. legitimate persons, illegitimate persons, legitimation; Marriage as sacrament: existence, 729; essence, 730; effects, 731; ministers, 732; celebration of marriage, 733-752, cf. celebration of marriage; reception, 753; Invalid marriage, 827; declaration of nullity of marriage, 828; convalidation of marriage, 829: simple convalidation, 830-833, cf. convalidation; sanation in the root, 833, cf. sanation in the root.

Marriage of conscience: II, 752.

Marriage of conscience: II, 752.

Marriage with an unworthy person: II, 769.

Masonic sect: excommunication established against its members, II, 896, II; things to be observed in absolution from excommunication, ibid..

Matrimonial publications: Notion, II, 683; existence of the law, 684; object of the law, 685-691; gravity of the law, 692; dispensation, 693; excusing cause, 694; what is to be done if doubt arises about the existence of an impediment, 695; matrimony of vagrants, 695, 6; obligation of the faithful who know of an impediment, 696; of the confessor, 697.

Matter: Matter of the sacraments, II, 3; the minister should duly unite matter and form, 22; substantial and accidental change of matter, 23. Cf. the individual sacraments; Matter of sacred vessels, 255 sq; of sacred vestments, 266; Matter of things to which indulgences are annexed, 536; of scapulars, 546.

Medical inspection: To what extent it can be prescribed by the State before marriage, II, 718, corollary IV.

Messenger: Confession made through a messenger to an absent confessor is invalid, II, 312.

Midwife: What is to be said about those baptized by a midwife, II, 104.

Military service: those enrolled for ordinary military service are impeded from receiving Order until they have completed it, II, 641.

Minister: Of the sacraments, II, 12; of sacramentals, 49. Cf. the individual sacraments, and also ministration of the sacraments; Minister serving one celebrating Mass, 269.

Ministration of the sacraments: Requisites for valid ministration, II, 13-24; requisites for licit ministration: that they be ministered legitimately, 25; holily, 26; duly, 27; worthily, 28; absolutely or conditionally according to the circumstances, 30; ministration of a doubtfully valid sacrament, 31, 32; repetition of a sacrament conferred doubtfully or doubtfully validly, 33; obligation of ministering the sacraments, 34-37. Cf. the individual sacraments.

Missal: To be used in Mass, II, 267.

Mixed religion: Impediment impeding matrimony: notion, II, 761; existence, 762; cessation of the impediment, 763; requisites without which a dispensation is not granted, 764; obligations of the parties, 765; of pastors of souls, 766; of the confessor, 767; assistance to be given at a mixed marriage, ibid.; obligations to be fulfilled after a mixed marriage, 768.

Mode: added to betrothals, II, 672; to matrimony, 712.

Monster: Baptism of monsters, II, 98.

Monstrance: II, 132, 3; 134, 1.

Mortal: what things remit mortal sins, II, 282.

Must: Whether it is valid matter for consecration, II, 143; whether it is licit, 144.

Mute person: Whether he is bound to use writing, if otherwise he cannot confess integrally, II, 326.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

N Nativity of the Lord: It is lawful to celebrate Mass three times, II, 237; and to receive a stipend for each, 217; Mass and Communion on the night of the Nativity, 249.

Natural fast: Before Communion: existence of the precept, II, 187; object of the precept, 188, 189; gravity of the precept, 190; causes on account of which the precept ceases: danger of death, 191, 1; prolonged illness, 191, 2; scandal to be avoided, 191, 3; infamy to be avoided, 191, 4; irreverence to be prevented, 191, 5; sacrifice to be completed, 191, 6; dispensation, 192; epikeia, 193.

New priest: Things to be observed in the Mass of ordination, II, 160.

Non-Catholics: baptism of the infants of non-Catholics, II, 99, 100; confession of non-Catholics, 478; anointing of non-Catholics, 584; children of non-Catholics are impeded from receiving orders, 638; to what extent non-Catholics are bound by the form of betrothal and marriage, 742; by the impediments of marriage, 757.

Number: Number of mortal sins to be declared in confession, II, 320.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

O Oath: Oath added to betrothals, II, 672.

Oblivion: One who has forgotten a mortal sin in confession is not bound to confess again before he communicates, II, 179; yet he is bound afterward to supply it, 321.

Obreption: in the petition of a matrimonial dispensation, II, 823.

Obstacle of grace: In the reception of the sacraments, II, 10.

Occasion: Notion, II, 455; division, 456; obligation of avoiding occasions, 457-461; absolution of occasionaries, 462-465, cf. concubinage, courtship, domestic dangers, dances, theatrical spectacles, bad writings, bad associations, bad schools.

Occult: Occult impediment of matrimony, II, 755.

Of desire: Baptism of desire, II, 63-67.

Oil: Sacred oils must be blessed by the Bishop, diligently kept, and not retained at home, II, 27; olive oil mixed with balsam, in other words chrism, is the matter of Confirmation, 112; olive oil is the matter of Extreme Unction, 566; the threefold oil is blessed by the Bishop on the Lord's Supper, 567, note 1.

Old person: how far he can be fortified with Extreme Unction, II, 582, corollary II.

One living in the same house: Ministration of Viaticum to housemates, II, 164; sacramental jurisdiction over them, 372.

Oratory: notion and division, II, 244, 2; in which oratories the Eucharist can be reserved, 131; in which oratories the Eucharist can be distributed, 167; in which oratories Mass can be celebrated, 246, 247.

Order: Notion, II, 588; institution, 588, IV; existence, 589; essence: of orders which are not sacraments, 590; of orders which are sacraments: diaconate, 591; presbyterate, 592; episcopate, 593; defects to be corrected, 594-596; effects, 597; Ministration of order: ordinary minister, 598; extraordinary minister, 599; liceity of ministering: generally, 600; ordination of seculars, 601; of religious, 602; of both seculars and religious, 603; Reception of order: person capable of order, 604; admission to orders, 605; manner of receiving: requisites for valid reception, 606; for licit reception: vocation, 609; state of grace, 610; intention of ascending to the Presbyterate, 611; Confirmation, 612; congruent morals, 613; canonical age, 614; due knowledge, 615; reception of inferior orders, 616; observance of interstices, 617; canonical title, 618; right intention, 619; immunity from irregularity and other impediments, 620-647; Things to be premised to ordination: petition of the one to be ordained, 648; inquiries, 649; testimonies to be brought, 650; examination, 651; denunciations, 652; spiritual exercises, 653; Rites and ceremonies, 654; time, 655; place, 656; notation and testimony of the completed ordination, 657; penal sanctions, 658; Diriment impediment of matrimony, 782; what is to be said about the Oriental Churches, 783.

Ordinary: II, 734.

Orientals: Masses can now be transmitted directly to Orientals, II, 225, note 2.

Ostiariate: Notion and institution, II, 588; it is not a sacrament, 589; matter and form, 590.

Ovaries: whether a woman who lacks ovaries is capable of matrimony, II, 774, 9.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

P Pall: II, 257.

Papal blessing: Notion, II, 527; grant of the blessing, 528; acquisition of the indulgence, 529; Papal blessing at the moment of death: notion, 530; grant of the indulgence, 531; acquisition of the indulgence, 532.

Parasceve: On the day of Parasceve Mass cannot be celebrated, II, 248.

Pastor: He enjoys ordinary jurisdiction, II, 364, but cannot delegate it, 365, corollary I; who come under the name of pastor, if there is discussion of the celebration of matrimony, 734.

Paten: II, 255.

Pauline privilege: II, 721.

Penalty: What things remit the penalty owed for sins, II, 285; Penalty added to betrothals, 672.

Penances: As quasi-penalties, II, 893.

Perinde valere: Letters Perinde valere, II, 824.

Permanence: Permanence of Christ under the species: truth of the permanence, II, 126; the mode by which He is made present, 127; the mode in which He is present, 128; the time for which He is present, 129.

Persons to be avoided: What and who avoided excommunicates are, II, 871; how far they can assist at divine offices, 872, I; what is to be done if they assist, ibid.; how far the faithful must avoid communion in profane matters with one to be avoided, 872, 9.

Pious foundations: Notion and nature, II, 233; acceptance of a foundation, 234; obligation of a foundation, 235; cessation or change of the obligation, 236.

Place: II, 244; their consecration and blessing, 245.

Plenary indulgence at the point of death: II, 561.

Polyandry: II, 719.

Polygamy: II, 719.

Pontificals: Suspension from pontificals, II, 886.

Portable: Privilege of a portable altar, II, 246, 4; notion, 250.

Portiuncula: II, 562.

Postulants: Confession of postulants, II, 374, IV; 375, III; 377.

Prayers: for gaining indulgences, II, 498.

Preparation: For Holy Communion, II, 181; for Mass, 243.

Presbyterate: Notion and institution, II, 588; it is a sacrament, 589; matter and form, 592.

Presence: Of Christ in the Eucharist, II, 126; the mode by which He is made present, 127; the mode in which He is present, 128; the time for which He is present, 129.

Priest: His obligation of celebrating from time to time by reason of the Order received, II, 210.

Privilege of faith: II, 722.

Privilege of forum: penalties of those violating the privilege, II, 896, V.

Privilege of the canon: penalties of those violating the privilege, II, 894, II; 895, X; 897, III.

Privileged altar: Notion, II, 508; division, 509; local privilege, 510; personal privilege, 511; conditions to be fulfilled, 512; circumstance of a privileged altar in offering Mass, 222.

Prohibition of the Church: The Church can prohibit certain marriages, II, 756.

Public: Public impediment of matrimony, II, 755.

Public honesty: Diriment impediment of matrimony, II, 799, 800.

Publishers: Which publishers contract excommunication, II, 895, III; 898.

Purificator: II, 258.

Purpose: Purpose in the Sacrament of Penance: notion, II, 301; division, 302; necessity, 303; whether an implicit purpose suffices, 304; properties: firm, efficacious, and universal with respect to mortal sins, 305; purpose with respect to venial sins, 306.

Pyx: Whether it is blessed, II, 132, 3; whether, if left outside the corporal, it is consecrated, 161.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

R Raptus (abduction): As an impediment of matrimony: raptus properly so called, II, 785; raptus less properly so called, ibid. - As a sin: notion, III, 44.

Real indulgences: Notion, II, 535; required matter, 536; annexing of indulgences, 537; acquisition of indulgences, 538; cessation of indulgences, 539.

Reception of the sacraments: Person receiving, II, 38; mode of receiving, 38; requisites for valid reception, 39-41; requisites for licit reception, 42-44; before matrimony, 699.

Reduction: reduction of burdens annexed to pious foundations, II, 236.

Regular prelate: he has ordinary jurisdiction in the sacramental forum, II, 372; and can delegate it, ibid..

Relapser: Habituated non-relapser: notion, II, 450; absolution, 451; Habituated relapser: notion, 450; absolution, 452-454.

Religion: Diriment impediment of matrimony, II, 784.

Religious person: Jurisdiction over exempt religious, II, 372; over religious women, 373; Ordination of religious, 602, 603; An apostate from religion is punished, 897, V; likewise a fugitive religious, 900, V.

Remedies: Penal remedies, II, 892.

Remission of penalty: Act of remission, II, 861, I; power of remitting, 861, II; mode of remitting, 861, III.

Reordination: Correcting defects of ordinations, II, 594-596.

Repetition: Of confessions, II, 332-334.

Rescripts: For a matrimonial dispensation, II, 825.

Reservation of sins: Notion, II, 379; purpose, 380; division, 381; power of reserving, 382; use of the power, 383; requisites in order that a sin be reserved, 384; cessation of the reservation of a sin, 386; absolution from a reserved sin, 387.

Reservation of the Most Holy Eucharist: Licitness, 130; places, 131; manner, 132.

Residence: Monthly residence for marriage, II, 736; actual residence, ibid..

Revival: Of sacraments, II, 11; of merits, 286.

Rite: Rite in the administration of the sacraments: obligation of observing the rite, II, 27; each one should follow his own rite, ibid.; in what rite offspring are to be baptized, 79; if an altar of one's own rite is lacking, it is permitted to celebrate on an altar of another Catholic rite, but not on the antimensions of the Greeks, 250.

Roman Ritual: Its obligation, II, 27.

Rosary / chaplet: Diverse chaplets, II, 540; annexing of indulgences, 541; acquisition of indulgences, 542; cessation of indulgences, 543.

Rubrics: They must be observed in the administration of the sacraments, II, 27; in Mass: object of the precept, 270; gravity of the precept, 271; excusing cause, 272.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

S Sabbatine privilege: II, 548.

Sacrament: Notion, II, 1; reception, 38-45. Cf. the individual sacraments.

Sacrament of Penance: Notion, II, 288; existence, 289; summary exposition: remote matter, 290; proximate matter, 291; form, 292; fuller exposition: remote matter: object, 293; division, 294; whether moral defects can be matter, 294, corollary II; proximate matter: contrition, 295-306, cf. contrition, purpose; confession, 307-339, cf. confession; form, 340-344, cf. absolution from sins; satisfaction, 345-356, cf. satisfaction; effect, 357; necessity: of means, 358; of divine precept, 359; necessary before the confection of the Eucharist and Communion for one who has sinned gravely, 179, 242, 359. Cf. repetition of confessions; Ministration of the Sacrament of Penance: generally: minister, 360; place of ministering the sacrament, 444; vesture prescribed in ministration, 445; ministration to certain persons in particular: confession of boys, 446; confession of the rude and dull, 447; confession of the half-witted, 448; confession of habituated persons, 449-454; confession of occasionaries, 455-474; confession of dying persons, 475, 476; confession of the apparently dead, 477; confession of baptized non-Catholics, 478; Reception of the Sacrament of Penance: requisites in order that someone be capable of receiving the sacrament, 479, I; that he receive it validly, 479, II; that he receive it fruitfully, 479, III; that he receive it licitly, 479, IV.

Sacramental jurisdiction: Notion, II, 361; necessity, 362; division, 363; ordinary, 364; delegated: persons delegating, 365; manner of delegating, 366; cessation of delegation, 367; jurisdiction over soldiers, 368; over those sailing, 369; over the dying, 370; over pilgrims and vagabonds, 371; over exempt religious, 372; over religious women, 373; supplied jurisdiction, 388.

Sacramental seal: Notion, II, 428; existence of the obligation, 429; proximate source of the obligation, 430; quality of the obligation, 431; gravity of the obligation, 432; cessation of the obligation, 433; one who knows something by sacramental and extra-sacramental knowledge lawfully uses the extra-sacramental knowledge, 434; what if you are asked about a matter closed by the seal, ibid.; object of the seal, 435; subject of the seal, 436; corollaries, 437-439; penalties established against transgressors, 440, 894.

Sacramentals: Notion, II, 46; institution, 47; effects, 48; ministration or use, 49; how far they remit venial sins, 284, 5.

Sacred: II, 244, 245.

Sacred linens: Touching and washing, II, 265.

Sacred order: Diriment impediment of matrimony, II, 782; what is to be said about the Oriental Churches, 783.

Sacred place: II, 244; consecration and blessing, 245. Cf. local sacrilege.

Sacred stone: II, 250.

Sacred vessels: which are prescribed in Mass, II, 255; touch of sacred vessels, 265.

Sacrifice: notion, II, 194; division, 195; sacrifices of the Old Testament, 196; sacrifice of Christ on the Cross, 197.

Sacrifice of the Mass: Notion, II, 199; existence, 200; essence, 201; character, 202; agreement with the sacrifice of the Cross and difference from it, 203; efficacy, 204; effects, 205; mode of producing them, 206; measure according to which they come to those for whom it is celebrated, 207; Offering of Mass: the person offering, 209; obligation of offering by reason of order received, 210; by reason of office, 211-213; by reason of precept or promise, 214; things to be observed in the offering of Mass: disposition of the one offering, namely natural fast, 241; state of grace, 242, which, if it has been lost, must be recovered through confession, ibid.; preparation and thanksgiving, 243; place of offering, 246, 247; time of offering, 248, 249; rite of offering, 250-273; defects committed in the offering to be corrected, 274.

Sanation in the root: II, 833.

Satisfaction: Notion, II, 345; efficacy, 346; power of imposing satisfaction, 347; how much is to be imposed, 348; of what kind it is to be, 349; causes excusing from imposing satisfaction due of itself, 350; time for fulfilling satisfaction, 351; commutation of satisfaction, 352-354; obligation of accepting satisfaction: the person obligated, 356, 1; gravity of the obligation, 356, 2; time for fulfilling it, 356, 3; mode of fulfilling it, 356, 4; cessation of the obligation, 356, 5; what if the confessor omitted imposing satisfaction, ibid..

Scapular: Notion, II, 544; different scapulars, 545; conditions in order that one may enjoy the privilege of scapulars, 546; metal medals to be substituted for scapulars, 547; Sabbatine privilege, 548.

Schismatics: Penalties against schismatics, II, 895; absolution from penalties, II, 895. Cf. heretics.

Scrutiny: Before Orders, II, 649.

Sea: Celebration of Mass at sea, II, 246; jurisdiction over those sailing, 369.

Second marriages: Chaste widowhood is to be preferred to second marriages, II, 717; how far second marriages can be blessed, 744.

Seducer: Inquiry into the name of the seducer, II, 408.

Service: Dangers of service, II, 469.

Ship: Mass at sea, II, 246.

Sickness: What kind is required for the ministration of Extreme Unction, II, 581.

Sign: Ordinary signs of disposition, II, 399, 451; extraordinary, 400.

Simony: II, 900.

Simple vow: Which simple vows impede marriage, II, 759; what if someone has contracted marriage with such an impediment, ibid..

Simulation of a sacrament: Notion, II, 17.

Sincerity: What if the confessor doubts the sincerity of the penitent, II, 407, question.

Sinner: Who is a public sinner, II, 28; the sacraments are to be denied to a public sinner, ibid.; to what extent they must be denied to an occult sinner, ibid..

Sins to be confessed: Mortal sins committed after Baptism and not yet directly remitted must be confessed, II, 319; what in doubt, 319; species, 320, 1; number, 320, 2; whether circumstances, 320, 3; external act, 320, 4; effect, 320, 5; questions, ibid.; to what one is bound who has not confessed integrally, 321; one who afterward holds as certainly committed a sin confessed as doubtful, ibid.; one who omitted a circumstance to be declared, ibid.; one who doubts whether he has confessed a grave sin, 322; excusing causes, 325-328.

Skullcap: Its use in carrying the Most Holy Eucharist to the sick, II, 170; in the offering of Mass, 266.

Slave: He is impeded from receiving Order, II, 641.

Sodomy: Cause of separation of spouses, II, 840.

Soldiers: Jurisdiction over soldiers, II, 368. Cf. military service.

Solicitation: Documents pertaining to this, 416.

Somewhat deaf person: His confession, II, 326.

Spiritual relationship: Notion, II, 801; diriment impediment of marriage, ibid..

Sponsors: Sponsors of Baptism: notion, II, 82; obligation, 83; requisites, 84; selection, 85; effect of sponsorship, 86; Sponsor of Confirmation, 121, 5.

Spoon: It can be used in Mass, II, 261.

Spurious: Who is such, II, 727.

State of fortune: How far it must be expressed in a petition for a matrimonial dispensation, II, 820.

State of grace: In the ministration of the sacraments and of other sacred functions, II, 26; in reception of the sacraments, 43; in Confirmation, 125; in Communion, 179; in offering Mass, 242.

Sterility: Notion, II, 771; it neither dirimently impedes nor simply impedes matrimony, 773.

Stipend: Notion and origin, II, 215; division, 216; lawfulness, 217; just stipend, 218; acceptance of stipends, 219; obligation arising from an accepted stipend: celebration and application of Mass, 221;

due circumstances, 222; due time, 223; cessation of the obligation, 224; distribution and transmission of Masses, 225, 226; of stipends, 227, 228; abuses to be avoided, 229; cautions of the law: supervision, 230; annotation of Masses, 231; penalties, 232. Cf. pious foundations.

Stole: To be used in Mass, II, 266.

Stomach: Whether washing of the stomach before Communion stands in the way of the natural fast, II, 188, 4.

Studies of clerics: II, 615.

Style of the Curia: II, 815.

Subdiaconate: Notion and institution, II, 588; it does not seem to be a sacrament, 589; matter and form, 591.

Subreption: in seeking a matrimonial dispensation, II, 823.

Superiors: they have ordinary jurisdiction in the sacramental forum, II, 372; and can delegate it, ibid..

Supplying of jurisdiction: when it is lawful to use supplied jurisdiction, . Cf. II, 388.

Suspected of heresy: Who they are, II, 895, II; penalties, II, 895, II.

Suspension: Notion, II, 884; division, 885; effects, 886; violation of it, 887; suspension from informed conscience, 888; suspensions which are censures or medicinal penalties, 900; suspensions which are vindicative penalties, 901.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

T Tabernacle: II, 132.

Telephone: Absolution given by telephone, II, 343, corollary II.

Testimonials: by ordinands, II, 650.

Thanksgiving: After Holy Communion, II, 181; after Mass, 243.

The blind: They are irregular, II, 625.

The delirious: To what extent they can receive the Holy Eucharist, II, 174.

The insane: as to reception of the sacraments, II, 42, 45; communion, 174.

Theatrical spectacles: how far they are an occasion of sinning, II, 471.

Those destitute of senses: To what extent they can be absolved, II, 475, 476.

Those sailing: Jurisdiction over those sailing, II, 369.

Those to be ordained: Requisites in those to be ordained, II, 608-647, cf. order.

Those under puberty: they are excused from latae sententiae penalties, II, 858.

Those with impaired sight: To what extent they are irregular, II, 625; indult of always celebrating a votive Mass of the Blessed Virgin Mary or a daily Mass of the dead, 625, II, note 2.

Title: Canonical title for Orders, II, 618.

To rebaptize: When it is lawful, II, 33.

Tobacco: Use before Communion, II, 189.

Tolerated persons: What tolerated excommunicates are, II, 871; how far they can assist at divine offices, 872, 1; what is to be done if they assist, ibid..

Toties-quoties: Toties-quoties indulgences, II, 562.

Toties-quoties indulgence: II, 562.

Touch: Of sacred vessels and sacred linens, II, 265.

Transubstantiation: Notion, II, 127.

Truth: Injury to truth in confession, II, 323, 324.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

U Unbelievers: Baptism of the children of unbelievers, II, 99; whether it is lawful to offer Mass for unbelievers, 208.

Unction: In Confirmation, II, 113; in Extreme Unction, 568-570.

Uninstructed persons: Confession of the uninstructed, II, 447.

Union: Of matter and form in the sacraments, II, 22.

Unity of marriage: II, 719.

Usurpation: Usurpation of Orders not received is punished, II, 895, IV; likewise usurpation of ecclesiastical goods, 895, XI; 896, VII.

Uterus: Whether a woman who lacks a uterus is capable of marriage, II, 774, 9.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

V Vagabond: likewise by personal prescriptions, - Marriage of vagabonds, II, 695, 6; How far he is liable to penalties, 857.

Vagina: A woman who lacks a vagina or has it closed at the entrance is incapable of marriage, II, 774, 6; what of a woman who has the vagina closed near the uterus, ibid.; or narrow, 774, 7.

Vaginismus: A woman who labors under vaginismus is incapable of marriage, II, 774, 8.

Vasectomy: whether one who has undergone vasectomy is impotent for entering marriage, II, 774, 5.

Venial: What things remit venials and how, II, 284.

Vexation: Cause for separation of spouses, II, 841.

Viaticum: Notion, II, 164, 3; obligation, 158; to whom the dispensation of Viaticum is reserved, 164, 3; time, 166; place, 168; boys, 173; insane persons, 174; those who can receive Communion only artificially, 178; in doubt whether a dying person can swallow the species, 178, note; it can be received by one not fasting, 191.

Vindicative penalty: Notion, II, 889; division, ibid.; cessation, ibid.; common vindicative penalties, 890; vindicative penalties peculiar to clerics, 891; suspensions which are vindicative penalties, 901.

Violation: Of a church, II, 247, 2; of excommunication, 873; of interdict, 882; of suspension, 887.

Vocation: To Orders, II, 609.

Votive: How far the circumstance of a votive Mass must be observed, II, 222.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

W Washing: Of the stomach before Communion, II, 188, 4; of sacred linens, 265; of hands before and after Mass, 270; of the place into which a host fell, 274.

Water: Remote matter of baptism, II, 52, 53; to be mixed with the wine of Mass, 144.

Way of the Cross: Notion, II, 514; power of erecting it, 515; places suitable for erection, 516; documents required, 517; matter of erection, 518; form of erection, 519; invalidation of erection, 520; convalidation of erection, 521; indulgences annexed, 522; acquisition of indulgences, 523.

Wine: Matter of the Most Holy Eucharist, II, 143; what is required for validity, ibid.; for liceity, 144.

Worship: Of the Holy Eucharist, II, 133, 134.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).