956 III. Morality. Stock-exchange games, as is clear, are not illicit per se. Per accidens they are often to be dissuaded from or even prohibited, namely because of the danger of harming the family or creditors, or of spreading false reports so that prices may be increased or diminished, etc.

As regards the price of shares and bonds, cf. n. 904.

Point VI. On Settlement and Arbitration

957 To aleatory contracts can in some way be reduced settlement and arbitration.

I. Settlement is a contract by which parties end a lawsuit that has arisen, or forestall one that is imminent, by cession, promise, or retention of some thing. Its form is determined by civil law.

958 II. Arbitration is a contract by which parties agree that a lawsuit that has arisen or is imminent be ended through arbitrators. Its form is to be considered in civil law.

§ XIII. On Subsidiary Contracts

Subsidiary contracts are called contracts which are entered into to strengthen another principal contract; with it, if it falls, they fall. The principal ones are suretyship, pledge, and hypothec.

Point I. On Suretyship

959 I. Notion. Suretyship is a contract by which someone, the surety, binds himself to fulfilling another's obligation if the principal debtor does not satisfy him.

960 II. Form. The form of the contract is to be drawn from civil law.

961 III. Subject. Those who can dispose of their goods and are not excluded by positive law can validly and licitly act as sureties. As regards clerics, canon 137 establishes: "A cleric is prohibited from acting as surety, even concerning his own goods, without consulting the local Ordinary"; by this precept, with attention paid to canon 592, religious also are bound.

962 IV. Obligations of the surety. The surety is bound to pay in default of the debtor; nevertheless regularly he cannot be sued for payment unless, after the principal debtor has been exhausted, it is clear that the latter is unable to pay. For the rest, the obligation of the surety, as being real, passes to heirs.

963 V. Rights of the surety. The surety, once payment has been made, acquires the rights of the creditor, and therefore has recourse against the debtor for whom he paid, and from him can recover both the principal sum and, if the debtor culpably did not pay, restitution of expenses and damages, if any have followed (St. Alphonsus, III, 912). Thus with attention paid to natural law; what civil law adds, see in the code of one's country.

Point II. On Pledge

964 I. Notion. Pledge is a contract by which a debtor delivers a movable thing[1] to the creditor as security of his debt. The creditor is called the pledge-holder, and the thing itself handed over is also called the pledge (St. Alphonsus, III, 913).

[1] If a pledge is constituted on an immovable thing, it is called antichresis.

965 II. Form. The form of the contract is to be drawn from civil law.

966 III. Rights of the pledge-holder, or creditor. The pledge-holder can retain the pledge until the debtor has paid; and if he is unequal to paying all debts, he has the right that payment be made to him from the thing pledged before the other creditors, according to what is to be said in n. 1012. But he is bound to keep the thing pledged safe and sound.

967 IV. Obligations of the debtor. The debtor is bound to compensate the pledge-holder for expenses necessary for the preservation of the thing, and likewise useful expenses made with the debtor's consent.

Note. To this belong contracts by which a certain sum of money is lent to one who, for example, has given merchandise or public bonds in pledge.

Point III. On Hypothec

968 I. Notion. Hypothec is a real right by which another's immovable thing is obligated to the creditor as security of a debt. The right of hypothec commonly arises from contract.

969 II. Division. Hypothec is distinguished as conventional, judicial, and legal, according as the right of hypothec arises from contract, from a decree of a judge, or from law.

970 III. Form. The form is established by law.

971 IV. Rights of the hypothecary creditor. The creditor has the debtor's thing obligated to himself until the latter has paid; and if the latter is unequal to paying debts, he has the right that payment be made to him from the thing obligated before the other creditors, according to what is to be said in n. 1012.

972 V. Obligation of the debtor. "It is not permitted to give the same thing in hypothec to several persons, unless it is sufficient for paying all, or the later ones are warned about the prior hypothec" (St. Alphonsus, III, 915).

[1] Cf. Oswald von Nell-Breuning, Grundzüge der Börsenmoral.

Scholion. On the Alienation of Ecclesiastical Things

973 I. The matter about which the law is concerned. The Church has subjected to special rules the alienation of ecclesiastical immovable or movable things which can be preserved by being preserved, or kept in their substance (can. 1530). It is said:

1. Alienation. Under the name of alienation here are included both alienation properly so called and every contract by which the condition of the Church can become worse (can. 1533). Alienation properly so called includes: donation, exchange, sale, the cession of a right, for example of a credit, lawsuit, or action already acquired. To the contracts by which the condition of the Church can become worse are referred: hypothec, pledge, usufruct, emphyteusis, servitude. Likewise, under the old law, a long-term lease; but now leasing seems exempt from the rules of alienation, since by canon 1541 it is subjected to distinct rules.

The norms soon to be set forth also bind that alienation which takes place between two ecclesiastical moral persons.

2. Of ecclesiastical things; under this name come things which belong to an ecclesiastical moral person (n. 786).

3. Which can be preserved by being preserved, or which are not consumed by first use. Things are not touched by these rules which must be consumed or alienated lest they perish, or which have no use unless they are alienated: thus money. Hence the rules to be assigned do not govern, for example, the payment of a debt by means of money, the first investment of money, money given as a loan; nor, as it seems, the exchange of securities into others. "And if money destined for the building of a church is meanwhile profitably invested, it will not be thought to be an alienation, nor will the simple sale of those securities, so that the money obtained may be able to serve for the building."[1]

[1] Vermeersch, loc. cit., n. 852.

974 II. The statutes of the law. 1. In order that alienation may take place, with due regard for the prescription of canon 1281, § 1, these are required:[1] 1° an appraisal of the thing, made in writing by upright experts; 2° a just cause, that is, urgent necessity, or evident utility of the Church, or piety; 3° the permission of the legitimate Superior, without which the alienation is invalid. - Other suitable precautions also, to be prescribed by that same Superior according to diverse circumstances, are not to be omitted, so that damage to the Church may be avoided (can. 1530).

2. The thing must not be alienated for a lower price than that which is indicated in the appraisal. - Let the alienation take place by public bidding, or at least let it be made known, unless circumstances suggest something else; and let the thing be granted to him who, all things considered, has offered more. - Let the money received from alienation be invested cautiously, safely, and usefully for the advantage of the Church (can. 1531).

3. The legitimate Superior, of whom under 1, is:

a) If there is question of things which do not exceed the value of one thousand lire or francs, the Ordinary of the place, after the administrative Council has been heard, unless the matter is of very slight importance, and with the consent of those whose interest is involved (can. 1532, § 2).

b) If there is question of things whose price is contained between one thousand lire and thirty thousand lire or francs, the Ordinary of the place, provided the consent has been added both of the Cathedral Chapter, of the administrative Council, and of those whose interest is involved (can. 1532, § 3).

c) If there is question either of things which exceed the value of thirty thousand lire or francs, or of precious things,[2] the Apostolic See is the legitimate Superior (can. 1532, § 1).[3] But the permission of the Holy See is also required "for alienating in the manner of one thing ecclesiastical things of the same person which, taken together, exceed the value of thirty thousand lire or francs."[4] If, however, the experts lawfully appraised the price below 30,000 lire, and, after bidding has been announced or on another occasion, a higher price is offered, the consent of the Apostolic See is not required for carrying out the alienation.[5]

d) If there is question of alienating a divisible thing, in seeking permission or consent for the alienation, the parts previously alienated must be expressed; otherwise the permission is void (can. 1532, § 4).

4. The Church has a personal action against him who has alienated ecclesiastical goods without the due solemnities, and against his heirs; but a real action, if the alienation was null, against any possessor whatever, saving the right of the buyer against the one alienating badly. - Against an invalid alienation of ecclesiastical things there can act the one who alienated the thing, his Superior, the successor of each in office, and finally any cleric enrolled in that church which has suffered damage (can. 1534).

5. With the nullity of the act and the obligation remaining firm, even to be urged by censure, of restoring goods illegitimately acquired and of repairing damages perhaps inflicted, one who has presumed to alienate ecclesiastical goods, or to give consent in alienating them against the prescriptions of can. 534, § 1, and can. 1532, according to can. 2347:

a) If there is question of a thing whose price does not exceed one thousand lire, let him be punished with suitable penalties by the legitimate ecclesiastical Superior.

b) If there is question of a thing whose price is above one thousand, but below thirty thousand lire, let a patron be deprived of the right of patronage; an administrator, of the office of administrator; a religious Superior or economus, of his proper office and of capability for other offices, besides other suitable penalties to be inflicted by Superiors; but let an Ordinary and other clerics who hold an office, benefice, dignity, or function in the Church pay double in favor of the church or pious cause harmed; let other clerics be suspended for a time to be defined by the Ordinary.

c) But if the apostolic beneplacitum prescribed in the mentioned canons has knowingly been omitted, all guilty persons in any way, whether by giving, by receiving, or by giving consent, are moreover subject to excommunication latae sententiae reserved to no one.

Note. As regards religious, see the treatise on the duties of religious.

[1] Canon 1281 states: notable relics or precious images, and likewise other relics or images which are honored with great veneration by the people in any church, cannot validly be alienated nor perpetually transferred into another church without the permission of the Apostolic See (§ 1). Notable relics of Saints or Blessed are the body, head, arm, forearm, heart, tongue, hand, leg, or that part of the body in which a martyr suffered, provided it is whole and not small (§ 2).

[2] Precious things are those "which have notable value by reason of art or history or material" (can. 1497, § 2). The Sacred Congregation of the Council, February 14, 1922, in response I, declared that for the alienation of things precious in any way the beneplacitum of the Holy See is required (cf. A.A.S. 1922, p. 160).

[3] The Apostolic See is understood as the Sacred Congregation of the Council, for seculars; the Sacred Congregation of Religious, for religious institutes and Third Orders; the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, for regions subject to it, or also for religious institutes and associations which are placed under its full jurisdiction; the Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Church, if the goods belong to moral persons of that rite, insofar as they are bound by these laws; the Sacred Consistorial Congregation, if the goods are of dioceses; the Sacred Congregation of Seminaries and Universities of Studies, if the goods belong to a Seminary.

[4] P.C., July 20, 1929 (A.A.S. 1929, p. 574).

[5] P.C., November 24, 1920 (A.A.S. 1920, p. 573 sq.).

Section II. On Injustice and on Restitution

975 The word injustice can be taken for a violation of commutative, distributive, or legal justice. Injustice taken thus generally is defined: the violation of another's right. Nevertheless injustice is especially understood of a violation of commutative justice. Of this alone we shall speak here, adding those things which regard the reparation of the said violation, that is, restitution. We shall speak first about injustice in common; then about restitution in common; then about injustice and restitution in particular cases.

Chapter I. On Injustice in Common

976 I. Notion. Injustice, also called injury, is the violation of another's strict right. From this very definition it must be deduced in what sense Rule 27 of law in the Sext is to be understood: No injury is done to one who knows and consents, namely:

1. If someone freely consents, and there is question of a right which he can validly renounce, injury is absent.
2. If someone freely consents, and there is question of a right which he cannot validly renounce - suppose if someone consents to his own killing, or a husband consents to intercourse being had with his wife - it is disputed whether injustice is committed with respect to the one consenting.

But now, against many, it seems that this must be affirmed; since, while the right persists, the violation of the right, or injustice, persists. But in the hypothesis posited the right persists, because the renunciation is invalid. There is added proposition 50 condemned by Innocent XI: "Intercourse with a married woman, with the husband consenting, is not adultery; and therefore it suffices in confession to say that one has fornicated;"[1] this is explained with difficulty by the adversaries. They do indeed speak of an injury inflicted on the marital state, etc.; but the marital state is not a moral person which enjoys strict rights.

Objection. In order that injustice cease, it suffices that someone not oppose his own right.

Response. I deny the assertion, in the case in which the right persists, even if someone does not oppose his own right. But in our hypothesis the right persists, whether someone opposes his own right or does not oppose it.

Still, it must be said otherwise concerning rights which the one consenting can validly renounce, and which would be violated together with the right which he cannot renounce. Thus, for example, one who, with the husband consenting, committed adultery is not bound to restore to the husband damages that would follow from the adultery.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1200.

977 II. Division. Injustice is divided:

1. Into formal and material, according as another's right is violated with or without theological fault.
2. Into personal and real, according as someone is harmed in goods of the soul or body, or in external goods.

978 III. Morality. Injustice is a grave sin by its kind, that is, grave or light according as it regards grave or light matter. Injustice which regards grave matter is a grave sin, because it is simply or gravely opposed to the good of one's neighbor and of society, and therefore to charity (cf. St. Thomas, II-II, q. 59, a. 4; q. 66, a. 6; St. Alphonsus, III, 700). Furthermore:

1. The gravity of the matter must be drawn both from damage that is relatively grave, or which is grave when the condition of him to whom it is inflicted has been considered, and from the relation which exists between the one causing damage and the one damaged, so that if, for example, there is question of a son of a family, a graver matter is required for mortal sin than if there is question of another.
2. A sign of grave matter is present when the damage inflicted, with attention paid to the common disposition of men, is apt to move great sorrow or indignation.
3. In doubt whether the thing or quantity to be taken away or consumed by you is grave, you are bound under grave obligation to abstain, because, once another's certain right to some thing or to a certain quantity has been posited, it is gravely illicit for you to expose yourself to the danger of inflicting grave damage on someone.

Chapter II. On Restitution in Common

Article I. Notion, Obligation, and Titles of Restitution

979 I. Notion of restitution. Restitution is the reparation of another's violated strict right, or it is an act of commutative justice by which someone returns another's thing or compensates damage unjustly inflicted by himself.

Restitution differs: 1° from satisfaction, which consists in the reparation of an offense inflicted on someone; 2° from payment, which neither returns another's thing nor supposes damage unjustly inflicted.

980 II. Obligation of restitution. 1. The obligation is clear both from Sacred Scripture[1] and from the reason brought forward in n. 978.

2. The obligation of restitution is grave by its kind, that is, grave or light according as the matter to be restored is grave or light; for the said obligation corresponds to the obligation of not committing injustice; and that obligation is grave by its kind (n. 978). Nevertheless, the gravity of the obligation ceases if so much has been restored that the remaining matter ceases to be grave (St. Alphonsus, III, 553).
3. In doubt whether the thing or quantity taken away by you, destroyed, or consumed, is grave, you are bound under grave obligation to restore, because, once another's certain right to a thing or to a quantity has been posited, it is gravely illicit for you to expose yourself to the danger of continuing grave damage. But in doubt whether you took, destroyed, or consumed more or less, for example whether you stole 20 or 10 florins, you are bound only to restoring the lesser amount, because the fact founding the obligation of restoring more is doubtful (n. 228; St. Alphonsus, III, 706).

4. It is disputed whether one who has harmed someone in a kind of goods in which he cannot restore must compensate the injury with money, for instance if someone has mutilated or defamed another.

Response. St. Thomas (II-II, q. 62, a. 2, ad 1 and 2) seems to affirm, because where an equivalent cannot be restored, there must be made the compensation which is possible. Thus also Cajetan.[2] St. Alphonsus, however, with others, deservedly holds the contrary as sufficiently probable. For "commutative justice obliges one to restore according to the equality of the damage inflicted. But where restitution is to be made in a different kind, there is no equality present, nor will there ever be any compensation of the damage; for by any money whatever the damage will by no means be repaired, either in whole or in part. And thus response is made to the opposite opinion" (St. Alphonsus, III, 627). There is added that a strict right must regard something determinate. But it cannot be determined what in a diverse order would have to be restored.

Corollary. In this case the injured person generally cannot provide for himself by occult compensation, because the debt is only probable; cf. however n. 1074. But where the injured person has received compensation in another kind from the one harming him, he can retain it, nor can the one who harmed now recover it by occult compensation (n. 1033).

[1] Cf. Exod. 22:5; Tob. 2:21; Ezek. 33:15; Rom. 13:7; Jas. 5:4.

[2] Summa, word Restitutio, cap. 2.

981 III. Titles of restitution, that is, the reasons or roots from which the obligation of restitution arises, are: 1° another's thing materially unjustly possessed; 2° another's thing formally unjustly accepted; 3° mere damaging, which takes place when someone merely injures the good of another, or unjustly impedes him from acquiring a good. A contract, whether not observed or violated, is referred according to the circumstances to one of the assigned titles (St. Alphonsus, III, 548).

Article II. The Subject and Object of Restitution

As is deduced from what has been said in n. 981, those are bound to restitution: 1° who unjustly possess another's thing, or at least unjustly accepted and possessed it; 2° who merely inflict damage on another by violating his rights; 3° who unjustly impede another from acquiring a good. There are added those who cooperate in another's injustice. We shall treat of each, at the same time explaining the things to be restored by them, or the object of restitution.

§ I. On Unjust Possessors

982 Preliminary note I. Another's thing can be possessed in two ways, in itself and in equivalent. It is said to be possessed in equivalent when someone no longer possesses it, but nevertheless from it as such has become richer, or has more than he would have had if he had not possessed another's thing. This happens when someone: 1° sold another's thing received gratuitously; 2° by consuming or donating another's thing, received gratuitously, spared his own things; 3° sold at a profit another's thing which he had bought. He is not numbered among these who has received fruits from another's thing, because he has become richer not from the thing as such, but from its fruits.

Preliminary note II. The possessor of another's thing is distinguished in three ways, namely, as a possessor in good, doubtful, and bad faith (n. 776). But the obligation of restitution arising from the possession of another's thing can regard: 1° the thing itself; 2° the fruits of the thing; 3° damages following for the owner from the fact that his thing was possessed by another; 4° expenses made by the possessor concerning another's thing.

With these things noted in general beforehand, we shall speak singly about the different possessors.

[1] Cf. Vermeersch, Epitome, t. II, n. 851 sq.; Raus, Institutiones canonicae, n. 361 sq.

[2] Cf. Bonartz, Die Restitutionspflicht des Besitzes fremden Gutes; Kutsekker, Die Lehre vom Schadenersatze; Hohenlohe, Gründe der Schadenersatzpflicht in Recht und Moral.

Point I. On the Possessor in Good Faith

983 The possessor in good faith is bound as follows:

I. As regards the thing. 1. He who possesses another's thing[1] in itself is generally bound to return it as soon as possible to the owner, and indeed gratis. The thing, as the adage has it, cries out for its owner. I said generally; for one who bought a thing from another, for instance from a thief, can sufficiently probably return it even to the thief in order to recover the price, unless the owner, appearing, now claims his own thing for himself. The reason is that the buyer is not the cause but only the occasion of the damage that will follow for the owner; the cause of the damage is the bad will of the thief, while the buyer permits the damage. But avoiding the buyer's own damage, in this case recovering the price, is a just cause for permitting another's damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 569). If, however, the possessor can recover the price by another likewise easy way, he is bound to return the thing to the owner, since the cause for handing it over to the thief is lacking (St. Alphonsus, III, 569).

If the owner, appearing, claims his own thing for himself, the possessor can demand back from the seller the price paid by him. For the rest, let it also be seen what perhaps the law of the country establishes, for example concerning another's thing bought in public markets or in a public auction.

2. He who no longer possesses another's thing in itself, but in equivalent, is bound thus:

a) He who sold another's thing received gratuitously is bound to restore the price to the buyer, but the latter is bound to return the thing to the owner. But if the buyer refuses to return the thing, or it is foreseen that he will not return it, let the seller return the price to the owner of the thing insofar as it does not correspond to mere industry, and thus, insofar as can now be done, repair the equality violated also by himself, although without fault (St. Alphonsus, III, 609).

b) He who donated another's thing received gratuitously, and thus spared his own goods, is bound to warn the donee, who should restore the thing to the owner. But if he refuses to restore it, the donor is bound to restitution with respect to the owner; for he cannot become richer, to the owner's damage, from disposing of another's thing.

c) He who consumed another's thing received gratuitously, and thus spared his own goods, is likewise bound to restitution with respect to the owner, because, as was just said, he cannot become richer, to the owner's damage, from disposing of another's thing.

Both the donor, of whom under b), and the one who consumed another's thing, of whom under c), are bound to restore according to the value of his own thing preserved, if this is worth less than the other thing donated or consumed; but according to the value of the other thing donated or consumed, if his own thing preserved is worth more than the other thing donated or consumed. The reason for the former is that they are not bound to restore beyond what they spared of their own goods. The reason for the latter is that they are not bound to restore beyond the damage which the owner suffered.

d) He who sold at a profit another's thing which he had bought is bound per se to return the price to the buyer, while the latter must restore the thing to the owner (St. Alphonsus, III, 800). But if the buyer refuses to restore the thing to the owner, let the seller give to the owner the profit insofar as it does not correspond to industry (St. Alphonsus, III, 601; 609, 6; 825, compared with 609, 8 and 610). Of him who sold another's thing which he had bought without profit, there is no discussion here, because he has not been made richer from another's thing.

3. He who no longer possesses another's thing either in itself or in equivalent is not bound, as far as the thing is concerned, to restitution; for he is an inculpable damager (n. 995). The same must be said of him who doubts whether he in some way possesses another's thing (St. Alphonsus, III, 706).

[1] Note, a thing legitimately prescribed is no longer another's.

984 II. As regards the fruits of the thing, the possessor in good faith:

1. With attention paid to the law of nature, is bound to restore natural, civil, and mixed fruits, while nevertheless retaining the price of the labor furnished for producing them; he can retain merely industrial fruits. The reason is that the former arise from the thing itself, the latter from the labor of the possessor (St. Alphonsus, III, 607, 610).

2. As regards civil law, which commonly has force in conscience, see the Code of the country.

985 III. As regards expenses made, the possessor in good faith can deduct:

1. With attention paid to the law of nature: 1° necessary expenses, or those without which the thing would have perished or become worse; 2° useful expenses, or those by which the thing was improved; 3° voluptuary expenses, that is, those which serve only ornament or pleasure, insofar as the value of the thing has been increased by them; nevertheless the possessor can remove the ornaments, provided this is done without detriment to the thing; 4° expenses made for producing fruits which are not merely industrial,[1] or which he restores.[2]

2. As regards civil law, let the law of the country be consulted.

[1] Since he can retain merely industrial fruits, he himself must also bear the expenses.

[2] Of course he is not bound both to restore the fruits and besides to bear the expenses made.

Point II. On the Possessor in Bad Faith

986 The possessor in bad faith is bound:

I. As regards the thing. If it exists, the thing must be returned as soon as possible. If it does not exist, generally its price or equivalent must be restored. Cf. the questions treated in n. 990.

987 II. As regards fruits. He is bound to restore the natural, civil, and mixed fruits which he received, even if the owner would not have received them; for a thing fructifies for the owner. Nevertheless, he can retain the price of the labor furnished for obtaining the fruits. For the rest, it does not matter that perhaps the fruits have been consumed, because by the very fact that they existed they were the owner's. Merely industrial fruits do not have to be restored (St. Alphonsus, III, 618).

988 III. As regards damages to be repaired. He is bound to restore emergent damage and ceasing profit, provided they were foreseen at least confusedly, for example fruits or interest which the owner would have received. But emergent damage and ceasing profit must be restored according to the estimation of the hope of avoiding damage or of acquiring profit (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). If emergent damage and ceasing profit doubtfully took place, he is not bound to restore them. Nor is he bound, with attention paid to the law of nature, to restore fruits which neither he himself received nor the owner would have received. But if civil law prescribes their restitution, it can be held as penal, and therefore should not be urged before the sentence of a judge.

989 IV. As regards expenses made, he can deduct:

1. With attention paid to the law of nature, necessary and useful expenses; voluptuary expenses for the same reason by which this is permitted to the possessor in good faith (n. 985); finally expenses made for producing fruits (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, n. 74).
2. As regards civil law, let the Code of the country be consulted. But if the law of the country prohibits one who has occupied another's thing by force from deducting any expenses, these provisions, insofar as they restrict the law of nature, can be held as penal, so that they cannot be urged before the sentence of a judge.

990 Question 1. Whether the possessor in bad faith must restore the price of the thing or of the fruits which perished while with him, but would also have perished while with the owner.

Response 1. Negatively: 1° if the thing or fruits perished from an intrinsic defect, as a horse from old age; 2° if they perished by the same danger by which they would have perished while with the owner, as if the house of the thief, in which the thing is, and the house of the owner, in which the thing was, are burned by the same common fire. The reason is that the possessor in bad faith did not expose the thing to the danger, and therefore did not influence the destruction of the thing, or the damage that would follow; hence the obligation of repairing the damage is lacking.

Response 2. Affirmatively, if the thing or fruits perished by a different danger, as if the houses of the thief and of the owner are burned by different fires, or one is burned by fire, the other is overthrown by an earthquake. The reason is that the possessor exposed the thing to this danger, and thus influenced its destruction or the damage, as it occurred in the concrete; hence the obligation of repairing the damage is present. Nor does it seem to matter whether the different dangers took place at the same or at a different time, because it suffices that he influenced the destruction or the damage as it occurred in the concrete (St. Alphonsus, III, 620; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, n. 79).

Objection. It does not matter to the owner whether the thing perished by this or by that danger.

Response. I concede; but this does not prevent the possessor from having influenced the damage as it took place in the concrete.

As to what civil law establishes, see the Code of the country.

Question 2. To what extent the possessor in bad faith is bound to restore, if the thing possessed had varying intrinsic value or varying price.

Response 1. If the possessor in bad faith still possesses the thing, he is bound to restore it whole, even if it has increased either in intrinsic value, as if a lamb has grown into a sheep, or, the thing not having been changed, in price alone. If the thing has decreased in intrinsic value, as if a horse has become old, both the thing must be returned and compensation must be added, if by the possessor's fault the thing has decreased more in value than it would have decreased while with the owner. If the thing, unchanged in itself, has decreased in price, it suffices to return the thing, unless, had the thing not been taken away or had it been restored at the time of increased price, the greater price would have benefited the owner, for instance because he would have sold it at the time of increased price. According to others, it does not suffice to return the thing, but restitution must be made according to the greater value, because when the price increased for the owner's benefit, and at that time the thief culpably did not restore, from that unjust detention he contracted the obligation of restoring it according to the greater price. But that contracted obligation is diminished by the very fact that the price of the thing is diminished; for the thing decreases in price for the owner.

Response 2. If the possessor in bad faith no longer possesses the thing, he is bound to restore thus:

1. He is bound according to the greater value: 1° if the thing profited the possessor according to the greater value, for instance if he sold it at the time of increased price; 2° if, had the thing not been taken away or had it been restored, the greater value would have benefited the owner, for instance because the owner would have sold the thing at the time of increased price; in doubt whether it would have benefited the owner, as regards the excess let only so much be restored as the probability of the excess that would have come to the owner is worth.
2. If the greater value neither profited the possessor nor would have profited the owner, as if the possessor sold the thing at the time of the price again diminished, and the owner, had the thing not been taken away or had it been restored, would not have sold it at the time of increased price, it suffices to restore according to the lesser value, by granting to the owner either a thing of the same species and value, or its price.

Objection. In the case just posited, the possessor in bad faith is bound to restitution according to the greater price, because by the very fact that he did not restore the thing at the time of increased price, he contracted the obligation of restoring it according to the greater price.

Response. That contracted obligation, as we have already noted, has been diminished by the very fact that the thing began to be worth less; for the thing decreases in price for the owner.

Question 3. To what extent restitution must be made if another's thing has passed through the hands of several possessors in bad faith.

Response 1. As regards the thing, it must be restored by the last possessor in bad faith who holds it in itself or in equivalent, or who unjustly destroyed or consumed it. If the last possessor in bad faith neither holds the thing in itself or in equivalent, nor unjustly destroyed or consumed it, according to some he, according to others the thief, is bound in the first place as regards the value of the thing. But if neither satisfies, the others must pay the price of the thing in equal parts. If all the others are lacking, each is bound for the whole, because he is a cause of the damage.

Response 2. As regards the fruits and damages of the thing, each is bound to compensation for the part of the time during which each detained the thing. If the others do not restore, the reparation of the whole damage falls upon each, in proportion to the time elapsed from the day on which they became unjust possessors.[1]

Note. Let the confessor not too anxiously compute with the penitent the sometimes very uncertain price, both of the thing itself and of its fruits, and the expenses to be deducted, either perhaps laid out or perhaps spent for labor and industry; nor let him scrupulously estimate damage of whatever kind perhaps inflicted on the owner. But let him settle the matter... according to what is equitable and good with the unjust possessor or damager.[2] Prudence requires that the confessor also attend to the good faith and the mind of the penitent, more or less prepared for due restitution. Let him also observe that it can happen that an unjust possessor who was in bad faith by reason of the thing nevertheless received the fruits in good faith, and either consumed or destroyed them.

[1] Cf. Aertnys-Damen, n. 758.

[2] Cf. Aertnys-Damen, loc. cit.

Point III. On the Possessor in Doubtful Faith

991 I. The possessor in doubtful faith must investigate the truth, if there is hope of discovering it. Meanwhile he must have care of the thing, and not alienate it without warning the new possessor about the doubt. If he discovers the owner, the thing must be restored to him.

992 II. He who doubts, and either holds the investigation of the truth as useless, or, after investigation has been made, continues to doubt:

1. If he began to possess in good faith, he can retain the thing, and indeed even if the thing is more probably another's. For the security of possessions and the preventing of lawsuits require that I be able to retain a thing which I began to possess in good faith, until it is established, at least morally, that it is another's (St. Alphonsus, I, nn. 35 and 36; III, 711).

2. He who began to possess in doubtful faith:

a) If he took the thing away from a possessor in good faith, he is bound to restore the whole thing, because, as was said under 1, the prior possessor had the right of retaining the thing.

b) If by a title legitimate in itself, for example purchase, he received the thing while doubting whether another was the owner of the thing:

α) If he received it from a possessor in good faith, he can retain it, because sufficiently probably he succeeds to the whole right of his predecessor.

β) If he received it from a suspect possessor, he can retain part of the thing in proportion to the doubt; but the other part must be restored to the probable owner, if he is known. If besides the actual possessor, that is, the one who received the thing by a title legitimate in itself, there are several probable owners, the thing is to be divided among all probable owners, that is, the possessor and the others. The reason for all this is that all probable owners are of equal condition (St. Alphonsus, III, 625). If the probable owner or owners are unknown, he can retain the whole thing for himself. Many indeed think that, in the latter case, the other part is to be assigned to the poor or to a pious cause. But this is not proved with attention paid to the law of nature; and ecclesiastical law, if it existed, after the Code now cannot be urged (cf. n. 1011).

Note. He who doubts whether a thing has an owner, and cannot lay aside the doubt, can occupy it whole if the owner who perhaps exists is unknown; otherwise let him divide the thing in proportion to the doubt.

3. He who culpably neglected the investigation, so that the owner now cannot be discovered with certainty, is more probably bound to restore something to the probable owner, if there is one, and indeed in proportion to the hope of which he unjustly deprived the owner (St. Alphonsus, I, 36). "I think, however, that restitution is not to be made according to the quantity of the doubt, so that, if the reasons on each side were equal, the thing or its price would have to be restored by half; but less and perhaps much less. The reason is that that hope of the owner could not be valued at half the value of the thing, but at much less, with an equal probability of reason standing on one side, and the certain right of possession on the other, which favored and still favors the possessor. For possession of the thing is indeed valued much more highly than possession of the hope" (St. Alphonsus, I, 37). If there is no probable owner, he can retain the whole for himself, nor is he bound, according to what has just been said, to restore a part to the poor or to a pious cause.

§ II. On Those who Merely Inflicted Damage

Preliminary note. Damage can be inflicted either with theological fault, or with juridical fault together with or without theological fault, or without any fault. Theological fault is had when someone commits a formal sin, and therefore is culpable before God. Juridical fault is the omission of diligence required by civil law, whether theological fault is added or is not added; in the former case there is juridical fault together with theological fault. But we inquire what things are required, apart from both contract and the sentence of a judge, in order that an act carry with it the obligation of restoring the damage that followed.

Now, in order that an action carry with it the obligation of restoring the damage that followed, it is required: 1° that it was the cause of the damage, and indeed, as is probable, of the damage which the agent willed to inflict; 2° that it was an unjust cause of the damage; 3° that it was theologically culpable.

993 I. The first condition is that the action was the cause of the damage, and indeed - as is probable - of the damage which the agent willed to inflict. It is said:

1. That the action was the cause of the damage, that is, either physical or moral. For an obligation of repairing damage which someone did not produce cannot be admitted (St. Alphonsus, III, 584). Now:

a) It certainly suffices - which is plain - that the action be a cause per se of the damage, or that the action by its nature be ordered to producing the damage.

b) A merely occasional cause of the damage does not suffice, that is, such a cause as does not itself inflict the damage, but, once it has been posited, another creates the damage; as if someone commits homicide, and that homicide, through an error of the judge to which the murderer gave no cause, is imputed to another. The reason is that in the case the action in truth cannot be called the cause of the damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 584, 635, 536). The same must be said for the same reason about an action which is only a condition without which the damage inflicted would not have occurred.

c) Nor does an accidental cause of the damage suffice, that is, such a cause as by its nature is not ordered to inflicting damage, but, some circumstances being posited, can produce it, as for example a theft which becomes for someone the cause of illness. The reason is that the burden of restoring the damage inflicted does not seem to arise in a case in which the damage must be attributed more to the circumstances of the action than to the action itself (St. Alphonsus, III, 632).

Nevertheless, both as regards an occasional cause and as regards an accidental cause, the case seems to have to be excepted in which the said causes assume the character of cooperation in inflicting damage; on this see the example set forth in n. 1073.

Question. Whether an occasional or accidental cause of damage suffices, if it is posited with the intention that the damage follow.

Response. Sufficiently probably this is denied, because restitution is owed only on account of damage created, with theological fault of course being posited, and consequently only on account of a cause or external act, since that is what creates the damage; hence if anything is lacking on the part of the external cause, the obligation of restitution does not seem to arise, with whatever intention at last the cause may be posited (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 636). This, however, does not prevent the damage from being imputed to the one positing the cause in this sense: that on account of that damage he offends against charity.

Note. Sometimes it is difficult to determine whether an action is a cause per se or an accidental or occasional cause of damage. Especially there is dispute about example. Moreover, with St. Alphonsus we say that example per se is merely an occasion of damage; nevertheless, with attention paid to circumstances, it can be equivalent to counsel and therefore to a cause per se (II, 44, 4°; 45, at the end).

2. Sufficiently probably it is required that the action was the cause of the damage which the agent willed to inflict. Otherwise the damage actually inflicted was in no way willed, and therefore cannot be imputed to the agent. To this opinion adhere St. Alphonsus (III, 628, 629; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, nn. 84, 85); De Lugo;[1] La Croix;[2] Sporer;[3] D'Annibale;[4] Aertnys-Damen;[5] Marc.[6]

Corollary. He who culpably inflicted damage on some person, for example Peter, while willing to harm another, not that person - as if someone set fire to the house of Paul his friend, thinking it to be the house of Peter his enemy - is sufficiently probably not bound to restitution. The reason is that the arsonist was not the cause of the damage which he willed to inflict, but of damage which he did not will to inflict.

Objection. The arsonist willed to harm some man; this suffices for inducing the obligation of restitution.

Response. He willed to harm some man, whoever he was: I deny; he willed to harm Peter, who is some man, but not Paul: I concede. But in fact he harmed Paul. Therefore the damage in fact inflicted was not willed; and this is sufficiently probably required in order that the obligation of restoring arise.

[1] Disp. 18, n. 86.

[2] Theologia moralis, l. 3, p. 2, n. 200.

[3] Theologia moralis super Decalogo, tr. 4, c. 2, n. 139.

[4] Summula Theologiae Moralis, p. 2, l. 3, nn. 100 and 232.

[5] Theologia moralis, I, n. 767, q. 2°.

[6] Institutiones morales S. Alphonsi, I, n. 950, q. 4°.

994 II. The second condition is that the action be an unjust cause of the damage. Thus it is not enough that someone causing damage act illicitly or against charity, but it is required that by justice he be bound not to cause the damage. This condition is lacking, for example, in him who, with the things to be observed having been observed, kills an unjust aggressor, and this indeed even if, by killing him, with attention paid to the circumstances, he sinned against charity.

Question 1. Whether he acts unjustly and is bound to restitution who, after a cause of damage has been inculpably posited - for example, after another's house has been burned without fault - does not prevent the damage.

Response. Affirmatively; for just as justice prohibits me from positing a harmful action, so also it must command that I take precautions against the damage that will follow from an action already posited. Make exception if someone cannot prevent the damage without his own damage greater than, equal to, or grave relative to the damage of his neighbor (St. Alphonsus, III, 564, 994; VI, 621).

Question 2. Whether he acts unjustly, and is bound to restitution, who destroys or consumes a thing, for example foodstuffs, that certainly would perish while with the owner, for example in a fire.

Response 1. If he destroys or consumes a thing already placed in danger, he does not act unjustly, because in that case the thing is considered of no value to the owner himself (St. Alphonsus, III, 620). But the resolution holds even if the one thus acting spared his own goods, since the owner suffered no damage. Nevertheless, the case will not easily occur in such a way that nothing is to be restored; because, says De Lugo,[1] "if someone could, if he wished, snatch the thing away, then the thing itself was not inevitably going to perish; therefore he ought in justice to pay something, namely as much as could be found and offered for the thing placed in that danger."

Response 2. If he destroys or consumes a thing soon to be placed in danger, a distinction must be made. The obligation of restitution is absent if the danger was certainly and commonly foreseen, because then by common estimation the thing was of no value to the owner. It must be said otherwise "if at the time the damage was given there was no knowledge of the destruction or future danger. The reason is that, since that danger was unknown, that thing was truly worth as much among men as if it had not later been going to perish."

Response 3. If someone destroys or consumes a thing rescued from danger, for example from a fire, he is bound to restitution, because a thing withdrawn from danger cries out for its owner. And, for the reason given, this holds, others denying it, even if the thing is immediately consumed. For the rest note that charity alone obliges someone to rescue another's thing from danger.

[1] Disp. 18, n. 146.

995 III. The third condition is that the action be theologically culpable, that is, a formal sin. The reason is that an act posited without sin, and therefore subjectively licitly, cannot carry with it the burden of repairing harmful effects that followed from it. There is added that the obligation of restoring has in some way the character of a penalty. But the obligation of a penalty is not contracted per se, or by the force of the act admitted alone, without sin (St. Alphonsus, III, 550). Thus of itself merely juridical fault does not suffice; this nevertheless does not prevent someone, when merely juridical fault has been admitted, from being able to be held to restitution by force of a judge's sentence or of a contract (n. 1009).

Moreover, sufficiently probably a formal sin against justice is required, because otherwise formal injury is not had. But the fact that someone did not know that injustice carries with it the obligation of restoring does not prevent the obligation from arising. For this arises from the very nature of justice culpably violated.

Finally, much more probably a perfectly voluntary act is required, so that a semi-deliberate act, whether there is question of light or grave matter, does not suffice. Only a perfectly voluntary act, or one plainly imputable, can induce the obligation of repairing effects that followed from the act; just as only a perfectly voluntary contract and only a perfectly voluntary vow can beget obligation. But a semi-deliberate act must be imputed to misfortune equally or rather than to the agent (St. Alphonsus, III, 552). "Whence it follows that he is free from every restitution who, inflamed by sudden anger, kills a man; a boy who from levity and imprudence causes a fire, etc. Yet authors warn that, unless it is certain, such venial fault from imperfection of the act is rarely to be presumed in grave damaging, and therefore confessors ordinarily ought to induce the penitent to some composition with the injured party, insofar as this can conveniently be done; which is altogether most advisable."[1]

Question 1. To what extent is he bound to restore who with light fault, perfectly deliberate, inflicted grave damage. The case occurs if someone inflicts damage grave in itself, but from an erroneous conscience thinks that for grave sin a graver matter is required, or that one who inflicts grave damage sins only lightly.

Response. Others thinking otherwise, sufficiently probably no obligation arises, because light fault probably cannot carry with it the obligation of undergoing a grave burden, of which sort is - at least if there is question of goods of fortune - the burden of restoring grave damage. There is added that a grave obligation does not correspond to light fault, while a light obligation is not proportioned to the matter or grave damage. All these things considered, sufficiently probably every obligation is denied.

Question 2. To what extent is he bound to restore who through several venial faults deliberately committed finally inflicted grave damage.

Response 1. If someone inflicted those small damages on different owners, the individual damages are to be restored only under light obligation, because to light faults there does not correspond a grave obligation.

Response 2. If the damages were inflicted on the same person, most think that there is a grave obligation at least of restoring so much that grave matter no longer remains. But sufficiently probably, just as in the former case, there is only a multiple obligation under light obligation, because, as was said, to light faults there does not correspond a grave obligation.

Question 3. Whether he is bound to restore who culpably posited a cause of damage, but before the damage followed retracted the wicked will.

Response. Affirmatively, unless together with the wicked will he also removed the influence of the cause posited on the damage. The reason is that the retraction of the will does not prevent the damage from following from the cause posited. The reason for the exception is that then the damage arises from elsewhere. Hence he who has thrown fire into another's crop is bound to restitution, even if afterward, grieving, he tried to extinguish the fire (St. Alphonsus, III, 559; VII, 40).

Corollary. He who was invincibly mistaken about the quantity of the damage, for example about the value of a thing which he destroyed or consumed, is bound to restore only according to the value which he apprehended. The reason is that "that damage is not judged willed which is not known; therefore as regards that excess the will of damaging is lacking" (St. Alphonsus, III, 613). It suffices, however, that someone apprehended the excess confusedly.

[1] Sporer, n. 213 sq.; Sweens, n. 306.

§ III. On Those who Impede Another from Obtaining a Good

996 He who impedes another from obtaining a good is bound to restitution, as follows:

I. If the other has a strict right to the good from which he is impeded, the one impeding is bound to restitution; nor does it matter whether he impedes the other by a means just in itself or unjust. Hence, for example, you are bound to restore to Paul if you persuade Peter, Paul's debtor, not to pay the debts to Paul (St. Alphonsus, III, 582).

II. If the other lacks a strict right to the good from which he is impeded, a distinction must be made:

1. If someone impedes another by a means not unjust - for example by persuading someone not to buy from Paul - he does not act unjustly; and this holds even if from hatred he impedes another from obtaining the good (St. Alphonsus, III, 584, 585).
2. If someone uses an unjust means, for example fear, force, calumny, fraud, lying,[1] a subdistinction must be made:

a) If the unjust means is unjust with respect to him who is impeded from obtaining the good, there is injustice and the obligation of restitution; as if someone, by calumniating a poor man, impedes him from obtaining alms. Make exception, however, if either the one about to confer the good cannot confer it without sin, or the one about to receive the good pursues it illegitimately or is going to abuse it; as if, by calumniating a poor man, you turn someone away either from making a prodigal donation to the poor man, or from giving alms which the poor man would abuse. In these circumstances injustice is absent in relation to the good impeded, although the act can be unjust on another head, for instance because of injured reputation. The reason is that per se someone can be impeded from obtaining a good which cannot be granted to him without sin, or which he himself pursues illegitimately, or which he is going to abuse; this being posited, the impeditive act is not unjust by reason of the good impeded through the act; but it can be unjust by reason of itself, for example by reason of the injury to reputation which it involves (St. Alphonsus, III, 587).

In a case in which someone uses an unjust means with respect to him who is impeded from obtaining the good, restitution must be made according to the certainty or probability by which the other is judged otherwise to have been going to obtain such a good.

b) If the means is directly unjust only with respect to him who was about to confer the good - as if someone by fear impedes another from conferring alms, for example, on Peter - it is disputed whether there is an obligation of restoring to Peter. Now it seems this must be denied, because under no head is it clear that injustice is committed with respect to Peter, neither by reason of the act, which is unjust only with respect to the benefactor, nor by reason of the good from whose attainment Peter is impeded, because Peter does not have a strict right to that good (St. Alphonsus, III, 632).

Objection. Everyone has a right that another not be unjustly impeded from giving a good to him.

Response. What is asserted is not evident, and therefore must be proved.

Nevertheless St. Alphonsus and others think that an obligation of restitution arises if someone impedes another from obtaining a good with precisely this intention, that the other not obtain the good, because the said intention seems to them to bring it about that the act assumes the character of a violent means with respect to him who is impeded from obtaining the good, and thus becomes unjust also with respect to him (III, 633).

[1] Fraud and lying are unjust insofar as, equally with fear, they deprive another of liberty of acting.

§ IV. On Those who Cooperate in Injustice

997 The modes of cooperating in injustice are enumerated as nine, expressed in these little verses:

Command, counsel, consent, the flatterer, the receiver,

The participant, the silent one, the one not opposing, the one not manifesting.

Of these the first six are called positive, the last three negative (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 62, a. 1).

We shall speak first about those cooperating positively, then about those cooperating negatively, and finally about the measure and order by which cooperators are held to restitution.

Point I. On Positive Cooperators

998 I. In order that positive cooperators be held to restitution of the damage that followed, it is required: 1° that the cooperation was an efficacious cause, whether physical or moral, of the damage; 2° that it was an unjust cause of the damage; 3° that it was theologically culpable.

II. He who cooperated in damage is obligated to restitution, even if, failing him, another would have cooperated (St. Alphonsus, III, 562, at the end). He who cooperated only in part of the damage is held to restitution in proportion to that part; and this you should also apply to him who brought it about that a greater damage was inflicted.

III. A moral cause, for example one commanding, counseling, etc., in the case in which the author of the damage was already prepared for inflicting the damage, is bound thus:

1. If he in no way moved the author of the damage, he is not bound to restore, because in truth he exercised no influence, or cannot be called the cause of the damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 561).
2. If he only confirmed the author of the damage in his purpose, he is sufficiently probably immune from restitution, because it is denied not without foundation that he was an efficacious cause of the damage (cf. St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
3. If he only brought it about that the damage was inflicted sooner or in another way, he is sufficiently probably exempted from restitution, because he did not influence the substance of the damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 563).

With these things noted generally, we pass on to the individual cooperators.

I. On the One Commanding

999 I. Notion. Here one commanding is understood as one who efficaciously moves another to inflict damage in his own name, that is, in the name of the one commanding. For in this the one commanding differs from the one counseling: he who acts by command acts in the name of the one commanding; he who acts by counsel acts in his own name. For the rest, it makes no difference whether another is induced to inflict damage by precept or by threats or prayers or by contract, whether explicitly or tacitly. Nor is it required that the one commanding possess authority over the mandatary.

II. Damages to be repaired. The one commanding is bound to restore:

1. The damage which he ordered to be inflicted.
2. The damage which, besides the damage commanded, naturally follows from carrying out the order, and which he foresaw at least confusedly would follow; as if soldiers ordered to devastate a city kill citizens. It must be said otherwise concerning damage which is not morally connected with the damage commanded, or which was in no way foreseen; as if, being ordered to strike someone lightly, you kill him. It must also be said otherwise, sufficiently probably, concerning damage which the mandatary by error inflicted on someone other than the one commanded, for example on Peter instead of Paul. The reason is that in the case the command seems rather an occasion than a cause, while the error of the mandatary seems the cause of the damage. There is added that in this hypothesis the one commanding did not will the damage which in fact was inflicted (n. 993).
3. The damage which befell the mandatary in the execution of the command, the one commanding is bound to restore, if the danger of damage was attached to the execution and the mandatary was unjustly forced or deceived; otherwise if the mandatary freely accepted the command and the danger of damage, for instance because of a promised reward.

III. Cessation of the obligation. In order that the one commanding as such be freed from the obligation of restoring, there is required a serious revocation of the command, and that made known to the mandatary in time. If the revocation for any reason whatever was not made known in time, the command continued to exercise force, and therefore the one commanding remains a cause of the damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 558).

II. On the One Counseling

1000 I. Notion. The one counseling is he who induces another to inflict damage in his own name (cf. n. 999).

Counsel is distinguished into doctrinal and impulsive. Doctrinal counsel is that by which someone gives a judgment about the liceity or illicitness, the justice or injustice, of an action; impulsive counsel is that by which someone, once the morality of the action is known, excites another to the action. Each can be either bare or clothed, according as it is not confirmed, or is confirmed, by assigning motives, means, the place or opportune time of execution, or something similar.

II. Damages to be repaired. 1. He who gave doctrinal counsel is bound thus:

a) If he gave it from office, he is bound to repair both the damages which are going to befall the one seeking counsel and those which are going to befall others from it. For all the aforesaid damages must be imputed to him (St. Alphonsus, III, 564).

b) If he did not give it from office, he must restore the damages which befall others from it, but not those which befall the one seeking counsel. The reason for the former is that he is their unjust cause; the reason for the latter is that these must be ascribed to the imprudence of one seeking counsel from an unskilled person. If, however, he used deceit, namely by pretending skill, he is bound also to repair the damages that would follow for the one seeking counsel, because in this case these too must be imputed to him (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

2. He who gave impulsive counsel is bound to restore the damages which befall others from it, but not those which befall the one seeking counsel. The reason for the former is that they must be imputed to the one giving counsel; the reason for the latter is that the one seeking counsel, by freely following the counsel, should impute to himself the damage that followed from it (St. Alphonsus, III, 558).

III. Cessation of the obligation of restoring. The obligation of restoring ceases:

1. If the counsel was bare, whether doctrinal or impulsive, the obligation ceases by a serious revocation, signified to the executor in time. For thus the counsel ceases to influence the effect (St. Alphonsus, III, 559).
2. If the counsel was clothed, most authors hold as sufficiently probable that the counselor is freed from the obligation of restoring if he brings forward motives which of themselves ought to destroy the former motives; to these especially belong motives sought from faith. For then, they say, the execution is said to proceed more from the executor's own malice than from the counsel of another (St. Alphonsus, III, 559).

Corollary. The counselor who, after his counsel has been revoked and weakened as much as he can, could not turn another away from execution, is bound by charity to warn the person who is to be damaged; indeed by justice, if the counsel was clothed, because counsel of this sort - although the execution of the counsel is said to proceed more from the executor's own malice than from the counsel of another - nevertheless in some way continues to influence (St. Alphonsus, III, 559).

Question 1. Is it permitted to persuade one prepared to harm a determinate person that he should inflict on him rather a lesser evil than a greater one?

Response. Affirmatively, because by acting thus he prevents a graver damage rather than counsels some damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 565).

Question 2. Is it permitted to persuade one prepared to harm that he should inflict rather a lesser evil on one person than a greater evil on another?

Response 1. It is not permitted to persuade one prepared to harm that he should inflict rather a lesser evil on a determinate person than a greater evil on another. Namely, just as it is not permitted to avert one's own damage with injury to another, so neither is it permitted to prevent another's damage with injury to another; unless the difference between the two damages is of such a kind that the other, as regards the counsel given, cannot be reasonably unwilling (St. Alphonsus, III, 565, 577).

Others admit the contrary, because it is conformable to charity that the damage be prevented of him who will suffer more, rather than of him who is going to undergo lesser damage; hence the one to be harmed cannot be reasonably unwilling toward the counselor, but only toward the damager himself. But the fact that one consenting to his own damage exercises an act of charity does not prevent him from being reasonably unwilling and from licitly not consenting.

Response 2. Likewise it seems illicit to persuade one prepared to harm that he should inflict rather a lesser evil on someone, that is, on a non-determinate person, than a greater evil on another, for example that he should harm a rich man rather than a determinate poor man. The reason is that in this case the one persuading influences the damage of him who will be harmed (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

III. On the One Consenting

1001 I. Notion. One consenting is said to be he who, whether by consenting or by casting a vote, influences the damaging act of another. Here can come: 1° Superiors and others who by external consent, laughter, etc., approve the evil will of the evil-doer; 2° legislative assemblies; 3° administrative assemblies of a province, municipality, etc.; 4° judges of diverse instances.

II. Damages to be repaired. The one consenting is bound to restore: 1° the damage in which he cooperated positively; 2° the damage which he did not prevent, and which he both could and, by justice, ought to have prevented.

Question. Which of those who have cast an unjust vote are bound to restore?

Response 1. If the votes were cast either at the same time, for example by standing or sitting, or by agreement,[1] all voting unjustly are bound to restitution, because all are equally the cause of the damage.

Response 2. If the votes were cast neither at the same time nor by agreement, those certainly must restore who certainly voted before the necessary number of votes was completed. But there is dispute about those who afterward cast a vote. Sufficiently probably they are immune from restitution. For although the law is not enacted until all votes have been collected or counted, nevertheless, strictly speaking, votes afterward cast effect nothing, or do not influence the law, since it already cannot be avoided (St. Alphonsus, III, 566).

Response 3. He who doubts whether he voted before or after the necessary number was completed - which will easily occur if votes are cast secretly - is certainly bound to restitution, because by casting his vote he brought it about that the authors of the damage are uncertain; and thus he worsened the right which the one who suffered damage had of recovering restitution from certain damagers. Indeed also for this reason, because he is the cause of uncertainty, he seems to be bound in solidum (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 9, n. 50).[2]

III. Cessation of the obligation. An obligation that would follow from approval ceases by timely revocation; one that would follow from a vote given ceases for the same reason, provided however that the vote can legally be revoked.

[1] "Before a vote is truly cast by individuals, such a conspiracy rather has the character of counsel; wherefore one who only consented in the meeting of the faction, but in the assemblies themselves is not among those effectively voting, is not held to restitution in the same order, but generally after them" (Lehmkuhl, I, 1201).

[2] St. Alphonsus says otherwise in Theologia moralis, III, 566; but the text of the second edition seems to have remained changed through forgetfulness.

IV. On the Flatterer

1002 A flatterer is said to be one who, whether by flattering or praising, or by mocking or reproaching, etc., influences the damaging act of another.

He is bound to repair the damages inflicted just as one guilty of impulsive counsel, and indeed clothed counsel (n. 1000); and by the same reason he is freed from the obligation of restoring (St. Alphonsus, III, 567).

V. On the Receiver

1003 A receiver is he who, by providing refuge, security, or protection to an evil-doer, influences that one's damaging act. Receivers are, for example: 1° those who deliberately hide or buy stolen things; 2° those who conceal the goods of those who have ceded their goods in court or are about to do so; 3° one who receives or protects a thief formally, as is said, for example for the concealment of the theft; but not one who receives or protects him materially, for example as a wretched man, etc. (St. Alphonsus, III, 568).

He is bound to repair the damages inflicted just as the participant, of whom it will now be said.

VI. On the Participant

1004 I. Notion and division. The participant is distinguished in two ways: participant in the thing and participant in the unjust action, according as he either buys or receives as a gift part of the thing offered, or helps the damager in inflicting damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 571).

II. Damages to be repaired. The participant in the thing is bound as an unjust possessor of another's thing; the participant in the unjust action must restore as an unjust damager, and indeed in proportion to his influence (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.; n. 993 sq.).

Question. To what extent is it permitted, in order to avoid one's own damage, to cooperate in a damaging action? The discussion is about material cooperation, because formal cooperation is always illicit. Furthermore:

Response 1. To cooperate mediately in damage to one's neighbor is permitted for a proportionately grave cause. Thus it is permitted, for example, in order to avoid death, to hand over a sword to one who is going to kill another (St. Alphonsus, III, 571; n. 556).

Response 2. To cooperate immediately is permitted as follows:

1. It is not permitted to cooperate immediately in the killing or mutilation of another, because such cooperation is intrinsically evil (n. 556).
2. It is permitted for a grave cause to cooperate immediately in damage in goods of fortune: 1° if the cooperator has both the power and the will of repairing the damage to be inflicted; 2° if there is question of inflicting light damage; 3° if, cooperation being denied, the damage will nevertheless be inflicted by the principal author. The reason for all of these is that in the cases posited the one to be harmed is bound by charity to consent to the cooperation, so that injury ceases. Outside the enumerated cases it is not permitted to cooperate immediately, because the one to be harmed is not bound to consent, so that injury does not cease. Make exception if, from denied cooperation, some most grave evil threatens someone, for example death, mutilation, etc., because then the one to be harmed is again bound to consent; or even consent is not required, almost as if there is question of one who in extreme or quasi-extreme necessity can take another's goods, by which he averts most grave damage (St. Alphonsus, III, 571).

It is disputed whether in this last case the cooperator is bound to restitution. Others affirm, excepting the case in which the cooperator was absolutely poor, that is, poor in reality and in hope; just as one is bound who in extreme necessity took another's goods. But with St. Alphonsus it seems that the distinction must be made thus: the cooperator is not bound to restitution if he avoided damage of a higher order, for instance death, mutilation, grave infamy; he is bound if he avoided damage of the same order, that is, damage of fortune. The reason is that in the former case he did not spare his own goods, otherwise in the latter case (III, 571).

Point II. On Negative Cooperators

1005 I. Negative cooperators are: 1° the silent one; 2° the one not opposing; 3° the one not manifesting. The silent one is said to be he who by speaking or warning does not prevent damage to be inflicted. The one not opposing is he who does not impede the damage that is being inflicted or omits to procure restitution to be made. The one not manifesting is he who does not denounce damage that has been inflicted (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 62, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, III, 573).

II. The requisites in order that negative cooperators be held to restore are:

1. That they ought by strictly so-called justice to have prevented the damage. Now an obligation of strictly so-called justice arises from a contract, whether express or tacit.

By express contract there are bound, for example, keepers of woods, of hunts, administrators of the goods of an institute, etc.

A tacit contract is contained in the acceptance of an imposed office which, by reason of the remuneration annexed to it, is also considered a benefit; but not in the acceptance of an office which lacks the character of a benefit, as the office of parents or of the Superior of a religious house (St. Alphonsus, III, 360, but doubt 1°). By contract, at least tacit, there are bound, for example, officials of the police, who must provide for the safety of citizens, customs guards, etc., as will be explained more below.

2. That they could have prevented the damage without grave inconvenience. I said without grave inconvenience, because commonly contracts are not entered into with a greater burden, nor do offices carry a greater burden with them.
3. That with theological fault they did not impede the damage, according to what was said in n. 995 (St. Alphonsus, III, 573; cf. St. Thomas, II-II, q. 62, a. 7).

Corollary I. By force of natural law, owners, likewise parents or tutors, are bound to restore damages inflicted by their things which cannot govern themselves - for example by animals, by children lacking the use of reason - on account of culpable negligence; namely, by justice they are bound with moral diligence to prevent the said things from harming others.

Corollary II. By force of civil law, even if theological fault is lacking and merely juridical fault is had, commonly these are bound: 1° parents or tutors for damage inflicted by minor children living in the same household; 2° teachers and craftsmen for harm done by pupils or servants during the time in which they are under their custody; 3° masters for damage inflicted by animals, etc. Nevertheless, the law does not bind except after the sentence of a judge (n. 1009).

Corollary III. Guards of taxes who connive with those defrauding are bound to restore the value of the taxes to be paid. It is disputed whether they must also restore the fine which those defrauding, if denounced, would have had to pay. Now with St. Alphonsus (IV, 237) and others we deny, because a fine has the character of a penalty; but a penalty, of course after the sentence of a judge, is to be borne by the delinquent, not by another.

Objection. He who unjustly impedes another from obtaining a good is bound to restitution. But guards, by not denouncing those defrauding taxes, act unjustly, and therefore unjustly impede the treasury from obtaining a good, in the case from receiving a fine.

Response. He who unjustly impedes another from obtaining a good is bound to restitution if that good has the character of a penalty: I deny, because the penalty is to be borne by the delinquent himself, condemnation having been posited.

Keepers of woods, of hunts, etc., are bound to restore the damages that followed for the owner from their omission (St. Alphonsus, III, 573). "Nevertheless, the damage must be of great moment, and the owner rationally unwilling. Hence the keeper will not be bound to restore if he permits a poor person to take something away; or if the one defrauding were of such condition that he prudently presumed the owner, if he knew, would give him the faculty or would afterward ratify it; or finally, if by custom or by the patience of the Government knowing and dissimulating, it had been received that they should perform the office not so severely and with so great a burden."[1]

Corollary IV. Deputies who, by not casting a vote, are the cause that an unjust law is adopted are bound to restore damages that will follow from it for citizens; not so electors who, by neglecting to elect, are the cause why an unjust deputy is elected. The reason for the former is that deputies are bound to cast a vote from an office to which remuneration is annexed. The latter must be admitted for the contrary reason.

Corollary V. Servants who culpably did not prevent damage to the master are bound to restore if there is question of a thing specially committed to them. If there is discussion of other things, they are not bound to restore damages inflicted by fellow servants, because to prevent hatreds, the prevention of damages of this sort is not considered included in the contract (St. Alphonsus, III, 344). As regards damages inflicted by outsiders, there is dispute. Some affirm, because by the very fact that they are taken into the household, they are considered to have undertaken that burden. But that is today called into doubt in law, because servants are no longer accustomed to obligate themselves beyond the limits of the works assigned. Nevertheless, attention should be paid to circumstances, which sometimes are such that the aforesaid burden is considered to have been undertaken; this can easily happen, for example, if a servant is hired by a widow.

Corollary VI. A confessor who - even culpably - merely omits to warn a penitent about restitution to be made is not held by the obligation of restitution, neither with respect to the injured person, nor with respect to the penitent who perhaps suffers damage from the omitted warning. The reason is that the confessor is not bound by justice to warn the penitent. It must be said otherwise, however, if the confessor expressly or equivalently - for example if, when questioned, he is silent or dissimulates, although the reason for being silent or dissimulating is lacking - exempts the penitent from restitution (St. Alphonsus, VI, 621).

Corollary VII. A witness, even though legitimately interrogated, who does not manifest what he knows is not bound to restore, because he is not bound by justice to open the truth. The same must be said of a witness who falsely says or swears that he knows nothing, because, although he thus says or swears, nevertheless he did not by an unjust means impede someone from obtaining a good; since even in the case he impeded someone from acquiring a good not precisely by that lie or perjury, but by opening nothing, which is not unjust (St. Alphonsus, IV, 270).

[1] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 786.

Point III. On the Measure and Order by which Cooperators Are Held to Restitution

1006 I. Measure of restitution. 1. Those who have cooperated in the same damage can be held to restitution in two ways: in solidum and pro rata, as they say. An obligation in solidum consists in this, that the cooperator is held to restore the whole damage; an obligation pro rata is had when someone is obligated only to the part which is commensurate with his influence. The obligation in solidum is distinguished as twofold: absolutely and conditionally solidary, according as someone is held to the restitution of the whole damage before all others, or only in default of the other cooperators. One who is held absolutely in solidum can demand no compensation from the cooperators; otherwise one who is held conditionally.

2. He is held in solidum who has so influenced the whole damage that the whole must be imputed to him; others are held only pro rata for their own part. Hence they are obligated in solidum:

a) He who alone was the principal cause of the damage, as a sole one commanding (St. Alphonsus, III, 579).

b) He who alone was the secondary cause of the damage, as a sole executor (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

c) Those who were equal causes, whether principal or secondary, as follows. These are held in solidum:

α) Those whose cooperation was necessary, although not sufficient, for inflicting the damage; as if three carry away a chest which two could not have carried away (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

β) Those whose conspiracy was necessary, so that, if one had not consented, the damage would not have been inflicted (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

γ) Those whose cooperation was in fact sufficient, even if it was not necessary for inflicting the damage; as if two induced a thief to steal, and each proposed an efficacious motive; or two discharge a gun at the same person, and each inflicted a lethal wound (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

δ) It is disputed concerning those whose cooperation indeed regarded the whole damage,[1] but was neither necessary nor sufficient.[2] But a sufficiently probable opinion teaches that they are held to restitution only pro rata, because in this hypothesis the whole damage seems to be ascribed rather to all together than to each separately (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Note. "It must be observed that although rough persons are held in solidum, it is rarely expedient to obligate them to the whole; since such persons are with difficulty persuaded that they are held to restoring the part taken by their companions. - Indeed, it can be presumed enough that the owners themselves to whom restitution is owed consent that they restore only the part taken by them; since otherwise there must be great fear that they will restore nothing, if they are obligated to the whole" (St. Alphonsus, III, loc. cit.).

[1] It is said: it regarded the whole damage; hence the case is not present if several, for example, carry away a heap of wheat, but each carries away his own part, and this without mutual influence or dependence.

[2] The case is present if someone, for example, proposed to another a motive for killing someone, which was not necessary, and yet by itself would not have sufficed to move the killer efficaciously; or if four carry away a chest which even two would have carried off.

1007 II. Order of restitution. Those who cooperated in the same damage are held to restitution in this order:

1. Before all others the possessor is held, that is, he who has another's thing in itself or in equivalent. If he is no longer possessor, before all others he is held who consumed or destroyed another's thing in bad faith, unless he did this in the name of another (St. Alphonsus, III, 580).
2. Next the one commanding is held, if there was one, because he "is principal in the deed" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 62, a. 7, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). But to him is assimilated the one who by unjust means, for example by false doctrinal counsel, "was the cause why the damage was inflicted: for although then he is not the principal cause in strictness, nor does the executor act in his name but in his own, nevertheless by injustice he cast the executor into the obligation of restoring; therefore he is bound to preserve him unharmed, and accordingly must restore in the first place for him on whom he unjustly imposed such an obligation."[1]
3. Then the executor is held (St. Thomas, loc. cit.; St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). To him is equated one who was a participant in the unjust action and acted in his own name, for example one who with others cast a vote efficacious for passing an unjust sentence; because such persons are co-executors of unjust damage.
4. After the executor other positive cooperators are held; among these there is no order (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
5. Finally negative cooperators are held (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). Even among them there is commonly no order. Nevertheless, sometimes an order seems to have to be admitted; thus, for example, particular guards, who are immediately bound to impede damages, seem to be obligated before general guards, who must watch that the particular guards duly fulfill their office.

Corollary I. Among cooperators there can be a twofold subordination: one as regards damaging, another as regards the mode of cooperating; and then there will also be a twofold order in the obligation of restoring. For example: Paul commands his son to counsel Peter not to impede damage which Peter by justice ought to impede. In the case all are non-impeding; but in the order toward restitution Peter precedes the rest; if he fails, Paul comes as the one commanding; finally the son as the one counseling.[2]

Corollary II. If a solidary debtor has repaired the whole damage, the less principal causes are held to nothing; but the more principal causes must refund the whole to the said debtor, and equal causes each their own part. For example, A, B, and C, equal solidary causes, owe Peter 30 florins. A restores the whole. In the case B and C must each refund 10 florins to him (St. Alphonsus, III, 581).

It is disputed whether, if some cause refuses to refund his part or cannot do so, another must partially supply the part not refunded. For example, in the case given, B refuses to return 10 florins. Must C refund 15 florins? Many deny, because the obligation in solidum exists only toward the creditor, not toward fellow debtors. But it seems this must be affirmed; for by the fact that B refuses to pay 10 florins, A and C are each held to return 15 florins to Peter, so that A, by returning 30 florins, returned 15 florins for C, and therefore can demand them from him.

To the argument of the adversaries I respond that the obligation in solidum exists directly indeed toward the creditor alone, but indirectly toward fellow debtors, if the latter have paid the creditor in place of another debtor.

Corollary III. If a solidary debtor has received condonation, all less principal causes are held to nothing; but more principal causes are in no way freed; nor, per se, are equal causes freed, although they are not held to restore the part condoned to the fellow debtor. I said per se, because sometimes the intention of the one condoning to free equal causes can be presumed (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Nevertheless, let it be seen what civil law establishes about condonation.

Corollary IV. One of the solidary co-debtors who doubts whether his companion has restored his part is more probably bound to restore the whole; because in doubt about payment, the right of the damaged person, as prior to payment, is of better condition (St. Alphonsus, III, 569; I, 34; n. 1020).

[1] Waffelaert, II, n. 399.

[2] Sweens, n. 361.

Scholion I. On the Doubtful Damager

1008 I. He who doubts either whether damage followed, or whether he posited the cause of the damage, or whether he posited the said cause with the required theological fault - he who doubts about these things, I say, is not held to restitution. For in the enumerated cases there is question of a doubt of fact founding the law or obligation. But in such a doubt the obligation is lacking (n. 228; St. Alphonsus, III, 562).

II. He who posited the cause, but doubts about the influence of his action, for example of evil counsel given, on the damage that followed, likewise is not held to restitution; for the reason alleged under I holds. Note, however, that if there is question of a physical cause, for example of a wound inflicted and apt for killing, commonly there is no reason to doubt the influence; but it is more easily present if there is question of a moral cause, for example of counsel or command (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

You should also apply these things: 1° if several unjustly posited a cause, and it is doubted whether some one of the agents influenced the damage; as if several committed adultery with the same wife, and it is doubted whether the offspring was born from conjugal intercourse or from adultery (St. Alphonsus, III, 658); 2° if several unjustly posited a cause, and it is doubted which one of them influenced the damage. The case would be if several, while the husband was absent, had intercourse with the wife at the same time morally speaking. Make exception, however, if one or the other was a culpable cause of the doubt, as if someone, while the husband was absent, conscious of adultery committed by another, had intercourse with the same wife (St. Alphonsus, III, 658).

III. What has been said about the doubtful damager should also be applied both to him who doubtfully or doubtfully unjustly impeded another from obtaining a good, and to him who doubtfully or doubtfully unjustly cooperated in injustice.

Scholion II. On Juridical Fault; Likewise on a Contract or Law Intervening

1009 I. Juridical fault is present: 1° when someone posits an action harmful to another, either prohibited by law or not permitted by it; 2° when someone omits diligence owed by force of contract, law, or office. Furthermore, present laws, neglecting the distinction of the ancients between grave, light, and very slight juridical fault, commonly demand the care of a good father of a family; this nevertheless, with attention paid to the nature of the contract, extends more or less widely. Thus, for example, greater diligence is required in drivers, shipmasters, and administrators of railways.

II. He who with merely juridical fault inflicted damage is not held to restitution by force of natural law, as was proved in n. 995; nor is he held to it by force of positive law before the sentence of a judge;

nevertheless he can be held by force of a special contract. It is said:

1. Nor is he held by force of positive law before the sentence of a judge. The reason is that the legislator in causes of this sort, which are commonly very uncertain, is not considered to obligate unless juridical fault has been proved. There is added that, apart from a judge's sentence, the quantity of damage to be repaired will be difficult to determine practically (St. Alphonsus, III, 554; I, 100). After the sentence of a judge there is an obligation,[2] and indeed, as it seems, of commutative justice. Namely, the legislator by force of high dominion can establish an obligation of repairing juridical fault. But that an obligation of commutative justice is imposed or had is sufficiently suggested by the very matter of the law, which is compensation to be imposed for damage inflicted; and the judge applies the law.

Corollary. He who has received damage from another's action, merely juridical fault having been posited, can safely use the concession of the law and invoke the sentence of a judge.

2. Nevertheless he can be held by force of a special contract, namely of answering even for merely juridical fault. For anyone can obligate himself to restoring damage which he inflicted with merely juridical fault, indeed which he inflicted without any fault.

Corollary. Those undertaking an office, for example advocates, physicians, etc., parish priests, confessors, etc., are not considered by the very fact that they undertake the office to have obligated themselves by tacit contract to restoring damages inflicted with merely juridical fault. Thus also the timorous think. For the rest, if the contrary opinion were admitted, very many would be deterred from undertaking offices (St. Alphonsus, III, 555).

[1] For the sake of practice we speak first about the measure, then about the order.

[2] If, however, the sentence of the judge rests on a false presumption of fact, per se the obligation is absent; nevertheless it will commonly be present per accidens on account of scandal to be avoided (St. Alphonsus, I, 100, at the end).

Article III. The Person to whom Restitution Is to Be Made

1010 I. Restitution per se must be made to the injured person, or to him who has succeeded to his rights, whether as owner, or as administrator or possessor (St. Alphonsus, III, 596). I have said per se, because sometimes, from the presumed will of the owner, it can be assigned to the poor; thus, for example, alms received under the fictitious title of poverty can be granted to the true poor. For the rest, you should especially conclude and note:

1. If a moral person has been injured, whether it is a universitas of things or a universitas of persons, restitution is to be made to it. But if a society pursues only a dishonest end, and therefore lacks the right of existing, possessing, etc., restitution per se and pro rata is to be made to the individual members. Since this can scarcely be done in practice, there will easily be reason to spend the sum to be restored, for example, on the poor or on a pious cause; all the more because the individual members, for the most part, do not suffer grave damage. I have said "only a dishonest end"; for otherwise the answer must be different, if the society also pursues a legitimate end.

2. What has been said, which it is especially useful to note, is also to be applied to an insurance society; and this holds even if that society has shareholders, or has reinsured its damages with another society. For it, as voluntarily injured by you, has a strict right to restitution; all the more because a contract has often also been added, which you would not call unjust.

Objection. In determining the price to be paid annually, the society also takes account of damages voluntarily to be inflicted, so that it has already provided for itself.

Response. That, considering both the latitude admitted in prices and the aleatory character annexed to the contract, does not prevent the price from being called just.

3. Damages unjustly inflicted on the republic can be restored to causes, for example Catholic schools, etc., which receive or have received subsidies less than just.

1011 II. In doubt as to whom restitution ought to be made, the following rules hold:

1. If it is unknown to which one out of a few the thing belongs, let it be handed over to those few, who may divide it among themselves according to the proportion of the doubt. If something prevents it from being handed over in that way, let the possessor himself divide it among those few. The reason is that each one has a truly probable right in the thing (St. Alphonsus, III, 589).

2. If it is unknown to which one out of many the thing belongs, the possessor can retain it. For since, in the case supposed, no determinate person has a truly probable right in the thing, and since, as is supposed, there is no hope of acquiring further knowledge, that thing can be held as a thing belonging to no one, or at least be treated as such (n. 798). And this is so not only by a possessor in good faith, which all concede, but, as it seems, also by a possessor in bad faith; for no reason appears why he should seem to be excluded. Nevertheless it is praiseworthily advised that a possessor of this sort spend the thing so possessed on pious causes.

Objection 1. Let no one take advantage from a possession formally unjust.

Response. From a possession formally unjust as such, I concede; from the fact that, on the occasion of such a possession, the thing has now been placed in that condition in which it has become no one's, or in which it can be treated as no one's thing, I deny.

Objection 2. Canon Law[1] prescribes that things accepted through usury or simony be spent on pious causes; and this by custom has been extended to all things accepted from delict.

Response. The new Law is silent about that disposition; this being so, even the custom which extended the disposition of the law, granting that it truly had place, now no longer seems to be binding.

What the law is if the injured owner later appears, see n. 798.

3. If it is unknown precisely to whom, out of many, restitution is to be made, or if many of some commune have been defrauded, for example by a merchant, innkeeper, or baker who sold adulterated merchandise or diminished measures or weights, and it is not known precisely to whom damage was inflicted, restitution per se ought to be made to the ordinary buyers, not to the poor. And restitution can be made, for example, by selling better merchandise or by increasing measures or weights. But if the buyers are not judged to have been gravely injured, the seller is not held under grave sin to restore to the ordinary buyers, but satisfies the grave obligation by restoring to the poor of the place; and he is even excused from venial sin if there is a reasonable cause for restoring to the poor, for example because he cannot restore to the ordinary buyers without suspicion arising about past frauds, or because some poor are in great need, in which case it is licit to presume that the owners are not unwilling. But if the ordinary buyers are judged to have been gravely injured, restitution must be made to them under grave sin, unless again either a proportionate cause is present for restoring to the poor, or the owners, even in the case, are reasonably presumed not to be unwilling (St. Alphonsus, III, 589, 595, with 534, question 2).

4. If it is entirely unknown to whom the thing belongs, the possessor, even in bad faith, can retain it, as was said about the case in which it is unknown to whom out of many the thing belongs.

Corollary I. What was said under 1, 2, and 4 about the possessor is also to be applied to a mere damager. Therefore: 1° if it is unknown to which one out of a few damage was inflicted, restitution is to be made to each according to proportion; 2° if it is unknown to which one out of many, and likewise if it is entirely unknown to whom damage was caused, there is no obligation of restoring.

Corollary II. In the case in which restitution can or must be made to the poor, the debtor himself, if he is poor, can prefer himself (St. Alphonsus, Praxis confessarii, n. 24).

[1] Alexander III, cap. V, De usuris.

Scholion. On the Case in which Someone Cannot Satisfy All Creditors

Preliminary Note. We suppose that the debtor has not yet made cession of goods or cession in court. Now:

1012 I. With regard to natural law:

1. Another's thing existing in itself must be returned to the owner (St. Alphonsus, III, 690).
2. Those who enjoy a hypothec or pledge have preference with respect to the thing obligated to them, unless and insofar as law establishes the contrary.
3. There follow creditors endowed by law with a privilege in certain determinate goods, namely insofar as the law truly grants the privilege.
4. Then come creditors endowed with a privilege in all the goods of the debtor, namely again insofar as the law truly assigns the privilege.
5. Then follow common creditors, to whom, as regards the debtor's obligation, privileged creditors are equated so long as the privilege has not yet become available for execution. Now the debtor, with regard to them, can either satisfy each according to proportion, or make full payment either to the creditor who was earlier in time, or to the creditor asking for full payment, or to both; and divide what remains according to proportion (St. Alphonsus, III, 688, 690-693). Thus we resolve practically; but theoretically:

Disputation 1. Whether the creditor who is earlier in time must be preferred. Some affirm it, because the earlier creditor, although he directly has the person of the debtor obligated, nevertheless indirectly has also the debtor's goods obligated, in which he ought not to be prejudiced by a subsequent creditor. There is added the ancient Rule of Law 54 in the Sext: he who is prior in time is stronger in right. But this is denied sufficiently probably, because not the debtor's goods, but only his person, is obligated to the creditors, and equally to all. Nevertheless, the creditor who is earlier in time can sufficiently probably be preferred, namely with regard to the argument alleged above, which indeed does not prove an obligation of preferring him, but nevertheless argues so strongly on its behalf that one may conclude to liceity (St. Alphonsus, III, 690; cf. St. Thomas, Opusc. 73, chap. 18, at the end).

Disputation 2. Whether the creditor asking for payment can be preferred. Per se it seems this must be denied, because on the one hand the said creditor has only an equal right with the others, and on the other hand, for him as such there is not present, as there is for the earlier creditor, a special title not altogether to be rejected. Appeal is indeed made to ecclesiastical positive law;[1] but that law, even if perhaps formerly it favored the opposite opinion, after the Code of Canon Law can no longer be urged. Nevertheless per accidens the creditor asking for payment seems able to be preferred, because approved custom in commerce so holds. For the same reason it is licit for the creditor to ask for full payment; but the debtor cannot warn some creditor to ask, because on his part he cannot bring it about that the other creditors, who have a right equal to that of the one to be warned, become of worse condition; nor do men who admit payment to one asking approve that someone be warned to ask.

Disputation 3. Whether a poor creditor can be preferred to a rich one; likewise, whether a creditor by reason, for example, of theft committed by the debtor, can be preferred to a creditor from contract.

Response. It seems this must be denied, because the said creditors have only an equal right with the others, nor is there present for them as such, as for the creditor earlier in time, some special title not altogether to be rejected (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 691). Make exception if the poor man is in grave necessity, because then the consent of the other creditors seems able to be presumed (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 691).

Objection 1. A poor man suffers greater damage than a rich man. But restitution is ordered to repairing damage.

Response. I distinguish the major: he suffers greater damage subjectively, because he is poor, I concede; but this is per accidens to restitution. For just as on that account you are not held to restore more to him, so neither are you held to restore sooner to him than to others enjoying an equal right. He suffers greater damage objectively, that is, a violation of a greater and stronger right, I deny. But restitution is ordered to repairing the violated right, or the damage inflicted, objectively.

Objection 2. The owner suffers a greater injury (and therefore has a greater right to restitution) from theft or robbery than from an unobserved contract.

Response. The obligation of restoring does not arise from the personal injury, but from the unjust detention of the thing; and the detention in a contract, once the term of payment has elapsed, is equal and equally unjust as in theft or robbery.

Disputation 4. Whether certain creditors must be preferred to uncertain or unknown creditors, that is, to the poor, etc., who come in place of the uncertain creditors.

Response. Many affirm it, because certain creditors have an immediate right, whereas uncertain creditors have only a remote right, namely insofar as they succeed to unknown creditors. Others deny it, because, as succeeding to unknown creditors, they have a right equal to that of certain creditors. Thus the authors; but we have denied the very obligation of restoring if the creditors are unknown (n. 1011).

Disputation 5. Whether a creditor to whom the debtor has unjustly made full payment is held to restitution.

Response 1. Theoretically it must be affirmed, if the creditor accepted the restitution in bad faith, because he culpably cooperated in an unjust action. Likewise it seems theoretically to be affirmed if he accepted the restitution in good faith, because by retaining the things restored he continues or confirms the unjust act (although not culpable) of accepting full payment (St. Alphonsus, III, 693).

Response 2. Practically he is not held to restitution, because he can ask for the full payment already made; this being posited, he can retain what he received.

6. Finally come creditors by gratuitous title, or, "debts from onerous title must be paid before those which are owed gratuitously, for example from a promise; because these include a tacit condition, unless something stands in the way. Hence the debts of the deceased must be paid before all legacies, even pious ones" (St. Alphonsus, III, 689, 4°).

[1] Pupillus; l. Si non, 6, § 2, ff. de bonis auctoritate iudicis possidendis.

1013 II. Whether and how far civil law tempers natural law, see in the Code of the country. Yet note this: 1° another's thing existing in species is to be returned to the owner; 2° debts from onerous title are to be preferred to debts from gratuitous title.

Article IV. The Time of Restitution

1014 I. Restitution is to be made as soon as it can morally be made. He who cannot restore the entire damage should restore a part, if he can, and should strive according to his powers that he may be able to restore the remaining part. Delay of restitution, if there is question of a grave thing, is a grave sin from its genus, that is, he sins gravely who postpones the restitution of a grave thing for a long time, and he sins lightly who postpones it for a short time, unless grave damage to the owner would follow from the short delay (St. Alphonsus, III, 676, 679; Praxis confessarii, n. 43). A delay, for example, of three weeks is certainly brief (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

II. He who has delayed restitution (or payment) is held to repair the emergent damage and ceasing profit which have followed from the delay and were foreseen at least confusedly, as follows:

1. He is held if he delayed without a legitimate cause, because by illegitimately delaying he placed or continued an unjust cause of damages.
2. He is not held if he delayed from a just cause, with the exception, more probably, of a debtor from delict; because although in the case the delay is not the unjust cause of damages, nevertheless the unjust cause was and remains the delict itself (St. Alphonsus, III, 680, 703, doubt 2).

Corollary. A dying person who is held to restitution (or payment) must be treated in this way:

1. If the dying person is in good faith, he must be warned, unless there is no time for warning, or it is feared that the warning will not be useful.
2. If the dying person was not in good faith, or has been deprived of it by the warning, let him wisely be induced to fulfill the obligation, and indeed immediately, if this can conveniently be done.
3. If the obligation cannot conveniently be fulfilled immediately, then:

a) If the obligation is public, let the dying person take care that it be fulfilled by the heirs, for example by handing over to the creditor a private written instrument completed in legitimate form.

b) If the obligation is hidden, let the sick person either hand over the sum owed to a prudent man, who may remit it to the creditor; or let him bequeath it to the creditor in his testament, if this can be done under some plausible pretext.

Article V. The Place of Restitution

1015 I. He who possesses another's thing in good faith satisfies by returning it where it is; a fortiori he is not held to transmit it elsewhere at his own expense.

II. He who possesses another's thing in bad faith is held to restore it where the owner would have it if it had not been possessed in bad faith; for he must preserve the owner entirely unharmed. Moreover, he is held to transmit it at his own expense, although he can deduct those expenses which the owner also would have made. If the expenses of transmission would be great, the price of the thing can be transmitted from the presumed consent of the owner; indeed they can be so great that transmission of the thing would be demanded irrationally by the owner (St. Alphonsus, III, 598).

III. If another's thing, or its price sent, does not reach the owner, whether because it has perished or for another reason, the following must be said:

1. A possessor in good faith, provided he has used due diligence, is freed; for he is no longer bound either by reason of the thing, which he no longer possesses, or by reason of the transmission, which was owed and, as is supposed, was duly carried out.
2. A possessor from delict per se is not freed, because by force of the delict he is held to render the owner unharmed. Per accidens he is freed if he transmitted the thing in the mode assigned by law or by the judge; likewise if the owner took the danger of the thing upon himself, which happens if he himself received the thing through an intermediary person; if he indicated the mode of transmitting; if he approved the mode proposed by the debtor or prudently to be chosen (St. Alphonsus, III, 704).

Question 1. Whether a debtor from delict is freed who entrusts the things to be restored to the confessor, even if they do not reach the owner.

Response. Many affirm it, because in law the confessor is held as quasi-mandatary of the creditor and therefore can accept the thing in the creditor's name. But St. Alphonsus (III, 704) deservedly prefers the contrary opinion, because the confessor, just as another person, cannot accept the thing in the creditor's name unless the creditor has granted that faculty to him. That he would grant it if asked does not suffice for him to enjoy it here and now.

Question 2. Whether a debtor from delict is freed who, by the counsel or precept of the confessor, has spent the thing to be restored to the owner on the poor or on pious causes.

Response. Negatively, because he has not preserved the creditor unharmed, to which he is held by force of the delict (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). This nevertheless does not prevent that sometimes, on account of the known liberal disposition of the creditor, his consent or condonation can be presumed.

Article VI. The Mode of Restitution

1016 I. In general, any mode is sufficient by which the owner is rendered unharmed. Hence:

1. It is all the same whether restitution is made while the owner notices it or while he does not notice it, for example by increasing the measure or by decreasing the price of merchandise.
2. Restitution can more probably also be made through a simulated donation, that is, by which someone gives under the appearance of giving, but intends to satisfy the debt. If, however, the creditor would give it back, being otherwise not about to give, this donation would be invalid (n. 837) and therefore would have to be restored. A non-simulated donation, that is, one by which someone truly intends to give, does not suffice if someone gives while mindful of the debt, because then he wills that the creditor's right endure. If he gives while forgetful of the debt, it does not suffice if it is evident that the debtor, even if he had been mindful of the debt, would nevertheless have given. Otherwise the matter is disputed. St. Alphonsus and many other authors hold the opinion which affirms it as sufficiently founded, relying on this reason, that each person is presumed to have the habitual will of first satisfying debts from justice (St. Alphonsus, III, 700, question 2). There is added that at least condonation on the part of the donee is reasonably presumed.

3. A debt is also satisfied through restitution (or payment) made by the debtor to the creditor of his own creditor. Make exception if the debtor must restore a determinate thing or a debt of a different species to his creditor; for example, if the debtor owes wheat to his creditor, but the creditor owes money to his own creditor. Besides, restitution (or payment) made in this way, that is, to the creditor of one's creditor, per se seems to be opposed to the order of law.

II. In particular note:

1. Restitution to be made to the republic should be transmitted to the Minister of Finance, who should be asked to announce the restored sum in some public newspaper. Restitution can also be made by burning either obligations of the public treasury, or notes of the public bank, or stamps to be affixed to letters being transported. But if no mode exists by which it is certain that the restitution truly comes to the republic, it can be made to the poor or to other pious causes, for example Catholic schools, to which equitable subsidies are unjustly denied by the republic.
2. Restitution to be made to a municipality, institute, or association should be assigned to the administrators of the goods of the municipality or association.
3. As regards the mode by which household members, that is, spouse, children of the family, and servants, are held or are able to restore, note:

a) Per se they are held to restore from their own goods, if they have any.

b) If they lack goods of their own, or cannot conveniently restore from them, let them restore, for example, by frugality or by extraordinary services; likewise, if there is question of a spouse, by testament, or, if there is question of children of the family, by contributing the sum to be restored into the inheritance to be divided. Nevertheless, there is no obligation to the latter means unless there is question of a large quantity (St. Alphonsus, III, 546).

Article VII. Causes Extinguishing or Suspending the Obligation of Restitution

§ I. Causes Extinguishing the Obligation

The causes which, besides the very fulfillment of the obligation, extinguish it are:

1017 I. Remission or condonation made by the creditor, provided, of course, those things required for valid condonation are present (St. Alphonsus, III, 700, 1°).

Presumed remission for the future suffices, that is, that the creditor would remit it if he were asked, provided he would not do this on account of the petition alone, but on account of, or also on account of, a good affection toward the debtor. The reason is that, in the hypothesis posited, the owner, morally speaking, is now not unwilling with respect to the omission of restitution. If, however, he is unwilling with respect to the mode, that is, with respect to the omission of restitution without express pardon, you are not excused from venial sin (St. Alphonsus, III, 700, question 1).

1018 II. Compensation properly so called, or legal compensation, has place when two persons who are debtors between themselves oppose and extinguish a mutual debt. But what is required by law in the case, see in the Code of the country.

There will be discussion later about compensation improperly so called, or hidden compensation, which can likewise extinguish the obligation of restitution.

1019 III. Composition made by public authority; namely:

1. A sentence of a judge obtained without fraud frees, if the cause was truly doubtful, whether by doubt of law or of fact. Likewise a punitive sentence which, as a punishment for a delict committed by the creditor, absolves the debtor from restitution, is valid also for the internal forum.

2. The Supreme Pontiff can condone restitution owed to pious causes.

In fact, the Roman Pontiffs have not rarely granted condonation of this sort concerning those goods which had been unjustly confiscated by the Government, or had been occupied by private persons and then passed into the hands of the Government. But if there is question of those goods which were usurped by private persons, or even by public authority but in those places where the aforesaid condonation has not been made, Catholic acquirers will not be safe in conscience unless, for the individual case, they have recourse to the Holy See to obtain sanation.[1] The Supreme Pontiff can also remit uncertain spiritual debts, or even certain ones, to be paid by someone, for example Masses to be said. He can remit them, I say, by compensating from the treasury of the Church the detriment which the creditor is going to suffer. Indeed, sometimes he has granted a general faculty of satisfying, by one Mass, for several Masses owed from a stipend accepted. Recourse is made to the Sacred Congregation of the Council; but if the case is hidden, to the Sacred Penitentiary.

3. Prescription can also be referred here, since it sometimes extinguishes the debt itself; it can be referred here, I say, insofar as it receives force from public authority.

[1] Sweens, n. 415.

1020 IV. As to how far the destruction of the thing excuses from restitution, see nn. 983, 990.

Question 1. Whether he is still held to restore or pay who doubts whether he has restored or paid.

Response 1. He who thinks that he has restored or paid is held to nothing. Now he who is generally diligent in paying can, in doubt, rightly think that he has satisfied the obligation. On the contrary, he who thinks that he has not restored or not paid is held to the whole debt (cf. n. 229).

Response 2. It is disputed to what he is held who, all things considered, strictly doubts whether he has restored or paid. Some deobligate him entirely; a few bind him to a part, others to the whole debt; and this opinion seems to have to be admitted. For 1° in doubt the condition of the possessor is better, that is, of that which is prior and continues to persist with equal probability (n. 229). But the creditor's right to restitution or payment is prior to the restitution or payment itself, and in the hypothesis posited persists with equal probability. 2° Natural equity demands that he who is in doubt whether he contracted an obligation of restoring or paying be obligated to nothing; and, I say, that he who is in doubt whether he has satisfied a contracted obligation be bound to the whole debt (St. Alphonsus, III, 700, question 2; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 1, n. 20).

Objection 1. It is not equitable that the whole debt be paid to him who indeed had a certain right, but here and now has only a doubtful right.

Response 1. I turn the argument back; since with the same right it can be said: it is not equitable that nothing be paid by him who doubtfully did not contract the debt.

Response 2. That is equitable, provided it is admitted that nothing is to be paid by the same person if he only doubtfully contracted the debt. Once this is admitted, and it is now commonly admitted, equity precisely demands that he pay the whole if he certainly contracted the debt and only doubtfully satisfied it.

Objection 2. In doubt the condition of the possessor is better. But the debtor possesses the thing, for example his own money. Therefore in doubt his condition is better.

Response. I distinguish the major: in doubt as to whose some thing is, the condition of him who possesses it is better, I concede (n. 777). In doubt whether the one possessing the thing has satisfied the obligation of yielding it to another, posited that the said obligation certainly existed and with equal probability continues to persist, the condition of the possessor is better, I deny, on account of the reasons given.

§ II. Causes Suspending the Obligation

1021 The causes which suspend the obligation of restoring are enumerated:

I. The impotence of the debtor, whether physical or moral. As regards physical impotence, the matter is clear; as regards moral impotence, it is deduced from the fact that the creditor in the case would demand restitution irrationally. To impotence belong:

1. The necessity of the debtor or of his own, that is, of wife, children, parents, or, as others add, of the other ascendants and descendants, indeed of brothers and sisters. Necessity excuses: 1° when the debtor lacks the means with which he can satisfy; 2° when by restoring the debtor would be cast into extreme or quasi-extreme necessity. Make exception if the creditor is already in the same necessity, and "precisely by reason of that subtraction or taking away has been cast into extreme necessity, because to take from someone a thing necessary for life itself is the same as killing him; whence in the case the condition of the owner who possessed first ought to be better" (St. Alphonsus, III, 701); 3° when by restoring the debtor would be cast into grave necessity. Make exception if the creditor is already in necessity of this sort, or in graver necessity, because then the condition of the creditor ought to prevail; 4° when both creditor and debtor are already in grave necessity; for then the debtor, by restoring, would be cast into a much worse condition than the creditor. Make exception if the thing taken away exists in species, or if the creditor precisely through that taking away has come into grave necessity (St. Alphonsus, III, 701, 702, 703).
2. Damage in his own affairs much greater than that which will follow for the creditor from the delay. Hence, for example, you are not held to sell your things for much less than they are worth. But ceasing profit is not a cause for delaying restitution; for it is not equitable that the creditor be deprived of his thing or his debt so that the debtor may gain profit from them. Make exception if the creditor would suffer no damage from the delay, or if there is founded hope that by delaying restitution the debtor could so gain that he would satisfy all the creditors; for then it seems that the creditor ought to suffer some delay (St. Alphonsus, III, 697).

3. Damage to himself or to his own in goods of a higher order, such as infamy, imprisonment, etc., unless the loss of the higher good is minimal with respect to the damage which the creditor undergoes (St. Alphonsus, III, 698). Hence, for example, a notary is not held, with danger of infamy, to disclose a false instrument made by himself in order to repair the damage which followed from it for another. An adulterous woman ought not, with danger to reputation, confess adultery in order to prevent the damage which threatens legitimate children from illegitimate offspring born. A spouse, in order to restore, is not held to reveal to the other spouse what things he or she has unjustly usurped from common goods. A debtor who has made cession of goods, but has unjustly concealed certain things, is not held afterward to reveal this to the creditors, because on account of the fraudulent cession of goods he would expose himself to danger of a very grave punishment. Nevertheless, he is held in another way, if he can, to repair the damage given.

4. Ejection from a justly acquired status. According to many, this reason excuses even then when someone by his own vice, for example by feasting, gaming, etc., has come to such necessity. I have said, however, justly acquired; for no one is excused from restitution on account of the loss of a status unjustly acquired, unless the injustice is hidden, in which case he is excused by reason of infamy. For the rest, ejection from a justly acquired status is nowadays to be urged somewhat less than before; both because ejections of this sort occur much more frequently, and because more people can more easily turn aside to another place, there to bear a lower status without confusion. Gluttons and gamblers also are not worthy of such great commiseration. Moreover note that even those who have justly acquired a status have the obligation of abstaining from superfluous expenses, indeed also of procuring for themselves, with some diminution of status, the faculty of restoring gradually and in parts (St. Alphonsus, III, 702).

1022 II. Damage that will follow either to the creditor himself or to a third party, namely from the fact that the creditor is going to abuse the thing restored, whether for sinning or for harming another. "When the thing to be restored," says St. Thomas, "appears to be harmful to him to whom restitution is to be made, or to another, it ought not then to be restored to him; because restitution is ordered to the utility of him to whom it is restored: for all things that are possessed fall under the aspect of the useful; nor nevertheless ought he who detains another's thing to appropriate it to himself, but either to reserve it so that he may restore it at a fitting time, or even hand it over to another to be kept more safely" (II-II, q. 62, a. 5, ad 1). Indeed, in the case there is per se an obligation of delaying restitution, an obligation, I say, either of charity, if there is question of the creditor himself, or of justice, if there is question of a third party, because in the case restitution would take on the character of cooperation toward the damage of the third party (St. Alphonsus, III, 697).

Scholion. On Juridical Delay of Payment, on Voluntary Cession of Goods, and on Cession in Court

1023 I. Juridical delay of payment consists in this: once it has been pronounced and while it endures, the debtor cannot be forced to pay debts; yet some of these are usually excepted by law. Now juridical delay of payment, as is clear from the nature of the matter, does not excuse from payment to be made afterward, if it can be made; nor from the obligation of applying means, if there are any, by which the debtor may be made capable of paying the debts. For the rest, one must stand by the dispositions of the law and of the judge.

1024 II. Voluntary cession of goods consists in this: that the debtor, with the creditors consenting, cedes his goods so that the debts may be paid from them. It does not transfer ownership of the goods to the creditors, but gives them the right of selling them. For the rest, note:

1. The obligations of him who has made cession of goods are usually determined by the agreement itself.
2. To judge whether or not cession of goods frees from payment of the residue, the agreement should be inspected, and that agreement as ordered by law, and usage. If, after these have been inspected, it is sufficiently evident that the debtor is not freed, neither can condonation be presumed. If law, agreement, or usage does not settle the matter, let it be seen whether condonation by all or some of the creditors can be presumed. If doubt persists, the obligation of paying persists, because in doubt the condition of the creditor is better.

1025 III. Cession in court consists in this: that the goods of the debtor are juridically seized, so that they may finally come to the creditors. For the rest, note:

1. The obligations of him who has made cession in court are determined by the judge in conformity with law.
2. To judge whether or not one who has made cession in court is freed from the residual debt, again the agreement should be inspected, if any has been entered into, and that agreement as it has been ordered by law, and usage. If, after these have been considered, it is sufficiently clear that the debtor is not freed, neither can condonation be presumed. If law, agreement, or usage does not settle the cause, again let it be seen whether condonation by all or by some can be presumed. If doubt persists, the obligation of paying persists.

Corollary I. He who foresees that he will be unable to satisfy his creditors sins against justice by squandering goods, by neglecting means of improving the state of his fortune, and by contracting new debts without necessity.

Corollary II. Likewise he injures justice who by fraud or by other unjust means induces creditors to a composition, or to one more favorable than just.

Corollary III. He who has made cession in court is held to stand by the dispositions of the law and of those who apply the law; and this from commutative justice, because the law justly determines the rights of creditors. Hence, for example, he sins who reserves for himself part of his goods besides those which are granted by the judge. If, however, he justly judges that the law does not sufficiently provide for him, namely so that he and his own may be able to live sparingly, he can secretly retain something for himself, and to the judge interrogating him he can respond that he has concealed nothing, understanding: nothing which it is illicit to conceal; indeed it is also lawful to confirm the assertion with an oath. But here one must proceed cautiously, because those who make cession of goods or cession in court easily exaggerate their necessities; for this reason others should not easily concur with them in concealing goods. Finally note canon 122, which establishes concerning clerics: for clerics who are forced to satisfy creditors, those things necessary for their honorable support, according to the prudent judgment of the ecclesiastical judge, are to be preserved, while nevertheless their obligation of satisfying creditors as soon as possible remains firm.

Chapter III. On Injustice and Restitution in Particular Cases

Injustice and restitution can regard: 1° goods of fortune; 2° goods of the body; 3° goods of the soul; 4° the good of modesty and chastity; 5° the good of reputation; 6° the good of honor; 7° the good of secrecy. Each must be discussed.

Article I. On Goods of Fortune

Goods of fortune can be injured both by theft and by mere damaging. An unjust or unfulfilled contract and the taking away of a thing from a legitimate possessor can be added. It suffices to speak of the first two, because enough has been said about the others in their own place. For the rest, all these modes of injuring goods, as such, do not differ in species.

§ I. On Theft

Point I. On Theft in General

1026 I. Notion. Theft, taken in the broader sense, is taken for every unjust injury in goods of fortune. Taken in the stricter sense it is defined: the occupation of another's thing while the owner is reasonably unwilling. It is said:

1. Occupation, that is, taking away with the intention of making the thing one's own, or at least of treating it as one's own. Hence he is not guilty of theft who takes wine away from someone so that he may not become drunk, or a sword so that he may not kill someone.
2. While the owner is unwilling, namely with respect to the occupation. Therefore I note that, morally speaking, he is now not unwilling if, being asked, he would consent, provided he would not do this on account of the petition alone, but on account of, or also on account of, a good affection toward the person taking it away. If, however, the owner is unwilling with respect to the mode, that is, with respect to occupation without express permission, you are not excused from venial sin (St. Alphonsus, III, 700, question 1).
3. While reasonably unwilling, again with respect to the occupation. Moreover, in general the owner is irrationally unwilling if he refuses to yield a thing which is owed either from justice or from piety (n. 779); otherwise, if it is owed from charity alone. Hence a poor man is guilty of theft who, placed in necessity that is simply grave, occupies the owner's thing; but not a wife who, placed in a similar necessity, against her husband's will takes goods necessary for herself (St. Alphonsus, III, 519).

1027 II. Division. Theft is distinguished into simple theft and robbery. Simple theft is when a thing is taken away while the owner is ignorant of it, or at least without physical or moral force. Robbery is when theft is committed while the owner is present and positively resisting, with force being employed, whether physical or moral, for example unjust fear. Each is called sacrilegious if a sacred thing is taken away.

1028 III. Morality. 1. Theft is a grave sin from its genus, or grave or light according as it regards grave or light matter. Theft which regards grave matter is a grave sin, as is clear both from Sacred Scripture[1] and from the reason alleged where injustice in general was discussed (n. 978; cf. St. Thomas, II-II, q. 59, a. 4; q. 66, a. 6; St. Alphonsus, III, 518). Nevertheless:

a) "It is not mortal, speaking per se, to steal any sum whatever with the intention of restoring immediately, for example within a quarter of an hour" (St. Alphonsus, III, 531). But

b) "It is grave, although not in the species of theft, if the thief knows that from the loss of a small thing a very great annoyance will follow for the owner; for example, because he was greatly attached to it, and a similar thing cannot be recovered: unless, however, the thing is of no importance at all" (St. Alphonsus, III, 526).

2. Simple theft and robbery differ in species, since robbery adds to theft the species of personal injury. Sacrilegious theft adds to both the species of sacrilege[2] (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 66, a. 4; St. Alphonsus, III, 518).

3. It remains to determine what matter is grave. Now:

a) Matter both relatively grave and absolutely grave must be established. It is said:

α) Matter relatively grave, that is, matter which is grave considering the condition of him from whom it is taken away. For the gravity of theft also depends on the gravity of the damage which is inflicted on someone. But the gravity of damage is different according as the condition of him on whom it is inflicted is different (St. Alphonsus, III, 527). Here, however, it can be asked whether, in establishing matter relatively grave, account must also be taken of the owner's special and reasonable affection toward some thing which in itself is of lesser value, for example toward a collection of letters from a dear person. Now it seems this must be affirmed, because on account of the special affection the thing is of greater value to the owner, so that for this reason it could be sold for more, and therefore greater damage is inflicted on him.

β) Matter absolutely grave regards the quantity by which the thief is enriched, rather than the damage inflicted on the neighbor. It is called absolutely grave because it is always held as grave, even with respect to the very rich. And it must be admitted, because the act of occupying and having another's thing as such, according to its proper concept, that is, with abstraction made from the damage which is inflicted on the neighbor, involves disorder; in a word: justice forbids inflicting damage on someone and occupying and having another's thing, or, to use the words of St. Alphonsus, "the precept of not stealing obligates not only that grave damage not be inflicted on the neighbor, but also that no one be enriched from another's thing" (Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, n. 28). Moreover, if the aforesaid act involves disorder, with abstraction made from the damage inflicted, one must finally arrive at grave matter, even if the individuals from whose goods someone is enriched do not suffer grave damage.[3]

b) For matter grave, whether relatively or absolutely grave, a greater sum is required the smaller the value of money is; hence for grave sin a greater quantity is required now than formerly, and a greater quantity, for example, in North America than in Europe. Finally a greater quantity is required the less unwilling the owners are judged to be.

c) Considering the things we have just noted, the matter can be more determinately stated for our regions in this way:

α) With respect to a poor person: 1 florin; with respect to workers: 3 florins; with respect to citizens of middle fortune: 5 florins; with respect to the rich: 10 florins. The reason is that the assigned sums, with respect to the assigned persons, are judged to inflict grave harm. With respect to the very rich, absolutely grave matter holds; but the sum of 25 florins can be held as absolutely grave matter.

If there is question of a sacred thing, the gravity of the matter must be judged from the dignity and rarity of the thing. Hence, as regards relics, grave matter is lacking "if someone steals some very small thing, not deforming the relic itself, nor diminishing its esteem: unless it is some notable or rare relic, as for example of the Holy Cross" (St. Alphonsus, III, 532).

β) For spouses and children of the family, a sum twice as great can be established, so that, for example, the child of rich parents would sin gravely if he stole 20 florins from his parents. Indeed, if there is question of spouses, a latitude somewhat greater than for children is admitted. The reason for these things is "that the parent (and spouse) is less unwilling, and the child is something of the father" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, n. 32), and spouses constitute one thing. Moreover, sometimes they are in no way unwilling, or are unwilling only about the mode, so that there can be no question of theft. Finally spouses and parents easily condone thefts committed by the spouse and by children if they have been consumed, so that there is no obligation of restoring (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). If there is an obligation, compare what was said about the mode of restoring in n. 1016.

Note moreover that a wife and children of the family do not steal by taking secretly what is necessary for food and clothing, if the father refuses to grant these things. But as regards those things which are judged to be required by children for recreations fitting to their condition, great prudence is needed if these are denied by the parents. For children are usually more inclined to squander money, whereas parents often have excellent reasons for denying what is desired.

γ) As regards servants, if there is question of money or of a thing carefully guarded, the same quantity as for outsiders suffices. But it is commonly admitted that, by stealing eatables and drinkables, they do not easily arrive at grave sin, provided they themselves consume them, and do not sell them or carry them out of the house, and there is no question of a thing diligently guarded (St. Alphonsus, III, 545; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, n. 34).

δ) As regards religious, in eatables and drinkables what was said about servants holds; in other thefts from the goods of the monastery, a greater quantity is required for grave matter than in thefts by outsiders, but a lesser quantity than in thefts by children (St. Alphonsus, IV, 24).

Here, however, note that the diverse opinions of theologians about the quantity required for grave sin are not to be explained to the people or to penitents.

Corollary I. Considering the notion of theft, sometimes very small things can be secretly taken without sin, for example one apple or another from an orchard by someone passing by, etc.; as regards very small things, owners for the most part are not judged to be unwilling. If, however, the orchard, etc., is fenced in, the owner is reasonably unwilling with respect to entrance into his territory.

Corollary II. He who cuts wood in another's forest or pastures animals in another's pastures:

1. Does not sin if the forests or pastures belong to some commune, and there is question of inhabitants of that commune, unless, as regards forests, great devastation is done. Otherwise the prohibition can be held as merely penal, and even as such it is not judged to extend to dry branches.
2. Sins if the forests or pastures belong to some private person, or at least have been leased by a private person. Nevertheless, commonly owners are judged to grant that dry branches may be collected (St. Alphonsus, III, 529). For the rest, in these matters custom must also be attended to.

Corollary III. He who, from money entrusted to him by a society, steals a sum with the intention of returning it, sins, because the owners, on account of the danger of damage, are reasonably gravely unwilling. But what quantity is required for grave sin depends in great part on the gravity of the danger.

[1] Zech. 5:3; Hab. 2:16; Exod. 20:15; 1 Cor. 6:10.

[2] According to others, both robbery and sacrilege constitute one species of sin, as if coalescing from two, yet distinct from simple theft.

[3] Others argue from the grave damage which, according to the contrary opinion, would threaten society or even individual persons; but an intrinsic reason of strict injustice is lacking. Others judge that in the case posited the right of the republic is gravely injured. But the private owner alone, and not the republic as such, enjoys a strict right in the goods of others.

Point II. On Minor Thefts in Particular

1029 I. One sins gravely by minor thefts:

1. When someone commits a light theft with the intention of committing a grave one if the occasion were present (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 66, a. 7, ad 3).
2. When someone steals light things with the intention of arriving gradually at grave matter. In the case the thief already sins gravely by the first theft; namely, although the execution of the individual thefts is externally light, nevertheless insofar as it is subject to a gravely evil intention, it is gravely evil. Nonetheless, those several little thefts seem to be morally united from that intention and therefore to coalesce into only one sin in number (St. Alphonsus, III, 533).
3. When someone, after minor thefts retained either in themselves or in equivalent, finally and advertently completes grave matter; and it is all the same whether the retained thefts were committed against the same owner or against diverse owners. The reason is that the act of retaining another's thing in itself contains disorder, and therefore, if there is question of grave matter, grave disorder (n. 1028). In this hypothesis the thief sins gravely by that very theft which completes grave matter, unless he has the intention of restoring at least the last little theft quickly. But if, after grave matter has been completed, he again commits a minor theft, according to some he increases and continues the prior mortal sin and therefore sins gravely; according to St. Alphonsus and others, he does not sin gravely unless he reaches another new grave quantity (III, 538). In the case, however, it is posited that the new little theft was not intended from the beginning; but if this had happened, there would indeed be an increase and continuation of the prior mortal sin.
4. When someone, after minor thefts not indeed retained, but following at a brief interval and committed against the same owner, completes grave matter. I have said at a brief interval, because then they are apt to inflict grave damage and therefore the owner is gravely unwilling; not so if they are separated by a longer interval. For the rest, the greater the quantity taken away on individual occasions is, the greater the interval required so that they do not coalesce (St. Alphonsus, III, 530).

If there is question of a quantity which is near to grave matter, St. Alphonsus requires an interval of at least two months (III, 530).

5. When several, by conspiracy, each take light things from someone, which together constitute grave matter. The reason is that the total damage is imputed to each one (St. Alphonsus, III, 535, 536).

But "if several, either simultaneously or successively, commit several small thefts against someone, which taken together gravely harm him, then, if one does not know about the other, no one sins gravely" (St. Alphonsus, III, 535). If each one is moved by the example of another, by reason of scandal they sin against charity, and indeed gravely if the matter is grave. Moreover, more probably they also sin against justice, insofar as they cooperate in injustice by giving an example that will be followed, as was said about indirect scandal (n. 548). But by reason of this injustice one is not held to restitution, because for this it is required that someone have been an efficacious cause, not merely an occasional cause, of the damage.

6. Finally, as is clear, theft light in itself can become grave by reason of damaging, as if someone steals an instrument of lesser value, for example a tailor's needle, which someone needs in order to be able to support himself.

1030 II. As regards the quantity required in minor thefts for grave sin, the following rules hold:

1. First note in advance that in the cases related under 1, 2, 3, and 5, the general doctrine set forth on p. 676 holds.

2. But if there is question of minor thefts not retained, but following at a brief interval, a greater quantity is required, both because the owners are less unwilling, and because they commonly suffer less damage in the case. It can be established with St. Alphonsus: 1° one and a half times the amount, if the little thefts are made at different times against the same owner, or at the same time against diverse owners; 2° a double sum, if they are made at different times against diverse owners (III, 530). For the rest, theoretically, further degrees can still be distinguished between these rules, considering the person of the thief and the end by which he is led, the nature of the things taken away, and finally the greater or lesser interval.

1031 III. He who, after minor thefts retained, finally completed grave matter, or who by minor thefts not indeed retained, but following at a brief interval and committed against the same owner, arrived at grave matter, is held under grave sin to restitution, at least to such an extent that there no longer remains grave matter to be restored (St. Alphonsus, III, 533, 534). If, however, the little thefts were committed against diverse owners, the thief is not held under grave sin to restore to those owners themselves, because the individual owners were injured only lightly; according to the authors he satisfies the grave obligation if he restores to the poor or to other pious causes, indeed he also does this without sin if there is a reasonable cause for doing so (St. Alphonsus, III, 534, question 20).

Question. How great is the obligation of restoring if a thief, by minor thefts retained neither in themselves nor in equivalent, but following at a brief interval and committed against the same owner, did indeed arrive at grave matter, but subjectively sinned only venially?

Response. The obligation of restoring does not seem to be grave; not by reason of matter retained, because it is posited as not retained; nor by reason of the acts which were posited, because, as merely venial, they do not induce a grave obligation (n. 995). It remains, therefore, that we say the thief is held under venial sin to restore each little theft.

Corollary. "Confessors are to be warned by me that they should not easily dissemble even in minor thefts, and those which do not reach mortal sin; but according to the condition and capacity of the persons, they should always impose some restitution, which may be made either by returning the same thing, if it exists, or a thing of the same species, or the price of the thing, or by compensating with greater service than they are held to by contract; or, if they cannot restore to the creditors, by contributing the same amount to the poor. For in this way, when they do not pass away unpunished, they are deterred from sins of this sort more than by other little penances; otherwise they become more ready for little thefts of this sort, and make a step toward greater ones."[1]

[1] Lessius, l. 2, c. 12, n. 50.

Point III. On Causes Excusing the Taking Away of Another's Thing

The causes which excuse the taking away of another's thing are necessity and hidden compensation.

1032 I. Necessity excuses, as follows:

1. Extreme necessity excuses to this extent, that it is licit to take away what is necessary for succoring the necessity, even a thing of great or extraordinary value. For the division of things proceeding from a human fact can have force only to the extent that it does not prejudice the primary end of things, which is to provide for the life of men. But it would prejudice that end if it were illicit, in extreme necessity, to consume another's thing, or, if only use is necessary, to use it (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 66, a. 7; St. Alphonsus, III, 520).
2. Quasi-extreme necessity excuses to this extent, that it is licit to take away ordinary things, but not extraordinary and choice things. The reason is that such necessity differs little from extreme necessity. Many exclude extraordinary and choice things, because otherwise the character of private ownership seems to be too much restricted, and public order to be exposed to danger more than is fitting (St. Alphonsus, III, 520; cf. St. Thomas, loc. cit., ad 2).

Corollary I. He who is in extreme or quasi-extreme necessity is per se held to ask for another's thing before he occupies it. For the rights of private ownership ought to be judged restricted only to the extent that the primary end of things demands it. But that end does not demand that the owner lack the faculty of assigning the thing by which the necessity of the neighbor may be relieved; but given that faculty, the petition of the neighbor must precede. There is added that otherwise all beggars who lack necessary things could steal what belongs to another, without acquiring it for themselves by begging; and this would necessarily harm order (St. Alphonsus, III, 520, question 2). Make exception: 1° if a determinate thing is absolutely necessary for someone, either because another cannot be obtained, or because another would not suffice; for then there can be no question of assigning the thing, since it has already been assigned. Make exception 2° if the owner is foreseen as about to refuse the petition, because no one is held to what is useless (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Corollary II. What is licit for relieving one's own necessity is also licit for succoring another's necessity. Yet if someone can succor the needy person from his own goods, he is held to that from charity, rather than to steal another's goods (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, n. 15).

Corollary III. If it is asked from what virtue someone is held to succor one who is in extreme or quasi-extreme necessity, I respond: he is held from charity to succor him spontaneously; if he does not succor him spontaneously, he is held from justice not to impede the needy person from providing for himself (St. Alphonsus, III, 520, question 3).

3. Grave necessity (a fortiori common necessity) does not excuse. This is clear first from proposition 36 condemned by Innocent XI: It is permitted to steal, not only in extreme necessity, but also in grave necessity. The reason, moreover, is that the primary end of things, which is that life be provided for, does not demand such a restriction of private ownership. There is added that the contrary doctrine would give occasion to innumerable takings away of another's things. Nevertheless, it is licit for a poor man, for relieving grave necessity, to steal some light thing, "judging probably that the wealthy owner, from mercy, is not unwilling, at least with respect to the substance. But the use of this epikeia ought not to be easy, nor in grave matter; because then the rich would also be reasonably unwilling with respect to the substance" (St. Alphonsus, III, 520, at the end).

4. An obligation of restoring after the necessity has passed is present as follows:

a) If the occupied thing still exists, it must be restored, because only the use, not ownership, was necessary (St. Alphonsus, III, 520, question 5).

b) If the thing has been consumed, the one taking it away is held to restitution if he was not absolutely poor, that is, if he had goods of his own or hope of obtaining them; for it sufficed to receive the thing as a loan. The contrary must be said, for the contrary reason, if he was poor both in thing and in hope. And this holds sufficiently probably even if someone had unjustly stolen the thing before the necessity. The reason is that the obligation of restoring contracted from unjust acceptance is extinguished by the very fact that the thief makes the stolen thing simply his own and consumes it (St. Alphonsus, III, 520, questions 4 and 5).

1033 II. Hidden compensation consists in this: that the creditor, without the debtor's knowledge, procures for himself from the debtor's goods that to which he has a right. It is just and licit, provided the due conditions are observed. It is required:

1. That there be a strict right, and that it be liquid or exigible.
2. That there be a certain right. If it is doubtful, the condition of the possessor is better. Yet some judge that compensation has place when the doubt regards not the fact, for example injury to reputation, which is supposed to be certain, but the right, namely, in the hypothesis posited, the right to compensation through goods of fortune, so that, for example, someone certainly defamed could compensate himself with money for reputation not repaired (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 544, with the editor's note).

He who has secretly compensated himself with a doubtful right is held to restore the thing if he began to possess in doubtful faith; otherwise, if he proceeded in good faith and cannot overcome the doubt (n. 992).

3. That the debt cannot conveniently be obtained by another way. Namely, one secretly compensating himself per se, although only venially, "sins against common justice, while he usurps for himself judgment of his own thing, with the order of law passed over" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 66, a. 5, ad 3). He sins only venially because, provided the thing is owed, public order is not gravely disturbed.

Moreover, insofar as it can be done, a thing of the same species as the thing owed is to be taken; likewise, insofar as it can be done, care should be taken that another, for example a servant, not come under suspicion of theft; finally one must beware lest the debtor pay again, for example by remitting the debt, as it were (St. Alphonsus, III, 521; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 10, n. 21).

Corollary. Hidden compensation is often illicit, namely because the required conditions are lacking. Hence the confessor should be very prudent in permitting it; wherefore proposition 37 condemned by Innocent XI is to be noted: "Male and female domestic servants can secretly steal from their masters to compensate their labor, which they judge greater than the wage which they receive."[1] This proposition was deservedly condemned, both because sometimes they so judge too lightly, and because a wage per se less than the work rendered can per accidens be just (n. 917), and because, even if the wage is less than just, there is not always a just cause for obtaining what is owed to oneself by this reason, but per se a greater wage ought first to be asked (St. Alphonsus, III, 522-524).

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1187.

Point IV. On Mere Damaging in Goods of Fortune

1034 What has been said about theft in general and about minor thefts in particular is also to be applied to damaging in general and to minor damages in particular. Nevertheless, in particular:

Question 1. Whether even in mere damaging there must be admitted matter absolutely grave, that is, matter which even with respect to the very rich must be held as grave.

Response. It must be affirmed, because the act, for example, of destroying another's thing as such, according to its proper concept, that is, with abstraction made from the damage which is inflicted on the neighbor, involves disorder. But if it involves disorder, one must finally arrive at grave matter (p. 676).

Question 2. How great is the obligation of restoring if someone, through several minor damages following at a brief interval and done against the same owner, finally arrived at grave matter, but subjectively sinned only venially?

Response. The obligation is not grave in practice, because venial sins sufficiently probably do not induce a grave obligation (p. 649). It remains, therefore, that we say the damager is held under venial sin to restore each minor damage.

Article II. On Goods of the Body

Goods of the body are injured through homicide and mutilation. But damages that will follow from these can be distinguished into spiritual, corporal, and temporal damages. Each must be discussed.

1035 I. Spiritual damages consist in this: that the one killed is deprived of the last sacraments, of time for meriting, etc. Moreover, they must be restored only if both the damage that followed is certain and the damage can truly be compensated; for example, if the killer prevented Masses from being celebrated which the one killed certainly would have taken care to have celebrated for his soul.

1036 II. Corporal damages consist in deprivation of life, of a member, of health, and in the endurance of pain. There is no obligation of restoring these through goods of fortune (n. 980). Nevertheless, there is an obligation, not indeed by way of restitution for the lost member, but for the expenses that followed from it, of assigning goods of fortune to the injured person insofar as he wishes to substitute an artificial member for the member taken away.

1037 III. Temporal damages are distinguished into damages inflicted on the injured person himself and damages inflicted on third parties.

1. Damages inflicted on the injured person himself consist in the expenses of treatment, yet with those things deducted which he, if healthy, would have had to spend on food; likewise in emergent damage or ceasing profit for the time in which the injured person still lived and had to cease from labor. Restitution must be made according to the valuation of the hope of obtaining the goods, and indeed to the injured person himself or, if he has died, to his heirs. But if the killer does not restore these things, his heirs are held to restitution, unless the injured person has condoned them. "When remission of the injury has been made, remission of the damages is not understood to have been made" (St. Alphonsus, III, 630, 631).

Question 1. Whether something can be deducted from restitution of ceasing profit for the labor which the injured person would have had to spend in order to obtain the profit.

Response. Some affirm it; others seem rightly to deny it, for by his unjust action the killer caused the deprivation of the whole profit; hence he is also held to restore the whole profit. Yet in practice "Bonacina reasonably reconciles the opinions, saying that only that should be subtracted which the one killed is presumed to have been willing to give for the redemption of the labor" (St. Alphonsus, III, 639).

Question 2. Whether the heirs of the killer are freed from the obligation of restoring if the killer is punished with death.

Response. It seems this must be denied, because the penalty is judged to have been imposed only to satisfy vindicative justice, not commutative justice. Nevertheless, the heirs are excused from restitution if compensation for damages is not sought, because then the parties are presumed to condone, unless the thing still existed, or unless the damage was very grave (St. Alphonsus, III, 705).

2. Damages inflicted on third parties can chiefly regard the family, that is, parents, wife, and children; other blood-relatives; those to whom the one killed was doing good; and the creditors of the one killed. Now:

a) Damages inflicted on the family consist in deprivation of the support which the one killed was procuring for it, and likewise of the profit which he would still have procured for it. By the consent of all, these must be restored. The reason is deduced from the fact that the killer injured not merely a physical person, but, as it were, a moral person; a moral person, I say, which the others constituted with the person killed. Hence restitution is to be made to them (St. Alphonsus, III, 631). Nevertheless, "nothing is restored for funeral expenses, because those eventually would have had to be made at some time; unless perhaps, on the occasion of the death inflicted, for example outside the homeland, it was necessary for greater expenses to be made" (St. Alphonsus, III, 631). For the rest, restitution again must be made according to the valuation of the hope of obtaining those goods (St. Alphonsus, III, 631, question 2). A right norm will be the one which insurance societies follow on the occasion of an adverse event.

Question 1. Whether restitution is to be made to the family if it can conveniently provide for itself.

Response. Affirmatively; since the fact that the family can provide for itself does not prevent its right from having been injured; but from an injured right there arises the obligation of restoring. Yet the killer is not held to restore if the family receives from another what it would have received from the injured person, for example, "if the wife (and the same would have to be said of children and parents) afterward has married equally conveniently, nothing is to be restored to her; because then in reality she does not suffer damage" (St. Alphonsus, III, 631, question 1).

Question 2. Whether the injured person can remit the restitution owed to the family.

Response. Many deny it, because no one can remit restitution owed to another; but with St. Alphonsus and others it seems this must be affirmed, because the right of the family is entirely subordinated to the right of the father. Hence just as the father can validly transfer goods into another's ownership, so too he can validly remit restitution for them. But here again note: "When remission of the injury has been made, remission of the damages is not understood to have been made" (St. Alphonsus, III, 630).

b) Damages inflicted on other blood-relatives do not have to be restored: neither by reason of the good from the obtaining of which he impeded them, because they did not have a strict right to it; nor by reason of the means employed, since it would be unjust only with respect to the one killed. For the same reason the same must be said about the poor to whom the one killed was doing good, and about others who would have received certain things from the testament (St. Alphonsus, III, 632).

c) Damages inflicted on creditors likewise do not seem to have to be restored. It is indeed true that they are impeded, as we suppose, from obtaining a good in which they had a strict right; but they are not impeded by the killer, but by the heirs or by the law exempting the heirs, while the killer is only an occasional cause (St. Alphonsus, III, 634).

Nevertheless, St. Alphonsus and others judge that the enumerated damages must be restored if the killer acted with the intention of harming the enumerated persons (n. 996).

Corollary I. He who provokes another to a duel and kills or wounds the provoked man, who freely accepts the contest, is not held to restitution, neither toward the injured person, because he consented to the damage in fortune that would follow, nor toward the family, because the injured person, from whom the family would have received goods, by his own consent prevented him from acting unjustly toward it, since it had only a consequent right in the goods (St. Alphonsus, III, 638).

Corollary II. The one attacked, who deliberately exceeded the measure of blameless defense, seems to be held to restitution for the damages that followed from the excess, because the excess was truly unjust (St. Alphonsus, III, 637).

Objection. The attacker knowingly and willingly exposed himself to the danger that the one attacked would exceed the measure of blameless defense; but no injury is done to one who knows and wills.

Response. He who knowingly and willingly exposes himself to the danger that his right be injured is not therefore judged to yield his right.

Corollary III. What has been said about damages following from homicide is also to be applied to damages arising from wounding and other injuries of the body.

Article III. On Goods of the Soul

1038 Goods of the soul are distinguished into natural and supernatural goods.

I. Natural goods are: intellect, will, memory, sciences, arts, and the use of these. In this matter, injustice is committed either by unjustly harming someone in the said goods or in their use, for example by inducing someone unwilling or ignorant into drunkenness or by casting him into a hypnotic state; or by unjustly impeding someone from obtaining a good of this sort, for example knowledge; or by not procuring for someone a good, for example an art, although one is held from justice to procure it. Now:

1. He who has committed injustice according to what has been said is held from justice: 1° to remove the cause of the damage, for example fear that has been instilled, and to prevent, insofar as can be done, damages threatening from it; 2° to restore damages or ceasing profit that have followed or will follow for the injured person, for example ceasing profit from the fact that someone is unfit for his office; 3° to return, according to the proportion of negligence, the stipend agreed upon and accepted, if someone, for example, has not duly performed the office of teaching.

Corollary. He who harmed someone only by persuasion, entreaties, or example is commonly not guilty of injustice, and therefore contracts only an obligation of charity. I have said commonly, because he who by persuasion or entreaties led another into a sin of injustice is held from justice to restitution with respect to the injured person.

1039 II. Supernatural goods are: grace, virtues, vocation to the religious state, etc. Now:

1. He who unjustly, for example by lies or fear, led another into a harmful error or into sin, or led him away from a good work, for example from Religion, is held as was said under I about him who unjustly harmed someone in the natural goods of the soul.
2. He who only by persuasion or example led another to evil, or led him away from good, is not held to restitution; nevertheless he is held from charity, more than others, to promote his conversion. There are some who judge that he is held to this from justice; but because he did not sin against justice, no obligation of justice can arise.

Article IV. On the Good of Chastity and Modesty

The goods of chastity and modesty are injured through stuprum and adultery.

§ I. On Stuprum

By the name stuprum here is understood intercourse with an unmarried woman, whether a widow or not a widow, whether honorable or corrupt.

1040 I. If the young woman freely consented, the man committing stuprum per se is held to nothing. He is not held with respect to the young woman, because no injury is done to one who knows and wills, if there is question of a right which someone can validly renounce. But the young woman could validly renounce the right that no one use her body. Nor is he held to anything with respect to the parents, even if, so that the daughter may marry equally well, they must increase the dowry. The reason is that the young woman herself, since with respect to marriage she is in her own right, can close off for herself access to more honorable marriages without being unjust with respect to her parents; but of the damage which the parents perhaps will suffer from the fact that they increase her dowry, she is the occasion rather than the cause. Therefore, if the young woman, consenting to the man committing stuprum, does not act unjustly with respect to her parents, neither does the man committing stuprum, who enticed her to consent (St. Alphonsus, III, 641, doubt 2).

I have said per se; for if the man committing stuprum has divulged the hidden stuprum, he is held to repair the damages that will follow from his unjust detraction, whether toward the young woman or toward the parents, for example by increasing the dowry so that the daughter can marry equally well, or by procuring honorable marriage.

II. If the young woman was unjustly violated, by fraud, fear, or force, he is held to compensate all damages that will follow from the injustice, except the damage of perhaps injured virginity, which cannot be repaired. Hence he is held either to marry the young woman or, if she rejects marriage, which is free to her, to take care in some way that she can marry equally well as if she had not been violated (St. Alphonsus, III, 641, doubt 2).

Corollary I. Entreaties and gifts do not bring with them the obligation just mentioned. But the obligation follows: 1° "if threats or reverential fear are joined with the entreaties; 2° if the entreaties were so importunate and frequent that the young woman judged that harassment a greater detriment than the loss of virginity: for then solicitation so importunate is compared to force ... this nevertheless happens very rarely, since a woman can easily, by conceived anger or otherwise, free herself from the one soliciting her. ... 3° if a man begins by touches and kisses to bring force upon the young woman, even if afterward she freely consents to be deflowered; because through that antecedent violence the man placed her in proximate danger of consenting to intercourse; ... 4° if the man is unwilling to leave, and the virgin consents because otherwise she fears being defamed if she is found alone with him by others. Yet in these and similar cases, the Salmanticenses say that the violator is held only to a part, not to the whole reparation of damages" (St. Alphonsus, III, 641, question 2).

Corollary II. If the man committing stuprum is going to compensate the damages inflicted with money, let him enter into a contract with those who have suffered the damage, and let him pay the established sum at one time, lest dangerous intercourse be continued.[1]

Corollary III. The man committing stuprum is held to nothing, or to restoring only a part, if damages have followed in no way or only partially, as if the young woman can now marry equally well, or if offspring has not followed (St. Alphonsus, III, 641, question 1).

III. If the young woman was led to intercourse by a promise of marriage, the following must be said:

1. If the promise was made seriously, the man committing stuprum, according to what was said in n. 833, sufficiently probably is not held from justice to contract marriage, because a contract of this sort, namely about base matter, is sufficiently probably invalid and remains invalid even if the other party has furnished her part (St. Alphonsus, III, 712). I have said from justice, because per se he is held from piety toward the offspring, if perhaps one has been conceived, as will be explained in the scholion. Moreover, if it is evident that the promise was made under a suppositive condition, the man committing stuprum, according to what was said in n. 849, once the condition has been fulfilled, or intercourse granted, seems to be held from justice to marriage.
2. If the promise was made fictitiously, the man committing stuprum is held to prevent or compensate all damages arising from the intercourse; indeed he is held to fulfill the fictitious promise, or to marry the young woman. For the deceiver is held to furnish that for which the deceived party so furnished her part that the matter can no longer be reduced to its former state; otherwise the injury inflicted is not repaired. But in our case the deceived party furnished her part for obtaining marriage, and the matter can no longer be reduced to its former state. Therefore it remains that the deceiver offer marriage to the deceived party (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 46, a. 2, ad 4; St. Alphonsus, III, 642). Besides, note:

a) True deception, and consequently the obligation of entering marriage, is lacking if the young woman could easily have understood from the circumstances that the promise was not serious; for example, "if the betrothed man is of much better condition, or if there was some evident sign of fraud; because it can probably be presumed that the betrothed woman was not deceived, but feigned that she was being deceived" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.; St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). But if in the case the young woman was ignorant of the man's condition, not even then does the one promising seem to be held to marriage, because the young woman did not think of a promise of such value, and sought only consent of lesser value. "And therefore he who promised is not held to marry her; but it suffices if he repairs the damage by endowing her or by providing for marriage" (St. Alphonsus, III, 642, doubt 2). Finally, the man committing stuprum is not held by the fictitious promise if the young woman also deceived him, for example by pretending that she was a virgin when she was not such; in that case injury is compensated by injury.

b) If the young woman refuses the offered marriage, the man committing stuprum is held to nothing. If only the parents contradict it and are unwilling to hand over the young woman, it is disputed whether the man committing stuprum is freed. Some affirm it, because then he is not held by reason of the fictitious promise, since by it he is held only to marriage; because then the damage does not arise from his fraud, but from the opposition of the parents. Others with St. Alphonsus deny it, because the fictitious promise of marriage was made for this sole end, that the damage be compensated; hence, if marriage cannot be entered, the damage must be compensated in another way (St. Alphonsus, III, 647).

Corollary. The man committing stuprum, in the case in which per se he is held to marriage, is excused from marrying the young woman: 1° "if the worst outcome is feared from the marriage, as if the young woman is known to be too inconstant ... if great scandals or quarrels are feared among the blood-relatives of those contracting ...; 2° if from such a marriage disgrace would come upon the man's family, by reason of disparity of condition" (St. Alphonsus, III, 644); 3° "if the man knew the woman, thinking she was a virgin, but found her corrupt" (St. Alphonsus, III, 646). But much more probably he is not excused on account of a vow of chastity or another similar thing, nor generally on account of another dispensable canonical impediment. In the case he is held to take care that the impediment be removed, since a means of this sort is ordinary and therefore does not bring with it a cause of excusing (St. Alphonsus, III, 649, 650).

What if the young woman was induced by a promise of marriage only to touches?

Response. If the promise was serious, the seducer is not held to marriage, unless again it is evident that the promise was made under a suppositive condition; he is held if it was made fictitiously. Or, theoretically, the same things hold as in the case in which the young woman was led to intercourse by a promise of marriage. But in practice, as regards a fictitious promise, note that commonly true deception, and consequently the obligation of marriage, is lacking, namely because the young woman can scarcely admit that the promise of so great a good, made for touches alone, is serious (St. Alphonsus, III, 645).

[1] Aertnys-Damen, I, n.[†].

Scholion. On the Obligation of the Man Committing Stuprum and of the Woman Subjected to It with Respect to Offspring

1041 I. The man committing stuprum and the woman subjected to it, unless a sufficiently grave impediment stands in the way, are held to legitimate the offspring by a subsequent marriage. If for a just cause they abstain from marriage, per se it should be advised that they legally acknowledge the offspring.

II. They are always held to feed and educate the offspring. Now, with regard to natural law:

1. If the young woman freely consented to the intercourse, each is held to bear expenses for his or her part, until the offspring can provide for itself.
2. If the young woman was violated by fraud, fear, or force, the man committing stuprum alone must bear the aforesaid expenses: from piety toward the offspring, from justice toward the young woman. Let it also be seen what civil law establishes.

Corollary. Parents can hand over an illegitimate child to be educated by a foundling hospital, provided that both a grave cause, for example infamy to be avoided, is present, and the foundling hospital is going to furnish a Catholic education. It is disputed whether parents who are not truly poor are held to restore the expenses to the institute. Moreover, it seems this must be affirmed if, as has place among us, the institutes were erected in favor of the poor; otherwise, if they were expressly erected in favor of abandoned offspring (St. Alphonsus, III, 656). Nevertheless, it should strongly be advised that something be assigned to the hospital.

§ II. On Adultery

Adultery: 1° injures the conjugal right of the legitimate spouse; 2° if it becomes known, inflicts a grave insult on that same spouse; 3° finally brings with it damages in goods of fortune.

The injury to conjugal right cannot be repaired; the insult is compensated by showing sorrow, etc. But especially the damages in goods of fortune must be discussed.

1042 I. Damages to be restored with respect to goods of fortune are distinguished into damages inflicted:

1. On the legitimate husband. They consist in this: that offspring belonging to another is supposed to be fed and educated by the husband. These do not have to be restored if the husband consented to the adultery; otherwise, they do.
2. On legitimate children or other heirs. They consist: 1° in this, that the illegitimate child will share the inheritance of the putative father with the legitimate children; these likewise do not have to be restored if the husband consented to the adultery. Yet if the legitimate portion is injured, the legitimate children can appeal to the law; 2° in this, that the illegitimate child will divide the inheritance of the mother with the legitimate children; these things per se are not to be restored, since the mother can freely dispose of her own goods. Yet if the legitimate portion of the legitimate children is injured, they enjoy the right of appealing to the law; 3° in this, that through error about their condition, testamentary dispositions, inheritances ab intestato, or donations come to illegitimate children, which otherwise would have come to legitimate children or others. Moreover, since these things rest on error, they are invalid, and therefore must be restored by the illegitimate child if he has been convicted of his illegitimacy. I have said: if he has been convicted of his illegitimacy; wherefore note that the spurious child is not held to give credence to his mother, unless proving indications are present (St. Alphonsus, III, 654). The adulterers must restore these things to the legitimate children insofar as their adultery must be called a cause per se; but this must be said of testamentary dispositions and inheritances ab intestato, not always of donations.

1043 II. Persons restoring. 1. If each voluntarily consented to the adultery, each must restore a part;[1] but if one fails, the other is held to the whole, while recourse against the partner remains (St. Alphonsus, III, 651).

2. If the woman was led to adultery by fear or fraud, the adulterer is obligated to restore the whole damage; if he fails, the adulteress is. But the adulterer is held to restore the whole damage even if he did not persuade the woman to substitute the adulterous offspring for the husband. "The chief reason is that although the adulterer merely permits his son to be substituted, nevertheless by begetting the son he is the proximate and direct moral cause of all the damages, since he places the adulteress in the moral necessity of substituting the offspring; from this it is morally impossible for her to cast the offspring out of the house because of the infamy she would undergo. But the contrary must be said ... if the adulteress, without her own infamy and danger of substitution, can keep and feed the offspring outside the house" (St. Alphonsus, III, 659, question 30).

3. If the woman was overcome by physical force, the adulterer is held to repair the whole damage; nor, if he fails, is the woman held.

[1] Others obligate the seducer to the greater part, because he is a cause both moving and executing.

1044 III. Time of restoring. If the damage has already actually followed, it is to be repaired as soon as possible, like any other damage. If it has not yet been inflicted, the guilty person must so arrange matters that at the opportune time he may restore to the one to whom he ought whatever the spurious child is going to acquire unjustly by inheritance. But if, in this case, the adulterer were near death, he is held to restore immediately, by himself or by another, according to the probability of the life of the spurious child, taking into account his age and strength.[1]

[1] Aertnys-Damen, I, n. 825.

1045 IV. Mode of restoring. The adulteress, if she has goods of her own, should restore from these. If not, she should strive to satisfy in another way, if it can be done, for example by working more diligently, etc. Nevertheless, the adulteress, even if she cannot restore otherwise, is scarcely ever held to reveal her crime, namely on account of the infamy and other evils threatening from it (St. Alphonsus, III, 652, 653).

Note. What the law is in doubt whether the offspring is adulterous, or of which adulterer it is, see n. 1008.

Article V. On the Good of Reputation, Honor, Secrecy, and Truth

Cf. Part VIII, on the eighth precept, where the injury of reputation is treated, and, because of the connection of the matter, also the injury of the other goods enumerated is discussed.

Appendix I. On Distributive Justice in Particular

1046 I. Distributive justice requires that the ruler of a society justly distribute offices and other goods among its members (n. 381). It is said:

1. The ruler; namely, "the act of distribution, which concerns common goods, belongs only to him who presides over common goods; but nevertheless distributive justice is also in the subjects, to whom distribution is made, insofar, namely, as they are content with a just distribution" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 61, a. 1, ad 3).
2. Of a society; under this name here come both perfect societies, namely the Church and the State, and those which are subject to them and are organic parts of them.
3. Offices and other goods, for example the distribution of taxes received, the guardianship of minors, the regulation of hereditary succession, and other things, although at times it can be doubted whether they pertain to distributive justice or to legal justice.

1047 II. To distributive justice is opposed the acceptance of persons, as it is called.

"For the equality of distributive justice consists in this, that different things are assigned to different persons according to proportion to the dignities of persons. Therefore, if someone considers that property of the person on account of which that which is conferred on him is owed to him, there will not be acceptance of the person, but of the cause. ... For example, if someone promotes another to a teaching office on account of sufficiency of knowledge, here the due cause is considered, not the person; but if someone considers, in him on whom he confers something, not that on account of which what is given to him would be proportionate or due to him, but only this, that he is this man, for example Peter or Martin, there is here acceptance of person, because something is attributed to him not on account of some cause which makes him worthy, but is attributed simply to the person.

"Moreover, whatever condition does not make toward the cause on account of which he is worthy of this gift is referred to the person: for example, if someone promotes another to prelacy or to a teaching office because he is rich, or because he is his blood-relative, there is acceptance of person. Yet it happens that some condition of a person makes him worthy with respect to one thing, and not with respect to another; as blood-relationship makes someone worthy that he be appointed heir of an estate, but not that an ecclesiastical prelacy be conferred on him. And therefore the same condition of person, considered in one matter, makes acceptance of person, but in another does not make it.

"Thus, therefore, it is clear that acceptance of persons is opposed to distributive justice in this, that action is taken apart from proportion" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 63, a. 1).

1048 III. An unjust distributor of offices also injures commutative justice, as follows:

1. With respect to the society he injures commutative justice by conferring an office on an unworthy person, because he cooperates toward damages that will come upon the society; upon the society, I say, which has the right that the distributor not cooperate toward its damages. He does not injure commutative justice by conferring an office on a worthy person, even though less worthy, because the society does not have a strict right, but only a broad one, that the distributor cooperate toward its greater good; nor is the distributor judged by a tacit contract to have bound himself to confer the office on the more worthy person (St. Alphonsus, III, 342).
2. With respect to those to be nominated, he sins against commutative justice when the election is made after a competition has been established, because then a contract intervenes. For all receive it in this way, because the general conditions under which the competition is held require that expenses be incurred for the competition itself. If a competition is not established, a contract is lacking, and therefore the distributor is held only from distributive justice with respect to the one to be nominated.[1]

[1] As to the distribution of ecclesiastical offices it is established: 1° To a vacant office there must be promoted a cleric endowed with those qualities which are required for the same office by common or particular law or by the law of foundation (can. 153, § 1). 2° The local Ordinary, with his conscience gravely burdened, is held by the obligation of conferring a vacant parish on him whom he shall have judged more suitable for ruling it, without any acceptance of persons (can. 459, § 1). 3° Clerics or laymen who knowingly have presented or nominated an unworthy person lack, by the law itself and for that turn, the right of presenting or nominating (can. 2391, § 3).

Appendix II. On Legal Justice

1049 I. To legal justice there pertains, on the part of the ruler, determining and establishing those things which are to be furnished by subjects in relation to the common good. Thus, for example, he is held to do the following, although with respect to certain things it can be doubted whether they pertain to legal justice or to distributive justice:

1. To impose taxes; yet "private property must not be exhausted by the immensity of taxes and duties. For since the right of privately possessing goods was given not by the law of men but by nature, public authority can not abolish it, but only moderate its use and harmonize it with the common good. Therefore it would act unjustly and inhumanely if it took away from private goods more than is equitable under the name of taxes."[1]
2. To provide for the defense of the republic; cf., however, what was said about war (n. 751).
3. To enact laws which protect and promote temporal prosperity, for example by taking care that, insofar as it is necessary and can be done, opportunity for working be provided,[2] and that in working account be taken of strength; by taking care that children not work too early nor women to the detriment of their sex or home; by preventing labor from being deprived of a just wage, etc., etc. Yet public power should take care not to thrust itself importunately into these matters.[3]
4. To enact laws which protect and promote religious and moral prosperity, by protecting public morality; by procuring rest from works and labors on feast days,[4] etc., etc.
5. To recognize, or even to take care that there be instituted and furnished with the necessary authority, orders, as they are called, i.e. public institutions which regulate matters pertaining to economic life and consist of deputies of the classes to which the matters to be regulated pertain.[5]

[1] Encyclical Rerum novarum.

[2] Encyclical Quadragesimo anno (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1931, p. 201).

[3] Encyclical Rerum novarum.

[4] Encyclical Quadragesimo anno (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1931, p. 204).

[5] Wagner, Die sittlichen Grundsatze bezuglich der Steuerpflicht.

1050 II. To legal justice on the part of subjects there especially pertains observing those things which have been established by the ruler in order to the common good, for example by paying taxes justly imposed, by furnishing military service justly established, etc. But we shall speak specifically about taxes and about military service, and we shall likewise add certain things about the observance of other social laws.

I. On Taxes

1051 I. Notion. Taxes are goods which the competent Authority imposes as to be contributed for assisting the common necessity or utility. That an authority of this sort has this right is clear from what was said in n. 764. Moreover, it is said:

1. Goods; by which are understood real burdens, whether in kind or, as commonly obtains, in money.
2. Competent Authority, whether ecclesiastical or civil; wherefore canons 1504-1506 and the Civil Code of the country should be consulted.
3. For assisting, etc.; these matters may be seen explained in n. 1053.

1052 II. Division. Taxes are especially distinguished into direct and indirect. Direct taxes are those which are founded on stable possession or use of goods, and are demanded at stated times; by authors they are said directly or immediately to affect persons.[1] Indirect taxes are those which, when some fact occurs, must be paid; they are said directly to affect things,[2] and are called indirect because sellers, on account of the taxes imposed, increase the price, so that they fall indirectly upon buyers.

[1] Such are, for example, taxes on persons, lands, buildings, capital. Succession tax is counted by some among direct taxes, by others among indirect taxes.

[2] Such as customs and tolls.

1053 III. Requisites for the justice of a tax law. The following are required: 1° a just cause, namely of common necessity or utility (764); 2° the proportion of the tax to the cause or to the causes, so that a greater burden not be imposed than the causes require. I have said or to the causes, because today it is not so strictly determined which taxes precisely serve for such an object; 3° a just distribution, namely such that each person must pay according to his economic strength (St. Alphonsus, III, 615).

Corollary. Taxes should not too easily be regarded as unjust, as, for example, taxes imposed for maintaining armies (n. 1059), or for constructing certain luxurious buildings, since these bring some social good with them. Yet other taxes, for example those to be spent on bad schools, must be condemned; and taxes to be spent on useless or dangerous things, such as theaters, etc., are even less pleasing.

1054 IV. The obligation of a tax law is explained in different ways by different authors. Some hold all tax laws to be merely penal; others judge that tax laws which impose direct taxes are mixed, and that those which prescribe indirect taxes are merely penal. Then it is disputed whether mixed penal laws oblige from commutative justice or from another virtue.[1]

Now, first, the natural law dictates that taxes must be paid so that the common necessity may be assisted (St. Alphonsus, III, 616). Positive and just laws determine this natural law further. But with respect to these laws it seems this must be said:

1. The law of paying a tax, after the amount to be paid has been legally defined, seems mixed, or to oblige to the act. And first, indeed, Sacred Scripture seems to favor this opinion: "Render therefore the things that are Caesar's to Caesar, and the things that are God's to God."[2] And: "Wherefore be subject of necessity, not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake. For therefore also you pay tribute: for they are the ministers of God, serving unto this purpose. Render therefore to all men their dues: tribute, to whom tribute; custom, to whom custom."[3] These, in their obvious sense, impose the act of paying, not only the penalties to be undergone after neglected payment. Then, the legislator is judged to make laws in the manner which is especially suited to the matter of the laws. But to the matter of tax laws it is especially suited that the very act of paying the tax be prescribed. For tax laws further determine the natural law itself of paying tax; and it is fitting that, through laws which further determine the natural law, the act itself also be prescribed, just as that is done through the law itself which is further determined.

Objection 1. Modern legislators do not intend to oblige or truly command; indeed, they neither acknowledge nor care for obligation, or the power of obliging, or any morality.

For the response, see n. 162.

Objection 2. Common estimation holds tax laws to be merely penal.

Response. I deny that, from common estimation, the just law of paying tax, after the amount has been legally defined, is merely penal. The estimation involves at most: 1° that the taxes imposed are greater than just, and therefore that there is no obligation of paying all; 2° that the law of declaring things subject to indirect tax is merely penal.

2. The law of declaring things subject to tax, if perhaps such a law exists:[4]

a) It seems mixed, if there is question of direct taxes. The reason is that the legislator is presumed to make in the same way the law which concerns the means by which the amount to be paid can be defined, as the law of paying the defined amount; and this presumption is not overthrown by contrary arguments. Yet he does not sin who follows the received custom of somewhat diminishing the value of things to be declared; nor is he to be rebuked who, in a personal tax, does not declare everything to the exact measure.

b) Practically it can be held as merely penal, if there is question of indirect taxes. The reason is that, what cannot be said about the law of declaring things subject to direct tax, a fairly common estimation holds this law as merely penal. There is added that an exorbitant penalty threatens those who defraud, i.e. one which, considering only the gravity of the act, is graver than is fitting; now, to many it seems less suitable to oblige both under fault and under the threat of an exorbitant penalty (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 616). Therefore he does not sin who, by declaring nothing or even by hiding things, defrauds indirect taxes.

To what extent foreigners are held by laws, including tax laws, see n. 133.

3. Tax laws which we have said are mixed, sufficiently probably do not oblige from commutative justice, but from legal justice or another virtue distinct from commutative justice. The reason is taken from the fact that an obligation of commutative justice is not proved, as will be clear from discussing the arguments of the contrary opinion. Therefore, when the law has not been fulfilled, there is no obligation of restitution. Yet note that the obligation of paying the tax persists until that time for demanding it has passed.

Objection 1. The legislator, by imposing taxes, disposes of part of the goods of his citizens, and assigns a strict right in it to the treasury; this he can do by virtue of eminent domain.

Response. That the legislator, by a direct disposition, establishes a strict right is not clear. With equal right it is admitted that the legislator, by imposing a tax, disposes of part of the goods only in this sense, that he imposes on the citizens an obligation, for example of legal justice, to yield part of their goods to the treasury.

Objection 2. Legal justice can indeed regard all honorable acts, but those very acts are imposed from the motive of honesty proper to them, not from the motive of legal justice.

Response. Nothing prevents us from saying that in many acts there is the honesty of legal justice, and that they are imposed from the motive of that virtue. Besides, from the fact that an honorable act is not imposed from the motive of legal justice, it does not plainly follow that it is imposed from the motive of commutative justice.

Objection 3. From the fundamental pact of many kingdoms, the people themselves or the citizens, who are all declared equal before the law, elect deputies as mandataries, who each year decide what public expenses are to be made and how the money for this is to be procured. Therefore the mandating citizens are judged immediately to oblige themselves to furnishing the things which the mandataries have decreed necessary.

Response. The deputies are not mandataries strictly so called, or in no way act in the name of the citizens, but in their own name. Moreover, the deputies concede to the Government the right of procuring the necessary moneys, without establishing that these are to be demanded from the motive of commutative justice.

Objection 4. Taxes must be paid according to equality of thing, i.e. of the tax established, to thing, i.e. the tax to be paid. But equality of thing to thing is regarded by commutative justice.

Response. Taxes must be paid according to a proportionately established equality of thing to thing, I concede; according to equality taken simply, I deny. But proportionately established equality of thing to thing is not regarded by commutative justice (n. 379).

[1] The opinion of some, who assert an obligation of obedience, seems altogether to be rejected (n. 148).

[2] Matt. XXII, 21.

[3] Rom. XIII, 5-7.

[4] Namely, here and there some laws prescribe that citizens declare things subject to tax, others commit this to officials to be investigated, others leave citizens the faculty of choosing either one.

1055 Corollary I. A tax law about whose justice there is meritorious and serious doubt per se does not oblige, because there is question of damage to the subject; in which case, in doubt, per se there is no obligation of observing the precept (n. 146; St. Alphonsus, III, 617). But since in doubt it is commonly to be presumed in favor of the justice of the law, the case will not occur so easily with respect to a determinate law. Yet with greater right it is admitted that, in so great a multitude of taxes, certain ones are less just, especially insofar as they are applied to harmful rather than useful things, for example to supporting harmful universities and schools; hence anyone who prudently judges that he has sufficiently contributed to the common good can defraud the other taxes; indeed, practically, it can be said that payment of a third part can be evaded. Yet those are to be disapproved who make a profession of defrauding duties, because they expose their soul and their goods and those of their family to danger.

Corollary II. Those who corrupt tax guards cooperate toward an unjust act, and therefore are held to restore the value of the taxes defrauded; but they are not held to restore the fine which, if caught, they would have had to pay (p. 657). Nor are they held to restitution or do they sin who, by words or little gifts, etc., strive to win the guards over to themselves, so that they abstain from unjust vexation, or so that they act kindly, though not unjustly, especially by carrying these laws into execution in a human way, as is fitting.

Corollary III. Those who deceive the guards, for example by seriously declaring that nothing subject to tax is present, are held to restitution if the law prescribes declaration, or if the citizen, according to what was said in n. 1054, has chosen declaration. The reason is that the treasury is impeded by an unjust means from obtaining a good (n. 996). But if the Government commits the matter to officials to be investigated, the deceiver sufficiently probably is not held to restore, because in the case the Government seems not to care for the declaration of the citizen, of whatever kind it may be, and therefore not to urge the right which per se belongs to anyone, namely, not to be impeded from obtaining a good by an unjust means. Besides, true deception will not easily be present; indeed, even a lie can be prevented by the use of restriction.

Corollary IV. Finally, observe that those are not taxes which must be paid to the State on account of services which it furnishes in favor of private persons, for example in transporting persons, letters, or goods. Here rather there is a contract. Yet very many things which are established by administrators can sufficiently probably be held as merely penal dispositions, for example, that money not be inserted in ordinary letters, or letters inserted in other things to be transported; that one person not set out with the same ticket and another return with it, etc.

II. On Succession Tax

1056 I. Notion. Succession tax is a tax which heirs must pay to the treasury from an inheritance obtained.

1057 II. Justice of the law. The law of succession tax, considering the character of the tax, is commonly held to be just; for no reason can be assigned why the State cannot claim for itself a part of goods acquired by inheritance just as it can a part of other goods. I have said considering the character of the tax, because many judge that, in many regions, the part to be yielded to the treasury is greater than is just; but I would respond that it matters little whether taxes are imposed on goods acquired by inheritance or on other goods, provided that the taxes taken together are not greater than is just.

1058 III. Obligation of the law. The law seems mixed, or to oblige to the act, and this even if succession tax is counted among indirect taxes. For the reasons brought forward in n. 1054 hold; nor can contrary common estimation be opposed. For the aforesaid estimation does not so much hold the law to be merely penal as the part to be assigned to the treasury to be greater than is just.

Corollary I. He who, according to what was said in n. 1055, judges that he contributes sufficiently to the common good, even if he does not declare a part, can swear with a restriction that the declaration issued by him was without reticence or less complete designation, namely by understanding silently: insofar as the omitted things had to be declared in conscience. This also applies to a promissory oath of declaring the things which he will afterwards find not yet to have been declared, or not to have been declared rightly.

Corollary II. He who swore that he had declared all things, knowingly concealing a part that had to be declared in conscience, is guilty of perjury; but he is not held afterwards to declare the concealed part, because by force of the added promissory oath he is held only to declare those things which he will afterwards find not to have been declared, or not to have been declared rightly.

III. On Military Service

1059 I. Justice of the law. The law of forced conscription is just. For by those to whom it especially belongs to judge about this matter, especially considering conscription as commonly admitted, it is judged very useful, or rather necessary, for protecting the republic. Nor is injustice present in the fact that families which do not have suitable young men are not held to some compensation, because the burden of military service is not familial but individual; nevertheless it would be equitable for the aforesaid families to contribute in another way. Furthermore, those whom ecclesiastical law exempts are to be exempted from the law of conscription.[1]

[1] Cf. Damen, De vrijdom der Geestelijken van den krijgsdienst als Kerkelijke en Staatkundige Instelling.

1060 II. Obligation of the law. According to some, the law of military service is merely penal; according to others, it is mixed or obliges to the act of serving. Moreover:

1. First, the natural law dictates that the republic must be protected against unjust aggressors in good time and in a due manner, even with danger of life.
2. The law of military service seems mixed, or to oblige to the act. For the legislator, as we argued in n. 1054, is judged to make laws in that manner which is especially suited to the matter of the law. But to the matter of military law, since it is moral and even determinative of the natural law itself, it is especially suited that the very act of serving be prescribed; as was said about tax laws (n. cited). Nor does common estimation hold that military law is merely penal.
3. The law of military service does not oblige from commutative justice, but from legal justice or another virtue, yet one distinct from commutative justice; this is proved by the same reason by which it was proved in n. 1054 with respect to tax laws.

Corollary. Those sin who neglect registration in order to conscription; likewise those who obtain exemption by illegitimate means; and these indeed sin even apart from the sin which the means themselves contain, such as a lie, corruption of physicians, mutilation of oneself; likewise those who do not obey the precept of mobilization, or desert military service. And this holds even if someone, after the precept has been issued, is staying in another region; for, as common estimation has it, he remains a subject until he has been naturalized in another region, as it is called. Yet deserters are not held to return if a grave penalty threatens them.

Question 1. Whether those act unjustly with respect to those who are substituted in their place, and therefore are held to restore to them: 1° those who render themselves unfit for military service; 2° those who deceive physicians or magistrates, so that they are declared unfit; 3° those who desert military service.

Response. It is disputed; but it seems it must be denied, since those who act thus are not the cause, but only the occasion of the damage. The cause of the damage is the law itself, which orders that a fixed number be called, so that, when one is lacking, another is called.

Objection. Those who draw lots tacitly enter among themselves an aleatory contract, by force of which they are held to leave all things to the lot, and therefore to abstain from deceiving officials.

Response. A contract of this sort is asserted gratuitously; indeed, it would be entered even by those unaware of it.

Question 2. What must be said about those who corrupt magistrates or physicians?

Response 1. Those corrupting certainly act unjustly toward the republic, namely by cooperating toward an unjust act of magistrates or physicians, who with respect to the republic are held from justice to fulfill their office faithfully. Yet the damage which the republic suffers cannot be estimated, nor practically does restitution seem to be imposed on the penitent.

Response 2. It is sharply disputed whether they also act unjustly with respect to those who are called in their place, i.e. in the place of those corrupting. Moreover, sufficiently probably it is denied, because also in this case those corrupting are not the cause, but the occasion of the damage coming upon a third party; nor is it clear that the officials are held by a tacit contract with respect to the third party, namely, to turn the damage away from him.

IV. On the Observance of Other Social Laws

1061 It is enough to have noted these things: other social laws, just as the laws already explained, seem mixed; yet in general they do not oblige from commutative justice, but from legal justice or another virtue, unless they are more determinative of a strict right. We have said:

I. Other social laws seem mixed. For on the one hand the presumption seems to be that the act contained in the law is truly prescribed, if the matter is moral (n. 1054); on the other hand, the aforesaid presumption is not overthrown by common estimation, which holds the laws about which we are speaking to be merely penal.

II. Yet in general they do not oblige from commutative justice, but from legal justice or another virtue distinct from commutative justice. For the obligation of commutative justice is commonly clear from no source, and therefore at least practically can be held not to exist; hence, when the law has not been fulfilled, the obligation of restitution is lacking (cf. what was said p. 696).

III. Unless they are more determinative of a strict right, for example a law which, for the circumstances, determines the price of some things or the wage to be paid; this is sufficiently clear. Yet sometimes even outside the assigned case they establish a strict right, as can be elicited from the nature of the matter or from the tenor of the law (cf. n. 764 and 796).

Part VIII. On the Eighth Precept of the Decalogue

The eighth precept declares: "You shall not speak false testimony against your neighbor";[1] it therefore prohibits a lie by which the neighbor's reputation is injured. It is extended by some to every injury which is inflicted on the neighbor by words or by equivalent signs. Whatever the case may be, at least because of the connection of the matter, we shall speak: 1° of the injury of truth, or of lying; 2° of the injury of reputation, or of detraction; 3° of the injury of honor, or of insult; 4° of the injury of secrecy.

[1] Exod. XX, 16.

Section I. On the Injury of Truth, or on Lying

(St. Thomas, II-II, qq. 110, 111; St. Alphonsus, cf. Theologia Moralis, book III, nn. 157-171; Homo Apostolicus, tract 5, nn. 15 and 16.)

To truthfulness is opposed every act of manifestation discordant with the internal concept. If that act is contained in words, signs, or writings, it is called a lie; if it consists in deeds, it is called simulation. Hence what we are going to say about lying should also be applied to simulation.

1062 I. Notion. A lie is customarily defined: speech contrary to the mind. It is said:

1. Speech; by this word is understood the ordering of concepts toward another, by means either of words, which hold the principal place among signs, or of other signs (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 110, a. 1, ad 2).
2. Contrary to the mind, i.e. which is opposed to the concept of the mind.

Corollary I. For a lie there are required: 1° the will of saying what is false, i.e., insofar as false is taken here, what is contrary to the concept or what is held as false; 2° speech contrary to the concept. "The account of a lie is taken from formal falsity, namely from this, that someone has the will of uttering what is false; whence also a lie is named from this, that it is said contrary to the mind" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 110, a. 1). But there are not required: 1° a concept false in reality, hence he lies who holds as false what he says, although what he says is true; 2° the will of deceiving, for "that someone intends to establish falsity in the opinion of another, by deceiving him, does not pertain to the species of a lie, but to a certain perfection of it" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.); nor 3° deception of the neighbor, as is clear in the accused person who, before a judge who was an eyewitness, denies the crime.

Corollary II. It is not a lie: 1° to say what is false, when the speaker holds it as true; 2° to say in jest things which are openly false, because the circumstances remove the ordinary signification of the words; 3° ironic or hyperbolic expressions, by which words are really transferred to another signification; 4° equivocal expressions, or those uttered with a broad mental restriction, as will presently be explained more fully; nor 5° is it a lie if I sufficiently show that I am unwilling to manifest the truth, because then the words from that circumstance again receive another meaning.

1063 II. Division. A lie is distinguished as threefold: jocose, officious, and pernicious or damaging, according as it is done for the sake of pleasure or utility, whether one's own or another's, or with damage to a third party (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 110, a. 2). But under the word pernicious lie there can also be comprehended a lie which is done with injury to God (cf. St. Thomas, loc. cit., a. 4).

1064 III. Morality. 1. A lie is a sin, and is never licit. It is a sin, which is clear both from Sacred Scripture[1] and from reason. For an act is illicit which is opposed to the end which has been appointed to the act by nature, i.e. by the Author of nature. But a lie, i.e. speech contrary to the concept, is opposed to the end which has been appointed to speech, i.e. to the ordering of concepts toward another (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 110, a. 3). Then, "because man is a social animal, naturally one man owes to another that without which human society could not be preserved; but men could not live together with one another unless they believed one another as manifesting truth to one another" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 109, a. 3, ad 1). Nor is it ever licit, because the prior disordering, about which we have spoken, cannot be removed (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 110, a. 3; Quodlibet 8, a. 14; St. Alphonsus, III, 171).

Objection. An act with a double effect, when the things to be posited have been posited, is licit. But speech contrary to the mind sometimes becomes an act with a double effect, of which one, namely the defense of a secret, is intended, while the other is permitted.

Response. For an act with a double effect to be licit, it must be at least indifferent in itself, not disordered. But speech contrary to the mind is disordered in itself, or sinful, as follows from what has been said.

What if someone cannot hide without a lie a truth which must be positively hidden?[2]

Response. In the case, the obligation of hiding ceases, and the obligation of not lying prevails, because the intrinsic disordering of a lie cannot cease. But the case scarcely occurs except from the dexterity of the one asking and the weakness of the one responding.

If someone subjectively believes that he must positively hide a secret, and no possibility appears of doing this without a lie, from a perplexed conscience the lesser evil is permitted.

2. A lie as such, or insofar as it is opposed to truth, is only a venial sin. The reason is that the abuse of a sign and the deception to follow from it, as such only, i.e. without bringing damage to the neighbor or injury to God, involve only a slight injury of the social order.

3. A pernicious lie is grave from its kind, i.e. grave or slight according as it brings grave or slight damage to the neighbor. If it is pernicious to God, i.e. if it brings injury to God, it is grave.

Corollary. To lying pertains, as we noted above, simulation, which is had when "someone by certain signs of deeds or things signifies something contrary to that which is in him ... whence simulation is properly a certain lie consisting in exterior signs of deeds; but it does not matter whether someone lies by word or by any other deed whatsoever ... whence, since every lie is a sin, as was said above, it follows also that every simulation is a sin" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 111, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, III, 171). Moreover, a species of simulation is hypocrisy, "by which someone simulates the person of another, as when a sinner simulates the person of a just man" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 111, a. 2).

[1] Prov. VIII, 5; Col. III, 9.

[2] With respect to a secret, there is no obligation of positively hiding it, but only the obligation of not manifesting it; yet it can happen that a secret is in some way manifested unless it is hidden. Besides, accidentally there can be an obligation of positively hiding a secret, for example by reason of charity.

1065 IV. Concealment of truth as such is not a lie, because it does not involve the will of saying what is false, but only the will of keeping silent about what is true. Moreover, truth is concealed not only by being silent, but also by speaking with some mental restriction; about this more must be said.

1. Notion of mental restriction. It is had when the speaker mentally restricts words to a meaning which they have either in no way, or which they have, whether from themselves or from the circumstances, besides another meaning.

2. Division of mental restriction. It is distinguished as twofold, broad and purely mental. It is purely mental when the speaker mentally restricts words to a meaning which they have in no way, so that in no way, i.e. neither from the words themselves nor from the adjuncts or circumstances, can it be perceived; as if, asked whether he had been in Paris, he affirmed it, understanding silently: "in mind." Broad mental restriction is had when the speaker restricts words which have a double meaning to the less obvious meaning, permitting the more obvious meaning to be taken by the hearer; as if, asked whether he knows something, he replies, "No," understanding silently: "with communicable knowledge." Broad mental restriction is also called equivocation or amphibology, which, namely, is had when the words uttered have a double meaning (St. Alphonsus, III, 151, 152; Homo Apostolicus, tract 5, n. 15).

3. Morality of mental restriction. a) Purely mental restriction is never licit. For it falls into a lie: namely, the words in the case in no way express the meaning which the speaker intends, while the expressed meaning is supposed to be opposed to the speaker's judgment; therefore there is speech contrary to the mind (St. Alphonsus, III, 152). There are added the propositions condemned by Innocent XI, namely:

26: "If anyone, either alone or before others, whether asked or of his own accord, whether for the sake of recreation or for any other end, swears that he has not done something which in reality he has done, by understanding within himself something which he did not do, or another way from that in which he did it, or any other true addition whatsoever, in reality he neither lies nor is perjured";[2]

27: "A just cause of using these amphibologies is present whenever this is necessary or useful for protecting the health of the body, honor, family property, or for any other act of virtue, so that the concealment of truth is then judged expedient and diligent";[3]

b) Broad mental restriction, with which equivocation coincides, is per se illicit; for it is opposed to sincerity, and in fact commonly leads the hearer into error. Yet it becomes licit if a just cause is present, and there is not from some other source an obligation of opening the truth, for example from the precept of a Superior. This is clear both from the example of Christ,[4] and from the fact that in broad mental restriction the words also contain the meaning intended by the speaker, so that there is not speech contrary to the mind, or that intrinsic disordering which inheres in a lie (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Corollary I. Besides other applications of the doctrine explained which occur in different treatises, it is useful to report certain ones from St. Alphonsus:

1. "One in need, with goods hidden for his sustenance, can respond to the judge that he has nothing. Likewise an heir who has hidden goods, if he is not held from them to satisfy creditors, can respond to the judge that he has hidden nothing, understanding silently: from which he is held to satisfy" (III, 158).

2. "He who accepted a loan, but afterwards satisfied it, can deny that he accepted a loan, understanding silently: so that he must pay" (III, 159).

3. An adulteress, asked by her husband whether she has committed the crime, can deny it, understanding silently: in such a way that she must manifest it (III, 162).

4. A servant by order of his master can respond that he is not at home, understanding silently: for speaking with someone (III, 165).
5. One bound to a secret can respond to the one asking that he knows nothing, understanding silently: for example, with communicable knowledge (III, 153).
6. One asked to give or lend money can respond that he does not have it, understanding silently: money which he wishes to give or lend (III, 163).
7. One invited, who is asked whether the food, which is tasteless, tastes good, can respond that it is good; for responses of this sort need not necessarily be taken in an absolute sense (III, 160).

[1] Cf. Waffelaert, Dissertation morale sur la malice du mensonge; Koenraedt, in N. K. Stemmen, 1925, p. 297; Gregorianum, 1920, pp. 11, 278; A. Kern, Die Luge.

[2] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1176.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1177.

[4] John VII, 8; Matt. XXIV, 36.

Section II. On the Injury of Reputation

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 60, a. 3; qq. 72-73; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book III, nn. 962-1003; Homo Apostolicus, tract 11, nn. 1-2 and 7-22.)

Reputation, from speaking, is the common opinion or estimation of many concerning the morals of another. It is called good or bad according as morally good or morally bad things are adjudged to someone. Speech pertains to the perfection of reputation. Reputation is injured externally through detraction, internally through rash judgments. Each must be discussed.

Chapter I. On Detraction

We shall treat first the notion, division, and morality of detraction, then restitution on account of detraction, then the causes excusing detraction, and finally the one hearing detraction.

Article I. On the Notion, Division, and Morality of Detraction

1066 I. Notion. Detraction is the unjust denigration of another's reputation. If it is done before the defamed person, there is added insult or injury of honor (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 73, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, III, 966).

1067 II. Division. Detraction is distinguished into simple detraction and calumny, according as it is committed by revealing what is true, or by imputing what is false.

1068 III. Morality. 1. Detraction, both simple detraction and calumny, is opposed to justice and is grave from its kind. It is opposed to justice because it deprives a man of a good justly possessed. It is grave from its kind, which is clear from Sacred Scripture,[1] and likewise from reason; for "to take away someone's reputation is very grave, because among temporal things reputation seems to be more precious, through the lack of which a man is impeded from doing many good things; on account of which it is said in Ecclesiasticus 41: Have care for a good name, for this will remain to you more than a thousand great and precious treasures; and therefore detraction, speaking per se, is a mortal sin" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 73, a. 2). Yet they can become venial because of slightness of matter. Finally, that the aforesaid sins are opposed to justice is sufficiently elicited from what has been said (St. Alphonsus, III, 966). Besides, note:

a) The malice of calumny is graver than the malice of simple detraction; for the former injures an absolute right to reputation, the latter a limited right. For everyone has the right that what is false never be imputed to him; but with respect to revealing what is true, he has only the right that it not be revealed without a relatively grave cause.

b) The gravity of matter, if there is question of injury of reputation, depends: 1° on the gravity of the thing revealed; 2° on the judgment which the hearers make, considering their region and condition; 3° on the greater or lesser authority of the detractor; 4° on the condition of the person against whom detraction is made (St. Alphonsus, III, 967).

Objection. A bad man does not have the right of retaining the reputation of goodness.

Response. I deny the assertion, since on the one hand no one is certainly held to deprive himself of reputation; and on the other hand, per se it belongs to no private person to deprive another of a good which the latter has and possesses without injury to another; nor can public authority do this unless public order demands it.

2. Simple detraction and calumny, insofar as they are opposed to justice, do not differ in species, because they injure the same good or right. But to calumny there is added the species of lying. Furthermore, detractions in different matters seem to be of the same species, because, insofar as they are injurious to reputation, they are not morally diverse, but differ only according to more and less (St. Alphonsus, III, 978).

Objection. Reputation consists of parts distinct in species; for one reputation is that which someone possesses concerning chastity, another concerning justice, and therefore injuries of reputation ought to differ in species according as they violate parts of a different species.

Response. The parts of which reputation consists are indeed diverse in species in themselves, but insofar as they constitute reputation, they differ only according to more and less.

Corollary I. Ordinarily it is venial to reveal: 1° natural defects of mind or body; 2° venial faults; 3° a defect which is indeed grave, but which is sufficiently common in men of such a condition (St. Alphonsus, III, 967).

Corollary II. Generally, unless the matter is known, it is mortal to say of a superior that he is a liar; of a religious or priest, that he has been drunk, or that he is a lover of girls; likewise to use words which provide occasion for suspecting something grave, as if "you should say nothing in particular, but only in general, for example, that you know something about him, which, if you should say it, would affect him with great shame" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Corollary III. He who narrates the hidden crime of someone who has already been defamed in other matters sins gravely if the new revelation notably increases the prior infamy, or brings a new grave infamy, for example if about one infamous in one species a crime of another species is narrated, not very connected with the prior one (St. Alphonsus, III, 976).

Corollary IV. He who, in reporting someone's hidden crime, at the same time reports his repentance, is guilty of grave detraction, unless the repentance is so great that it entirely destroys the infamy.

Corollary V. Several slight detractions can coalesce into grave matter, because taken together they can contain a grave injury of reputation.

Corollary VI. What has been said about injury of reputation should also be applied to defamation of the dead, although it is less grave to detract from the dead than from the living, and the detraction is the less, the longer the person has been dead. But what is lawful for historians, see n. 1070.

3. Detraction from some person also contains a graver sin if the infamy of the defamed person redounds to the community, or to the family, to which he belongs; and the sin is graver in proportion as a greater and more common good is injured. Yet note that the defamation of a member commonly redounds into the community the more, the smaller it is in number, and therefore redounds more into a family, which of itself is smaller in number (St. Alphonsus, III, 978; Homo Apostolicus, tract 11, n. 16).

[1] Prov. XXIV, 9; Rom. I, 30, 32; 1 Cor. VI, 10; Jas. III.

1069 Question 1. How great a sin is it to reveal a grave defect to one or another person who certainly will keep the matter secret?

Response 1. If it is done on account of a just cause, for example for the sake of instruction or counsel, there is no sin. The same seems to be said if it is done only for the sake of consolation, but not from the intention of blackening the neighbor. The reason is that one affected by injury seems to have the right of lessening his grief with some damage to him who inflicted the grief. Hence servants, wives, and children who reveal injuries inflicted on them by a master, by a husband, or by a father seem to be excused (St. Alphonsus, III, 973).

Response 2. If it is done without cause, it is disputed whether it is a grave or slight sin. Now a sufficiently probable opinion recognizes only a slight fault, because, since reputation consists in the common estimation or the estimation of many, it does not appear that it is notably injured by the bad opinion of one person or another (St. Alphonsus, III, 973; cf. St. Thomas, II-II, q. 73, a. 1, ad 2). Nor should it be said that by defamation before one person, just as by one person's rash judgment, reputation is gravely injured. For it is answered that in rash judgment there is an accusation of a false or wholly uncertain crime, but in our hypothesis the revelation of a true crime is supposed. Yet authors except the case in which someone reveals the offense to a person, for example to a superior or master, from whom the delinquent reasonably wishes it to be hidden before others (St. Alphonsus, III, 973). Moreover, the narration of a false crime is always mortal, because I have a firmer right that a false crime not be imputed to me than that a true crime not be revealed to another. Finally, even the revelation of a true crime to one trustworthy man can accidentally be grave, namely if it contains whispering or tale-bearing (n. 1079).

Question 2. Of what kind and how great a sin is it to reveal a defect which per se would constitute grave matter, but as heard from others?

Response 1. If you report it in such a way that others, by force of the narration itself, believe what is reported, there is a grave sin against justice; for example, "if you assert that you heard it from a person worthy of trust, ... because you give a sufficient cause for believing the evil" (St. Alphonsus, III, 977).

Response 2. If you report it in such a way that others are going to believe from their own levity or malice alone, you do not sin gravely against justice, because you are not the cause but only the occasion of grave damage. But you sin against charity, because everyone is held to impede grave damage to the neighbor as much as he conveniently can (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). Indeed, if there is discussion of an enormous crime, there is also grave sin against justice. The reason is that on the one hand even suspicion of such a crime gravely injures reputation; on the other hand the narration must be called at least a cause of suspicion (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Question 3. To what extent is it a sin to report the crime of a person entirely unknown, or without the person being named?

Response. Per se this contains no detraction. Yet except: 1° if there is danger that the person can afterwards become known or come under suspicion; 2° if a report of this sort redounds to the family, community, etc., of him whose crime is reported; in which case there is grave or slight sin according as that person's reputation is gravely or slightly injured. Hence, for example, he would sin gravely who said that someone from this religious community had committed such a crime (St. Alphonsus, III, 978). "Nevertheless, if the order were large, it should not be considered a grave sin ... to name the order which is not of strict observance" (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 11, n. 16; p. 9).

Question 4. Whether it is lawful to detract from the deceased.

Response. No, because the soul of the deceased, no less than a living man, has a right to reputation. Yet "to defame a dead person is less grave than to defame a living one," because he has less need of reputation (St. Alphonsus, III, 978).

Question 5. To what extent is it a sin to divulge further a notorious crime?

Response. A crime can be notorious: 1° by law; 2° by fact; 3° by report. It is called notorious by law when it is established by a sentence of a judge. It is notorious by fact when it has been committed before so many persons of the community that it will certainly and quickly be divulged more and more. It is notorious by report when it has been narrated to so many persons of the community that it will certainly and quickly be narrated more and more (St. Alphonsus, III, 975; VII, 141). Furthermore, some crime can be notorious either only relatively, for example with respect to a college, community, family, or neighborhood, or absolutely, with respect to all who inhabit the same region or city. Now:

1. A crime notorious by law can be divulged without injustice in whatever place and time. For the judge by law deprives the accused absolutely of reputation, just as he can deprive him of goods of fortune; indeed public trials are held for this end, that from publicity a partial penalty may be had through defamation. Nor does he who divulges a crime of this sort per se, i.e. unless he acts from evil affection, sin against charity. For the accused has also been condemned for this reason, that others may be deterred from crime; there is added that it has been expedient for the common good that each one be known as he publicly is (St. Alphonsus, III, 974).

2. A crime notorious either by fact or by report may be revealed as follows:

a) It is lawful to reveal it to members of the same convent or college.

b) With respect to revelation in another community, this must be said:

alpha) It is lawful if, considering the circumstances, knowledge of the crime is going to arrive there quickly. Wherefore note that today communications between convents are more frequent, so that revelation will with difficulty be a grave sin. The contrary must be said about a different province and about an autonomous monastery.

beta) If knowledge of the crime is not, or is not quickly, going to arrive in another community, it is illicit and unjust to reveal it there, if there is question of a restricted community, i.e. of a house, convent, or college. The same must be said theoretically if there is question of a city, town, or village, because one defamed in one place still justly possesses reputation in the place to which knowledge of the crime is not going to arrive quickly; therefore he does injury to him and sins against justice who defames him there. Nor is it valid if you say that he no longer has anywhere a right to reputation, from the fact that his crime is public somewhere. For by what reason would he have lost this right? Not through the crime itself according to itself; otherwise whoever had committed a crime, however hiddenly, would no longer have a right to reputation, and no one would sin against justice by spreading it abroad; which no one admits. Not through the crime as public in one place; for it is and will be unknown elsewhere unless you reveal it, and accordingly it is so related there, where it is unknown, as if it were absolutely hidden.[1] I have said theoretically, because practically, on account of more frequent communication between different places, a crime public in one place will quickly be divulged in another place. Finally, it is always lawful to divulge crimes which render a man pernicious, because it is expedient for the common good that pernicious men be known by all: such are, for example, murderers, thieves, scandalously lustful persons, etc. (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Question 6. Whether it is lawful again to reveal a crime which through forgetfulness has become hidden.

Response. Affirmatively, if there is question of a crime notorious by law, as was said above. Otherwise, if there is question of a crime notorious by fact or by report. To manifest this again is certainly opposed to charity; and also to justice, as it seems, because through forgetfulness the matter has been reduced to the state in which it was before publicity (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 11, n. 13).

[1] Cf. Billuart, De iure et iustitia, diss. 15, a. 1, § 5.

Article II. On Causes Excusing Detraction

1070 I. Calumny is never licit, as is clear both from what has been said about lying and from proposition 44 condemned by Innocent XI: "It is probable that he does not sin mortally who imputes a false crime to someone in order to defend his own justice and honor."[1]

II. The following can render simple detraction licit:

1. The consent of the delinquent, since he is master of his own reputation, and therefore per se can abdicate himself from that good.
2. The public good to be protected. Hence, if you know that a man given over to lust wishes to receive Sacred Orders, you are held to denounce him to the Superior (St. Alphonsus, III, 968); likewise, per se, you ought to manifest a dishonest physician who is to others an occasion of sinning.
3. The spiritual good of the delinquent himself; hence they rightly excuse "those who indicate to parents the hidden crime of children, or to masters that of servants, or to the prelate of religious as to a father, in order to correction; as also a wife speaking with her husband about the hidden crimes of children or servants" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
4. A temporal or spiritual good, grave with respect to defamation, whether of the revealer himself or of a third party. Hence it is lawful to manifest the guilty person if an innocent person is accused; likewise to inform a mistress about the bad morals of a maidservant whom she intends to hire; likewise, sometimes, to indicate a hidden crime to someone for the sake of taking counsel or help, etc. (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit. and n. 969).

5. With respect to historians, I note:

a) It is lawful for them to write down the public things of their own time, even if these, consigned to letters, are transmitted to the knowledge of posterity, and thus injure in perpetuity the reputation of the authors of those deeds.[2]

b) With respect to those things which were public but have been completely obliterated, authors commonly concede more to historians on account of the integrity of history and for the instruction and terror of others. Besides, since archives, even more secret ones, in our age are easily accessible to all students of history, it can be doubted whether hidden crimes which are contained in old documents ought to be called hidden.[3] And this can be urged all the more because it is better that many things, which of themselves would better remain buried in eternal oblivion, be narrated according to truth by an upright historiographer, than that they be mixed with falsehoods by the impious and propagated for wicked ends.[3]

Yet note that, in a historical book which is intended for the common people, many things can be passed over in silence which cannot be passed over in others.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1194.

[2] Sweens, De virtute iustitiae, n. 473.

[3] Lehmkuhl, Theologia Moralis, I, 1426.

Article III. On Restitution on Account of Detraction

1071 I. Subject of restitution. 1. He who unjustly and with grave theological fault has injured the reputation of the neighbor is held under grave obligation to restitution "just as to restitution of any thing taken away" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 73, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, III, 991).

2. He who with slight fault or inculpably has injured the reputation of the neighbor is held to remove the cause of damage placed by him and morally persevering, i.e. to revoke the detraction or deprive it of force, if he conveniently can.

3. What has been said about the detractor should also be applied: 1° to him who positively influenced an unjust detraction, for example by asking, applauding, etc. (n. 1075); 2° to a Superior, in the case in which from justice he is held to provide for reputation to be restored, according to what is to be said in n. 1075.

1072 II. Object of restitution. The obligation is of restoring: 1° the reputation unjustly injured; 2° the real damages following from the injury of reputation and at least confusedly foreseen. Moreover, "the obligation of restoring reputation, since it is purely personal, does not pass to heirs. But the obligation of compensation for the aforesaid damage, since it has respect to the goods of the defamer, passes to heirs" (St. Alphonsus, III, 996).

1073 III. Mode of restoring. 1. He who narrated what is false ought openly to retract the false thing imputed, for example by saying that he erred or, if that is not sufficient, that he lied; indeed, if there is need, he should prove the retraction and confirm it by oath or even by witnesses (St. Alphonsus, III, 991).

2. He who revealed what is true ought prudently to correct the opinion of the hearers, for example by saying with equivocation that he erred, etc. If the matter does not succeed in this way, he should strive to furnish an equivalent compensation, for example by praising the defamed person in the same or in a different matter, etc. (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 62, a. 2, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, III, 992).

3. A detractor, in default of the immediate hearers, is held to restore reputation before mediate hearers, as follows:

a) He is not held if he narrated the matter before those whom he thought would hide it, because damage not foreseen is not imputed to him.

b) It is disputed whether he is held if he could foresee that the hearers would not keep the secret. But he seems per se to be held, because in the hypothesis posited the detractor becomes not merely an occasional cause of damage to be inflicted by the immediate hearers, but an occasional cause which puts on the character of culpable cooperation toward that damage. But he who culpably cooperates toward the damage of someone acts formally unjustly, and therefore is held to restitution. I have said per se, because practically he will often be excused, either because the immediate hearers will restore the damage, or on account of moral impossibility (St. Alphonsus, III, 991).

1074 IV. Causes excusing from restitution of reputation are customarily enumerated:

1. Physical or moral impossibility. But with respect to moral impossibility note that the detractor is not held to restoration of reputation with damage much greater. Damage to one's own reputation does not excuse, unless the reputation of the detractor is necessary for the public good (St. Alphonsus, III, 1002). Yet no one is held to compensate injured reputation with money (St. Alphonsus, III, 1000). But if you ask whether the defamed person can compensate himself with money of the defamer, it seems this must be said: if the defamer unjustly refuses restoration of reputation, the defamed person more probably can compensate himself, relying on the principle: if you unjustly deny me what is owed to me, it is lawful for me to take something from you which is yours; almost as "you are not compelled to restore his right to another if he refuses to restore yours to you" (St. Alphonsus, IV, 999). If the defamer is excused from restoring reputation, it seems it must be denied, because on the one hand the right to money is doubtful, and on the other hand compensation on account of a doubtful right is not admitted (n. 1033; cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 1001).

2. Cessation of damage; as if someone has already from elsewhere, for example by sentence of a judge or by forgetfulness, been purged from infamy. In doubt whether the crime of the neighbor has been given over to oblivion, ordinarily the obligation of restoring will cease, both because there will be danger of harming the defamed person more, and because restitution cannot be made without one's own damage, which no one is held to suffer for repairing an already doubtful damage of the neighbor (St. Alphonsus, III, 997, 998).

3. Condonation by the defamed person, whether express or presumed. Yet damage of reputation cannot be presumed to be condoned as easily as damage in goods of fortune. Condonation is prohibited if the infamy redounds to others, or harms the common good, as if there is question of a priest or religious (St. Alphonsus, III, 1003).

4. Compensation, understood in this sense, that after injury has been inflicted on both sides, you can sufficiently probably defer restitution until the other is prepared to make satisfaction. Yet from these things do not conclude that the defamer can likewise be defamed (St. Alphonsus, III, 999).

Yet that is lawful, that you may lessen belief in the defamer, or that you may lead him, unwilling, to restore reputation or to omit further detraction.

Note. Excuse from restitution of reputation per se does not bring with it excuse from repairing real damages following from the injury of reputation.

Article IV. On the One Hearing Detraction

1075 I. He who positively influences detraction, for example by asking, laughing, or applauding, sins against justice. Yet sufficiently probably he sins only slightly who fishes out the crime of the neighbor without the intention of divulging it (n. 1069; St. Alphonsus, III, 979).

II. He who only internally rejoices over detraction sins against charity with respect to the defamed person; likewise with respect to the defamer, insofar as he omits fraternal correction in a case in which he is held to it (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

III. He who does not rejoice over detraction as such, but over the hearing of a new thing, or over curious knowledge of the crimes of others, or over the witty manner of narrating, or over the thing narrated as amusing, is excused at least from mortal sin (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

IV. He who does not impede detraction which he can easily impede sins against charity. But practically the obligation at least grave of positively impeding often is absent, "because in this matter of detraction it can be most difficult to establish that correction would be profitable, and from another source detractors corrected before others are very easily offended; indeed there is danger that they would rather increase or confirm the detraction. ... But according to all, those are excused even from venial sin who, noticing the detraction, either depart, or divert the conversation, or turn away the face or show it sad" (St. Alphonsus, III, 981). The contrary must be said about a Superior who does not impede detraction, namely:

1. The Superior of the defamer per se is held from charity, even more than others, to correct the subject; indeed even from justice, if he is the pastor, although he is not the Superior, or the Bishop of the defamer. But with respect to a defamer who is not a subject he is held no otherwise than others are.
2. The Superior of the defamed person likewise per se is held, even more than others, from charity to impede the evil of the subject; not, however, from justice, even if he is his pastor or Bishop, because from that virtue he is not held to attend to the temporal good of the subject (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

But what if the Superior has not impeded the detraction?

Response 1. The Superior of the defamer is held from charity to compel the subject to restore reputation; indeed from justice, if he is pastor or Bishop.

Response 2. The Superior of the defamed person likewise per se is held from charity to provide for the restitution of reputation; not, however, from justice, even if he is pastor or Bishop, because from that virtue he is not held to provide for the temporal good of the subject.

Response 3. If there is question of the Superior of both, and the defamed person implores the authority of the Superior, more probably he is held from justice to take care of the restitution of reputation, because in the case he seems to act as a judge, who from justice speaks the law (St. Alphonsus, III, 980).

Chapter II. On Rash Judgment, Opinion, and Doubt

1076 I. Notions. Judgment or certitude, opinion, and doubt respectively involve firm assent, weak assent, and suspension of assent concerning the truth of some proposition. Suspicion is reduced to doubt (n. 215). They are called rash here if they are made without sufficient foundation and regard the evil of the neighbor (St. Alphonsus, III, 962).

1077 II. Morality. 1. Judgment, opinion, and doubt, rashly conceived, are sins, and indeed against justice. This is clear both from Sacred Scripture, which at least teaches that they are sins,[1] and from the fact that he inflicts injury on the neighbor who holds him to be evil without sufficient reason.

2. With respect to the gravity of the sin, receive these things:

a) A rash judgment is a grave sin if the conditions to be explained are present; if any of these is lacking, there is only a slight sin. The conditions are:

alpha) That judgment is truly present, or that the assent is firm or quasi-firm; in other words, it is required that the matter be held as certain or morally certain (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 60, a. 3; St. Alphonsus, III, 962).

beta) That the judgment is about grave matter, i.e. about matter which, if it were revealed, would contain grave detraction (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

gamma) That the judgment rests on reasons which do not suffice for conceiving an opinion. If they suffice for opinion, there is no grave sin, even if the judgment is wholly firm (St. Alphonsus, III, loc. cit.).

delta) That the judgment is about a determinate and known person. Therefore grave sin is absent if you rashly judge that in some place some crime has been committed by someone indeterminate; or if you judge the same thing about a man who meets you, but is unknown to you (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Now, when these conditions have been fulfilled, there is grave sin, because there is grave injury; otherwise, if any of them is lacking.

b) Rash opinion, suspicion, and doubt ordinarily are only slight sins, because the injury, and consequently the sin, is only slight (St. Alphonsus, III, 963). Many make an exception if someone, on account of the slightest reason, should suspect or hold as probable that a grave and honorable person is guilty of an enormous crime: "as it would be, to suspect about a pious religious that he is a heretic, or that he has committed incest with his mother; or about a man commonly held as Catholic, that he is a Jew or an atheist. The reason is that perhaps a greater injury is inflicted on them by suspecting such things than if a certain judgment were had about them concerning ordinary grave offenses" (St. Alphonsus, III, 964; St. Thomas, II-II, q. 60, a. 3).

c) It is disputed whether or not detraction and rash judgment differ in species. Some deny it, because by detraction reputation is injured before others, by rash judgment before ourselves; which difference seems merely material. Others affirm it, because by detraction there is taken away before others the knowledge which they have of someone's goodness; by rash judgment I do not take away from myself the knowledge of someone's goodness, but I deny the assent of the intellect due to the knowledge had; which difference seems formal to the patrons of this opinion.

Corollary I. Since rash judgment, etc., are opposed to justice, they oblige to a certain species of restitution, namely that one lay aside the aforesaid judgment, etc., and judge better about someone.

Corollary II. Doubts about the uprightness of the neighbor are to be interpreted in the better part, unless someone prefers to abstain from judging. It can indeed "happen that he who interprets in the better part is more often deceived; but it is better that someone more frequently be deceived, having a good opinion about some bad man, than that he be deceived more rarely, having a bad opinion about some good man; because from the latter injury is done to another, but not from the former" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 60, a. 4, ad 1).

Yet these things do not prevent someone, if there is question of avoiding damage, from conducting himself as if the other were harmful; for prudence advises this.

[1] Luke VI, 37; Matt. VII, 1-2; Rom. XIV, 4; 1 Cor. XIII, 5.

Scholion. On Whispering

1078 (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 74; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book V, n. 72.)

I. Notion. Whispering is evil backbiting directed to dissolving true or ordered friendship. The whisperer and the detractor intend to take away reputation.

"They differ," says the Angelic Doctor, "in the end, because the detractor intends to blacken the reputation of the neighbor; whence he chiefly brings forward those evils about the neighbor from which the neighbor can be defamed, or at least his reputation diminished; but the whisperer intends to separate friendship ... and therefore the whisperer brings forward such evils about the neighbor as can move the mind of the hearer against him, according to that saying of Ecclesiasticus 28: 'A sinful man will trouble friends, and in the midst of those having peace he will cast enmity'" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 74, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, V, 72).

1079 II. Morality. 1. Whispering is opposed to charity and is a grave sin; indeed it is graver than detraction and insult. It is opposed to charity because it deprives the neighbor of a good. It is a grave sin, which is clear both from Sacred Scripture,[1] and from the fact that it deprives the neighbor of a grave good. It is graver than detraction and insult, because it takes away from the neighbor a good which is greater than reputation and honor (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 74, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, V, 72). Yet it can be venial on account of slightness of matter, for example if it is apt only to lessen friendship a little.

2. To whispering there is added a sin of injustice if it is done by an unjust means, as by detraction or unjust revelation of a secret; but in that case it obliges to restitution properly so called, as is clear (St. Alphonsus, V, loc. cit.).

What if someone deprives another of acquired friendship, using a means not unjust in itself, for example by manifesting natural defects publicly known?

Response. Many judge that in the case there is sin only against charity, not against justice; neither by reason of the good, i.e. friendship, since it is not owed from justice; nor by reason of the means, for in this case this is not unjust. But with St. Alphonsus and others it seems it must be said that there is sin also against justice, because if there is question of a good already acquired, no one, as it seems, can without injustice cooperate in any way toward deprivation of the good; to deprive him of such a good belongs only to him who continuously and gratuitously grants that good (St. Alphonsus, V, loc. cit.).

[1] Ecclus. VI, 15; XXVIII, 15; Rom. I, 29, 30.

Section III. On the Injury of Honor, or on Insult

(St. Thomas, II-II, qq. 72, 75, 105; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book III, nn. 966, 984-990; Homo Apostolicus, tract 11, nn. 3-6.)

1080 Honor is a testimony concerning someone's excellence, in his presence (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 103, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, III, 966). It is said:

1. Testimony; namely, either through words, or through actions, for example genuflection, etc., or through honorific things, for example through the erection of a statue, etc.
2. Concerning excellence, i.e. concerning superiority in some perfection, whether with respect to the one honoring, or with respect to others (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 103, a. 2). Moreover, "in anyone there is found something from which someone can reckon him superior, according to that saying in Philippians 2: in humility, considering others superior; and according to this also all ought to anticipate one another with honor" (St. Thomas, loc. cit., ad 3).
3. In his presence; these things will be clearer from the notion of the opposite, or insult, about which something must now be said.

1081 I. Notion. Insult is an undue dishonoring of someone, or an undue testimony concerning someone's baseness, in his presence. It is said:

1. Undue; i.e. one which is made without a just cause.
2. Testimony; this can be made both by words and by deeds, insofar as they are signs or have the force of signifying words (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 72, a. 1), as if you strike someone with a slap, thereby signifying that he is base.
3. Concerning someone's baseness, or concerning this, that someone is unworthy of honor and worthy of contempt.
4. In his presence. "The insulting person," says St. Thomas, "speaks to a man to his face; whence if someone speaks badly about another before many people, with him absent, it is detraction; but if with him alone present, it is insult (II-II, q. 73, a. 1, ad 2); if with others present together with him, it is detraction and insult." But it suffices that someone be present through a representative; likewise, that someone should write injurious things to another.

Insult differs from that disordering which is called negative insult, and which consists in this, that someone merely omits to furnish due honor; this is opposed to observance. But the omission of due honor accidentally rather often contains true insult, namely if, considering the circumstances, it involves a signification of contempt, as if someone, meeting several equal superiors, shows honor only to one.

1082 II. Morality. 1. Insult is a grave sin from its kind, and indeed against justice. It is said to be grave from its kind; this is clear both from Sacred Scripture[1] and from the fact that it contains a sin of injustice, which is grave from its kind (n. 978). It is opposed to justice; for everyone has the right that another not illegitimately signify to him that he is unworthy of honor and worthy of contempt (St. Alphonsus, III, 966).

The gravity of matter depends: 1° on the matter considered in itself, with attention both to the native signification of the words and to the affection from which they proceed, since this can temper the signification not a little. "Signification," says Aquinas, "proceeds from the interior affection; and therefore in sins of words it seems especially to be considered from what affection someone utters the words" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 72, a. 2). The gravity of matter depends 2° on the condition of the person injuring and the person injured; 3° on the common judgment of men in that region concerning the injury. Hence, for example, men of the lowest condition, who affect one another with insults, ordinarily do not sin gravely (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 37).

2. The diverse modes by which insult is inflicted, as such, seem to be of the same species, because, insofar as they are injurious to honor, they are not morally diverse, but differ only according to more and less.

3. The mere omission of due honor, or negative insult, which I have added because of the affinity of the matter, is opposed to observance, as we have already noted, and per se and for the most part is venial; yet accidentally, as was likewise noted, it rather often is equivalent to true insult.

Corollary I. "Since the sin of abusive speech or insult depends on the mind of the one speaking, it can happen that it is a venial sin, if it is a slight abusive speech, not greatly dishonoring the man, and is uttered from some levity of mind or from slight anger, without a firm purpose of dishonoring someone; for example, when someone intends to sadden someone slightly through a word of this sort" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 72, a. 2, ad 3).

Corollary II. "Just as it is lawful to strike someone, or to damage him in his things, for the sake of discipline, so also for the sake of discipline someone can say some abusive word to another whom he ought to correct; and in this way the Lord called the disciples fools, and the Apostle called the Galatians senseless. Yet, as Augustine says in book 2 On the Sermon of the Lord on the Mount (ch. 19), 'rebukes are to be employed rarely and from great necessity'" (St. Thomas, loc. cit., ad 2).

Corollary III. "To eutrapelia it pertains to say some slight abusive speech, not for the dishonoring or saddening of him against whom it is said, but rather for the sake of delight and jest; and this can be without sin, if due circumstances are observed" (St. Thomas, loc. cit., ad 1).

[1] Matt. V, 22; Rom. I, 30.

1083 III. Restitution on account of insult. Insult always injures the honor of him against whom it is inflicted. Besides, if it is inflicted before others or afterwards becomes known to others, it can also have other connected damages, namely both a diminution of good estimation and the omission of due honor on the part of others. Now:

1. The insulting person is held to furnish satisfaction for the injured honor; but the damages perhaps connected with the insult, and at least confusedly foreseen, he is held to repair or avert.

2. With respect to the mode of making satisfaction and restoring, there is required such a mode as, considering the circumstances of the person injured and the person injuring, the gravity of the injury, the custom of the place, etc., suffices for repairing honor (St. Alphonsus, III, 986). Hence:

a) If the one dishonoring was a superior, it will suffice if he honorably greets the dishonored person, invites him home, shows benevolence, etc. The contrary holds if he was an equal or inferior; then greater satisfaction is required, namely that he anticipate him in greeting, yield place, ask pardon. This mode indeed is more apt for compensating insult. Besides, such a request for pardon is not necessary except when satisfaction cannot be made otherwise; hence a prelate is not held to ask pardon from a subject, a master from a servant, or a husband from a wife (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

b) If honor has been taken away publicly through insult, it must also be restored publicly before those who were present at the dishonoring, or at least in a mode by which the satisfaction can easily come to their knowledge (St. Alphonsus, III, 984). But if the dishonored person is judged rather to refuse than to desire that public satisfaction, lest the memory of the injury received return among others, or lest he himself be affected with more shame, another way of making satisfaction should be sought, for example by honoring the dishonored person with extraordinary actions (St. Alphonsus, III, 988).

3. The same things which excuse from restitution of reputation exempt from restitution of honor (n. 1074). Moreover, many times it will happen to be expedient that the confessor omit warning a penitent existing in good faith, who has dishonored another, about furnishing satisfaction, for example: 1° if he foresees that the warning will not be profitable; for experience establishes that penitents easily promise such satisfactions, but with difficulty actually fulfill them, on account of the shame which they afterwards feel or apprehend in this; 2° if there is danger lest, in the act of satisfaction, hatreds between the offended person and the offender be renewed (St. Alphonsus, III, 988).

Scholion. On Derision

1084 (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 75.)

I. Notion. Derision occurs when someone, by jesting, objects something vicious to another, for this end, that he blush or be confounded; by jesting, i.e. by turning someone's defect into laughter.

Derision differs from insult, detraction, and whispering, because derision intends someone's blushing; insult, the injury of honor; detraction, the injury of reputation; whispering, the dissolution of friendship.

"Sins of words," says St. Thomas, "are principally to be weighed according to the intention of the one uttering them; and therefore sins of this sort are distinguished according to the diverse things which someone intends when speaking against another. For just as someone by abusing intends to depress the honor of the one abused, and by detracting to diminish reputation, and by whispering to take away friendship, so also by mocking someone intends that he who is mocked should blush; and because this end is distinct from the others, therefore also the sin of derision is distinguished from the aforementioned sins" (II-II, q. 75, a. 1).

1085 II. Modes of deriding. Derision can be done: 1° by the mouth, namely by words and laughter, and it is called mockery; 2° by wrinkling the nose, sticking out the tongue, etc., and it is called scoffing; 3° by deeds, for example by bending the knee, etc., and it is called ridicule. But the aforesaid modes, as is clear, do not differ in species.

1086 III. Morality. 1. Derision is a grave sin when someone's defect grave in itself is turned into laughter; for true or grave contempt is had in this, that someone is so little esteemed and held so base that his grave defects are turned into sport, as if they were the defects of a child or a fool (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 75, a. 2). But if a defect slight in itself is turned into laughter, there is not true or grave contempt, and therefore only a slight sin.

2. Derision "is a sin so much the graver, as greater reverence is owed to the person who is mocked" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.).

"Whence it is most grave to mock God and the things which are God's, according to that saying of Isaiah 37: Whom have you reproached? and whom have you blasphemed? and against whom have you exalted your voice? and afterwards it is added: Against the Holy One of Israel. Next place is held by mockery of parents; whence it is said in Proverbs 30: The eye that mocks his father and despises the birth of his mother, let the ravens of the torrents pluck it out and the young of the eagle eat it. Next, the derision of the just is grave; because honor is the reward of virtue, and against this it is said in Job 12: The simplicity of the just is derided; and this derision indeed is very harmful, because through this men are impeded from doing well" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.).

3. Derision is free from fault: 1° if it is done so that the one derided may recover from sin; 2° if friends, without danger of offense, for the sake of recreation, jokingly object certain slight things to one another.

Section IV. On Injury of a Secret

1087 I. Notion. A secret is a hidden matter which cannot be manifested.

1088 II. Division. A secret is distinguished into natural, promised, and entrusted. A natural secret is one which, from the nature of the matter, must be kept, namely because it cannot be revealed without damage or grief to one's neighbor; as if you know where someone has hidden his money, and you reveal this to a thief. A promised secret is one which someone, after receiving knowledge of it, has freely promised to keep; it can at the same time be natural. An entrusted secret is one which has been communicated to someone who did not know it, and who expressly or tacitly promised that he would keep it. By force of a tacit pact, for example, physicians, advocates, theologians, religious superiors, and others to whom recourse is had because of the office which they discharge, for the sake of seeking counsel, are bound to an entrusted secret (St. Alphonsus, III, 970). I said by force of a tacit pact; for by undertaking the office they undertake an obligation without which, if it had not been undertaken, subjects and clients would not approach them with sufficient security for the sake of seeking counsel or imploring help.

1089 III. Obligation of keeping a secret. 1. A natural secret obliges from charity if the revelation merely creates sorrow; from justice if it creates damage for one's neighbor. Hence the said obligation is grave from its kind.

A proportionate cause excuses from the obligation, as was said concerning manifestation of a hidden crime or defect (n. 1070). Yet it is clear that a secret cannot be revealed if common damage would be imminent from the revelation (St. Alphonsus, III, 970).

2. A promised secret obliges from fidelity or from justice, according as was said concerning a promise in general (n. 864).

The obligation of a promised secret ceases or does not subsist: 1° by the consent, even presumed, of the promisee; 2° if from another source there was, or there arises, an obligation of revealing the secret, as if you are legitimately questioned by a judge or by a superior (St. Alphonsus, III, 970; IV, 268); 3° if it cannot be kept without such inconvenience that the one promising cannot be judged to have wished to bind himself with so great a burden. Moreover, these statements hold even if the promise was confirmed by oath.

Sometimes a promise is added to a natural secret; in that case the added promise is judged to be merely confirmatory of the obligation already existing, so that it stands or falls with the latter. Yet it is not repugnant that an obligation independent of the existing obligation be intended and assumed. Apply the same to an oath, if perhaps it is added to a natural secret.

Question. To what extent is he obliged who expressly promised that he would keep a secret of very great importance even with the loss of life? I said of very great importance, because otherwise the promise would certainly be prodigal and therefore invalid.

Response. Some say that he is not obliged, because from the precept of charity each person is bound to prefer his own life to another's good, however very grave. Others maintain the obligation, because every promise of an honorable object obliges. But the promise about which we are speaking regards an honorable object; since it is permitted "for an honorable end to omit the preservation of one's own life in order to save another's life... because this is not directly to bring death upon oneself, but not to protect life, which is permitted for a just cause: therefore very probably the doctors... say that in the proposed case you are sufficiently obliged to keep the secret even with danger of life, if you promised it" (St. Alphonsus, III, 971). Yet note that the words even with danger of life must more often be taken less strictly according to the mind of the one promising.

3. An entrusted secret obliges from justice, and therefore by an obligation grave from its kind (n. 978). Moreover, the said obligation is stricter by reason of the onerous contract intervening. With respect to the promise at least tacitly made by the adviser, there is added the fact that it is of the greatest interest to the common good that the secret entrusted to him bind most strictly, namely so that men may be able to seek counsel without fear of revelation. Yet it is sufficiently probable that it is not a grave sin to reveal an entrusted secret to one or another person who will certainly keep it and will not even reveal it to one or another person. Moreover, this is sufficiently probable because in that case the secret remains safe as to its substance. Except, however, if the secret is revealed to him from whom the one entrusting it wishes it to be hidden before all others; in that case it would be a grave sin (St. Alphonsus, III, 971). I said sufficiently probably, because a contract is involved, and it is doubtful whether that more benign interpretation is valid; with respect to a natural secret, the matter is certain.

The obligation of an entrusted secret ceases: 1° by the consent, even reasonably presumed, of the one entrusting the secret; 2° if, from the secret being kept, grave damage is imminent either to the common good, or to the one entrusting the secret himself, or - provided he accepted the secret without force or fraud - to the one accepting the secret. The first two are sufficiently clear; the latter is drawn from this, that "no one is presumed to have obliged himself to such a burden, unless this certainly appears from the circumstances" (St. Alphonsus, III, 971). The obligation of an entrusted secret does not cease from the questioning of a judge or superior; and "you can respond that you know nothing, namely nothing to be revealed" (St. Alphonsus, III, 970). Except if the obligation of the secret has already ceased from another heading (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 70, a. 1, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, III, 970, 971; IV, 49, 248, 268).

What if grave damage is imminent to a third party from an entrusted secret being kept?

Response 1. If the damage is neither created nor culpably permitted by the one entrusting the secret, it is not lawful to reveal the secret; suppose that an advocate knows that an innocent man will be condemned, but the guilty man will be freed. If, because of special circumstances, the guilty man can permit the damage of the innocent man, the advocate also is bound to keep the secret entrusted to him.

Response 2. Outside the aforesaid case, I distinguish between those who are not bound by force of office and those who are bound by force of office to keep the secret. Now:

1. One who is not bound by force of office to keep the secret can certainly reveal it: 1° if the damage to the third party is created by the one entrusting the secret himself; as if a syphilitic, who pretends that he is healthy, intends to marry a bride ignorant of the bridegroom's disease; 2° if the damage to the third party is not indeed created by the one entrusting the secret, but nevertheless is culpably permitted by him; as if the guilty man mentioned above would culpably permit the damage of the innocent man. The reason for both is that charity demands that the secret be disclosed in order to avert damage to one's neighbor, unless the common good stands in the way. But the common good does not require that one who is not bound by force of office to be silent should be obliged to be silent, if a grave cause for speaking, i.e. for revealing the secret, exists (St. Alphonsus, III, 971).
2. The same, with St. Alphonsus and others against many, seems to be admitted if there is question of those who are bound by force of office to keep a secret; as if a physician knows that the bridegroom is afflicted with a contagious disease, and nevertheless does not wish to abstain from marriage. For on the one hand the reason just given is valid; on the other hand, the common good in this case does not demand that secrets of this sort be kept even with grave damage to a third party. For it is more in the interest of the common good that provision be made for the innocent person than for the harmful one, i.e. for him who wishes to inflict unjust damage on an innocent person, or who does not wish himself, by manifestation of the secret, to avert the damage to be inflicted on the innocent person (St. Alphonsus, III, 971). Yet the physician, etc., would be excused if grave damage to himself, for example hatred of citizens, a penalty to be imposed, etc., would be imminent from the revelation.

Objection 1. The common good demands that each person be able, without fear of revelation, to entrust a secret to those who furnish counsel by reason of office.

Response. On account of the reason just given, I deny the assertion with respect to those about whom the discussion is here. Nor, for that reason, will others to whom these things cannot be applied reasonably seek counsel with fear.

Objection 2. One who knows an impediment of marriage under an entrusted secret is not bound to reveal it, although there is question of averting damage.

Response. I deny the assertion taken generally; namely, one is bound to reveal an impediment, however known under an entrusted secret, if it is supposed and known that the impediment is known to one of the persons about to marry and unknown to the other, and therefore that formal injustice will be committed by one of the persons about to marry. And a case of this kind is especially intended by us.

Note 1. To an entrusted secret also belongs what is called a quasi-sacramental secret, namely one which arises from the manifestation of conscience to a superior or spiritual director, for the sake of seeking counsel or obtaining spiritual direction. Before this secret can be revealed, or even merely used, to avert some damage, even common damage, generally the one seeking counsel should first be warned concerning his obligation of preventing that damage by spontaneous manifestation or use of the secret; if he refuses, it should be well weighed whether in the case the gravity of the damage in question is not to be postponed to the gravity of that common damage which arises from the fact that, at least apparently, faith is broken in this matter.[1]

Note 2. In some kingdoms a promissory oath concerning keeping a secret must be made by physicians; this oath, as is clear, is not valid insofar as you suppose that in some respect it is opposed to the law of nature.

[1] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis, I, n. 1004.

1090 IV. Investigation of a secret. 1. Per se it is illicit and unjust to seek out another's secret against his will, for example by questioning deceitfully, reading letters, spying on the things which someone purposely does secretly, or by extorting a secret by a certain force. The reason is that one acting thus deprives another of his own thing; since a secret or hidden matter is most proper to a man. Moreover, it is a grave or light sin according as there is question of a grave or light matter. Except, with respect to a grave matter, if someone fishes out another's secret with the intention of keeping it to himself; this is sufficiently probably only light (n. 1069).

2. It is lawful to seek out a secret if there is at least presumed permission of the owner, or a proportionate cause, of which sort is damage to be averted, whether common damage, or grave damage to oneself or one's own. The reason is that there is no injury if the other consents or is bound to consent to the investigation itself of the secret.

Corollary I. It is lawful to read another's letters (i.e. whether written by subjects or sent to subjects): 1° as was said, from consent, even presumed, either of the writer or of the recipient; 2° if from the secret of the letters common damage, or damage to oneself or a third party, is feared; 3° if the rule of a religious institute prescribes or permits this, namely for the common good. Besides, parents, guardians, and superiors of institutes generally can read the letters of subjects, namely lest some evil befall them. A husband, however, per se cannot inspect letters given to his wife, since she is not plainly a subject but a companion. Often there will be consent at least presumed. For the rest, what a religious superior can do should be drawn from the rule and from custom (St. Alphonsus, III, 969; V, 70).

Corollary II. It seems illicit to join and read fragments of letters that have been torn very small and thrown away, because the owner, by tearing the letters, sufficiently signifies that he does not wish them to be read. The contrary must be said if the owner tore them into larger parts and voluntarily threw them into a place accessible to all (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

1091 V. Use of a secret. 1. Use of a secret communicated as such, which takes place without revelation of the secret - suppose if someone uses knowledge of a secret to direct others in the way of perfection - is lawful if it is done without damage to him whose secret it was; for what does not harm you is, with the required suppositions in place, lawful for me. If it is done with damage, it is illicit, unless there is added the consent, at least presumed, of the one communicating the secret, or a proportionate cause for allowing the damage; for a secret is judged to have been communicated with the burden of not harming the one communicating the secret.

2. Use of a secret not communicated, but investigated by just industry - suppose an invention publicly displayed and attentively inspected by an expert - is lawful; since the one investigating by his own industry made the secret his own, and therefore he can use it; except if a monopoly of using it had already been granted to another by the State.
3. Use (whether revelation, or use without revelation) of a secret unjustly extorted, with damage to him whose secret it was, is lawful for averting damage to oneself or to others only when the matter has been brought to that state in which it would be lawful to seek out the secret; otherwise it is illicit, because it would be a continuation of the injustice (St. Alphonsus, III, 969).

Dissertation II. On the Precepts of the Church

1092 The principal precepts of the Church, common to all, are: 1° the sanctification of Sundays and feast days; 2° abstinence and fasting; 3° annual confession; 4° Easter communion; 5° the censorship and prohibition of books. Concerning the sanctification of certain days we spoke in Part III, concerning the third precept of the Decalogue (n. 701 ff.). It remains for us to treat the last four precepts, with a scholion on the forbidden cremation of bodies added.

Part I. On Abstinence and Fasting

(St. Thomas, II-II, qq. 146-147; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book III, nn. 1004-1050; Homo Apostolicus, tract 12, nn. 2-34.)

From history it is established that the law of abstinence and fasting is merely ecclesiastical; likewise, that the said law was introduced by custom rather than by law properly so called. From this it follows that it must be explained especially by custom. Having noted these things, receive the law of abstinence and fasting as it has now also been established by written law.

1093 I. The law of abstinence alone is to be observed on each Friday (can. 1252, § 1).

II. The law of abstinence and fasting together is to be observed on Ash Wednesday, on the Fridays and Saturdays of Lent and of the Ember Days, on the vigils of Pentecost, of the Mother of God assumed into heaven, of All Saints, and of the Nativity of the Lord (can. 1252, § 2).[1]

III. The law of fasting alone is to be observed on all the remaining days of Lent (can. 1252, § 3).

IV. On Sundays or feasts of precept the law of abstinence, or of abstinence and fasting, or of fasting alone ceases, except on a feast during the time of Lent, nor are vigils anticipated; likewise, it ceases on Holy Saturday after midday (can. 1252, § 4). Moreover:

1. In view of can. 6, 6°, the following have been abrogated: 1° the law of abstinence on Saturdays outside Lent and the Ember Days;[2] 2° the law of fasting and abstinence on Wednesdays and Fridays of Advent, outside the Ember Days.[3]
2. The law of fasting persists if the feast of St. Joseph (19 March) falls on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday, or Thursday of Lent; the law of fasting and abstinence persists if it falls on Friday or Saturday.[4]
3. If some feast day to be observed under precept in the universal Church has been suppressed in some region, the law of abstinence persists;[5] it likewise persists, if in some region or diocese a habitual dispensation has been granted by the Holy See, say for five years, from a feast day not suppressed; because the foundation of cessation falls away.
4. If some feast day which has a fast attached on the vigil falls on Monday, the fast ceases, so that it no longer has to be anticipated on the preceding Saturday, without prejudice, however, to particular law.[6]

Having noted these things concerning the time at which the laws mentioned oblige, we shall set forth each law distinctly.

[1] By force of an Apostolic Indult, the law of abstinence in the dioceses of Belgium is to be observed not on Saturday, except for the Ember Days, but on Wednesday and Friday through the time of Lent.

[2] Although it is not altogether established that the said law was universal in the full sense, nevertheless certainly in the places where it was in force it bound after the manner of a universal law, so that even travelers in those places were bound by it (S. Off., 10 June 1855). Hence can. 6, 6°, which speaks about universal laws, should be applied to it.

[3] This law also possessed a universal character, both because it was once universal, and because, having fallen into desuetude, it was introduced anew by Clement XIV in many regions in place of a universal law, namely that of the abrogated Vigils (Brief Paterna caritate, 1771).

[4] P. C., 24 Nov. 1920 (A. A. S. 1920, p. 573).

[5] P. C., 17 Feb. 1918 (A. A. S. 1918, p. 170).

[6] P. C., 24 Nov. 1920 (A. A. S. 1920, p. 573).

Section I. On the Law of Abstinence

1094 I. Object of the law. The law of abstinence forbids eating meat and broth from meat, but not eggs, dairy products, and any condiments whatever, even from the fat of animals (can. 1250). It is said:

1. Meat; wherefore observe these things:

a) By the word meat are included not only flesh taken more strictly, but also other constitutive parts of an animal, such as blood, bacon, marrow, etc. Yet the following are permitted: 1° a thing not prohibited in itself which has been mixed with meat, provided that only a little of the meat has remained in it. The reason is that a little is reputed as nothing. Therefore oil in which meat has been fried is permitted.[1] Some concede the same with respect to vegetable fat and Palmin,[2] in which meat has been fried.[3] But this seems doubtful to others, because in that case too much meat remains in the fat. The same reason for doubting holds with respect to butter in which meat has been fried. 2° Peptones which are obtained from pepsin and vegetable albumin; but not those which are prepared from pepsin and animal albumin. "To take" the latter, Antonelli says, "is the same as to eat the more principal substance of meat already wholly digested";[4] the fact that they are not called meat, but have a special name, and do not have the taste of meat, does not prevent them from being judged meat.

b) Rules for discerning whether animals are meat or fish, or at least whether they are prohibited or permitted.

alpha) Before all else, common estimation and custom should be attended to (St. Alphonsus, III, 1011).

beta) If common estimation and custom are lacking, these things should be observed: 1° those animals are judged meat which are accustomed to live on land, or at least for a long time outside water; 2° amphibians are counted with those animals to which they bear the greater likeness[5] (St. Alphonsus, III, 1011; Homo Apostolicus, tract 12, n. 2).

gamma) If, considering the things said above, the matter is doubtful with respect to certain animals, it is lawful to eat them until a declaration of the Church removes the doubt.

c) Applications. With attention to the rules set forth:

alpha) Among others, birds are counted as meat, although some are nourished in water, such as divers and ducks.

beta) Frogs, snails, turtles, oysters, shellfish, and lobsters are counted as fish, or are equated with fish with respect to our matter; the same must be said about caviar, as the Sacred Penitentiary declared.[6] gamma) With respect to otters, beavers, coots, etc., custom should be attended to.

2. And broth from meat; by the name of broth from meat is understood the water in which meat - to which bones also pertain - has been boiled. Moreover, it is prohibited absolutely, so that it cannot even be used after the manner of a condiment. But if it could be taken in such a mode, the legislator certainly would have signified this, just as he did with respect to a condiment from fat. Add that even previously the use of fat after the manner of a condiment had been conceded, but not truly the use of broth from meat.

Hence liquid foods prepared from meat broth, bouillon, are prohibited; likewise those prepared from Liebig. Foods prepared from Maggi are some prohibited, others not prohibited, according as the Maggi used consists of elements of meat or of others; namely, each case occurs.

3. But the law of abstinence does not forbid using eggs, dairy products (milk, butter, cheese), and any condiments whatever (butter, margarine,[7] etc.), even from the fat of animals. With respect to animal fat observe:

a) By the name of fat is understood not only swine fat, but the fat of any animal whatever;[8] likewise fat extracted from bacon, for it can come under the name of fat.[9] Likewise those bits of bacon which remain whole from the same rendered bacon can be eaten, provided they continue to be part of the condiment.[10] From what has been said it also follows that it is lawful to eat bread spread with fat: both because it can be said that not only that which is cooked with food is taken after the manner of a condiment, but also that which is added to it merely for the sake of increasing flavor; and because the law, if taken more severely, would harm the poor especially.

b) Fat - just like butter, margarine, and similar things - seems lawful, even if it is not used after the manner of a condiment. The reason is that it seems to be equated by the legislator with other condiments which are certainly lawful. The fact that the law uses the word condiment is explained from this, that the aforesaid things are accustomed to be used only after the manner of a condiment.

[1] S. Poenit., 17 Nov. 1897.

[2] These, of themselves, consist only of plant elements.

[3] N. K. Stemmen, 1909, p. 126.

[4] Medicina Pastoralis, II, 868.

[5] Benedict XIV, De Synodo, book II, ch. 5, n. 12.

[6] 16 Jan. 1834.

[7] Cf. S. Off., 5 Sept. 1906 (A. S. S. XXXIX, p. 455).

[8] S. Off., 1 May 1889; 25 March 1895.

[9] Cf. S. Off., 25 March 1895 (A. S. S. III, p. 276), and S. C. C., 29 April 1911 (A. S. S. XXVIII, p. 570).

[10] S. Poenit., 17 Nov. 1897.

1095 II. Subject of the law. All who have completed the seventh year of age are held by the law of abstinence (can. 1254, § 1). Therefore one who has not yet completed the seventh year of age is not held, even if he has arrived at the use of reason. Likewise, in view of can. 12, one is not held who, although the seventh year of age has been completed, has not yet attained the use of reason. One who completes the seventh year of age on a day of abstinence seems not yet to be held to abstinence on that day, but only from midnight of the following day (cf. can. 34, § 3, 3°).

1096 III. Obligation of the law. It is grave from its kind. Practically, however, it can be said that grave matter is 20 grams.[1]

Besides, observe: 1° small quantities coalesce; 2° sin is committed as often as prohibited food is eaten. The reason is that the essence of the precept consists in abstinence from meats as long as the day lasts; hence one who has violated the precept at some time of the day violates it again if at another time of the day he again eats meats (St. Alphonsus, III, 1030, q. 1). But it is another question whether, after grave matter has been completed, new acts of eating - abstracting from a retracted will - are sins new in number, or the same continued sin. The latter opinion does not lack foundation, because there is one precept for each whole day (cf. n. 254).

[1] Some think - but without sufficient reason - that on days of abstinence alone a larger quantity is required for grave matter than on days of fasting and abstinence.

1097 IV. Excusing causes. "Many," as Aertnys-Damen rightly note, "need more than one meal on a day of fasting; but few need forbidden foods, at least in our time, in which the law of abstinence has been greatly mitigated in the Code of Canon Law."[1] Yet the following are excused:

1. The sick, or those so weak that they cannot digest fasting foods. Likewise pregnant or nursing women, if they are weak, if their infant is sick or danger of sickness threatens the infant; likewise if they vehemently desire meat (St. Alphonsus, III, 1033).
2. The poor who beg - likewise those who would beg, unless shame prohibited them - can eat what they receive, and this even if on that day they have fasting foods, because the Church is not judged to prohibit them from enjoying an advantage unusual for them.
3. The poor who have nothing else except a small piece of fat or bacon for seasoning porridge or lettuce.
4. Workers who daily devote themselves to labors so arduous and so fatiguing to the stomach that, after the manner of the sick, they do not experience hunger and have an aversion to foods; of this sort are those who pass their life in mines, or in glass or iron foundries.
5. Travelers who, for example in inns, cannot have lawful foods without great difficulty.
6. Children of the household, male servants, and maids who are in the same condition as the said travelers. With respect to persons who are in the power of a father of a family to whom a legitimate faculty of eating meats has been granted, the Sacred Penitentiary[2] declared that "permission made by a simple confessor suffices," if the father cannot or will not prepare two meals; the sense of this declaration seems to be that the confessor can practically declare, in the supposed hypothesis, that a case of inability is present.
7. A guest who finds a meal furnished with prohibited foods and cannot easily obtain other dishes; for by departing, or by eating only lawful things, he would for the most part provoke a notable disturbance or even enmity. If someone must attend a meal which he foresees will be prepared with meats, he should ask for a dispensation in time. If time is not available, he should proceed as was just said. But if someone spends several days among relatives or very close friends who do not observe the law, permitted foods are more easily obtained without grave inconvenience.
8. If prohibited condiments have been used in good faith, and the error is discovered only when the meal is imminent, it is lawful to take foods seasoned in this way. - If an entire meal has been prepared with meats, it can be taken if it cannot be left without grave inconvenience; suppose if time is lacking for preparing another suitable meal, or if anger and quarrels are feared.

[1] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis, I, n. 1065.

[2] 27 May 1863.

1098 V. Dispensation. 1. Not only the Ordinaries of places, but also pastors, in individual cases and for a just cause, can dispense individual faithful subject to them, or individual families, even outside the territory, and in their own territory also travelers, from the common law concerning the observance of feasts and likewise from the observance of abstinence and fasting, or even of both (can. 1245, § 1); suppose on the occasion of marriage, or funerals, or golden weddings.

The same, in view of can. 1368, seems to have to be said concerning the rector of a seminary with respect to all who are in the seminary; this, at least with the Church supplying, is practically certain.

2. Ordinaries, from a special cause of a great concourse of the people or of public health, can also dispense the whole diocese or place from fasting and from abstinence, or even from both laws together (can. 1245, § 2). And the P. C.[1] declared that a great concourse of the people is had even through an extraordinary concourse of the faithful of only one parish to a feast to be celebrated in a church.

3. In an exempt clerical religious institute, Superiors have the same power of dispensing after the manner of a pastor, so far as concerns professed members, novices, or others dwelling in the religious house day and night by reason of service, education, hospitality, or ill health (can. 1245, § 3).

4. Finally note the dispensation, both from the law of abstinence and, if ever it occurs, from the law of fasting, granted on 7 March 1924 by Pius XI to all who have attended a Eucharistic Congress, whether international, or of one nation, region, or diocese, also on the occasion of the journey.[2]

Note 1. One who is not held by the law of fasting - whether because he has not yet attained the required age, or because he has been dispensed from the law, or is excused from it - can, on those days on which the law of fasting alone is in force but not that of abstinence, eat meats as often as he eats during the day. Others can eat meats only at the full meal, while preserving morning and evening the approved custom of places concerning the quantity and quality of foods.

Note 2. It is lawful, as it seems, on Holy Saturday - just as on other days (n. 1099) - to begin the full meal after the eleventh hour; likewise to eat meats in it; since, in view of the obvious sense of can. 1252, § 4, both laws cease at the same moment. Therefore the word midday, which the canon uses, should be taken in a broad sense. However, on Holy Saturday it is not lawful to take breakfast, even if the law of fasting ceases after midday. The reason is that the law commands the continuation of the fast until midday.

Note 3. The obligation of almsgiving or prayers which Bishops are accustomed to impose in a dispensation from the law of abstinence is certainly only light, if the work imposed is light; nor does the matter, as imposed for individual days, coalesce. If the work is grave, nevertheless, considering the character of a dispensation - otherwise than of a commutation - the obligation seems light.

[1] 12 March 1929, ad III (A. A. S. 1929, p. 170).

[2] A. A. S. 1924, p. 157.

Section II. On the Law of Fasting

1099 I. Object of the law. The law of fasting prescribes that only one meal be taken during the day; but it does not forbid taking some food in the morning and evening, while preserving the approved custom of places concerning the quantity and quality of foods. Nor is it forbidden to mix meats and fish in the same meal; nor to exchange the evening refection with the dinner (can. 1251). Besides, drink is never prohibited, nor certain things which are not taken after the manner of nourishment. We shall explain the several points.

1. One refection, which is called dinner. Moreover:

a) The full refection, which originally could begin only at a later hour, can now by custom be begun about midday, and indeed, by the same custom broadly interpreting the midday hour, at the eleventh hour. In calculating the hour it is lawful to follow the common usage of the place; likewise the time of the place, whether local, true or mean, or legal, whether regional or some other extraordinary time (can. 33, § 1; n. 167).

Besides, the determination of the hour no longer pertains to the substance of the precept, so that even a notable anticipation is not prohibited under grave sin. This can be deduced both from the fact that the law makes no mention of the hour of the one meal, and from the fact that, considering changed customs, the law has already for a longer time been accepted by more recent authors in that sense. Yet the determination of the hour pertains to the integrity of the law, so that anticipation per se involves venial fault; for the law permits only taking some food in the morning and exchanging the small supper with the dinner (can. 1251, § 2). Hence per se it is illicit to take dinner in the morning; but it is lawful to take the small supper at the eleventh hour and dinner in the evening (can. cited); likewise, for a reasonable cause, to take the small supper in the morning, dinner at midday, and a little piece in the evening (St. Alphonsus, III, 1024).[1]

b) The full refection can be prolonged for two hours (St. Alphonsus, III, 1020, question 5). Besides, St. Alphonsus neither approves nor reproves the custom, if it is in force somewhere, of placing on the table, notably beyond two hours - namely for another hour or two - only sweetmeats or lighter foods, provided the little evening refection is omitted (loc. cit.).

c) The full refection, by the very fact that only one is permitted, must at least be morally continued. Wherefore observe:

alpha) An interruption made for a reasonable cause does not prevent one from returning to dinner (St. Alphonsus, III, 1020, questions 3 and 4).

beta) An interruption of a quarter hour or even half an hour does not prevent returning to dinner, even if it was already regarded as finished (St. Alphonsus, III, 1020). After the full refection has been taken, to eat again after an hour is a grave sin. If the refection has not yet been completed, an interruption of two hours is required for grave fault.

d) One who, whether culpably or inculpably, has taken a double refection does not sin gravely by refreshing himself a third time or more often. The reason is that the substance of the precept consists in abstinence from a second refection; hence, once the second refection has been taken, the substance of the precept no longer subsists, and therefore it can no longer be violated (St. Alphonsus, III, 1030, questions 1 and 2). Yet according to St. Alphonsus and others he sins venially, "because to act contrary to the end of the law is a certain disorder which does not seem to be excused from all fault" (III, 1030, question 1). But one who, whether culpably or inculpably, has injured the law of fasting only in accidental things is per se bound to keep it according to its substance. Hence, for example, one who has breakfasted in the morning, if the breakfast is equivalent to the small supper, should take dinner in the customary way and a little piece in the evening, or arrange the matter in some other way so that the substance of the law is preserved. If the breakfast is equivalent to a full refection, afterwards he can take only the small supper and a little piece, unless, because of inconvenience, a full refection must again be conceded to him (St. Alphonsus, III, 1020, question 4). Others, however, think that one who from inadvertence, and therefore inculpably, has breakfasted can thereafter fast as others fast, and consequently take dinner and the small supper.

2. The little morning refection is permitted, while preserving approved custom concerning the quantity and quality of foods. Now, half an ounce of denarius weight, or 60 grams, is permitted, whether of bread or of a nourishing drink, such as chocolate, etc.; in some regions even stronger foods - not, however, meats[2] - are permitted.

It is also permitted that one, repeatedly during the day, take a little bit of food for this purpose, lest drink harm him; likewise that he take certain electuaries in a small quantity, not indeed after the manner of nourishment, but, for example, to preserve the voice, remove bad odor of the mouth, or assist digestion (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 147, a. 6, ad 3; St. Alphonsus, III, 1018, 1019; Homo Apostolicus, tract 12, n. 11).

3. The small supper, or evening refection, is likewise permitted, while again preserving approved custom concerning the quantity and quality of foods. With this considered, the following can be established:

a) With respect to quantity. About 2 1/2 ounces of denarius weight, or about 250 grams, of foods not very nourishing are permitted to all, even to those who are plainly refreshed by the quantity to be assigned; but 300 grams are permitted in northern regions, and if someone needed more abundant food (St. Alphonsus, III, 1025). If the food is very nourishing,[3] only about 1 1/2 ounces of denarius weight, or 140-150 grams, can be taken. Besides, the assigned quantities can be increased a little if a just cause is added; indeed they can be increased as much as is necessary for duly carrying out the duties of one's state. Finally, if somewhere there exists a custom, on the Vigil of the Nativity or others, of doubling the quantity of the small supper, the "joyful fast," this can be observed, even if the chief reason, namely assistance at the nocturnal office, is not present (St. Alphonsus, III, 1025).

b) With respect to quality. Considering custom, in most regions nothing except meats is prohibited. Yet, as was said above, if the small supper consists of stronger foods - such as eggs, larger fish - only a smaller quantity is permitted (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 1026-1028).

4. Drink always permitted is understood as that which per se and ordinarily is used to extinguish thirst, refresh nature, and foster digestion, such as wine, beer, water, or coffee mixed with a small quantity of sugar, and this even if they nourish to some degree. Milk, meat broth, chocolate, and similar things are excluded, since they have rather the character of food; this also holds of fruits, such as apples, melons, etc., even if only the juice is swallowed (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 147, a. 6, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, III, 1022, 1023).

[1] Cf. S. Poenit., 19 Jan. 1834.

[2] The President of the Pontifical Commission, to the doubt whether on days of fasting alone meats can be taken several times, responded on 29 Oct. 1919: Negative (A. A. S. 1919, p. 480).

[3] From precisely the fact that food is cooked, for example into porridge, at least nowadays the quantity does not seem to be diminished. But in some dioceses cooked foods seem to be prohibited.

1100 II. Subject of the law. All are bound by the law of fasting from the completed twenty-first year of age to the begun sixtieth year (can. 1254, § 2).

Corollary I. In view of the cited canon, the opinion once defended by some, which exempted women in their fiftieth year from fasting, can no longer be sustained.

Corollary II. One who completes the twenty-first year on a day of fasting seems not yet to be held to fasting on that day, but only from midnight; one who begins the sixtieth year of age on a day of fasting seems exempt from fasting on that day, so that the obligation of fasting ceases once the fifty-ninth year of age has passed (cf. can. 34, § 3, 3°).

Corollary III. It is commonly admitted that religious who have begun the sixtieth year are exempt even from the fasts to which they are bound by force of profession, because the rules of religious are judged to oblige after the manner of ecclesiastical laws. It is disputed, however, whether the same can be said of robust young religious who have not yet completed the twenty-first year. Most deny it, because young men are presumed to have bound themselves also for a younger age. To this it can be answered that young men have bound themselves according to the mind of the rule. Hence, if it is doubted whether the rule comprehends them, in practice they are excused from the regular fast.

1101 III. Obligation of the law. On this point, first note proposition 23 condemned by Alexander VII: "One breaking the fast of the Church to which he is bound does not sin mortally unless he does it from contempt or disobedience, for example because he does not wish to subject himself to the precept."[1] Now the law of fasting obliges under grave sin insofar as it prohibits a second full refection. In addition, he sins gravely who, besides the full refection, whether in the small supper or otherwise, reaches grave prohibited matter. Moreover, according to St. Alphonsus, grave matter in violation of fasting is a quantity exceeding 30 grams of denarius weight (III, 1029). Hence he sins gravely who, for example, in the small supper adds to the permitted quantity a quantity greater than 30 grams. But if there is question of prohibited food, suppose meat, or eggs in a region where eggs are prohibited in the small supper, even a smaller quantity suffices. Besides, observe:

1. Small quantities coalesce, as is deduced from proposition 29 condemned by Alexander VIII: "On a day of fasting, one who more often eats a small amount of something, even if at the end he has eaten a notable quantity, does not break the fast"[2] (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
2. It is the same whether the permitted quantity is exceeded in the small supper or at another time.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1123.

[2] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1129.

1102 IV. Causes excusing from the law are infirmity, bodily labor, and spiritual labor.

1. Infirmity excuses: 1° not only the sick, but also those recovering; 2° the weak, who cannot take sufficient food in one refection; 3° those who from fasting suffer dizziness or notable pain of the head or stomach, or cannot sleep through a great part of the night; 4° pregnant or nursing women, which Capellmann-Bergmann[1] extends also to the time of menstruation; 5° the poor, who lack a sufficient dinner (St. Alphonsus, III, 1033-1036).
2. Bodily labor excuses if it is both necessary or useful to oneself or others, and grave and prolonged through a great part of the day. It is said:

a) Labor whether necessary or useful to oneself or others. Concerning this, note that the Church does not require that, in order to observe the fast, one abstain from necessary or useful labor; and this holds even if there is question of the rich, because it is of interest to the common good that useful labors not be interrupted (St. Alphonsus, III, 1042). It is disputed, however, whether it is lawful for the sake of pleasure alone to assume labor which cannot morally be combined with fasting. Moreover, some think that this can be done once or twice. But I rather adhere to the opinion which teaches that pleasure alone, not even once or twice, is a reason why it is lawful to place an impediment to a grave law that must be observed.

b) Grave labor, and prolonged through a great part of the day; otherwise, for the most part, it is compatible with fasting. Moreover, grave labor is the labor: 1° of farmers; 2° of workmen and artisans, except those who perform quiet works, such as barbers, tailors, and painters; 3° of male servants and maids, whether in a private family or in an institute or monastery, unless they perform only light services. To these also are to be counted those who make a laborious journey, suppose a journey on foot of 4-5 leagues, although it can happen that even a journey made by horse or carriage must be called laborious (St. Alphonsus, III, 1041, 1047); likewise those who use a bicycle for a long time. For the rest, note proposition 30 condemned by Alexander VII: "All officials who labor bodily in the State are excused from the obligation of fasting";[2] likewise proposition 31 proscribed by the same Pontiff: "All those who travel by riding are absolutely excused from the precept of fasting, however they make the journey, even if the journey is not necessary, and even if they complete a journey of one day."[3]

3. Grave spiritual labor likewise excuses, provided the conditions required with respect to bodily labor are also present in the case, in other words, provided the labor is necessary or at least useful, and is prolonged through a great part of the day. For this reason the following are commonly excused: 1° preachers who preach five or six times a week; 2° teachers of the higher sciences, who are almost continually intent upon study; 3° teachers of a lower science or art, who teach daily for several hours and therefore are fatigued by study and speaking; 4° confessors who hear confessions through the greater part of the day; 5° scholastics continually occupied with study (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 1049).

Corollary I. From what has been said it follows that grave labor, provided it is at least useful, can for the most part be undertaken, even if it is morally incompatible with fasting. Yet this should not be extended to all works, especially religious works and those useful only to the one acting. For many works of this sort are rather to be omitted or deferred than undertaken with injury to the fast, suppose - at least per se - a pilgrimage (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 147, a. 4, ad 3; St. Alphonsus, III, 1049).

Corollary II. Bodily labor, about which there has been discussion, is such that each person is presumed to be excused from fasting because of it; but if there is question of spiritual labor, it can more easily happen that someone is so robust that he is not excused because of it, but needs a dispensation (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Corollary III. One who in Lent performs labor which excuses from fasting is not bound to fast on one or another day on which perhaps he is free from labor, unless it is manifest that this can be done without danger of grave inconvenience. For the most part he will be excused either for restoring or for preserving his strength.

4. Labor not so grave in itself will rather often excuse when some infirmity is added.

[1] Pastoral-Medizin, 10th ed., p. 245.

[2] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1130.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1131.

1103 V. Dispensation. The same persons who can dispense from the law of abstinence can dispense from the law of fasting (n. 1098). Those who can dispense should generally acquiesce readily to the one seeking dispensation, and should remember that even in doubt whether there is a sufficient cause for dispensing, they can dispense.

Note. Canon 1253 establishes: By these canons, that is, by the canons explained by us, nothing is changed concerning particular indults, concerning vows of any physical or moral person, or concerning the constitutions and rules of any approved religion or institute of men or women living in common even without vows.

Part II. On Annual Confession

(St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 662-674; Homo Apostolicus, tract 12, nn. 35-38.)

1104 I. Existence of the precept. The precept of annual confession, enacted by the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215,[1] confirmed by the Council of Trent,[2] is stated thus by can. 906: "Every one of the faithful of either sex, after he has reached the years of discretion, that is, the use of reason, is bound faithfully to confess all his sins at least once a year." For the rest, note that the precept of confessing is divine, as will be said in the treatise on the sacrament of Confession, but the precept of annual confession is ecclesiastical.

[1] Chapter Omnis.

[2] Session 14, De Poenitentia, canon 8.

1105 II. The subject of the precept is those who have sinned mortally, and indeed - as is clear from can. 12, compared with can. 906 - even if they are not yet seven years old (St. Alphonsus, III, 270; VI, 686). It has been disputed whether those who have sinned only venially are held by the precept. This must be denied, considering, namely, the tenor of the law, which requires that the faithful "confess all their sins," so that if the aforesaid were held by the law, they would have to declare all venial sins; this cannot be admitted. It is confirmed by the fact that the Council of Trent[1] testifies that "nothing else is required in the Church from penitents than that... they confess those sins by which they remember having mortally offended their Lord and God" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 667).

Corollary. One who committed only venial sins and confessed them has not satisfied the precept for that year, since he was not bound by it. Yet sufficiently probably, by epikeia, he is not bound to confess again, even if during the same year he has committed a mortal sin: namely, the Church is not judged to oblige him to that. This is confirmed by the fact that otherwise he who had confessed only venial sins would be in a worse condition than he who had confessed a mortal sin. The same must be said about him who committed and confessed only doubtfully mortal sins.

[1] Session 14, De Poenitentia, chapter 5.

1106 III. Time of fulfilling the precept. The precept obliges each year, but not at a determined time. Moreover, some compute the year from 1 January to 31 December;[1] others from Easter to Easter;[2] others say that it suffices that no greater interval of time than twelve months intervene between successive confessions.

In the internal forum the confessor can as it were extend the time of annual confession, and this for a reason which pertains to confession, for example if he judges that absolution must be deferred.

Corollary I. One who, once the useful time has begun, foresees that an obstacle will be placed to fulfilling the law is bound to anticipate (n. 167; St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 12, n. 40).

Corollary II. One who has not satisfied the precept is more probably still bound to confess for the elapsed year, and indeed as soon as possible, because the time affixed seems to be for urging the obligation, not for ending it (St. Alphonsus, VI, 297, 668).

Corollary III. One who has confessed for the elapsed year is more probably bound to confess again in the same year if he again falls into mortal sin. The reason is that by the prior confession he satisfied a fulfillment affixed per se to the elapsed year, and a man of this sort cannot by epikeia be judged immune from the burden of confessing again (St. Alphonsus, VI, 669).

[1] With the year understood in this way, per se someone who confessed on 1 Jan. 1915 could postpone confession until 31 Dec. 1916.

[2] With the year understood in this way, one who confessed at Easter of the year 1915 could per se defer confession until the Saturday before Easter of the year 1917.

1107 IV. Mode of fulfilling the precept. 1. It is open to any one of the faithful to confess his sins to any legitimately approved confessor, even of another rite, whom he prefers. So says can. 905. For the rest, the obligation concerning which Lateran spoke, of confessing to one's own pastor or of asking permission from him so that confession could be made before another, has long since ceased.

St. Thomas had already written in his own time: "Moreover, a priest would sin if he were not ready to grant permission to confess to another, because many are so weak that they would rather die without confession than confess to such a priest. Hence those who are too solicitous to know through confession the consciences of their subjects cast many into a snare of damnation, and consequently themselves also... And therefore, if it seems expedient to superior prelates for promoting the salvation of the people and the honor of God, that they commit to others things which are of jurisdiction, no prejudice is done to inferior prelates, except to those who seek the things that are their own, not the things that are Jesus Christ's, and who preside over the flock not that they may feed it, but that they may be fed by it" (Supplementum, q. 8, arts. 4 and 5).

2. One who makes a sacrilegious or voluntarily null confession does not satisfy the precept of confessing sins (can. 907): sacrilegious, as if someone conceals sins; voluntarily null, suppose if a penitent, having confessed sacramentally and having been instructed by the confessor concerning a grave obligation, does not wish to fulfill it, so that he cannot be absolved.

Part III. On Easter Communion

(St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 295-301; Homo Apostolicus, tract 12, nn. 39-42.)

1108 I. Existence of the precept. The precept of Easter communion, just like that of annual confession, was enacted by the Fourth Lateran Council[1] in 1215, and confirmed by the Council of Trent.[2] It is presented thus by the Code of Canon Law: "Every one of the faithful of either sex, after he has reached the years of discretion, that is, the use of reason, must once a year, at least at Easter, receive the sacrament of the Eucharist, unless perhaps, by the counsel of his own priest, for some reasonable cause, he has judged that he should abstain for a time from receiving it" (can. 859, § 1). That the prescription obliges under grave sin follows from the nature of the matter, which is grave. Finally, it is clear that the precept is not satisfied by a sacrilegious communion (can. 861); hence proposition 55 condemned by Innocent XI: The precept of annual communion is satisfied by a sacrilegious eating of the Lord.[3]

[1] Chapter Omnis, De poenitentia et remissione.

[2] Session 13, canon 9, De Eucharistia.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1205.

1109 II. The subject of the precept is all who have been baptized and enjoy the use of reason. It is said:

1. Have been baptized; both because infidels cannot sacramentally receive Holy Communion, and because they are not subject to the power of the Church.
2. And enjoy the use of reason, so that little children and the perpetually insane are excluded, but not children below the seventh year who have reached the years of discretion. Hence the decree Quam singulari: The age of discretion, both for confession and for Holy Communion, is that in which a child begins to reason, that is, around the seventh year, whether above or even below. From this time begins the obligation of satisfying each precept, of Confession and Communion.[1] So also the President of the P. C. to the Bishop of Valleyfield.[2]

In doubt whether a child has attained the use of reason, before the completion of the seventh year he is judged not to be in possession of himself; but after the seventh year has been completed, he is presumed to have the use of reason (can. 88, § 3).

Note. The obligation of the precept of receiving communion, which burdens those under puberty, also and especially falls back upon those who ought to have care of them, that is, upon parents, guardians, the confessor, teachers, and the pastor (can. 860).

[1] S. C. de Sacr., 8 Aug. 1910 (A. A. S. 1910, p. 577).

[2] 3 Jan. 1918; cf. Linzer Quartalschrift 1922, p. 113.

1110 III. Time of fulfilling the precept. 1. Easter communion is to be made from Palm Sunday to Low Sunday, unless the time has been legitimately anticipated or extended (can. 859, § 2), or in a particular case deferred. Note, however:

a) With respect to anticipation. Local Ordinaries can, if circumstances of persons and places so require, anticipate the time of Easter communion even for all their faithful, but not before the fourth Sunday of Lent (can. 859, § 2). Travelers also can use the anticipated time (n. 131). The pastor and confessor lack the faculty of anticipating the time.

b) With respect to extension. Local Ordinaries enjoy the same faculty with respect to extension as with respect to anticipation; yet they cannot extend the time beyond the feast of the Most Holy Trinity (can. 859, § 2). The pastor and confessor are without the said faculty.

c) With respect to deferral. In particular cases, communion can be deferred for a time, for a reasonable cause, according to the judgment of one's own priest (can. 859, § 1). Under the name of one's own priest come the pastor or the confessor (St. Alphonsus, VI, 297). For the rest, the circumstance of time also obliges under grave sin.

Corollary. One who, when the useful time, that is, the time established by law or by the local Ordinary, has not yet begun, foresees that he will be impeded during the aforesaid time is not bound to anticipate. The reason is that he cannot yet satisfy the precept, so that the communion received would not be a fulfillment of the precept (St. Alphonsus, VI, 298; n. 167). But one who, once Easter time has begun, sees that afterwards he will not be able to satisfy the precept, is bound to communicate now (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.; n. 167).

2. The precept of Easter communion still urges if someone, for whatever reason, has not fulfilled it at the prescribed time (can. 859, § 4). Moreover, the obligation of supplying seems to urge not only until the end of the civil year, as some think, but until the following Easter. The reason is that, as Eugene IV declared in the constitution Fide digna,[1] the year within which, before the Code, communion was to be received ran "from Easter to Easter." But the Code repeats the ancient law, and indeed in the same words (St. Alphonsus, VI, 297). Finally, with St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) against others, we judge that the obligation of supplying must be fulfilled as soon as morally possible. That this is the mind of the legislator seems to have to be deduced from the end of the law, which is that reception of the Holy Eucharist not be deferred longer than is fitting.

[1] 8 July 1440.

1111 IV. Place of fulfilling the precept. The faithful should be advised that each satisfy this precept in his own parish, and those who satisfy it in another parish should see to it that their own pastor is informed concerning the fulfilled precept (can. 859, § 3). Notification of one's own pastor is judged to be of counsel rather than of precept.

1112 V. Counsels. 1. It is expedient that on Thursday of Holy Week all clerics, even priests who abstain from celebrating Mass on that day, be refreshed with the most holy Body of Christ in the solemn or conventual Mass (can. 862).

2. The faithful should be encouraged to be refreshed frequently, even daily, with the Eucharistic bread according to the norms handed down in the decrees of the Apostolic See; and those assisting at Mass, if rightly disposed, should communicate not only by spiritual affection, but also by sacramental reception of the Most Holy Eucharist (can. 864). More will be said about these things in the treatise on the Most Holy Eucharist.

Part IV. On the Prior Censorship of Books and their Prohibition

(St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book I, Appendix III.)[1]

[1] Cf. Hilgers, Der Index der verbotenen Bücher; Wernz, Ius Decretalium, III, nn. 96-131; Sleutjes, De prohibitione et censura librorum; Vermeersch, De prohibitione et censura librorum.

1113 I. The Church has the right: 1° of requiring that the faithful not publish writings which she herself, by her judgment, has not previously reviewed; 2° of prohibiting, for a just cause, writings published by anyone from being read or retained. This is clear both from can. 1384, § 1, and from the end of the Church, which was instituted so that she might lead the faithful to God and the heavenly fatherland; hence she has the right and duty of removing dangers to faith and morals from her own. There is added the fact that the Church has continually used the said rights, especially after the invention of the art of printing. Namely, several Supreme Pontiffs established several rules by which that matter would be ordered, until Leo XIII, by the constitution Officiorum ac Munerum,[1] thoroughly ordered that subject anew; the new Code of Canon Law, title XXIII, canons 1384-1405, retained and presents that constitution in inverted order and with a few changes.

[1] 25 Jan. 1897.

1114 II. The Code, just like the constitution Officiorum ac Munerum, distinguishes two things, censorship and prohibition of books. The former regards writings to be published by the faithful, and is the review of a writing to be published by ecclesiastical authority; as such it regards primarily persons, namely the faithful, and secondarily things or books. The latter concerns writings already published by anyone, and therefore directly refers to the things themselves or writings, and forbids reading and other acts about which something will be said later. For the rest, with respect to the interpretation of this title of the Code, observe:

1. There is question only of writings to be published or already published, or rather to be multiplied or already multiplied by type or other means; and indeed, if there is question of prior censorship, to be multiplied for common use, so that they are truly going to be made public, but not for private use, even of many. For the rest, it does not matter whether the work has been multiplied by type or by polygraph or lithography. It suffices - and this is the criterion - that it can be bought by all.

2. The things prescribed under this title concerning books are applied to daily publications, periodicals, and any other published writings, unless something else is clear (can. 1384, § 2). But something else is clear if, for example, the canon expressly distinguishes books from other writings, as happens in can. 1386. Moreover, in the case in which it is clear that there is discussion of books as distinct from other writings, under the name of book comes a literary work multiplied by type, as was explained under 1, and which is of a certain bulk, suppose 160 pages in octavo. Therefore a letter or sermon published separately, small pamphlets, and daily papers or journals are excluded; but not periodical publications, whether taken separately, provided they are of sufficient bulk, or bound into fascicles and thus constituting the required unity.

3. The interpretation of laws concerning censorship and prohibition of books should be made as in other laws, that is, neither broadly as in privileges, nor strictly as in penalties. There are indeed some who think that a broad interpretation is required, so that doubts are to be resolved in favor of the law; but this is clear from no source. Yet observe that many things can be prohibited by natural law which are not prohibited, or are only doubtfully prohibited, by positive law.

With these things premised, we shall speak first about prior censorship, then about prohibition of books, and finally about penal sanctions.

Section I. On the Prior Censorship of Books

1115 I. Prescripts of the law. 1. No one may publish without prior ecclesiastical censorship and due permission the books and images soon to be assigned (cf. can. 1385). It is said:

a) No one, not even a layman.

b) May publish, i.e. may make public, as was explained in n. 1114. Therefore the law does not regard the case in which a book is multiplied only for limited use.

c) Without prior ecclesiastical censorship, i.e. without a prior review of the book made by ecclesiastical authority, namely by the competent Ordinary or his delegate. Religious superiors, considered under common law alone, in order to give the permission required by the Code, are not bound themselves to subject books or images to censorship; to what extent they must grant permission will be said under 2.

d) And due permission. Besides censorship, permission to publish these things is required. Now, permission to publish the books and images soon to be assigned can be given either by the local Ordinary proper to the author, or by the Ordinary of the place in which the books or images are made public, or by the Ordinary of the place in which they are printed, yet in such a way that, if one of these Ordinaries has denied permission, the author cannot ask it from another Ordinary unless he has informed him of the permission denied by the other (can. 1385, § 2). For religious, the proper local Ordinary is the Ordinary of the place in which the religious house to which the religious belong is situated. Besides, religious must also obtain beforehand the permission of their own major Superior (can. 1385, § 3).

e) Books and images; to this category, from can. 1385, § 1, belong:

alpha) Books of the Sacred Scriptures, or annotations and commentaries on them (can. 1385, § 1, 1°).

beta) Books which regard the divine Scriptures, sacred theology, ecclesiastical history, canon law, natural theology, ethics, or other religious and moral disciplines of this sort; books and booklets of prayers, devotion, or religious, moral, ascetical, mystical teaching and instruction, and other things of this sort, although they may seem to conduce to fostering piety; and generally writings in which there is something which is of particular concern for religion and the honesty of morals (can. 1385, § 1, 2°). Since books, booklets, and writings are distinguished, in the first series the word books should be taken in the strict sense; in the second series there is discussion of books and booklets, with separate sheets excluded; in the third series there is discussion of writings of any kind.

With respect to the first series, note that periodical publications can indeed constitute a book according to what was said in n. 1114; but they do not constitute a book which regards, for example, ecclesiastical history or canon law, unless the periodical itself is destined for cultivating ecclesiastical history or canon law.

With respect to writings of any kind, note that it especially depends on the circumstances of time and place whether something contained in them is of particular concern for religion or the honesty of morals.

gamma) Sacred images to be printed in any way whatever, whether they have prayers attached or are published without them (can. 1385, § 1, 3°). To this do not belong statues and paintings; nor images which are multiplied only for the sake of art, not for pious use, and therefore are not called sacred; nor finally, as it seems, medals, since these are said to be struck, not printed.

2. Secular clerics are forbidden without the consent of their Ordinaries, and religious without the permission of their own major Superior and the local Ordinary, to publish even books which treat of profane matters, and to write in daily papers, sheets, or periodical booklets, or to direct the same (can. 1386, § 1). Moreover:

a) The word books should be taken for books strictly so called and for booklets.

b) By local Ordinary is understood the Ordinary proper to the author.

c) One or another minor essay in daily papers, etc., does not seem to be comprehended under the word writing; since, where there is discussion of evil daily papers, etc., the Code speaks more severely by saying: nor may they write anything.

d) Finally, with respect to directing daily papers, sheets, or periodical booklets, the President of the P. C.[1] declared that the canon also prohibits a cleric or religious without due permission from being a member of a commission for editing, or of a supervisory council, or of similar councils connected with political daily papers.

3. Nor may Catholic laymen, a fortiori clerics and religious, write anything in daily papers, sheets, or periodical booklets which are accustomed to attack the Catholic religion or good morals, unless a just and reasonable cause advises it and has been approved by the local Ordinary (can. 1386, § 2), the local Ordinary being taken as was said under 2. These things do not touch so-called advertisements, which are left to be judged according to the general rules of cooperation.

4. Things which in any way pertain to the causes of beatifications and canonizations of Servants of God cannot be published without the permission of the Sacred Congregation of Rites (can. 1387). And this permission suffices; the permission of the local Ordinary is no longer required.

5. All books of indulgences, summaries, booklets, sheets, etc., in which grants of them are contained, are not to be published without the permission of the local Ordinary (can. 1388, § 1). Note that images published in memory of some deceased person, jubilee, etc., are not called sheets of indulgences, even if they contain little prayers endowed with indulgences. But express permission of the Apostolic See is required so that it may be lawful to publish in print, in any language whatever, both an authentic collection of prayers and pious works to which the Apostolic See has attached indulgences, and an index of apostolic indulgences, and a summary of indulgences either previously collected but never approved, or now for the first time to be gathered from diverse grants (can. 1388, § 2). What apostolic indulgences are, see in the treatise on Indulgences.

6. Collections of decrees of the Roman Congregations cannot be republished unless permission has first been obtained and the conditions prescribed by the Moderators of each Congregation have been observed (can. 1389). By Moderator of the Congregation is understood the Cardinal Prefect together with his Congress.

7. In publishing liturgical books and their parts, and likewise litanies approved by the Holy See, their agreement with approved editions must be established from the attestation of the Ordinary of the place in which they are printed or made public (can. 1390).

8. Versions of the Sacred Scriptures into the vernacular language cannot be printed unless they are approved by the Apostolic See, or unless they are published under the vigilance of Bishops and with annotations drawn especially from the holy Fathers of the Church and from learned and Catholic writers (can. 1391).[2] Paraphrastic versions seem to be equated with versions with annotations. Besides, without annotations there are permitted certain parts of Scripture which are rather often inserted into prayer booklets. Finally, books which, for the benefit of youth, present the history of both Testaments are immune from this special censorship and are subject only to the common censorship.

9. Finally note with respect to all the writings enumerated above: the approval of the original text of some work benefits neither translations of the same into another language nor other editions; wherefore both translations and new editions of an approved work must be fortified by a new approval (can. 1392, § 1). But chapters excerpted from periodicals and published separately are not judged new editions and therefore do not need a new approval (can. 1392, § 2).

[1] 3 Nov. 1928; cf. Commentarium pro Religiosis 1929, p. 24.

[2] Versions with annotations must be published, even if they are published under the vigilance of Bishops (P. C., 20 May 1923; A. A. S. 1924, p. 115).

1116 II. The appointment and office of censors. 1. In all episcopal Curias there should be censors ex officio who examine things to be published (can. 1393, § 1). Moreover, censors should be chosen from either clergy, commended by age, learning, and prudence, who in approving and disapproving doctrines proceed by a middle and safe way (can. 1393, § 3).

2. In carrying out their office, examiners, laying aside all acceptance of persons, should have before their eyes only the dogmas of the Church and the common doctrine of Catholics, which is contained in the decrees of general Councils or the constitutions or prescriptions of the Apostolic See and the consensus of approved doctors (can. 1393, § 2). Therefore the censor must per se judge only about doctrine; this nevertheless does not prevent him from being able, and sometimes according to the circumstances even obliged, if the writing seems inopportune, to signify this to the competent authority.

3. The censor must give his opinion in writing (can. 1393, § 4).

1117 III. Granting of permission. 1. If the judgment of the censor is favorable,[1] the Ordinary should grant the power of publishing, to which, however, the censor's judgment should be prefixed, with his name inscribed. Only in extraordinary circumstances, and very rarely, according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, can mention of the censor be omitted (can. 1393, § 4). But the name of the censor should never be known to authors before he has issued a favorable judgment (can. 1393, § 5).

2. The permission by which the Ordinary grants the power of publishing should be granted in writing, to be printed at the beginning or end of the book, sheet, or image, with the name of the one granting it expressed, and likewise the place and time of the grant (can. 1394, § 1). If the judgment of the censor was favorable, this judgment, with his name inscribed, together with the granted power of publishing, must indeed be made known to the author, but it is not prescribed that these be printed in the writing to be published. But if this is omitted, it is useful to preserve the judgment and the name of the censor in the archive.

3. If permission seems to have to be denied, the reasons should be indicated to the author asking for it, unless a grave cause demands otherwise (can. 1394, § 2).

Corollary. From what has been said it follows that sometimes, for publishing writings, the permission of the competent Authority suffices, without its being required per se that the things to be published be subjected to censorship.

[1] This is commonly expressed by these words: Nihil obstat.

Section II. On the Prohibition of Books

We shall speak first about the prohibition itself, then about prohibited books, and finally about exemption from the prohibiting law and about permission to use prohibited books.

Chapter I. On the Prohibition Itself

1118 I. Power of prohibiting. The right and duty of prohibiting books for a just cause belongs:

1. To the supreme ecclesiastical authority for the universal Church (can. 1395, § 1). By supreme ecclesiastical authority are understood the Supreme Pontiff, who uses his right by himself or through the Sacred Congregations, and Ecumenical Councils. Moreover, books condemned by the aforesaid are to be judged prohibited everywhere and into whatever language they are translated (can. 1396).[1]
2. To particular Councils and local Ordinaries for their subjects (can. cited). Under the name of subjects of the local Ordinary do not come exempt religious, about whom something is said specifically (cf. under 3). For the rest, let them beware of scandal arising for the faithful.

From a prohibition made by a particular Council or local Ordinary there is recourse to the Holy See, but not in the suspensive effect (can. 1395, § 2), i.e. one is held by the established prohibition until the Holy See has decided the case in his favor.

3. Also the Abbot of a monastery sui iuris and the supreme Moderator of an exempt clerical religion, with his Chapter or Council, can prohibit books to his subjects for a just cause; and the same, if there is danger in delay, can be done by other major Superiors with their own Council, but under this law, that they refer the matter as soon as possible to the supreme Moderator (can. 1395, § 3).

Corollary I. It belongs to all the faithful, especially clerics and those constituted in ecclesiastical dignity and those who excel in doctrine, to refer books which they have judged pernicious to local Ordinaries or to the Apostolic See; but by a particular title this belongs to Legates of the Holy See, local Ordinaries, and Rectors of Catholic Universities (can. 1397, § 1). Moreover, it is expedient that in the denunciation of evil books not only the title of the book be indicated, but also, as far as possible, the causes be set forth why the book is judged to be prohibited (can. 1397, § 2). Let it be sacred to those to whom the denunciation is referred to keep secret the names of those denouncing (can. 1397, § 3).

Corollary II. Local Ordinaries, by themselves or, where there is need, through suitable priests, should keep watch over books which are published or offered for sale in their own territory (can. 1397, § 4).

Corollary III. Books which require a more subtle examination, or about which the judgment of the supreme authority seems to be required for attaining a salutary effect, Ordinaries should refer to the judgment of the Apostolic See (can. 1397, § 5).

[1] Orientals also are held by decrees of condemnation of books and daily papers issued by the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office (S. C. for the Eastern Church, 26 May 1928; A. A. S. 1928, p. 195).

1119 II. Effects of prohibition. 1. Prohibition regards the whole book, so that even an innocuous part falls under the prohibition. The contrary must be said, as seems sufficiently probable, if the part which gave occasion to the prohibition is separated from the innocuous parts or so expunged that it can no longer be read (St. Alphonsus, VII, 283). The contrary must also be said sufficiently probably if, when a book consists of several volumes, the volumes which were the cause of the prohibition are rendered unfit for use; likewise if an innocent part of a prohibited book is published separately. Nor is it prohibited that innocent parts of a prohibited book be inserted into literary miscellanies.

2. The prohibition of books effects this, that without due permission the book can neither be published, nor read, nor retained, nor sold, nor translated into another language, nor communicated in any way to others (can. 1398, § 1). Besides, a book prohibited in any way whatever cannot again be brought to light unless, after corrections have been made, permission has been given by him who prohibited the book, or by his Superior or successor (can. 1398, § 2). Of these things the following must be explained more:

a) Publication. Under the name of publisher here come: 1° the publisher properly so called, i.e. the one who commits a book to the owner of a printing house to be printed and takes care that it be made public; 2° the owner of the printing house, who accepts the book to be printed; 3° the author of the book, not indeed as such, but insofar as he acts as publisher properly so called or hands the book over to the owner of the workshop or to the publisher for this end, that it be published. Typesetters and other workers, however, are not touched by positive law, but are touched by natural law insofar as they cooperate in evil.

b) Reading. Formal reading is understood, so that the law does not regard him who merely hears someone reading (St. Alphonsus, VII, 292), or recites from memory things once read, or, ignorant of the language, reads through the book; but it does regard the blind person who perceives the type with his fingers.

Grave matter can exist either by reason of quantity, as if, in one at least morally continuous stretch, you read two or three pages; or by reason of quality, i.e. of danger. In this case even a few lines can suffice, because in them there can be danger of perversion (St. Alphonsus, VI, 284, 292). Nor does there seem to be reason for establishing another norm with respect to daily papers.

c) Retention. It is the same whether someone retains his own book or another's; whether he retains the book with himself or with another who does not have the faculty; whether he understands the retained book or not. But he is excused who deposits the book with another who has the faculty, and this with an express agreement that he will not ask for it back except after permission has been obtained; likewise he who retains the book because he awaits either the required permission or an occasion to hand it over to a Superior (St. Alphonsus, VI, 295-298). A bookbinder is indeed counted among those retaining, but he is easily excused if he binds books for one having the faculty of reading them, or if he has another just cause. Likewise the keeper of another's library is not numbered among those retaining, unless he retains prohibited books in his own room or house. Finally, where, as in religious houses, there is a common library, it is permitted that prohibited books be kept in a locked cabinet.

There is grave matter if a book, or, if there is discussion of daily papers, a notable number of sheets, is retained for a notable time, suppose for three or four days (St. Alphonsus, VI, 295). For the rest, if the intention of retaining prohibited writings for a notable time is present from the beginning, one sins gravely at once.

d) Sale. Although sale is prohibited, nevertheless a prohibited book can be sold to him who enjoys the faculty of reading it. Specifically, with respect to sellers of books, can. 1404 establishes: Sellers of books are not to sell, lend, or retain books treating professedly of obscene things; other prohibited books they are not to have for sale unless they have obtained due permission from the Apostolic See, nor may they sell them to anyone unless they can prudently judge that they are legitimately sought by the buyer.

e) Communication. Any communication is forbidden; hence a prohibited book cannot be exchanged with others, nor read aloud to others, nor transcribed for others.

Chapter II. On Prohibited Books

Books can be prohibited under a twofold aspect, either insofar as they fall under a general rule prohibiting books of some kind, or insofar as they are proscribed by a particular decree. The former are said to be prohibited by the law itself.

Article I. On Books Prohibited by the Law Itself

1120 By force of can. 1399, the following are prohibited by the law itself:

I. Editions of the original text and of ancient Catholic versions of Sacred Scripture, even of the Eastern Church, published by any non-Catholics whatever; and likewise versions of the same into any language, made or published by the same.

II. Books of any writers whatever which defend heresy or schism, or strive in any way to overthrow the very foundations of religion. It is said:

1. Which defend, i.e. which maintain by reasons.
2. The very foundations of religion, i.e. the foundations either of natural religion or of revealed religion as such, or the truths which must be admitted so that one may be led either to the religious worship of God or to admitting revealed religion. That only the foundations of natural religion are not understood follows from the fact that the legislator, in place of natural religion, which the rule of the Council of Trent has, uses the broader expression religion.

Moreover, the foundations of natural religion are: the existence of a personal God, the spirituality of the soul, free will, etc.

The foundations of revealed religion as such are the motives of credibility, such as the force of proving which is present in miracles, etc.; but not the fundamental truths of faith itself, concerning which, as also concerning others, see under VI.

3. Strive in any way to overthrow, whether by arguing or by deriding, whether directly or indirectly.

III. Books which deliberately attack religion or good morals.

1. Religion, namely taken generally, whether natural or revealed.

2. Deliberately, i.e. intentionally, by design, or with the intention of attacking them. This differs from the expression professedly; in the former, everything depends on the intention of the writer; in the latter, on the subject of the book. But since each condition must be judged from the book itself, it comes to almost the same thing.

IV. Books of any non-Catholics whatever which professedly treat of religion, unless it is clear that nothing against the Catholic faith is contained in them.

1. Professedly, i.e. not incidentally but in the whole writing, or in a notable part of it, or throughout.
2. Of religion; this word is commonly taken in a broad sense. "Of religion," says St. Alphonsus, "namely of Sacred Scripture, or of scholastic, dogmatic, or moral theology, or the mysteries of faith, of the worship of God or of the Saints, of the rites of the Church, of canons, of spiritual things and the like" (VII, 283).
3. Against the Catholic faith, i.e. as we judge it should be interpreted, either against dogmas of faith or against those truths which cannot be called into doubt by Catholics without temerity.

V. If they have been published without observing the prescriptions of the canons: books of Sacred Scripture or annotations and commentaries on them; likewise books and booklets which recount new apparitions, revelations, visions, prophecies, miracles, or which introduce new devotions, even under the pretext that they are private.

VI. Books which attack or deride any one of the Catholic dogmas; which defend errors proscribed by the Apostolic See; which detract from divine worship; which contend to overthrow ecclesiastical discipline; and which deliberately heap reproaches upon the ecclesiastical hierarchy, or the clerical or religious state.

1. Under the name Apostolic See come also the Congregations (cf. can. 7).
2. Detract; namely notably, so that one or another word of detraction does not suffice.
3. The clerical or religious state; hence it does not suffice that particular clerics or religious, or even a determined order or congregation, be affected with reproaches, unless one proceeds in such a way that the state also, as such, is attacked and affected with reproaches.

VII. Books which teach or commend superstition of any kind, sorceries, divination, magic, evocation of spirits, and other things of that kind.

VIII. Books which establish as lawful duel, suicide, or divorce; books which, treating of Masonic sects or other societies of the same kind, contend that they are useful and not pernicious to the Church and civil society.

Societies of the same kind are those which are both secret and, whether openly or clandestinely, plot against the Church or legitimate civil powers.

IX. Books which professedly treat, narrate, or teach lascivious or obscene matters. Books are understood which of themselves tend to corruption of morals, not merely scientific or classical books.

X. Editions of liturgical books approved by the Apostolic See in which anything has been changed, so that they do not agree with the authentic editions approved by the Holy See.

XI. Books by which apocryphal indulgences, or indulgences proscribed or revoked by the Holy See, are publicized.

XII. Images printed in any way whatever of Our Lord Jesus Christ, the Blessed Virgin Mary, Angels and Saints, or other Servants of God, alien from the sense and decrees of the Church.

Article II. On Books Prohibited by Particular Decree

1121 What authority can prohibit books, we said in n. 1118. But here there is discussion only of books which are prohibited by the Apostolic See, and so are inserted into what is called the Index of Prohibited Books. Moreover, that Index, revised by Leo XIII and promulgated in the year 1900, was published several times and again in the year 1929. For the rest, note:

I. The Apostolic See prohibits books either by itself, i.e. through Apostolic letters of the Roman Pontiff, or with the help of a Congregation. Moreover, formerly this business belonged to the Congregation of the Index, but now to the Congregation of the Holy Office, which undertook that function after the prior Congregation was suppressed[1] (can. 247, § 4).

II. With respect to the interpretation of particular prohibitions, note:

1. Whenever all the writings of some non-Catholic author are prohibited, only those works are understood which either treat of religion, or have been proscribed by some general or special decree. Whenever all the writings of some Catholic writer are forbidden, only those works are touched by the prohibition which are prohibited by some general or special decree.[2]
2. If the first or earlier volumes of some work are placed in the Index, and the later volumes have followed that decree of prohibition into public light; or if periodical booklets are proscribed which afterwards have been continued again and again; or if all the works of some writer are prohibited, and he has published other works after the decree was issued: in all these cases the volumes or booklets or works made public after the last special decree, although they are not comprehended by that special decree, nevertheless are held suspect, and are deservedly presumed to fall into the prohibition of some decree from the general ones, unless perhaps the author's recovery of sound sense is established.[3]

[1] Motu proprio, 25 March 1917 (A. A. S. 1917, p. 167; cf. p. 162).

[2] Cf. Preface of the Index of the year 1924, p. XIV.

[3] Cf. Preface of the Index of the year 1924, pp. XVI-XVII.

Chapter III. On Exemption from the Prohibiting Law, and on Permission to Use Prohibited Books

1122 I. Those who in any way devote themselves to theological or biblical studies can use even prohibited texts and versions of Sacred Scripture, provided the said texts and versions have been published faithfully and integrally, and the dogmas of the Catholic faith are not attacked in their prolegomena or annotations (can. 1400). It is said:

1. Those who... in any way devote themselves, i.e. both clerics and laymen who not merely incidentally or passingly, but habitually for some time, are especially intent upon those studies.

2. Dogmas of the Catholic faith; under this name do not come other truths, however theologically certain.

II. Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church, Bishops, even titular Bishops, and other Ordinaries, with the necessary precautions employed, are not bound by the ecclesiastical prohibition of books (can. 1401).

1123 III. With respect to the faculty of granting permission, note: the following can grant it:

1. The Supreme Pontiff, who grants it through the Holy Office (can. 247, § 4). Yet those who have obtained an apostolic faculty of reading and retaining prohibited books cannot therefore read and retain any books whatever proscribed by their Ordinaries, unless in the apostolic indult the power of reading and retaining books condemned by anyone whatever has been expressly given to them (can. 1403, § 1).
2. Ordinaries, namely both local Ordinaries and major Superiors of an exempt clerical religion, are able, with respect to books prohibited by the law itself or by decree of the Apostolic See, to grant permission to their subjects only for individual books and only in urgent cases (can. 1402, § 1). But if they have obtained from the Apostolic See a general faculty of permitting their subjects to retain and read proscribed books, they should grant it only with choice and for a just and reasonable cause (can. 1402, § 2).

Note that local Ordinaries can also grant to subjects permission, but only in particular cases and for a just cause, to use books prohibited by a plenary or provincial Council (can. 82; 291, § 2).

The petition by which permission is sought must be recommended by the local Ordinary if there is question of a secular cleric, and by his own Superior if there is question of a religious. For a layman, generally the recommendation of the confessor suffices.

1124 IV. With respect to permission granted, observe:

1. Those who have obtained permission are held by a grave precept to guard prohibited books in such a way that they do not come into the hands of others (can. 1403, § 2).
2. Permission obtained from anyone in no way exempts a person from the prohibition of natural law against reading books which present a proximate spiritual danger to him (can. 1405, § 1).

Add the warning of the Code: Local Ordinaries and others having care of souls should opportunely warn the faithful concerning the danger and harm of reading bad books, especially prohibited books (can. 1405, § 2).

Section III. On Penal Sanctions

1125 Preliminary Note. The word books in what follows must be taken strictly, so that small booklets, daily papers, etc., are excluded (n. 1114). The reason is that only those things which are said in book III, title XXIII, of the Code, and not those which are said in book V concerning books, are to be applied also to other publications (can. 1384, § 2). There is added that penal law must be interpreted strictly (can. 19).

I. They incur by the fact itself excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See in a special manner, once the work has been made public: publishers of books of apostates, heretics, and schismatics which defend apostasy, heresy, or schism; and likewise those defending the same books, or other books prohibited by name through apostolic letters, or knowingly reading or retaining them without due permission (can. 2318, § 1). Cf. the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties.

II. Authors and publishers who, without due permission, see to the printing of books of the Sacred Scriptures, or annotations or commentaries on them, incur by the fact itself excommunication reserved to no one (can. 2318, § 2). Cf. the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties.

Scholion. On the Cremation of Bodies

1126 I. The Prohibition of Cremating Bodies. The bodies of the faithful departed are to be buried, the cremation of the same being reprobated (can. 1203, § 1). The Church forbids the cremation of the bodies of the faithful, both because the custom of cremating bodies is pagan, and because this custom is promoted as a certain protest against the resurrection and the immortality of the soul. Moreover, that the ecclesiastical prohibition obliges under grave sin is clear both from the fact that the Holy Office[1] calls the cremation of bodies a detestable abuse, and from the penalties established against transgressors; concerning these there will be discussion immediately.

Corollary I. It is unlawful "to give one's name to societies whose purpose is to promote the practice of burning human corpses";[2] likewise "to order that one's own corpse or those of others be burned."[3]

Corollary II. If anyone has in any way ordered that his body be cremated, it is unlawful to carry out this will; and if it has been added to a contract, testament, or any other act whatsoever, it is to be regarded as not added (can. 1203, § 2).

[1] 19 May 1886 (A. S. S. vol. 19, p. 46).

[2] Holy Office, 19 May 1886 (A. S. S. vol. 19, p. 46).

[3] 27 July 1892.

1127 II. Cooperation in Cremation. 1. The Holy Office[1] decreed that in cremation "it is never lawful to cooperate formally by command or counsel. But material cooperation can sometimes be tolerated, provided that: 1° the cremation is not held as a protest-sign of the Masonic sect; 2° there is not contained in it anything which of itself, directly, and uniquely expresses reprobation of Catholic doctrine and approval of the sect; 3° nor is it established that Catholic officials and workers are bound or called to the work in contempt of the Catholic religion. For the rest, although in these cases they are to be left in good faith, they are nevertheless always to be admonished that they not intend to cooperate in cremation."[2]

2. The Apostolic Vicar of Vizagapatam asked the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide: 1° what was to be done there, where the bodies of Christians were sometimes cremated by pagan relatives; whether resistance was to be made, with harm to the propagation of the faith, or whether one should proceed passively, and meanwhile, by instructing the people, promote the abolition of the abuse; 2° what should be done where a dying pagan asks for baptism, but it is foreseen that the body will be cremated. To these things the Sacred Congregation replied:[3] "The question ... was submitted to the judgment of the Supreme Inquisition. The response which I received from that venerable Congregation concerning this matter is contained in the following decree, which I communicate to you, namely: 'You must not approve cremation, but conduct yourself passively, always conferring baptism, and take care that the peoples be instructed according to those things which are set forth by you.'"

[1] 27 July 1892.

[2] Cf. Holy Office, 10 June 1926 (A. A. S. 1926, p. 282).

[3] 27 September 1884 (Collectanea, n. 1626).

1128 III. The Established Penalties. 1. Those who have ordered their body to be given over to cremation are deprived of ecclesiastical burial, unless before death they have given some signs of repentance (can. 1240, 5°). Moreover, "those are to be deprived of ecclesiastical burial who have ordered their body to be given over to cremation and have remained in this will up to death, even if cremation does not follow according to the norm of can. 1203, § 2."[1] Finally, neither is it lawful "to bestow ecclesiastical burial upon the ashes of one cremated, or in any way to preserve them in a blessed cemetery."[2]

2. It is unlawful "publicly to offer the Sacrifice of the Mass for the faithful whose bodies have been cremated not without their own fault ... and likewise to accept foundations for this purpose."[3] Besides, those err who, "from the specious reason that the deceased, while he was living, had been accustomed to perform some act of religion, or that perhaps at the last moment of life he could have retracted his depraved will, judge it lawful to perform for him, in the presence of the corpse, ecclesiastical funeral rites according to custom, although this corpse afterwards, by the deceased's own arrangement, is to be handed over to fire. For since nothing can be certainly established concerning this conjectured retraction, it is plain that no account can be taken of it in the external forum."[4]

[1] Pontifical Commission, 10 November 1925 (A. A. S. 1925, p. 583).

[2] Holy Office, 19 June 1926 (A. A. S. 1926, p. 282).

[3] Holy Office, 27 July 1892.

[4] Holy Office, 19 June 1926 (A. A. S. 1926, p. 282).

1129 IV. Notes. 1. If some member of the faithful has ordered that his body be cremated after death, he has indeed sinned gravely. But if he is in good faith, with respect to admonition "the rules handed down by approved authors are to be observed, especially taking account of avoiding scandal."[1]

2. "Whenever there is question of those whose bodies are subjected to cremation not by their own will but by the will of another, the rites and suffrages of the Church can be used both at home and in church, but not as far as the place of cremation, scandal having been removed. Scandal, moreover, can also be removed if it is made known that cremation was not chosen by the will of the deceased himself."[2]

[1] Holy Office, 27 July 1892 (Collectanea, n. 1808).

[2] Holy Office, 15 December 1886 (A. S. S. vol. 25, p. 63); cf. Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 26 January 1911.

Dissertation III. On the Precepts or Duties of the States of Life

We shall speak first of the duties of certain secular persons, then of the duties of clerics, and finally of the duties of religious.

Part I. On the Duties of Certain Secular Persons

Section I. On Judges

(St. Thomas, II-II, qq. 60, 67; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 192-217; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, nn. 63-67.)

1130 A judge is a public person constituted for this end, that he may pronounce right according to law. He differs from an arbiter, who is a private person to whom litigants commit a dispute to be settled, either according to the rules of law, or according to what is equitable and good, as it is said.

1131 I. A judge, in order to carry out his office licitly, must be furnished with due knowledge, i.e. at least moderate knowledge, and even greater knowledge if he is sole judge. Besides, knowledge of the question being treated is required more than knowledge in general. If he lacks due knowledge, he is bound, even by commutative justice, either to resign the office or to acquire the due knowledge for himself; by commutative justice, I say, because otherwise he exposes himself to grave danger of wounding that virtue by his sentences (St. Alphonsus IV, 192, 195).

1132 II. A judge, in order to act validly, must be furnished with jurisdiction both over the matter and over the persons whom the trial concerns.

1. With respect to the matter, note these things from the Code of Canon Law: The Church by her proper and exclusive right takes cognizance: 1° of causes which concern spiritual things and things annexed to spiritual things; 2° of the violation of ecclesiastical laws, and of all things in which there is a character of sin, as regards the definition of guilt and the infliction of ecclesiastical penalties (can. 1553, § 1, 1° and 2°) ... In causes in which both the Church and the civil power are equally competent, and which are called causes of the mixed forum, there is place for prevention (can. cited, § 2).
2. With respect to persons, according to can. 120, clerics in all causes, whether contentious or criminal, must be summoned before an ecclesiastical judge, unless something else has been legitimately provided for particular places. If nevertheless they are summoned by one who had no prior permission, they can, by reason of necessity and to avoid greater evils, appear, but with notice having been given to the Superior from whom permission was not obtained; these individual points are explained more fully in n. 1153.

1133 III. A judge is bound to treat causes diligently, and, insofar as it can morally be done, to dispatch them promptly; nor can he ever refrain from judgment because of the silence or insufficiency of the law, but he must either draw out the mind of the legislator from the law, by arguing by analogy or from the contrary, or pronounce according to prevailing custom or according to natural equity. In a penal matter indeed there is no difficulty, since there the rule is applied: no penalty without law; and therefore, in silence or obscurity of law, the accused is to be absolved.

1134 IV. A judge is bound to judge according to the things alleged and legally proved; and therefore he must rely only on proofs recognized by law, not on private knowledge. For "to judge belongs to the judge insofar as he exercises public power; and therefore in judging he ought to be informed not according to that which he knows as a private person, but according to that which becomes known to him as a public person" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 67, a. 2). Hence, for example, "one whom the judge by private knowledge knows to be guilty, if he has been juridically proved innocent, cannot be condemned" (St. Alphonsus IV, 207).

1135 V. A judge is bound to give sentence according to the laws, except in a case in which it is established that the law is iniquitous. The reason is that a judge has been constituted for this, that he may execute or apply the laws. With respect to right laws St. Thomas observes: "Even laws which have been rightly established fail in some cases; and if they were observed in those cases, they would be contrary to natural right; and therefore in such matters judgment is not to be made according to the letter of the law, but recourse is to be had to the equity which the legislator intends" (II-II, q. 60, a. 5, ad 2). But recourse to equity today is impossible, at least with respect to the substance of the sentence; in other words, it is not admitted that the judge gives a sentence not according to the law itself. But he can preserve equity in the penalty to be inflicted, and in this respect he enjoys a greater liberty than formerly, insofar as conditional condemnations are sometimes admitted, i.e. in the case of relapse within a determined space of time.

Corollary I. If someone has juridically proved that he has a right, while the judge holds as certain that this is false, the judge seems able to adjudge the right to him. For "the state has power over the goods of its citizens when the public good requires it, as in this case, lest the form of public trials be overturned with scandal to the people" (St. Alphonsus IV, 208). The same, for the same reason, holds if there is question of lesser penalties, for example of imposing a fine, or even of a penalty of imprisonment or chastisement (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

But it is more disputed whether a judge can condemn to mutilation or death someone who has been juridically convicted of a crime, but whom the judge knows by private knowledge to be innocent. According to St. Thomas and others, the judge is bound to condemnation, because, as a public person, he must be led by public knowledge alone. Nor does he sin in giving sentence according to the things alleged, because "he himself does not kill an innocent man, but those who assert him to be guilty" (II-II, q. 64, a. 6, ad 3). They add, however, that the judge must attempt everything in order to free the innocent man. But others teach the contrary, because in their opinion to public right there does not belong the right of depriving someone of a primary right, i.e. of life and integrity, although there does belong, as was said, the right of depriving him of a secondary right, namely by force of high dominion. St. Alphonsus, loc. cit., holds each opinion to be sufficiently founded, so that the judge can, but is not bound to, condemn the accused. For the rest, in many kingdoms there is no difficulty, because according to the laws a judge cannot condemn someone unless he is inwardly convinced of his guilt. Therefore both legal proof and inward conviction are required.[1]

Corollary II. If the cause is doubtful, the judge should proceed thus:

1. In a criminal cause, one must stand for the accused, whether the crime is doubtful or the law imposing the penalty seems obscure.

2. In a civil cause, a distinction must be made between doubt of fact and doubt of law.

a) In doubt of fact, i.e. if the fact on which the plaintiff's right rests - for example, a right of possession, ownership, etc.[2] - is doubtful, his cause falls; for it belongs to the plaintiff to prove the said fact, and to do so by legal proofs.

b) In doubt of law, i.e. if it is doubted whether the fact on which the plaintiff relies juridically founds a right of possession, ownership, etc., the judge cannot follow the opinion less probable to himself; since this was proscribed by Innocent XI, proposition 2: "I think it probable that a judge can judge according to an opinion even less probable."[3] If the judge is strictly in doubt, he can either induce the parties to a settlement, or, if they refuse and the dispute is about possession, compel them to contend about ownership, or, if the litigation is about ownership, he can choose the party he prefers.

Corollary III. A judge, at least considering present-day morals, cannot use the means of hypnotism for investigating the truth - the means of hypnotism, I say, which inflicts force on the accused; nor can a confession so extorted be held as certainly true, although sometimes it can provide elements for further proving the matter.

[1] Thus, for example, the Dutch Code of Criminal Procedure, arts. 216, 391, 395.

[2] A twofold cause is distinguished, possessory and petitory. The former is when the plaintiff asks for possession of a thing; the latter, when he asks for ownership of the thing or another right.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1152.

1136 VI. A judge, in giving sentence, should be free from acceptance of persons; nor must he ever be bent by gifts. Indeed the acceptance of gifts must be altogether reprobated according to these words: "You shall not accept a person, nor gifts; because gifts blind the eyes of the wise, and change the words of the just."[1]

Corollary. One who has accepted gifts: 1° if indeed from a liberal donation, is not bound to restitution before the sentence of a judge; 2° if by way of a price for giving sentence, is bound to restitution if he accepted it for giving a just sentence, for to this he is already obliged by strict justice; if he accepted it for giving an unjust sentence, he is bound to abstain from a sentence of this kind and to restore the gift. After an unjust sentence has been given, he can retain the gift accepted, as was said concerning a contract in a shameful matter (St. Alphonsus IV, 216, 196).

[1] Deut. XVI, 19.

1137 VII. A judge who has failed in his office, whether by omitting the acquisition of due knowledge, or by treating causes negligently, or by delaying their treatment without a just cause, or by giving an unjust sentence, is bound to restore the damages following from his manner of acting, if he foresaw them at least confusedly and was gravely culpable. The reason is that by strict justice he is bound to perform his office rightly (St. Alphonsus IV, 195, 196, 214). But if the judge "has erred from human fragility, he is not obliged in conscience to restitution from his own goods ... since he did not commit theological fault" (St. Alphonsus IV, 214); if nevertheless afterwards "the judge recognizes an error committed by himself (even without grave fault) to the prejudice of a litigant, he is bound, if he can without infamy, to impede the error, for example by secretly warning the injured party to look after himself by appeal or otherwise" (St. Alphonsus IV, 195).

Whether he is bound to restore to the treasury a monetary fine which he has unlawfully not imposed on someone, see p. 657.

Finally I note with St. Alphonsus: "A judge is bound under grave sin to grant the accused sufficient time for confession ...; he is also bound to grant time for receiving Communion (unless grave harm is feared), since the accused is then at the article of death, in which the precept of Communion obliges by divine law ... But if the accused refuses to confess, after exhortation he can licitly be killed by the executioner, because then his damnation is attributed to his own fault" (III, 379).

Section II. On Jurors

1138 I. Jurors are called citizens constituted for giving judgment concerning the guilt of some accused person, especially concerning a more serious crime. When this judgment has been given by the jurors, ordinarily judges properly so called (that is, if the jurors have declared someone culpable) determine the penalty according to law. They are called jurors from the oath which they must swear concerning faithfully carrying out their office.

II. The institution of jurors, though not to be condemned in itself, is nevertheless less recommended; both because they are not bound to bring forward the reason for the judgment given by them, and because generally they are more easily moved than constituted judges by political passions, gifts, etc.

III. Many of the things which have been said concerning judges apply to jurors. I observe especially: Jurors are bound to give judgment according to inward persuasion. Thus the law establishes in regions in which jurors are used. Therefore they are bound to absolve the accused of whose crime and guilt they are not inwardly convinced, even if according to the things alleged and proved the accused appears guilty. It is disputed, note, whether they can declare guilty one whom by private judgment they hold as guilty, but who was not convicted in court. Some deny it, because the law which orders them to judge according to inward persuasion certainly understands this of inward persuasion drawn from the things brought forward and proved. Others affirm it, because such a law in its obvious sense understands inward conviction obtained in any way whatever.

[1] Cf. Groeken, Lijkverbranding.

Section III. On the Accuser and Denunciator

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 68; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 234-254; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, nn. 73-78.)

1139 I. Judicial Accusation. 1. Judicial accusation is the denunciation of someone's crime to a competent judge, for the sake of public vindication, with the burden of proving the crime. It is said:

a) The denunciation of a crime; and thus the accuser is distinguished from the actor or petitioner, who moves a lawsuit against another in a civil matter. The one who is accused, or against whom a lawsuit is moved in a civil matter, is called the defendant.

b) With the burden of proving the crime; and thus the accuser is distinguished from the denunciator, and accusation from denunciation; for the latter does not carry with it the burden of proving (St. Alphonsus IV, 235).

2. Judicial accusation for the most part belongs to those officials to whom this has been committed by law; primarily indeed to those who are customarily called the public ministry (St. Alphonsus IV, 236). To whom besides them it has been committed, see in the law of one's country.

1140 II. Denunciation. 1. Denunciation is the denunciation of a crime to officials deputed for this, without the burden of proving it.

2. The following are bound to denunciation:

a) By office, those who have been expressly deputed to this by law, and generally all who, while carrying out a public office, detect some delict in the exercise of their office.

b) By precept of law, in many kingdoms even private persons who perhaps have been witnesses of certain graver crimes are obliged.

c) By natural law, everyone is obliged who knows some crime whose denunciation is necessary for the common good or for averting grave harm from a private person (St. Alphonsus IV, 236).

3. From the obligation of denouncing, if indeed there is question of the common good, a private cause does not excuse; otherwise, a proportionately grave cause excuses. A graver cause is required for those who are bound by office than for those who are bound only by law or by natural right. The principal causes are notable harm to be feared for oneself or one's own from the denunciation, and connection with the delinquent himself. Finally, an entrusted secret not only excuses from the obligation, but even prohibits one from denouncing someone. Except if, from omitted denunciation, grave harm threatens either the common good - in which case there is an obligation not to preserve the secret - or the one accepting the secret (St. Alphonsus IV, 236); if from omitted denunciation grave harm threatens a third person, the things said on p. 720 hold.
4. One who has falsely denounced (or accused) is bound, if he was gravely culpable, to restitution of the damages that followed. Besides, he is obliged to retraction, even with equal harm to himself, but not with much greater harm. If he was not gravely culpable, he is not bound to restore damages; nevertheless he ought to retract the testimony, if this can be done conveniently enough (n. 994).

Section IV. On Advocates

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 71; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 218-226; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, nn. 69-72.)

1141 Under the name of advocates come: 1° those who in a civil or commercial matter argue the client's cause before a judge, and in a criminal matter defend the accused; 2° those who before a tribunal act in place of the litigating parties, by petitioning, concluding, etc., for them; the latter are more often called procurators. Therefore:

I. An advocate ought, by justice, to have or to acquire for himself knowledge congruent with the cause which he undertakes.

II. He can undertake causes as follows:

1. With respect to criminal causes, he can defend the accused even if he is certain concerning the crime committed, for "the accused is not bound to the penalty unless convicted; therefore he can by himself or by another avert it until he is convicted" (St. Alphonsus IV, 220). Nevertheless it is lawful to use only just means; therefore he cannot defend depraved theories, for example determinism, by which all freedom and guilt would be taken away. He can, however, in individual cases gather together whatever could lessen responsibility or even show irresponsibility.
2. As regards civil causes:

a) He can also undertake a doubtful cause, even though perhaps less probable, provided there is a prudent hope of winning, and the client is warned about the doubt (St. Alphonsus IV, 222). "The reason: both because an opinion less probable can in the course of time become more probable, and because many times an opinion which appears less probable to the advocate seems more probable to the judge himself" (St. Alphonsus IV, 222).

b) He cannot undertake a manifestly unjust cause. If, in the course of the lawsuit, he comes to know that the cause is certainly unjust, he is bound to abandon it. If he does not warn the client about the injustice of the cause, he sins against justice toward him; if he has warned him and goes on, he sins by furnishing him counsel and recourse (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 71, a. 3; St. Alphonsus IV, 220).

III. An advocate is bound by justice to treat diligently the cause undertaken; not to abandon it against the will of the client, except in the case just assigned under b); nor to draw it out longer, so that he may receive a greater fee. Finally, he should not demand a richer honorarium than law or custom, with account taken of the labor, permits. If he excels in skill, he can ask what the most skilled would ask in circumstances of this kind; for the service furnished can be said to be worth so much, and the client is to be said to have consented to such a price. If the client departs from the lawsuit for a just cause, the advocate does not have a right except to the price of the labor performed. If without sufficient reason he abandons it, the advocate can demand the whole fee about which they agreed; but commonly the price is not customarily established from the beginning for the whole lawsuit (St. Alphonsus IV, 225; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, n. 70).

To what extent he is sometimes bound to defend a cause gratuitously was said in the treatise on charity (n. 535; cf. St. Thomas, II-II, q. 71, a. 1 and 4, ad 1).

IV. An advocate who has failed in his office is bound to restore the damages that followed, if he was gravely culpable and insofar as he foresaw them at least confusedly.

Here note well that an advocate sometimes sins against justice with respect to the adversary of his client, for example: 1° if he undertakes a manifestly unjust cause; in which case, if he wins, he is bound to restore all damages to the defeated party (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 71, a. 3; St. Alphonsus IV, 223); if he is defeated, he ought at least to restore the expenses which the victor cannot recover from the party; 2° if he produces false writing or false witnesses, or adulterates harmful instruments. One who would bring forward truthful instruments, yet drawn up either to supply ones that had been lost or to pursue a certain right, would not act against commutative justice, although he would sin;[1] 3° if, convinced of the injustice of the cause undertaken by him, he drives the adversary to a settlement (St. Alphonsus IV, 226).

[1] Sweens, n. 610.

Scholion I. On the Accused

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 69; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 272-290; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, nn. 82-87.)

The discussion is only about the accused in criminal matters.

1142 I. The accused, according to present-day law,[1] is not bound to confess the crime. Therefore, even if he is questioned about it by the judge, he can answer, with a broad mental restriction, that he did not commit it, understanding: in such a way that I am bound to confess it. Likewise, using the same restriction, he can deny those things which could harm him, i.e. could lead to proof of the crime, provided he does not inflict injury on others. Nor is an oath now demanded from the accused; and if it were demanded, he could confirm by oath the broad mental restriction used by him, or to be used in the course of the trial. The things said do not prevent the accused, if the common good requires it, from being able and obliged to betray his associates (St. Alphonsus IV, 278).

According to ancient law, these things held: The accused, legitimately questioned, is bound to confess the truth; for it belongs "to the debt of justice that someone obey his superior in those matters to which the right of prelation extends. But the judge ... is superior with respect to the one who is judged; and therefore from debt the accused is bound to set forth to the judge the truth which he demands from him according to the form of law" (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 69, a. 1; St. Alphonsus IV, 274). Moreover, in order that he be legitimately questioned, at least probable indications of the crime must have preceded. The accused is excused: 1° if the judge "indeed questions the accused juridically, but only from a false presumption of delict" (St. Alphonsus IV, 273), as if someone is questioned about a homicide which he committed because of just defense of himself; 2° quite probably, if otherwise a most grave penalty threatens him (St. Alphonsus IV, 274).

[1] Cf. Staatslexikon, word Strafprocess, V, 604.

1143 II. The accused can break the force of testimonies brought forth against him by disclosing the crimes of the witnesses, provided the revelation of the crimes is both necessary and efficacious for his defense. But "to oppose a false crime to a witness or accuser for defending one's own cause is always unlawful and a grave fault" (St. Alphonsus IV, 277).

1144 III. The accused can decline the penalty as follows:

1. If he is innocent, he can flee both before and after sentence; he can also resist positively, for example by driving away the officers, frightening them, wrenching himself from their hands, indeed even by going further. The reason is that in the case the execution of the sentence involves an unjust aggression. Nevertheless, accidentally, positive resistance, especially graver resistance, is for the most part unlawful, because commonly it is not only useless, but also causes greater evils and gives occasion for scandal (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 69, a. 4; St. Alphonsus IV, 279).
2. If he is guilty, he can flee: 1° before he has been condemned; 2° after he has been condemned, if prison has been assigned not for punishment but for custody - that is, until the execution of the sentence. "The reason: because the sentence does not condemn the accused to not fleeing, but only to not resisting the ministers when they execute the sentence" (St. Alphonsus IV, 280, question 2; St. Thomas, II-II, q. 69, a. 4, ad 2). "But if prison has already by the sentence been assigned as a punishment, even perpetually, then one must deny that it is lawful for the accused to flee from prison; because in the execution of a just sentence the accused is certainly bound to obey ... Some except, however, if in prison necessities for sustenance are not given to him ..., or if the prison were excessively grievous, because it seems beyond human strength that someone should be obliged not to free himself, when he can do so without force and resistance, from a very hard penalty" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.; cf. St. Thomas, II-II, q. 69, a. 4, ad 2).

Besides, one who can flee can also remove impediments which stand in the way of flight, for example by breaking the prison. But if damage comes to the guards from this, that can be permitted. He can also deceive the guard by artifice, or make him drunk or put him to sleep when he is not paying attention. But he cannot corrupt him if he has been justly condemned, since there would be formal cooperation in the guard's sin (St. Alphonsus IV, 282).

1145 IV. The accused, as is clear, is not bound per se by an unjust sentence, whether because of a neglected order of law or because of the intrinsic character of the cause. Accidentally, commonly it must be observed, namely lest public order be disturbed and scandals arise (St. Alphonsus IV, 215).

In doubt concerning the justice of the sentence, it is to be presumed just; nevertheless it is lawful to appeal to a higher tribunal.

Note. With respect to ecclesiastical law, observe these things:

1° The accused, legitimately summoned, ought to respond (can. 1646); to respond, i.e. as juridical interpretation has it, is to present himself before the judge.

2° The accused is not bound to confess his own crime, according to these things: Parties are bound to respond to a judge legitimately questioning them and to confess the truth, unless there is question of a delict committed by themselves (can. 1743, § 1).

Scholion II. On Witnesses

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 70; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 255-271; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, nn. 79-81.)

1146 I. The Obligation of Testifying. The following are bound to testify and to confess the truth:

1. By charity one is bound if his testimony "is necessary for averting a great evil of a neighbor or of the state" (St. Alphonsus IV, 264).
2. By office, and by justice, the same persons are bound who by reason of office are bound to denunciation (n. 1140).
3. By precept, one is bound who is legitimately cited and questioned. One who flees when legitimately cited, or who does not confess the truth when legitimately questioned, sins, but does not wound commutative justice, and therefore is not bound to restore to him in whose favor he could have testified (St. Alphonsus IV, 264).

To what extent a cleric can be cited and questioned by a civil judge, see n. 1153.

1147 II. Excusing Causes. A witness is excused from testifying and manifesting the truth (or even, according to circumstances, is bound to abstain from them):

1. If he has known the matter under sacramental secrecy, or has acquired knowledge of the matter for himself through injury, for example by opening letters. If he has received knowledge of the matter under an entrusted secret, the things said concerning denunciation hold (n. 1140; St. Alphonsus IV, 268). For the rest, the law itself also commonly exempts doctors, advocates, priests, etc., from testifying with respect to those things which have been manifested to them in view of their office.
2. "If from the testimony notable harm threatens you or yours, unless nevertheless public harm or another's private harm prevails" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
3. "If you received it from men not sufficiently worthy of faith; for then you can conduct yourself as if you knew nothing" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
4. If someone is brought before the judge without probable indications of a crime. For injury is done to such an accused person (cf. St. Thomas, II-II, q. 69, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.), which the witnesses should not increase by testifying against him; but this excusing cause will scarcely obtain.
5. If the accused is probably immune from grave theological fault (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.); in which case the witness ought to respond that he knows nothing, or even that the accused did not commit the crime. If, however, there is question of a civil cause, the witness ought to confess the fact, even if only juridical fault was present.

6. A spouse and near blood relatives are often excused because of grave inconvenience; indeed civil laws generally exempt them.

Corollary I. One who is exempted or excused can also licitly use a restriction that is not purely mental. Moreover, the more obvious restriction is that by which the witness, when questioned, says that he knows nothing, understanding: which I am bound to manifest. And this holds even if he has sworn an oath to tell the whole truth; nevertheless he should proceed prudently.

Corollary II. A witness who is bound to testify and to confess the truth sins by merely concealing the truth: 1° against a just precept, which is grave from its kind; 2° against religion, if he swore that he would tell the whole truth. If, after this oath has been sworn, he lies or uses a purely mental restriction, he is guilty of perjury; if he is silent or uses a broad mental restriction, he is not indeed guilty of perjury, but he wounds the oath insofar as it is promissory; this is a sin grave from its kind (n. 689); 3° against commutative justice, if he is bound by reason of office; otherwise not, if he is bound only either by charity or by reason of the precept of the judge (St. Alphonsus IV, 270).

Corollary III. A witness "who knowingly has testified falsely, through which he was an efficacious cause of harm to another, is bound to the prevention or reparation of all damages which are caused. Likewise he is bound to retract with equal harm to himself, and even with danger of life, if the accused is endangered in it and he is thought by retracting to be about to accomplish something" (St. Alphonsus IV, 269). If he was not gravely culpable, he is not bound to restitution; nevertheless he ought to retract the testimony, if this can be done conveniently enough (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.; n. 994).

III. With respect to ecclesiastical causes to be treated before an ecclesiastical judge, observe these things:

1. A witness duly cited ought to appear or make known to the judge the cause of his absence (can. 1765, § 1).

2. A disobedient witness, namely one who without legitimate cause does not appear, or even if he appears refuses to respond or to take an oath or to sign the attestation, can be coerced by the judge with suitable penalties and moreover fined in proportion to the harm which comes to the parties from his disobedience (can. 1765, § 2).

3. Witnesses must respond to a judge legitimately questioning them and confess the truth (can. 1755, § 1).

4. From the obligation assigned under 3 are exempted: 1° pastors and other priests as regards those things which have been manifested to them by reason of the sacred ministry outside sacramental confession; magistrates of states, doctors, midwives, advocates, notaries, and others who are bound to secrecy of office even by reason of counsel furnished, as regards matters subject to this secret; 2° those who fear that from their testimony infamy, dangerous vexations, or other very grave evils will come upon themselves or upon blood relatives or relatives by affinity in any degree of the direct line and in the first degree of the collateral line (can. 1755, § 2).

Section V. On Physicians and Notaries

1148 (St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 291, 230 and 231.)

I. A physician is bound to possess sufficient knowledge, and in the exercise of his office to apply diligence proportionate to the gravity of the illness or operation. Hence he ought to furnish the sick person the remedy which seems safer to him. "But if there is no hope concerning the health of the sick person, nor is there present any remedy except a doubtful one, namely one concerning which it is doubted whether it will be useful or harmful, they can, indeed they ought to, apply it. The reason is that thus the business of the sick person is managed usefully; and if death follows, it will not be imputed to them, since otherwise he has no hope of life" (St. Alphonsus IV, 291).

Corollary. It is unlawful to use a means solely for the sake of experiment, except in the case in which the means to be applied is certainly not going to be harmful, and the consent of the sick person is added.

II. A physician should abstain from useless visits and remedies. Observe, however, that those are not plainly useless if they conduce in some way to consoling the sick person or alleviating his pains; nevertheless he should take care that the expenses do not become greater than is just.

III. He can ask the honorarium which, considering the labor and condition of the sick person, is customary to be asked in those regions. If he excels in skill, he can ask what the most skilled are accustomed to ask in circumstances of this kind. The reason is that the service furnished is deservedly said to be worth so much, and that those whose interest it is consent to an honorarium of this kind.

IV. Finally, the physician is also bound, either by himself or through another, to warn the sick person in a timely way concerning danger to life, so that he can provide for the salvation of his soul, receive the sacraments rightly, and arrange temporal affairs. If, however, he is morally certain either that the sick person is in the state of grace, or that the warning will not be useful, at least a grave obligation under this heading is not had (St. Alphonsus VI, 664).

I add these grave words of St. Alphonsus: "O how miserable it is to see so many sick persons (and especially you who are of distinguished dignity) reduced to the final straits of death, so that they may prepare the accounts of life soon to be rendered to God, at a time when they are almost lifeless, when they can scarcely then form words, scarcely hear others, scarcely conceive the state of their own conscience and sorrow for their sins! And all this happens through the fault of those physicians who, lest they displease the sick or their relatives, do not make them certain concerning the danger; indeed they go on flattering them until they themselves altogether despair of life" (Praxis Confessarii, n. 57).

1149 V. With respect to notaries it suffices to treat the question insofar as a notary is bound to restitution toward the treasury if, with the parties consenting explicitly or implicitly, he writes down a price of the thing lower than the true one for this end, that the tax to be paid may be diminished.

Response 1. If there is a custom of writing down a lesser value, and the notary follows that custom, he is not bound to restitution, nor does he sin; indeed, by oath he can affirm that all things have been duly declared.

Response 2. If the notary goes beyond the custom, and deprives the treasury of a tax to which the client is not obliged, likewise he is not bound to restitution; nor does he sin by writing down the lesser value, because he can use a broad mental restriction: Such is the value, insofar as it is subject to a just tax.

Response 3. If the notary goes beyond the custom, and deprives the treasury of a tax (or part of a tax) to which the client is bound, he is obliged to restitution, because by an unjust means, namely a lie, he impedes the state from a good legitimately to be obtained (n. 996). Note, however, that the obligation of restoring belongs primarily to those in whose name the notary acted.

Part II. On the Duties of Clerics

Section I. Preliminary Notes

1150 I. The Notion of Clerics. Those who have been dedicated to the divine ministries by at least first tonsure are called clerics (can. 108, § 1). Besides, note:

1. Clerics are not all in the same grade, but among them there is a sacred hierarchy in which some are subordinated to others (can. 108, § 2). With these things considered, the sacred or ecclesiastical hierarchy can be defined: the body of clerics who, according to various grades, enjoy sacred power in the Church. It is distinguished into the hierarchy of Order and the hierarchy of jurisdiction, according as sacred power is concerned with the ministry of divine worship (for example, the dispensation of the sacraments, etc.) or with the governance of the faithful (cf. can. 948).
2. By divine institution the sacred hierarchy, by reason of order, consists of Bishops, presbyters, and ministers; by reason of jurisdiction, of the supreme pontificate and the subordinate episcopate; but by the institution of the Church other grades have also been added (can. 108, § 3).
3. Those who are enrolled in the ecclesiastical hierarchy are not chosen by the consent or calling of the people or of secular power; but in the grades of the power of order they are constituted by sacred ordination; in the supreme pontificate, by divine law itself, once the condition of legitimate election and acceptance of the same has been fulfilled; in the remaining grades of jurisdiction, by canonical mission (can. 109). This mission is called canonical because it is required precisely for having canonical, i.e. ecclesiastical, jurisdiction, just as civil mission is required for having civil jurisdiction. It is said: in the remaining grades of jurisdiction; hence, although the episcopate together with the papacy was instituted by Christ, individual Bishops nevertheless also need canonical mission on the part of the Roman Pontiff (cf. can. 329), not only so that territory may authoritatively be marked out for them and subjects assigned to them, as all concede, but also - according to the opinion today at least most common and certain - so that they may directly acquire their jurisdiction.

1151 II. The Enrollment of Clerics in Some Diocese or Religion. Every cleric ought to be enrolled in some diocese or religion, so that wandering clerics are in no way admitted (can. 111, § 1).

1. Enrollment in some diocese. By reception of first tonsure a cleric is enrolled, or, as they say, incardinated, in the diocese for whose service he was promoted (can. 111, § 2). Moreover, in order that a cleric already enrolled in some diocese may be incardinated into another diocese, he must obtain: 1° from his own Ordinary letters of perpetual and absolute excardination, signed by the same; 2° from the Ordinary of the other diocese letters, likewise perpetual and absolute, of incardination, signed by the same (can. 112). Besides, there is excardination and incardination if the cleric has obtained a residential benefice from the Ordinary of the other diocese with the consent of his own Ordinary given in writing, or with permission granted by the same in writing to depart from the diocese in perpetuity (can. 114).
2. Enrollment in some religion. One professed with perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, loses by the law itself the proper diocese which he had in the world (can. 585). If a religious constituted in sacred orders has lost his proper diocese through perpetual profession, and afterwards departs from the religion, he cannot exercise sacred orders outside the religion until he has found a Bishop benevolently receiving him, or the Apostolic See has otherwise provided. But if some Bishop has received such a religious, by that very fact he is incardinated in his diocese (can. 641).

1152 III. The Rights of Clerics. Rights here are called those things which are founded in the very nature of the clerical state. Therefore:

1. Clerics alone can obtain ecclesiastical power, whether of order or of jurisdiction (can. 118).
2. All the faithful owe reverence to clerics, according to their diverse grades and offices, and they stain themselves with the delict of sacrilege if at any time they have inflicted a real injury on clerics (can. 119; cf. n. 614).

1153 IV. The Privileges of Clerics. Privileges are those things which have been added to rights by positive law. They are: the privilege of the canon, the privilege of the forum, the privilege of exemption, and the privilege of competency.

1. The privilege of the canon is that by which a cleric is protected against every real or bodily injury by the penalties established against those who commit them. It is called the privilege of the canon because it was contained in the celebrated canon of Lateran Council II (1139).
2. The privilege of the forum is that by which a cleric is exempted from lay jurisdiction according to the norm of can. 120, soon to be cited. It is called the privilege of the forum, for forum (from fero or foris) according to the first imposition of the name signifies a public place to which goods for sale are brought; here, however, it chiefly signifies the place in which lawsuits and trials are carried on. Therefore, according to can. 120, clerics in all causes, whether contentious or criminal, must be summoned before an ecclesiastical judge, unless something else has been legitimately provided for particular places, or special permission has been obtained to summon them before a lay judge. If nevertheless they are summoned by one who had no prior permission, they can, by reason of necessity and to avoid greater evils, appear, but with notice having been given to the Superior from whom permission was not obtained. It is said:

a) In all causes; whether contentious or criminal, whether civil or ecclesiastical. Moreover, exemption from the jurisdiction of secular judges with respect to ecclesiastical causes is rather from native right than from privilege, even taken broadly; with respect to civil causes, exemption is from privilege. Nevertheless that privilege does not prevent clerics from generally being subject to civil laws; but if a cause is instituted, for example if there is question of punishing a transgression of civil law, the matter is to be referred to the ecclesiastical judge. Hence it is also said that clerics are subject to civil laws with respect to the directive part, but not with respect to the coercive part.

b) Must be summoned, i.e. cited as defendants, not as witnesses.

c) Unless something else has been legitimately provided for particular places. Thus, for example, in Austria, Bavaria, and Colombia, by concordats, the privilege of the forum has partly been derogated. Whether this privilege can also be derogated by way of custom, at least centenary custom, is disputed among canonists.

d) Or special permission has been obtained to summon them before a lay judge. Moreover, Cardinal Fathers, Legates of the Apostolic See, Bishops even titular, Abbots or Prelates nullius, supreme Superiors of religions of pontifical right, and major Officials of the Roman Curia, on account of affairs pertaining to their office, cannot be summoned before a lay judge without permission of the Apostolic See; others enjoying the privilege of the forum cannot be summoned without permission of the Ordinary of the place in which the cause is conducted. Yet the Ordinary should not deny this license without a just and grave cause, especially when the plaintiff is a layman, and most of all when he has fruitlessly given effort to settling the controversies between the parties (can. 120, § 2).

3. The privilege of exemption.[1] All clerics are immune from military service, from offices and public civil duties alien to the clerical state (can. 121). Duties and offices are understood: 1° those which are repugnant to the dignity of the clerical state, such as sordid duties; 2° those which can be composed with difficulty with the duties of the clerical state, such as offices for preserving public security, for keeping watches, for averting fires, and similar things.

4. The privilege of competency. It is the privilege by which a cleric burdened with debt and called into court by creditors cannot be deprived of those goods which are required for his honorable support; according to these words of can. 122: Clerics who are compelled to satisfy creditors are to have safe those things which, by the prudent judgment of the ecclesiastical judge, are necessary for their honorable support, while nevertheless their obligation of satisfying the creditors as soon as possible remains firm.

A cleric cannot renounce the privileges mentioned; but he loses them if he is reduced to the lay state,[2] or is punished with perpetual privation of the right of wearing ecclesiastical habit, according to the norm of can. 213, § 1 and can. 2304. But he recovers them if this penalty is remitted or he himself is again admitted among clerics (can. 123).

[1] Cf. Damen, Vrijdom der Geestelijken van krijgsdienst.

[2] Cf. scholion.

Scholion. On the Reduction of a Cleric to the Lay State

1154 I. Modes of Reduction. 1. A minor cleric returns to the lay state:

a) By the fact itself: 1° if he has entered marriage, except in the case in which the marriage was null because of force or fear inflicted on him (can. 132, § 2); 2° if by his own authority and without legitimate cause he has put aside ecclesiastical habit and tonsure, and, when warned by the Ordinary, has not amended himself within a month (can. 136, § 3); 3° if of his own accord he has given his name to military service, except in the case in which he did this with the permission of the Ordinary, so that he might become free more quickly (can. 141).

b) By his own will, after the local Ordinary has been forewarned (can. 211, § 2).

c) By decree of the Ordinary issued for a just cause, namely if the Ordinary, all things having been weighed, has prudently judged that the cleric cannot, with the decorum of the clerical state, be promoted to sacred orders (can. 211, § 2).

2. A major cleric is reduced to the lay state:

a) By rescript of the Holy See (can. 211, § 1).

b) By decree or sentence according to the norm of can. 214 (can. 211, § 1); this can. 214 establishes: A cleric who, compelled by grave fear, received a sacred order and afterwards, once the fear was removed, did not ratify that same ordination at least tacitly by the exercise of the order, while nevertheless willing by such an act to subject himself to clerical obligations, is to be reduced to the lay state by sentence of the judge, after the coercion and the lack of ratification have been legitimately proved, without any obligations of celibacy and canonical hours.

c) By the penalty of degradation (can. 211, § 1).

1155 II. Effects of Reduction. All who have legitimately been reduced from the clerical state to the lay state, or have returned to it, by that very fact lose offices, benefices, clerical rights and privileges, and are forbidden to go about in ecclesiastical habit and to wear tonsure (can. 213, § 1); nevertheless a major cleric is held by the obligation of celibacy, except in the case of which there was discussion under 2, b.

1156 III. Cessation of Reduction. 1. For one constituted in minor orders who has returned to the lay state for any cause whatever to be admitted again among clerics, permission of the Ordinary of the diocese to which he was incardinated by ordination is required; this is not to be granted except after a diligent examination concerning life and morals, and a suitable trial, according to the judgment of the Ordinary himself (can. 212, § 1).

2. A major cleric who has returned to the lay state, in order to be admitted again among clerics, needs permission of the Holy See (can. 212, § 2).

Section II. On the Duties of Clerics

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 184, a. 8; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 83-191; Homo Apostolicus, Appendix 3.)

We shall speak first of the duties of clerics generally, then of the duties of some clerics specifically.

Chapter I. On the Duties of Clerics Generally

1157 Can. 124 establishes generally: "Clerics ought to lead an interior and exterior life holier than laymen, and to excel them in virtue and right deeds as an example." Therefore they are bound to a holier life than laymen both by reason of the offices to which they are deputed, and by reason of the example to be furnished by them.

By reason of offices; concerning which St. Thomas says: "For the suitable execution of Orders, goodness of whatever sort is not sufficient, but excellent goodness is required, so that just as those who receive Order are constituted above the people in the grade of Order, so also they may be superior in the merit of holiness" (Supplementum, q. 35, a. 1, ad 3). And concerning the Priest in II-II, q. 184, a. 8, he says: "Through sacred Order someone is deputed to the most worthy ministries, by which Christ Himself is served in the Sacrament of the Altar; for this a greater interior holiness is required than even the religious state requires."

By reason of example; concerning which the Council of Trent says:[2] "There is nothing which more continually instructs others unto piety and the worship of God than the life and example of those who have dedicated themselves to the divine ministry. For since they are lifted from the things of the world into a higher place, the rest cast their eyes upon them as upon a mirror, and from them take what they may imitate. Wherefore it is altogether fitting that clerics called into the lot of the Lord so compose their whole life and morals that in habit, gesture, gait, speech, and all other things they display nothing except what is grave, moderate, and full of religion; and that they avoid even slight things, which in them would be very great, so that their actions may bring veneration to all."

After these things have been noted generally, following the Code of Canon Law we shall speak first of positive duties, then of negative duties, and finally specifically of the duty of reciting the canonical hours.

[1] Cf. Code of Canon Law, cann. 124-144; Decretals, book III, title 1, De vita et honestate clericorum; Council of Trent, session 22, decree on reform, c. 1; Exhortation to the clergy of Pius X, 4 August 1908; Wernz-Vidal, Ius canonicum, II, n. 87 sq.; Gasparri, Tractatus de sacra ordinatione, I, n. 1 sq.; Vermeersch-Creusen, Epitome Iuris Canonici, I, n. 214 sq.; Vlaming, Institutiones iuris ecclesiastici, part III, n. 489 sq.

[2] Session 22, decree on reform, c. 1.

Article I. On Positive Duties

1158 To these pertain:

I. Penance and Prayer. 1. Let local Ordinaries take care: 1° that all clerics frequently wash away the stains of conscience by the sacrament of penance; 2° that the same daily devote themselves for some time to mental prayer, visit the Most Holy Sacrament, honor the Virgin Mother of God with the Marian rosary, and examine their conscience (can. 125).

2. All secular priests ought at least every third year to give themselves to spiritual exercises, for a time to be determined by their own Ordinary, in some pious or religious house designated by the same; nor is anyone to be exempted from them except in a particular case, for a just cause and by express permission of the same Ordinary (can. 126).

Pius XI, in the encyclical on spiritual exercises,[1] greatly commends to clerics a recollection to be made every month or at least every third month.

[1] 20 December 1929 (A. A. S. 1929, p. 689).

1159 II. Obedience.[1] 1. All clerics, but especially presbyters, are held by a special obligation each to show reverence and obedience to his own Ordinary (can. 127).

2. As often and for as long as, in the judgment of one's own Ordinary, the necessity of the Church requires it, and unless a legitimate impediment excuses, clerics must undertake and faithfully fulfill the office which has been committed to them by the Bishop (can. 128).

Priests are held to obedience by a further special title, by force of the promise which they made on the occasion of ordination into the hands of the consecrating Bishop.

Exempt religious promise reverence and obedience anew by this promise to their own Ordinary Prelate, i.e. to their major religious Superior.

[1] Cf. Ned. Kath. Stemmen, 1910, p. 143; 1912, pp. 9, 67; 1914, pp. 100, 130.

1160 III. Cultivation of the Sciences. 1. Clerics, after receiving the priesthood, should not interrupt studies, especially sacred studies; and in the sacred disciplines they should follow that solid doctrine handed down by the elders and commonly received by the Church, avoiding profane novelties of words and knowledge falsely so called (can. 129).

2. Once the course of studies has been completed, all priests, even if they have obtained a parochial or canonical benefice, unless they have been exempted by the local Ordinary for a just cause, are to undergo an examination every year for at least a full three years in the various disciplines of the sacred sciences, previously opportunely designated, according to the manner to be determined by the same Ordinary (can. 130, § 1). In the conferral of ecclesiastical offices and benefices, account should be taken of those who, other things being equal, have excelled more in the aforesaid examinations (can. 130, § 2). Add can. 2376: Priests who, neither dispensed by the Ordinary nor detained by a legitimate impediment, refuse to make the examination mentioned in can. 130, are to be compelled to it by the Ordinary with suitable penalties.

a) Priests who study in lay universities are not exempted from the examination of which there was discussion.[1] Nothing prevents, however, the threefold annual examination from being deferred until they have completed their studies.[2]

b) Religious pastors or religious vicars with care of souls are not bound to undergo that examination if they have undergone before the religious Superior or his delegate the examination of which there is discussion in can. 590.[3] But in the case of negligence of religious Superiors concerning that examination, recourse is to be made to the Sacred Congregation of Religious.[4]

c) What has been said about religious pastors or religious vicars with care of souls is to be said by the same right about other religious.

3. In the episcopal city and in each vicariate forane, more often in the year, on days to be fixed beforehand by the judgment of the local Ordinary, meetings are to be held which they call collations or conferences, concerning moral and liturgical matters; to these can be added other exercises which the Ordinary has judged opportune for promoting the knowledge and piety of clerics (can. 131, § 1). If it is difficult to hold meetings, written solved questions are to be sent, according to norms to be established by the Ordinary (can. 131, § 2). Unless they have previously expressly obtained exemption from the local Ordinary, all secular priests are bound to attend the meeting, or, if the meeting is lacking, to send a written solution of the cases; and likewise religious, even exempt, who have care of souls, and also, if the collation is not held in their houses, other religious who have obtained the faculty of hearing confessions from the Ordinary (can. 131, § 3). Add can. 2377: Priests contumacious against the prescription of can. 131 are to be punished by the Ordinary according to his prudent judgment; but if they are religious confessors not bearing care of souls, he is to suspend them from hearing confessions of seculars.

[1] Sacred Consistorial Congregation, 30 April 1918 (A. A. S. 1918, p. 237).

[2] Vermeersch-Creusen, Epitome, n. 218.

[3] Pontifical Commission, 14 July 1922 (A. A. S. 1922, p. 526).

[4] Pontifical Commission, 14 July 1922 (A. A. S. 1922, p. 526).

1161 IV. Chastity; concerning which several things must be noted.

1. The obligation of celibacy and perfect chastity. Clerics constituted in major orders are kept from marriage and are held by the obligation of preserving chastity in such a way that those sinning against it are also guilty of sacrilege, saving the prescription of can. 214, § 1[1] (can. 132, § 1). The aforesaid clerics attempt marriage not only illicitly but also invalidly (can. 1072). The obligation of perfect chastity also binds a married man who has been initiated into sacred order with apostolic dispensation.

The said obligation of preserving perfect chastity certainly arises from the solemn vow of chastity, which is plainly made tacitly in the reception of major order, from Boniface VIII,[2] from John XXII,[3] and from the Constitution of Benedict XIV Inter praeteritos, § 41 (St. Alphonsus VI, 808). Likewise it arises from ecclesiastical law, insofar as perfect chastity regards external and mixed acts, so that a major cleric who had entirely been ignorant of or had excluded the vow of chastity would nevertheless, through an external violation of perfect chastity, sin both against chastity and against religion, namely because the ecclesiastical law was passed from the motive of this virtue; in a word, he would become guilty of carnal sacrilege (cf. can. 132, § 1). With respect to merely internal acts, the matter is deservedly called into doubt, since ecclesiastical law more probably cannot, and in fact is not presumed to, regard acts of this kind. Besides, note:

a) Married men, while the wife is living, are kept from receiving orders (can. 987, 2°). A married man who without apostolic dispensation has received major orders, even in good faith, is prohibited from the exercise of those orders (can. 132, § 3).

b) Minor clerics can indeed enter marriage, but unless the marriage was null by force or fear inflicted on them, they fall by the law itself from the clerical state (can. 132, § 2).

c) From can. 188, 5°, any offices of clerics are vacant by the fact itself and without any declaration, even if they have contracted only civil marriage, as they say.

d) With respect to the Eastern Church these things hold: 1° Clerics who contracted marriage before the subdiaconate can receive the remaining orders and continue married life, except Bishops, who are bound to bid farewell altogether to married life. 2° Clerics once initiated into the subdiaconate are prohibited from contracting marriage; not indeed by vow, but by prescription of the Church. Indeed, "the marriage would be not only illicit, but also invalid."

2. Means of preserving chastity; to which can. 133 refers: Clerics should take care not to keep with themselves or in any way frequent women concerning whom there could be suspicion (§ 1). It is lawful for them to cohabit only with those women in whom a natural bond allows nothing evil to be suspected, such as mother, sister, paternal aunt, and the like, or from whom proven honesty of morals joined with more advanced age removes every suspicion (§ 2). Judgment whether keeping or frequenting women in some particular case can be a scandal or bring danger of incontinence belongs to the local Ordinary, whose duty it is to prohibit clerics from this keeping or frequenting (§ 3). The contumacious are presumed concubinarians (§ 4).

3. Penal sanctions. a) Clerics constituted in minor orders, guilty of some delict against the sixth precept of the decalogue, are to be punished according to the gravity of the fault, even by dismissal from the clerical state if the circumstances of the delict advise this, besides the penalties threatened by can. 2357 for some delicts even against laymen (can. 2358).

b) Clerics in sacred orders, whether secular or religious, who are concubinarians, after warning has been issued uselessly, are to be compelled to withdraw from illicit cohabitation and to repair scandal, by suspension from divine things and by privation of the fruits of office, benefice, or dignity, with observance of cann. 2176-2181 concerning the manner of proceeding against concubinary clerics. If they have committed a delict against the sixth precept of the decalogue with minors below the age of sixteen years, or have committed adultery, defloration, bestiality, sodomy, pandering, or incest with blood relatives or relatives by affinity in the first degree, they are to be suspended, declared infamous, deprived of any office, benefice, dignity, or function which they have, and in graver cases deposed. If they have offended otherwise against the sixth precept of the decalogue, they are to be restrained with suitable penalties according to the gravity of the case, not excluding privation of office or benefice, especially if they have care of souls (can. 2359).

c) Clerics constituted in sacred orders, or regulars or nuns after a solemn vow of chastity, and likewise all who presume to contract marriage, even only civilly, with any of the aforesaid persons, incur excommunication latae sententiae simply reserved to the Apostolic See. Besides, clerics, if after warning they have not come to their senses within the time fixed beforehand by the Ordinary according to the diversity of circumstances, are to be degraded (can. 2388, § 1). Finally, as has already been noted, any offices of clerics are vacant by the fact itself and without any declaration, even if they have contracted only civil marriage, as they say (can. 188, 5°).

[1] Can. 214, § 1 establishes: A cleric who, compelled by grave fear, received a sacred order and afterwards, once the fear was removed, did not ratify that same ordination at least tacitly by the exercise of the order, while nevertheless willing by such an act to subject himself to clerical obligations, is to be reduced to the lay state by sentence of the judge, after the coercion and the lack of ratification have been legitimately proved, without any obligations of celibacy and canonical hours.

[2] C. unic., De voto, III, 15.

[3] C. unic., Extravagantes, I, 6.

1162 V. Common Life. The custom of common life among clerics is to be praised and recommended, and where it flourishes, it is to be preserved as far as can be done (can. 134).

1163 VI. The Divine Office. Clerics constituted in major orders, except those mentioned in cann. 213 and 214, i.e. those who have been legitimately reduced to the lay state, are held by the obligation of reciting the canonical hours completely every day according to their proper and approved liturgical books (can. 135); concerning these, see Article III.

1164 VII. External Gravity. To this pertain those things which regard ecclesiastical habit, hair and tonsure, and the rest of the apparatus of external things.

1. Ecclesiastical habit. a) All clerics are to wear decent ecclesiastical habit, according to legitimate customs of places and the prescriptions of the local Ordinary (can. 136, § 1).

b) A cleric who, with no necessity compelling, does not wear the prescribed habit sins generally gravely, as is clear from the gravity of the penalty soon to be reported, and also from the doctrine of the Council of Trent,[1] which charges with temerity and contempt of religion clerics who, valuing their proper dignity and clerical honor lightly, wear lay clothing even publicly. A cleric sins only lightly if, without a just cause, for a brief time, without a depraved end and without grave scandal, he puts off the habit. He does not sin if he does this even for a long time but with proportionate cause, for example to avoid danger of death or grave harm (St. Alphonsus VI, 825; Examen Ordinandorum, n. 49).

c) Minor clerics who by their own authority and without legitimate cause have put off ecclesiastical habit and tonsure, and when warned by the Ordinary have not amended themselves within a month, fall by the law itself from the clerical state (can. 136, § 3). Major clerics, after a month has passed uselessly from the warning, are to be suspended from the orders received; and if they have notoriously passed over to a kind of life alien to the clerical state, and, after being warned again, have not come to their senses, they are to be deposed after three months from this last warning (can. 2379). Any offices are vacant by the fact itself if a cleric by his own authority and without just cause has laid aside ecclesiastical habit, and, when warned by the Ordinary, has not resumed it within a month from receiving the warning (can. 188, 7°).

2. Hair and tonsure. The meaning of this crown is disputed; for they narrate that Blessed Peter was shaved on the head by pagans for the sake of mockery, and was shorn around in a circle, and that from this the use of wearing the crown was introduced into the Church. Others derive it from symbolic reasons, either insofar as this crown or shaving of the head, already among Greeks and Romans and so among monks and clerics, though with a higher meaning, would be a sign of servitude,[2] or as an imitation of the thorny crown of Our Lord, or on the contrary as a sign of reign or royal dignity (cf. St. Thomas, Supplementum, q. 40, a. 1).

a) All clerics are to wear the tonsure or clerical crown, unless the received customs of peoples bear otherwise, and are to use a simple style of hair (can. 136, § 1). It is said "unless the received customs of peoples bear otherwise," because the custom of wearing the crown has not been received in some regions, or at least has fallen into desuetude, which desuetude is now recognized in the Code itself. A wig can licitly be used from a just cause with the permission of the Bishop. But it is not lawful to celebrate with it except with the permission of the Supreme Pontiff, or of another endowed with the faculty of granting permission; a faculty of this kind has been given, for example, to Nuncios, provided true necessity is present (St. Alphonsus VI, 398).[3]

b) The gravity of the obligation of wearing the tonsure is not established, unless it is omitted from contempt, or someone constituted in sacred orders neglects it for a very long time, for example for many months (St. Alphonsus VI, 826; Homo Apostolicus, Appendix 3, n. 50).

c) With respect to the penal sanction, cf. can. 136, § 3, reported above.

Note. Formerly in the Western Church it was forbidden to wear a beard, except in a case of necessity, with the permission of the Bishop being added, or from privilege (as for Capuchins), or from particular usage.[4] But the Code is silent concerning this matter; therefore a general prohibition is no longer had, although neither has positive license been given. Hence the Sacred Congregation of the Council, in the Wroclaw case,[5] responded that the Code had not conceded the wearing of a beard, and that Ordinaries have the right to keep in force, each for his own diocese, the prohibition in force before the Code.

3. The rest of the apparatus of external things. Concerning the ring, can. 136, § 2 says: Let them not use a ring, unless this has been conceded to them by law or apostolic privilege. Thus, for example, from liturgical laws the ring belongs to Bishops because of spiritual marriage with the Church (can. 349, § 1, n. 2). In the Code it is also conceded to Abbots (can. 325) and Doctors (can. 1378); from privilege, sometimes to certain canons. Nevertheless, with respect to the wearing of a ring in Mass, can. 811, § 2 establishes: "(A priest about to celebrate Mass) should abstain ... from zucchetto and ring, unless he is a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, a Bishop, or a blessed Abbot, or unless an apostolic indult permits him the use of the same in celebrating Mass."

For the rest, attention must be paid to the general principles and obligations connatural to clerics, taken from the character of the clerical state itself (can. 124). Thus in general, luxury of every kind is always to be prohibited to clerics.[6] Under this name come, for example, boasting and the use of perfumes, concerning which c. 1, causa 21, qu. 4; likewise c. 1, c. 21, q. 4: display and sumptuousness in furnishings, concerning which, among other things, Trent[7] declares: "not only does [the Council] command that bishops be content with modest furnishings ..., but also that in the rest of the manner of life and the whole household, they take care that nothing appear which does not display simplicity, zeal for God, and contempt of vanities ... What has been said concerning Bishops, it determines that the same is to be observed, according to the condition of their grade, in all who hold any ecclesiastical benefices."

[1] Session 14, chapter 6, on reform.

[2] Vlaming, n. 514; Gasparri, I, n. 38.

[3] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, n. 2027, ad 5; Benedict XIV, De Synodo, book 11, c. 9.

[4] Cf. response of the Nuncio of Munich, given on 4 May 1863 to the Archbishop of Munich.

[5] 10 January 1920.

[6] Cf. Trent, session 22, on reform, chapter 1.

[7] Session 25, on reform, chapter 1.

Scholion. On Celibacy

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 152, aa. 1-5; Supplementum, q. 41, a. 2; Contra Gentiles, book 3, c. 136 sq.; on book 4 of the Sentences, dist. 26, q. 1, a. 2; Opusc. 18, De Perfectione vitae spiritualis, c. 8; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 806-812.)

1165 I. Notion. Celibacy is understood as the state of major clerics, insofar as they are bound to abstain from entering marriage, or, if perhaps before the reception of the subdiaconate they entered it, from the use of it. Sometimes celibacy is taken for the state of perfect chastity, to which major clerics are bound.

1166 II. Origin. The author of the law of celibacy is the Church, not Christ. This is already deduced from the fact that the Church tolerates the practice of the Greeks, and also in the Latin Church has several times dispensed in celibacy; indeed, it even concedes to inferior ministers the faculty of dispensing in some cases, except nevertheless if there is question of the presbyterate (cf. cann. 1043-1045).

1167 III. History. In both the Greek and Latin Church it has always been prohibited that a cleric enter marriage after receiving the diaconate.[1] Leo I extended the same thing to subdeacons.[2] Besides, from the beginnings of the Church the practice was that major clerics abstain from the use of a marriage perhaps contracted previously.[3] But in the Greek Church the contrary practice gradually prevailed to such a degree that the Trullan Synod, also called Quinisext, issued a decree by which the use of a marriage previously entered is conceded to Subdeacons, Deacons, and Presbyters.[4] The Holy See tolerated that decree, although it desires that perfect chastity be observed by clerics also in the Greek Church.[5] For the rest, major clerics cannot enter marriage, and Bishops are bound to perfect chastity.

[1] Cf. Thomassinus, Vetus et nova Ecclesiae disciplina, part I, book 2, c. 60 sq.; Vlaming, Institutiones iuris ecclesiastici, part 3, n. 495 sq.

[2] De Jong, Handboek der Kerkgeschiedenis, vol. I, § 14, 50.

[3] De Jong, loc. cit.; witnesses are Origen (Homily 23 on Numbers, n. 3), Eusebius (Demonstratio Evangelica, book 1, c. 9), St. Cyril of Jerusalem (Catechesis 12, n. 24 sq.).

[4] Canon 13.

[5] Constitution Etsi pastoralis, 26 May, § 7, n. 25.

1168 IV. Suitability. Celibacy is especially fitting for clerics: 1° because a more perfect state, such as celibacy is, is fitting for those who excel others in dignity; 2° because the state of continence is especially desired in those who are bound to be occupied continually with holy and pure mysteries; 3° because one who is free from the cares of marriage better can fulfill his duties of praying, preaching, teaching, administering the sacraments, visiting the sick, etc.[1]

Objection 1. Celibacy is opposed to the precept of preserving and propagating the human species; therefore it is dishonorable.

Response 1. If the conclusion were valid, all who, being capable of entering marriage, refused to enter it would act dishonorably.

Response 2. The precept of preserving and propagating the human species does not oblige individual persons, because that precept alone obliges individual persons which first of itself regards the good of individuals. But the precept of preserving and propagating the human species does not first of itself regard the good of individuals, but the good of the multitude or species (St. Thomas, Contra Gentiles, book 3, c. 137; II-II, q. 152, a. 2). For the rest, even if the said precept does not regard individual persons, no danger from it threatens the propagation of the species or the end intended by God instituting marriage; for, considering the very great inclination of men toward the act of generation, the number of those who will remain in celibacy will always be relatively very small.

For the rest, note that the common good consists not only in a number raised to the highest point, but in the happiness of the multitude, which indeed is promoted more by clerics who observe celibacy than by those who are entangled in the cares of marriage and family (St. Thomas, II-II, loc. cit.).

Objection 2. The law of celibacy does injury to clerics.

Response. I deny the assertion, since the Church does not impose the burden of celibacy on the unwilling, but on those freely embracing the clerical state.

Objection 3. The law of celibacy involves what seems morally impossible.

Response. Experience proves the contrary. Then, the adversaries do not think about the special grace of state. Further, the obligation of celibacy is undertaken at that age and after such a testing of life that it is lawful to hope safely that, with divine grace assisting, it can be observed without difficulty.

Objection 4. Celibacy provides occasion for sins of lust.

Response. The said sins are first indeed exaggerated; then they are compensated by the countless goods arising from celibacy.

Finally, experts testify that celibacy also does not harm health.[2]

[1] Cf. 2 Tim. II, 3; 1 Cor. VII, 32.

[2] Cf. our little work De virtute castitatis et de vitiis oppositis, n. 18.

1169 V. Excellence. Celibacy is preferred to the matrimonial state.[1] It is de fide from the Council of Trent: If anyone says that the conjugal state is to be placed before the state of virginity or celibacy, and that it is not better and more blessed to remain in virginity or celibacy than to be joined in Matrimony, let him be anathema.[2] This is established first from Sacred Scripture: "His disciples say to him: If the case of a man with his wife is so, it is not expedient to marry. He said to them: Not all receive this word, but those to whom it has been given. For there are eunuchs ... who have castrated themselves for the kingdom of heaven. He who can receive it, let him receive it."[3] Then it is proved from this, that celibacy, that is, immunity from spouse and family with the things annexed to them, when undertaken with a right intention, favors a more intense service of God and neighbor.

[1] Cf. our little work De virtute castitatis et de vitiis oppositis, n. 18.

[2] Session 24, can. 10.

[3] Matt. XIX, 10-12.

Article II. On Negative Duties

Several things are prohibited to clerics, either because they bring with themselves a danger of harm, such as suretyship (can. 137); or because they are unbecoming to the clerical state, such as unbecoming arts, games of chance, etc. (can. 138); or because they are alien to the clerical state, such as the medical art, notariate, etc. (can. 139 sq.).

1170 I. Suretyship. A cleric is prohibited from standing surety, even with his own goods, without the local Ordinary having been consulted (can. 137). The reason is evident; for experience establishes that suretyships, even when made with due prudence, often create harm or at least danger of harm for those who have aided others in such a way. There is added that, even if the surety can fulfill the obligations which he has taken upon himself - which is required in every suretyship - nevertheless often from those financial vicissitudes there arise dissensions and contentions which can be an impediment to the fruitful ministry of clerics. A fortiori it is not lawful for clerics to stand surety with goods not their own, or goods in any way pertaining to the Church, since they are not owners of those goods, but only administrators (cf. can. 1523, 1° and 1527).

1171 II. Unbecoming or Base Arts (can. 138), of which kind are, for example, the offices of butchers, innkeepers and tavern-keepers, actors and comedians, shoemakers, lay service or servitude, etc. (St. Alphonsus IV, 189).[1]

[1] Cf. c. 3, D. 44; c. 1, Clem. III, 1; Trent, session 22, on reform, c. 1.

1172 III. Games of Chance, with Money Staked (can. 138). Games are distinguished into games of chance, games of skill, and mixed games, according as they are governed by fortune alone, or by skill alone, as playing chess, or by fortune and skill, as playing cards. Therefore:

1. It is prohibited only to give oneself to games of chance with money staked (can. 138). Other games are not prohibited of themselves; nevertheless, accidentally they can become sinful, for example through excessive frequency, through neglect of the sacred ministry, and so forth.
2. Clerics sin gravely by giving themselves to games of chance: 1° if they play with grave scandal; 2° if they play frequently and for a long time. Moreover, sufficient frequency is present sooner if one plays for a great sum of money than if for a moderate sum (St. Alphonsus III, 896-898).
3. Religious, both because of their state and because of scandal, more easily sin gravely than secular clerics, and the more easily according as they profess stricter observance, especially if by acting so they would open a way for such games in their Order, or would play for a notable sum; in the latter case they would also sin against poverty (St. Alphonsus III, 901; V, 32).

Corollary. A prohibition of a Bishop would not seem equitable by which, in general, all games even privately exercised would be forbidden to clerics; for unless particular circumstances advised such a prohibition, such a prohibition would have to be called too severe and alien from the mind of the Church.[1] Moreover, although the game of dice remains prohibited to clerics, nevertheless a constitution of a Bishop would have to be criticized by which at once a grave penalty, for example excommunication, would be imposed on violation of this law. Thus the secretary of the Sacred Congregation of the Council[2] wished mitigated a decree of the Bishop of Vaison by which priests playing dice were struck with excommunication latae sententiae. The prohibition indeed was held valid, but the penalty had to be mitigated.[3]

[1] Cf. Benedict XIV, De Synodo dioecesana, book XI, c. 10, n. 4.

[2] 20 December 1687.

[3] Cf. Benedict XIV, De Synodo dioecesana, book X, c. 2, n. 2; book XI, c. 10, n. 5; cf. also c. 1, D. 35; c. 15, X III, 1; c. 11, De excessibus praelatorum, V, 37; Trent, session 22, on reform, c. 1.

1173 IV. Carrying Arms. They should not carry arms unless a just cause for fearing is present (can. 138). For it is fitting that a cleric, a minister of the peaceful God, express in his external conduct the spirit of Christ's gentleness and meekness, with which spirit the apparatus of arms, especially when carried publicly, can with difficulty be combined. Here also attention should be paid to civil laws, which commonly impose similar prohibitions on all citizens indiscriminately.

1174 V. Hunting. They should not indulge in hunting, and should never exercise noisy hunting (can. 138). Hunting - by which bird-catching is also comprehended - is distinguished as twofold, noisy and quiet. Noisy hunting is that which is done with great tumult and noise of weapons, dogs, and beaters; quiet hunting is that which is done with snares and nets, or even with a shotgun, but without the aforesaid noise. Therefore:

1. Noisy hunting is forbidden simply; but quiet hunting, if it is done moderately and without scandal, is not prohibited. Nevertheless, particular statutes or precepts should be attended to; since the Ordinary, if a just cause is present, can altogether prohibit hunting with a shotgun, though not with a censure added, unless for grave and special causes.[1]

2. Noisy hunting exercised without grave scandal and not frequently is not mortal (cf. St. Alphonsus III, 606; Homo Apostolicus, tract 10, n. 72).

3. Finally note that fishing is forbidden by no canon.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, Gnesen and Posen, 11 June 1921 (A. A. S. 1921, p. 498).

1175 VI. Entrance into Taverns. They should not enter taverns and other similar places without necessity or another just cause approved by the local Ordinary (can. 138).

1176 VII. The Medical Art. Without an apostolic indult they should not exercise medicine or surgery (can. 139, § 2).

Except if in some region - as can happen in mission lands - physicians are lacking, while observing what must be observed (St. Alphonsus VII, 384).[1] Attention should also be paid to civil laws, which commonly establish penalties against physicians practicing the medical art without examination and public certificate.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 28 November 1641 (Collectanea, n. 334).

1177 VIII. Notariate. They should not act as tabelliones or public notaries, except in an ecclesiastical Curia (can. 139, § 2). The office of notary, actuary, or tabellio, from writing up "acts" or recording them on "tablets," is permitted to clerics only in ecclesiastical Curias; not as though this office would otherwise be unbecoming to them, but because it can with difficulty be combined with ecclesiastical duties, on account of the continual attention of mind which it requires.

1178 IX. Lay Jurisdiction. They should not assume public offices which carry with them the exercise of lay jurisdiction or administration (can. 139, § 2). Offices are understood which refer proximately to the government of a state, province, or kingdom, such as, for example, the offices of President of the republic, Minister, Syndic, and so forth. But there are not comprehended in this paragraph offices which pertain only remotely to government, but in themselves properly constitute a certain council, such as, for example, the office of deputy, councillor, senator, etc. But observe the things which follow:

1179 X. The Office of Senator or Deputy. They should not solicit nor accept the office of senators or of orators for making laws, whom they call deputies, without permission of the Holy See in places where a pontifical prohibition has intervened; in other places, they should not attempt the same thing without the permission both of their own Ordinary and of the Ordinary of the place in which the election is to be held (can. 139, § 4).

Moreover the Commission of the Code declared: "If by force of the constitution of the state Cardinals, Archbishops, and Bishops are senators by law, and the Holy See in some way has approved this, the same can fulfill an office of this kind without special permission of the Holy See, provided they satisfy their obligations through a Vicar General or in another way. In any other case they need the permission of the Holy See. But Ordinaries, in granting permission to priests who desire to present themselves as candidates for elections of deputies, should show themselves rather difficult than easy."[1]

[1] A. A. S. 1922, p. 313.

1180 XI. Administration of Goods. Without the permission of their own Ordinary they should not enter upon managements of goods pertaining to laymen, or secular offices which carry with them the burden of rendering accounts (can. 139, § 3). Of this kind are, for example, the offices of tutors, curators, administrators, and executors of testaments.

As regards the administration of goods pertaining to laymen, it will not be useless to recall to memory the decree of the Sacred Consistorial Congregation,[1] which indeed praised the zeal of clerics in founding and protecting money chests or savings banks for the temporal assistance of the faithful, but nevertheless prohibited them from fulfilling in them the offices of president, director, secretary, treasurer, and offices very similar to these, without permission of the Holy See. Today, of course, according to the tenor of can. 139, § 3, permission of the Ordinary will suffice.

[1] 18 November 1910.

1181 XII. The Office of Advocate. They should not exercise the office of procurator or advocate, except in an ecclesiastical tribunal, or in a civil one when there is question of their own cause or that of their church (can. 139, § 3). A procurator is understood as one who conducts the parts of the parties before the judge, by petitioning, concluding, etc., for them. An advocate strictly so called, or causidicus, is one who argues the cause of a client before the judge. An advocate differs from a jurisconsult, who only gives counsel, explains the way to the process, but does not defend the client in judgment. An advocate could have fulfilled the parts of a jurisconsult.

Note the things which are had at the end of can. 139, § 3: "In a lay criminal trial pursuing a grave personal penalty, let them have no part, not even giving testimony without necessity." By a grave personal penalty is understood not only capital punishment or mutilation, but every penalty by which the personal or bodily integrity of the delinquent is injured. It is said "let them have no part"; therefore every intervention is denied to them, whether as judge, or as advocate, or as notary. Indeed, as is said at the end of this paragraph, they should not even give testimony in such trials without necessity.

1182 XIII. Use of Public Amusements. They should not be present at spectacles, dances, and processions which are unbecoming to them, or at which it would be a scandal for clerics to be present, especially in public theaters (can. 140). Therefore, by common law the aforesaid amusements are prohibited insofar as the presence of clerics would be unbecoming, or would be a scandal to the faithful; this can easily occur in public theaters. But particular statutes are also to be attended to.

Corollary I. The things which are said here about spectacles and theaters must also be applied to our modern bioscopes. Indeed, in Rome it has been prohibited not only to both clergy, even pilgrims, to attend public cinematographs, even if they treat of a sacred object, but canonical penalties have moreover been threatened, not excluding suspension from divine things.[1]

Corollary II. To attend a certain musical work is not prohibited by common law, unless because of circumstances it would fall under the general prohibition by which clerics ought to avoid those things which are a scandal to the faithful, or which generally are unbecoming to their state (cf. can. 124).

[1] A. A. S. 1918, p. 300.

1183 XIV. Military Service. They should not enter secular military service voluntarily, unless they have done this with the permission of their own Ordinary, so that they may become free more quickly; nor should they assist in any way in civil wars and disturbances of public order (can. 141, § 1). A minor cleric who, against the prescription of § 1, has of his own accord given his name to military service, falls by the law itself from the clerical state (can. 141, § 2). Besides, with respect to every cleric, any offices are vacant by the fact itself if against the prescription of can. 141, § 1, he has of his own accord given his name to secular military service (can. 188, 6°).

1184 XV. Trading. Clerics are prohibited from exercising trading or commerce by themselves or through others, whether for their own advantage or that of others (can. 142). Clerics or religious exercising commerce or trading by themselves or through others against the prescription of can. 142 are to be restrained by the Ordinary with suitable penalties according to the gravity of the fault (can. 2380). Commerce coincides with trading properly so called; but the word trading extends more broadly, as will be clear from what is to be said.

1. Notion. Trading properly so called, or commerce, is the buying or exchange of merchandise with the intention of selling it more dearly, not changed for the better (St. Alphonsus III, 837). For it there are required: 1° that a thing be bought and sold; 2° that it be sold more dearly; 3° that it be sold not changed for the better; 4° that it was bought with the intention of selling it more dearly and not changed for the better (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 77, a. 4, ad 1; St. Alphonsus III, 331, 330).

Trading improperly so called is the buying or exchange of a thing made with the intention of selling it more dearly after it has been changed by art or industry. Moreover, someone can change a thing either by himself, or through his own servants, or through workers hired for this.

2. Prohibition. a) Trading properly so called is prohibited to clerics (can. 142). It is the same whether they exercise it by themselves or through others, for their own advantage or for the advantage of others (can. cited).

The reason of the prohibition is explained thus by St. Thomas: "Clerics ought to abstain not only from those things which are evil according to themselves, but also from those things which have the appearance of evil; and this indeed happens in trading, both because it is ordered to earthly gain, of which clerics ought to be despisers, and also because of the frequent vices of traders ... There is also another reason, because trading too greatly involves the mind in secular cares, and consequently draws it back from spiritual things; hence also the Apostle says in 2 Timothy 2: 'No one serving God entangles himself in secular business'" (II-II, q. 77, a. 4, ad 3; St. Alphonsus III, 831).

b) Trading improperly so called is prohibited to clerics if the thing to be sold is changed through workers hired for this. For trading of this kind, by which another's labor is bought and from it gain is taken, was equated in the ancient law with trading properly so called, nor is there reason for interpreting trading, concerning which can. 142 speaks, otherwise (cf. can. 6, n. 2). The same, for the same reason, must be said about exchange,[1] if someone exercises it by way of habit or art, by doing banking.[2]

c) Trading improperly so called is not prohibited to clerics if they change the things to be sold by themselves or through their own servants. One who by himself changes things and sells them more dearly does nothing other than receive the just reward of his labor. Moreover this, provided that the craft is fitting for them, considering the circumstances, and is done without neglect of their own ministry, must be called equally lawful for clerics as for laymen, because it contains nothing disordered, as is clear from the example of St. Paul;[3] therefore it was never prohibited by any law. And to him who changes the things to be sold by himself, there is equated in law one who changes them through his own servants, i.e. through labor already owed from elsewhere.

Formerly stricter dispositions and penal sanctions had been established for missionaries of the East Indies, China, Japan, and America, both South and North, exercising illicit trading.[4] But because these laws seemed to pertain to the common law and today have not been taken up in the Code, they seem to have been abolished by can. 6, n. 6; certainly with respect to the penal sanction, by the same can. 6, n. 5.

d) The obligation of the prohibition is grave from its kind. Therefore one who frequently trades sins gravely; moreover, sufficient frequency is present sooner if someone trades in a great quantity. One who rarely trades sins only lightly, because the canon speaks of exercising trading (St. Alphonsus III, 831).

e) Not only extreme necessity, but even grave necessity excuses from the obligation, namely if it is necessary for the sustenance of the cleric or the family living with him. Nevertheless, in a case of grave necessity, so that the danger of illusion may be avoided, outside Italy permission of the Ordinary is required; within Italy, permission of the Holy See. Thus, considering the Constitution of Clement XIII Cum primum,[5] which from can. 6, n. 2 seems still to be in force (St. Alphonsus III, 833).

Corollary I. It is lawful "1° to sell fruits gathered from one's own fields; 2° to buy livestock, and sell them after they have been fattened on one's own estates, or to feed flocks so that offspring, wool, etc., may be sold; 3° to exercise an art fitting to one's own state, and to sell the works; 4° to buy fruits and sell animals fattened on them, since properly the labors for taking gain are sold rather than things not changed; 5° to buy for one's own uses, even broadly, and afterwards to sell what remains; indeed, when the price rises, even by purposely using more sparingly, to preserve things for the sake of sale."[6] 6° To buy, for example, grapes and grain, and from them, either by oneself or through one's own servants, but not through hired workers, to make wine and bread, and sell them with profit. But it is unlawful to buy materials and from them, through hired workers, to manufacture any things which are sold with profit (St. Alphonsus III, 836).

With respect to establishing a printing press, hold these things: It is lawful: 1° if printing is done either through members of the Order or through one's own servants; nor is it prohibited that a hired servant be used, both because a little is reckoned as nothing, and because the accessory follows the principal; 2° if printing is indeed done through hired servants, but there is question of printing one's own works; for it is lawful to make these fruitful just like one's own land. It is unlawful if a printing press is established for printing the works of others, and this through hired servants.

Corollary II. It seems lawful for religious houses to buy things pertaining to devotion and sell them with some profit to guests, provided the profit is received as just compensation of expenses and labor expended, or as a stipend. The reason is that, in the case, the things, strictly speaking, are not sold more dearly. Nor is prohibited trading had if, for example, a missionary quasi-sells depicted or photographically printed cards of his mission to his benefactors, even if at a dearer price than he bought them, because from the circumstances the profit obtained assumes the character rather of alms made to the Mission than of price.

Corollary III. Trading which is called by some political, by which namely someone buys necessary things and sells them to the state or army, that trading, I say, is prohibited to clerics from can. 139, § 2, insofar as it would involve a public office which would carry with it the exercise of lay jurisdiction or administration. If somewhere from charity this were necessary, for example if a missionary in time of famine buys grain for his neophytes, practically no profit will be present, or there will be a case of excuse; nevertheless, it is expedient that the permission of the Bishop be sought.

Corollary IV. To this also pertains the buying of bonds and shares; but concerning it there will rather be distinct discussion in the scholion, after we have briefly noted the remaining things to be noted concerning the obligations of clerics.

[1] Concerning exchange, cf. n. 938.

[2] Benedict XIV, Constitution Apostolicae, 25 February 1741; Clement XIII, Constitution Cum primum, 17 September 1759.

[3] Acts of the Apostles XVIII, 3; XX, 34; 2 Thess. III, 8.

[4] Constitutions of Urban VIII Ex debito (1633); of Clement IX Sollicitudo (1669).

[5] 17 September 1759.

[6] Lehmkuhl, Theologia Moralis, II, n. 774.

1185 XVI. Can. 143 declares: Clerics, although they do not have a residential benefice or office, should nevertheless not depart from their diocese for a notable time without at least the presumed permission of their own Ordinary.

1186 XVII. Can. 144: One who with the permission of his own Ordinary has passed into another diocese, while remaining incardinated in his own diocese, can be recalled for a just cause and with natural equity preserved; and also the Ordinary of the other diocese can for a just cause deny to him permission of further staying in his own territory, unless he has conferred a benefice.

[1] Cf. our little work De virtute castitatis et de vitiis oppositis, n. 18.

Scholion. On the Buying and Selling of Bonds and Shares

1187 I. Notions. Bonds are monetary certificates by which someone lends his money to some company, with this agreement, that each year he receive a determinate interest.

Shares are monetary certificates by which someone hands over his money to some company, so that in a certain way he becomes a member of this company and thus receives a variable interest, a dividend, according to the greater or lesser success of the company.

1188 II. Morality. 1. With respect to bonds. It is lawful for clerics equally as for laymen to buy bonds, because clerics equally as laymen can freely lend their money to others and receive a just interest from it. But by buying bonds they do nothing else. Nor is it prohibited to sell them at an opportune time, because this pertains to the economic administration of goods. Nevertheless, clerics should take care not to sin in the manner, for example by personally going to the stock exchange, or by taking part in lucrative trades and speculations, concerning which below.

2. With respect to shares. It is lawful for clerics to buy and sell shares concerning fruitful things. Thus it is lawful, for example, to buy lands together with several persons, or to take shares in them, for this end, that from the fruits sold by the company they may take profit.

Likewise it is lawful to take shares in industrial companies, where a change of matter occurs through hired labor, for example in factories; likewise in commercial companies, where goods are bought in great quantity so that they may be sold in smaller amounts with profit. It is lawful to take the aforesaid shares, I say, provided the conditions soon to be reported are observed. For the single reason on account of which some deny this does not hold. They object, namely, that by buying shares a cleric exercises trading through an interposed person, which is prohibited by law. Now, if the matter is well examined, this reason does not proceed. For a shareholder properly does not influence the trading exercised through others, or influences it so remotely that this ought not to be attended to in law. For others, with the money received, trade for themselves rather than the shareholder for himself. Hence shares today are almost equated with bonds, with only this difference, that in shares, in place of determinate interest, variable interest is received. There are added responses of the Holy Office,[1] from which it is deservedly deduced that the buying of shares is lawful for clerics, provided they are prepared to stand by the commands of the Holy See, and the following conditions are observed:

a) Let them know certainly that those companies have no illicit or suspect end.

b) Let them undertake no part of the administration. Therefore let them not be reckoned among the primary associates, who can have a part in the direction of the company; but secondary associates or simple shareholders are excluded from every direction.

c) Nor should they exercise trading in the shares of those same companies. Therefore:

a) It is certainly lawful to buy shares at a low price and to sell them at a dearer price, if just economy demands this. Likewise it is lawful to buy them even with the intention of selling them more dearly at an opportune time, if just economy will demand this. Nor does it seem to be disapproved if someone does this more often, indeed even habitually, whenever he actually needs money. The reason for all these things is that trading strictly so called is not present.

b) It is not lawful to buy shares and bonds[2] with the intention of selling them more dearly, even if just economy will not demand this; for in this case strict trading in them is present.

c) Let them abstain from every contract which has the appearance, as it is commonly called, of "games of the stock exchange"; concerning these, see the things said in n. 955.

d) Besides the conditions required by the Holy See, others are commonly assigned by authors, at least by way of prudence. Namely: 1° Let them take bonds and shares by means only of their own money,[3] not because otherwise they offend against the trading forbidden to them, but because otherwise they expose themselves to danger of harming others in their goods.

2° Let them take care not to give their name to companies still to be constituted or recently constituted, because then there is easily the danger that they may be too much absorbed by desire for profit.

3° Let them not go to general meetings, in which commissioners are appointed and an account is given of business transacted.

4° The greatest solicitude is required concerning ecclesiastical goods, which must be placed altogether safely, as various canons declare (cf. can. 1516, § 2; 1523, nn. 3 and 4; 1547).

[1] Holy Office, 17 November 1875; 15 April 1885.

[2] Although ecclesiastical documents speak only about trading in shares, it is nevertheless manifest that the same must be applied also to bonds.

[3] Holy Office, 1 April 1857.

Article III. On the Duty of Reciting the Canonical Hours Specifically 1189 The canonical hours are the complex, chiefly of psalms, readings, and chants, by which ecclesiastical persons, in the name of the Church, daily offer liturgical worship to God. They are distinguished as seven, namely Matins with Lauds, Prime, Terce, Sext, None, Vespers, and Compline, in conformity with these words of Ps. CXVIII, 164: "Seven times in the day have I spoken praise to Thee." They are called "canonical hours" because from their primitive institution they were, as it were, annexed to determinate hours, namely Matins to midnight, Lauds to the beginning of dawn, Prime to the sixth hour, Terce to the ninth, Sext to midday, None to mid-afternoon, Vespers to the time which precedes sunset, and Compline to the time which follows sunset.

The canonical hours are also called the divine office: office, because it is imposed; divine, because it is destined for the worship of God. It is divided into the nocturnal office, to which Matins with Lauds pertains, and the diurnal office, which the other hours constitute. Finally the canonical hours are called the breviary; according to some, because they contain Sacred Scripture and the writings of the Holy Fathers compendiously; according to others, because they are a certain abbreviation of the longer office which formerly was in use. According to others, under the name of breviary there first came a little book containing the rules for ordering the divine office through the course of the year, into which afterwards the diverse parts of the divine office itself were inserted, such as psalms, readings, etc. And thus it happened that finally the office itself was called the breviary.[1]

Moreover can. 135 prescribes the canonical hours in these words: "Clerics constituted in major orders ... are held by the obligation of reciting the canonical hours completely each day according to their proper and approved liturgical books." We shall speak first about the object, then about the subject, then about the obligation of the precept, and finally about the causes excusing from the obligation. Moreover we shall chiefly keep solitary recitation before our eyes; nevertheless at the end, for the sake of completeness, we shall speak in one scholion about recitation with a companion, and in another about choral recitation.

[1] Baümer, loc. cit., Appendix I.

§ I. On the Object of the Precept

The object of the precept is constituted both by the matter to be recited and by the time and manner of reciting. Hence:

Point I. On the Matter to Be Recited

1190 Each day the canonical hours must be recited according to proper and approved liturgical books. Besides, the Litanies are to be recited on the feast of St. Mark and on the three days of Rogations. It is said:

I. The canonical hours must be recited according to proper and approved liturgical books. Namely:

1. Of itself there is an obligation of reciting the canonical hours according to the form and rite of the Roman Breviary, issued by St. Pius V, revised by Clement VIII, Urban VIII, and Leo XIII, and reformed by Pius X in the Constitution Divino afflatu, 1 November 1911. But those who do not use this order of the Psalter "should know that they are not going to satisfy so grave an office."[2]

I said of itself, for Churches and Religions which in the year 1568 used another breviary, approved by a custom of at least two hundred years, could retain it.[3] Nevertheless, with due observances preserved, it is lawful to assume the Roman Breviary;[4] but once assumed it can no longer be abandoned.[5] I said with due observances preserved, namely:

a) If a Church or Religion retained a legitimate breviary of another form, the public office of choir must be made from that particular breviary, unless the Bishop with the consent of the whole chapter, or the Prelate with the consent of the community, has assumed the Roman Breviary.[6]

b) Individual clerics who are not bound to choir can of their own accord, after renouncing the particular breviary, assume the Roman; but offices "proper to the diocese or order," although conceded by indult, must be recited by individuals when they have been accepted by the diocese or order.[7]

c) If a particular breviary legitimately prescribed is changed or altered, the breviary so changed becomes illegitimate, and, the prior privilege having been taken away, the Roman Breviary must be assumed.[8]

2. Besides these things, the proper calendar of the diocese or Religion obliges, if it has been approved by the Sacred Congregation of Rites; likewise particular offices permitted to a particular Church or Religion and once received by use oblige.[9] Therefore:

a) A Bishop, both secular and regular, is bound to recite the office of the Church over which he presides. One who governs several dioceses can recite the office either of the diocese in which he habitually dwells, or of that in which he is actually staying.[10]

b) Priests must recite the office of the Church to which they are assigned.[11]

c) Those staying outside their own domicile are bound thus:

a) Bishops and "beneficiaries are always bound to the office of their own Church; but simple priests can conform themselves to the Office of the place where they are staying."[12]

b) Religious bound by canon law to choir are bound, if they recite in choir, to stand by the calendar of the monastery in which they are guests. Reciting privately, they ought to follow the calendar of their own house if they are staying for a few days in another house; if for a longer time, they can at will follow the calendar of their own or of the other house.[13] On a journey, they should follow the calendar of their own house.[14] If nevertheless they are staying outside monasteries for a longer time, for example during Lent, they ought to conform themselves to the calendar of the Province, extended without any diversity for all in each year.[15] Finally, religious not bound by canonical title to choir, if for a few days they are staying outside their own house, whether in another house or elsewhere, should recite the office of their own house; if they are staying outside their own house for a longer time, let them at will follow the calendar of their own house or of the other house, when in another house, but the calendar of their own house or of the province, if they are staying elsewhere, for example on a journey or in a hospital.

Corollary I. The obligation of following a determined calendar carries with it the obligation of obtaining for oneself new approved offices, and likewise readings notably changed.

Corollary II. If in useful time you lack the proper office of some Saint, you ought to recite the common office of Saints of the same class; and if you also lack that, another office from the breviary of the same rite, not of a different rite, must be recited.

II. Besides, the Litanies are to be recited on the feast of St. Mark and on the three days of Rogations. "Those," so the rubric says,[16] "who are not present at the Procession of the Litanies should say them privately after Matins with their prayers and collects." Moreover, that there is an obligation, the Sacred Congregation of Rites has declared several times;[17] that a grave obligation is present is deduced from the fact that there is question of grave matter (St. Alphonsus IV, 161, question 1).[18]

[1] As regards the history of the canonical hours and the legislation concerning it, compare S. Baümer, O.S.B., Geschichte des Breviers; Batiffol, Histoire du Bréviaire Romain; Baudot, Le Bréviaire Romain.

[2] Constitution of Pius V Quod a nobis, 9 July 1568.

[3] Constitution cited.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 10 May 1608, n. 249.

[5] Constitution Quod a nobis.

[6] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, 6 September 1738, n. 2338; 24 November 1883, n. 3597, ad 1.

[7] Response of the Holy See to the Archbishop of Besançon, 28 August 1856.

[8] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 6 September 1738, n. 2338; 24 November 1883, n. 3597, ad 1.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 6 September 1738, n. 2338; 24 November 1883, n. 3597, ad 1.

[10] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 11 June 1605, n. 181; 17 January 1880, n. 3508; 28 May 1898, n. 3993, ad 1.

[11] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 4 February 1898, n. 3979, ad 7.

[12] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 12 November 1831, n. 2682, ad 46.

[13] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 27 June 1896, n. 3919, ad 13.

[14] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 31 August 1839, n. 2801, ad 1.

[15] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 31 August 1839, n. 2801, ad 2.

[16] Breviary, after the second Sunday after Easter.

[17] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 12 March 1836, n. 2740, ad 8; 4 August 1877, n. 3428.

[18] The precept of adding the Office of the Dead on the day of the Commemoration of All Saints to the office of the octave of All Saints was removed by the Bull of Pius X Divino afflatu, letter 8, n. 2. The Office of the Dead is already proper to the said day.

Point II. On the Time and Manner of Reciting

1191 Besides at the due time, the canonical hours must be recited in order, continuously, vocally, and devoutly. It is said:

I. At the due time; wherefore note:

1. The useful time, both for the valid fulfillment of the precept and for satisfying the grave obligation, is: for the whole office, from midnight to midnight; for Matins with Lauds, moreover, by indult or quasi-indult, from 2 p.m. on the preceding day.[1] Moreover priests of various societies enjoy, by quasi-privilege, the faculty of reciting Matins and Lauds from 1 p.m.; the Sacred Congregation of Rites easily grants this permission. Legates of the Roman Pontiff can grant the faculty of anticipating from noon; this permission is also contained in the faculties of the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith. Indeed the members of the Missionary Union for the Clergy enjoy the faculty of reciting the office from noon; and because all missionaries, whether dwelling in missions of the Sacred Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith, or compelled to leave them because of health, old age, or obedience, enjoy all the privileges and graces granted to the Pious Union, the faculty of the Sacred Congregation now has practically little value.[2]

2. Under venial sin it is required that Matins and Lauds be recited on the preceding day or in the morning time, and Prime and Terce in the forenoon. Sext and None can be said at pleasure before or after midday. Vespers and Compline must be recited after midday; nevertheless in the time of Lent, except for the first triduum and Sundays, Vespers can also be recited before midday, and are laudably so recited. Moreover from observing the time "any useful or honorable cause excuses, namely a sermon to be prepared or heard, the danger of a supervening occupation or labor, greater devotion or rest, a more suitable time for studying, and similar things" (St. Alphonsus IV, 173). It is said any cause, even the least, on account of the latitude which has more and more been admitted in interpreting custom. The holy Doctor adds, however, "that mere greater convenience, without another honorable motive, is not sufficient for excusing" (loc. cit.).

It is disputed whether Matins with Lauds must be recited before Mass. Now some have taught that this is prescribed under grave obligation; yet that opinion is now commonly rejected. Others deny every obligation; but with St. Alphonsus (V, 347) a light obligation seems to have to be admitted, because neglect of this rubric is enumerated in one series with other defects certainly sinful.[3] So also Benedict XIV:[4] "But any moderate reasonable cause will excuse from this kind of venial fault; for instance, if the one giving the alms asks that Mass be celebrated at once, if the people or some grave person is waiting, if a superior commands it, if the time for celebrating is passing, or the convenience of study, journey, and similar things is pressing" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). If, however, there is question of a conventual and solemn Mass, the obligation of reciting Matins with Lauds before Mass is grave, unless a grave and public cause intervenes. "The reason is that such is the custom received in all churches where public prayers are said; so that, by acting otherwise, the public worship of God, the common good, and the fitting governance of the Church would be gravely harmed" (St. Alphonsus VI, 348).

3. The Litanies for the feast of St. Mark and the days of Rogation cannot be recited on the preceding evening.[5]

4. In the private recitation of the canonical hours it is lawful to follow: 1st, usual time; 2nd, local time, both true and mean; 3rd, legal time, both regional and any other extraordinary time (can. 33, § 1; n. 167).

Corollary I. One who has not recited the hours or litanies within the useful time is still bound to recite them until midnight; after midnight he is no longer bound, because the useful time has passed by (St. Alphonsus IV, 155).

Corollary II. One who, once the day of obligation has begun, foresees that later he will not have the possibility of discharging the office is bound to recite the hours now; but "one who cannot recite Matins on the following day is not bound to anticipate it on the preceding day. For then there is an obligation of anticipating the Office when the obligation of the precept has already begun; but that Matins can be said on the preceding day is not from precept, but from a privilege introduced by custom, which no one is bound to use" (St. Alphonsus IV, 155).

II. In order. First the order of the Offices must be observed, so that the Office assigned to each day is completed in the useful time. Then the order of the Hours and the order among the different parts of the Hour must be observed. These, however, oblige only under venial sin, because they touch rather the accidents than the substance of the precept. Hence a reasonable cause excuses, as if you are invited to pray by a friend who has already completed the greater part of the office; if now you lack a breviary and, for example, retain in memory the psalms of a Nocturn; if you come late to choir, when the office has already begun (St. Alphonsus IV, 170).

III. Continuously, or in such a way that within the hours themselves there is no notable interruption; this, however, is only venial, so that a reasonable cause excuses. Moreover note:

a) Matins can be separated from Lauds; but if they are separated, Matins should be concluded with the Prayer of the office, which is followed by the verse Dominus vobiscum, the verse Benedicamus Domino, and the verse Fidelium animae, etc., and the Pater.

Afterwards Lauds are begun by the verse Deus in adiutorium, etc., with Pater and Ave having been first said. Thus the Ordinary of the divine office in the breviary. Likewise one Nocturn can be separated from another, at least by the space of three hours (St. Alphonsus IV, 167).

b) "Just causes for interrupting the Office are ... any utility, one's own or another's, which would inconveniently be deferred. Likewise, civility or devotion, as to say Mass, to execute the commands of superiors; if you hear the confession of someone who would not willingly wait; if you wish to do or note something, so that you may remove distraction or anxiety lest you forget: provided, as Gobat well notes, that this is not done frequently. - Also some brief prayer or affections can lawfully be inserted while praying" (St. Alphonsus IV, 168).

c) Even if an interruption has culpably occurred, nevertheless there is no obligation of repeating the things recited, "because the individual psalms and the individual verses have a complete meaning; and they are sufficiently united either by the intention of continuing or by the very recitation joined to them" (St. Alphonsus IV, 168). Nevertheless, if the interruption is longer and not much has been recited, it is fitting to resume the hour, or at least the psalm.

IV. Vocally; this pertains to the substance of the precept. It is sufficient, however, to have formed the words with one's proper organs, that is, the tongue and lips; when this has been done, some sound is necessarily produced; but it does not matter whether or not the one reciting hears himself (St. Alphonsus IV, 162, 163).[6]

Moreover note that complete pronunciation is required, so that words are neither omitted, nor mutilated, nor cut off by halves. If these things are done in such a way that the meaning of the words is lost, and this in a great quantity, it is a grave sin, and it induces the obligation of repeating; otherwise it is venial, and does not bring with it the obligation of repeating. Someone can also be excused because of stammering or a custom which he is trying to lay aside (St. Alphonsus IV, 164, 165).

V. Devoutly;[7] that is, there are certainly required: 1st, the intention of worshiping God; 2nd, external attention. It is doubtful whether internal attention is required, so that in practice this is not required for fulfilling the precept.

a) The intention of worshiping God is demanded, because otherwise there would be an act entirely profane; and it cannot be admitted that only such an act is prescribed by the Church. But the said intention, at least in an exercised act, is always present, since it is enough that in the usual way you take up the breviary in order to fulfill the daily obligation (St. Alphonsus IV, 176).

b) External attention is that by which someone avoids external acts which cannot be combined with internal attention, such as writing, painting, attentively listening to others speaking, attentively looking through pictures; but not walking, looking at hills, meadows, fields, slowly putting on or taking off clothes, gathering a few flowers or herbs. Some things are very distracting with respect to one person but not with respect to another, such as dressing oneself quickly, washing oneself, or preparing a pen (St. Alphonsus IV, 176). Moreover, that external attention is required is drawn both from chapter Dolentes, question De celebratione missarum (III, 41), and from the common consent of authors, and from the fact that it is with difficulty admitted that the Church does not require a manner of reciting the office which, at least for the external forum, also indicates internal worship.

c) In practice, by force of ecclesiastical law, internal attention is not required. Theoretically some affirm and others deny this, according as they affirm or deny that internal attention pertains to the essence of prayer; concerning this controversy see n. 583. While the doubt stands, the more benign opinion is safe in practice (St. Alphonsus IV, 177). Moreover, with due pronunciation and attention being posited, some internal attention, at least very slight, will scarcely, or scarcely at all, be lacking. Those who require internal attention say that virtual attention suffices. But since there is not question of intention, but of attention, that virtual attention is understood with difficulty, unless there is question of a most slight attention.

Note. "The more suitable remedies for repelling distractions of mind are: 1st, at the beginning to form the intention of praising God; 2nd, to renew the intention at the Gloria Patri or at the beginning of each psalm; 3rd, to represent to oneself some mystery of the Passion; 4th, carefully to guard the senses; and other things of this kind" (St. Alphonsus IV, 177).

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 12 March 1905, n. 4158, ad I.

[2] Cf. Acta Apostolicae Sedis XVIII, p. 235.

[3] Roman Missal, De Defectibus, X, 1.

[4] De Sacrificio Missae, book 3, chapter 13, n. 4.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 28 March 1775, n. 2503, ad 4.

[6] There are those who think that regulars have the privilege of reciting entirely mentally; either the whole Office, as others say, or only those things which in the ordinary are ordered to be said secretly in silence, as others think. Concerning this privilege compare St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book I, Appendix II, n. 107; IV, 643, with the notes of Gaude compared; Analecta ecclesiastica, 1910, p. 417 sq.; 1911, p. 419; Ami du Clergé, 1924, p. 129.

[7] Fourth Lateran Council, chapter 7.

§ II. On the Subject of the Precept

1192 The following are bound to the recitation of the breviary:

I. Clerics constituted in major orders, except, however, those who have legitimately been reduced or returned to the lay state (can. 135, 213, 214). Since the obligation begins with a major order, a subdeacon on the day of ordination is bound to that hour which corresponds to the moment of ordination; hence one who, for example, is ordained between the hour of Sext and None is bound to begin from None (St. Alphonsus IV, 140). Moreover, although the obligation does not yet subsist before the order has been received, nevertheless the cleric seems able to render the fulfillment already then; for since it is the burden of the day, by the will of the Church legitimately interpreted he is presumed already before ordination to have been deputed to discharge the said burden on the day (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

II. Beneficiaries from the day possession of the benefice has been taken, provided they receive the fruits (can. 1475, § 1). If a beneficiary, detained by no legitimate impediment, has not satisfied the obligation of reciting the canonical hours, he does not make the fruits his own in proportion to the omission, and he should hand them over to the fabric of the church or to the diocesan Seminary, or distribute them among the poor (can. 1475, § 2). It is said:

1. He does not make the fruits his own. Therefore he does not acquire ownership of the fruits, and so before the sentence of a judge (cf. can. 2232) and, as it seems, by justice, he is bound to restitution, although d'Annibale[1] thinks that restitution is imposed after the manner of a conventional penalty.
2. In proportion to the omission, that is, according to the Constitution of Pius V Ex proximo:[2] One who has omitted the whole office on one day is bound to restore all the fruits corresponding to that day, or the 365th part of the annual revenue; one who has omitted either Matins with Lauds or the remaining hours, half the fruits of one day; one who has omitted one of the said remaining hours, a twelfth part. Moreover one who receives the fruits of a benefice on account of other burdens also is bound only to that extent to restore the fruits insofar as they correspond to the burden of the canonical hours. "Wherefore they say that a bishop or pastor is bound to restore a third or fourth part of the fruits, retaining the others for the other burdens which they satisfy; canons, half; those having a chaplaincy, half or a third part" (St. Alphonsus III, 673). Finally, from the Constitution of Leo X Supernae dispositionis, the fruits received in the first six months are remitted.

3. He should hand them over to the fabric of the church or to the diocesan Seminary, or distribute them among the poor. "By the name of the poor, however, are understood the poor of any place whatsoever; and the deceased themselves are also understood. - And also the cleric himself can apply the said fruits to himself, if he is truly poor" (St. Alphonsus III, 672). Besides, if someone ignorant or forgetful of the debt has distributed alms, he can quite probably reckon these for restitution (St. Alphonsus III, 700, question 2). But proposition 33 was condemned by Alexander VII:[3] "Restitution of fruits on account of omission of the hours can be supplied by any alms whatsoever which the beneficiary had previously made from the fruits of his benefice."

III. The solemnly professed in religions, whether of men or women, which have the obligation of choir. Therefore the solemnly professed in religions of this kind, if they have been absent from choir, must recite the canonical hours privately (can. 610, § 3). But professed religious of temporary vows are not bound to private recitation of the office, unless they have been constituted in sacred orders or perhaps are obliged by their own constitutions (can. 578, 2nd; 610).[4]

Corollary. If someone is bound to the divine office under different titles, "because he owes praises to God as one man, it is enough that he say the office once" (St. Thomas, Quodlibet 1, article 13).

[1] Summula Theologiae Moralis III, 65.

[2] 20 September 1571.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1133.

[4] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, 24 November 1852.

§ III. On the Obligation of the Precept

1193 I. The obligation of the divine office is grave of its own kind; hence an omission is grave or light according as there is question of grave or light matter. Now:

1. The omission of one hour, even a little hour, seems to be grave; both because there is question of worship to be offered in the name of the Church, and therefore of a matter of greater moment, so that in this case a smaller quantity than in other cases seems to suffice for gravity; and because the deformity of the act seems notable if, in the prayer which the Church wished to be distributed into parts, one whole part among seven is omitted. Likewise he sins gravely who would recite only too little of a little hour, because morally speaking he omits it. Nevertheless the contrary must be said concerning one who would omit the Vespers of Holy Saturday, because the quantity seems too small (St. Alphonsus IV, 147). Moreover, separated parts coalesce.

2. Where a whole hour is not omitted, a greater quantity from different hours seems to be required, because the deformity does not appear so great.

3. Those who mutilate the office, by syncopating, truncating words, or swallowing syllables, also sin according to the quantity of the matter; but in these things, unless the excess is enormous, there is not a grave sin.

Corollary I. One who omits the whole office commits only one sin, because the whole office of one day falls under one precept, or the precept regards one office, which consists of seven hours. "But if, however, someone were to omit several hours from morally interrupted intentions, then he would commit several sins" (St. Alphonsus IV, 148; n. 254).

Corollary II. One who takes up the purpose of omitting the office for several days perpetrates as many sins as there are days on which he omits the breviary. Likewise one who by one act, for example by throwing the breviary into the sea, renders himself unable to recite, commits as many sins as there are omissions which he foresees, unless he repents of the first sin (St. Alphonsus IV, 149; n. 255).

II. The obligation of the determined office is sufficiently drawn from these things:

1. He sins gravely who recites an office either notably different from his own office,[1] or notably less than his own office;[2] likewise one who rather often, for example five times or more in a year, recites an office different from the office of the day. The reason is that "although any variation taken separately is venial by reason of smallness of matter, nevertheless all within the year coalesce, and gravely disturb the order of the breviary precept for the Offices of the whole year, which taken together make one complex whole" (St. Alphonsus IV, 161, question 3). Outside the enumerated cases it is quite probable that one sins only lightly, and if a just cause is present, not at all. A just cause is, for example, that you recite with a companion; if the possibility of reciting the office is lacking and by reciting later you will be too much wearied or impeded from another useful labor (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). But "the office of the breviary is not to be abandoned for an office of devotion."[3]

2. "One who through inadvertence says one office for another is bound to repeat nothing.... The reason is that the Church is not presumed to wish someone to be obliged twice in one day to so great a burden...; but if the office said was notably shorter... compensation must be made" from the omitted office (St. Alphonsus IV, 161, question 3). But the omitted office should rather be entirely omitted than recited on another day, lest you err twice.[4] (St. Alphonsus IV, 161, question 5.) "If you notice that you have erred after you have advanced much in the undue Office, for example if you have said Matins, then you can either continue, or recite the remainder from the due Office; ... but I think ... it is better to recite from the proper one, lest you continue the error.... But if you have forgotten some part of an Hour, it is enough to recite that part without repeating anything else" (St. Alphonsus IV, 161).

III. In doubt whether the office or part of it has been recited, the scrupulous, either on account of the very harms arising from an obligation of repeating, are excused from repetition; indeed they must be forbidden to repeat anything (St. Alphonsus IV, 175). With regard to others it must be said thus: one who, all things considered, strictly doubts, whether the doubt is positive or negative, is bound to repeat (n. 229). But by the aid of the principle of presumption, anyone in doubt commonly and rightly thinks that he has recited that about which he doubts. Hence "you are well excused if you do not remember having said something, and have a just conjecture for believing that you said it, for instance ... if you remember that you began a psalm, reading, or Hour, and afterwards, not distracted deliberately or not interrupted, you find yourself at the end of the Hour, reading or reciting from memory those things in which ordinarily you are not accustomed to err. And this has place ... even if you have a probable reason for omission, because the presumption that you are accustomed to complete what you began brings it about that you are bound to repeat nothing, unless you are morally certain that you did not say it" (St. Alphonsus, Elenchus II, reformed questions, question 1; IV, 150, with Gaude's note on this number compared).

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, 27 January 1899, n. 4011.

[2] Proposition 34 was condemned by Alexander VII: "One reciting the Easter Office on Palm Sunday satisfies the precept."

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 13 February 1666, n. 1334.

[4] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, 17 June 1673, n. 1474.

§ IV. On the Causes Excusing from the Obligation

1194 The excusing causes are:

I. Physical inability; to this belong lack of a breviary and blindness. Nevertheless a blind man and one who lacks a breviary is bound to recite the part which he holds in memory, provided it is both notable in itself, or reaches the quantity of a little hour, and can be recited sufficiently according to the prescribed form. Hence proposition 54 was condemned by Innocent XI:[1] "One who cannot recite Matins and Lauds, but can recite the remaining Hours, is bound to nothing, because the greater part draws the lesser to itself." Therefore he is bound to the possible part who holds in memory some morally entire hour, for example with only the little chapter and prayer unknown; or who from a longer hour can recite from memory, in the order of the breviary, a notable continuous part, or even a somewhat continuous part, such as several psalms of the Nocturns; but not one who knows only parts that are not sufficiently connected (St. Alphonsus IV, 158).

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1204.

1195 II. Moral inability, or such inability that the office cannot be recited without notable inconvenience. For this reason the following are excused:

1. The sick laboring under grave illness; likewise convalescents or those slightly ill, if the illness is joined with weariness of strength or notable heaviness of the head. If a sick man could not celebrate Mass and recite the office, he can celebrate, with the recitation of the office omitted. Moreover it must be noted "that in doubt whether an illness suffices or not for excusing, he can commit himself to the judgment of a physician ... or acquiesce in the judgment of the Superior, who in such a doubt can also dispense; or finally he can remit himself to the probable judgment of a prudent man; ... and he can also stand by his own judgment, if he himself can prudently form such a judgment" (St. Alphonsus IV, 154).

"If there is doubt that recitation would gravely harm him, then certainly he is not bound; indeed he cannot recite, because the natural right of preserving health is to be preferred to the precept of the Church" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Finally, "if someone because of his infirmity is certain that he cannot recite the whole Office, and doubts whether he can recite part, he is probably bound to nothing; ... for this man is reasonably excused from the whole Office, lest he be greatly troubled by scruples, not knowing how far he can and is bound to recite. For this anxiety would bring him great inconvenience" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

2. Those laboring under such weakness of the eyes that recitation becomes hard.

3. The scrupulous; namely, "if someone were suffering grave anxieties, recitation of the Office could sometimes even be forbidden to him, until he seems able to recite without so great an inconvenience; since a great inconvenience excuses of itself from the precepts of the Church" (St. Alphonsus IV, 177 at the end).

1196 III. An occupation to be preferred, that is, such an occupation as cannot be omitted without scandal or some other grave inconvenience, whether one's own or another's, and is incompatible with the recitation of the breviary. For this reason someone can be excused who, for example, is called to a sick person toward night, or by reason of hearing confessions, or of offering assistance to the sick, or of preparing a lesson or giving a sermon. Here, however, note: 1st, he sins who, when he can anticipate the business, does not anticipate it, or after the business has been completed does not recite what he can still conveniently recite; 2nd, he who is habitually so occupied with business that opportunity of reciting the Office is not available should either dismiss some labors or seek a dispensation.

It can also happen that an imprisoned cleric is excused from reciting the office in order to avoid disgrace to his state.

If someone cannot recite the Office without a companion, but can with a companion, he is bound to use that means, which is also consonant with the primitive institution, if the companion can be had without great inconvenience both to himself and to the companion (St. Alphonsus IV, 158).

1197 IV. Dispensation.[1] 1. The Pope can dispense, even with a beneficiary, since the burden of the office annexed to the benefice must be derived from ecclesiastical law alone.

2. Bishops can dispense when recourse to the Holy See is difficult and at the same time there is danger of grave harm in delay (can. 81); likewise, for a just cause, with some particular person for a brief time, namely from immemorial use or privilege (St. Alphonsus IV, 159).

3. Exempt major superiors, with respect to their subjects, can do the same thing as Bishops (can. 81 compared with can. 198). But regular Prelates can dispense their subjects who are not constituted in sacred orders, for a just cause, from the office as from other things (St. Alphonsus IV, 142).

Note. Clerics constituted in major orders who have legitimately been reduced or returned to the lay state are freed from the burden of the divine office; likewise solemnly professed religious not constituted in major orders who, having obtained an indult of secularization, have left the religion (can. 640).

[1] We add dispensation, although in a particular case it rather relaxes the law than excuses from the obligation.

Scholion I. On Choral Recitation

1198 I. Existence of the precept. The canonical precept of reciting the office in choir is in force as follows:

1. Any Chapter is bound by the obligation of duly discharging the divine offices in choir daily, with the laws of foundation preserved (can. 413, § 1). Moreover:

a) The divine office comprehends the psalmody of the canonical hours and the celebration with chant of the conventual Mass, besides other Masses to be celebrated either according to the rubrics of the Missal or from pious foundations (can. 413, § 2).

b) All and each who hold a choral benefice are bound to discharge the divine offices in choir itself on individual days, unless service by turns has been granted by the Apostolic See or by the laws of foundation (can. 414). A canon who without just cause was notably absent from choir, that is, for three or four days beyond the time conceded by law, would sin gravely. By law, however, individuals can be absent only three months in the year, whether continuous or interrupted, provided the statutes of their own church or legitimate custom do not require longer service (can. 418, § 1). Bishops are not bound to assist at choir, "because they ought to be free for greater affairs, which are incompatible with assistance at choir" (St. Alphonsus III, 675, doubt 1).

2. In religions, whether of men or women, which have the obligation of choir, in individual houses where there are at least four religious bound to choir and actually not legitimately impeded, and even fewer if the constitutions so provide, the divine office must be discharged in common daily according to the norm of the constitutions (can. 610, § 1). The obligation of choir of which the canon speaks is understood as a canonical obligation, which is had only in religions in which solemn vows are in fact emitted, though not in all. Moreover, that obligation being posited:

a) The burden rests upon the community, so that no one individually is bound to assist at choir, provided choral recitation takes place (St. Alphonsus IV, 143); he sins who is the culpable cause why the choir is taken away.

b) The obligation of choir then only actually presses where in the house there are at least four, or fewer if the constitutions so provide, religious who are both bound to choir and actually not impeded. Hence novices and lay brothers are not counted, because they are not bound to choir; nor are those legitimately impeded by illness or occupations, for example care of the sick or hearing confessions (St. Alphonsus IV, 143).

c) Although novices are not counted if there is question of constituting the obligation of choir, nevertheless the constituted obligation is quite probably satisfied even if only novices assist at choir, because in favorable matters they are reputed religious.

Note. As it is useful to note again, in religions, whether of men or women, in which there is the obligation of choir, the solemnly professed who have been absent from choir must, except for lay brothers, recite the canonical hours privately (can. 610, § 3); but in the same religions those professed by temporary vows are not bound by the law of privately reciting the divine office, unless they are constituted in sacred orders or the constitutions expressly prescribe something else (can. 578, 2nd).

1199 II. Obligation of the precept. 1. The Bishop, if there is question of canons, or the Superior, if there is question of religious, sins gravely if through negligence he permits the office or a notable part of the office to be omitted; but a notable part, as in private recitation (n. 1193), is that which reaches the quantity of a little hour (St. Alphonsus IV, 143).

2. Even a notable inversion in the order of the hours is quite probably only venial, because it touches an accident rather than the substance (St. Alphonsus IV, 171).

1200 III. Time for satisfying the precept. 1. The useful time both for the valid fulfillment of the precept and for satisfying the grave obligation is from midnight to midnight, yet in such a way that Matins and Lauds can be anticipated on the preceding day from the hour of Vespers. For satisfying the light obligation, attending to law alone, Matins must be recited at midnight, Lauds at the beginning of dawn, or Matins with Lauds from dawn until sunrise, Prime at sunrise, Terce in the middle of the morning time, Sext at midday, None in the middle of the afternoon, Vespers before sunset, and Compline after sunset. I said attending to law alone, because a reasonable received custom can be observed. This obligation is only light, because there is question only of an accidental circumstance of the precept.

2. In computing the hours of the day, one must stand by the common use of the place (can. 33, § 1).

1201 IV. The place for satisfying the precept is the church; nevertheless for a just cause the hours can sometimes be recited in the sacristy (St. Alphonsus III, 675; IV, 143).

1202 V. Manner of satisfying the precept. 1. For the psalms the choir must be divided into only two parts, whether there are more on one side or fewer, so that individuals recite alternate verses; for thus the use and practice of the Church has it. Readings, etc., can either be distributed among several persons or said by one (St. Alphonsus IV, 162). One who omits certain things from his own part, whether because he came somewhat late, or because of distraction,[1] or because he is occupied in the office of choir, for example by playing the organ for some moments or transferring books - he, I say, who thus omits certain things, is not bound to supply them, because the choir has supplied them. The same must be said of one "who while others are reciting coughs or spits, even if an entire psalm is said in the meantime," ... likewise of one "who in choir reads through a lesson beforehand, lest he err, when otherwise he would err" (St. Alphonsus IV, 143, note 3), or who, while the others are chanting, prepares himself for this end, that he may complete the lesson with sufficient readiness. The contrary must be said of one who for a long time is occupied by some other business alone, for example merely playing the organ. Likewise, quite probably, one satisfies the office who recites his own part softly and hears the other. Nevertheless canons do not acquire the distributions and fruits of the prebend if they do not sing or chant as the others do; in order to acquire them, they must come together for chanting the office (St. Alphonsus IV, 163, question 1; III, 675, doubts 3 and 4).[2]

2. One who assists at choir must attend to the things which are recited by the others, because by attending to them he must communicate in them. But he satisfies well who does not distinctly perceive the things recited by the others, whether because he is somewhat deaf, or because of the noise of others, or because of the fault of the choir (St. Alphonsus IV, 163, questions 2 and 3). But one who is deaf and recites his own part indeed gains the distributions, but does not seem to satisfy the obligation of the office unless he recites quietly the things which are said by the other side (St. Alphonsus IV, 163, question 3).

[1] Cf. chapter Dolentes 9, De celebratione missarum.

[2] Constitution of Benedict XIV Cum semper oblatas, 19 August 1744; Brief of Benedict XIV Dilecte Fili, 19 January 1748.

Scholion II. On Recitation with a Companion

1203 It is enough to note these things:

I. It is lawful, in imitation of choral recitation, to recite the office with a companion, especially because this is conformed to the primitive institution of the Church and to the public rite of praying; and it is lawful even if the companion is not bound to the canonical hours and does not attend to the things recited by the other side (St. Alphonsus IV, 162).

II. In recitation with a companion each one should pronounce his own part. Moreover, as regards the psalms, individuals should recite alternate verses. The readings, responsories, little chapters, and prayers should either be distributed or recited by one alone; indeed quite probably he satisfies "who alone says the psalms and hears the readings; or who says part of the psalms alone and part with a companion" (St. Alphonsus IV, 162). The things which one part recites by beginning too quickly, before the other has completed its own part, are considered omitted; but unless there is too much confusion, an obligation of repeating is not easily had. This also holds if the companion merely cuts off syllables.

Chapter II. On the Duties of Certain Clerics Specifically

For our purpose we shall speak chiefly about the duties of beneficiaries; first generally, then about the duties of parish priests in particular. Finally we shall add what must be observed by the assistants of parish priests.

Article I. On the Duties of Beneficiaries in General

1204 I. Notion of a benefice. An ecclesiastical benefice is a juridic entity constituted or erected in perpetuity by competent ecclesiastical authority, consisting of a sacred office and of the right of receiving revenues from an endowment annexed to the office (can. 1409). It is called a juridic entity, that is, a moral person; but the beneficiary is usually a physical person. Moreover, for constituting that juridic entity which is called a benefice, there are required:

1. A sacred or ecclesiastical office, and indeed taken in the strict sense, that is, a function stably constituted by ordination, whether divine or ecclesiastical, to be conferred according to the norm of the sacred canons, carrying with it at least some participation in ecclesiastical power, whether of order or of jurisdiction (can. 145).
2. The right of receiving revenues from the endowment annexed to the office. The endowment of a benefice is constituted either by goods whose ownership is in the juridic entity itself, or by certain and due payments of some family or moral person, or by certain and voluntary offerings of the faithful which pertain to the rector of the benefice, or by the rights, as they are called, of the stole within the limits of diocesan taxation or legitimate custom, or by choral distributions, with a third part of the same excluded,[1] if all the revenues of the benefice consist in choral distributions (can. 1410).
3. Legitimate erection, namely proceeding from competent ecclesiastical authority; hence, for example, a foundation of Masses, even though constituted in perpetuity, is not sufficient, but it is required that competent authority have erected it into the title of a benefice.
4. Erection in perpetuity, so that, when the beneficiary, for example the parish priest, has died or been removed, it persists.

Corollary. Beneficiaries are residential Bishops, canons, parish priests; but not apostolic administrators, confessors, episcopal secretaries, spiritual directors of religious women, assistant vicars, sacristans; nor religious Superiors, because although they discharge an office strictly so called, nevertheless they lack the right of receiving revenues from an endowment annexed to the office.

[1] This third part is to be converted into daily distributions among those present (can. 395).

1205 II. Division of benefices. From can. 1411 benefices are distinguished into:

1. Consistorial, which are customarily conferred in Consistory; the rest are non-consistorial.
2. Secular or religious, according as they pertain to secular clerics alone or to religious clerics alone; but all benefices erected outside the churches or houses of religious are presumed, in doubt, to be secular.
3. Double or residential, or simple or non-residential, according as, besides the benefice-office, they have annexed to them the obligation of residing, or not.

4. Manual, temporary or removable, or perpetual or irremovable, according as they are conferred revocably or in perpetuity.
5. With cure or without cure, according as they have the cure of souls annexed or not.

1206 III. Duties of beneficiaries. As the title of the article indicates, the discussion is about the duties which are common to beneficiaries, with the special obligations of some being omitted.[1] Moreover:

1. A beneficiary is bound faithfully to fulfill the particular burdens annexed to the benefice and, besides, to recite the canonical hours daily. If, detained by no legitimate impediment, he has not satisfied the obligation of reciting the canonical hours, he does not make the fruits his own in proportion to the omission, and he should hand them over to the fabric of the church or to the diocesan Seminary, or distribute them among the poor (can. 1475); these things were explained more fully in n. 1192.
2. A beneficiary must administer the goods pertaining to his benefice as the curator of the benefice (can. 1476); and in particular he must carry out as soon as possible the lesser repairs which fall upon him, lest the necessity of greater repairs arise (can. 1477, § 3).
3. Expenses connected in an ordinary way with the administration of benefice-goods and the perception of fruits are to be borne by the beneficiary. Expenses for extraordinary repairs of the benefice-house are to be borne by those upon whom falls the burden of repairing the benefice-church, unless the documents of foundation or legitimate agreements and customs provide otherwise (can. 1477, §§ 1 and 2).
4. A beneficiary is bound by the obligation of expending superfluous benefice-fruits for the poor or for pious causes; Cardinals, however, are not bound by this obligation (can. 1473). Since there is question of fruits which he has made his own (cf. can. 1409, 1472, and 1475), the said obligation is not to be judged an obligation of justice; hence a beneficiary who illicitly expends superfluous revenues is not bound to restitution (St. Thomas, Quodlibet 6, article 12, ad 3; St. Alphonsus III, 492).

[1] I note, however, can. 2381: One who obtains an office, benefice, or dignity with the burden of residence, if he is illegitimately absent: 1st, by that fact is deprived of all the fruits of his benefice or office in proportion to the illegitimate absence, and must hand them over to the Ordinary, who is to distribute them to the church or to some pious place or to the poor; 2nd, he is to be deprived of office, benefice, or dignity according to the norm of canons 2168-2175.

Article II. On the Duties of Parish Priests in Particular

(St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book III, nn. 357-360; Homo Apostolicus, tract 7, nn. 14-17.)

1207 I. Notion of a parish priest. A parish priest is a priest or moral person to whom a parish has been conferred in title, with the cure of souls to be exercised under the authority of the local Ordinary (can. 451, § 1). A moral person can be, for example, a chapter, monastery, etc. To parish priests are equated, with all parochial rights and obligations, and they come under the name of parish priests in law: 1st, quasi-parish priests who govern quasi-parishes; 2nd, parochial vicars, if they are endowed with full parochial power (can. 451, § 2; cf. the tract on Matrimony). Moreover in the definition it is said:

1. Moral person; now a moral person to which a parish has been united by full right can retain only the habitual cure of souls, with the actual cure committed to a vicar (can. 452, § 2).

2. Parish; but a parish is a part of a diocese to which a particular rector is assigned as its proper pastor. Parts of an apostolic vicariate and apostolic prefecture, if a particular rector has been assigned to them, are called quasi-parishes (can. 216).

3. To whom a parish has been conferred in title with the cure of souls. From these things it is sufficiently drawn that power belongs to a parish priest by force of his office, and therefore that it is ordinary. Moreover it is proper, not vicarious, or it is exercised in his own name. Besides, the power of a parish priest is only of the internal forum, so that he cannot make laws or censures or institute a canonical trial; nevertheless he has some domestic or economic power over his subjects, and he carries out a public administration by which he fulfills several external functions by force of office.[1]

4. To be exercised under the authority of the local Ordinary. Namely, although the power of a parish priest is exercised in his own name, nevertheless it is subordinated to the power of the local Ordinary; nor is that unfitting according to these words of St. Thomas: "It must be said that it would be unfitting if two were constituted equally over the same people; but if unequally, it is not unfitting. And according to this, immediately over the same people there are the parochial priest, the bishop, and the Pope" (Supplement, q. 8, article 5, ad 3).

Note. Those who are placed over the administration of a parish as its proper rectors must be stable in it; yet this does not prevent all from being removable from it according to the norms of law. But not all parish priests obtain the same stability; those who enjoy greater stability are customarily called irremovable, and those who enjoy lesser stability, removable (can. 454).

[1] Chelodi, De personis, n. 223 b.

1208 II. The duties of a parish priest chiefly regard residence, Mass for the people, ministration of the sacraments, catechetical instruction, sacred sermons, custody of ecclesiastical discipline, spiritual care of the sick, and care of the poor.

1. Residence. a) A parish priest is held by the obligation of residing in the parochial house near his church; nevertheless the local Ordinary can, for a just cause, permit him to live elsewhere, provided the house in which he lives is not so distant from the parochial church that the performance of parochial duties suffers some detriment from it (can. 465, § 1). However, a parish priest is permitted to be absent for at most two months within the year, whether continuous or interrupted, unless a grave cause, in the judgment of the Ordinary himself, either requires a longer absence or permits only a shorter one (can. 465, § 2). And the days on which once a year he is occupied with pious exercises are not computed in the two months of vacation (can. 465, § 3). Nevertheless it must be noted that a parish priest who is going to depart is bound to these things:

a) When the absence is going to last beyond a week, the parish priest, besides a legitimate cause, must have the written permission of the Ordinary and, unless he habitually has assistants, leave in his place a substitute vicar to be approved by the same Ordinary; but if the parish priest is a religious, he also needs the consent of the Superior, and the substitute must be approved both by the Ordinary and by the Superior (can. 465, § 4).

b) If a parish priest is compelled to depart for a sudden and grave cause and to be absent beyond a week, he should as soon as possible inform the Ordinary by letter, indicating to him the cause of the departure and the supplying priest, and should stand by his commands (can. 465, § 5).

c) Even for the time of a shorter absence the parish priest must provide for the necessities of the faithful, especially if particular circumstances require this (can. 465, § 6). Finally, it is prohibited to be absent in time of contagious disease;[1] nevertheless it is lawful to leave the care of the sick to the vicar, if the latter is prepared for it, lest both be exposed to danger or lest the faithful, because of fear of contagion, avoid both (St. Alphonsus VI, 233). On the time of persecution see the tract on Faith, n. 500.

b) The obligation of residence is grave of its own kind; and illicit absences coalesce. Neglect is grave if it is extended to three continuous weeks; nevertheless a longer space of time is required if the absences are interrupted; even less can suffice if meanwhile sufficient provision has not been made for the necessity of the faithful.

c) A parish priest who is illegitimately absent is by that fact deprived of all the fruits of his benefice in proportion to the illegitimate absence, and he must hand them over to the Ordinary, who is to distribute them to the church or to some pious place or to the poor (can. 2381, 1st); besides, proceedings must be taken against the delinquent according to the norm of canons 2168-2175 (can. 2381, § 2). It is said all the fruits; hence those fruits also are comprehended which correspond to other burdens of the benefice.[2] Then the obligation of handing over the fruits to the Ordinary presses before the sentence of a judge.[3]

2. Mass for the people, which obligation is explained in the tract on the Most Holy Eucharist.

3. Ministration of the sacraments; concerning this there is enough in the tracts on the Sacraments in general and in particular.

4. Catechetical instruction. a) With regard to children, the parish priest must: 1st, at fixed times, by continuous instruction for several days, prepare children each year for receiving the sacraments of penance and confirmation rightly; 2nd, with altogether particular zeal, especially, if nothing prevents, in the time of Lent, instruct children in such a way that they may holily taste for the first time the Holy Things from the altar (can. 1330); 3rd, besides the instruction of children already explained, the parish priest should not omit to cultivate more abundantly and perfectly in the catechism those children who have recently received first communion (can. 1331).

b) With regard to adults, on Sundays and other feasts of precept, at that hour which in his judgment is more suitable for the attendance of the people, the parish priest must moreover explain the catechism to the adult faithful, in speech accommodated to their understanding (can. 1332).

Note 1. In the religious instruction of children the parish priest can, indeed, if he is legitimately impeded, must, make use of the work of clerics dwelling in the territory of the parish, or even, if necessary, of pious lay people, especially those who are enrolled in the pious society of Christian doctrine or another similar society erected in the parish (can. 1333, § 1). Priests and other clerics detained by no legitimate impediment are to be helpers to their own parish priest in this most holy work, even under penalties to be inflicted by the Ordinary (can. 1333, § 2). Here the discussion is about priests and clerics who are not exempt, since exempt clerics do not have a proper parish priest.

Note 2. If, in the judgment of the local Ordinary, the help of religious for the catechetical instruction of the people is necessary, religious Superiors, even exempt, when requested by the same Ordinary, are bound, either by themselves or through their religious subjects, though without detriment to regular discipline, to hand it on to the people, especially in their own churches (can. 1334). Finally it belongs to the local Ordinary to issue all things in his diocese which regard instructing the people in Christian doctrine; and even exempt religious, whenever they teach the non-exempt, are bound to observe the same things (can. 1336).

c) The obligation of catechetical instruction is grave of its own kind; hence a parish priest who is notably negligent in fulfilling it sins gravely. Nevertheless the obligation of doing this personally is not to be urged in the same way as when there is discussion of sacred sermons; for then, as we shall now say, it is expressly indicated by the Code (can. 1344).

5. Sacred sermons. By divine precept it has been commanded to all to whom the care of souls has been committed to feed their sheep by the preaching of the divine word.[4] Moreover:

a) On Sundays and the other feasts of precept through the year, it is the proper office of each parish priest to announce the word of God to the people by the customary homily, especially within the Mass at which there is usually the greater attendance of the people (can. 1344, § 1). A parish priest cannot satisfy this obligation habitually through another, unless for a just cause approved by the Ordinary (can. 1344, § 2). The Ordinary can permit that on certain more solemn feasts, or even, for a just cause, on some Sundays, the sermon be omitted (can. 1344, § 3).

Note 1. It is to be desired that at Masses which, with the faithful present, are celebrated on feasts of precept in all churches or public oratories, a brief explanation of the Gospel or of some part of Christian doctrine be made; and if the local Ordinary has prescribed this, with suitable instructions given, not only priests from the secular clergy are bound by this law, but also religious, even exempt, in their own churches (can. 1345).

Note 2. Let the Ordinaries of places take care that in the time of Lent, and likewise, if it has seemed expedient, in the time of Advent, sacred sermons be given more frequently to the faithful in cathedral and parochial churches (can. 1346, § 1).

b) In sacred sermons those things are chiefly to be expounded which the faithful must believe and do for salvation. The heralds of the divine word should abstain from profane or abstruse arguments exceeding the common understanding of the hearers; and they should exercise the evangelical ministry not in persuasive words of human wisdom, not in the profane display and enticement of vain and ambitious eloquence, but in the showing of spirit and power, preaching not themselves but Christ crucified (can. 1347).[5] Finally, it is illicit to treat certain matters, namely: a determinate time of certain future things, for example of Antichrist or of the last judgment; likewise vain revelations about these or other things; new inspirations or revelations or new miracles, unless they have been approved by competent authority.[6]

c) The obligation of preaching is grave of its own kind; but grave matter seems to be had if a parish priest for one continuous month or for three discontinuous months in the year preached neither by himself nor through others (St. Alphonsus III, 269). A longer space of time is also required for someone to sin gravely for the reason that he preached only through another.

6. Custody of ecclesiastical discipline. The parish priest must know his sheep and prudently correct those who err (can. 467, § 1). Besides, he should watch lest anything against faith and morals be handed on in his parish, especially in public and private schools (can. 469; cf. St. Thomas 2-2, q. 33, article 2, ad 4; St. Alphonsus III, 360, doubt 2). Moreover sacred missions contribute greatly to the custody or restoration of ecclesiastical discipline, concerning which can. 1349 says thus: Ordinaries should watch that parish priests take care that at least every tenth year a sacred mission, as it is called, be held for the flock committed to them. A parish priest, even a religious, must stand by the commands of the local Ordinary in instituting these missions.[7]

7. Spiritual care of the sick; these things are explained in the tracts on the Holy Eucharist, on Penance, and on Extreme Unction.

8. Care of the poor; concerning this can. 467, § 1 establishes: The parish priest must embrace the poor and miserable with fatherly charity.

[1] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 6 September 1576, in Fagnanus, on chapter Clericos, De clericis non residentibus, from n. 41 to n. 45; Benedict XIV, De Synodo dioecesana, book 13, chapter 19, n. 2.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 10 July 1920, ad III.

[3] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 10 July 1920, ad VII.

[4] Council of Trent, session 23, chapter 1, on reform.

[5] Cf. Encyclical of Benedict XV Humani generis, 15 June 1917.

[6] Cf. Lateran Council V, session 11, constitution 1; Council of Trent, session 25, decree on the invocation of Saints.

[7] Pius VI in the Bull Auctorem fidei, 28 August 1794, condemned proposition 65 of the Synod of Pistoia: "The proposition stating that the irregular noise of the new institutions which are called Exercises or Missions perhaps never, or at least very rarely, reaches the point of working absolute conversion, and that those external acts of movement which appeared were nothing other than passing flashes of natural shock, is rash, evil-sounding, pernicious, and injurious to a practice piously and salutarily frequented by the Church and founded on the word of God."

Benedict XIV in the Constitution Gravissimum, 8 September 1754, speaks thus: "Taught by long experience, we have perceived that for correcting wicked morals, which either begin to creep in, or have already grown too strong, or finally, confirmed by long duration, have occupied dioceses more widely, nothing contributes more than to implore external help and powers, namely to appoint sacred Missions everywhere (§ 4).... Wherefore this remedy cannot be called new, uncertain, or devised by Us: a remedy most suitable for correcting the corruptions of the people, and perhaps the only one, which so many Bishops distinguished by the glory of piety have used with great utility in their dioceses, which We Ourselves have so often experienced, and which You also, who beyond doubt have at some time refreshed the people committed to you with sacred Missions, have experienced (§ 10)."

Pius IX in the Letter Singulari quidem, 17 March 1856, to the Austrian Bishops: "Since sacred Missions carried out by suitable workers conduce exceedingly to exciting the spirit of faith and religion among peoples, and to recalling them to the path of virtue and salvation, We vehemently desire that you take care that they be held from time to time in your dioceses. And We offer deserved and highest praises to all those who from your order have already introduced into their dioceses so salutary a work of sacred Missions, from which, by the breathing of divine grace, We rejoice that abundant fruits have been perceived."

Article III. On the Duties of Assistants of Parish Priests in Particular

Among assistants of parish priests, some are called assistant vicars, others cooperator vicars.

1209 I. "To the vicar," that is, the assistant vicar, so says can. 475, § 2, "if he supplies the place of the parish priest in all things, belong all the rights and duties proper to parish priests, except the application of Mass for the people, which burdens the parish priest; but if he supplies only in part, his rights and obligations are to be drawn from the letters of deputation." With these things premised, certain things remain to be noted with regard to cooperator vicars.

1210 II. A cooperator vicar:

1. Is bound by the obligation of residing in the parish according to diocesan statutes or laudable customs or the prescription of the Bishop; indeed the Ordinary should prudently take care, according to the norm of can. 134, that he live in the same parochial house (can. 476, § 5).
2. His rights and obligations are to be drawn from diocesan statutes, from the letters of the Ordinary, and from the commission of the parish priest himself; but, unless something else is expressly provided, he must assist the parish priest in the whole parochial ministry, except the application of Mass for the people (can. 476, § 6). Specifically, with regard to competence for assisting at marriage, see the tract on Matrimony.
3. He is subject to the parish priest, who should instruct him paternally and direct him in the care of souls, watch over him, and at least annually report concerning him to the Ordinary (can. 476, § 7).

Part III. On the Duties of Religious

(St. Thomas, 2-2, qq. 179-189; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book IV, nn. 1-82; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, nn. 1-29.)[1]

[1] Cf. Code of Canon Law 487-681; Cajetan, Commentarius on the cited place of St. Thomas; Billuart, Tractatus de statu religioso; Suarez, De virtute et statu religionis, tract VII-X; Wernz, Ius Decretalium III, n. 586 sq.; Vermeersch, De religiosis institutis et personis; Vermeersch-Creusen, Epitome Iuris Canonici, 4th ed., I, n. 531 sq.; Peyska, Ius canonicum religiosorum; Schafer, De religiosis ad normam iuris canonici; Fanfani, De iure religiosorum; Chelodi, Ius de personis.

Section I. Preliminary Notes

In order that the duties of religious may be better explained and understood, certain things must first be noted concerning the religious state itself, then concerning the society of persons which lives the religious state, or concerning a religion, and finally concerning admission into religion.

Chapter I. On the Religious State

1211 I. Notion. The religious state is "a stable manner of living in common by which the faithful, besides the common precepts, also undertake the evangelical counsels to be observed through vows of obedience, chastity, and poverty" (can. 487). It is said:

1. A stable manner of living. For a state involves a certain immobility or firmness, that is, a manner of living not easily changeable (St. Thomas 2-2, q. 183, article 1).

2. In common, that is, in a society. Hence eremitical life or a private profession of the counsels now does not suffice for the religious state. Nevertheless it is not required that life be spent in a community; for a bond with the other members and dependence upon a Superior suffices. Hence a religious bishop and an exclaustrated religious remain in the religious state (can. 627-629; 638 and 639).

3. The evangelical counsels, that is, the counsels of obedience, chastity, and poverty. Namely, the religious state is ordered to perfection, and not to common but to higher perfection; hence it ought to exclude the things which are an impediment to the said perfection, which are comprehended in these words: "All that is in the world is the concupiscence of the flesh and the concupiscence of the eyes and the pride of life."[1] Now the concupiscence of the flesh is healed through chastity, the concupiscence of the eyes through poverty, and the pride of life through obedience. The aforesaid are called simply the evangelical counsels, because not only are they commended in the Gospel like many other things, but they are also universal means which by their nature remove all impediments to evangelical perfection.

4. To be observed through vows. For state and stability demand obligation; but there is required an obligation arising from a vow, that is, from a promise made to God, because an obligation of this kind corresponds to the nature of the religious state, by which someone devotes himself to God (St. Thomas 2-2, q. 186, article 6). There are required - which is understood rather than expressed by can. 487 - vows emitted in some religion, and therefore public vows accepted in the name of the Church (can. 488, 1st, and 572). For no one would admit that the Church recognizes as religious those who do not belong to some religion. But it is not required that the vows be solemn or perpetual; temporary vows suffice, though to be renewed after the time has elapsed (can. 488, 1st); in that case sufficient stability is had.

Moreover, in fact ecclesiastical approval is required for the religious state. For the religious state, as has been noted, is not had except in some religion; but every religion must be approved by ecclesiastical authority (can. 488, 1st). It is disputed, however, whether an approval of this kind is required from the nature of the thing, or from ecclesiastical law alone. Now it must be said that it is required from ecclesiastical law alone. For the religious state from the nature of the thing says only the profession of the evangelical counsels through vows; but ecclesiastical approval does not enter into this profession. The Church merely recognizes what already exists. But the approval of the Bishop according to the norm of can. 492, § 1, concerning which below, suffices. The reason is that these societies are indicated even by the Code itself (can. 488, 3rd) by the name of religion, and the members of these societies are called religious (can. 488, 7th); wherefore the canons, whenever they speak of religious, also understand the members of these societies, unless the contrary is expressly established.

[1] 1 John II, 16.

1212 II. The end of the religious state is Christian perfection (can. 488, 1st; St. Thomas 2-2, q. 186, article 2). But perfection consists:

1. Essentially in charity; for "each thing is said to be perfect insofar as it attains its proper end, which is the ultimate perfection of the thing. But charity is what unites us to God, who is the ultimate end of the human mind, because he who abides in charity abides in God and God in him, as is said in 1 John 4; and therefore according to charity especially is the perfection of the Christian life considered" (St. Thomas 2-2, q. 184, article 1). But perfection consists in charity "principally indeed according to love of God, but secondarily according to love of neighbor" (St. Thomas 2-2, q. 184, article 3).

2. Accidentally and instrumentally perfection consists in other virtues, or in the observance of the precepts of other virtues, and in the observance of the counsels, namely insofar as "precepts other than the precepts of charity are ordered to removing those things which are contrary to charity, with which, namely, charity cannot exist; but the counsels are ordered to removing impediments of the act of charity, which nevertheless are not contrary to charity, such as marriage, occupation with secular business, and other things of this kind" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.).

Corollary I. Bishops are said to be in the state of perfection because in a special way they have bound themselves to perfection, not indeed by emitting vows which correspond to the three evangelical counsels, but by assuming the pastoral office, by which they have entered a bond of itself perpetual with their church; for through this, says St. Thomas, they have publicly and perpetually bound themselves to obey that supreme counsel of charity, even of giving their life for their sheep (2-2, q. 184, articles 5 and 7). But they are said to be in the state of acquired perfection, or rather of perfection to be exercised, because of the excellent exercise of charity toward neighbor in the pastoral office. Religious are said to be in the state of perfection to be acquired according to these words of St. Thomas: "It is manifest, however, that for one who works toward an end, it is not of necessity fitting that he has already attained the end, but it is required that by some way he tend toward the end; and therefore he who assumes the state of religion is not bound to have perfect charity, but he is bound to tend to this and to devote effort so that he may have perfect charity" (2-2, q. 186, article 2).

Corollary II. Perfection, as is clear, can also be had without the state of perfection, for example among simple faithful; but a tepid religious, although he is in the state of perfection, is in no way perfect.

1213 III. Institution. The religious state according to its substance was instituted immediately by Christ Himself, and thus it is deservedly said to be of divine law, not commanding, but counseling. And indeed Christ is deservedly said to have instituted religion immediately, if He exhorted to the three evangelical counsels and to their being confirmed by vow; for by these the substance of the religious state is constituted. But that this took place is clear: with regard to poverty, from Matt. XIX, 29; 16 sq., and Luke XIV, 26; with regard to chastity, from Matt. XIX, 12, and 1 Cor. VII, 25 sq.; with regard to the three counsels, from those words by which Christ invites to perfection the young man who until then had lived the state of common life: "If thou wilt be perfect, go, sell what thou hast and give to the poor, and thou shalt have treasure in heaven, and come, follow me." Namely, by these words poverty and obedience are directly commended, but chastity implicitly, because without it strict imitation of Christ would be impossible. Besides, Christ counsels a stable manner of acting;[1] this demands obligation, and one founded on a vow (n. 1211). Therefore Christ implicitly also exhorted to vows.

[1] Mark X, 17 sq.; Luke IX, 57 sq.; XVIII, 18 sq.

1214 IV. The excellence of the religious state follows from what has been said, and is proved by the praises of the holy Fathers and of other doctors and holy men.

It should also be noted that, according to the common opinion of doctors, the religious state can never fully fail in the Church because of her mark of sanctity; wherefore not even the Roman Pontiff himself could totally suppress all religious families at once.

Therefore can. 487 deservedly declares that the religious state is to be held in honor by all.

Chapter II. On Religion

1215 I. Notion. A religion is: A society approved by legitimate ecclesiastical authority, in which the members, according to the proper laws of the society itself, pronounce public vows, perpetual or temporary, though to be renewed after the time has elapsed, and thus tend to evangelical perfection (can. 488, 1st).

1216 II. Division. Religions are divided:

1. By reason of vows, into Orders and religious Congregations, or simply Congregations. An Order is a religion in which solemn vows are pronounced. A religious Congregation is a religion in which vows that are only simple, whether perpetual or temporary, are emitted (can. 488, 2nd).
2. By reason of dependence, into exempt and non-exempt. An exempt religion is a religion, whether of solemn or simple vows, withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the local Ordinary. A non-exempt religion is subject to the jurisdiction of the Ordinary (can. 488, 2nd).
3. By reason of approval, into religions of pontifical right and of diocesan right. The former are those which have obtained either approval or at least a decree of praise from the Apostolic See. The latter are those which, erected by Ordinaries, have not yet obtained this decree of praise (can. 488, 3rd).
4. By reason of members, into clerical and lay. A clerical religion is one whose members for the most part[1] are advanced to the priesthood. A lay religion is one which consists uniquely or at least chiefly of lay members (can. 488, 4th).

5. By reason of the principal work, into contemplative, active, and mixed, according as they are principally devoted to contemplation (Carthusians, Trappists, etc.), to the corporal works of mercy (Camillians, Brothers of St. John of God, etc.), or to teaching and preaching (Friars Preachers, Friars Minor, Society of Jesus, Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer, etc.). Now "those religions hold the highest grade which are ordered to teaching and preaching" (St. Thomas 2-2, q. 188, article 6); "for just as it is greater to illuminate than only to shine, so it is greater to hand on to others the things contemplated than only to contemplate" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.). "But those which are ordered to contemplation hold the second grade; the third is of those which are occupied with external actions" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.).

"But in each of these grades preeminence can be considered according as one religion is ordered to a higher act in the same genus; just as among works of the active life it is preferable to redeem captives than to receive guests; and in works of the contemplative life, prayer is preferable to reading. Preeminence can also be considered if one of them is ordered to more of these things than another; or if it has statutes more suitable for attaining the proposed end" (St. Thomas, loc. cit.).

Note 1. Diversity of religions provides better: 1st, for the necessity and utility of the Church; 2nd, for the increase of members.[2]

Note 2. "To pass from one religion to another, unless on account of great utility or necessity, is not praiseworthy; both because from this those who are left behind are usually scandalized, and also because someone progresses more easily in the religion to which he is accustomed than in one to which he is not accustomed, other things being equal" (St. Thomas q. 189, article 8).

[1] It is said thus because in a religion of priests and lay members, the former are commonly more numerous. Nevertheless it suffices that the class of laymen be subordinated to the other; hence the Sacred Congregation of Religious has already recognized as clerical a religion in which laymen were more numerous (Vermeersch, Epitome, 4th ed., n. 542).

[2] The errors of the Synod of Pistoia concerning the multiplicity of religions were condemned by Pius VI in the Constitution Auctorem fidei, 28 August 1794.

1217 III. Subsidiary notions. In order that the things which pertain to the law of religious may be better understood, it is pleasing to add the notions which the Code in can. 488, 5th, 6th, 7th, and 8th places first, and which regard: 1st, houses; 2nd, provinces; 3rd, members of religions; 4th, Superiors. Now:

1. A religious house is called a house of some religion in general; a regular house is a house of an Order; a formed house is called a religious house in which at least six professed religious dwell, of whom, if there is question of a clerical religion, at least four are priests (can. 488, 5th).

2. By the name of province is understood the union of several religious houses joined together among themselves under the same Superior, constituting part of the same religion (can. 488, 6th).

3. Under the name of religious come those who have pronounced vows in some religion; under the name of religious of simple vows, those who are in a religious Congregation; of regulars, those who are in an Order; of sisters, religious women of simple vows; of nuns, religious women of solemn vows, or, unless something else is clear from the nature of the thing or from the context of the discussion, religious women whose vows from the institute are solemn but for some places by prescription of the Apostolic See are simple (can. 488, 7th). To nuns pertain Carmelite religious women, Poor Clares, religious women of the Most Holy Redeemer (Redemptoristines), etc.

4. Under the name of major Superiors come: the Abbot Primate, the Abbot Superior of a monastic Congregation, the Abbot of a monastery sui iuris, even if belonging to a monastic Congregation, the supreme Moderator of a religion, the provincial Superior, their vicars, and others having power after the manner of provincials (can. 488, 8th); likewise probably the superior and superiorissa of a house which is sui iuris (cf. can. 504).

1218 IV. Solemnity of vows. 1. A solemn vow is had only when the Church recognizes it as such (can. 1308, § 2).

2. A solemn vow renders acts contrary to the vow, if they are capable of being invalidated, illicit and invalid; a simple vow renders them illicit only, but not invalid, unless something else has been expressly provided (can. 579). Thus, for example, the solemn vow of poverty renders religious incapable of having ownership of goods, whether direct or beneficial, namely independently of Superiors; the solemn vow of chastity renders a marriage to be contracted invalid (can. 1073), and besides dissolves a ratified non-consummated marriage (can. 1119).

3. A solemn vow does not differ from a simple one in such a way that, if it has been violated, the circumstance of solemnity must of itself be expressed in confession. Accidentally, on account of the incapacity annexed, a new sin can arise. Besides, merit of itself is equal; but accidentally, on account of the incapacitating force, greater merit can be had in solemn profession, just as, conversely, in simple profession, for example on account of the greater liberality by which someone hands himself over to an Institute which is not so strictly obliged toward him as he is toward the Institute, or because of greater dependence in common life, and so forth; moreover the merit of a vow of perseverance can be added.

4. A solemn vow as such, or the solemnity of a vow, is an institute of merely ecclesiastical law; this seems altogether to have to be admitted, considering the sole chapter De voto, III, 15, in the Sext; Gregory XIII, Constitution Quanto fructuosius;[1] Constitution Ascendente Domino.[2] Cf. also can. 636.

5. It is disputed in what precisely the nature of solemnity consists.

According to some, it is placed in ceremonies and external rites. But solemn vows can be emitted without ceremonies and rites, as formerly in tacit profession.

According to others, in certain juridic effects. But the aforesaid effects can be removed from solemn vows, as was done for the Regulars of Belgium and Holland.

According to others, in a more perfect handing over of oneself, at least of the body, together with its acceptance made by the Church in the name of God; or, as others refine this opinion, in the conjunction of vows with a more perfect handing over of oneself, together with acceptance by the Church, both perpetual on either side and indissoluble by the ordinary way.[3] I said at least of the body, because in the vow of chastity annexed to sacred order, only a more perfect handing over of the body has place. But the solemnity of a vow is an institute of merely ecclesiastical law, as we said under IV; and with that doctrine the opinion just set out is joined with difficulty.

According to others, in a more perfect and of itself immutable handing over, together with a force incapacitating the person for certain moral effects. But to this opinion the same objections are opposed as to the immediately preceding opinion.

According to others, in a special authenticity of vows, or in a certain special extrinsic juridic quality annexed by the Church to certain vows, to which by the ordinary way there has been added the force of invalidating acts contrary to the vows, if they are capable of being invalidated. But this special authenticity or special quality should not be taken for publicity only, but for greater notability or inviolability. This opinion, since serious difficulties do not seem to stand in its way, is preferred.

[1] February 1583.

[2] 25 May 1584.

[3] According to the supporters of this opinion, a person bound by solemn vows is like a thing consecrated to God; but a person bound by simple vows is like a blessed thing.

Chapter III. On Admission into Religion

We shall speak beforehand about vocation to religion, then about admission itself into religion.

Article I. On Vocation to Religion

1219 I. Notion. Vocation, taken generally, is a certain invitation on the part of God to embrace a state of perfection. Universal and particular vocation can be distinguished. Universal vocation is the invitation to embrace the state of perfection, directed by Christ the Lord to all Christians in general. Particular vocation is that by which the religious state is counseled to a particular person, whether in an ordinary or extraordinary manner.

1220 II. Necessity of particular vocation. In order that someone may be able to embrace the religious state, or at least that he may embrace it laudably, a particular vocation is required, intimated by God either in an ordinary or extraordinary manner. The reason is that one who embraces the aforesaid state without a particular vocation exposes himself to the danger of not fulfilling the grave obligations annexed to that state. For on the one hand, since God does not will that all, although generally called, enter into religion, He will probably not provide more abundant graces to one called only generally, without which religious obligations will in fact commonly not be fulfilled; this being posited, one who lacks a particular vocation ought at least to fear lest he be deprived of those graces, and therefore transgress the obligations.

1221 III. Signs of particular vocation. There are three things which must concur together: 1st, absence of legitimate impediments; 2nd, capacity or fitness of the subject in relation to such an institute; 3rd, right intention (cf. can. 538).

1. Absence of legitimate impediments; concerning these there will soon be discussion where the novitiate is treated (n. 1224).
2. Fitness consists "in sufficient powers of body and soul, and this according to the diverse ends of diverse orders, namely: sufficient health; right judgment, not singular, which would disturb common life; talent at least moderately good, which is suitable or can be made suitable for exercising the functions of the order itself; a disposition suited to subjection, since the religious state is especially a state of subjection, which does not permit one to follow one's own will and one's own judgment in matters to be done."[1]

3. Right intention, or the will of entering into religion with a view to the glory of God and one's own salvation, or also the salvation of souls (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 92); these indeed can exist without a natural inclination, indeed even with natural repugnance. Moreover it makes no difference whether the said intention or will has been provoked in an extraordinary or an ordinary manner. Moreover:

Note 1. Omnimodal certainty is not required for someone to be able safely to enter into religion. But those who must admit a candidate to religion should carefully see and inquire whether he is truly suitable (cf. can. 571, § 2). "It would be illicit to receive an adolescent into religion if his inconstancy were established or probably believed, or if there were anything else of this kind, which things are diligently considered in well-instituted religions" (St. Thomas, Quodlibet 3, article 11).

Note 2. With regard to the office of the confessor, St. Alphonsus observes these things: "If there is question of those who wish to enter religion, before all things the confessor should take care to weigh well into what religion they desire to enter; for if that institute is ever relaxed, it will be better for someone, ordinarily speaking, to remain in the world. For by joining himself to it, he will conduct himself as he has given himself to others.... But if the religion flourishes in observance, let the confessor test well the vocation of his penitent, inquiring whether the penitent has for it some impediment of unsuitability, infirm health, poverty of parents; and specifically let him weigh the end: whether it is right, namely of joining himself more to God, or of correcting the falls of his past life, or of avoiding the dangers of the world. But if the principal end were worldly, to live a more comfortable life, or to free himself from relatives of hard condition, or to please parents who impel him to this, let him take care not to permit him to enter religion. For in that case it is not a true vocation; without it an entrance of this kind will have an evil outcome. But if the end is good, and no impediment is present, the confessor, nor any other, as St. Thomas teaches, neither ought nor can without grave fault impede or dissuade him from the vocation; although he acts prudently sometimes if he delays its execution for him, in order to test better whether the resolution is firm and persevering, especially if he knows that the adolescent is changeable, or if that deliberation was made in the time of a mission or of spiritual exercises; because in occasions of this kind certain resolutions are conceived which afterwards, once the first fervor has passed, fail" (Praxis Confessarii, n. 92).

[1] Lehmkuhl, Theologia Moralis I, n. 658.

1222 IV. Obligation of obeying a vocation. 1. Of itself there is no obligation of following a vocation. "To neglect a religious vocation," says St. Alphonsus, "of itself is not a sin; for divine counsels of themselves do not oblige to fault" (IV, 78).

2. Insofar as there is an obligation accidentally, the holy Doctor explains it thus:

a) "One who does not follow a recognized vocation, by reason of the danger of eternal salvation to which the called person commits himself, making a choice of state not according to the divine good pleasure, cannot be excused from some fault" (loc. cit.). Indeed, "if someone believed that by remaining in the world he would incur damnation, both because of his fragility, which he has experienced amid the occasions of the world, and because of the lack of helps which he would have in religion, he cannot be excused from grave sin, since he casts himself into grave danger of his salvation" (loc. cit.).

b) Outside the hypothesis set out, it is more disputed whether one who neglects a recognized vocation sins gravely. St. Alphonsus inclines to the affirmative opinion, because one who neglects a vocation exposes himself to a great danger of salvation. "But the reason of this danger is that he who remains in the world against the vocation of God will not have the fitting helps of grace which God prepared for him in religion; and therefore, destitute of these, he will with difficulty resist the temptations of the world, and thus by succumbing will incur damnation" (loc. cit.). Nevertheless the holy Doctor adds: "I do not wish to pronounce an absolute judgment on this point: I remit it to the wise" (loc. cit.). Others deny it, because in their opinion it is asserted gratuitously that an abundance of graces is annexed only to vocation; indeed the nature of counsel demands the contrary. While the doubt stands, since there is question of the mystery of the distribution of graces, the safer part seems to have to be followed in practice, on account of the danger of salvation.

Question. To what is one bound who has vowed religion?

Response 1. One who has vowed religion generally can enter whichever he prefers, provided regular discipline is in force there at least with regard to the more principal observances (St. Alphonsus IV, 72).

Response 2. One who has vowed a special religion is bound to enter it, unless he wishes to choose a stricter one; the latter is lawful, since it is better. If he is not admitted into the religion which he vowed, he is not bound to seek another, unless he had the intention of embracing religion in any way whatsoever (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Response 3. One who has vowed religion sins gravely if after entrance he leaves the novitiate, unless a just cause for leaving is present, for instance if he finds the religion unequal to his strength. "The reason is that a vow of religion obliges not only to taking up the religious habit, but also to serving God for the whole time of life" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.; cf. St. Thomas 2-2, q. 189, articles 3 and 4).

Response 4. One who has vowed religion and enters it, but is dismissed from the novitiate, is bound thus: if he is dismissed through his own fault, he is bound to correct himself and to apply moderate diligence so that he may be able to fulfill the vow. If he is dismissed without fault, and the impediment ceases, he is likewise bound to use moderate diligence so that he may be able to satisfy the vow, at least if there is hope of admission (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Article II. On Admission Itself into Religion

A twofold admission is distinguished, namely to the novitiate and to religious profession. Now the Code declares these things about each admission: Any Catholic can be admitted into religion who is detained by no legitimate impediment, is moved by a right intention, and is suitable for bearing the burdens of the religion (can. 538). Then it speaks specifically: first about the postulancy which in some religions must be placed before the novitiate; then about the novitiate; then about religious profession.

§ I. On Postulancy

1223 I. In religions of perpetual vows, all women and, if there is question of a religion of men, lay brothers, before they are admitted to the novitiate, should complete a postulancy for at least six full months; but in religions of temporary vows, as regards the necessity and time of postulancy, the constitutions must be followed (can. 539, § 1). The major Superior can extend the prescribed time of postulancy, but not beyond another semester (can. 539, § 2).

Corollary I. Postulancy is not required for the validity of the novitiate or profession, but is merely prescribed, as is clear both from the word complete and from the fact that there is no discussion of it in

can. 542, 1st.

Corollary II. The constitution of a religion of perpetual vows which prescribes a postulancy, for example, of one year or two years, can but need not be observed. It can be observed, because postulancy must be completed for at least six months; it need not, as it seems, because it is said only of religions of temporary vows that the constitutions must be followed.

II. With regard to the manner of completing postulancy, these things are prescribed:

1. Postulancy must be completed either in the house of the novitiate or in another house of the religion in which discipline is accurately observed according to the constitutions, under the special care of an approved religious (can. 540, § 1).
2. Postulants should wear clothing that is modest and different from the clothing of novices (can. 540, § 2).
3. In monasteries of nuns, aspirants, while completing postulancy, are held by the law of enclosure (can. 540, § 3).

III. Postulants, before they begin the novitiate, should spend at least eight full days in spiritual exercises; and, according to the prudent judgment of the confessor, they should first make a general confession of their past life (can. 541).

IV. Besides the things set out, these things must be noted:

1. Postulants do not enjoy spiritual privileges, nor according to the general laws suffrages after death, since can. 567, § 1 speaks only of novices.
2. Where the Code speaks only of novices, postulants enjoy only the rights of members of the household (can. 514, § 1), for example with regard to confessions (can. 875, § 1), with regard to dispensation from fasting and abstinence (can. 1245, § 3), with regard to Extreme Unction and Viaticum (can. 514, § 4), with regard to burial (can. 1221, § 3), etc. Nor are they exempt (can. 615).
3. The testimonials to be brought before the novitiate (p. 816) are usefully presented already before postulancy.

§ II. On the Novitiate

1224 I. Requisites for someone to be admitted to the novitiate. From can. 542, 1st:

1. The following are invalidly admitted to the novitiate:

a) Those who have adhered to a non-Catholic sect. It suffices that they have adhered, even if they do not actually adhere. It is not sufficient that someone was born in heresy or has heretical blood-relations,[1] or that he was baptized outside the Catholic Church; but it is required that after the seventh year he was publicly enrolled in a non-Catholic sect, and - so some say - that he was not converted to the Catholic Church before the fourteenth year.[2] The impediment does not regard one who has been an apostate.

b) Those who do not have the age required for the novitiate. The completed fifteenth year of age is required (can. 555, § 1, 1st). At the beginning of the novitiate, the last day of the fifteenth year should have been completed (can. 34, § 3, 3rd).

c) Those who enter religion induced by force, grave fear, or fraud, or whom the Superior, induced in the same way, receives. Fear merely concomitant is not sufficient; but, considering the word induced, such fear is required as was the cause of entrance; likewise grave fear is required, although relatively grave fear suffices, so that reverential fear, at least if importunate prayers, etc., are added, would constitute an impediment.

d) A spouse, while the marriage lasts.

e) Those who are bound or have been bound by the bond of religious profession. It suffices that one be bound or have been bound by temporary profession.

f) Those over whom a penalty is impending because of a grave delict committed, concerning which they have been accused or can be accused.

g) A Bishop, whether residential or titular, even if he has only been designated by the Roman Pontiff.

h) Clerics who, from an institute of the Holy See,[3] are held by oath to devote their work to the good of their diocese or of the missions, for the time during which the obligation of the oath endures.

2. From can. 542, 2nd, the following are illicitly admitted:

a) Clerics constituted in sacred orders, without consultation with the local Ordinary, or with the same Ordinary contradicting it because their departure would result in grave detriment to souls which could in no other way be avoided.

b) Those burdened with debt, who are not able to pay. The debt should not have arisen from a mere promise which obliges from fidelity alone. If someone, with debts not paid, has emitted profession, he is bound to pay, for example when an inheritance has been received, etc.; but he can accept the inheritance even if he has emitted solemn profession, because the ecclesiastical law standing in the way of acceptance seems not to be in force to the harm of a third party having a right.

c) Those liable to render an account or implicated in other secular business, from which the religion could fear lawsuits and troubles.

d) Children who must assist parents, that is, father or mother, grandfather or grandmother, constituted in grave necessity, and parents whose work is necessary for feeding or educating children. Grief to be caused to parents by entrance into religion does not suffice. Some except grief that is very grave because of special circumstances; this, however, is altogether doubtful to me. If there is question of a brother or sister, grave necessity does not constitute an impediment; but extreme necessity, from natural law, requires that entrance at least be deferred (St. Alphonsus IV, 70).

Question. Whether a son ought to leave in order to help parents constituted in grave necessity after his entrance.

Response 1. He should not leave if he can help by remaining in religion; nor should he leave definitively if departure for a time or exclaustration according to the norm of can. 638 suffices.

Response 2. If he cannot help unless he leaves, it must be said thus: 1st, if there is question of a novice, he ought to leave. 2nd, If there is question of a professed religious, he should not leave in order to help a brother or sister even constituted in extreme necessity; in order to help parents, grandfather, or grandmother he is bound to leave if the necessity is extreme; likewise if grave necessity already existed before profession (St. Alphonsus IV, 67).

e) Those destined for the priesthood in religion, from which nevertheless they are removed by irregularity or another canonical impediment.

f) An Oriental in Latin religions without permission given in writing by the Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Church.

3. Things to be noted:

a) The right of admitting to the novitiate and to subsequent religious profession, both temporary and perpetual, pertains to major Superiors with the vote of the Council or Chapter, according to the particular constitutions of each religion (can. 543).

b) With regard to testimonials to be brought, these things have been established:

a) In any religion, all aspirants, before they are admitted, must present a testimonial of baptism and confirmation received (can. 544, § 1).

b) Male aspirants must besides present testimonial letters of the Ordinary of origin and of each place in which, after the completed fourteenth year of age, they have stayed beyond a morally continuous year, every contrary privilege being removed (can. 544, § 2).

c) If there is question of admitting those who have been in a Seminary, college,[4] or in the postulancy or novitiate of another religion, there are required besides testimonial letters, given for the diverse cases by the rector of the Seminary or college, after the local Ordinary has been heard, or by the major Superior of the religion (can. 544, § 3).

d) For clerics to be admitted, besides the testimonial of ordination, testimonial letters of the Ordinaries in whose dioceses after ordination they have stayed beyond a morally continuous year are sufficient, with the prescription of § 3 preserved (can. 544, § 4).

e) For a professed religious passing to another religion by apostolic indult, the testimonial of the major Superior of the prior religion is sufficient (can. 544, § 5).

f) Finally, women should not be received unless accurate investigations concerning their character and morals have first been made, with the prescription of § 3 remaining firm (can. 544, § 7).

c) With regard to things to be observed by the one giving a testimonial, these have force:

a) Those who must give testimonial letters from the prescription of law should give them gratuitously, within the space of three months from their request, not to the aspirants themselves, but to the religious Superiors, closed with a seal and, if there is question of those who have been in a Seminary, college, or in the postulancy or novitiate of another religion, confirmed by the oath of the Superior (can. 545, § 1).

b) If for reasons they have judged that they cannot respond to them, they should set out the causes to the Apostolic See within the same time (can. 545, § 2).

c) If they have replied that the aspirant is not sufficiently known, the religious Superior should supply this by another accurate investigation and a trustworthy report; but if they have replied nothing, the Superior making the request should inform the Holy See concerning the response not received (can. 545, § 3).

d) In their testimonial letters, after they have instituted a diligent investigation, even through secret information, they must report, their conscience being gravely burdened concerning the truth of the things set forth, about the aspirant's birth, morals, talent, life, reputation, condition, knowledge; whether he has been investigated, entangled by some censure, irregularity, or other canonical impediment; whether his own family needs his help; and finally, if there is question of those who have been in a Seminary, college, or in the postulancy or novitiate of another religion, for what cause they were dismissed or departed of their own accord (can. 545, § 4). His own family, that is, parents, grandfather, and grandmother (cf. can. 552, 2nd), likewise brothers and sisters according to the norm of the things said on p. 816.

All who have received the aforesaid information are held by a strict obligation of preserving secrecy concerning the information had and the persons who gave it (can. 546).

d) In monasteries of nuns, the postulant should bring the dowry established in the constitutions or determined by legitimate custom (can. 547, § 1); wherefore the statutes of canons 547-551 should be observed. In religions of simple vows, as regards the dowry of religious women, the constitutions must be followed (can. 547, § 3).

e) The Abbess or Superior of religious women, even exempt, must inform the local Ordinary at least two months before the next admission to the novitiate and to profession, whether temporary or perpetual, solemn or simple. The local Ordinary, or, if he is absent or impeded, the priest deputed by him, should diligently and gratuitously investigate the will of the aspirant at least thirty days before the novitiate and before profession, as above, but not entering the enclosure, as to whether she has been forced or seduced, and whether she knows what she is doing; and if it is plainly established concerning her pious and free will, then the aspirant can be admitted to the novitiate or the novice to profession (can. 552).

[1] Holy Office, 3 February 1898, ad I (Collectanea, n. 1990).

[2] Cf. Holy Office, 8 March 1882 (Collectanea, n. 1566).

[3] These things do not seem to regard those who have been ordained by title of mission according to the norm of can. 981, because common law is not customarily called an institute of the Holy See.

[4] More probably it is required that the alumnus or girl was in a religious institute, that is, in such an institute in which students are instructed for the priesthood or for religious life or at least also for these; for can. 544, § 3 corresponds to the decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Religious, 5 April 1910 and 4 January 1910, where there is discussion only of institutes of this kind. Hence if someone has been both in a Seminary or college and in the postulancy or novitiate of another religion, testimonials are required both from the Rector of the Seminary or college and from the major Superior of the religion.

1225 II. Formation of novices.

1. Beginning of the novitiate. The novitiate begins with reception of the habit, or in another manner prescribed in the constitutions (can. 553).
2. House of the novitiate; cf. can. 554.
3. Requisites for the validity of the novitiate. Besides those things which can. 542, 1st (n. 1224) and can. 543 (p. 816) enumerate for the validity of the novitiate, the novitiate, in order to be valid, must be completed: 1st, after at least the completed fifteenth year of age; 2nd, through an entire and continuous year; 3rd, in the house of the novitiate (can. 555, § 1). If a longer time is prescribed in the constitutions for the novitiate, that is not required for the validity of profession, unless something else is expressly said in those constitutions (can. 555, § 2).[1]

Note 1. One who begins the novitiate on 29 September cannot emit profession except on 30 September of the following year, because the beginning of the novitiate does not fall, or at least is not considered to fall, at the beginning of the day, that is, at midnight of the day 29 September (can. 34, § 3, 3rd).[2] Nevertheless one who in a leap year begins the novitiate on 29 February can emit profession on 1 March of the following year (can. 34, § 3, 4th).

Note 2. The novitiate is interrupted, so that it must be begun and completed anew, if the novice, dismissed by the Superior, has gone out from the house; or has deserted the house without his permission, not intending to return; or has remained outside the house, even intending to return, beyond thirty days, whether continuous or not continuous, for any cause whatsoever, even with the permission of the Superiors (can. 556, § 1). If the novice has remained outside the enclosure of the house beyond fifteen but not beyond thirty days, even non-continuous, by permission of the Superior or compelled by force, under the obedience of the Superior, for the validity of the novitiate it is necessary and sufficient to supply the days passed in this way; if not beyond fifteen days, the supplement can be prescribed by the Superiors, but is not necessary for validity (can. 556, § 2). Superiors should not grant permission of remaining outside the enclosure of the novitiate except for a just and grave cause (can. 556, § 3). If a novice is transferred by the Superiors into another house of novitiate of the same religion, the novitiate is not interrupted (can. 556, § 4). But if by the transfer it is brought about that the novice remains beyond thirty days, whether continuous or not continuous, outside the house of novitiate, the novitiate is interrupted.

4. The master of novices and his associate; let canons 559-565 be compared.

5. Confessors of novices; cf. the tract on Penance.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Religious, 3 November 1921 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1921, p. 539), where there is discussion of works to be performed in the second year of novitiate.

[2] Cf. Pontifical Commission, 12 November 1922, under 2nd (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1922, p. 661).

1226 III. Obligations of novices.

1. They are held to observe the rules established for them; likewise to obey the Master and the Superior (can. 561, § 2).

2. In monasteries of nuns they are held by the law of enclosure. For if this has force for postulants (can. 540, § 3), a fortiori it has force for novices.

3. In the course of the novitiate, if a novice has renounced his benefices or goods in any way, or has obligated the same, the renunciation or obligation is not only illicit, but null by the law itself (can. 568). Except compensation for the expenses of postulancy and novitiate (can. 570, § 1). The law does not regard postulants, as it seems, concerning whom there is no discussion.

4. At the end of the novitiate, before first profession, a novice must: 1st, cede the administration of his goods to whomever he wishes; 2nd, freely dispose concerning the use and usufruct of his goods, unless nevertheless the constitutions provide otherwise (can. 569, § 1). Now "Constitutions approved before the promulgation of the Code are to be observed whether they take away from novices the right of disposing concerning the use and usufruct of their goods, or whether they limit or predetermine this right."[1] If the said cession and disposition has been omitted because of lack of goods and these later supervene, or if it has been made and afterwards other goods by any title come to him, it should be made or repeated according to the norms established in § 1, notwithstanding simple profession already emitted (can. 569, § 2). Now:

a) The prescribed cession and disposition also regard novices of Orders.

b) The cession, and likewise, unless the constitutions provide otherwise, the disposition regarding use and usufruct, must regard the whole time during which the novice will be bound by simple vows (can. 569, § 1); hence it persists until death if he never emits solemn vows. With regard to those who will emit solemn vows, the disposition made ceases after the renunciation of goods prescribed by can. 581, § 1, and the solemn profession following it.

c) It is not required that the disposition have force before the law;[2] nevertheless it is expedient that it be made in writing, with the date and signature of the novice and of the major Superior added.

5. A novice in a religious Congregation before profession of temporary vows should freely make a testament concerning present goods or goods perhaps to come (can. 569, § 3). Now the canon regards only religious Congregations, not Orders. The reason is that members of an Order renounce goods before solemn profession (can. 581, § 1). It is disputed whether it regards members of an Order who never emit solemn vows.

[1] Pontifical Commission, 13 July 1930, ad I (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1930, p. 365).

[2] Pontifical Commission, 16 October 1919 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1919, p. 478); cf. Norms of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, n. 118 (28 June 1901).

1227 IV. End of the novitiate. When the novitiate has been completed, if the novice is judged suitable, he should be admitted to profession; otherwise he should be dismissed. If doubt remains whether he is suitable, the time of probation can be extended by the major Superiors, but not beyond six months (can. 571, § 2).

§ III. On Religious Profession

1228 I. Requisites for the validity of profession. 1. For the validity of any religious profession it is required that: 1st, the one who is going to emit it have the legitimate age according to the norm of can. 573;[1] 2nd, a legitimate Superior admit him to profession according to the constitutions; 3rd, a valid novitiate according to the norm of can. 555[2] have preceded; 4th, the profession be emitted without force or grave fear or fraud; 5th, it be expressed; 6th, it be received by a legitimate Superior according to the constitutions, either personally or through another[3] (can. 572, § 1).

2. But for the validity of perpetual profession, whether solemn or simple, it is required besides that simple temporary profession have preceded according to the norm of can. 574 (can. 572, § 2). Now in canon 574 it is declared:

[1] Can. 573 establishes: Anyone who is going to emit religious profession must have completed the sixteenth year of age, if there is question of temporary profession; the twenty-first, if of perpetual profession, whether solemn or simple.

[2] Cf. n. 1225.

[3] Therefore religious societies in which vows are not accepted by a Superior, such as the Congregation of the Daughters of St. Vincent de Paul, do not pertain to religions properly so called (Fanfani, n. 185). - When in the Constitutions of a Religious Congregation of pontifical right no mention is made of the Abbess or Superior in the formula of profession, but only of the Bishop or his delegate, then the Bishop or his delegate is to be held the legitimate superior according to the Constitutions for receiving profession, as having a legitimate mandate (Pontifical Commission, 1 March 1921, Acta Apostolicae Sedis, p. 178).

1229 II. Necessity of placing temporary profession before perpetual profession. In any Order, both of men and of women, and in any Congregation which has perpetual vows, after the completed novitiate, in the house of the novitiate itself, the novice must place before perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, with the prescription of can. 634 preserved, a profession of simple vows to be valid for three years, or for a longer time if the age required for perpetual profession is farther distant, unless the constitutions require annual professions (can. 574, § 1). Nevertheless note:

1. When the time for which temporary profession was emitted has elapsed, the legitimate Superior can extend the time to be passed before perpetual profession, but not beyond three years (can. 574, § 2).
2. In the case in which the Superior extends the time to be passed before perpetual profession, the religious, when the time for which the vows were pronounced has elapsed, should renew profession at once (can. 574, § 2; 577, § 1). Nevertheless Superiors have the faculty, for a just cause, of permitting the renewal of temporary vows to be anticipated for some time, though not beyond a month (can. 577, § 2).
3. The Pontifical Commission[1] declared that three years of temporary vows are not to be placed before profession in those institutes of simple vows in which vows are emitted under this or a similar appended condition: "As long as I live in the congregation," so that the alumnus, whether he departs voluntarily or is dismissed by the superiors, by that fact becomes free from the vows.
4. With regard to young men to be enrolled in military service, compare the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of Religious Inter reliquas;[2] likewise the response of the same Sacred Congregation dated 15 July 1919.[3]

[1] 1 March 1921 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1921, p. 177).

[2] 1 January 1911 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1911, p. 37).

[3] Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1919, p. 321.

1230 III. Prescriptions when the time of temporary profession has elapsed. When the time of temporary profession has elapsed, the religious, according to the norm of can. 637,[1] should either emit perpetual profession, solemn or simple according to the constitutions, or return to the world. But even during the time of temporary profession, if he is not considered worthy to pronounce perpetual vows, he can be dismissed by the legitimate Superior according to the norm of can. 647 (can. 575, § 1). The vote of the Council or Chapter for first temporary profession is deliberative; for subsequent perpetual profession, solemn or simple, it is only consultative (can. 575, § 2).[2]

Here, however, note with regard to solemn perpetual profession to be emitted: One who is going to emit a solemn vow, within sixty days before solemn profession, with particular indults granted by the Holy See preserved, must renounce all goods which he actually has, to whomever he wishes, under the condition that profession will follow (can. 581, § 1). Once profession has followed, all things should immediately be done which are necessary so that the renunciation may obtain effect also in civil law (can. 581, § 2).

[1] Can. 637 declares: One professed by temporary vows, when the time of the vows has elapsed, can freely leave the religion; likewise the religion, for just and reasonable causes, can exclude the same person from renewing temporary vows or from emitting perpetual profession, but not by reason of infirmity, unless it is certainly proved that it was fraudulently concealed or disguised before profession.

[2] With regard to suffrages, it was asked whether they have force "even if constitutions previously approved by the Holy See provide otherwise." The Pontifical Commission, on 16 October 1919, responded: "Affirmatively and according to the mind. The mind is: Orders and religious Congregations can prescribe suitable and the same suffrages for all ... temporarily professed and professed of solemn vows or professed of perpetual simple vows, in their constitutions to be amended and presented for approval to the Sacred Congregation of Religious, according to the norm of the same Sacred Congregation's Decree of 26 June 1918."

1231 IV. Effects of profession. It is enough to note the effects:

1. With regard to graces. Those professed by temporary vows enjoy the same indulgences, privileges, and spiritual graces which those professed by solemn vows or those professed by perpetual simple vows enjoy; and if they are overtaken by death, they have a right to the same suffrages (can. 578, 1st).
2. With regard to obligations. Those professed by temporary vows are held by the same obligation as those professed by solemn vows or those professed by perpetual simple vows of observing the rules and constitutions; but where the obligation of choir is in force, they are not bound by the law of reciting the divine office privately, unless they are constituted in sacred orders or the constitutions expressly prescribe something else (can. 578, 2nd).
3. With regard to acts. Simple profession, whether temporary or perpetual, renders acts contrary to the vows illicit, but not invalid, unless something else has been expressly provided; but solemn profession, if they are capable of being invalidated, renders them also invalid (can. 579).
4. With regard to the right of retaining and acquiring goods and of disposing of goods, n. 1245 should be compared.
5. Finally, after a year from any religious profession emitted, parochial benefices become vacant; after three years, other benefices (can. 584). One professed by perpetual vows, whether solemn or simple, loses by the law itself the proper diocese which he had in the world (can. 585).

1232 V. Convalidation of an invalid profession. Religious profession invalid because of an external impediment does not become valid by subsequent acts, but it is necessary that it be sanated by the Apostolic See, or emitted anew legitimately, once the nullity is known and the impediment has been removed (can. 586, § 1). But if it was invalid because of a merely internal defect of consent, once this has been supplied, it becomes valid, provided consent on the part of the religion has not been revoked (can. 586, § 2).

Scholion. On Profession in Danger of Death

1233 I. Substance of the privilege. A novice or probationer who, in the judgment of a physician, is gravely ill, so that he is considered to be constituted in the article of death, can before the end of the novitiate be admitted to profession or consecration or the promise customary in the institute; and indeed either by the major superior, or by him who actually governs the monastery, or the house of novitiate or probation, or by a delegate of the aforesaid superiors.

II. Things to be observed in the use of the privilege. The formula of profession or consecration or promise should be the same as that which is in use in the Institute outside the case of illness; and the vows, if they are pronounced, should be pronounced without determination of time or perpetuity.

III. Effects. 1. One who has emitted a profession, consecration, or promise of this kind will be participant in absolutely all the indulgences, suffrages, and graces which truly professed religious dying in the same Institute obtain; and to the same person a plenary indulgence and remission of his sins in the form of a Jubilee is mercifully granted in the Lord.

2. This profession or consecration or promise, besides the graces declared in the preceding article, produces no other effect at all. Therefore:

a) If a novice or probationer after a profession, consecration, or promise of this kind dies intestate, the Institute will be able to claim no goods or rights belonging to him for itself.

b) If he recovers before the time of novitiate or probation expires, let him be in entirely the same condition as if he had emitted no profession; and therefore: a) freely, if he wishes, he will be able to return to the world; b) the Superiors are able to dismiss him; c) he must complete the whole time of novitiate or probation defined in each Institute, even if it is beyond a year; d) when this time has been completed, if he perseveres, a new profession or consecration or promise will have to be emitted.

So, considering the decree of the Sacred Congregation of Religious dated 10 September 1912, and the declaration of the same Congregation dated 30 December 1922, which declared that the first decree, after the promulgation of the Code, was still in force.[1]

[1] Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1923, p. 157.

Section II. On the Duties of Religious

The Code first declares: All religious are also held by the common obligations of clerics, concerning which in canons 124-142, unless something else is clear from the context of the discussion or from the nature of the thing (can. 592). We spoke about these obligations in n. 1157 sq. But here we must speak about the special obligations or duties of religious; and indeed first about the substantial duties, so to speak, and those connatural to the religious state, then about certain other duties.

Chapter I. On the Substantial Duties of Religious 1234 The substantial duties of religious are: the pursuit of acquiring perfection, the observance of vows, likewise of rules and constitutions. These are sufficiently indicated by can. 593: All and each religious, Superiors equally as subjects, must not only faithfully and entirely observe the vows which they have pronounced, but also compose their life according to the rules and constitutions of their own religion and thus strive toward the perfection of their state.

Article I. On the Pursuit of Acquiring Perfection

1235 I. Nature of the obligation. The pursuit of acquiring perfection, or tendency toward perfection, consists in this, that someone: 1st, observes the means which oblige under grave sin; 2nd, does not contemn any means annexed to his state, even if not imposed under grave sin; 3rd, habitually observes the means which do not oblige under grave sin, but nevertheless are annexed to the state by force either of vows, or of rules and constitutions, or of ecclesiastical precept (St. Alphonsus IV, 9-11; cf. St. Thomas 2-2, q. 186, article 9).

1236 II. The existence of the obligation is deduced both from can. 488, 1st (n. 1212) and 593 (n. 1215), and from the fact that a religious "by force of profession is held to advance in some way in the way of perfection. Because by force of profession he is held to will to preserve his state, which is of perfection or of those tending to perfection, although according to itself it is not of precept but of counsel; but this is intrinsically to will to tend toward perfection" (St. Alphonsus IV, 9; cf. St. Thomas 2-2, q. 186, articles 1 and 2).

Corollary I. A religious sins gravely against the obligation of tending toward perfection: 1st, who does not observe a means which obliges under grave sin; 2nd, who from contempt neglects a means annexed to his state, even if it is not imposed under grave sin (St. Thomas 2-2, q. 186, articles 2 and 9; St. Alphonsus IV, 10).

Corollary II. He sins lightly against the obligation of tending toward perfection who habitually neglects means which are annexed to the state, but do not oblige under grave sin (St. Alphonsus IV, 11).

Corollary III. He does not sin against the obligation of tending toward perfection: 1st, who is not yet actually perfect (St. Thomas 2-2, q. 186, article 1, ad 3; St. Alphonsus IV, 9); 2nd, who now and then does not observe a means which is annexed to the state but does not oblige under grave sin; 3rd, who neglects means not annexed to his state (St. Alphonsus IV, 9).

Article II. On the Observance of Vows

§ I. On the Vow of Poverty

1237 I. Notion. The vow of poverty is a promise made to God concerning a certain constant repudiation of temporal goods for the sake of following poor Christ. It is said to concern a certain repudiation, inasmuch as it restricts in some way either the ownership itself of goods or acts concerning it.

The remote material object generally consists of external temporal or material goods, capable of being valued by price. I said generally, because the material object can at least by use or by law be extended or restricted, according as there is or is not present a danger of harming the spirit or vow of poverty. The proximate material object consists of certain acts concerning those goods which involve a certain repudiation, such as acts of not having them as one's own, dependent use of them, dependent administration of one's own goods, and so forth.

The remote formal object is the perfect following of poor Christ for obtaining perfection; the proximate formal object is the very honesty which shines forth in following Christ exercised for that end.

Corollary I. For the essence of the vow of poverty there is required at least the abdication of independent beneficial ownership.

Corollary II. The vow and the virtue of poverty differ in this, that the vow excludes independent acts concerning temporal goods, whereas the virtue excludes affection of heart toward them.

1238 II. Fuller exposition of the notion. Two things especially need development, namely the remote and the proximate material object.

1. The remote material object. To it there do not belong: 1st, internal things, such as liberty; 2nd, spiritual things, both supernatural, such as Mass and indulgence, and natural and intermediate things, such as integrity of honor, the right of good reputation, nobility, the right of election, presentation, and collation of benefices; 3rd, material things not capable of being valued by price, that is, things either of no value or of inestimable value, because they are consequently or intrinsically joined to a spiritual thing, for example a benefice; 4th, things which by use or by law are equated with the foregoing (St. Alphonsus IV, 14).

Corollary I. The application of a Mass as such is not against the vow of poverty, for instance if someone celebrates Mass for an intention other than the one prescribed; it can, however, be against obedience. Nevertheless the stipend is for the monastery (cf. can. 580, § 2 and 594, § 2). Nor is it against the vow of poverty to ask for intentions, or to dispose freely concerning them; intentions can also be given to another without injury to poverty. Superiors, however, can interpose their prohibition; for in the decree of 3 May 1914 it was asked whether religious superiors can command their subjects, even in virtue of holy obedience, that they celebrate according to the intention prescribed by the constitutions or determined by those superiors themselves, with the exceptions sanctioned by the constitutions or by legitimate custom preserved. The response was: Affirmatively.

Corollary II. Knowledge is an internal good; it is the fruit of the intellect and, as it were, part of it. One can dispose of his knowledge by a gratuitous title, but not by an onerous title. This would be against poverty. Then it becomes, as it were, an external thing capable of being valued by price.

Corollary III. Relics are exempt from the vow of poverty. By reason of their sacred character they are placed outside commerce, although otherwise they may have great value, for example manuscripts of the Saints. Relics which are not from bones are sacred first and principally from the use of the Church; hence if, apart from the use of the Church, they do not receive a certain veneration, they can as such be the object of the vow of poverty; for example, a manuscript of St. Thomas is rather preserved in museums.

Corollary IV. Reliquaries, as things antecedently annexed to spiritual things, are in themselves capable of valuation by price and are not prohibited from being sold, and thus they are the object of poverty. By use, however, they are usually excepted, provided they are of moderate price. Hence a contrary use can also exist in some Order. Finally, the use is reasonable, for the accessory follows the principal.

Corollary V. Devotional objects, such as images, medals, rosaries, and crosses, are not matter of the vow only by use; and the use perhaps only argues a tacit license of the Superior, not that they are no longer the object of the vow.

Corollary VI. Manuscripts. A religious has full ownership of any manuscripts whatsoever that have no sale value, because they are not things capable of being valued by price, and therefore are not matter of the vow. Likewise he can have full ownership, or at least unlimited use, of manuscripts of some value, and indeed from custom or the tacit consent of Superiors. Nevertheless custom or tacit consent does not support a religious if there is question: 1st, of manuscripts drawn up by command of the Superior for the good of the Order; 2nd, of manuscripts drawn up after profession, to be given away or alienated, at least if this is done for the purpose that they be published;[1] 3rd, of manuscripts for which the Superior, custom, or rule determines otherwise, as perhaps with regard to very precious manuscripts.

Note. The use of these rights over manuscripts, whether salable or not, always remains matter of obedience, and indeed, as it seems, of a certain high ownership.

Corollary VII. Lithographic notes, or notes made in a similar artificial way, even those written by machine, and indeed also those privately printed in type, seem to be equated with manuscripts, and this both from use, and from the fact that they often lack price, and from the fact that, if you except those printed by type or by machine, they are really manuscripts, although multiplied artificially.

Corollary VIII. Works made by art, for example paintings and sculptures composed by a religious, are the object of the vow of poverty, inasmuch as ownership of them cannot be retained by the religious himself; but they belong either to the monastery or to the one who supplied the materials.

St. Alphonsus says concerning a choir religious: "If panels, canvas, colors, etc., are handed over to him by the monastery, then the paintings belong to the monastery; otherwise, if those things are furnished by others" (IV, 14). Concerning lay brothers he says that those works belong to the monastery, because such lay brothers are received only for this, that they exercise external arts; an exception is made if the lay brother makes them on a feast day or by working for one or another hour in the day; in that case they belong to the one who supplied the materials (loc. cit.).

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Religious, 2 June 1911; 13 July 1913; Ned. Kath. Stemmen, 1913, p. 290.

1239 2. The proximate material object consists: 1st, in dependent use of things; 2nd, in dependent administration of one's own goods; 3rd, in the exclusion of the use of superfluous things, with regard being had to the character of the religion.

1240 a) Dependent use of things, namely on the license of Superiors. Now:

a) License is a faculty granted to a subject for doing something. It is especially divided into express, tacit, and presumed. Tacit license is that which is granted only by an internal act, but truly; hence it should not be confused with mere toleration for avoiding a greater evil[1] (St. Alphonsus IV, 17). Presumed license exists if the Prelate is supposed to be going to grant the license if he were asked.

b) License is granted either by the rule, or by legitimate custom, or by a designated Superior.

c) In order that license be valid, it must be: 1st, voluntary, and therefore not extorted from the Prelate by force; 2nd, obtained without obreption or subreption. In order that the license also be licit, it must be granted for a just cause of necessity or utility. But it is disputed whether a license given for illicit uses, or uses superfluous when the character of the religion and the circumstances are considered, is valid. Now it seems it must be denied, because "the Superior is not the owner, nor does he have any faculty over the goods of the monastery except insofar as the canons and the religion grant it to him. But neither the sacred canons nor the religion can be said to grant him the faculty of giving license for illicit or superfluous uses: not the sacred canons, since the contrary is drawn from them; not the religion, which is never considered to grant that for the spiritual destruction of its children" (St. Alphonsus IV, 30; cf. also n. 31).

d) Tacit license suffices whenever express license is not expressly required. Let these be examples: 1st, "If the prelate knows that a subject receives, retains, or spends something, and does not prohibit it although he easily could, he seems tacitly to consent and approve.... 2nd, if in some religion there is in force a custom of receiving or spending certain things without license, that is excused by the tacit license of the prelate, who by tolerating it reasonably declares the custom; if the prelate gives to a subject, or permits to be given to him, images, rosaries, etc., knowing that he does not need all of them for his own use, he is considered tacitly to grant the faculty of giving them to others" (St. Alphonsus IV, 17). Yet generally you should observe that "not always are the things which are done under the eyes of the prelate to be considered tacitly approved by him; for very often Superiors are reluctantly compelled to tolerate many things which they see done against their will" (St. Alphonsus IV, 18, at the end).

e) Presumed license suffices for saving the vow. The reason is that, according to the notion handed down, in the case of that license the Superior is not considered unwilling as to the substance, as it is said, and therefore the thing is not disposed of wholly without dependence on the will of the Superior. It also suffices for saving the discipline of the rules, if express license cannot be obtained in time; otherwise if it can be acquired in time, because then the superior and the rule require the petition for license, so that, if this is neglected, the authority would be unwilling as to the manner, as it is customarily said (St. Alphonsus IV, 18).

Moreover, note: 1st, "If, however, the things are of great importance, with regard to them presumed license does not support him; otherwise occasion would be given for receiving and retaining things even of greater importance without express license: which would yield grave detriment to religious poverty" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). Therefore "they, that is, Superiors, are in such cases to be presumed unwilling even as to the substance"; 2nd, "it must be observed that licenses are not easily to be presumed unless there is certainty, or at least certain probability, about their concession... and one must take the greatest care lest things be presumed which ought not to be presumed" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

[1] License which is virtually or implicitly contained in some express act, for example license to undertake a journey contains license for those things which are necessary for the journey, is counted by some as tacit, by others as express.

1241 b) Dependent administration of one's own goods, namely on the license of Superiors. Now administration in the broad sense is any juridical act concerning temporal things. In the strict sense it is a complex of actions by which temporal things are preserved and so handled that they become fruitful. It is twofold, according as it is done in one's own name or in another's name.

1242 c) Exclusion of the use of superfluous things. The use of superfluous things, namely with regard being had to the character of the religion, seems to be excluded by common law itself, and not only by the particular law of many religions. This is first suggested by can. 594, § 3: The furnishings of religious should befit the poverty which they have professed. Then the vow of poverty excludes those things which are repugnant to the state of poverty which religious have chosen; but the use of superfluous things is repugnant to the said state.[1] (St. Alphonsus IV, 29, 30).

Corollary I. A religious sins against the vow of poverty: 1st, "if, at home or outside, even from those things which pertain to food and clothing, he receives, retains, consumes, exchanges, gives to another, or lends anything without the express, tacit, or presumed consent of the superior or rule" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.); likewise if without license he eats or drinks at home or among externs,[2] because a religious has abdicated every independent use; 2nd, if he expends for another use anything from the things conceded to his use, or culpably loses or destroys it by broad fault. The reason is that in those things he has only use of fact, and that precariously, so long as it will seem good to the superior, and it is an act of ownership to be able to destroy a thing at one's own judgment (St. Alphonsus IV, 19); 3rd, "if you hide anything, so that you withdraw it from the free disposition of the superior. Nor can procurators, stewards, administrators, or lower prelates spend anything contrary to what the rule of the order, the will of the superiors, or custom demands. The reason is that they are not owners of the common goods, but only administrators" (St. Alphonsus IV, 28); 4th, a religious sins "if, while traveling, he turns aside to other places outside the direct route in order to see curious things; unless perhaps the expenses are moderate, and in an unforeseen case the license of the Superior can certainly be presumed. The same must be said if without faculty from the superior he buys anything, even for the Community";[3] 5th, a professed religious of simple vows sins if he acquires ownership or disposes of his own goods entirely by his own authority and will, and not according to the Rule and the will of the Superior, because the vow of religious poverty altogether requires abdication of the proprietorial use and disposition of all goods.[4]

Corollary II. A religious does not sin: 1st, if without express license he makes "remuneratory donations from goods conceded to him for use, because such donations are, as it were, payments of a debt. Indeed he can give more than he received, up to an excess of a fourth part; because gratitude demands that more always be returned than was received" (St. Alphonsus IV, 21); 2nd, if he accepts or gives something under the condition of license to be obtained, provided the thing can be recovered if license is denied, because then the act is suspended.[5]

Corollary III. One who has proceeded from presumed license is afterwards bound to disclose the thing to the Superior, if he still retains the thing, and the Superior is unwilling at least either as to the substance or as to the manner (St. Alphonsus IV, loc. cit.).

Corollary IV. One who acts against a license, even one unduly denied, sins against the vow, "unless there is danger of grave harm in the delay; for then the consent of a major superior is presumed to be present; and if he also then denies license, it can sometimes be prudently judged that the law or vow does not oblige in so great a crisis" (St. Alphonsus IV, 33; cf. St. Thomas I-II, q. 96, a. 6).

[1] Cf. Council of Trent, session 25, chapter 2, on regulars.

[2] This, however, is not admitted by Lugo (De iustitia, disp. 2, n. 5) and by others; nor should it be extended to those things which do not involve use of a thing as this is commonly understood. Hence I agree with Lugo teaching that it is not against the vow of poverty, for example, if a secular person lights a fire for warming a religious, if he burns some precious perfume to refresh his smell, or if he shows him some spectacle whose viewing is otherwise worthy of a price.

[3] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis I, n. 1193.

[4] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis I, n. 1193.

[5] Aertnys-Damen, loc. cit.

1243 3. Doubts and responses. a) A religious can ask for, accept, and refuse gifts as follows. It is not licit to ask for the community except within the limits of the rule and ecclesiastical laws. This, however, does not seem of itself to pertain to the vow (cf. can. 621 sq.). It is not licit to ask for himself, except within the limits of the rule. 2nd, it is licit to accept things spontaneously offered for the community; for oneself, as was said above. 3rd, it is not licit to refuse what is owed to the community; and this is both against the vow and against justice. To refuse what is offered to the community beyond what is owed is not against the vow, but can be against charity. It is licit for a religious to refuse things offered for himself alone; indeed there is an obligation to do so, unless the rule permits an increase of the substance of his own goods, or the religious declares that they are acquired for the community.

b) A religious seems to sin against the vow by accepting money without license to be spent at his discretion on pious works. The reason is that the arbitrary choice of the pious work involves something of independent disposition. Nor should you say that the choice is made in another's name; since the choice, as one which after the faculty of choosing has been given can no longer be contradicted, is made in one's own name (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, n. 7; letter of 3 Oct. 1757).

The same seems to be said if a religious without license accepts money to be distributed at his discretion among indeterminate poor persons, because the arbitrary choice of the poor person also involves something of independent disposition. St. Alphonsus indeed, loc. cit., speaks only of money to be distributed at discretion among pious works; but the same formal reason alleged by him subsists in each case.

If there is question of determinate poor persons, to distribute money or goods without the license of Superiors is not against the vow, since the distributor acts as a bare minister. Superiors, however, if a just cause is present, can prohibit that. But that someone gives counsel, or directs someone's attention to a certain poor family, cannot be disapproved.

But if gifts are offered "for your poor," as it is said, it depends on the circumstances whether by this word penitents wish to designate determinate poor persons, that is, exclusively the poor for whom that Father has care, or rather more indeterminate poor persons, that is, the poor whom the monastery is accustomed to assist. In the latter case, the subject cannot without license spend gifts on poor persons, as indeterminate; and the same seems to be said of the former case, because a certain arbitrary disposition is left.

c) A religious can accept another's thing on deposit without license as follows. 1st, if there is question of a deposit properly so called, or under a contract that obliges the religious himself or indirectly the monastery (cf. can. 536), it is against the vow. 2nd, if there is question of a deposit in the broad sense, or of mere custody of one's own or another's money, in general it can be said that the vow of poverty is not offended by it, unless it is expressly prohibited by the Rule from a motive of poverty.

1244 III. Division. The vow of poverty is divided into solemn and simple.

1. The solemn vow. The solemn vow, or rather solemn profession, of itself renders a religious incapable of ownership, so that any act of property is invalid (can. 579). But goods which in any way come to one solemnly professed: 1st, in an order capable of possessing, accrue to the Order or province or house according to the constitutions; 2nd, in an Order incapable of possessing, are acquired in ownership for the Holy See (can. 582).

I said: "Solemn profession of itself renders a religious incapable of ownership"; for accidentally solemnly professed religious of either sex in Belgium and in Holland received the faculty that, with due dependence on legitimate superiors, they can acquire, retain, administer, and dispose for pious and honorable uses of goods which have come to them. So from the Sacred Penitentiary[1] and the Sacred Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs.[2] These decrees are explained in two ways: either so that they become owners only civilly, or so that they become owners also naturally and before God. The latter seems to us more probable from the terms of the indult. The reason for the faculty granted was that civil laws there do not admit possession by religious. Some wish to extend this also to religious of simple vows, which seems improbable from the end and origin of this institute.

2. The simple vow, or rather simple profession, of itself does not deprive one of direct ownership, nor render acts of ownership invalid, but only prohibits independent use according to the manner determined in the rules. I said of itself, for the spiritual and temporal coadjutors of the Jesuits are wholly incapable of acquiring any ownership. Moreover, concerning simple profession the canons establish:

a) Anyone professed by simple vows, whether perpetual or temporary, unless something else has been provided in the constitutions, preserves the ownership of his goods and the capacity of acquiring other goods, with those things preserved which are prescribed in can. 569 (can. 580, § 1).

b) It is not licit for those professed by simple vows in religious Congregations:[3] 1st, to abdicate by an act among the living the ownership of their goods by gratuitous title; 2nd, to change a testament made according to the norm of can. 569, § 3, without the license of the Holy See, or, if the matter is urgent and there is not time to have recourse to it, without the license of the major Superior or, if even he cannot be approached, of the local Superior (can. 583).

c) Anyone professed by simple vows, whether perpetual or temporary, can change the cession or disposition of which in can. 569, § 2 (n. 1226), not indeed by his own judgment unless the constitutions allow this, but by license of the supreme Moderator, or, if there is question of nuns, by license of the local Ordinary and, if the monastery is subject to regulars, of the regular Superior, provided that the change, at least concerning a notable part of the goods, is not made in favor of the religion. But by departure from the religion, a cession and disposition of this kind ceases to have force (can. 580, § 3).

d) Anyone professed by simple vows, whether perpetual or temporary, whatever he acquires by his own industry or with regard to the religion, he acquires for the religion (can. 580, § 2).

[1] 1 December 1820.

[2] 31 July 1871.

[3] It is said "in religious Congregations" because one who is going to profess in a religious Order is not bound to make a testament, and before solemn profession renounces all goods (can. 569, § 3; 581).

1245 IV. Obligation of the vow. The obligation of the vow of poverty is grave from its kind, so that one sins gravely who, either by claiming something for himself as his own, or by using some thing as his own without the Superior's license, or in any other way, so behaves that, with the nature of the action and the quantity of the thing considered, he places an act of property in grave matter. But the gravity of the matter depends both on the nature of the act and on the quantity of the thing; hence, for example, a greater sum is required if someone uses the goods of the community without license than if he alienates them; much greater if he gives them as a loan than if he gives them as a gift, and so forth. Thus, for example, "regularly a religious does not sin gravely by secretly taking, for example, a book for temporary use, even a long one, but not in perpetuity" (St. Alphonsus IV, 24).

Moreover it cannot be determined accurately when grave matter is present. In addition, slight matters, insofar as they are opposed to the vow and therefore to the religion, quite probably do not coalesce, just as slight matters do not coalesce which, for example, are repugnant to temperance. Besides, observe:

1. To a sin against the vow there can be added a sin against justice, for instance if a religious destroys or without license alienates the goods of the community.

2. What in a case is grave matter, likewise when slight matters coalesce, and what quantity is required, if they do coalesce, so that the matter becomes grave, see in the treatise on justice, nn. 1028-1030.

Scholion. On Common Life

1246 I. Notion. Common life, taken in the formal sense, seems to consist in this, that individual religious receive equally, from common goods alone held in common, with the license of the rule or of Superiors, all and only those things which they need here and now.

1247 II. Division. Common life is distinguished as twofold, perfect and imperfect, according as it excludes or permits some peculium, as it is called. With regard to peculium note:

1. A peculium is a good capable of being valued by price which, separated from the things of the monastery, religious are permitted to possess, administer, and keep for their own uses, beyond what their present necessity morally requires.
2. A peculium is twofold, namely of perfect or imperfect right. It is of perfect right if the permission, once given from the beginning for spending goods on one's own uses, can no longer be taken away by the superior. It is of imperfect right if the faculty of disposing can always be circumscribed or taken away by the Superior.

1248 III. Obligation of common life. The obligation of common life does not subsist by divine law, since a sufficient abdication of temporal goods can be had without it, as is clear from the example of the ancient hermits and from the nature of the thing. By present ecclesiastical law there exists an obligation of common life, and indeed of perfect common life (can. 594; cf. can. 2389).

Question 1. Does a defect of common life, at least of perfect common life, or the use of an imperfect peculium, persist from custom and by way of privilege for some religions (cf. can. 5)?

The matter seems doubtful;[1] whatever the case, however, with all agreeing, the mind of the Church is that perfectly common life be introduced where it does not exist. But Superiors who would introduce the use of a peculium, even only an imperfect one, would certainly sin gravely, both because ecclesiastical law excludes it, and because the use of a peculium gives occasion to abuses and is usually very harmful to religious discipline (St. Alphonsus IV, 15; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, n. 6).

Question 2. Is the obligation of common life included in the vow of poverty itself?

Response. Affirmatively, at least with regard to the exclusion of a perfect peculium, as is clear from the very common doctrine which teaches that acts against common life are against the vow.

Question 3. Is moderate use, or a poor and uniform life, prescribed by the vow of poverty?

Response. With common law considered, it is disputed (cf. can. 594); therefore it is better to have recourse to the particular discipline of individual institutes.

[1] Cf. Vermeersch, Epitome, I, n. 696; Chelodi, De personis, p. 430.

§ II. On the Vow of Chastity

1249 I. Notion. The vow of chastity is a promise made to God of excluding the appetite and use of venereal things.

The remote material object is the appetite and use of venereal things; the proximate object is acts of excluding the aforesaid.

The formal object is the honesty which shines forth both in the said exclusion and in the vowing of it.

1250 II. Effects. 1. A simple vow prohibits contracting marriage (can. 1058, § 1); a solemn vow, and likewise a simple vow to which this force has been added by a special prescription of the Apostolic See, dissolves a marriage contracted and not consummated between baptized persons or between a baptized party and a non-baptized party (can. 1119).

2. Concerning the manner in which both a simple and a solemn vow extinguish betrothals, see in the treatise on Matrimony.

1251 III. Obligation. One who violates the vow of chastity sins: 1st, against religion, as is clear; moreover he commits the sin of personal sacrilege (n. 614); 2nd, against the virtue of chastity, at least if he perpetrates an act illicit in itself. It is disputed if he exercises an act licit in itself, as if a husband who has become a religious were again to use his wife.

1252 IV. Penalties against violators of the vow; cf. our little work De virtute castitatis, 3rd ed., n. 60.

§ III. On the Vow of Obedience

1253 I. Notion. It is a promise made to God of fulfilling the commands of legitimate superiors. Whether the vow also extends itself to the rule is disputed. We said:

1. Commands; namely commands strictly so called. Now a superior can command or oblige either under fault or to penalty alone. Under fault, I say, either grave, provided the matter is grave, or light, if the matter is light, or, even if grave, it is commanded only under light fault. But the Superior is considered to oblige under fault if he uses the words "I command," "I order," and similar words; under grave fault, if he employs the formula: "in virtue of obedience," "under grave fault," "under penalty of excommunication," etc. Otherwise he is considered only to oblige to penalty (St. Alphonsus IV, 38; I, 141). This, however, does not prevent the subject from sinning gravely if he proceeds from contempt of authority.

2. Of superiors; namely of those who by force of the vow of obedience can command. Such are the Supreme Pontiff (can. 499, § 1), the Sacred Congregation of Religious, as it seems, other Congregations if a special mandate is added, major and local Superiors; but not the Superiors of religions in which only a promise of obedience is emitted, as among the Oratorians.

3. Legitimate; wherefore observe that whatever is contained in the rule, or is required for its perfect observance and for attaining the end of the institute, is commanded legitimately (St. Alphonsus IV, 38, 39). But those things cannot be commanded which are outside the rule, that is, either: 1st, against the rule, unless the Superior justly dispenses; or 2nd, above the rule, such as certain macerations, unless they are inflicted as a penalty, or the care of sick outsiders imposed on a religious who is not a hospitaller; or 3rd, within the rule, such as vain or ridiculous things, unless the Superior "commands for a cause which is according to the rule, for example, that obedience be exercised. Nor does it matter that the rules command obedience in all things; for this is understood not of the obligation of the vow, but of the perfection of obedience" (St. Alphonsus IV, 40).

Here, however, note these words of St. Thomas: "No one is obliged to the impossible; and therefore if some prelate heaps up or enjoins so many precepts that the subject cannot fulfill them, he is excused from sin; and therefore prelates ought to abstain from a multitude of precepts" (II-II, q. 105, a. 1, ad 3). And St. Alphonsus: "A multitude of decrees would be the ruin of a Congregation" (Correspondence generale, n. 75).

4. Whether and to what extent the vow extends itself to the rule is disputed. Now it certainly extends itself to rules which express the obligation of the vow sufficiently certainly, as if something is commanded in virtue of obedience. Otherwise, according to some, the matter must be resolved from the acceptance and use of the institute itself. According to others, if the rule obliges under sin, its transgression is against the vow. According to others, the vow simply extends itself to the rules just as to the commands of Superiors; but understand this in such a way that the vow obliges either to the act or to penalty alone, according as the rule itself obliges[1] (cf. St. Thomas II-II, q. 186, a. 9; St. Alphonsus IV, 41, 42).

Corollary I. A command to which danger of life is annexed does not oblige unless it accords with the end of the institute or is demanded by the common good (St. Alphonsus IV, 40). Hence a Superior cannot oblige a subject to go to infidels with manifest danger of death or servitude, unless the subject has expressly obliged himself to this. Nevertheless a religious can be compelled to go to very remote provinces beyond the sea, if there are Convents of the Order there; for this pertains to the good of the Religion.

Likewise the Superior can oblige a subject to assist the sick infected by contagious disease, if the sick are religious of the same Monastery or Order; or if they are outsiders and there is lacking someone who would fortify them with the Sacraments of the Church; or finally if the care of the sick is the end of the Institute.[2]

Corollary II. In doubt whether a thing is outside the rule, likewise whether a thing is licit, one must obey, unless the thing commanded is too difficult, or grave spiritual harm threatens the subject or a third party from it. The reason is both because presumption stands for the superior, and because order, that is, peace and tranquillity, requires that in doubt the right of the superior prevail, and because the rules of various institutes favor this doctrine (St. Alphonsus IV, 47).

Corollary III. A religious is obliged to new statutes of Chapters, provided they are not wholly outside the rule, but are only means apt for attaining the end of the religion and the observance of the rule. But those who have embraced the rule legitimately mitigated cannot be forced to further things (St. Alphonsus IV, n. 44).

Corollary IV. License obtained from an inferior superior is valid, even if it has been denied by a major superior, "because the major Superior by denying license by no means takes away the power of the inferior" (St. Alphonsus IV, 50). And this seems to be valid in itself even if the rule commands that the refusal of the higher Superior be made known to the inferior; if in this case it is not made known, only the manner is illicit. "But I think one must say otherwise if the major Superior positively prohibits the subject from executing the thing requested, because then the inferior cannot dispense in the command of the superior" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Corollary V. A religious can appeal from the commands and penalties of a Superior. Nevertheless, except in the case of dismissal, ordinarily this does not have suspensive effect, unless the abuse of power is excessive. Yet extrajudicial recourse is always available to them.

[1] Cf. Raus, Obedientia religiosa, p. 54 sq., where he sets out the diverse opinions.

[2] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis I, n. 1212, question 3.

1254 II. The distinction between the vow and the virtue of obedience consists in this, that the virtue extends itself also to undue things and to internal and cheerful subjection (St. Thomas II-II, q. 104, a. 4, ad 3).

1255 III. Obligation. One who transgresses a true command of a religious Superior sins, as is clear; but of what species the sin is, see n. 148.

There are those who think that a sin of injustice is also committed by one who transgresses a command, at least if it is imposed from dominative power. But that seems to be denied, because dominative power does not confer a strict right to the act commanded, as is clear in parents; for no one would say that disobedient children sin against justice.

Objection. The Superior or institute by force of a contract has a right to the execution of the command.

Response. It is clear from no source that a contract of this kind is entered into. St. Alphonsus, who is sometimes alleged for the contrary opinion, in the place cited by the adversaries (IV, 46), does not speak of a sin of injustice.

Article III. On the Observance of Rules and Constitutions

Preliminary Note I. The rules and particular constitutions of individual religions which are not contrary to the canons of this Code retain their force; but those which are opposed to them are abrogated (can. 489).

Preliminary Note II. We speak of rules properly so called, or preceptive rules, but not of those which are merely directive and do not even oblige to penalty.

1256 I. Obligation. All and each religious, Superiors as well as subjects, must not only faithfully and entirely observe the vows which they have pronounced, but also compose their life according to the rules and constitutions of their own religion and thus strive toward the perfection of their state (can. 593).

Whether rules of themselves oblige to the act or to penalty alone depends on the different institutes. Thus in the Order of Friars Minor the rule obliges to the act, under grave or light fault according to the matter subject to it; in the Society of Jesus and the Congregation of the Most Holy Redeemer and in more recent Congregations,[1] it obliges only to penalty.

Nevertheless even the transgression of a rule which obliges only to penalty is commonly not without fault, either because it disturbs order or otherwise is scandalous, or because it does not proceed from an honorable motive but from laziness, from mere pleasure, etc.; indeed the transgression would also be a grave sin if it were done from formal contempt or had a grave influence toward relaxation of discipline (cf. St. Thomas II-II, q. 186, a. 9, ad 1 and 3; St. Alphonsus IV, 10, 41, 42).

[1] Cf. Norms of the Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, n. 320 (28 June 1901).

1257 II. Interpretation. With regard to interpretation of rules and constitutions, the same norms are valid as for laws taken generally (n. 141). If the matter, all things considered, is strictly doubtful, one must stand for liberty. Moreover, observe:

1. An inconvenience excusing from obligation should not be thought to be present too quickly, considering these things: a) in the state of perfection it is fitting that liberty be restricted; b) in the state of perfection laws have been voluntarily undertaken; therefore sacrifice should be sought rather than avoided.

2. Nor should legitimate desuetude be judged present too quickly. Yet he would err who thought that contrary customs enjoy no favor of law, as though legal or tacit consent were always lacking.

1258 III. Consequences. 1. Local Superiors should take care that at least once a year, on fixed days, their proper constitutions are publicly read (can. 509, § 2, 1st).

2. A Superior is bound to protect the observance of vows and rules, and therefore to correct the defects of subjects, even slight ones; indeed he is bound to this under grave fault "in the case in which the defects are many and such, for example concerning silence, fasts, etc., that they can relax discipline" (St. Alphonsus IV, 13).

"Although each religious may fail in a slight matter by transgressing a slight rule, nevertheless the superior who negligently fails to prevent relaxation of observance when he can do so fails in a grave matter. And therefore he is bound not only to correct defects of subjects which tend to the harm of the whole community, but also to inquire so that he may correct them, as St. Thomas teaches: 'yet without excessive solicitude,' as de Alexandris notes" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

3. Electors of Superiors should consider these things:

a) Those who elect notably less worthy persons sin gravely, namely because relaxation of discipline must be feared; and this is rightly extended to the election of general consultors and of the procurator general, considering their grave influence both on observance and on other grave matters (St. Alphonsus IV, 100, 101; Homo Apostolicus, tract 13, n. 35).

"Observance will with the greatest difficulty flourish if less worthy persons are elected; because less worthy persons easily become tepid and unworthy, or at least less diligently apply themselves to observance, and then from imperfect observance relaxation of the rules easily and quickly follows, with irreparable harm; for experience establishes that where in some religion an abuse has even once crept in, afterwards it is most difficult to avert it. And indeed less diligent prelates, and those who elect such prelates, are certainly the cause of this most grave harm. Would that detriment of this kind, derived from this source in many monasteries, were not often lamented" (St. Alphonsus IV, 101).

b) With regard to major Superiors in religions of men, can. 506, § 1, establishes: Before proceeding to the election of major Superiors in religions of men, all and each from the Chapter must promise by oath that they will elect those whom they have judged according to God to be fit to be elected.

[1] Cf. Raus, De Sacrae obedientiae Virtute et Voto.

Chapter II. On Certain Other Duties

1259 I. Exercises of devotion. 1. Superiors should take care that all religious: 1st, each year spend time in spiritual exercises; 2nd, if not legitimately impeded, daily be present at the Sacred Sacrifice, devote themselves to mental prayer, and diligently apply themselves to other offices of piety which are prescribed by the rules and constitutions; 3rd, approach the Sacrament of Penance at least once a week (can. 595, § 1).

2. Superiors should promote among their subjects frequent, even daily, reception of the Most Holy Body of Christ; moreover frequent, indeed even daily, access to the Most Holy Eucharist should be freely open to religious rightly disposed (can. 595, § 2). But if after his last sacramental confession a religious has been a grave scandal to the community or has perpetrated a grave and external fault, until he has again approached the sacrament of penance the Superior can prohibit him from approaching holy communion (can. 595, § 3). But if there are religions of either solemn or simple vows in whose rules or constitutions, or even calendars, communions are found fixed or commanded on certain days, these norms have merely directive force (can. 595, § 4).

1260 II. Religious habit. All religious should wear the habit proper to their religion both inside and outside the house, unless a grave cause excuses, in the judgment of the major Superior or, in urgent necessity, even of the local Superior (can. 596).

1261 III. Papal enclosure. Enclosure is distinguished as twofold: papal or major enclosure, and minor enclosure. Papal enclosure is that which must be observed in houses of regulars, both of men and of women; minor enclosure is that which must be observed in houses of religious congregations. Concerning papal enclosure, accept the following:

1. General matters. a) In canonically constituted houses of regulars, whether of men or of women, even not formed, papal enclosure must be observed (can. 597, § 1). Nevertheless, by force of an apostolic indult, houses of nuns which in fact do not emit solemn vows are exempt from papal enclosure.[1]

b) By the law of papal enclosure there is affected the whole house which the regular community inhabits, with the gardens and grounds reserved to the access of religious; excepted, besides the public church with the adjoining sacristy, is also the lodging for visitors, if there is one, and the parlor, which, as far as can be done, should be established near the door of the house (can. 597, § 2).

c) The parts subject to the law of enclosure should be openly indicated; but it will belong to the major Superior or General Chapter according to the constitutions, or, if there is question of a monastery of nuns, to the Bishop, to prescribe accurately the limits of enclosure or to change them for legitimate causes (can. 597, § 3).

d) Enclosure is violated even if someone enters illicitly within the bounds of enclosure by only one step, provided he enters with his whole body (St. Alphonsus IV, 229).

2. Papal enclosure of men. a) Within the enclosure of male regulars women of whatever age, class, or condition are not to be admitted under any pretext (can. 598, § 1).

b) The wives, with their retinue, of those who actually hold the supreme rule of peoples are exempted from this law (can. 598, § 2).[2]

c) If a house of male regulars has attached to it a boarding school for internal students or another work proper to the religion, at least a separate part of the building, if it can be done, should be reserved for the habitation of religious, subject to the law of enclosure (can. 599, § 1).

d) Even into places outside the enclosure which are reserved for external or internal students or for works proper to the religion, persons of the other sex are not to be admitted except for an equitable cause and with the license of the Superior (can. 599, § 2).

e) Women violating the enclosure of male regulars, and Superiors and others, whoever they may be, introducing or admitting them of whatever age, are punished by an excommunication ipso facto simply reserved to the Apostolic See; and besides, religious introducing or admitting them are deprived of office, if they have one, and of active or passive voice (can. 2342, 2nd).

3. Papal enclosure of women. a) Within the enclosure of nuns no one, of whatever class, condition, sex, or age, is to be admitted without license of the Holy See, except the persons who follow:

alpha) It is licit for the local Ordinary or regular Superior, when visiting a monastery of nuns, or for other Visitors delegated by them, to enter the enclosure only for the cause of inspection, care being taken that at least one cleric or religious man of mature age accompany them (can. 600, 1st).

The discussion concerns a local visitation. A personal visitation ought to be made at the grilles; nor is entrance into the enclosure admitted on the occasion of examining the will, election, clothing, or profession.[3] beta) The confessor, or one who acts in his place, can, with due precautions, enter the enclosure to administer the Sacraments to the sick or to assist the dying (can. 600, 2nd).

gamma) Those who actually hold the supreme rule of peoples and their wives with their retinue can enter the enclosure; likewise Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church (can. 600, 3rd).[4] delta) It belongs to the Abbess, with due precautions used, to permit entrance to physicians, surgeons, and others whose work is necessary, after at least habitual approval has first been obtained from the local Ordinary;[5] but if necessity is urgent and there is no time to ask approval, this is presumed by law (can. 600, 4th).

b) It is licit for no nun after profession to leave the monastery, even for a short time, under whatever pretext, without a special indult of the Holy See, except in the case of imminent danger of death or another most grave evil (can. 601, § 1).[6] This danger, if there is time, must be recognized by the local Ordinary (can. 601, § 2). These things also regard novices and postulants (n. 1226; can. 540, § 3).[7]

c) Those violating the enclosure of nuns, of whatever class or condition or sex they may be, by entering their monasteries without legitimate license, and likewise those introducing or admitting them, are punished ipso facto by an excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See; but if they are clerics, besides this they are suspended for a time to be determined by the Ordinary according to the gravity of the fault (can. 2342, 1st). Likewise nuns unlawfully leaving enclosure contrary to the prescription of can. 601 incur ipso facto an excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See (can. 2342, 3rd); concerning can. 601, see what was said under b.

[1] Pontifical Commission, 1 March 1921, under III (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1921, p. 178).

[2] Therefore not only queens, but also wives of a president of a republic and wives of a prince actually reigning, provided that either they themselves or their husband actually hold the rule of peoples (Fanfani, n. 234).

[3] Instruction on the enclosure of nuns of solemn vows, 6 February 1924, under III, 2nd (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1924, p. 96).

[4] Cf. note 1.

[5] Habitual approval is usefully sought once a year.

[6] Cf. the cited Instruction, under III, 1st.

[7] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Religious, 7 November 1916.

1262 IV. Minor enclosure. 1. Also in houses of religious Congregations, whether of pontifical or diocesan right, enclosure is to be observed, into which no one of the other sex is to be admitted except those of whom in can. 598, § 2 and can. 600,[1] and others whom the Superiors have judged can be admitted for just and reasonable causes (can. 604, § 1).

2. The prescription of can. 599 is also to be applied to houses of religious Congregations, whether of men or of women (can. 604, § 2).

3. In peculiar circumstances, and when grave causes intervene, the Bishop can fortify this enclosure with censures, unless there is question of an exempt clerical religion; he should always take care that it is rightly observed and that whatever vice creeps into it is corrected (can. 604, § 3).

[1] Cf. n. 1262.

1263 V. Communication with outsiders. 1. All those to whom the custody of enclosure belongs should watch diligently lest, when outsiders visit, discipline be disturbed by useless conversation and the religious spirit suffer detriment (can. 605).

2. Religious Superiors should take care that those things which are prescribed in their own constitutions, either concerning the going out of subjects from the cloisters or concerning outsiders to be received or approached, are accurately observed (can. 606, § 1).

3. Without prejudice to the prescriptions in can. 621-624, it is not permitted to Superiors to allow subjects to live outside a house of their own religion, except for a grave and just cause and for as brief a time as can be done according to the constitutions; but for an absence which exceeds six months, unless the cause of studies intervenes, permission of the Apostolic See is always required (can. 606, § 2).

4. Abbesses and local Ordinaries should watch seriously lest religious women, outside the case of necessity, go outside the house alone (can. 607).

1264 VI. Obligation of choir and Mass. 1. In religions, whether of men or of women, which have the obligation of choir,[1] in individual houses where there are at least four religious bound to choir and actually not legitimately impeded, and even fewer if the constitutions so provide, the divine office must be performed in common daily according to the norm of the constitutions (can. 610, § 1).

2. Likewise Mass corresponding to the office of the day must be celebrated daily according to the rubrics in religions of men and also, as far as can be done, in religions of women (can. 610, § 2).[2]

3. In the same religions, whether of men or of women, the solemnly professed who have been absent from choir, except lay brothers, must recite the canonical hours privately (can. 610, § 3).

[1] A canonical obligation is understood, which is not had unless solemn vows are in fact emitted.

[2] A conventual Mass must also be celebrated in houses of religious women having simple vows, who by constitutions approved by the Holy See have the obligation of choir (Pontifical Commission, 20 May 1923).

1265 VII. Communication of letters. All religious, whether men or women, can freely send letters, subject to inspection by no one, to the Holy See and its Legate in the nation, to the Cardinal Protector, to their own major Superiors, to the Superior of the house who is perhaps absent, to the local Ordinary to whom they are subject, and, if there is question of nuns who are under the jurisdiction of regulars, also to the major Superiors of the Order; and from all these the aforesaid religious, men or women, can likewise receive letters to be inspected by no one (can. 611).

1266 VIII. Observance of ecclesiastical decrees. 1. Every Superior must promote among his subjects knowledge and execution of decrees of the Holy See which regard religious (can. 509, § 1).

2. Local Superiors should take care that, at least once a year, on fixed days, the decrees which the Holy See prescribes to be read publicly are publicly read (can. 509, § 2, 1st).

1267 IX. Help to be furnished to Ordinaries and the secular clergy. 1. Superiors should take care that religious subjects designated by them, especially in the diocese in which they live, when their ministry is required by local Ordinaries or parish priests for providing for the people's necessity, willingly furnish it both within and outside their own churches or public oratories, with religious discipline preserved (can. 608, § 1).

2. In turn, local Ordinaries and parish priests should willingly use the work of religious, especially of those living in the diocese, in the sacred ministry and especially in administering the sacrament of penance (can. 608, § 2).

3. Besides the prescription of can. 1345,[1] if the local Ordinary for a public cause indicates the ringing of bells, certain prayers, or sacred solemnities, all religious, even exempt ones, must obey, with the constitutions and privileges of each religion preserved (can. 612).

[1] The cited canon states: It is desirable that in Masses which, with the faithful present, are celebrated on feast days of precept in all churches or public oratories, a brief explanation of the Gospel or of some part of Christian doctrine be made; but if the local Ordinary has prescribed it, having given opportune instructions, not only priests of the secular clergy are held by this law, but also religious, even exempt ones, in their own churches.

Scholion. On the Privileges of Religious 1268 I. Religious, even lay religious and novices, enjoy the privileges of clerics (can. 614); but concerning these there was discussion in n. 1153.

II. Moreover regulars, novices not excluded,[1] whether men or women, with their houses and churches, except those nuns who are not subject to regular Superiors, are exempt from the jurisdiction of the local Ordinary, except in cases expressed by law (can. 615). Nevertheless a house that is not formed remains under the special vigilance of the local Ordinary, who, if abuses have crept in and have been a scandal to the faithful, can provide in the meantime by himself (can. 617, § 2).

III. Religions of simple vows do not enjoy the privilege of exemption unless it has been specially granted to them (can. 618, § 1), as it has been granted to the Redemptorists and Passionists.

[1] Postulants are excluded.

Colophon (Volume I)

Bruges, printed by Les Presses Gruuthuuse, on the street called Gruuthuuse.

Alphabetical Index to Volume I

A Abbot: An Abbot nullius comes under the name of Ordinary and local Ordinary, 183, notes 1 and 2.

Abjection: Excessive abjection of oneself is opposed to humility, 456.

Abomination: Hatred of abomination: of God, 520; of neighbor, 542.

Abortion: Notion, 733; division, 734; morality of direct abortion, 735, 1; of indirect abortion, ibid., 2; whether the priest must always instruct, ibid., note 1; penalties against the crime of abortion, 736.

Abrogation of law: Notion, 174; person competent to abrogate, 175; modes of abrogating, 176.

Abstinence: Notion, 435; object, 436; opposed vices, 437; Law of abstinence, 1093; object, 1094; subject, 1095; obligation, 1096; excusing causes, 1097; dispensation, 1098.

Acceleration of birth: 739.

Acceptance: To what extent acceptance of a law is necessary for inducing obligation, 148, 4, 3; Acceptance of propositions condemned with a note inferior to heresy, 493; Acceptance of persons, 1047.

Accession: Notion, 803; modes, 804.

Accuser: 1139.

Acedia: Notion, 327; morality, 328; daughters, 329; remedies, 330.

Acta Apostolicae Sedis: Laws of the Apostolic See are promulgated in it, 91, III.

Action française: A prohibited association, 509, corollary III.

Actions: Buying and selling of shares, 904; as to clerics, 1188.

Actor: Notion, 1139.

Adjuration: An act of religion, 387; notion, 695; division, 696; morality, 697; beings to be adjured, 698; requisites for the licitness of adjuration, 699; adjuration of a demon, 700.

Administration: Notion, 1241; independent administration of one's own goods is opposed to the vow of poverty, 1237, 1241.

Administrator: Apostolic: he can make particular laws, 107.

Admission: To the novitiate, 1224.

Adoration: Notion, 588.

Adornment: Adornment of women, 551, 10.

Adulation: Notion, 415.

Adulteration: Of merchandise, 898.

Adultery: Restitution on account of adultery, 1042-1045.

Advertence: Condition of mortal sin, 280; and of venial sin, 287.

Advocate: His duties, 1141; to what extent he must help the poor gratuitously, 535, corollary I.

Affability: It is opposed to modesty of conduct, 462.

Affability: Potential part of justice, 384; notion, 413; object, 414; opposed vices, 415.

Affection: Notion, 33; affection of the present age, 312.

Age: For ecclesiastical laws, 127; for the law of confession, 1105; of communion, 1109.

Aggressor: Unjust: it is lawful to repel an aggressor against life, even by killing, with the proper conditions in place, 743; the same holds for other grave goods, except honor and reputation, 744; the same holds for aggression against the life and grave goods of one's neighbor, 745; whether there is an obligation of defending ourselves, 743, or our neighbor, 746; whether the killing is direct or indirect, ibid..

Aid: Aid to be furnished by ordinary religious and clergy, 1267.

Alcoholism: 320.

Aleatory: Aleatory contracts, 941-956.

Alienation: Of relics, 631; of ecclesiastical things, 973, 974.

Alluvion: 804.

Alms: Notion, 531; obligation, 532; further determination of the obligation, 533; quantity of alms, 534; manner of fulfilling the obligation, 535.

Alphonsus, St.: His authority, 215; how he expresses his judgment on the value of opinions, ibid.; he rejected probabilism and approved equiprobabilism, 232, II, III.

Ambition: Daughter of pride, 303; opposed to magnanimity, 422.

Anger: Notion, 323; morality, 324; daughters, 325; remedies, 326.

Animals: Occupation of animals, 791-793.

Animation of the fetus: 732, 735.

Antecedent: Ignorance, 31, 3; concupiscence, 38, 39.

Apostasy: Notion, 492.

Apostate: Notion, 492; to what extent he must be denounced, 501; penalties, 502; absolution from penalties, 503.

Apostolic Prefect: He can issue particular laws, 107; he comes under the name of local Ordinary, 183, note.

Apostolic Signatura: Its office, 109.

Architect: To what extent it is lawful for them to build non-Catholic churches, 557.

Art: Medical art forbidden to clerics, 1176.

Artificial hair: 1164.

Assistance: At the sacred rites, sermons, funerals, and nuptials of non-Catholics, 500, 4; at spiritistic meetings, 605, corollary II.

Association: Which associations are recommended, 509; which it is illicit to join, 509, corollaries I, II, III; how great a sin one commits who enrolls in them, 509, corollary IV.

Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary: Feast of precept, 701.

Attention: In prayer, 583; in hearing Mass, 702; in reciting the divine office, 1191.

Auction: 901.

Author: To what extent he has a right in the fruit of his intellect, 766, VI.

Authority: Of St. Thomas, 215, IV; of St. Alphonsus, ibid..

Avarice: Notion, 305; morality, 306; daughters, 307; remedies, 308; opposed to liberality, 412.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

B Bad writings: Cooperation in them, 558.

Bakers: Sometimes servile work is permitted to them on a feast day, 707, I.

Baptized persons: They are subject to the authority of the Church, 119; to what extent heretics are bound by the laws of the Church, 129; those doubtfully baptized, 130.

Beating: Of an innocent person, 740, IV, V; of a malefactor: to whom it is lawful, 742.

Beatitude: Beatitudes, 482.

Benefice: Obligation of spending the superfluous revenues of a benefice for pious uses, 781; notion, 1204; division, 1205.

Beneficiary: Duties of beneficiaries, 1206; of pastors, 1208; of assistants to the pastor, 1209, 1210.

Birth: Acceleration of birth: notion, 733; liceity, 739.

Bishop: He can make particular laws, 107; what laws he interprets, 139; his power of dispensing, 183; habitual faculties granted to bishops, 202; whose vows he can irritate, 662, 4; suspend, 667, 4, and dispense, 671, 2, 681; whose oaths, 690, 3.

Blasphemy: Notion, 634; division, 635; morality, 636; diverse locutions, 637; duty of the confessor, 638.

Blood relatives: Their duties toward each other, 716.

Boasting: Notion and morality, 296, 297, 303.

Boldness: Passion, 35.

Book: Cooperation in bad books, 558; what it is, as distinct from other writings, 1114.

Bourse / burse: Stock-exchange gaming, 954-956.

Boy: Their subjection to natural law, 124; to divine positive law, 126; to ecclesiastical law, 126, corollary II, 127; annual confession, 1105; Paschal Communion, 1109.

Breast: Baring of the breast, 551, 10.

Broker: 902.

Butcher: Their work is sometimes permitted on Sunday, 707, I.

Buying and selling: Notion, etc., 892-897; obligations of the seller, 898; obligations of the buyer, 899; by auction, 900, 901; through a broker, 902; of shares, 904; of ecclesiastical goods, 905.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

C Calumny: Notion, 1066, 1067; morality, 1068; restitution on account of calumny, 1071-1074; one hearing calumny, 1075.

Cardinal virtues: Notion, 369, 2; number, ibid..

Cartel: 903.

Castration: It is illicit for preserving sweetness of voice, 526, corollary I; for the purpose of preventing conception, 526, corollary II.

Cause: Efficient cause: notion and distinction, 57. What is required so that an evil effect be imputed, to how much fault, and when, 60; under what conditions it is lawful to place an act with a good and an evil effect, ibid. - It is lawful to posit a cause exempting from law, 136; how an excusing cause differs from an exempting cause, 168; whether it is lawful to posit a cause excusing from law, 171; Causes of sins: immediate, 258; mediate, external: the world, 259; the devil, 260; internal: culpable ignorance, 261; concupiscence, 262; sluggishness, 263; malice, 264.

Celibacy: 1165-1169.

Cemetery: Sacred place, 615; when its violation is local sacrilege, 616.

Censor of books: His nomination and office, 1116.

Censorship of books: General matters, 1113, 1114; prescriptions of the law, 1115; nomination and office of censors, 1116; grant of permission to publish a book, 1117.

Census: Censual contract: notion, 925; division, 926; morality, 927.

Certitude: Notion and division, 215; for acting licitly there is required certitude strictly so called concerning the honesty of the action, 220; one who is not certain is bound to inquire into the truth, 221; manner of inquiring into the truth, 222 sq.

Cessation of law: Cessation from within and from without, in universal and in particular, 172; cessation because of the cessation of the end of the law, 173.

Cession of forum: 1025.

Cession of goods: 1024.

Chapter: General: its legislative power, 107; power of invalidating vows, 662, 4.

Character: Notion and formation of it, 50.

Charity: In order that a human act be good, it is not required that it be elicited from a motive of charity, 243; Virtue: notion, 363; object, 364; subject, 365; properties of charity, 366; whether its act is necessary by necessity of means, 517; efficacy of an act of charity, 518; when the precept of charity toward God obliges, 519; sins against charity toward God, 520; Charity toward oneself: it is commanded, 521; it obliges one to care for salvation, both spiritual and bodily, 522; sins opposed to charity toward oneself, 523-526; Charity toward neighbor: an internal act is commanded, 529, I; when it obliges, ibid.; external acts are commanded, 529, II; sins opposed to charity toward neighbor, 542-570; Order of charity between God and creature, 571; between ourselves and neighbors, 572; among neighbors, 573.

Chastity: Virtue: notion, 441; object, 442; division, 443; opposed vices, 444; Chastity of clerics, 1161; Vow of chastity: notion, 1249; effect, 1250; obligation, 1251; penalties, 1252.

Chastity: 443, note.

Children: Their duties of love, reverence, and obedience toward parents, 709; whether children are bound to obey parents in the choice of a state of life, 711; or to ask counsel and consent, ibid. - Ownership of children, 778; thefts of children, 1028, 3.

Chloroform: Use of chloroform, 528, I.

Choice: Of state of life and profession, 711; obligation of choosing, 728; election of Superiors, 1258.

Choir: Recitation of the divine office in choir, 1198-1202, 1264.

Christian: 119.

Christian law: What it is and when it began to oblige, 90.

Cinematographic exhibitions: 551, 5.

Circumcision: To what extent it is false worship, 591.

Circumstances: Notion, 67; enumeration of circumstances, 68; morality from circumstance, 69.

Clause: Meaning of the principal clauses in declarations of the Sacred Congregations, 112.

Clemency: Notion, 450; object, 451; opposed vices, 452.

Cleric: He is not subject to laws which are opposed to his privileges, 134, 1132, 1153; Ownership of clerics, 780. Duties of clerics: notion, 1150; ascription of a cleric to some diocese, 1151; rights, 1152; privileges, 1153; reduction to the lay state, 1154-1156; duties generally, 1157; positive duties, 1158-1164; celibacy, 1165-1169; negative duties, 1170-1186; buying and selling shares, 1187, 1188.

Cloister: Papal cloister, 1261; minor cloister, 1262.

Coachman: Transport to a concubine or to a brothel, 564.

Code: Of Canon Law, 94.

Coeducation: 715.

Cohabitation: With suspect persons is forbidden to clerics, 1161.

Collation: Collation of goods, to which heirs are bound, 817; Evening collation permitted on fast days, 1099, 3.

Colonization: Right of colonization, 764, IV.

Command: It is formally an act of reason, 72.

Commanded: by accident they increase the morality of the internal act, 61.

Commercial trading: Notion, 1184; its prohibition to clerics, ibid..

Commixture: 804.

Commodatum: Contract, 881-883.

Common life: Notion, 1246-1248.

Communication: Communication of privileges, 199; danger to faith, 508.

Communication: Communication of religious with outsiders, 1263; communication of letters of religious, 1265.

Communion: Easter Communion, 1108-1111; frequent and daily Communion, 1259.

Commutation: Commutation of a vow, 673-677; commutation of a reserved vow, 681; commutation of an oath, 690, 4.

Companion: Recitation of the Divine Office with a companion, 1203.

Compensation: System of compensation, 225; Legal compensation, 1018; occult compensation, 1033.

Compromise: Contract, 958.

Concealment of faith: To what extent it is lawful, 496.

Conception: Animation of the fetus, 732.

Concomitant: Ignorance, 31.

Concupiscence: Notion, 37; division, 38; influence on the free act, 39; cause of sin, 262.

Condition: In contracts, 847-849.

Condominium: 779.

Condonation: Of restitution, 1017.

Confession: How incomplete acts are to be confessed, 254, 4; Annual confession, 1104-1107.

Confessor: Let him strive to remove penitents from venial sins, 292; a regular confessor can dispense in vows and oaths in which a bishop dispenses, 671, c, 681.

Conformity: Of the human will with the divine will, 245.

Conscience: Notion, 216, 217; division, 218; perplexed conscience, ibid.; directive force of conscience, 219; for acting licitly a certain conscience is required, 220; how it is acquired, 221, 222; strict and lax conscience, 238.

Conscription: Military, 1059 sq.

Consent: In contracts: qualities of consent, 834; obstacles, 835; error, 836, 837; fear, 838-840.

Consenting party: 1001.

Consistorial: Congregation: its competence, 109.

Consumption: Opposed to magnificence, 425.

Contempt: Notion and morality, 283, VI.

Contention: Notion and morality, 569.

Contract: Notion and division, 828, 829; subject of contract, 830, 831; object, 832, 833; intrinsic form or consent, 833; qualities of consent, 834; obstacles, 835; error, 836, 837; fear, 838-840; lesion of contract, 841, 842; extrinsic form, 843, 844; effects, 845, 846; effects of a qualified contract, 847-858; contract invalid by civil law, 859-861; Aleatory contracts, 941-956; Subsidiary contracts, 959-972.

Contradiction: Liberty of contradiction, 22.

Contrariety: Liberty of contrariety, 23.

Convalidation: Convalidation of invalid profession, 1232.

Cooperation: Notion, 554; division, 555; morality, 556; cooperation in non-Catholic worship, 557; in bad books, newspapers, etc., 558; in dangerous amusements, 559; selling or renting a house to prostitutes, 560; throwing an illicit work onto another, 561; painting dangerous images, 562; making immodest feminine adornment, 563; cooperation of servants, 564; of workmen and merchants, 565; of tavernkeepers, 566.

Cooperator: In injustice: modes of cooperating, 997; conditions for a positive cooperator to be bound to restore, 998; conditions for a negative cooperator to be bound to restore, 1005.

Cooperator vicar: His offices and rights, 1210.

Correction: Fraternal: notion, 536; obligation of correcting, 537; conditions of grave obligation, 538; manner of correcting, 539; denunciation of the delinquent, 539, corollaries I and II; manner of proceeding by the Superior to whom denunciation has been made, 539, corollary III; obligation of parents toward children, 713, 3.

Corrupter: When he must be denounced, 539, corollary I.

Council: Ecumenical: it can make universal laws, 107; plenary and provincial councils, their legislative power, 107.

Council: Sacred Congregation of the Council: what part of affairs is committed to it, 109.

Counsel: Notion, 211; existence of counsels, 212; obligation of following counsel, 213.

Craftiness: 376, 2, b.

Craftsmen: Their cooperation in sin, 565.

Craniotomy: Morality, 737.

Crapulence: Notion and morality, 319.

Crass: Ignorance, 31.

Cremation of bodies: 1126-1129.

Cruelty: Opposed to clemency, 452.

Curia: Constitution of the Roman Curia, 109; its juridic competence, 110; its acts, 111; meaning of the principal clauses, 112.

Curiosity: Opposed to studiousness, 459.

Custom: Acquired habit: notion, 44; division, 45; influence on the free act, 46; concerning those who resist a habit, ibid.; concerning good habits to be induced at a tender age, 47; Custom as law: notion, 191; division, 192; efficacy, 193; requisites for a custom to be efficacious, 194; cessation of custom, 195.

Cutting wood in another's forest: 1028, corollary II.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

D Dairy foods: On days of fast, 1094.

Damager: Conditions for him to be bound to restore, 993-995; doubtful damager, 1008; whether in mere damaging absolutely grave matter must be admitted, 1034.

Dances: Cooperation in them, 559.

Danger: Law founded on common danger: its notion and obligation, 151, 152.

Death: Whether it is lawful to wish death for oneself, 524.

Debt: Prescription of debts, 809-811.

Debtor: What if he cannot satisfy all creditors, 1012, 1013; what in doubt whether he has paid, 1020.

Decalogue: Precepts of the Decalogue, and their order or connection, 574.

Decision: Of the Holy See and of the Sacred Congregations: how they are distinguished, 493; to what extent account must be taken of them, ibid..

Decrees: Of the Roman Curia, 111.

Defect: To be manifested in sale, 898.

Defendant: Obligations and rights, 1142-1145.

Defilement: Restitution because of defilement, 1040, 1041; whether she can expel semen, ibid..

Delay of payment: Juridic, 1023.

Deliberation: for sin, 247.

Delight: It is not lawful to act for delight alone, 243; spiritual-sensible, ibid.; sensible, ibid.; venereal, ibid.; venereal twofold: complete and incomplete, ibid. What if someone has himself passively with respect to venereal commotion, 63, corollary III.

Delivery: Of a thing sold, 894.

Dementia: Praecox, 54; paralytic, 54; influence on liberty, 54, corollary.

Denial of faith: 497, 499, 500.

Denunciation: Evangelical, 539; how the Superior must proceed after an evangelical denunciation has been made, 539, corollary III; Judicial denunciation, 1140; obligation of the confessor with respect to the penitent who must denounce, 423-425.

Deposit: Contract, 877-879.

Deputy: His duties, 729; obligation to restitution, ibid., corollary I.

Derision: Notion, 1084; modes, 1085; morality, 1086.

Derivative: Derived modes of acquiring rights, 788.

Derogation of law: Notion, 174; person competent to derogate, 175; modes of derogating, 176.

Desire: As passion, 35; As act: notion and division, 296.

Despair: Notion, division, morality, causes, remedies, 514.

Desuetude: To what extent it abrogates law, 194.

Detraction: Notion and division, 1066, 1067; morality, 1068; excusing causes, 1070; restitution on account of detraction, 1071-1074; one hearing detraction, 1075.

Devastation: Of a hostile region, 751, V.

Devil: External cause of sin, 260.

Devotion: Act of religion, 387; notion, 577; causes, 578; effect, 579; Exercises of devotion to be commended to religious, 1259.

Dinner: On days of fasting, 1099.

Disciple: Duties, 725.

Discipline: Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments: its duties, 109.

Discord: Notion and morality, 568.

Disinheritance: Whether it is lawful for parents to disinherit children, 814, corollary II.

Disobedience: Daughter of pride, 303; opposed to piety, 396, and to observance, 400, 3.

Dispensation: Dispensation of law: notion, 178; laws capable of dispensation, 179; power of dispensing: notion, 181; division, 182; active subject, 183; passive subject, 184; causes of dispensing: final, impulsive, 185; necessity of a just cause, 186; diverse just causes, 187; dispensation is granted when the act has truly and manifestly been posited, 188; interpretation of dispensation, 189; its cessation, 190; Dispensation of a vow, 668-672, 681; Dispensation of an oath, 690, 4.

Disposition: Notion and division, 49.

Disputation: With non-Catholics, 510, III.

Dissimulation of faith: 498, 499, 500.

Distance: What distance excuses from hearing Mass, 704, 2.

Distraction: In prayer, 587; in hearing Mass, 702, 5; in reciting the divine office, 1191, 5.

Distribution: Of the goods of a society, 1046, 1047; of offices, 1048.

Divination: 600.

Divine Office: Notion, 1189; matter to be recited, 1190; time and manner of reciting, 1191; subject of the precept, 1192; obligation, 1193; excusing causes, 1194-1196; dispensation, 1197; choral recitation, 1198-1202, 1264; recitation with a companion, 1203.

Doctrine: Duty of parents, 713, 3.

Domicile: Notion, division, acquisition, effects, loss, 123.

Dominative: Power, 96.

Donation: Notion, 866; division, 867; capacity of giving, 868; capacity of acquiring from donation, 869; intrinsic form, 870; extrinsic form, 871; rescission, 872; Donation for a pious cause, 873-876.

Doubt: Positive and probable doubt: the Church supplies jurisdiction, 103; Notion and division of doubt, 215; one acting with practical doubt concerning the honesty of an action sins, 220, corollary III; In doubt one must stand for the validity of the act, 235.

Dowry: Of nuns, 1224, I, 3, d.

Drawing of lots: Contract of drawing lots, 952, 953.

Dream: How far one sins who gives credence to a dream, 600, corollary IV.

Dress: Dress of women, 551, 10.

Drunkenness: Notion, division, morality, 320; when it is lawful, 320, corollary I; whether it is lawful in order to avoid death which another threatens, ibid.; whether it is lawful to give another an occasion, or to induce another, to drunkenness, ibid.; how sins committed in drunkenness are imputed, ibid..

Duel: Notion, 747; division, 748; morality, 749; penalties, 750; to what extent an obligation of restitution follows from a duel, 1037, corollary I.

Dulia: Species of observance, 400, 576.

Duties: Of children toward parents, 709 sqq; of parents, 712 sqq; of blood relatives, 716; of spouses, 717; of masters, 719; of servants, 720; of employers, 722; of workers, 723; of teachers, 724; of students, 725; of rulers, 726; of subjects, 727; of electors, 728; of deputies, 729.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

E Earnest-money: 899.

Ecclesiastical garb: 1164.

Editors: Of depraved newspapers, etc., 558.

Education: The bodily and spiritual education of children is a grave duty of parents, 713.

Effection: 799-801.

Effects: Effects of sin: corruption of natural good, 265; liability to guilt, 266; liability to punishment, 267.

Eggs: They are permitted on days of abstinence, 1094; whether in the little supper on days of fasting, 1099, 3.

Electors: Their duties, 728; obligation to restitution, ibid., corollary II.

Elicited: morality properly so called belongs only to elicited acts, 61, corollary I.

Elision: Of probabilities, 215, III.

Emancipation: Of women, 718.

Embryotomy: 737.

Employers: What the relation is between employers and workers, 721; duties of an employer, 722.

End: End as source of morality: notion, 70; morality from the end, 71; The end to which a human act must be referred, 242, 2, 243.

Enemies: To what extent they can be killed in war, 751, V.

Enemy: Manner of acting with enemies, 544.

Envy: Notion, 313; morality, 314; daughters, 315; remedies, 316.

Epikeia: Notion, 142; laws which admit epikeia, 143; use of epikeia, 144; it differs from presumed license, ibid..

Epilepsy: Notion and influence on liberty, 54.

Equiprobabilism: Notion, 225; proof of its threefold proposition: 1. he who strictly doubts about the issuance of a law is not bound to observe it, 226-228; he who strictly doubts about the cessation or fulfillment of a law is bound to fulfill it, 229-231; he who holds it as more certainly probable that a law exists is bound to observe it, 232, 233.

Error: Notion, 31, 835; Jurisdiction in common error, 103; Error in a vow, 642; in contracts, 836, 837.

Eternal: Law: notion, 79; existence, 80; act of the eternal law, 81.

Eubulia: Potential part of prudence, 375, 2.

Eugenics: Eugenic theory to be rejected, 740, V.

Euthanasia: Notion and morality, 731, corollary II.

Eutrapelia: Notion, 463; object, 464; opposite vices, 465.

Eviction: Of a sold thing, 898, VII, 3.

Evil: There are acts evil by their nature, 63; to what extent it is lawful to advise a lesser evil, 552, 3.

Excardination: 1151.

Exchange: 938-940.

Excuse: Causes excusing from the obligation of law, 168-171.

Execution: Of a rescript, 209.

Exemption: Causes exempting from law, 136.

Exhibitionism: 55.

Exorcism: 700.

Expenses: Necessary, useful, luxurious, 985.

Exposure of life: 525.

Expropriation: 764.

Exsection of the ovaries: 526, corollary II.

Extraordinary things: There is no obligation to apply extraordinary means for preserving life, 522.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

F Factories: Mothers of families and those who are of infant age are not to be employed in factories, 722; care must be taken that in factories all things are done honorably, ibid..

Fairs: To what extent they are forbidden on feasts of precept, 705, 3.

Faith: Notion, 354, 487; division, 355; object, 356; subject, 357; properties of faith, 358; an act of faith is necessary for adults not justified by necessity of means, 488, I, and indeed an act of faith strictly so called, ibid., corollary II; in some way also for justified adults, ibid., II; what dogmas must be explicitly believed by necessity of means, ibid., III. The internal act of faith is necessary by necessity of precept, 489, I; what things must be explicitly believed by necessity of precept, ibid., II; when the internal act of faith obliges, ibid., III; the external act or profession of faith is sometimes prescribed, 490, I, either by reason of the precept of faith, ibid., II, 1, or by reason of the precept of another virtue, ibid., 2; concealment, 496; denial, 497; dissimulation of faith, 498; criterion for discerning denial and dissimulation of faith, 499, 500; dangers to faith, 504-509.

Falsification: Use of a false document in judgment, 1141.

Familiarity: With non-Catholics as a danger to faith, 507.

Fast: Law of fast, 1093; object, 1099; subject, 1100; obligation, 1101; excusing causes, 1102; dispensation, 1103.

Fat: It is not forbidden by the law of abstinence, 1094.

Father: He can irritate the vows of children, 662, 1; and suspend them, 667, 1; likewise oaths, 690, 3.

Fault: Juridic, 1009; to what one is bound who has caused damage with merely juridic fault, 1009.

Fear: Notion, 40; division, 41; influence on the free act, 42; Fear in a vow, 642, 3; in an oath, 688, 6; in contracts, 838-840.

Fear: Passion, 35.

Feast days: Local Ordinaries can appoint feast days, but only for the occasion, 701, 1; common feast days, 701, 2.

Feasts: Common feasts constituted by supreme authority, 701, II; how they are to be celebrated, ibid., IV.

Feebleness: Notion and influence on liberty, 51.

Female Superior: She can invalidate the vows of subjects, 662, 4; and suspend them, 667; likewise oaths, 690, 4.

Fetishism: 55.

Fetus: Killing of a fetus, 732-739. Cf. abortion, embryotomy.

Fiction: In an oath, 691-694; in a contract, 834.

Fideicommissum: 822.

Finder: Ownership of inventions, 766; finder of a treasure, 799; of a lost thing, 798.

Finding: Mode of acquiring ownership, 796, 798.

Fishing: Whether it is a servile work, 705, 5; force of the law which regulates the right and exercise of the right of fishing, 794.

Flatterer: Notion and obligations, 1002.

Flesh: Eating of human flesh, 319; what things come under the name of flesh in the law of abstinence, 1094.

Flight: In time of persecution, 500, 4.

Forbidden sects: 509, I; how far one who gives his name to them sins, ibid..

Forensic acts: They are prohibited on feasts of precept, 705, I.

Fortitude: Notion, 416; object, 417; its act, 418; parts of fortitude, 419-431.

Forum: Internal and external, 97.

Foundling homes: To what extent it is lawful to hand over an infant to a foundling home, 1041; whether expenses must be restored, ibid..

Fraud: Notion, 376, 2, d; in contracts, 837.

Fraud: Opposed to prudence, 376, 2; in contracts, 831.

Freemasons: It is unlawful to give one's name to their associations, 509.

Fruits: Of the Holy Spirit, 483; Temporal fruits, 799-801.

Fulfillment: For fulfilling an affirmative law the voluntary placing of the prescribed work suffices, 167; one can satisfy diverse precepts at the same time, and fulfill several precepts by one act, ibid. What concerning the time for fulfilling the obligation of law, ibid..

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

G Gain: Those who otherwise would omit an occasion of extraordinary gain are excused both from hearing Mass, 704, and from cessation from servile work, 707, 1.

Game: Contract, 947-949.

Gifts: Of the Holy Spirit: notion, 469; end, 470; number, 471; origin, 472; permanence, 473; excellence, 474; species of gifts: gift of wisdom, 475; of understanding, 476; of knowledge, 477; of counsel, 478; of piety, 479; of fortitude, 480; of fear of the Lord, 481.

Gluttony: Notion, 317; division, 318; gluttony strictly so called, 319; drunkenness, 320, cf. drunkenness; daughters, 321; remedies, 322.

Gnome: Potential part of prudence, 375, 2.

Good faith: Theological, 776; juridic, 808, IV.

Goodness: What moral goodness is, 61; what is required for an act to be morally good, 242; for it to be supernaturally good, 244.

Goods: Temporal goods necessary for life, necessary for one's state, superfluous, 530, II.

Gratitude: Potential part of justice, 384; notion, 404; object, 405; opposite vices, 406.

Gratuitous: Gratuitous contract, 829.

Greeting: Of an enemy, 529, II, 1; 544.

Guard: Of taxes, 1005, corollary III; of woods, etc., 1005, corollary III.

Guardian: Whether he can invalidate vows, 662.

H Habit: Notion, 333.

Hatred: Notion, 520; how great a sin hatred of God is, 520; hatred of neighbor, 542.

Hearer: One hearing detraction, 1075.

Heir: Obligation of a real vow passes to heirs, 649, 2, b. Cf. succession.

Heresy: Notion, division, morality, 492; loss of faith, ibid.; whether someone can bid farewell to the Catholic Church without formal sin against faith, ibid.; whether without any grave sin, ibid.; to what extent one sins who upholds propositions disapproved by a note lower than heresy, 493.

Heretics: Whether they are bound by ecclesiastical laws, 129; to what extent they must be denounced, 501; penalties of heretics, 502; absolution from penalties, 503.

Hiring-letting: Notion, 906; of things, 907-910; of ecclesiastical things, 911; Hiring of labor: notion, etc., 912-915; obligations of the lessor or hired person, 916; obligations of the hirer, 917; Letting of work, or contract for work to be performed: notion, 920; obligations of the undertaker, 921.

Historians: 1070.

Holiness: Requisites in clerics, 1157.

Holy Office, Sacred Congregation of the: It protects the doctrine of faith and morals, 109.

Homicide: Cf. killing. Restitution on account of homicide, 1035-1037.

Homosexuality: 55.

Honesty: Integral part of temperance, 445.

Honor: Notion, 1080; injury to it, 1081, 1082; restitution on account of injured honor, 1083.

Hope: Notion, 359; object, 360; subject, 361; properties, 362; act of hope necessary by necessity of means, 512; and of precept, 513; when it obliges, 513.

Human act: A human act considered according to its moral being: it is good, bad, or indifferent, 62; good act: requisites for an act to be morally good, 241-243, 244, 1; for it to be supernaturally good, 244, 2; for it to be meritorious de condigno, 244, 3; to what extent an indifferent act is given, 246; elicited and commanded acts of virtues, 337; forensic acts are forbidden on feasts of precept, 705, 1.

Humility: Notion, 454; object, 455; opposite vices, 456.

Hunting: Whether it is servile work, 705, 5; what hunting is prohibited to clerics, 1174.

Husband: He irritates the vows of his wife, 662, 3, and suspends them, 667, 2; likewise oaths, 690, 3; duties of a husband toward his wife, 717; whether he can ever beat his wife, 742, II, 3.

Hyperdulia: Species of observance, 400, 576.

Hypnotism: Notion, 602; morality, 603.

Hypocrisy: 303.

Hysteria: Notion and influence on liberty, 55.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

I Idiotism: Notion and influence on liberty, 51.

Idolatry: Notion, 592; division, 593; morality, 594.

Ignorance: Notion, 30; division, 31; influence on the free voluntary, 32; What sort of ignorance can exist regarding precepts of the natural law, 86; to what extent ignorance excuses from the irritation of law, 159; from obligation, 168; culpable ignorance as a cause of sin, 261; Ignorance in a vow, 642; in contracts, 836, 837.

Image: Very shameful images, 551, 5; worship of sacred images, 630.

Immodesty: Opposed to chastity, 444.

Immunity: Of clerics with respect to the judicial forum, 1153.

Impatience: 428.

Impeding another's good: To what extent it obliges to restitution, 996.

Impeding the more perfect thing: To what extent one sins who draws someone back from a more perfect thing, 567.

Imperfection: Notion and distinction, 331; morality, 213, 332.

Impotence: As a cause excusing from the obligation of law: its notion and division, 169; what impotence excuses, 170; it excuses from hearing Mass, 704; from abstinence, 1097; from fasting, 1102; from the divine office, 1194.

Imprisonment: Of an innocent person, 740, III, V.

Imprudence: 376.

Imputability: Notion, 58; imputability of acts, 59; of effects, 60.

In solidum: Obligation of restitution in solidum, 1006.

Inadvertence: What it is, 32, note.

Incardination: 1151.

Inconsideration: Opposed to synesis and gnome, 376; daughter of lust, 312.

Inconstancy: Daughter of lust, 312; opposed to prudence, 376.

Increase: Of virtues, 341.

Inculpable: Inculpable ignorance, 31.

Index: Congregation of the Index, 109, note; index of prohibited books, 1121.

Indifference: Liberty of indifference, 21; whether it is a species of morality, 62, 246.

Indifferent things: Indifferent act, 246.

Infamy: To what extent it excuses from a penalty to be observed, 164.

Infant: to what extent it is lawful to hand them over to a foundling home, 713; whether expenses must be restored, 1041.

Infidelity: Notion, division, morality, 491.

Inhabitant: Notion, 121.

Injury: In contracts, 841, 842.

Injustice: Notion, 976; division, 977; morality, 978.

Innominated: Innominated contract, 829.

Insanity: Notion, 52; species, 53, 54; influence on liberty, 54.

Insensibility: Opposed to patience, 428, and to temperance, 434.

Instruction: Of one who through ignorance is about to transgress a grave law, 540.

Insult: Notion, 1081; morality, 1082; restitution on account of insult, 1083.

Insurance: 941-945; life insurance, etc., 946.

Interest: Titles for demanding interest, 887.

Interpretation: Interpretation of law properly so called: notion, 137; division, 138; author of authentic interpretation, 139; the Supreme Pontiff interprets all laws, and divine natural and positive right, ibid.; force of interpretations, 140; rules of interpretations, 141.

Intimation: To what extent consent in contracts must be intimated to the other party, 834.

Investigation: Of a secret, 1090.

Invincible: Ignorance, 31, 32.

Invocation: Of God, 387; of a demon, 595.

Irascibility: Opposed to meekness, 449.

Irreligiosity: Opposed to religion, 308; species, 606.

Irreverence: Opposed to piety, 396.

Irritating: Irritating law: notion, 155; division, 156; power of issuing irritating laws, 157; its obligation, 158; causes excusing from irritation, 159.

Irritating law: Notion, 155; division, 156; power of issuing irritating laws, 157; obligation of an irritating law, 158; causes excusing from irritation, 159.

Irritation: Irritation of law, 177; of a vow, 656-662; of an oath, 690, 4.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

J Joy: Notion, 296; morality, 297; joy concerning an effect, concerning a bad act insofar as it was the cause of a good effect, 298, corollary I; concerning merely natural pollution, 298, corollary II.

Judge: Duties, 1130-1137; whether a cleric can be called into judgment, 1153.

Judgment: Rash, 1076, 1077.

Judicial: Judicial jurisdiction, 97.

Judicial accusation: Notion, 1139; on whom it is incumbent, ibid..

Juridical: Juridical fault: when it is present, 1009; whether he who inflicted damage with merely juridical fault is held to restitution, ibid..

Jurisdiction: Notion, differs from dominative power, 96; division, 97; acquisition of ordinary and delegated jurisdiction, 98; interpretation of jurisdiction, 99; its extension, 100, and cessation, 101; Supplied jurisdiction: notion, 102; when jurisdiction is supplied, 103; use of supplied jurisdiction, 104.

Jurors: Duties, 1138.

Justice: Notion, 377; object, 378; conditions required for justice, 379; commutative justice, 380, 756, 759; distributive, 381, 756, 1047, 1048; legal, 382, 756, 1049-1107; Integral parts of justice, 383; potential parts, 384-415.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

K Killing: Of oneself: direct, 523; indirect, 525; penalties for suicide, 527; Killing of one's neighbor: division, 730; of an innocent person, 731; killing of a malefactor, 741; of an unjust aggressor, 743-746.

Knowledge: How moral and casuistic knowledge differ from conscience, 217, corollary II.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

L Labor: Notion, 922; right of working, 923; obligation of working, 924.

Lactation: To what extent a mother is bound to nurse her offspring, 713.

Laparotomy: 737.

Lard: On days of abstinence, 1094.

Latria: 576.

Law: Definition, 73; what the acts of law are, 74; difference between law and precept and other things which bear the appearance of law, 74, 76; division of laws, 77, 79; eternal law, 79-81; natural law, 82-88; positive law taken generally, 89; divine, 90; ecclesiastical, 91; civil, 92; law of nations, 93; ecclesiastical right, 94; civil right, 95; Legislative power: in the Church: existence, 106; subject, 107; in the civil state: existence, 113; its derivation from God, 114; subject, 115; relation between ecclesiastical and civil power, 116; The object of law is external acts, 117, I; to what extent internal acts, 117, II; acts not repugnant to a higher law, 117, III; acts belonging to the competence of the legislator, 117, IV; morally possible acts, 117, V; acts necessary or very useful for the common good, 117, VI; Subject of law: generally: subject of natural law, 124; of the law of nations, 125; of positive law, 126; specifically: to what extent those not yet seven years old are subject, 127; the legislator, 128; heretics, 129; the doubtfully baptized, 130; pilgrims and vagabonds, 131; religious, 132; subject of civil law: to what extent a citizen staying in another territory is subject, 133; clerics, 134; the Supreme Pontiff, 135; Obligation of law: notion, 145; existence, 146; beginning, 147; quality or species, 148; quantity, 149; obligation of certain laws in species: affirmative and negative law, 150; law founded in common danger, 151; law founded in presumption, 152; dishonest law, 165, 166; fulfillment of the obligation: requisites for it, 167, I, II, III; time of fulfilling the obligation, 167, IV; causes excusing from the obligation: notion, 168; ignorance, ibid.; impotence: notion and division, 169; what impotence excuses, 170; placing of an excusing cause, 171.

Law of nations: Notion, 93; it is distinguished from law among nations, ibid..

Lax: Conscience, 239.

Laxism: 225.

Legacy: Notion, 823; rights of the legatee, 824; legacy for pious causes, 826.

Legislative: To whom legislative power belongs in the Church, 107; in the civil state, 115.

Legislative power: It exists among men, 105; in the Church: existence, 106; subject, 107; who can impose precepts, 108; in the civil state: existence, 113; its derivation from God, 114; subject, 115; relation between ecclesiastical and civil power, 116.

Legislator: Whether he is bound by his own law, 128.

Legitimate portion: 822, VI.

Leisure: Whether leisure to be avoided excuses from the law forbidding servile works, 707.

Lenity: Excessive lenity is opposed to clemency, 452.

Lesser evil: To what extent it is lawful to advise a lesser evil, 552, 3.

Liability: Of fault, 266; of penalty, 267.

Liberal works: What liberal works are, 705; they are permitted on feast days, ibid..

Liberalism: To what extent one sins who professes Liberalism, 494, 509.

Liberality: Potential part of justice, 384; notion, 410; object, 411; opposite vices, 412.

Liberty: Notion, 21; division, 22; existence, 23; extension, 24; acts which concur toward a deliberate act, 25; diverse acts of the will, considered by defect or degree of deliberation, 26; things which influence liberty, 27-56; consequence of liberty, 57-60.

License: What presumed license is, and when it is lawful to use it, 144; license differs from dispensation, 178.

Lie: Notion, 1062; division, 1063; morality, 1064.

Litanies: To be recited on the feast of St. Mark and on the three days of Rogations, 1190.

Little children: Their subjection to natural law, 124; to divine positive law, 126, corollary I; to ecclesiastical law, 126, corollary II, 127; they are capable of rights, 757.

Little morsel: On a day of fast, 1099, 2.

Little supper: Permitted on fast days, 1099, 3.

Loan: Contract of loan, 884-886; titles for demanding interest, 887; obligations of the borrower, 888.

Lost thing: Notion, 797; occupancy of a lost thing, 798.

Lost things: Their occupation, 797, 798.

Lots: Use of lots, 600.

Love: Passion, 35; love of self, daughter of luxury, 312.

Luxury: Opposed to modesty of attire, 468.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

M Maggi: Use on days of abstinence, 1094.

Magic: 601.

Magnanimity: Notion, 420; object, 421; opposite vices, 422.

Magnificence: Notion, 423; object, 424; opposite vices, 425.

Major Superior: The major Superior of an exempt clerical religion comes under the name of Ordinary, 183, note; who are included under the name of major Superiors, 1217.

Malefactor: The supreme authority in the commonwealth, and it alone, enjoys the power of killing a malefactor, 741; whether it is bound to use that power, ibid.; the same authority, and it alone, enjoys the power of mutilating, imprisoning, and beating a malefactor, 742.

Malefice: 601.

Malice: Cause of sin, 264.

Management of affairs: Contract, 937.

Management of another's affairs: Notion, etc., 937.

Mandatary: His obligations, 935.

Mandate: Contract: notion, 932; obligations of the mandator, 934; of the mandatary, 935; cessation of mandate, 936.

Mania: 53; influence on liberty, 54, corollary.

Manuscript: To what extent a religious has ownership of it, 1238, corollary VI.

Margarine: Its use on days of abstinence, 1094.

Marital power: With respect to vows, 662; with respect to the wife, 717; with respect to goods, 779.

Market: Public: to what extent it is forbidden on feasts of precept, 705, 2.

Martyrdom: Notion, 418, 1; conditions, 418, 2; effect, 418, 3.

Masochism: 55.

Masonic sect: Assistance at the burial of Masons, 500, 5; it is unlawful to give one's name to the Masonic sect, 509.

Mass: To be heard: object of the precept, 702; obligation, 703; excusing causes, 704. Cf. sacrifice of the Mass.

Master: He is presumed to command from a motive of obedience, 148; his duties toward servants, 719.

Matins: When it must be recited, 1191; whether before Mass, ibid..

Medicine: No one is bound to use very costly medicine, 522, corollary II.

Meditation: A remedy for sins, 269.

Medium: In spiritism, 604.

Meekness: Notion, 447; object, 448; opposite vices, 449.

Meetings: To assist at spiritistic meetings is gravely illicit, 604, corollary I.

Mental restriction: An oath with mental restriction, 685, 1; Notion, division, and morality, 1065.

Merchandise: Sale of merchandise mixed with cheaper merchandise, 898.

Merchants: Their cooperation in sin, 565.

Mercy: Corporal and spiritual works of mercy, 530, III.

Meritorious: Conditions in order that acts may be meritorious de condigno, 244.

Military service: Justice of the law, 1059; obligation of the law, 1060.

Minor: Notion, 120; obligations toward parents, 709-711; ownership of minors, 778.

Miracles: To what extent the feigning of miracles is a sin, 591; likewise the absolute petition of a miracle from God, 609, corollary.

Mission: Missions among non-Catholics, 510; concerning the obligation of betaking oneself to regions of unbelievers, 541; a mission to be instituted every tenth year in a parish, 1208, 6.

Mode: Modes of acquiring strict rights, 788; Mode added to a contract, 850.

Moderation: Moderation of blameless defense to be observed in defense of oneself or another, 743, 3.

Modernism: Who must emit the anti-modernist oath, 490, II.

Modesty: Potential part of temperance, 453; species, ibid..

Modesty of adornment: Notion, 466; object, 467; opposite vices, 468.

Modesty of manners: Notion, 460; object, 461; opposite vices, 462.

Mohatra: Or the threefold contract, 931, note.

Money: False money, even if received from a third party, cannot be given as a price, 899.

Money: It expresses the venal value of things, 895.

Monopoly: Notion, division, and morality, 903.

Moral person: Notion, 785; division, 786; diverse moral persons, 787.

Moral system: Notion of system, 223; state of the question, 224; different systems, 225; proof of the true system, that is, equiprobabilism, and refutation of objections, 226-233; the Code of Canon Law and the moral system, 234; sayings annexed to the moral system, 235; the question of the moral system is very practical, 236; use of the system as regards ourselves, penitents, and public direction, 237.

Moral virtues: Notion, 367; existence, 368; number, 369; subject of inherence, 370.

Morality: Notion, 61; to which acts it belongs, ibid.; division, 62; whether indifference is a species of morality, ibid.; sources, 64-71.

Morose delight: Notion, 293; morality, 294; morose delight in spouses, 295, corollary I; in widows, 295, corollary II; in betrothed persons, ibid.; morose delight concerning an act prohibited by positive law alone, 295, corollary III; concerning the manner in which a bad act was committed, 295, corollary IV; concerning the thought of a lustful act, 295, corollary V; concerning an object which is apt to excite venereal motions, 295, corollary VI.

Moroseness: Opposed to eutrapelia, 465.

Morphine: Use of morphine, 528, II.

Mortal: Existence of mortal sin, 277; nature, 278; division, 279; conditions, 280; effects, 281; criteria for discerning mortal sins, 282; when a sin venial of itself becomes mortal, 283.

Mortgage: Contract, 968-972.

Mosaic law: What it is and when it ceased, 90.

Most Holy Trinity: Whether explicit faith in the Most Holy Trinity is necessary by necessity of means for justification, 488, III.

Mother: Her power of irritating, 662, 2, and suspending the vows of children, 667, 1; and oaths, 690, 3; whether she herself is bound to nurse her offspring, 713.

Motion: First-first, second-first, and second, 26.

Mount of piety: 890.

Mutilation: Of oneself: notion, division, morality, 526; ecclesiastical penalties for mutilation, 527; of an innocent person, 740, I, II, V; mutilation of a malefactor: under what conditions it is lawful, 742; Restitution on account of mutilation, 1035-1037.

Mysteries: To be believed by necessity of means, 488, III; by necessity of precept, 489, II.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

N Name: Vain usurpation of the name of God, 634.

Narcotics: Use of them, 528.

Natural: natural law: notion, 82; existence, 83; object, 84; subject, 85; knowability, 86; mutability, 87; source of obligation, 88.

Necessity: Necessity of means, 484; of precept, 485; Necessity as indigence: extreme, grave, common, 530, I. Cf. almsgiving.

Negligence: Opposed to prudence, 376; and to studiosity, 459; and to modesty of adornment, 468.

Neurasthenia: Notion, 55.

Newspapers: Cooperation in bad newspapers, 558; whether it is lawful to subscribe to them, to advertise in them, to display them, ibid..

Non-Catholic school: In what different ways it can be harmful, 714, I; it is to be disapproved, even a neutral school, ibid., II; how far parents sin who send children to a non-Catholic school, ibid., III; nor is a school to be tolerated in which the teachers are not Catholics, ibid.; office of the confessor toward parents, ibid., corollary I; whether it is lawful to undertake the office of teacher or inspector in a non-Catholic school, ibid., corollary II.

Non-Catholics: Promoting the faith among non-Catholics, 510, 4.

Notary: His duties, 1149.

Notes: Lower than heresy, 493, 1; to what extent account must be taken of them, ibid., 2.

Novice: Instruction of novices, 1225; obligations, 1226; end of the novitiate, 1227.

Novitiate: Requisites in order that someone be admitted, 1224; end of the novitiate, 1227. Cf. novice.

Numerical: Numerical distinction of sins, 252-255.

Nuns: Who they are, 1217.

Nymphomania: Sexual abnormality, 55, 3.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

O Oath: Act of religion, 387; who must emit the anti-modernist oath, 490, II; notion of an oath, 682; division, 683; morality, 684; conditions: truth, judgment, justice, 685; Promissory oath: notion, 686; division, 687; requisites for validity, 688; effects, 689; cessation, 690; Fictitious oath: notion, 691; morality, 692; obligation, 693; what kind of sin a promissory oath is when made without the intention of fulfilling what was sworn or of obliging oneself, 694.

Obedience: Virtue: notion, 400, 3; object, ibid.; opposite vices, ibid. - Obedience of children, 710, 711; of a wife, 717; of servants, 720; of students, 725; of citizens, 727; of clerics, 1159; Vow, 1253-1255; in doubt one must obey, 1253, corollary II.

Object of a human act: Notion, 65; morality from the object, 66.

Obligation of law: Notion, 145; existence of obligation, 146; generally also in doubt whether the Superior, by commanding, exceeds his power, ibid. Beginning of the obligation of laws issued by the Apostolic See, by the Bishop, and by civil power, 148; sometimes the legislator is judged not to urge his law, ibid.; quality or species of obligation, 148; quantity of obligation, 149; whence a grave obligation is discerned, ibid. - Obligation of affirmative and negative law, 150; of law founded on common danger, 152; founded on presumption, 154; of invalidating law, 158; of penal law, 164; of dishonest law, 165, 166; What is required in order that the obligation of a law be fulfilled, 167.

Obligations: To what extent the purchase and sale of obligations is lawful for clerics, 1188.

Oblivion: Notion and influence on the voluntary, 32.

Obreption: In the petition of a rescript, 206.

Observance: Virtue: potential part of justice, 384; notion, 397; object, 398; opposite vices, 399; species of observance, 400, cf. dulia, hyperdulia, obedience; Superstitious observance: notion, 595; signs for discerning it, 596; morality, 597; penalties, 598; species, 599-601, cf. divination, vain observance.

Obsession: Exorcism over the obsessed, 700.

Obstinacy: Daughter of pride, 303; opposed to perseverance, 431.

Occupation: Notion, 789; title of ownership, 790; of animals, 791-794; of treasure, 795, 796; of lost things, 797, 798.

Of an innocent person: Direct killing of an innocent person is lawful only by the authority of God, 731, I, II; indirect killing is sometimes lawful, ibid., III; whether an innocent person can ever be handed over to enemies, ibid., II; mutilation, imprisonment, beating of an innocent person, 740.

Old person: Exempt from the law of fasting, 1100.

Omission: Of self-preservation, 524.

One commanding: Cooperator: notion, 999; damages to be repaired, ibid..

Onerous: Onerous contract, 829.

Oophorectomy: Its morality, 526 and 526, corollary II; whether authority licitly imposes it, 740, V, 742, I.

Opinion: Notion, 215; one opining truly has cognition, 215, corollary I; an opinion certainly more probable will commonly be notably probable or certain in a broad sense, 215, corollary II.

Oratory: In which places satisfaction is made to the precept of hearing Mass, 702, 6.

Ordinary: Ordinary jurisdiction: notion, 97; how it is acquired, 98; to what extent it can be delegated to another, ibid..

Ordinary: Who come under the name of Ordinary, and likewise of local Ordinary, 183, note.

Organ: To play an organ in a church of non-Catholics, 557, 5.

Orientals: The Code of Canon Law does not bind the Orientals, 126; an Oriental cannot be admitted into Latin religious institutes without written permission of the Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Church, 1224.

Originative: Originative titles of acquiring rights, 788.

Outsiders: To what extent they are subject to the civil laws of the territory in which they are staying, 133, II.

Ovaries: To what extent extirpation of the ovaries is lawful, 526, corollary II.

Ownership: Notion, 760; division, 761; legitimacy, 762; necessity, 763; eminent ownership, 764; object of ownership, 765; ownership of oneself, 766; of reputation and honor, ibid.; of goods of fortune, ibid.; of the fruit of the intellect, ibid..

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

P Pact: Pact of buying back a sold thing, 900.

Painters: With respect to scandal, 551, 5; whether it is lawful to paint on feast days, 705, 5.

Painting with a needle: Whether it is servile work, 705.

Paranoia: Notion, 53; influence on liberty, 54, corollary.

Parents: They are presumed to command from the motive of obedience, 148; their duties toward children, of love and of bodily and spiritual education, 712, 713; whether they can beat their children, 742, II, 3.

Parish: Notion, 1207.

Participant: Notion, 1004; damages to be repaired by him, 1005; to what extent it is lawful, in order to avoid one's own damage, to cooperate in an act causing damage, ibid..

Parvificence: Opposed to magnificence, 423.

Paschal: Paschal Communion, 1108-1111.

Passion: Notion, 33; eliciting principle, 34; enumeration of the passions, 35; influence on the free act, 36; whether the passions must be positively resisted, 43.

Pastor: He can dispense in a particular case in laws concerning the observance of feast days, fasting, and abstinence, 183; notion, 1207; duties, 1208.

Paternal power: With respect to vows, 662; with respect to children, 709, 710.

Patience: Notion, 426; object, 427; opposite vices, 428.

Peculium: 1247.

Penal law: Notion and division, 160; power of issuing purely penal laws, 161; existence of purely penal laws, 162; criterion for discerning them, 163; obligation of penal law, 164.

Penance: Virtue: potential part of justice, 384; notion, 389; object, 390; subject, 391; necessity, 392; opposite vices, 393. Cf. acts of penance, Sacrament of Penance.

Peptones: Which are forbidden on days of abstinence, 1094.

Perfection: Perfection to be pursued by religious, 1235, 1236.

Perjury: 685.

Perplexed: Conscience, 218.

Perseverance: Notion, 429; object, 430; opposite vices, 431.

Person of full age: Notion, 120.

Pharmacist: It is lawful for him on feast days to provide necessities for the sick, 707.

Photography: Whether it is a servile work, 705.

Physical violence: Notion, 27; division, 28; influence on the free voluntary, 29.

Physician: His duties, 1148; to what extent he must give assistance gratis to the poor, 535, corollary I; the medical art is forbidden to clerics, 1176.

Piety: Potential part of justice, 384; notion, 394; object, 395; opposite vices, 396; to what extent piety permits servile works, 707, 3; duties of piety of children, 709 sqq; of blood relatives among themselves, 716.

Pious cause: Notion, 826; governance of a testament and legacy for a pious cause, ibid.; capacity for making a will for a pious cause, ibid.; mode of making a will for a pious cause, ibid.; execution of pious wills, ibid.; change of last wills, ibid..

Place: Of origin of a child, 122; sacred places, 615.

Planting: 804.

Plays: Notably shameful plays as cause of scandal, 551, 4; cooperation in them, 559.

Pledge: Contract of pledge, 964-967.

Plurality: Of objects multiplies sins, 255.

Pontiff: He can issue universal laws, 107; he is immune from civil jurisdiction, 135; he interprets all laws, 139; whether in divine law, 183; what vows he can irritate, 662, 4; suspend, 667, 4; and dispense from, 671; what oaths, 690, 3.

Positive: Positive law: notion and necessity, 89; divine, 90; ecclesiastical, 91; civil, 92.

Possession: In doubts of conscience, 229, III; In matter of justice: notion, 775; division, 776; effect, 777.

Possessor in bad faith: Notion, 776; to what the possessor of another's thing is bound, 986-990.

Possessor in doubtful faith: Notion, 776; to what the possessor of another's thing is bound, 991, 992.

Possessor in good faith: Notion, 776; to what the possessor of another's thing is bound, 983-985.

Postulancy: Necessity and mode, 1223.

Poverty: To what extent it suspends the obligation of making restitution, 1021.

Praise: Notion, 632; utility and modes, 633.

Prayer: Act of religion, 387; notion, 580; meditative prayer, 581; deprecatory prayer: notion, 582; division, 583; object, 584; morality, 585, where also concerning necessity of means and of precept, concerning the time when the precept obliges, and concerning the persons for whom one must pray; efficacy, 586; conditions, 587.

Prayers: Morning and evening, 585.

Preaching: To non-Catholics, 510, IV.

Precarium: Contract, 881-883.

Precept: How it differs from law, 75; who can impose precepts, 108; from what motive they are issued, 148; Precepts of the Church, 1092.

Precepts of the Decalogue: What they are, 574, I; what connection there is among them, 574, II.

Precipitation: Opposed to eubulia, 376; effect of lust, 312.

Pregnant women: To what extent they are excused from the law of abstinence, 1097; and of fasting, 1102.

Prescription: Notion, etc., 805-807; acquisitive, 808; liberative, 809, 810; for ecclesiastical goods, 811.

Preservation of oneself: To be procured by ordinary means, 522.

Presumption: Law founded on presumption: its notion and obligation, 153, 154; Whether a presumed dispensation is valid, 188; Vice: daughter of pride, 303; opposed to magnanimity, 422; Sin against hope: notion, morality, causes, remedies, 515.

Price: Notion and division, 895; just price, 895, 3; for a thing already owed to another, 832; for an evil action, 833.

Pride: Notion, 300; division, 301; morality, 302; daughters of pride, 303; remedies, 304; it is opposed to humility, 456.

Primitive: Primitive modes of acquiring rights, 788.

Printers: Their cooperation, 558.

Printing of bad books: Cooperation in it, 558.

Prison: To what extent it is lawful to incarcerate an innocent person, 740; a guilty person, 742.

Privilege: Notion, 196; division, 197; author of a privilege, 198; modes of acquiring a privilege, 199; interpretation of a privilege, 200; its use, 201; cessation, 202; privileges granted orally by the Holy See, 202, note 1; faculties granted, 202, note 2; Privileges of clerics, 1153; Privileges of religious, 1268.

Privilege of forum: 1153.

Privilege of the canon: 1153.

Probabiliorism: Notion, 225; it is refuted, 226-228.

Probabilism: Notion, 225; it is refuted, 229-233.

Probability: Notion and division, 215, IV.

Prodigality: Opposed to liberality, 308, 412.

Profession: Profession of faith: its obligation by force of divine precept, 490; by force of ecclesiastical precept, ibid. - Religious profession: requisites for validity, 1228; temporary profession to be premised to perpetual, 1229; effects, 1231; convalidation of invalid profession, 1232; profession in danger of death, 1233.

Propaganda Fide (Congregation): Congregation: its office and jurisdiction, 109.

Prohibition of books: General matters, 1113, 1114; power of prohibiting books, 1118; effect of prohibition, 1119; books prohibited by the law itself, 1120; books prohibited by particular decree, 1121; exemption from the law, 1122; license to use prohibited books, 1123, 1124; penal sanctions, 1125.

Promise: Notion, 862; division, 863; obligation, 864; cessation, 865.

Promissory: Oath, 686 sq.

Promulgation: Notion, necessity, mode of promulgating laws, 73, 6; promulgation of divine positive law, 90; of ecclesiastical law, 91; of civil law, 92.

Propagation of faith: To whom it belongs, 510, 541, III.

Proposition: Propositions disapproved with a note lower than heresy, 493.

Prostitute: To what extent it is lawful to sell a house to prostitutes, 560.

Protectorates: It differs from colonization, 764.

Providence: Providence of life, food, and state is required for bodily education, 713, 2.

Prudence: How it differs from conscience, 217, corollary II; notion, 371; object, 372; acts of prudence, 373; its connection with the remaining moral virtues, 374; its parts, 375; opposite vices, 376.

Psychasthenia: Notion and influence on liberty, 55, II.

Psychic abnormalities: 51-56.

Psychogenic reactions: 56.

Psychopathies: Notion, 55.

Psychoses: Endogenous, 53; exogenous, 54; influence on liberty, 54, corollary.

Pubescent person: Who he is, 120.

Public: Public worship, 576; public prayer, 583.

Puncture: Puncture of the heart, 731; of the membranes of the fetus, 735, corollary II.

Purpose: Notion and division, 296; morality, 297.

Pusillanimity: Opposed to magnanimity, 422.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

Q Quasi-domicile: Notion, division, acquisition, effects, loss, 123.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

R Rash: Rash judgment, 1076, 1077.

Reading: Danger to faith from impious writings, 504.

Rebellion: It is unlawful, 727, corollary I; nevertheless it is lawful by parliamentary means to strive toward one's own republic, ibid., corollary II.

Receiver: 1003.

Recitation: Choral recitation of the Divine Office, 1198-1202.

Reconciliation: With enemies, 544, V.

Reduction: Of a cleric to the lay state, 1154-1156.

Reflex principles: 223, 235.

Regular prelate: He enjoys dominative power, 96; likewise jurisdiction even for the external forum, 108; he can impose precepts, ibid.; he is presumed to command from the motive of obedience, 148; he enjoys the power of dispensing from ecclesiastical laws, 183; of irritating vows, 662, 4; and oaths, 690, 4; of suspending the same, 667, 5; what things must be attended to in the election of regular Prelates, 1258.

Regulars: Who they are, 1217.

Relics: Their cult, custody, exposition, and alienation, 631; one who makes false relics, etc., incurs excommunication, ibid..

Religion: Virtue: a potential part of justice, 384; notion, 385; object, 386; acts of religion, 387; opposed sins, 388; Religious society: how simony can be committed on the occasion of entrance into religion, 626, 4; notion, 1215; division, 1216; Vocation to religion: notion, 1219; necessity, 1220; signs, 1221; obligation of following a vocation, 1222.

Religious: The Congregation set over the affairs of religious members: its office, 109.

Religious habit: 1260.

Religious house: 1217.

Religious order: Notion, 1216.

Religious person: How far he is subject to ordinary laws, 132; he is not subject to a civil law which is opposed to his privileges, 134; Ownership of religious, 782-784; who are included under the name of religious, 1217; Duties of religious, 1234-1267; privileges, 1268.

Religious poverty: Notion of the vow of poverty, 1237; remote material object, 1238; proximate object, 1239, 1240; division, 1244; obligation, 1245. See common life.

Religious province: 1217.

Religious state: Notion, 1211; end, 1212; institution, 1213; excellence, 1214.

Remedies: Remedies for sins: flight from occasions, 268; meditation, 269; exercise of penance and virtues, 270; reception of the sacraments and prayer, 271, 272.

Reparation of scandal: Obligation and mode, 553.

Reputation: Notion, 1065; its defense, 744; injury to it, 1068, 1069; causes excusing injury, 1070; restitution on account of injured reputation, 1071-1074.

Rescripts: Notion, 203; division, 204; obtaining a rescript, 205; requisites for validity, 206; the time at which rescripts have effect, 207; their interpretation, 208; execution, 209; revocation, 210.

Residence: Of a parish priest, 1208.

Resistance: How far there is an obligation of positively resisting the passions, 43.

Restitution: Notion, 979; obligation, 980; titles, 981; measure and order of making restitution, 1006, 1007; to whom restitution must be made: in general, 1010; in doubt, 1011; in the case in which satisfaction cannot be made to all, 1012; time of restitution, 1014; place, 1015; mode, 1016; causes extinguishing the obligation, 1017-1020, and suspending it, 1021, 1022; Restitution because of damage in goods of fortune, 1034; because of injury to goods of the body, 1035-1037; because of injury to goods of the soul, 1038, 1039; because of injury to goods of chastity, 1040-1045; because of injury to reputation, honor, secrecy, and truth, 1045.

Retraction: How far retraction of a mandate excuses from the obligation of making restitution, 999, III; of counsel, 1000, III; Retraction of detraction, 1073.

Returning a greeting: An enemy, 529, II, 1; 544.

Right: Ecclesiastical, 94; civil, 95; notion, division, source, and subject of right, 757.

Right of asylum: 616.

Ring: To which clerics it is granted, 1164, 3.

Risk of principal: Title for demanding interest, 887.

Rite: Congregation of Sacred Rites: its offices, 109.

Robbery: 1027.

Roman Congregations: Offices of the several congregations, 110; their juridic competence, 110; doctrinal and disciplinary acts, 111.

Root: Of the specific distinction of sins, 250; of the numerical distinction of sins, 253 sqq.

Rule: Observance of rules: obligation, 1256; interpretation, 1257; consequences for Superiors and electors of Superiors, 1258.

Ruler: Duties toward subjects, 726; whether it is lawful to depose a legitimate ruler who is nevertheless a tyrant, 727, question 2.

Rusticity: It is opposed to modesty of manners, 462.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

S Sacred: Sacred person, 613; sacred place, 615; sacred thing, 617.

Sacred Penitentiary: Its office, 109.

Sacred person: 613.

Sacred place: Notion, 615.

Sacred Roman Rota: Its office, 109.

Sacred thing: 617.

Sacred things: What they are, 617.

Sacred vessels: Real sacrilege which is committed by using them for profane use, 618.

Sacred vestments: Sacrilege committed by using them for profane use, 618.

Sacrifice: Act of religion, 387.

Sacrilege: Notion, 610; its lowest species, 611; morality, 612; by what acts personal sacrilege is committed, 614; local, 616; real, 618; penalties, 619.

Sadism: 55.

Sadness: Passion, 35.

Safer part: In which doubts the safer part must be followed, 224.

Saints: Their cult, 629.

Sale: Of things serving sin, 558, 4; 565; of another's thing, 894; of a thing already sold, 894; selling one thing for another, or merchandise mixed with poorer merchandise, 898. Cf. buying and selling.

Salvatorism: 601, corollary IV.

Sanctification: the determination both of the time and of the mode belongs to ecclesiastical law, 701.

Savings bank: 891.

Scandal: Notion, 546; division, 547; morality, 548; causes excusing from scandal, 549; resolutions, 550-552; reparation of scandal, 553.

Schism: Notion and morality, 570.

Schismatics: Penalties against schismatics, 502; absolution from penalties, 503. Cf. heretics.

Schizophrenia: Notion, 54; influence on liberty, 54, corollary.

Scruple: Notion, 240; signs of a scrupulous conscience, causes, harms, remedies for scruples, ibid.; lawfulness and obligation of acting against scruples, ibid.; confessor of a scrupulous person, ibid..

Sculptors: As regards scandal, 551, 5; whether it is lawful to sculpt on feast days, 705, 5.

Scurrility: It is opposed to eutrapelia, 465.

Secret: Notion, 1087; division, 1088; obligation, 1089; investigation, 1090; use, 1091. Cf. sacramental seal.

Semi-deliberate: Semi-deliberate act, 26; it does not induce an obligation of restitution, 995.

Sentence: How a judicial sentence differs from law, 76.

Sequestration: Contract, 880.

Sermon: Whether it is lawful to attend the sermons of heretics, 500, 4, c.

Servants: Cooperation of servants, 564; their duties toward their master, 720; those not preventing damage to the master, 1005, corollary IV; thefts of servants, 1028.

Service: Contract of rendering certain services, 919.

Servile things: Servile works, 705; they are prohibited on feasts of precept, ibid..

Servitude: Personal: how far it is lawful, 766, V; Real, 772-774.

Settlement: Contract, 957.

Sexual abnormalities: 55, 3.

Sexual erethism: Mutilations lawful for preventing sexual erethism, 526, corollary III.

Shamefacedness: Integral part of temperance, 445.

Signs: Common and relatively common signs of charity, 530, II; how far they are to be shown, ibid..

Simony: Notion, 620; division, 621; morality, 622; various cases immune from simony, 623; simony of divine law, 624; of ecclesiastical law, 625; doubtful cases, 626; effects of simony, 627; established penalties, 628.

Simple desire: Notion, 296; morality, 297.

Simulation: It is opposed to truth, 403.

Sin: Nature, 247; conditions of formal sin, 248; specific distinction of sins: notion, 249; root, 250; norms determining specific distinction, 251; numerical distinction: notion, 252; its roots: plurality of acts, 254; and of objects, 255; unequal gravity of sins, 256, 257; Causes of sin, 258-264, cf. cause; Effects of sin, 265-267, cf. effects; Remedies of sin, 268-272, cf. remedies; Classes of sinners, 273-274; sin of commission and omission, 275, 276; mortal sin, 277-283, cf. mortal; venial sin, 284-292, cf. venial; internal sins, 293-298, cf. morose delectation, simple desire, purpose; capital sins, 299, cf. pride, avarice, lust, envy, gluttony, anger, sloth.

Singing: its usefulness, 633, II.

Sleeping: It impedes hearing Mass, 703, corollary II.

Sobriety: Notion, 438; object, 439; opposed vices, 440.

Social: Social justice, 756. Obligation of certain social laws, 1061.

Socialism: How far one sins who professes socialism, 495, 509.

Society: Contract of society, 928-931. Cf. association.

Softness: Opposed to perseverance, 431.

Sojourner: Notion, 121.

Solemn vow: 1218.

Solemnity: Transfer of the solemnity of a feast, 701, II, 3; Solemnity of vows, 1218.

Solemnity of vows: 1218.

Somnambulism: 601, corollary III.

Soul: When the infusion of the soul takes place, 732.

Sources: Of morality, 64-71. Cf. morality.

Specification: Title of ownership, 802.

Spiritism: Notion, 604; morality, 605.

Sponsion: Contract, 950, 951.

Sponsor: His obligations, 721.

Spontaneous: 18.

Spouses: Power of the husband to irritate the vows of his wife, 662; power of suspending the vows of one's spouse, 667; duties of spouses, 717; ownership of spouses, 779.

St. Thomas: His authority, 215; philosophy and theology are to be handed down according to the mind of St. Thomas, 724, 3.

Stain: Of mortal and venial sin, 266.

State of life: How far children are bound to obey parents in the choice of a state of life, 711.

Statues: Obscene, 551, 5.

Stock-market games: 954-956.

Stole fees: 780.

Strikes: 916.

Striking: Of clerics is sacrilege, 614.

Studies of clerics: 1160.

Studiosity: Notion, 457; object, 458; opposed vices, 459.

Subdelegation: Of jurisdiction, 98. Cf. jurisdiction.

Subject: Compelled to work on Sunday, 707, I.

Subjection: How far subjection to declarations of the Supreme Pontiff or of a Roman Congregation is required, 493, 2, b.

Subreption: In seeking a favor, 206.

Subsequent: Concupiscence, 38, 39.

Substitution: In a testament, 822.

Succession: Hereditary: general matters, 812-817; testamentary, 818-832; legal or intestate, 825.

Succor: What is required in order that there be an obligation of assisting one's neighbor, 530, IV; what kind of obligation there is in the extreme, grave, and common necessity of one's neighbor, 533.

Suffrages: Offices of electors, 728; of deputies, 729.

Suicide: Direct suicide, 523; omission of self-preservation, 524; indirect suicide, 525; penalties, 527.

Superfluous things: Superfluous goods: notion, 530; what kind of obligation there is of assisting one's neighbor from superfluous goods, 533, 534, 763.

Superiors: Of religious: they enjoy dominative power, 96; they can impose precepts, 108; they are presumed to command from the motive of obedience, 148; they enjoy the power of invalidating vows, 662, 4, and oaths, 690, 4, and of suspending the same, 667, 5; Superiors of an exempt clerical religion, besides, enjoy the power of jurisdiction also for the external forum, 108; the power of dispensing from ecclesiastical laws, 183; from vows, 671; from oaths, 690, 4; what things must be attended to in the election of Superiors, 1258.

Superstition: Notion, 590; its species: vicious worship of God, 591; vicious worship of a creature, 592-605.

Supplying of jurisdiction: Notion, 102; when it is supplied, 103; when it is lawful to use supplied jurisdiction, 104. Cf.

Suretyship: Contract, 959-963.

Surgery: Forbidden to clerics, 1176.

Suspected of heresy: Who they are, 502; penalties, 502; absolution from penalties, 503.

Symbol: Of the Apostles: how far it must be believed and known, 489.

Synderesis: How it differs from conscience, 217, corollary II.

Synesis: Potential part of prudence, 375, 2; notion, ibid..

Synod: In a diocesan synod the sole legislator is the Bishop, 107.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

T Tailor: Sometimes servile work is permitted to him on a feast day, 707, 1; what is lawful for a tailor who buys cloths for a client, 902, corollary IV.

Tavernkeeper: Their cooperation in sin, 566.

Taxes: Notion, 1051; division, 1052; requisites for the justice of tax law, 1053; obligation, 1054; a doubtfully just law, 1055; Inheritance tax, 1056-1058.

Teachers: Their duties, 724; in handing on doctrine they remain subject to legitimate authority, ibid., 3.

Temperament: Notion and division, 48.

Temperance: Notion, 432; object, 433; opposed vices, 434.

Temples: How far it is lawful to build temples of non-Catholics, 557, 3.

Temptation of God: Notion, 607; division, 608; morality, 609.

Testament: Notion, 818; division, 819; capacity for making a testament, 820; capacity for acquiring from a testament, 821; form, 822; testament for pious causes, 826.

Testimonials: To be brought for the novitiate, 1224.

The dead: To what extent the dead must be assisted, 541, III.

The insane: Their subjection to natural law, 124; to positive divine law, 126, corollary I; to ecclesiastical law, 126, corollary II, 127; they are capable of rights, 757.

The poor: To what extent they can work on feast days, 707; whether it is lawful to work for them on feast days, ibid.; whether a found thing, when the owner is unknown, is to be assigned to the poor, 798; whether, when the owner is unknown, restitution is to be made to them, 1011.

Theatrical spectacles: Cooperation in them, 559.

Theft: Notion, 1026; division, 1027; morality, 1028; of spouses, 1028; of children of the family, ibid.; of servants, ibid.; of religious, ibid. - Small thefts, 1029-1030; Causes excusing the taking away of another's thing, 1032, 1033.

Thefts of domestic servants: 1028, c.

Theological conclusion: Whether one who denies a theological conclusion is a heretic, 492, corollary II.

Theological virtues: Notion, 352; number, 353.

Theosophy: It is illicit to give one's name to theosophical societies, 509.

Those under puberty: Who they are, 120.

Tightrope walkers: 525.

Time: What time it is commonly lawful to follow, 167, IV; in the celebration of feasts, 701, III.

Title: For prescription, 808, III; titles of restitution, 981.

To ask: It is lawful from a just cause to ask for something which another will furnish with sin, 552, 2.

To grind: Whether it is lawful on feast days, 705, 5.

To paint: A work not forbidden on feasts of precept, 705, 5.

To permit: It is lawful for a just cause to permit an occasion of sin, 552, 1.

To persuade: How far it is lawful to persuade to a lesser evil, 552.

To wish: Whether it is lawful to wish death for oneself, 524, question II; it is lawful in an ordered way to wish evil to one's neighbor, 542.

To write: It is lawful on feast days of precept, 705, 5.

Tonsure: 1164.

Transfer: From religion to religion, 1216.

Traveler: Notion, 121; generally he is not bound by particular laws, 131; everywhere he is bound by personal precepts, ibid..

Treasure: Notion, 795; occupancy, 796.

Treasury: How restitution must be made to the treasury, 1016. Cf. tribute.

Tribunals: What they are, and what their offices are, 109.

Triple contract: Notion, 931.

Truth: Potential part of justice, 384; notion, 401; object, 402; opposed vices, 403.

Turning tables: 601, V.

Tutiorism: Absolute and mitigated, 225.

Type: Asocial - criminal, 55.

Tyrant: Whether it is lawful to depose a tyrant, 727, question 2; to kill him, 741, corollary II.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

U Unbelievers: They are not subject to ecclesiastical laws, 126; use of garments and insignia proper to unbelievers, 500; propagation of the faith among unbelievers, 510.

Uncertain things: To whom uncertain goods are to be restored, 1011.

Unilateral: Unilateral contract, 829.

Use: As a right, 771.

Usufruct: Notion, 767; acquisition, 768; rights and burdens of the usufructuary, 769; cessation, 770.

Usurper: Whether it is lawful to kill a usurper, 727, question 1.

Usury: Notion, 887; obligation and penalties of usurers, 889.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

V Vacancy: Vacancy of law, 147, note 2.

Vagabond: Who he is, 121; his pastor or Ordinary, 123; he is bound by the laws of the territory in which he is staying, 131; likewise by personal prescriptions, ibid. - Marriage of vagabonds.

Vain observance: Notion, 601; applications, ibid..

Vainglory: Notion and morality, 303.

Vainglory: Opposed to magnanimity, 422.

Vasectomy: Notion, 526, note; how far it is lawful, 526, corollary II; whether authority can impose it, 740, 742.

Venial: Existence of venial sins, 284; nature, 285; division, 286; conditions, 287; effects, 288; when a mortal sin becomes venial by accident, 289; multiplied venials, 290-292.

Versions of Sacred Scripture: 1115, 8.

Vicar Apostolic: Can make particular laws, 107; comes under the name of local Ordinary, 183, note.

Vicar Capitular: Comes under the name of Ordinary, 183, note.

Vigilance: Office of parents, 713, 3.

Vincible: Ignorance, 31, 32.

Vindication: Potential part of justice, 384; notion, 407; object, 408; opposed vices, 409.

Virtually: Acts of virtues can be elicited formally and virtually, 486.

Virtue: Notion, 334; object, 335; division, 336; specific distinction, 337; subject of inherence, 338; origin of natural virtues, 339; of supernatural virtues, 340; increase, 341; diminution, 342; destruction, 343; permanence of virtues in the blessed, 344; in the damned, 345; in souls being purified, 346; being in the mean of virtues, 347; mutual connection of virtues, 348; inequality of virtues, 349; relation between natural and supernatural virtues, 350, 351.

Vocation: To religion: notion, 1219; necessity, 1220; signs, 1221; obligation of following it, 1222.

Vomiting: Whether it is a grave sin to eat or drink up to vomiting, 319, corollary I.

Vow: Act of religion, 387; notion, 639; division, 640; morality, 641; requisites for a vow: on the part of the one vowing, 642; on the part of the thing promised, 643; Obligation of a vow: existence of the obligation, 644; subject, 645; object, 646; quality of the obligation, 647; its quantity, 648; fulfillment of the obligation as to time and mode, 649; obligation of a vow under a suspensive condition, of a penal vow, of a vow concerning another's act, 650; Cessation of a vow: lapse of time, 652; substantial change of matter, 653; defect of condition, 654, and of final cause, 655; invalidation, 656-662; suspension, 663-667; dispensation, 668-672; commutation, 673-677; Reserved vows: notion, 678; private and public vows reserved to the Holy See, 679; conditions of reservation, 680; cessation of a reserved vow, 681.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

W Wage: A just wage, 917.

War: Division, 751, I; morality, 751, II; to whom it belongs to declare war, 751, III; requisites for declaring war licitly, 751, IV; things lawful, prescribed, and prohibited in war, 751, V; who can be killed in a just war, ibid..

Warning: Of one who is in danger of sinning formally, 541.

Weakness of mind: Notion and influence on liberty, 151.

Whispering: Notion, 1078; morality, 1079.

Wife: Duties of a wife toward her husband, 717; ownership, 779; how far she can dispose of common goods, 779, I, corollary II; of goods proper to the husband, 779, II, corollary III.

Wild thing: Wild animals, 792; their occupation, 792, 793.

Willed: 18.

Witness: His obligations, 1146, 1147.

Woman: Emancipation of women, 718; whether a woman fifty years old is exempted from fasting, 1100.

Worker: What the relation is between workers and employer, 721; duties of workers, 723.

Works: Servile works: notion, 705, 5; they are forbidden on feasts of precept, 705; grave obligation, 706; excusing causes, 707; Liberal works, 705, 5; Common or intermediate works, 705, 5.

World: External cause of sin, 259.

Worship: Notion, 575; division, 576; worship of the heavenly citizens, 629; of images, 630; of relics, 631.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

" "Trust": 903.

The author's index, rendered with links to the paragraphs; † = reference corrected (see the edition note).

Synoptic Index (as printed)

- Treatise I. On the sacraments in general — p. 1
  - Dissertation I. On the sacraments considered in themselves — p. 1
    - Part I. On the summary notion, existence, essence, and division of the sacraments — p. 1
    - Part II. On the efficacy or productive power of the sacraments — p. 4
    - Part III. On the effects of the sacraments — p. 5
      - Section I. On grace — p. 5
      - Section II. On character — p. 6
        - Scholion. On the informity and reviviscence of the sacraments — p. 7
  - Dissertation II. On the ministration of the sacraments — p. 9
    - Part I. On the person ministering — p. 9
    - Part II. On the mode of ministering — p. 9
      - Section I. On the requisites for valid ministration — p. 9
        - Chapter I. On intention — p. 10
          - Scholion. On simulated ministration of a sacrament — p. 13
        - Chapter II. On other requisites — p. 15
      - Section II. On the requisites for licit ministration — p. 18
        - Scholion I. On the ministration of a doubtfully valid sacrament — p. 25
        - Scholion II. On the repetition of a sacrament doubtfully, or doubtfully validly, conferred — p. 26
      - Section III. On the obligation of ministering — p. 27
  - Dissertation III. On the reception of the sacraments — p. 29
    - Part I. On the person receiving — p. 29
    - Part II. On the mode of receiving a sacrament — p. 29
      - Section I. On the requisites for valid reception — p. 30
      - Section II. On the requisites for licit reception — p. 34
      - Appendix. On sacramentals — p. 37
- Treatise II. On Baptism — p. 40
  - Dissertation I. On Baptism considered in itself — p. 40
    - Part I. On the existence of the sacrament of Baptism — p. 40
    - Part II. On the essence of the sacrament of Baptism — p. 41

        - Section I. On remote matter — p. 41
        - Section II. On proximate matter — p. 43
        - Section III. On form — p. 45
    - Part III. On the effects of Baptism — p. 49
    - Part IV. On the necessity of Baptism — p. 50
        - Section I. On necessity of means — p. 50
            - Scholion I. On Baptism of desire — p. 50
            - Scholion II. On Baptism of blood — p. 51
        - Section II. On necessity of precept — p. 52
  - Dissertation II. On the ministration of Baptism — p. 53
    - Part I. On the person ministering — p. 53
    - Part II. On the mode of ministering Baptism — p. 55
        - Section I. On the rites and ceremonies of Baptism — p. 56
        - Section II. On sponsors — p. 58
        - Section III. On the time and place for conferring Baptism — p. 61
        - Section IV. On the annotation and proof of Baptism conferred — p. 62
  - Dissertation III. On the reception of Baptism — p. 63
    - Part I. On the person receiving — p. 63
        - Section I. On infants — p. 63
        - Section II. On aborted fetuses — p. 64
        - Section III. On fetuses not yet brought forth — p. 65
            - Scholion. On Caesarean section and other incisions — p. 67
        - Section IV. On monsters — p. 70
        - Section V. On infants of non-Catholics — p. 71
        - Section VI. On adults — p. 72
        - Section VII. On the insane and the furious — p. 74
            - Scholion. On those doubtfully baptized — p. 74
    - Part II. On the mode of receiving Baptism — p. 76
- Treatise III. On Confirmation — p. 78
  - Dissertation I. On Confirmation considered in itself — p. 78
    - Part I. On the existence of the sacrament of Confirmation — p. 78
    - Part II. On the essence of Confirmation — p. 78
        - Section I. On matter — p. 78
        - Section II. On form — p. 80
    - Part III. On the effects of Confirmation — p. 80
    - Part IV. On the necessity of Confirmation — p. 81
  - Dissertation II. On the ministration of Confirmation — p. 83

- Dissertation III. On the reception of Confirmation — p. 86

- Treatise IV. On the Most Holy Eucharist — p. 88
  - Dissertation I. On the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist — p. 88
    - Scholion I. On the custody of the Holy Eucharist — p. 91
    - Scholion II. On the worship of the Holy Eucharist — p. 94
  - Dissertation II. On the Most Holy Eucharist insofar as it is a sacrament — p. 97
    - Part I. On the Most Holy Sacrament considered in itself — p. 97
      - Section I. On the existence of the sacrament of the Eucharist — p. 97
      - Section II. On the essence of the sacrament of the Eucharist — p. 97
        - Chapter I. On remote matter — p. 98
          - Article I. On the matter of bread — p. 98
          - Article II. On the matter of wine — p. 101
          - Scholion. On a defect of valid or certainly valid matter detected in Mass — p. 104
        - Chapter II. On form — p. 105
      - Section III. On the effects of the sacrament of the Eucharist — p. 107
      - Section IV. On the necessity of the sacrament of the Eucharist — p. 109
        - Chapter I. On necessity of means — p. 109
        - Chapter II. On necessity of divine precept — p. 110
    - Part II. On the ministration of the Most Holy Sacrament — p. 112
      - Section I. On the confection of the Most Holy Sacrament — p. 112
      - Section II. On the dispensing of the Most Holy Sacrament — p. 118
        - Chapter I. On the person dispensing — p. 118
        - Chapter II. On the things to be observed in dispensing the Holy Eucharist — p. 121
          - Article I. On the time of dispensing the Holy Eucharist — p. 122
          - Article II. On the place of dispensing the Holy Eucharist — p. 123
          - Article III. On the mode of dispensing the Holy Eucharist — p. 124
          - Article IV. On the mode of carrying the Holy Eucharist to the sick — p. 125
    - Part III. On the reception of the Most Holy Sacrament — p. 127
      - Section I. On the notion and division of reception of the Holy Eucharist — p. 127
      - Section II. On the person receiving — p. 128
      - Section III. On the mode of receiving — p. 133
        - Chapter I. On the disposition of the soul — p. 133
          - Scholion. On frequent and daily Communion — p. 137
        - Chapter II. On the disposition of the body — p. 140

- Dissertation III. On the Most Holy Eucharist insofar as it is a sacrifice — p. 147
  - Part I. On the Sacrifice of the Mass considered in itself — p. 149
    - Section I. On the existence and essence of the sacrifice of the Mass — p. 149
    - Section II. On the efficacy and effects of the sacrifice of the Mass — p. 150

- Part II. On the offering of the sacrifice of the Mass — p. 156
  - Section I. On the person offering — p. 156
  - Section II. On the obligation of offering — p. 157
    - Chapter I. On the obligation by reason of Order received — p. 157
    - Chapter II. On the obligation by reason of office — p. 158
    - Chapter III. On the obligation by reason of precept or promise — p. 162
    - Chapter IV. On the obligation by reason of stipend — p. 162
      - Article I. On the stipend considered in itself — p. 162
      - Article II. On the acceptance of stipends and on the obligation arising from it — p. 165
      - Article III. On the distribution and transmission of Masses — p. 169
      - Article IV. On abuses to be avoided in accepting stipends — p. 172
      - Article V. On the cautions of the law — p. 172
      - Scholion I. On pious foundations — p. 173
      - Scholion II. On several Masses offered on the same day — p. 176
  - Section III. On the things to be observed in the offering of Mass — p. 178
    - Chapter I. On the disposition of the offerer — p. 178
    - Chapter II. On the place of offering — p. 180
    - Chapter III. On the time of offering — p. 184
    - Chapter IV. On the rite of offering — p. 187
      - Article I. On the altar and its adornment — p. 187
      - Article II. On sacred vessels with accessories — p. 191
      - Article III. On sacred vestments, etc. — p. 194
      - Article IV. On rubrics to be observed — p. 197
      - Scholion. On defects to be corrected both in the dispensing of the Holy Eucharist and in the offering of Mass — p. 202

- Treatise V. On Penance — p. 204
  - Dissertation I. On the act of doing penance — p. 204
    - Part I. On the notion of the act of doing penance — p. 204
      - Scholion. On the virtue of penance — p. 205
    - Part II. On the necessity of the act of doing penance — p. 206
    - Part III. On the effects of the act of doing penance — p. 208
      - Section I. On the remission of mortal sins — p. 208
      - Section II. On the conferral of sanctifying grace — p. 209
      - Section III. On the remission of venial sins — p. 209
      - Section IV. On the remission of punishment — p. 211
      - Section V. On the reviviscence of merits — p. 212
  - Dissertation II. On the sacrament of Penance — p. 213

- Part I. On the sacrament of Penance considered in itself — p. 215
  - Section I. On the existence of the sacrament of Penance — p. 215
  - Section II. On the essence of the sacrament of Penance — p. 216
    - Chapter I. On remote matter — p. 218
    - Chapter II. On proximate matter — p. 219
      - Article I. On contrition — p. 220
      - § I. On contrition taken integrally — p. 220
      - § II. On purpose specifically — p. 230
      - Scholion. Sorrow and purpose with respect to venial sins — p. 232
      - Article II. On confession — p. 232
      - § I. On confession considered in itself — p. 233
      - § II. On the qualities of confession generally — p. 236
      - § III. On the quality of integrity specifically — p. 238
      - Point I. On the notion, division, and necessity of integrity — p. 238
      - Point II. On the scope of material integrity — p. 239
      - Scholion. On injury to truth in confessing — p. 248
      - Point III. On causes excusing from material integrity — p. 249
      - Point IV. On the means of procuring integrity, or on examination of conscience — p. 253
      - Scholion I. On confessions to be repeated in general — p. 253
      - Scholion II. On general confession — p. 256

- Treatise V. On Penance, continued
  - Dissertation II. On the sacrament of Penance, continued
    - Part I. On the sacrament of Penance considered in itself, continued
      - Section II. On the essence of the sacrament of Penance, continued
        - Chapter II. On proximate matter, continued
          - Article II. On confession, continued
          - Scholion III. On venial sins to be confessed and on doubtful matter alone confessed — p. 257
        - Chapter III. On form, or on absolution — p. 258
        - Chapter IV. On the integral part, or on satisfaction — p. 263
          - Article I. On the notion and efficacy of satisfaction — p. 263
          - Article II. On the power and obligation of imposing satisfaction — p. 264
          - Scholion. On the commutation of satisfaction — p. 270
          - Article III. On the obligation of accepting and fulfilling satisfaction — p. 272
      - Section III. On the effects of the sacrament of Penance — p. 275
      - Section IV. On the necessity of the sacrament of Penance — p. 276
    - Part II. On the ministration of the sacrament of Penance — p. 277

- Section I. On the ministration of Penance generally — p. 277
  - Chapter I. On the required power — p. 277
    - Article I. On sacramental jurisdiction generally — p. 277
    - Article II. On sacramental jurisdiction over certain classes of persons specifically — p. 281
    - Scholion. On confessors to be deputed for religious — p. 287
    - I. A clerical religion of men — p. 287
    - II. A lay religion of men — p. 288
    - III. A religion of women — p. 289
    - IV. A society of both men and women living in community without vows — p. 291
    - Article III. On the limitation of jurisdiction with respect to sins, or on the reservation of sins — p. 291
    - Scholion. On supplied sacramental jurisdiction — p. 298
  - Chapter II. On the right use of the power — p. 299
    - Article I. On things to be observed in confession — p. 299
    - § I. On the office of questioning — p. 300
    - § II. On the office of instructing — p. 304
    - § III. On the office of judging sins — p. 306
    - § IV. On the office of judging and promoting disposition — p. 306
    - § V. On the office of providing for amendment of life — p. 309
    - § VI. On the office of rendering sentence — p. 309
    - Article II. On things to be avoided in confession — p. 313
    - § I. On inquiry into the name of the accomplice — p. 313
    - § II. On absolution of an accomplice — p. 314
    - § III. On solicitation to shameful things — p. 321
    - Point I. On those who must be denounced — p. 322
    - Point II. On those who must denounce — p. 327
    - Point III. On the mode of denouncing — p. 328
    - Point IV. On the obligation of the confessor with respect to the penitent who is bound to denounce — p. 330
    - Scholion I. On the mode of receiving the denunciation and, after it has been received, of proceeding further against those denounced — p. 331
    - Scholion II. On false denunciation — p. 334
    - Article III. On things to be observed after confession — p. 336
    - § I. On the office of preserving the sacramental seal — p. 336
    - Point I. On the obligation of the sacramental seal — p. 336
    - Point II. On the object of the sacramental seal — p. 340

        - Point III. On the subject of the sacramental seal — p. 341
- Point IV. Corollaries from the doctrine handed down — p. 343
- § II. On the obligation of repairing defects admitted in confession — p. 347
- Appendix. On external circumstances to be observed — p. 349
- Section II. On the ministration of the sacrament of Penance to certain persons specifically — p. 350
- Chapter I. On the confession of boys — p. 350
- Chapter II. On the confession of the rude, the dull, and the half-witted — p. 351
- Chapter III. On the confession of the habituated — p. 352
- Scholion. On the confession of those given to pollution or onanism — p. 358
- Chapter IV. On the confession of occasionaries — p. 358
- Article I. On occasionaries in general — p. 358
- Article II. On certain occasions in species — p. 365
- § I. On concubinage — p. 365
- § II. On courtships — p. 366
- § III. On domestic dangers — p. 367
- § IV. On dances — p. 368
- § V. On theatrical spectacles — p. 369
- § VI. On evil writings — p. 370
- § VII. On evil companionships — p. 370
- § VIII. On evil schools — p. 370
- Chapter V. On the confession of the dying — p. 370
- Chapter VI. On the confession of baptized non-Catholics — p. 372
- Part III. On the reception of the sacrament of Penance — p. 374
- Appendix. On indulgences — p. 375
- Part I. On indulgences generally — p. 375
- Section I. On the notion, existence, and division of indulgences — p. 375
- Section II. On the concession of indulgences — p. 378
- Scholion. On the faculty of blessing things with the application of indulgences — p. 382
- Section III. On the acquisition of indulgences — p. 383
- Chapter I. On the subject capable of acquiring indulgences — p. 383
- Chapter II. On the requisites in order that a capable subject may acquire indulgences — p. 390
- Section IV. On the translation, suspension, and cessation of indulgences — p. 392
- Part II. On certain indulgences in species — p. 394
- Section I. On the privileged altar — p. 394
- Section II. On the Way of the Cross and on the Crucifix of the Way of the Cross — p. 396
- Chapter I. On the erection of the Way of the Cross — p. 397

- Chapter II. On the indulgences annexed to the Way of the Cross and on acquiring them — p. 400
- Chapter III. On the Crucifix of the Way of the Cross — p. 401
- Section III. On the papal or apostolic blessing — p. 403
- Section IV. On the papal or apostolic blessing at the hour of death — p. 404
- Section V. On general absolution with a plenary indulgence — p. 405
- Section VI. On real indulgences — p. 407
- Chapter I. On real indulgences generally — p. 407
- Chapter II. On certain real indulgences specifically — p. 409
- Article I. On rosaries — p. 409
- Article II. On scapulars — p. 411
- Section VII. On the heroic act of charity — p. 416
- Section VIII. On the Jubilee — p. 417
- Chapter I. On the notion, division, and interpretation of the Jubilee — p. 417
- Chapter II. On the benefits of the Jubilee — p. 418
- Article I. On the faculty of choosing a confessor — p. 418
- Article II. On special faculties of confessors — p. 419
- Article III. On the indulgence — p. 423
- Chapter III. On the suspension of indulgences and faculties on the occasion of the Jubilee — p. 425
- Scholion I. On the plenary indulgence at the hour of death — p. 426
- Scholion II. On indulgences toties-quoties — p. 427
- Treatise VI. On Extreme Unction — p. 428
- Dissertation I. On Extreme Unction considered in itself — p. 428
- Part I. On the existence of Extreme Unction — p. 428
- Part II. On the essence of Extreme Unction — p. 429
- Section I. On remote matter — p. 429
- Section II. On proximate matter — p. 431
- Section III. On form and on the union of matter and form — p. 434
- Scholion. On the special character of Extreme Unction — p. 435
- Part III. On the effects of Extreme Unction — p. 436
- Part IV. On the necessity of Extreme Unction — p. 439
- Dissertation II. On the ministration of Extreme Unction — p. 440
- Dissertation III. On the reception of Extreme Unction — p. 441
- Part I. On the person receiving — p. 442
- Scholion. On the anointing of baptized non-Catholics — p. 446
- Part II. On the mode of receiving Extreme Unction — p. 447
- Part III. On repeated reception of Extreme Unction — p. 450
- Treatise VII. On Order — p. 450

- Dissertation I. On Order considered in itself — p. 452
- Part I. On the existence of the sacrament of Order — p. 452
- Part II. On the essence of the sacrament of Order — p. 454
- Scholion. On correcting defects of ordinations — p. 457
- Part III. On the effects of the sacrament of Order — p. 459
- Dissertation II. On the ministration of Order — p. 459
- Part I. On the person ministering — p. 459
- Part II. On the liceity of ministering — p. 461
- Dissertation III. On the reception of Order — p. 465
- Part I. On the person receiving Orders — p. 465
- Part II. On admission and preparation for the reception of Orders — p. 465
- Part III. On the mode of receiving Orders — p. 467
- Section I. On the requisites for valid reception — p. 467
- Section II. On the requisites for licit reception — p. 467
- Chapter I. On the things positively required — p. 468
- Chapter II. On irregularities and other impediments — p. 476
- Article I. Irregularities and impediments in general — p. 476
- Article II. Irregularities in species — p. 477
- § I. Irregularities from defect — p. 477
- § II. Irregularities from delict — p. 480
- Article III. Impediments in species — p. 483
- Article IV. Cessation of irregularities and impediments — p. 485
- Dissertation IV. On those things which regard both the ministration and the reception of Order — p. 488
- Part I. On those things which must precede ordination — p. 488
- Part II. On the rites and ceremonies of sacred ordination — p. 493
- Part III. On the time and place of sacred ordination — p. 494
- Part IV. On the annotation and testimony of ordination performed — p. 496
- Treatise VIII. On Matrimony — p. 498
- Dissertation I. On those things which are accustomed or ought to be premised to Matrimony — p. 498
- Part I. Betrothals — p. 498
- Section I. On the notion, division, fittingness, and governance of betrothals — p. 498
- Section II. On the form of betrothals — p. 502
- Section III. On the effects of betrothals — p. 507
- Chapter I. On absolute betrothals — p. 507
- Chapter II. On conditional betrothals — p. 509

- Scholion. On accidental things of betrothals — p. 510
- Section IV. On the dissolution of betrothals — p. 511
- Part II. Examination, especially concerning free state — p. 517
- Part III. Publications — p. 518
- Scholion I. On the obligation of the faithful — p. 525
- Scholion II. On the obligation of the confessor — p. 526
- Part IV. Antenuptial instruction — p. 526
- Part V. Reception of the sacraments — p. 527
- Dissertation II. On Matrimony itself — p. 528
  - Part I. On Matrimony in general — p. 528
    - Section I. On the nature of Matrimony — p. 528
      - Chapter I. Summary exposition — p. 528
      - Chapter II. Fuller exposition — p. 530
        - Scholion. On conditional Matrimony — p. 537
    - Section II. On the division of Matrimony — p. 540
    - Section III. On the institution, ends, goods, honesty, and governance of Matrimony — p. 542
    - Section IV. On the properties of Matrimony — p. 547
      - Chapter I. On the unity of Matrimony — p. 547
      - Chapter II. On the indissolubility of Matrimony — p. 548
        - Scholion I. On the Pauline privilege — p. 553
        - Scholion II. On the privilege of the faith — p. 558
        - Scholion III. On the favor of law which belongs to Matrimony — p. 559
    - Section V. On the effects of Matrimony — p. 560
      - Scholion. On legitimacy and matters akin to it — p. 561
  - Part II. On Matrimony insofar as it is a sacrament, specifically — p. 565
    - Section I. On the sacrament of Matrimony considered in itself — p. 565
      - Chapter I. On the existence of the sacrament of Matrimony — p. 565
      - Chapter II. On the essence of the sacrament of Matrimony — p. 566
      - Chapter III. On the effects of the sacrament of Matrimony — p. 567
    - Section II. On the ministration of the sacrament of Matrimony and the form of its celebration — p. 568
      - Chapter I. On juridical form — p. 569
        - Article I. On ordinary juridical form — p. 569
        - § I. Summary exposition — p. 569
        - § II. Fuller exposition — p. 571
        - Point I. On the requisites so that the pastor or local Ordinary may validly assist at Matrimony — p. 572

- Point II. On the requisites so that the pastor or local Ordinary may licitly assist at Matrimony — p. 574
- Point III. On delegation of another priest to assist at Matrimony — p. 578
- Article II. On extraordinary juridical form — p. 581
- Article III. On those who are subject to juridical forms — p. 583

- Chapter II. On liturgical form — p. 585
  - Article I. On the rite of celebration — p. 585
  - Article II. On the rite of blessing, or on the solemn nuptial blessing — p. 586
  - Scholion. On the form to be observed in Matrimony between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party — p. 588
- Chapter III. On the time and place of celebration of Matrimony — p. 589
- Chapter IV. On things to be observed after the celebration of Matrimony, or on the registration of celebrated Matrimony — p. 590
  - Scholion. On Matrimony of conscience — p. 593

- Section III. On the reception of the sacrament of Matrimony — p. 594
  - Chapter I. On impediments in general — p. 595
  - Chapter II. On impeding impediments specifically — p. 599
    - Article I. Simple vow — p. 600
    - Article II. Legal kinship — p. 601
    - Article III. Mixed religion — p. 602
    - Scholion. On Matrimony with an unworthy person — p. 611
  - Chapter III. On diriment impediments in species — p. 612
    - Article I. Age — p. 612
    - Article II. Impotence — p. 613
    - Article III. Bond — p. 618
    - Article IV. Disparity of cult — p. 621
    - Article V. Sacred Order — p. 625
    - Scholion. On sacred Order in the Oriental Churches — p. 627
    - Article VI. Religion — p. 628
    - Article VII. Rape — p. 629
    - Article VIII. Crime — p. 631
    - § I. Adultery with a promise of Matrimony — p. 631
    - § II. Adultery with attempted Matrimony — p. 633
    - § III. Adultery with spouse-killing — p. 634
    - § IV. Spouse-killing alone — p. 635
    - Article IX. Consanguinity — p. 637
    - § I. On consanguinity in itself — p. 637

- Scholion. Names of blood-relatives — p. 642
- § II. On consanguinity insofar as it is an impediment of Matrimony — p. 644
- Article X. Affinity — p. 646
- Scholion. Names of relatives by affinity — p. 649
- Article XI. Public honesty — p. 650
- Article XII. Legal kinship — p. 654

- Chapter IV. On dispensation from impediments — p. 654
  - Article I. On the power of dispensing — p. 654
  - § I. On the power of the Supreme Pontiff — p. 654
  - § II. On the power of local Ordinaries — p. 656
  - § III. On the power of the pastor and of the priest assisting at Matrimony according to canon 1098, n. 2 — p. 661
  - § IV. On the power of the confessor — p. 662
  - Scholion. Things to be noted with respect to the power of dispensing — p. 663

- Treatise VIII. On Matrimony, continued
  - Dissertation II. On Matrimony itself, continued
    - Part II. On Matrimony insofar as it is a sacrament, specifically, continued
      - Section III. On the reception of the sacrament of Matrimony, continued
        - Chapter IV. On dispensation from impediments, continued
          - Article II. On the causes for dispensing — p. 665
          - Article III. On the petition for dispensation — p. 671
          - § I. On the person petitioning — p. 671
          - § II. On the person to be approached for the petition — p. 672
          - § III. On composing the supplication — p. 672
          - Point I. On the supplication by which dispensation is sought for the external forum — p. 673
          - Point II. On the supplication by which dispensation is sought for the internal forum — p. 676
          - Point III. On the supplication which regards Matrimony invalidly contracted — p. 677
          - Scholion. On defects of a dispensation to be healed — p. 678
          - Article IV. On the execution of a dispensation — p. 680

        - Appendix I. On invalid Matrimony — p. 684
          - Part I. On the declaration of nullity of invalid Matrimony — p. 685
          - Part II. On the convalidation of invalid Matrimony — p. 686
            - Section I. Simple convalidation — p. 686
            - Chapter I. On the convalidation of a Matrimony invalid because of a diriment impediment — p. 686

        - Chapter II. On the convalidation of a Matrimony invalid because of defect of consent — p. 687
        - Chapter III. On the convalidation of a Matrimony invalid because of defect of form — p. 688
        - Section II. Sanation in the root — p. 689
        - Scholion I. On the convalidation of an invalid Matrimony between a Catholic party and a non-Catholic party — p. 692
        - Scholion II. On the inscription of a convalidated Matrimony — p. 693
        - Scholion III. On the mode of treating a case of convalidation — p. 693
    - Appendix II. On separation of spouses — p. 694
        - Part I. On full divorce — p. 694
            - Section I. On the dissolution of Matrimony between baptized persons, not consummated — p. 694
            - Section II. On the dissolution of Matrimony between a baptized party and a non-baptized party — p. 695
        - Part II. On semi-full divorce — p. 696
    - Appendix III. On civil Matrimony — p. 701
- Treatise I. On delicts — p. 703
    - Dissertation I. On delict considered in itself — p. 703
        - Part I. Summary exposition — p. 703
        - Part II. Fuller exposition — p. 705
- Dissertation II. On the juridical effects of delict — p. 708
    - Scholion. On an attempt at delict — p. 709
- Treatise II. On the penalties of delict — p. 710
    - Dissertation I. On penalties in general — p. 710
        - Part I. On the notion, division, imposition, and interpretation of penalties — p. 711
        - Part II. On the Superior having the power of punishing — p. 713
            - Section I. On the Superior having non-judicial jurisdiction — p. 713
            - Section II. On the Superior having judicial jurisdiction — p. 715
        - Part III. On the subject liable to the power of punishing — p. 717
        - Part IV. On the remission of penalties — p. 721
    - Dissertation II. On penalties in species — p. 722
        - Part I. On medicinal penalties, or on censures — p. 722
            - Section I. On censures in general — p. 722
                - Chapter I. On the notion, multiplication, and division of censure — p. 723
                - Chapter II. On the reservation of censure — p. 725
                - Chapter III. On the remission of censure — p. 726
            - Section II. On censures in species — p. 730

        - Chapter I. On excommunication — p. 731
        - Chapter II. On interdict — p. 736
        - Chapter III. On suspension — p. 741
            - Scholion. On suspension from informed conscience — p. 746
    - Part II. On vindicative penalties — p. 747
        - Section I. On vindicative penalties in general — p. 747
        - Section II. On common vindicative penalties — p. 749
        - Section III. On vindicative penalties peculiar to clerics — p. 751
    - Part III. On penal remedies and penances — p. 754
        - Section I. On penal remedies — p. 754
        - Section II. On penances — p. 755
- Dissertation III. On penalties established for individual delicts — p. 756
    - Part I. On excommunications — p. 757
        - Section I. Excommunications reserved to the Roman Pontiff in the most special manner — p. 757
        - Section II. Excommunications reserved to the Roman Pontiff in a special manner — p. 758
        - Section III. Excommunications simply reserved to the Roman Pontiff — p. 768
        - Section IV. Excommunications reserved to Ordinaries — p. 774
        - Section V. Excommunications not reserved — p. 777
    - Part II. On interdicts — p. 781
    - Part III. On suspensions — p. 782
        - Section I. On suspensions which are censures or medicinal penalties — p. 782
        - Section II. On suspensions which are vindicative penalties — p. 784

Book III. On the Aids of the Christian Life, or on the Sacraments

We shall speak first of the sacraments in general, then of the sacraments in species.

Treatise I. On the Sacraments in General

(St. Thomas, part 3, qq. 60-65; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 1-94; Homo Apostolicus, tract 14, nn. 1-6.)[1]

We shall deal first with the sacraments considered in themselves, then with the administration, and finally with the reception of the sacraments. Those things, however, which are treated by dogmatic theologians we shall touch upon very briefly, especially for this end, that there may be had a view of the whole doctrine, and that the connection between dogmatic and moral doctrine may appear.

[1] Cf. Billuart, Summa S. Thom., part 3, treatise III; De Smet, De sacramentis in genere; Rath, De Sacramentis in genere; Pourrat, La theologie sacramentaire; Schanz, Die Lehre von den Sakramenten der kath. Kirche; Billot, De Ecclesiae sacramentis.

Dissertation I. On the Sacraments Considered in Themselves

Having handed down a summary notion of a sacrament, we shall speak first of the existence, essence, and division of the sacraments, then of their efficacy, and then of the effects of the sacraments.

Part I. On the Summary Notion, Existence, Essence, and Division of the Sacraments

1 I. Summary notion. By force of the word, a sacrament signifies every sacred thing. Here, however, it is taken more strictly and is defined: a sensible sign of a sacred thing sanctifying man, that is, of grace. Sacraments of the Old Law and sacraments of the New Law are distinguished. The former only signify; the latter signify and produce grace. Hence a sacrament of the Old Law is defined: a sensible sign, but not an efficacious sign, of grace; but a sacrament of the New Law is called: a sensible and efficacious sign of grace.

2 II. Existence of the sacraments. In order that the existence of the sacraments may be rightly set forth, the various states of men must be distinguished, namely: 1. the state of innocence in paradise; 2. the state of the law of nature, so named not to the exclusion of grace, but to the exclusion of the written Mosaic law. This state prevailed for the Israelites until the written law, and for others until Christ; 3. the state of the Mosaic Law, which for the Israelites lasted until Christ; 4. the state of the new or Christian Law. Now:

1. In the state of innocence, by the consent of all, no sacrament existed.
2. In the state of the law of nature, more probably at least one sacrament existed. Namely, considering the will of God to save all, there certainly existed a remedy by which little children would be freed from original sin. That this was a sensible sign of sanctifying grace, or a sacrament, is more probable, as the dogmatic theologians explain (cf. St. Thomas, part 3, q. 61, a. 3; q. 60, a. 5, ad 3; q. 61, a. 1).
3. In the state of the Mosaic Law, several sacraments existed, as is deduced from the Council of Trent[1] and from the decree of Eugene IV for the Armenians. Moreover, it is commonly admitted that circumcision was a sacrament. Other sacraments of this Law are enumerated: the consecration of priests, the eating of the paschal lamb and of the loaves of proposition, and purifications (cf. St. Thomas, I-II, q. 102, a. 5; part 3, q. 61, a. 3, ad 2).
4. In the state of the New Law there are seven sacraments, and these were instituted by Christ; this is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone shall say that the sacraments of the New Law were not all instituted by Jesus Christ our Lord; or that there are more or fewer than seven, namely Baptism, Confirmation, Eucharist, Penance, Extreme Unction, Order, and Matrimony; or even that any one of these seven is not truly and properly a sacrament, let him be anathema."[2] That the said sacraments were instituted immediately by Christ, not by the Apostles under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, is certain doctrine, although it is disputed whether it was defined by the Council of Trent as a truth to be believed with Catholic faith.

It is disputed how Christ instituted the sacraments. Some teach that Christ determined the matter and form only in general, commanding only an apt gesture and suitable words, and leaving the more exact determination to the Church; this is the opinion of immediate institution in general. Others judge that Christ prescribed this gesture in species and these words in species, yet in such a way that there is room for some latitude, insofar as the Apostles or the rulers of the Church can, not indeed abrogate the matter and form established by Christ, but determine them more exactly or more strictly, or even increase them by new elements, so that the very sign-value is, within certain limits, subject to the will of the Church; this is the opinion of immediate institution in a perfectible specific form. Others admit immediate institution in a fixed specific form, so that the Church can do nothing directly with respect to validity by changing or adding anything concerning the matter or form.

[1] Session 7, canon 2.

[2] Session 7, canon 1.

3 III. Essence of the sacraments. 1. The sacraments of the New Law consist of things and words; this doctrine is declared in the decree for the Armenians. It is clear: 1. from Sacred Scripture, which expressly affirms this about several sacraments, such as Baptism,[1] Confirmation,[2] and Extreme Unction;[3] 2. from the doctrine and use of the Church. For the rest, words and things can be understood morally, so that it suffices for words and things to be had equivalently.

2. Things and words in the sacraments stand to one another as matter and form; this doctrine is proposed in the same decree for the Armenians. It is clear from the fact that the thing of a sacrament, which of itself can signify several things, for example washing in Baptism, and therefore of itself is indeterminate in the being of a sign, is determined by words to a special signification; so that the thing is like matter, the determinable part, while the words are like form, the determining part.

3. The matter of a sacrament is customarily distinguished as twofold, remote and proximate. The remote matter is the thing which is used in the sacred rite, as water in Baptism; or the thing about which the sacramental action is concerned, as sins in Penance. The former is called the remote matter from which, the latter the remote matter about which. The proximate matter is the application of the remote matter, as washing in Baptism; or the action which is concerned with the remote matter, as the acts of the penitent in Penance.

[1] Matt. 28:19.

[2] Acts 8:15, 17.

[3] Jas. 5:14.

4 IV. Division of the sacraments. The sacraments of the New Law are distinguished into:

1. Sacraments of the dead and of the living, according as they were primarily instituted for giving grace, namely to the spiritually dead; or for increasing it, namely in the spiritually living. The grace which is conferred on a man deprived of every degree of grace, or spiritually dead, is called first grace; the grace which is conferred on a man constituted in the state of grace, or spiritually living, is called second grace. The sacraments of the dead are Baptism and Penance. The sacraments of the living are Confirmation, Eucharist, Extreme Unction, Order, and Matrimony.

2. Repeatable and non-repeatable, according as they can be conferred on the same person more than once or only once.

3. Necessary and non-necessary, according as they ought or ought not to be received by individuals. Of those which ought to be received, some are necessary by necessity of means and precept, others by necessity of precept alone. Baptism for all (can. 737), and Penance for all who have fallen into mortal sin after Baptism, are necessary by necessity of means and precept (can. 901 and 906). The Eucharist is certainly necessary by necessity of precept (can. 859, §§ 1 and 4; can. 864, § 1); concerning necessity of means, it is disputed. Confirmation and Extreme Unction are not necessary by necessity of means; whether they are necessary by necessity of a grave precept is disputed.

Finally, Matrimony and Order are necessary only to the community; each of these matters will be developed in its own place.

4. Formed and unformed, according as, as soon as they are received, they confer grace, or, on account of an obstacle, at least do not produce it immediately. Of the unformed sacraments, some, when the obstacle has been removed, revive, that is, confer grace; others do not revive (St. Alphonsus, VI, 6).

5. Finally, a sacrament is called valid or invalid according as nothing or something is lacking for constituting it.

Part II. On the Efficacy, or Productive Power, of the Sacraments

5 The question is whether the sacraments truly produce grace, etc.; concerning the effects themselves there will be discussion in the following part. Now:

I. The sacraments of the New Law confer grace ex opere operato, or are truly efficient causes of grace. This proposition is established against the Protestants and Modernists, and is of faith from these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone shall say that grace is not conferred through the sacraments of the New Law themselves ex opere operato ... let him be anathema."[1]

II. The sacraments concur in producing grace only as instrumental causes; the principal cause, which uses the sacraments as instruments, is God alone; for no creature can, as principal cause, produce an effect which exceeds the order of every creature.[2]

III. The mode by which the sacraments concur in producing grace is explained in different ways. Some teach that the sacraments, which morally are actions of Christ, move God by an infinite and infallible power to confer grace (the doctrine of moral causality). Others judge that the sacraments do not immediately produce grace, but effect in the subject a title which, so far as lies in itself, demands grace (the doctrine of intentional causality). Others teach that the sacraments physically and immediately produce grace (the doctrine of physical causality). This is the opinion of St. Thomas (I-II, q. 112, a. 1, ad 2; III, q. 62, a. 1, 3, 4, 6).

[1] Session 7, canon 8.

[2] Council of Trent, Session 6, chapter 7.

Part III. On the Effects of the Sacraments

The effects of the sacraments are grace and character. The former is common to all the sacraments; the latter is proper to three, namely Baptism, Confirmation, and Order.

Section I. On Grace

6 I. Grace conferred. The grace which the sacraments confer is sanctifying grace and sacramental grace.

1. Sanctifying grace. a) All the sacraments confer sanctifying grace on those rightly disposed. This follows from what has been said concerning the efficacy of the sacraments. Moreover, to sanctifying grace there is attached either the infusion of the supernatural virtues and of the gifts of the Holy Spirit, namely if first grace is conferred; or the increase of the aforesaid, namely if second grace is conferred.

b) Baptism and Penance of themselves confer first grace; accidentally, namely if someone in the state of grace receives them in the due manner, they confer second grace, that is, an increase of grace.

c) Extreme Unction of itself and primarily confers second grace; of itself, but secondarily, it confers first grace. The other sacraments of themselves confer second grace, and accidentally, at least much more probably, first grace. The case obtains if someone in the state of mortal sin receives a sacrament in good faith and with attrition, which extends itself to all the sins committed. The reason for this opinion is that, according to Trent, the sacraments confer grace on those who place no obstacle. Now one who is in good faith and attrite places no obstacle to grace, as is clear from the sacraments of the dead (St. Thomas, III, q. 72, a. 7; q. 79, a. 3; Supplement, q. 30, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, VI, 6, 269 and 731).

2. Sacramental grace, that is, a certain divine help for attaining the end proper to such a sacrament (St. Thomas, III, q. 62, a. 2). What end is proper to each sacrament will be stated where there is discussion of the individual sacraments. Further:

a) That sacramental grace is conferred through the sacraments is deduced first from the Council of Florence, which declares: "Each sacrament is ordered to a proper and distinct end." But a sacrament cannot attain its proper end unless it produces an effect or grace proper to itself, in other words, sacramental grace. Then, if all the sacraments conferred the same grace, they would differ only in the external rite; nor would there have been a reason for instituting diverse sacraments; nor would it be clear why one is more necessary than another.

b) There is not one opinion of theologians about that in which sacramental grace precisely consists. According to the defenders of intentional causality, sacramental grace consists in actual graces proper to some sacrament, which are demanded by the same title as sanctifying grace. According to others, sacramental grace is sanctifying grace itself, insofar as it is given through such a sacrament; but sanctifying grace, given through such a sacrament, is ordered to the ends of such a sacrament, and consequently gives a right to receive, namely in due time, the actual graces by which the end of such a sacrament may be obtained. Thus, for example, sanctifying grace conferred in Baptism is regenerative and preservative of spiritual life; in Confirmation, strengthening and perfective, etc. According to the Thomists, sacramental grace is sanctifying grace with an intrinsic modification, by force of which sanctifying grace is ordered to the effects proper to the sacrament, together with a right to receive actual graces in order to those effects. Hence, according to them, for example, sanctifying grace conferred in Baptism, by force of the aforesaid modification, is regenerative and preservative of spiritual life, etc.

7 II. The measure according to which the sacraments confer grace. 1. Sacraments distinct in species more probably confer unequal grace on those equally disposed. For sacraments differ in dignity; and to a more worthy cause there corresponds a more worthy effect.

2. Sacraments distinct only in number confer equal grace on those equally disposed, and unequal grace on those unequally disposed. The Council of Trent[1] expressly teaches this concerning Baptism. Hence it must also be presumed concerning the others.

[1] Session 6, chapter 7.

Section II. On Character

8 I. Existence of sacramental character. Three sacraments, namely Baptism, Confirmation, and Order, imprint upon the soul a character, that is, a certain spiritual and indelible sign, whence they cannot be repeated. This is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone shall say that in the three sacraments, namely Baptism, Confirmation, and Order, a character is not imprinted on the soul, that is, a certain spiritual and indelible sign, whence they cannot be repeated, let him be anathema."[1] Canon 732, § 1, also teaches this.

[1] Session 7, canon 9.

9 II. Nature of sacramental character. The nature of sacramental character is explained in different ways by different authors. Yet all agree in this: that character is a spiritual quality, distinct from sanctifying grace, and is a power by which man becomes capable either of receiving sacred things, as in Baptism, or of handing on sacred things, as in Confirmation and Order (St. Thomas, III, q. 63, aa. 1 and 2). But they dispute, according as they defend either physical or moral causality, whether it is a physical power or only a moral one; wherefore consult the dogmatic theologians.

Scholion. On the Informity and Reviviscence of the Sacraments

10 I. Informity. 1. The informity of a sacrament consists in this: that the sacrament is validly received, but, on account of an obstacle, does not produce fruit, that is, grace. It is said to be on account of an obstacle, whether material or formal, according as it is placed inculpably or culpably.

2. Six sacraments certainly can be unformed; concerning Penance alone it is disputed whether it can be received informly, that is, validly but without fruit.

11 II. Reviviscence; concerning which several things must be explained.

1. Notion. Reviviscence consists in this: that a sacrament validly but fruitlessly received afterwards produces grace, when the obstacle has been removed and the sacramental sign has ceased. I said "when the sacramental sign has ceased." Hence, supposing that the Holy Eucharist, received with an obstacle, produces Eucharistic grace when the obstacle has been removed before the consumption of the species,[1] there would not be reviviscence of the sacrament, because the fruit would be produced while the sacramental sign remains.

2. The sacraments which revive are these:

a) Baptism certainly can revive; this is clear from the fact that otherwise those who received Baptism without fruit would be unable to obtain the remission of original sin and of the other sins committed before Baptism. For original sin and the other sins committed before Baptism are not remitted except through Baptism received in reality or in desire. But those who have once received Baptism can no longer receive it: neither in reality, because Baptism cannot be repeated; nor in desire, because if a new Baptism is impossible, the desire for a new Baptism is also excluded.

b) Confirmation, Order, Matrimony, and Extreme Unction much more probably can revive. Otherwise those who had received the said sacraments fruitlessly, even inculpably, would remain deprived of sacramental grace, which is so necessary to man in the various states of life; since Confirmation and Order cannot be repeated at all, Matrimony cannot be repeated while the same bond remains, and finally Extreme Unction, while the same danger persists, is at least not licitly repeated.

c) Whether Penance can revive is doubtful: both because it is doubtful whether it can be unformed, that is, valid and fruitless; and because it can be repeated.

d) The Holy Eucharist, at least if it has been received sacrilegiously, is almost commonly said not to revive: both because it can be repeated so often, and because there would follow the absurdity that one who had communicated very often sacrilegiously, if he afterwards truly repented, would immediately be heaped with grace.

3. The time of reviving. Baptism, Confirmation, and Order can always revive, since they can never be repeated, and by force of the character in some way continue in being. Matrimony can revive so long as the same matrimonial bond persists. Once it has been broken, sacramental grace either is no longer necessary, or can be acquired through a new marriage. Extreme Unction can at least revive so long as the same danger continues. Finally, Penance, if it must be numbered among the sacraments that revive, must be said to be able always to revive.

4. The requisites for reviviscence. If someone has sacrilegiously received a sacrament, or has sinned gravely after receiving it, there is required of itself contrition or attrition with sacramental absolution; accidentally, given good faith, attrition with a sacrament of the living received in good faith suffices, as is taught much more probably. The reason is that such a man is in the state of mortal sin. But in order that mortal sin may be remitted, and thus that place may be given for the reviviscence of the sacrament, there is required of itself contrition or attrition with sacramental absolution; accidentally, attrition with a sacrament of the living suffices (St. Alphonsus, VI, 6, 87, 444). Outside these cases:

a) Attrition certainly suffices in order that Baptism and Penance may revive. For the disposition required in the very reception itself suffices.

b) Of itself contrition is required, but accidentally attrition most probably suffices, in order that Extreme Unction may revive, because this sacrament, received in good faith with attrition, most probably produces fruit.

c) Of itself contrition is required, but accidentally attrition more probably suffices, in order that Confirmation, Order, and Matrimony may revive, because those sacraments, received in good faith with attrition, more probably produce fruit (n. 6).

5. The mode by which reviviscence has place is explained in different ways, according as the causality of the sacraments is explained in different ways. Supporters of moral causality teach that the value of the sacrament received perseveres morally in divine acceptance, and, when the obstacle has been removed, moves God to the infusion of grace. Defenders of intentional causality say that there remains a title demanding grace, and that, when the obstacle has been removed, it produces grace. Defenders of physical causality attribute the reviviscence of Baptism, Confirmation, and Order to character; as for the reviviscence of the other sacraments, some of them deny it, others derive it from a certain habitual determination in the will, and others have recourse to moral causality for these cases.

6. The degree of reviviscence seems to correspond to the actual disposition of the subject.[2]

[1] Whether this has a place, see in the treatise on the Eucharist.

[2] Cf. Council of Trent, Session 6, chapter 7.

Dissertation II. On the Ministration of the Sacraments

Part I. On the Person Ministering

12 The minister of a sacrament is he to whom the administration of the sacraments belongs by legitimate authority. A twofold minister is distinguished, namely principal and secondary, according as the administration of the sacraments belongs to someone by his own authority, or by authority communicated by the primary minister. The principal minister is Christ as man. The secondary minister is only the priest of the first or second order. Except Baptism and Matrimony. Concerning these there will be fuller discussion in the treatise on the individual sacraments.

Part II. On the Mode of Ministering

Concerning the mode of ministering the sacraments, canon 731, § 1, notes these things in general: Since all the sacraments of the New Law, instituted by Christ our Lord, are the chief means of sanctification and salvation, the greatest diligence and reverence must be employed in administering and receiving them opportunely and rightly.

With these things premised, we shall speak first of the requisites for valid ministration, then of the requisites for licit ministration.

Section I. On the Requisites for Valid Ministration

13 I. For the valid ministration of the sacraments, faith and sanctity are not required in the minister. With respect to faith, this is of faith as regards Baptism;[1] certain as regards the other sacraments. With respect to sanctity, it is of faith.[2]

The reason is that "the ministers of the Church operate instrumentally in the sacraments ... but, as was said above, an instrument does not act according to its own form or power, but according to the power of him by whom it is moved" (St. Thomas, III, q. 64, a. 5). Hence the efficacy of the sacraments does not depend on the disposition of the minister (St. Alphonsus, VI, 13).

II. For the valid ministration of the sacraments there are required intention, and certain other things, concerning which we shall treat individually.

[1] Council of Trent, Session 7, On Baptism, canon 4.

[2] Council of Trent, Session 7, On the Sacraments, canon 12.

Chapter I. On Intention

14 I. Notion. Intention is here understood as the deliberate will of confecting a sacrament.

15 II. Division. Intention is distinguished:

1. By reason of itself into actual, virtual, habitual, and interpretative. Actual intention is had when the minister, at the time at which he confects the sacrament, actually wills to confect it. It is reflex, or rather in actu signato, if there is had an express and formal volition of confecting the sacrament; it is in actu exercito if someone actually wills indeed, but nevertheless less expressly and formally, to confect the sacrament, as if someone, recognizing a rite as a sacrament, administers it under this recognition. Virtual intention is had when someone has actually and explicitly willed to confect a sacrament, and that will, though not actually, nevertheless perseveres virtually, so that he operates by force of the will once had, as if someone, from the intention of celebrating Mass, puts on the vestments and performs the other things, even if perhaps at the time of the ministry he is wholly distracted. Habitual intention exists if someone has actually and explicitly willed to confect a sacrament and that will has not indeed been retracted, but nevertheless does not persevere virtually. Interpretative intention is had when someone neither actually and explicitly wills nor actually and explicitly has willed to confect a sacrament, but is presumed to be going to will it if thought about it should occur.[1] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 15.)
2. By reason of the object into merely external and internal. Merely external intention is had when someone wills and outwardly seriously performs only the external rite, but lacks the mind of confecting a sacrament, or even intends the contrary. It is called merely external because, although in itself it is internal, nevertheless its whole object is external, namely only the placing of the external rite. Internal intention is had when someone wills the external rite insofar as it is sacred, or at least insofar as it is held as such by the Church.

By reason of the object, intention is further distinguished into determinate and indeterminate, according as the thing intended is certain and defined; or is uncertain, as if someone intends to consecrate only ten hosts out of a multitude of hosts.

3. By reason of mode into explicit and implicit, according as someone expressly wills such a sacrament known and thought of, or by a more general will wills such a sacrament, whether not known, or known but not thought of.

By reason of mode it is also distinguished into absolute and conditioned, according as someone intends to confect a sacrament independently of, or dependently upon, some circumstance or event; as if someone absolves another under the condition: if you are attrite; or: if you make restitution.

[1] Some call interpretative the intention which others call implicit habitual intention.

16 III. The intention required. It is of faith that intention is required, and indeed intention "at least of doing what the Church does."[1] In order that these things may be unfolded and completed, observe the following:

1. In itself, actual intention is not required, but virtual intention suffices; habitual intention does not suffice, much less interpretative intention; fear, however, does not hinder intention. I said:

a) Actual intention is not required, but virtual intention suffices. For it must be judged that the intention suffices which truly flows into the act or sacramental rite, and therefore can be called its cause. Such is not only actual intention, but also virtual intention. There is added the fact that actual intention is not always within man's power, and its necessity would give occasion for anxieties about the validity of the sacraments (St. Thomas, III, q. 64, a. 8, ad 3;[2] St. Alphonsus, VI, 17, 18).

Corollary. A priest validly acts who, in the customary way, betakes himself to the baptistery, confessional, or altar and there baptizes, absolves, or consecrates; for there is had at least virtual intention; indeed practically everywhere actual intention is present, even if remiss. Likewise, a priest validly consecrates who has placed on the corporal the hosts to be consecrated, even if at the time of consecration he does not think of them. Indeed, in general it must be said that one imprudently doubts the value of the act who has placed the required rite, unless he has expressly excluded the due intention (St. Alphonsus, VI, 18).

b) Habitual intention does not suffice; since it cannot be admitted that an intention suffices which in no way flows into the action of the minister; such is habitual intention (St. Alphonsus, VI, 16). Much less, as is clear, does interpretative intention suffice (St. Alphonsus, VI, 16).

c) Fear does not hinder, because, as we posit, it does not take away the voluntary (St. Alphonsus, VI, 19). Except, however, Matrimony, as will be said in its place.

2. As regards the object, there is required the intention or will of confecting a sacrament. This is established against those who judge that external intention suffices; in other words, that it suffices for someone outwardly and seriously to place the external rite, even if inwardly he does not will to confect the sacrament. This doctrine, first defended by Roland Bandinelli, and afterwards revived by Ambrosius Catharinus (1553), is today almost commonly abandoned and rightly seems to be rejected. For: 1. as we have said, it is of faith that intention is required in the minister, "at least of doing what the Church does." But these words seem to have to be understood according to the sense which they had in the schools, in other words, of the intention of doing what the Church intends to effect through the rite. 2. Proposition 28 was condemned by Alexander VIII: "Baptism conferred by a minister who observes every external rite and the form of baptizing is valid, even though inwardly in his heart he resolves within himself: I do not intend what the Church does."[3] Here it seems entirely that there is discussion of one who outwardly and seriously places the external rite. Therefore this does not suffice. 3. The Roman Missal has these words: "If someone has before him eleven hosts and intends to consecrate only ten, not determining which ten he intends, ... he does not consecrate, because intention is required,"[4] namely, as the Missal, according to the obvious sense, supposes, the intention of consecrating, and that a determinate one (St. Alphonsus, VI, 23).

It suffices, however, that the minister implicitly will to confect the sacrament, for example, that he will the rite as sacred, that he will to do what Christ instituted, what the Church does, what is asked by a Christian, etc.

Corollary I. A sacrament is not valid: 1. if someone places the external rite without any intention; this, for example, will have place if someone does not place a human act, as if he baptizes someone in sleep or drunkenness; 2. if someone performs the external rite for the sake of jest, mockery, or mere exercise.

Corollary II. A sacrament can be valid, even if someone does not regard the rite placed by himself as sacramental, provided he truly wills, for example, what Christ instituted, what he who admits the sacrament asks, etc. Hence heresy or infidelity of itself is not a reason for doubting the required intention;[5] otherwise if there is added hatred of the Christian name, which, for example, we can easily suspect in a Jew.

3. As regards the term, intention must be borne toward a determinate person or matter; yet it suffices that the intention be directed to the person or to the whole matter present, without being directed to the parts individually. But he consecrates invalidly who would will to consecrate ten hosts out of eleven and would not determine those ten.

4. As regards the mode, especially as regards a sacrament to be confected under a condition, several things must be noted:

a) A sacrament conferred under a condition concerning the present or the past generally is valid or not valid at once, according as the condition is verified or not verified. I said "generally," because it is disputed whether a sacrament conferred under a condition naturally unknowable is valid; as if someone were to absolve another if he were predestined. Further, it seems this must be denied, because "since God has committed the administration of the sacraments to the knowledge and will of men, a condition cannot be placed which cannot fall under human knowledge" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 26).

b) A sacrament conferred under a condition concerning the future, for example: I absolve you, if you will make restitution, that is, as soon as you shall have made restitution, generally is not valid, neither before nor after the condition has been fulfilled. Not before the condition is fulfilled, because there is not had the intention of confecting the sacrament before the fulfilled condition; not after the condition is fulfilled, because then the matter and form no longer exist (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). I said generally, because Matrimony is excepted, which follows the nature of a contract. But a contract entered into under a condition is perfected when the condition has been fulfilled.

[1] Council of Trent, Session 7, On the Sacraments, canon 11.

[2] St. Thomas in the cited place indeed says: "Although he who is thinking of something else does not have actual intention, nevertheless he has ... habitual intention, which suffices for the perfection of the sacrament." But St. Alphonsus responds: "By habitual intention here the holy Doctor without doubt understands virtual intention; for immediately after he adds thus: Suppose that when a priest approaches to baptize, he intends to do with respect to the one to be baptized what the Church does; hence if afterwards in the very exercise of the act his thought is carried off to other things, the sacrament is perfected from the force, note well, of the first intention" (VI, 18).

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1318.

[4] De Defectibus, title 7, n. 1.

[5] Holy Office, 18 December 1872 (Collectanea, n. 1392).

Scholion. On the Simulated Administration of a Sacrament

Authors do not agree in explaining the nature and morality of simulated or fictitious administration of a sacrament. It seems to us that the following must be said:

17 I. Notion. 1. Simulated administration of a sacrament, taken in the full sense, consists in this: that someone uses the matter and form of a sacrament, and this in such a way that he signifies the will of confecting a sacrament, which nevertheless he does not actually have (St. Alphonsus, VI, 60 and 61, where he denies simulation because matter and form are lacking).

2. Simulated administration, accepted in a less full sense, is had when someone uses the matter or form of a sacrament, and this again in such a way that he signifies the will of confecting a sacrament, which in reality he does not have (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Each simulated administration is called formal or material, according as deception of one's neighbor is intended as an end, or is chosen as a means.

3. Simulated administration of a sacrament, taken improperly, consists in this: that someone applies something which bears the appearance of the matter and form of a sacrament, or of either one, and this for the end that he may be judged to confect a sacrament.

From every simulated administration there differs the dissimulation of a denied sacrament, which has place when someone applies something which bears the appearance of the matter and form, or of either one, for the end that he may hide the denial of the sacrament; for example, if someone gives a blessing instead of absolution to one who is indisposed, lest the denial of absolution be disclosed to others (St. Alphonsus, VI, 59).

18 II. Morality. 1. Simulation of a sacrament, accepted in the full sense, is gravely evil, because it contains a sacrilegious lie, that is, a lie which, as having been committed through a sacramental rite, redounds upon the sacrament itself and inflicts grave injury upon it. Add that the said lie will often be gravely harmful. There is added proposition 29 condemned by Innocent XI: "Urgent grave fear is a cause for simulating the administration of the sacraments";[1] concerning which note: 1. by that proposition at least the simulation of a sacrament accepted in the full sense is condemned; 2. the authors of the said proposition understood it of material simulation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 59); hence formal simulation is to be rejected a fortiori.

2. Simulation of a sacrament accepted in the less full sense likewise seems gravely illicit, because the argument just brought forward also has force if the lie is committed through the partial rite of a sacrament.[2]

3. Simulation of a sacrament taken improperly of itself is quite probably not gravely illicit; for since the rite of the sacrament is applied neither wholly nor partially, the injury inflicted on the sacrament seems to be lacking, so that only a lie remains. I said of itself, because grave sin can be committed from another source, for example against charity or even against justice with respect to the subject to whom the sacrament, owed by charity or by justice, is thus denied.

4. The dissimulation of a denied sacrament, when there is a just cause, is of itself licit. For in the case neither is injury inflicted on the sacrament, nor is a lie committed, but only the truth is hidden (St. Alphonsus, VI, 59). I said of itself, because again grave sin can be had from another source, for example with respect to the subject, who can have a grave right that the truth not be hidden from him.

And these things which we have said concerning simulated administration of a sacrament, with the necessary adjustments, should also be applied to simulated reception.

Corollary I. It is neither simulation of a sacrament nor sin:

1. To place the matter and form for the sake of practice, because it is not signified that the sacrament is being confected, and therefore a lie is lacking; nor does the placing of the rite for the sake of practice inflict any injury upon the sacrament.

2. For the sake of avoiding infamy, to pronounce the customary words before one pretending to receive Communion, while not handing over the host but replacing it in the ciborium (St. Alphonsus, VI, 61). Nevertheless the case is little practical.

3. To enter the confessional and there speak to the confessor about some business. "For since matter and form are lacking there, I do not know how to understand where there is simulation of a sacrament" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 60). Nor is there a lie, unless someone "approached with the intention that bystanders believe that he is confessing" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.); otherwise if he did it in order to hide from others the fact that he was not confessing.

4. In contracting Matrimony, to which someone is compelled, to simulate consent; since consent of this kind is invalid, so that the matter and form of the sacrament are lacking. Nor is there sin because consent is simulated, since, on account of the opposing impediment, the words of consent can be uttered with a restriction that is not purely mental, so that a lie also is lacking (St. Alphonsus, VI, 62).

Corollary II. It is simulation of a sacrament, or at least grave sin:

1. To pronounce without intention the words of absolution over one who is indisposed, or the words of consecration over bread, or in the celebration of Mass to omit the words of consecration; indeed, also from chapter De homine, 7, de celebratione missarum, the priest who in Mass did not consecrate would sin more gravely than one who consecrated and communicated sacrilegiously (St. Alphonsus, VI, 59, 61).

2. To hand over a non-consecrated host as consecrated; here indeed there is not simulation of a sacrament, but cooperation in idolatry, at least material idolatry (St. Thomas, III, q. 80, a. 6, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 61).

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1179.

[2] Cf. Holy Office, 6 September 1625 (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1489).

Chapter II. On the Other Requisites

In order that a sacrament be validly confected, besides intention these things are required:

19 I. The minister must place the external rite in a human manner, or by a human act. For it cannot be admitted that Christ instituted a sacrament in such a way that it can be confected by an act which is not human; as if someone wholly drunk or sleeping were to baptize. For the rest, in the case, at least practically, the required intention will also be lacking (St. Alphonsus, VI, 16).

20 II. The same minister must apply the matter and pronounce the form. If there is discussion of Baptism, this seems certain, both because otherwise the words of the form are not verified, and because the Sacred Congregation of the Discipline of the Sacraments[1] declared Baptism conferred in another way invalid, adding these words: Catholic doctrine holds most certainly that the matter must be placed by one and the same minister and at the same time the form of Baptism must be uttered; otherwise the form I baptize you, I wash you would labor under falsity (St. Thomas, III, q. 67, a. 6, ad 3). The same seems almost certain with regard to Confirmation, Extreme Unction, and Order, considering namely both the analogy with Baptism and the doctrine of theologians and the practice of the Church. There is added that otherwise the moral union in the sacrament does not seem to be sufficiently preserved. Except the sacrament of Penance, whose nature requires the contrary. With regard to the sacrament of the Eucharist, the question cannot be posed. For the rest, note:

1. Different ministers can validly minister a sacrament which consists of parts, if you grant that this occurs; concerning which consult the treatise on Extreme Unction, provided that the individual parts are placed whole by one and the same minister, that is, with their own matter and form. This is clear from what will be said in the treatise on Extreme Unction. Nevertheless, since that is gravely contrary to the rite, it is forbidden under grave obligation outside a case of necessity.
2. Even if a sacrament does not consist of parts, nevertheless several ministers can validly confect one and the same sacrament, provided that each places everything which is required for the sacrament. This is urged first, with regard to other sacraments, from the analogy with the sacrament of the Eucharist, which can certainly be confected by several at the same time. The reason is that the individual ministers do not confect the sacrament except in the person of Christ, and therefore in and with Christ they are one. Then, since the individuals, as we suppose, possess the power of confecting the sacrament and exhibit all the requisites, it does not appear that anything is lacking to the conferral of the individuals (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 67, a. 6; q. 82, a. 2, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 120, 232; can. 803). But this also is gravely illicit, except the consecration in the ordination of priests and the consecration of Bishops.

Even if several confect a sacrament, nevertheless it will be one sacrament, because Christ, who is the one principal minister, effects one thing through several (St. Thomas, III, q. 67, a. 6).

3. Finally, one and the same person can confer a sacrament on several at the same time, for example baptize or absolve several. Yet this too is illicit outside a case of necessity (St. Alphonsus, VI, 29).

[1] 17 November 1916 (A.A.S. 1916, p. 479); cf. Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 1, n. 10.

21 III. The minister must confer the sacrament on a subject distinct from himself. This is drawn both from the common doctrine of theologians and the constant practice of the Church, and from the form of several sacraments. There is added that Innocent III declared null the Baptism which a certain Jew had ministered to himself in danger of death, adding this reason: "Since there ought to be a distinction between the one baptizing and the one baptized, as is clearly gathered from the words of the Lord, saying to the Apostles: Go, baptize all nations in the name, etc." (St. Thomas, q. 66, a. 5, ad 4; q. 82, a. 4, ad 2).[1] Except the Most Holy Eucharist and Matrimony.

[1] Cf. Decretals, IV, III, 42.

22 IV. The minister must duly unite matter and form, because they must constitute one sign. A moral union suffices, or rather that union by which the words of the form, according to common estimation, affect the matter and so constitute one thing with it (St. Alphonsus, VI, 9). Now:

1. In Baptism, Confirmation, Order, and Extreme Unction it certainly suffices that matter and form coexist in some part of themselves, or that one be begun before the other is completed. Likewise, it seems to suffice that the form be pronounced immediately before or immediately after the application of the matter. The reason is that even on this supposition the words "I baptize you," etc., "I sign you," etc., still seem to signify the actual application of the matter. There is added that the Holy Office several times resolved that the sacrament of the priesthood was not to be repeated in the case in which the Bishop had had his extended hand over the ordinands immediately before the prayer Oremus;[1] likewise in the case in which the ordinand had touched the instruments after the form had been uttered.[2] These resolutions seem also to be applicable to Baptism, Confirmation, and Extreme Unction. Nevertheless, the reason for doubting with regard to these three sacraments, especially with regard to Baptism, is taken from the fact that the Holy Office on 2 May 1858 declared that Baptism is always to be repeated under condition whenever "after the washing has been wholly completed, the form is pronounced, or conversely, when the pronouncing of the form has been completed, one proceeds to the washing."[3] For the rest, a very brief delay would render the sacrament doubtful, but the delay of one Our Father would render it null (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). For liceity it is required that matter and form perfectly coexist.[4]
2. In Penance, because it was instituted after the manner of a judgment, a greater interval can intervene.
3. In Matrimony there is always had union of matter and form when the consent of one is placed, the consent of the other not having been retracted; for it has and follows the nature of a contract (St. Alphonsus, VI, 9).
4. In the Eucharist there is discussion rather of the presence of the matter than of its union with the form; here, however, it is required that the matter be physically present, because otherwise the words "this" and "here" are not verified (St. Alphonsus, VI, 9).

[1] 12 September 1877; 30 November 1898; 14 December 1898.

[2] 17 March 1897.

[3] Note, however, that at the time the response was given, the value of Baptism conferred in this way was doubted more than today. Considering this together with the declarations afterwards issued concerning Order, it is permissible to doubt whether the Sacred Congregation, if again consulted, would give the same response.

[4] Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 1, n. 8; title 5, chapter 1, n. 18.

23 V. The minister must use neither matter nor form substantially vitiated. Now:

1. A substantial change of matter is had when a thing is used which, according to common estimation, differs from the thing which the Church uses, as if in Baptism you should use wine instead of water. If, however, the matter is the same thing in reality, either wholly or as to the greater quantity, but is called by a different name and is used for a different use, it is rather doubtfully valid than certainly invalid, as if someone were to baptize with moisture flowing from a vine (St. Alphonsus, VI, 11).

2. A substantial change of form is had when the words, according to common estimation, have a meaning different from that which must be expressed according to the mind of Christ (St. Alphonsus, VI, 11, 221). If the change is made into words which can be taken in a twofold sense, namely a sacramental one and a foreign one, the change is substantial or accidental according as the minister intends the foreign or the sacramental sense; since even in the common intercourse of men an ambiguous sense must be determined by the speaker himself. Besides, it can happen that a change which, considering only the grammatical sense, is substantial, is in fact accidental or substantial according as it proceeds from inadvertence or ignorance, or from a heretical mind. Thus if someone in consecration, from inadvertence, were to say, "Here" in place of "This is My Body," the consecration would be valid; otherwise if he intended the word "here" in the sense of Luther, or adverbially (St. Alphonsus, VI, 110). For the rest, a change of form can occur:

a) By substitution of words, as if in Baptism it were said: I wash you, etc. But it is accidental or substantial according as the substituted words are synonymous or not synonymous.

b) By transposition, as if someone says: I baptize you, etc. This will generally be accidental.

c) By omission, as if in consecration the word for is omitted. It must be seen whether or not an essential word is omitted, namely one by which the due sense is taken away.

d) By corruption, as can happen because of stammering, haste, or inexperience, as if someone says: This is my boby. In the case the change is generally accidental.

e) By addition, as if in Baptism it is said: I baptize you in the name of the Father, who created you, etc. Further, a change of this kind is more easily substantial if what is false is added than if what is true is added; likewise if the change is made with a heretical mind than otherwise.

f) By interruption. Further:

a) Interruption of the words of the form is substantial or accidental according as it is or is not so great that the words before those hearing no longer effect the complete sense intended by Christ.

b) Interruption of the syllables of the same word, if it occurs by the interposition of several words or of one word, as if it were said: I bap- (be silent) -tize you, etc., renders the value doubtful. Otherwise if it occurs by a cough or a similar way and is very brief (St. Alphonsus, VI, 11, 221).

3. A substantial change, as one which renders the sacrament invalid, is a grave sin; an accidental change is gravely or lightly forbidden according as it greatly or lightly opposes the use and precept of the Church.

24 VI. The minister must utter the sacramental form by voice, that is, by the organs ordered to speaking. Therefore vocal pronunciation is required. Besides, at least practically, the pronunciation ought to be audible of itself, because it is doubtful whether pronunciation which of itself is not audible can be called vocal (St. Alphonsus, VI, 414).

Section II. On the Requisites for Licit Ministration

In order that the minister of a sacrament proceed licitly, first indeed he must minister validly; concerning this there has already been discussion. Then it is required that he minister legitimately, holily, according to the rite, to the worthy, and absolutely or under condition according to the circumstances.

25 I. Legitimately; namely, it is required that the minister have received from the Church a mission or some jurisdiction, in other words authorization, and that he not have contracted a penalty which deprives him of the use of order. Concerning the jurisdiction required there will be fuller discussion in the treatise on the individual sacraments.

26 II. Holily, that is, in the state of grace. Now:

1. The obligation of ministering the sacraments in the state of grace is clear from the reverence due to an action so holy. Nevertheless, a necessity excuses which is so urgent that not even an act of contrition can be elicited, for example if absolution must be granted immediately to one dying. For since the sacraments are for men, the harm of one's neighbor to be averted prevails over the reverence due of itself to the sacrament, and thus, when the higher law of charity urges, the irreverence is taken away.

Here, however, it is asked by some whether the minister also is excused who cannot elicit an act of contrition in time without danger of infamy or scandal. Further, theoretically this must be affirmed, because, granted the good will of the minister and his moral inability to repent in time, even the right of preserving reputation and, a fortiori, the obligation of avoiding scandal prevail over the reverence due of itself to the sacrament. But since practically sufficient time for eliciting an act of contrition is available, it can be said that the said excusing cause in fact scarcely exists (St. Alphonsus, VI, 33).

2. As regards the gravity of the obligation, receive the following:

a) The obligation of the state of grace is certainly grave if these three things occur, namely if: 1. the minister is consecrated; 2. he confects the sacrament; and 3. he does this by office, or as consecrated, or solemnly.[1] This is clear from the Roman Ritual, which declares: "Those ministering these things impurely and unworthily incur the guilt of eternal death";[2] and these words must at least be applied to those of whom we are speaking. So also the Roman Catechism.[3] The reason is that grave irreverence is had in this, that someone exercises an act so holy in a state so foul, whether as consecrated and furnished with sacramental grace, or as acting as minister and instrument of Christ and in His name, or with the said titles considered together (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 64, a. 5, ad 3 and a. 6; St. Alphonsus, VI, 31, 32, 884).

b) It is disputed whether the following sin gravely: 1. a non-consecrated minister who confects a sacrament in mortal sin, namely a layman baptizing and those contracting Matrimony;[4] 2. a consecrated minister who confects a sacrament, but not by office or not as consecrated, namely a deacon or priest baptizing in a case of necessity. Some affirm, because there is grave irreverence in this, that someone, whether he is consecrated or is not consecrated, whether he acts as consecrated or does not act as such, performs such sublime things in the name of and as an instrument of Christ. Others deny it, and judge that for grave irreverence it is required that someone act by office, and therefore confect the sacrament as public minister of Christ and of the Church. Thus St. Thomas teaches (loc. cit.), nor does St. Alphonsus seem to reject this for practice (VI, 32; Homo Apostolicus, tract 14, n. 6); all things considered, it can be held as practically safe. Likewise, a priest does not sin gravely who, while in mortal sin, only hears confession, yet in such a way that he resolves to elicit an act of contrition before absolution is to be given (St. Alphonsus, VI, 36).

c) It is further disputed whether a priest or deacon sins gravely who, while in mortal sin, does not confect, but only administers a sacrament. This question regards only the distribution of the Holy Eucharist. Further, St. Alphonsus, against many, affirms it, "because," he says, "a priest ministering the Eucharist in mortal sin inflicts grave injury on this sacrament, because, as a minister consecrated for dispensing it, he ministers it unworthily (cf. can. 845). And just as in the other sacraments the minister proximately concurs in the sanctification of those receiving through confection, so here he proximately concurs through dispensation, since the minister of the Eucharist cannot exhibit himself as minister otherwise than through dispensation" (VI, 35). There is added that Nicholas II compares a dispenser in the state of sin to a burning torch, which, while it illuminates others, consumes itself.[5] Finally, the Roman Catechism favors this opinion.[6]

d) He does not sin gravely who, while in mortal sin, exercises other sacred functions, for example: 1. one who performs the functions of the Diaconate, Subdiaconate, or minor Orders; 2. one who performs consecrations, for example of Sacred Oil, and blessings; 3. one who touches or carries the Holy Eucharist or gives Benediction with the Most Holy Sacrament; 4. a priest who assists at Matrimony; 5. finally, one who preaches while in mortal sin does not sin gravely (St. Alphonsus, VI, 37-40).

Corollary. A minister who in mortal sin confects several sacraments in one continuous act commits as many sins as the sacraments he confects. The contrary must be said of him who by one moral action distributes the Holy Eucharist to several. Finally, he who celebrates while in mortal sin more probably commits four sins, namely he unworthily confects the sacrament, unworthily receives the sacrament, unworthily administers the sacrament to himself, and administers the sacrament to an unworthy person, again to himself (St. Alphonsus, VI, 35; vol. I, p. 201).

3. As regards the mode of recovering lost grace, one about to confect or administer a sacrament while constituted in mortal sin can recover grace either by an act of perfect contrition or by confession. If, however, there is question of confecting the Holy Eucharist, Confession is required of itself; this is clear from canon 807, to be explained later. Besides, the confection of this sacrament has its reception annexed to it. Further, he who has sinned mortally cannot receive the Holy Eucharist unless he has first received the sacrament of Penance (n. 179). With regard to the confection of the other sacraments, it is indeed fitting to confess,[7] but there is no obligation.

[1] The word solemnly, which in the case is commonly used, does not regard external rites, but signifies the same as by office.

[2] Title I, single chapter, n. 4.

[3] Part 2, chapter 1, q. 17.

[4] Nevertheless, they sin gravely insofar as they receive Matrimony in mortal sin.

[5] Chapter 5, cause 15, question 8.

[6] Part 2, chapter 1, question 17.

[7] Roman Ritual, title I, n. 4.

27 III. According to the rite, that is, according to the rites prescribed by the Church. Rites, however, are customarily distinguished as essential and accidental, according as they belong to the essence of the sacraments or do not belong to it. Concerning the essential rite, that is, concerning the use of matter and form, there has already been discussion, so that it remains to speak only of the accidental rite. Concerning this, let these things be observed:

1. That there is an obligation of observing the rites is of faith from these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone shall say that the received and approved rites of the Catholic Church, customarily used in the solemn administration of the sacraments, can either be contemned, or omitted by the ministers at their pleasure without sin, or changed into other new rites by any pastor of churches whatsoever, let him be anathema."[1] The obligation is likewise drawn from the Constitution Apostolicae Sedi of Paul V,[2] placed at the head of the Roman Ritual; likewise from canon 733, § 1, which establishes: "In confecting, administering, and receiving the sacraments, the rites and ceremonies which are prescribed in the ritual books approved by the Church are to be accurately observed." Yet this does not prevent certain rites from being called directive rather than preceptive; this is drawn both from the words of the Ritual and from the thing itself, as will be noted in its place.
2. The obligation of observing the rites is grave by its genus, so that he sins gravely who neglects the law in grave matter; this is drawn both from the importance of the matter being treated and from the penalties to be inflicted on incorrigible transgressors (cf. can. 2378).
3. Each person is bound to follow his own rite (can. 733, § 2). Now the rite to be observed in the Latin Church is contained in the Missal and Roman Ritual, the Roman Pontifical, the Ceremonial of Bishops, and the Memoriale Rituum.[3]

Note 1. The sacred oils which serve for administering certain sacraments must have been blessed by the Bishop on the most recent Thursday in the Lord's Supper; and old oils are not to be used unless necessity urges. When the blessed oil is nearly lacking, other unblessed olive oil is to be added, even repeatedly, but in a smaller quantity (can. 734). The pastor must request the sacred oils from his Ordinary and diligently preserve them in the church in safe and decent custody under key; nor is he to retain them at home, unless because of necessity or another reasonable cause, with the permission of the Ordinary (can. 735).

Note 2. The reverence due to the sacraments also requires that they be confected with the decency which the nature of the sacrament demands; to this also belongs due attention. Nevertheless, voluntary distraction is only venial, unless there is added danger of a substantial or at least notable defect. Yet voluntary distraction of a priest during consecration and communion is held by many as grave irreverence, namely because of the eminent dignity of the Sacrifice (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 14, 224, 410, dub. 5).

[1] Session 7, On the Sacraments in general, canon 13.

[2] 17 June 1614.

[3] The Memoriale Rituum is a small book of rites given for the City by Benedict XIII (1723) and promulgated for the whole world by Pius VII (1827).

28 IV. To the worthy. The sacraments can be ministered only to the worthy, at least of themselves. But it suffices that worthiness be established as will be explained below. I said:

1. They can be ministered only to the worthy. He who ministers them to an unworthy person commits: 1. the sin of sacrilege, on account of the irreverent treatment of a sacred thing, that is, of a sacrament; 2. the sin of scandal, on account of cooperation in the sin of one's neighbor (St. Alphonsus, VI, 43).
2. At least of themselves; because, as if accidentally, the sacraments can be ministered to an unworthy person if there is present a cause by which both the irreverence which is contained of itself in ministration to the unworthy is removed, and cooperation in the sin of one's neighbor is made honorable. Causes of this kind are: violation of the sacramental seal, infamy, scandal, and other inconveniences to be avoided. From these things follow:

a) A sacrament must be ministered to an unworthy person if his unworthiness is known only by sacramental knowledge. For the rest, the following rules hold:

b) The sacraments are to be denied to a public sinner whether he asks secretly or publicly. The reason is that neither scandal nor infamy to be avoided makes the ministration honorable[1] (can. 855, § 1; St. Thomas, III, q. 80, a. 6; St. Alphonsus, VI, 44). A public sinner, however, is one whose crime is notorious either by fact, by law, or by reputation; he is occult as long as there is hope that the crime can be hidden.

c) The sacraments are to be denied to an occult sinner if he asks for them secretly, that is, before the priest alone, or before a few others who do not understand what is being done and will not spread the matter; they are not to be denied if he asks for them publicly. It is said:

a) They are to be denied if he asks for them secretly (can. 855, § 2; Roman Ritual):[2] the reason is that from denial there does not follow the inconvenience mentioned above (St. Thomas, loc. cit.; St. Alphonsus, VI, 44). Except if the priest knew the state of the sinner from confession alone; for he cannot use knowledge from confession with the burden of the penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 51, 658).

b) They are not to be denied if he asks for them publicly (can. 855, § 2; Roman Ritual).[3] The reason is that from the fact that a minister could publicly deny the sacraments from private knowledge, the greatest inconveniences would follow: namely, not only the loss of the reputation[4] of the one asking, but especially disputes, disturbances, scandals, and the danger that many would abstain from the sacraments, namely from fear lest they be kept away by an imprudent or malicious minister (St. Thomas, loc. cit.; St. Alphonsus, VI, 49). Except, however, the sacrament of Order, from which even one occultly unworthy must be kept away (Council of Trent;[5] can. 970). "The reason is certain, because he who thrusts himself into public offices for which he is not suitable must be repelled, even with infamy, on account of the public good to be preferred to the private good" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 52; cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 36, a. 4). Besides, "it must be noted that in that case the Bishop is not bound to manifest the cause why he repels him from ordination; according to the declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Council issued on 21 March 1643 and on 21 April 1668, which the Supreme Pontiff Benedict XIV brings forward at length"[6] (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

If the crime is public in another place, but occult in the place where the sacrament is asked, the sacrament should not be denied unless knowledge of the crime will easily reach there (St. Alphonsus, VI, 46; cf. can. 855, § 2).

d) It is forbidden to minister the sacraments of the Church to heretics, even those erring in good faith and asking for them, unless first, having rejected their errors, they have been reconciled to the Church (can. 731, § 2). It is forbidden both because the sacraments generally cannot be ministered to heretics and schismatics without scandal,[7] and because ministration of the sacraments to non-Catholics fosters indifferentism.

Insofar as these things are also to be applied to the dying, see in the treatise on Penance and on Extreme Unction.

3. It suffices that worthiness be established as follows:

a) With regard to Baptism of adults, Penance, Order, and Matrimony, the worthiness of the recipient must be established more or less positively, and therefore inquiry must be made into it, as will be explained more fully in the treatise on the said sacraments. Meanwhile consult, with regard to Baptism, canon 752, § 1; with regard to Penance, canons 886 and 888; with regard to Order, canon 973, § 3; with regard to Matrimony, canons 1020, 1021, § 1, and 1033.

b) With regard to the other sacraments, worthiness must be presumed, while unworthiness must be proven in some measure, so that in doubt the sacraments ought rather to be granted. The reason is that all the faithful have a right to these other sacraments, and ministers are not judges but dispensers; whence in these cases they do not have the right of inquiring, but only the duty of dispensing to all who ask, provided that they are not positively unworthy (St. Alphonsus, VI, 43). If, however, unworthiness has been established, amendment must be proven, and sometimes, besides, the satisfaction performed must be established. Concerning this the Roman Ritual has these words: "All the faithful are to be admitted to sacred Communion, except those who are prohibited for a just reason. But the publicly unworthy are to be kept away, such as the excommunicated, the interdicted, and the manifestly infamous: as prostitutes, concubinarians, usurers,[8] magicians,[9] sorcerers, blasphemers,[10] and other public sinners of that kind, unless their penitence and amendment are established, and they have first satisfied for public scandal."[11] Canon 855, § 1, inculcates the same for the same reason. With these things considered, the following can be drawn:

[1] Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 2, n. 3.

[2] Title IV, chapter 1, n. 9.

[3] Title IV, chapter 1, n. 9.

[4] This reason is not adequate, because the reverence to be shown of itself to the sacrament prevails over the private good of the reputation of the sinner, who, as is supposed, is not of good will; but it does not prevail over the common good.

[5] Session 14, on reform, chapter 1; Session 23, chapters 5 and 7.

[6] De Synodo, book 12, chapter 8, n. 2.

[7] Holy Office, 20 July 1898 (Collectanea, n. 2012).

[8] That is, those judicially convicted as such.

[9] That is, those who publicly practice true and certain magic.

[10] That is, those who from a spirit of impiety are accustomed by mouth or writing to utter injurious things against God, against the Saints, or against the Church.

[11] Title IV, chapter 1, n. 8.

29 Corollary I. If unworthiness arises from sin alone, generally it suffices that the sinner has confessed publicly; indeed, the very approach to the Holy Eucharist seems generally to suffice that he be judged amended. If, however, a public sinner of this kind, notwithstanding confessions and communions, does not cease falling back into the same habit, and the relapse is notorious, then the ministration of the sacraments should be deferred for some time, so that amendment may be sufficiently proven, unless now particular signs of amendment appear, as can occur especially on the occasion of a Mission.

Corollary II. If someone has publicly lived in a proximate occasion; likewise, if some resignation of office, or retraction, or satisfaction must be imposed, for example if someone has performed a wicked office, or has publicly enrolled in a wicked society, or has spread pernicious errors, or has publicly and unjustly stripped another of reputation, generally the occasion must be abandoned or the other obligation fulfilled before the sinner is publicly[1] admitted to the sacraments.

Corollary III. If someone has been publicly excommunicated, or has notoriously adhered to a heretical sect, before he communicates he must be reconciled with the Church in the external forum and absolved from the censure.

Corollary IV. If the crime is doubtful, the sacrament should not be denied, unless nevertheless someone is so suspected that by charity he is bound to remove the suspicion. If the crime is certain, but penitence doubtful, the sacrament should be denied, because penitence is not established; which the Roman Ritual cited above and canon 855 require (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 48).

Corollary V. If a doubt remains whether the sacraments must be denied to someone, the Ordinary should be consulted; or, if there is not time, after the sacrament has been granted, recourse should be had to him for the future.

For the rest, if the sacraments are to be denied, one should proceed most prudently. As far as can be done, the sinner should be warned in time, so that the request itself may be forestalled. If the matter does not succeed, the denial should be made without disturbance. The ordinary circumstances are especially regarded by the things said above; concerning the things to be observed in urgent danger of death there will be discussion in its own place.

Finally, here it is customary to ask whether the minister can administer a sacrament to an unworthy person in order to avoid harm threatening himself, for example death. Some affirm, provided that the one asking can here and now validly receive the sacrament and does not ask for it in contempt of God or of religion. They affirm this because there is had only material cooperation, which is licit for a cause of this kind. But with St. Alphonsus (VI, 49) it seems it must be denied; since the conferral of a sacrament on an unworthy person, and this in the supposed circumstances, carries with it so great an injury to the sacrament that it does not seem it can be admitted for averting private harm from the minister, but only for preventing inconveniences that would follow for the community from the denial (St. Alphonsus, VI, 49). As we already noted above, the adequate reason why it is permitted to confer a sacrament on an occult sinner is not the avoidance of infamy for a contumacious sinner, but the inconveniences which would arise for the community from the denial (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

[1] Of themselves, the sacraments can be ministered at least secretly to all who are truly penitent, but according to the Sacred Penitentiary (1856) it is not fitting "to admit to secret participation in the sacraments those who have not made retraction, on account of the scandal of the weak, who can believe that the penitent has persevered in obstinate pertinacity."

30 V. Absolutely or conditionally, according to the circumstances. The sacraments are to be conferred absolutely if there is no serious doubt about validity; otherwise under condition. Yet he who, being certain of validity, places a condition, seems of himself to sin only lightly, because grave irreverence is not evident.

Scholion I. On the Ministration of a Doubtfully Valid Sacrament

31 I. The morality of doubtfully valid ministration. 1. Of itself it is illicit to minister a sacrament with doubt about its validity; in other words, moral certainty about the validity of the sacrament is required of itself. The reason is that of itself it is injurious to Christ, the Author of the sacraments, to place the external rite instituted by Him, wholly or at least partially, and indeed in order to constitute a sacrament, with grave danger of not truly constituting the sacrament. There is added proposition 1 condemned by Innocent XI: "It is not illicit in conferring the sacraments to follow a probable opinion about the validity of the sacrament, the safer one being left aside, unless law, agreement, or danger of incurring grave harm forbids it. Hence one must not use only a probable opinion in the conferral of Baptism, priestly Order, or episcopal Order."[1] Therefore of itself it is illicit: 1. to use doubtful matter or form; 2. to minister a sacrament in doubt whether another requisite for validity is present, for example the presence of the penitent due in the sacrament of Penance. Consequently, of itself it is also not licit to minister a sacrament under a condition which, according to what was said in n. 32, renders the validity of the sacrament doubtful (St. Alphonsus, VI, 28, 46).

Note. The moral certainty about validity which is required must be taken more strictly or more broadly according to the diversity of the sacraments; more broadly, for example, for the sacrament of Penance, as will be explained in its place.

2. Accidentally, a sacrament can sometimes, or even must, be conferred with doubt about its validity, namely if on the one hand it cannot certainly be conferred validly, and on the other hand there is a grave reason for conferring it. For since the sacraments are for men, the salvation of men to be procured prevails over the obligation of taking care lest the sacrament be exposed to the danger of nullity. A sufficient reason is present the more easily in proportion as the sacrament is more necessary (St. Alphonsus, VI, 28, 29).

Corollary I. A doubtfully valid sacrament can be conferred if the validity is at least probable and, from the sacrament not being conferred, grave spiritual harm threatens someone. Hence, for example, one doubtfully disposed can be absolved if there is fear lest otherwise he be alienated from the sacraments. But scarcely ever is it licit to consecrate doubtful matter (St. Alphonsus, VI, 28, 29, 432).

Corollary II. In danger of death, even with slight probability about validity, the necessary sacraments must be conferred, namely Baptism and Penance; likewise Extreme Unction, at least if Penance certainly cannot be conferred validly (St. Alphonsus, VI, 103).

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1151.

32 II. The mode of doubtfully valid ministration. If a sacrament is ministered with doubt about validity, it must be confected under condition; namely, the reverence due to the sacrament requires that the minister, in a doubt of this kind, protest that he does not will to confect the sacrament if the necessary condition is lacking.[1] Besides, observe:

1. Let the condition be placed on which validity depends, not that on which only the fruit depends. The reason is that a sacrament conferred under a condition on which only the fruit depends, for example, if you are disposed to receive grace, cannot revive; for if the condition is verified, the sacrament is immediately received validly and fruitfully; if it is not verified, it is not even validly received, and therefore cannot revive (n. 11). On the contrary, a sacrament conferred under a condition on which validity depends, for example, if you are capable of receiving the sacrament, is validly conferred if the condition is verified; and if perhaps it is now received without fruit, afterwards, when the due disposition is added, it can revive.

2. It is not required that the condition be expressed by mouth, but it suffices that it be expressed mentally, except in the cases in which, according to the Roman Ritual,[2] it must be expressed by mouth, namely: 1. in doubt whether the one to be baptized has already been baptized, or whether that which has been born is a human being; 2. in doubt whether the one to be anointed is still living (St. Alphonsus, VI, 29). The reason is that a condition placed mentally suffices for the sacrament truly to be conferred conditionally, in other words, for the intention to be restricted to the case of valid confection. This is confirmed by these words of the Roman Missal: "If he doubts very probably that he has omitted something essentially in the consecration, let him repeat the form at least under a tacit condition."[3] Indeed, it is enough to place the condition, whether by mouth or only mentally, implicitly; for example by ministering the sacrament according to the institution of Christ or the intention of the Church.

[1] If doubt about validity is removed by the Church supplying the defect, if it exists, the sacrament must be conferred absolutely. If someone places the condition: if you are disposed, it can seem doubtful whether there is intended a disposition required for the fruit alone or, at least confusedly or predominately, for validity. Hence it is safer not to express the condition in this way.

[2] Title 2, chapter 1, nn. 9, 22; title 5, chapter 1, n. 14.

[3] De defectibus, title 5, n. 2.

Scholion II. On the Repetition of a Sacrament Doubtfully or Doubtfully Validly Conferred

33 We speak of the repetition of a sacrament which is done under this condition, or an equivalent one: If the former sacrament was not conferred, or was not validly conferred; and which therefore effects nothing if the former sacrament was validly conferred. Now:

I. It is illicit to repeat a sacrament under condition if the doubt about the ministration or its valid ministration lacks reasonable foundation. In the case, repetition is gravely illicit, because it is grave irreverence to repeat the sacramental rite without reason. Nevertheless, the scrupulous are excused from sin, at least grave sin; yet they must be seriously admonished to abstain from repeating the form. Likewise, it is venial uselessly to repeat the same word, by which manner of acting Christ is introduced as speaking ridiculously. Stammerers, however, are excused, provided that, as far as can be done, they try to pronounce the words rightly the first time.

II. It is licit to repeat the sacraments under condition if both a prudent doubt about ministration, or about valid ministration, exists, and the usefulness of one's neighbor recommends reception of the sacrament.

III. A sacrament must be repeated under condition if there is prudent doubt about the ministration or its validity, and reception of the sacrament is necessary by necessity of means or of precept; even more if the common good requires that the sacrament be certainly conferred validly. Moreover, the more necessary the sacrament is, the more easily a sufficient doubt is present.

Corollary I. The sacraments of Baptism, Confirmation, and Order are to be repeated under condition if a prudent doubt exists whether they were really conferred or whether they were validly conferred (can. 732, § 1). If it is prudently doubted whether absolution was imparted or rightly pronounced, and the penitent is still sufficiently present, absolution must be repeated if there is question of a penitent constituted in mortal sin; otherwise it can at least be repeated.

Corollary II. Baptism, Order, absolution of one dying, and Extreme Unction conferred on one deprived of the senses must be repeated, even if the reason for doubting the validity of the former sacrament is slight.

Corollary III. It can happen that doubt about the ministration or the valid ministration of a sacrament, even a necessary one, is so slight that it can indeed be repeated, but need not be repeated. Thus, for example, to quiet anxiety Order could be repeated if the words of the form had been uttered immediately after the matter was placed.

Corollary IV. Finally, it can happen that a sacrament can and must be repeated several times under condition, for example that an infant must first be baptized while still existing in the womb; then, when some member has emerged, be rebaptized under condition; finally, once brought into the light, be rebaptized again under condition (n. 93; cf. can. 746, § 3).

Section III. On the Obligation of Ministering

34 I. Bishops and pastors are bound in this way:

1. They must, by justice, minister the sacraments to their subjects; and indeed not only in true necessity, but as often as they reasonably ask for this. They are bound by justice because, in accepting their office, they entered into a tacit contract. There is added the reason of salary or honorable support accruing to them by reason of their office (St. Alphonsus, VI, 58; cf. vol. I, n. 572; canons 464, § 1; 467, § 1; 785; 892, § 1; 939).
2. The aforesaid obligation is grave by its genus, namely so that they would sin gravely: 1. if they did not aid a subject constituted in grave or extreme necessity; 2. if by custom they showed themselves difficult or slow, for example if they heard confessions only on a few days in the month, or assigned notably inconvenient times for the distribution of the Holy Eucharist.
3. If the necessity is grave or extreme, grave inconvenience does not excuse, indeed not even danger on the way (cf. vol. I, n. 572). Nevertheless, concerning the obligation of ministering the sacraments with danger to life, let these things be noted:

a) The obligation regards only the sacraments necessary for salvation according to the circumstances, namely Baptism, Penance, and, if the sick person were deprived of the senses before he could have been absolved, Extreme Unction.

b) In order that the said obligation exist, it is required: 1. that there be no other who will certainly minister the sacraments; 2. that there be hope of fruit; 3. that from the sacrament ministered with danger to life there not threaten a greater harm, for example a common harm or the harm of many for whom the minister is necessary.

Corollary I. Pastors can provide many things through others, unless nevertheless they are requested by name. Bishops, however, can, at least today, fulfill ordinary offices entirely through others.

Corollary II. Benedict XIV concludes from rescripts of the Sacred Congregation of the Council that a pastor cannot withdraw in time of plague, even if he leaves behind a suitable vicar; nevertheless he can reserve to himself the care of the healthy if the vicar is ready to provide for the sick, lest the healthy, from fear of infection, flee both of them.[1] The same Sacred Congregation declared that this prohibition has much more force for Bishops.[2] Moreover, the things said about time of plague are certainly to be applied generally to a time of common danger, such as war or any contagious disease. Finally, pastors and bishops in a time of common danger cannot resign unless someone else can be substituted into their office.

[1] De Synodo dioecesana, book 13, chapter 19, n. 2.

[2] 18 December 1576.

35 II. Assistants who by reason of office supply the place of the pastor are held by almost the same obligation as pastors (cf. can. 476, § 6).

36 III. Other priests are obliged by charity alone (cf. can. 892, § 2; 939). They are bound under grave obligation if their neighbor is in extreme or grave necessity. If there is question of grave necessity, grave inconvenience excuses. If there is discussion of extreme necessity, or of grave common necessity, not even danger of life excuses. But concerning the obligation of ministering the sacraments with danger to life, let the things noted above concerning it be noted (St. Alphonsus, VI, 624; II, 27; Homo Apostolicus, tract 4, n. 14; tract 16, n. 125).

Corollary. If the people, because of a scarcity of ministers, are in grave necessity, a simple priest cannot abstain from hearing confessions and administering the Holy Eucharist; and if he is not suitable for hearing confessions, he is bound, if he can, to render himself suitable (St. Alphonsus, VI, 625).

37 IV. Superiors of religious, toward their subjects, are held by an equally grave obligation as pastors (cf. can. 514, § 1); nevertheless practically they are not held by justice, because there is no established tacit contract, nor is a salary assigned. There is added an obligation of religion, because superiors seem to be obliged from this motive.

Dissertation III. On the Reception of the Sacraments

We must speak first of the person receiving, then of the mode of receiving a sacrament.

Part I. On the Person Receiving

38 I. Only man as a wayfarer is capable of receiving the sacraments. Therefore angels and the dead are excluded. Nevertheless not every wayfaring man is capable of receiving all the sacraments; namely:

1. Every man not yet baptized is capable of Baptism (can. 745, § 1).
2. Every baptized person is capable of Confirmation and the Eucharist (canons 786, 853).
3. Every baptized male is capable of Order (can. 968).
4. Every baptized person who has fallen after Baptism is capable of Penance (can. 902).
5. Every baptized person able to enter into a contract is capable of Matrimony (cf. can. 1035).
6. Every baptized person who, after having attained the use of reason, is in danger of death because of illness or old age is capable of Extreme Unction (can. 940, § 1).

Part II. On the Mode of Receiving a Sacrament

In order that the sacraments produce the twofold effect concerning which there was discussion (n. 5), namely character and grace, they must be received validly and licitly. I said "in order that they produce the twofold effect," since valid reception suffices for producing character alone. In order, moreover, that grace be received, valid and licit reception is required.

Section I. On the Requisites for Valid Reception

39 For validly receiving a sacrament neither faith nor uprightness is required, as is clear from the sense and practice of the Church, which has always held as valid a sacrament received according to the rite of the Church in heresy. Penance is excepted, for which the good acts of the penitent are required, as will be explained in its own place.

Baptism, however, is required for the other sacraments. This is established, namely, from tradition, that the other sacraments were instituted only for those who through Baptism have been made members of the Church (St. Alphonsus, VI, 79).

Finally, for the valid reception of all the sacraments there is required, at least in adults, intention, that is, the will of receiving the sacrament; concerning which intention we must speak more fully (St. Alphonsus, VI, 80, 139).

40 I. Necessity of intention. 1. In little children and in the perpetually insane, that is, in those who have never enjoyed the use of reason, no intention is required, but the will of the Church supplies. This is of faith with regard to Baptism,[1] certain with regard to Confirmation and the Holy Eucharist, namely from the most ancient practice of the Church; likewise with regard to Order from the Constitution Eo quamvis tempore of Benedict XIV[2] (St. Thomas, III, q. 68, a. 9; a. 12, ad 1; St. Alphonsus, VI, 80, 139). Further, little children and the perpetually insane are capable of the sacraments which we have indicated, but incapable of the others (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

2. In adults intention is required, as follows:

a) He who both internally resists the reception of the sacrament and is forced to the external rite, by the consent of all, does not receive the sacrament.

b) He who internally resists the reception of the sacrament, but voluntarily admits the external rite, does not receive the sacraments which do not imprint character. Thus authors commonly teach, relying on this reason: that it is not fitting that the gifts of God be conferred on one who positively does not will to receive them. There is some dispute about those sacraments which confer character, that is, Baptism, Confirmation, and Order. Those few who judge that the latter sacraments are received in the case rely especially on the fact that Innocent III[3] declares that it is not absurd to teach that he who fictitiously approaches Baptism, that is, externally consenting but dissenting in heart, receives the impressed character of Christianity. Nevertheless, the more common opinion teaches that even the sacraments which imprint character are not received by one who internally dissents, although he externally consents. The reason alleged is that it seems especially unfitting that sacraments which carry special burdens with them should be received by a subject who does not will to receive them. For the rest, the words of Innocent III, considering their tenor, are of a kind to move anyone little.

c) He who neither consents nor dissents, but holds himself merely passively, much more probably does not receive the sacraments any more than one who positively resists reception; because it is not fitting that the gifts of God be conferred on one who does not positively will to receive them (St. Thomas, III, q. 68, a. 7; St. Alphonsus, VI, 81).

St. Thomas says thus in the cited place: "I answer that through Baptism someone dies to the old life of sin and begins a certain newness of life ... And therefore, just as in order that a man die to the old life there is required, according to Augustine, in one having the use of free will, the will by which he repents of the old life; so there is required the will by which he intends newness of life, whose beginning is the very reception of the sacrament; and therefore on the part of the one baptized there is required the will or intention of receiving the sacrament." And again: "If in an adult the intention of receiving the sacrament were lacking, he would have to be rebaptized; if however this were not established, it would have to be said: If you are not baptized, I baptize you."

With this doctrine of St. Thomas there cannot be reconciled the opinion of those who teach that the will which is required in the recipient is rather that of one not placing an obstacle than of one positively consenting.[4]

Corollary I. He validly receives a sacrament who, from fear, consents to reception; for fear does not take away freedom. Except Matrimony, which is invalid if consent has been extorted by grave fear, as will be explained in its own place.

Corollary II. The question treated concerning the intention of one receiving a sacrament does not regard the Holy Eucharist; concerning this, namely, it is not asked whether it is valid without the intention of the recipient, but whether without the said intention it is received sacramentally, or only materially, so that it does not produce fruit.[5]

[1] Council of Trent, Session 7, canon 13 on Baptism.

[2] 4 May 1745, article 1.

[3] Chapter 3, De Baptismo (III, 42).

[4] Cf. also, with regard to Baptism, canons 745, § 2, and 752; Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 3, n. 1; with regard to Penance, Roman Ritual, title 3, chapter 1, n. 24; with regard to Extreme Unction, canon 943; Roman Ritual, title 5, chapter 1, n. 6.

[5] Cf. the treatise on the Holy Eucharist.

41 II. Nature of the required intention. 1. In itself actual intention is not required, nor virtual intention, but even habitual intention suffices; interpretative intention does not suffice. I said:

a) Habitual intention suffices, in other words, it suffices that someone positively had it and has not retracted it.[1] The reason is that intention is required in the recipient only so that he may not be said to be sanctified against his will. But this cannot be said of one who enjoys habitual intention. Others except Penance and Matrimony. But as regards Penance, habitual intention suffices insofar as there is question of receiving absolution. It is another question, however, whether the acts of the penitent must be placed from an at least virtual intention, that is, by force of the intention of receiving the sacrament, in other words, whether they must be referred by the penitent, actually or virtually, to absolution.[2] With regard to Matrimony, which the recipients themselves minister, actual or virtual intention is necessary to this extent: that it is required that consent begin to exist from an actual or virtual intention of contracting Matrimony (St. Alphonsus, VI, 81, 82, 139).

b) Interpretative intention does not suffice, because intention of this kind, at least as it is understood by us (n. 15), in reality has not existed.[3]

Objection. The Roman Ritual[4] and canon 943 establish that Extreme Unction is to be conferred absolutely on the sick who, when they were in possession of their mind, at least implicitly asked for it or probably would have asked for it. Therefore with regard to Extreme Unction interpretative intention suffices, or rather a mind inclined toward the said sacrament, which interpretative intention indicates.

Response. I deny the consequence. And indeed the Roman Ritual and canon 943 do not speak of sick persons, faithful, who would probably have willed Extreme Unction, but who would probably have asked for it. But a faithful person who, while master of himself, would probably ask for Extreme Unction also, with sufficient certainty, willed the said sacrament more or less explicitly, just as the request which probably would have place indicates with sufficient certainty a mind inclined toward the sacrament.

2. With regard to the object, the intention of receiving such a sacrament is required, or of receiving what the Church intends through such a rite. But an intention more or less explicit of receiving such a sacrament suffices. A merely implicit intention, as for example the will of using the means of salvation, does not suffice if there is an explicit contrary intention; if no such contrary intention is had, the matter seems doubtful. With these things noted in general, receive the following in particular:

a) With regard to Baptism, the will of embracing the Christian religion suffices for receiving it, at least in danger of death. It is disputed whether the same can be said of the will of using the means of salvation, likewise of attrition or contrition. Many hold this as probable, because there is an implicit intention. But we judge that one must speak thus:

a) It seems it must be denied if there is question of those who reject Baptism at least more or less explicitly; of this kind are Jews, Mohammedans, and many Protestants today. But it seems it must be denied because, besides the fact that it is not proven that implicit intention suffices, explicit rejection seems to prevail over implicit admission.[5] There is added that the Holy Office on 30 March 1898 declared: "Concerning dying Mohammedans deprived of the senses, one must respond as in the decree of the Holy Office of 18 September 1850 to the Bishop of Perth, that is: If previously they had given signs of wishing to be baptized, or in their present state either by nod or in another way have shown the same disposition, they can be baptized under condition, insofar nevertheless as the Missionary, having inspected all the circumstances of things, has so prudently judged"; which at least proves that it is illicit to confer Baptism on those who reject it, and suggests that such conferral is invalid, because, if validity were posited, at least in extremis it does not seem it should be excluded. There are added canons 752, § 3, and 754, § 3, compared with the Holy Office of 30 March 1898, which seem to require a more or less explicit will. There is added finally that a practice conforming to the contrary doctrine never seems to have existed in the Church (St. Alphonsus, VI, 82; cf. VI, 483). Practically, the contrary opinion can be called licit, but not obligatory.

b) If there is discussion of those who do not explicitly reject Baptism, the probability of the opinion which teaches that the general will of admitting the means of salvation suffices, likewise attrition and contrition, the probability of that opinion, I say, seems rather slight: both because, as we said, canons 752, § 3, and 754, § 3, compared with the Holy Office of 30 March 1898, seem to require that the one to be baptized have signified an intention more or less explicit of receiving Baptism; and because the practice of baptizing those who enjoy only an implicit intention seems truly new in the Church. Practically, however, the contrary opinion seems licit, and, according to circumstances, obligatory.

b) With regard to Extreme Unction, likewise for receiving Viaticum sacramentally, the will of dying Christianly suffices; the same will in danger of death suffices for Confirmation; likewise for receiving sacramental absolution, at least considered by itself alone.

The will of dying Christianly, likewise the will of using the means of salvation, or contrition or attrition, according to the things explained above, do not seem to suffice in those who reject the mentioned sacraments more or less explicitly. With regard to non-Catholics who do not explicitly reject the said sacraments, it is not so proven that the will of dying Christianly, etc., does not suffice for valid reception.

c) With regard to Matrimony and Order, explicit intention is required; since, at least practically, there will not be had an implicit intention which includes the will of entering Matrimony or of receiving Order. There is added that the said sacraments carry special burdens with them, so that for that reason also a general will does not sufficiently contain the will of receiving them (St. Alphonsus, VI, 82).

Question. Whether the conceived intention of receiving a sacrament effects that it is validly received, even if it is ministered to one not master of himself, for example sleeping, drunk, or fallen into insanity.

Response. A few deny it;[6] but it seems it must entirely be affirmed, both because Innocent III teaches thus with regard to Baptism,[7] likewise Benedict XIV;[8] and because intention is not judged restricted unless a restriction is expressly placed, or is drawn from a contrary will once had (St. Thomas, In IV, dist. 6, q. 1, a. 2, sol. 3, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 81).

[1] Innocent III, chapter Maiores, § Item quaeritur, de baptismo; Instruction of Benedict XIV, Postremo mense, n. 46.

[2] Cf. the treatise on Penance.

[3] St. Alphonsus (VI, 82) and others teach that interpretative intention suffices; but they understand that intention which others call implicit habitual intention. The holy Doctor indeed calls it interpretative intention which was never had; but he intends the one which was never had explicitly, as follows from the context, namely both from the fact that he also calls interpretative intention general, that is, such by which someone implicitly wills the sacrament, and from the fact that he opposes interpretative intention to explicit intention.

[4] Title V, chapter 1, n. 6.

[5] It seems to others that in the will of using the means of salvation there is not included the implicit will of receiving the sacrament, but rather a merely conditioned will; in other words, he would will to receive it if he recognized it as a means of salvation; but this condition not being fulfilled, he in no way wills it (cf. Ter Haar, De occasionariis et recidivis, n. 503).

[6] Roncaglia, De Sacramentis in genere, chapter 5, question 2, response 2; Billuart, De Sacramentis in communi, dissertation VI, article I; Lehmkuhl (II, 65 note) doubts.

[7] Book 3 of the Decretals, title 42, chapter 3, Maiores.

[8] Instruction Postremo mense, n. 46.

Section II. On the Requisites for Licit Reception

42 In little children and the perpetually insane no disposition is required. In adults these things are required:

43 I. They must have the disposition by which they become proximately capable of the effect to which the sacrament is of itself ordered. Hence:

1. For the sacraments of the dead, that is, for Baptism and Penance, besides acts, at least implicit, of faith and hope, at least attrition is required.[1] That attrition suffices is clear from the fact that those sacraments are of themselves ordered to remitting mortal sins, and therefore cannot demand a disposition which already of itself remits mortal sins (St. Alphonsus, VI, 440). He who receives the sacrament of Penance without attrition sins gravely, because the sacrament is rendered invalid. Likewise, he sins gravely who, guilty of personal mortal sin, receives Baptism without attrition; for he inflicts grave injury on the sacrament who receives it in such a way that it is frustrated of its grave end, that is, the remission of mortal sins. If one guilty only of personal venial sin receives Baptism without attrition, he indeed effects that Baptism does not remit the venial sin; but only venial sin is committed.

2. For the sacraments of the living, the state of grace is required.

a) The existence of the obligation is clear from the fact that those sacraments are ordered to increasing grace; hence grace must already be present. Nevertheless, as was said concerning the minister, a necessity excuses which is so urgent that not even an act of contrition can be elicited; for example, "if a consecrated host were about to be profaned by heretics and someone, because of that sudden incursion, could not be contrite so quickly"; or if "a layman were reclining at the communion rail who remembered a mortal sin and could not elicit contrition because of the narrowness of time" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 86).

b) Gravity of the obligation. He who receives a sacrament of the living in mortal sin sins gravely, because he is guilty of grave injury who receives a sacrament of this kind without the disposition which its nature demands, or without the disposition required for the end or fruit to which it is of itself ordered, which is the increase of grace. There is added that a sacrament of the living received in mortal sin, even with attrition, according to some produces no fruit at all except character (n. 6; St. Alphonsus, VI, 86).

c) The certainty required concerning the state of grace. In order that someone licitly receive a sacrament of the living, at least broad moral certainty concerning the state of grace is required; but this also suffices. It is required because otherwise the one receiving exposes the sacrament to grave danger that it be received without the disposition which its nature demands, or without the disposition required for the fruit to which it is of itself ordered, to pass over the danger that it be received without any fruit at all; and this contains grave irreverence (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 15, n. 34). There is added that most authors, especially the more distinguished, adhere to this opinion. It suffices because these things must be taken in a human manner.

Objection. In order that someone who has sinned gravely be morally, although broadly, certain of the state of grace, he must either confess or elicit contrition with exquisite diligence. But the reverence due to the sacrament cannot oblige to so great a burden.

Response. I deny the assertion. Namely, in order that someone acquire broad moral certainty concerning the state of grace, it suffices that he either confess or elicit an act of contrition with moral diligence. God Almighty will not deny His help to one applying serious effort. For the rest, granted, though not conceded, the assertion of the adversaries, the burden set forth does not seem so great that, in order to avoid it, it would be licit to expose the sacrament to grave danger that it be received without the disposition required for the fruit to which it is of itself ordered, to say nothing of the danger that it be received without any fruit at all.

d) The mode of recovering lost grace. He who, constituted in mortal sin, wishes to receive a sacrament, can recover grace through an act of perfect contrition or through confession. If, however, there is question of receiving the Holy Eucharist, confession is required of itself; this obligation will be explained more fully in the treatise on the Eucharist. With regard to receiving the other sacraments, it is indeed fitting to confess, but there is no obligation.

Note. Besides the state of grace, the reverence due to the sacraments requires that the sacraments be received according to the rite perhaps prescribed in reception, and with that decency which the nature of the sacrament demands. To this especially belongs due attention, neglect of which nevertheless is only venial.

[1] Council of Trent, On Justification, Session 6, chapter 6; On Penance, Session 14, chapter 4.

44 II. They must ask for the sacrament from a minister: 1. enjoying legitimate faculty; 2. not censured, that is, not excommunicated, interdicted, or suspended, not irregular, or not canonically simply impeded; and 3. worthy, that is, living in the state of grace. Observe, however, that every minister is presumed suitable unless the contrary is established. But in order that the contrary be established, rumors do not suffice; indeed, one who has been a sinner is generally presumed amended, unless the contrary is evident, for example from a manifest voluntary proximate occasion not left behind. For the rest, receive these things:

1. It is a grave sin to ask for a sacrament from a minister here and now lacking legitimate faculty.
2. Of itself it is a grave sin to ask for a sacrament from a minister who is censured, irregular, canonically simply impeded, or unworthy because of grave sin, because it is proximate cooperation in the grave sin of the minister. Accidentally it is licit when a cause proportionate to the case and circumstances is present. This is clear from the things said concerning cooperation (n. 556) and from the canons soon to be cited. Hence:

a) From excommunicates to be avoided, and also from other censured persons after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence has intervened, the faithful can ask, in danger of death alone, both sacramental absolution according to the norm of canons 882 and 2252,[1] and also, if other ministers are lacking, the other sacraments and sacramentals (can. 2261, § 3; 2275, 2; 2284).

b) From tolerated excommunicates, and also from other censured persons before a condemnatory or declaratory sentence has intervened, the faithful can ask for the sacraments and sacramentals for any just cause, especially if other ministers are lacking; and then the censured person who is requested can minister the same and is held by no obligation to inquire of the requester about the cause (can. 2261, § 2; 2275, 2; 2284).

c) Concerning irregular persons and those canonically simply impeded, almost the same seems to have to be said as concerning excommunicates to be avoided (cf. can. 968, § 2).

d) Sacraments can be asked from a minister unworthy because of sin: 1. if the precept of confession or communion urges; 2. "if from delaying reception there threatens danger of a fall; 3. if you must fulfill the precept of hearing Mass; 4. if one is in mortal sin and does not wish to wait even an hour, because it is not a small usefulness to be freed from sin as soon as possible; 5. if you would have to lack, at least for a long time, communion or the fruit of confession, even if you do not have mortal sin; 6. if otherwise you cannot gain a jubilee; 7. if you need a skilled director and do not have another; 8. if you wish to apply Mass for a deceased friend" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 89). Indeed, for any just cause a sacrament can be asked from one whose office it is to administer such a sacrament, for example from one's own pastor (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

[1] The cited canons will be explained in their own place.

45 Note. It is pleasing to explain briefly how far the sacraments can be ministered to little children, the insane, and the partially insane, and received by the aforesaid.

I. Little children and the perpetually insane, as was already said (n. 38), are capable of receiving Baptism, Confirmation, the Holy Eucharist, and Order. Yet not all are conferred on them.

II. To the insane who previously possessed the use of reason, those things must be applied which we said generally concerning adults. Hence, for example, for valid reception it is required that before insanity they had the intention and did not retract it. For the rest, consult what is to be said concerning the individual sacraments.

III. The partially insane are not of themselves to be kept away from the sacraments. Namely:

1. Baptism must be conferred on them even outside danger of death; nor is so much instruction prerequired in them as in others.
2. Confirmation can be conferred, even if they have been instructed less than others.
3. Absolution should be granted, in doubt about sufficient use of reason or disposition under condition: 1. in danger of death; 2. at Easter; 3. as often as they have confessed a doubtfully grave sin; indeed, 4. several times, even if they have declared only light sins (St. Alphonsus, VI, 432; IV, 3).
4. The Holy Eucharist should be conferred: 1. in danger of death; 2. at Easter; 3. several times, if they show devotion (St. Alphonsus, VI, 303).
5. Extreme Unction should be furnished to those lying dangerously ill; under condition if there is doubt about the use of reason had both now and previously.
6. Order is not to be administered to them.
7. They can indeed enter Matrimony if they understand the substance of the contract; nevertheless they are generally to be turned away from it.

Appendix. On Sacramentals

46 I. Notion. Sacramentals are things or actions which the Church, in some imitation of the sacraments, is accustomed to use for obtaining from her own impetration effects, especially spiritual effects (can. 1144). This notion handed down by the Code will become clearer from what is to be said. Sacramentals are, for example, consecrations and blessings to be performed in the name of the Church, exorcisms, prayers prescribed by the Church and to be recited in her name, such as the breviary, and blessed things, such as water, Agnus Dei, ashes, palms, etc.

47 II. Institution. With regard to the institution of sacramentals, it seems more probable that one must speak thus: most derive their origin from ecclesiastical institution; but certain ones of them, such as exorcisms and blessings, were instituted by Christ at least in a general way and entrusted to the Church, yet in such a way that afterwards they were more determinately circumscribed by the Church both as to mode and as to effect.[1] To add new things to the sacramentals, or to change anything in them, belongs to the Apostolic See alone, as is clear from canon 1145. The reason is that sacramentals draw their force from the impetration of the Church alone. Therefore it belongs to the Head of the Church alone to constitute or change them.

[1] Cf. Schmid, Die Sacramentalien der Katholischen Kirche, p. 149.

48 III. Effects. 1. The effects of sacramentals are either the special deputation of some person or thing to divine worship, as, for example, the blessing of an abbot or the administration of minor orders, supposing that these do not enjoy the character of a sacrament, and the consecration of a church or chalice; or the attainment of some good, whether spiritual, such as actual grace, the removal of venial guilt and temporal punishment, or bodily, such as health of body or immunity from calamity by which the person himself or his goods can be affected. Special deputation to divine worship is the effect of those sacramentals which consist in consecrations and constitutive blessings; the attainment of a good, whether spiritual or bodily, is obtained by the sacramentals of exorcism, prayer, and blessed objects.

2. As regards the mode by which diverse sacramentals produce their diverse effects, it can generally be established that they produce them by way of impetration, as if ex opere operato, that is, from the work of the working or praying Church, and this independently of the disposition either of the minister or of the subject, and indeed with that infallibility by which God promised to hear the prayer of His most beloved spouse, namely the Church. Some effects, however, are received immediately, others mediately through the sacramentals; wherefore concerning the individual effects in species one can speak thus:

a) The special deputation of some person or thing to divine worship is obtained by way of impetration ex opere operato, infallibly and immediately.

b) Actual graces are obtained in the same way, and through acts placed by means of these graces, the remission of sins and other goods which the just man can acquire for himself supernaturally.

c) The expulsion and restraint of demons is obtained both by way of impetration and by way of adjuration or command.

d) Finally, temporal goods, such as health, fertility of the earth, and the removal of threatening evil, are obtained both by way of impetration and by way of adjuration directed against demons.

49 IV. Ministration or use. 1. In general, the legitimate minister of sacramentals is a cleric to whom power has been granted for this and who has not been prohibited by competent ecclesiastical authority from exercising the same power (can. 1146). In species, with regard to legitimate ministers, the following are established:

a) No one who lacks the episcopal character can validly perform consecrations unless this is permitted to him either by law or by apostolic indult (can. 1147, § 1).[1]

b) Any priest can impart blessings, except those which are reserved to the Roman Pontiff or to Bishops or others.[2] A reserved blessing which is given by a priest without the necessary permission is illicit but valid, unless in the reservation the Apostolic See has expressed otherwise (can. 1147, §§ 2 and 3). Deacons and lectors can validly and licitly give only those blessings which are expressly permitted to them by law (can. 1147, § 4).

c) With regard to exorcisms, see vol. I, n. 700.

2. In confecting or administering sacramentals, the rites approved by the Church are to be accurately observed (can. 1148, § 1). Consecrations,[3] and blessings whether constitutive or invocative,[4] are invalid if the formula prescribed by the Church has not been used (can. 1148, § 2).

3. Blessings, which are chiefly to be imparted to Catholics, can also be given to catechumens, indeed, unless a prohibition of the Church stands in the way, even to non-Catholics, for obtaining the light of faith or, together with it, health of body (can. 1149).

4. Things consecrated or blessed with a constitutive blessing are to be treated reverently and not applied to profane or improper use, even if they are in the ownership of private persons (can. 1150).

Note. Let the ministers of the Church explain to the faithful the nature and efficacy of sacramentals. Moreover, let the ministers of the Church show themselves ready in ministering sacramentals, and prudently accustom the faithful who neglect sacramentals to the use of them. Yet let them beware lest they apply ecclesiastical blessings, under whatever pretext, to ends other than those for which they were instituted by the Church, and lest by an imprudent use of them they expose this most holy institution to contempt, or stain it with the reputation of superstition or of dishonest gain.

[1] That law permits this to Cardinals (can. 239, § 1, n. 20); Vicars and Prefects Apostolic (can. 294, § 2); Pro-vicars and Pro-prefects (can. 310, § 2); Abbots and Prelates nullius (can. 383, § 2), according to the norm of the cited canons.

[2] Cf. with regard to blessings reserved to the pastor, can. 462, 6 and 7; with regard to sacred furnishings to be blessed, can. 1304; with regard to exorcisms to be pronounced, vol. I, n. 700.

[3] Consecrations are made by anointing with chrism or sacred oil.

[4] A constitutive blessing is one which orders a person or thing to divine worship, and so constitutes it sacred; an invocative blessing regards things, for example a ship, destined for profane use.

Treatise II. On Baptism

(St. Thomas, part 3, qq. 66-69; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 95-160; Homo Apostolicus, tract 14, nn. 7-38.)

We shall speak first of Baptism considered in itself, then of its ministration, and finally of the reception of Baptism.

Dissertation I. On Baptism Considered in Itself

50 Baptism is a sacrament by which man is spiritually regenerated through the washing of the body with water, done by another, under the express invocation of the individual Persons of the Most Holy Trinity. With this summary notion premised, we shall treat first of the existence, then of the essence, then of the effects, and finally of the necessity of Baptism.

Part I. On the Existence of the Sacrament of Baptism

51 Baptism is a true sacrament of the New Law. This is of faith from the Council of Trent,[1] and it is clear from Sacred Scripture, which openly teaches that Baptism is a sensible sign instituted by Christ and efficacious of grace.

I said a sensible sign, that is, consisting of matter, which is washing with water, and of form, which is situated in the invocation of the Most Holy Trinity. It suffices to have alleged John 3:5: Unless one is born again of water and the Holy Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God; and Matthew 28:19: Going therefore, teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit.

I said a sign efficacious of grace; since regeneration, concerning which Matthew speaks in the cited place, cannot be understood except as spiritual regeneration, which is effected through grace. For the rest, let the dogmatic theologians be consulted.

Note 1. It is disputed concerning the time at which Christ instituted Baptism. The more common and more probable opinion teaches that it was instituted by Christ before the Passion. Otherwise the Apostles would have received the Holy Eucharist and Order before Baptism had been received. There is added that the disciples of Christ baptized before the Passion of the Master.[2] Now the Baptism conferred by the disciples seems to have been different from the Baptism of John the Baptist. This is deduced from John 3:25 ff. It remains, therefore, that we say that the Baptism conferred by the disciples of Christ was our sacrament. For a third Baptism is invented without sufficient reason (St. Thomas, III, q. 66, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 96).

It is more disputed at what precise moment Christ instituted Baptism. According to some, in the discourse with Nicodemus;[3] according to others, when He sent the disciples to baptize.[4] According to St. Thomas (III, q. 66, a. 2 and q. 73, a. 5, ad 4), St. Alphonsus (VI, 96), and others, when He Himself was baptized by John.[5]

Note 2. The Baptism of John was not of the same efficacy as the Baptism of Christ. This is of faith from the Council of Trent.[6] Further, according to St. Thomas, "the Baptism of John was not of itself a sacrament, but as it were a certain sacramental disposing for the Baptism of Christ, and therefore in some way it belongs to the law of Christ, but not to the law of Moses" (III, q. 38, a. 1, ad 1).

[1] Session 7, On Baptism, canon 1.

[2] John 4:1, 2.

[3] John 3.

[4] John 4:1, 2.

[5] Matthew 3:11-17.

[6] Session 7, On Baptism, canon 1.

Part II. On the Essence of the Sacrament of Baptism

Section I. On Remote Matter

52 I. The remote matter of Baptism required for validity is true and natural water. This is of faith from the Council of Trent,[1] and is declared by canon 737, § 1. By true and natural water is understood that which according to common estimation comes under the name of natural water; for attention must be paid to this more than to the assertions of chemists. Water remains valid matter even if a diverse element has been mixed in, provided the quantity mixed in is small and does not change the water substantially. Thus, for example, valid matter is water into which a thousandth part of corrosive bichloride of mercury has been mixed;[2] with which water many physicians in a case of necessity baptize infants, especially in the womb of the mother, namely lest the mother's uterus be affected by disease.[3]

Water composed by chemical art from the elements which constitute water, that is, from oxygen and hydrogen, is doubtful matter. In the case there is true water; likewise water natural according to intrinsic causes, but artificial according to the extrinsic cause. Further, it is doubted whether water of this kind is valid matter.

Corollary I. Matter certainly valid is: 1. water drawn from wells, spring water, sea water, rain water; 2. water melted from ice, snow, or hail; likewise water condensed from vapor; likewise water purified from foreign elements by distillation; 3. sulphurous, ferruginous, or mineral water, provided that according to common estimation it is still called water.

Corollary II. Matter certainly invalid is: 1. blood, milk, wine; 2. fluids of the body, such as sweat, urine, saliva; 3. ice, snow, and hail, so long as they have not yet melted; 4. the sap of plants is almost certainly invalid matter. Amniotic fluid, that is, the fluid by which the fetus enclosed in the afterbirth is surrounded, seems to be invalid matter. For it is constituted by secretions from the body of the mother and of the infant, and therefore seems to have to be equated with other secretions, such as sweat, etc. Since, however, the matter is not so certain, in a case of necessity, if Baptism cannot be conferred in a more certain way, it can be ministered with amniotic fluid.[4]

Corollary III. Doubtful matter, besides water composed by chemical art, concerning which above, is: 1. moisture flowing from a vine or other trees; 2. liquid from dissolved salt; 3. water drawn by chemical art from plants, flowers, roots, such as rose water; 4. finally, broth, beer, coffee, tea, ink, mud, lye, and artificial waters are more or less doubtfully valid, according as they are thicker or thinner, or contain a greater or lesser quantity of foreign elements (St. Alphonsus, VI, 103, 104).

[1] Session 7, On Baptism, canon 2.

[2] In French: chloride de mercure.

[3] Holy Office, 21 August 1901, in Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1901, p. 289.

[4] Cf. Aertnys-Damen, Theologia moralis, vol. II, n. 47.

53 II. The remote matter required for liceity is water certainly valid, pure, and, if there is question of solemn Baptism, that is, Baptism which is administered with all the rites and ceremonies (can. 732, § 2), baptismal water, that is, water blessed for baptizing (can. 757, § 1). It is said:

1. Certainly valid; nevertheless, in extreme necessity only matter certainly invalid is excluded. If the matter is doubtful, Baptism should be conferred under condition: if the matter is valid; and afterwards it should be repeated under condition (St. Alphonsus, VI, 103).
2. Pure, that is, neither mixed[1] nor filthy. To use very impure water without necessity is a grave sin (St. Alphonsus, VI, 102).
3. Baptismal for solemn Baptism (can. 757, § 1); and this obligation is grave (St. Alphonsus, VI, 102). The consecration, however, must be done twice in the year, namely on Holy Saturday and on the Vigil of Pentecost, the old water having been poured into the sacrarium;[2] the precept of consecrating the water at the aforesaid times is grave. If lack is feared, common water can be mixed with it, even repeatedly, but in a smaller quantity (can. 757, § 2); if, however, it has become corrupted, or has flowed out, or has failed in any way whatsoever, the pastor is to pour fresh water into the font, well cleaned and neat, and bless it by the proper rite prescribed in his liturgical books (can. 757, § 3). Moreover, if the baptismal water is too cold, it can licitly be warmed or mixed with warmed common water.

With regard to the water to be used in private Baptism, it is better, if it can be done, to use baptismal water, but there is no obligation (cf. can. 757, § 3). Hence a priest called to confer private Baptism will laudably carry with him a sufficient quantity of baptismal water. "If baptismal water is not had and danger threatens, let the priest use simple water,"[3] whether holy water or common water, as it is permissible to interpret this word.[4]

[1] The Holy Office, on 21 August 1901, responded that the mixture of corrosive bichloride of mercury, concerning which in the text under I, is licit only where a true danger of disease is present.

[2] Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 2, n. 5; Sacred Congregation of Rites, nn. 2878, 3331.

[3] Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 2, n. 29.

[4] The Holy Office, 20 June 1883, prefers holy water.

Section II. On Proximate Matter

54 I. The proximate matter required for validity is the washing of the one to be baptized, done by the baptizer himself. This is clear from Sacred Scripture, which declares that man through Baptism is born again of water,[1] and is washed.[2] Canon 737, § 1, declares the same.

It is said:

1. Washing; and this indeed can be done in three ways, namely by immersion, pouring, and sprinkling. As regards validity, however, it makes no difference in what way it is done (can. 758). Nevertheless, true washing wholly requires:

a) That the water physically or immediately touch the one to be baptized. Hence: 1. Baptism is doubtful if the water has touched only the hair, scab, or birth matter still adhering in notable quantity. To birth matter there also seems to be numbered the vernix caseosa, which is accustomed to adhere to the fetus before cleansing. Hence surgeons and midwives, having removed scab and filth if need be, should either part the hair with the left hand while baptizing, or rather effect that the water flow over the temples of the head. Likewise, the sacred minister can, while pouring the water, divide the hair, or rather proceed in such a way that the water flows somewhat over the forehead (St. Alphonsus, VI, 107, q. 3).

2. With regard to Baptism conferred on the afterbirth, some teach absolutely that it is invalid, in whatever afterbirth the conferral may be done; namely, they judge that no afterbirth is a part of the fetus. Others hold Baptism conferred on the external afterbirth, or decidua, as certainly invalid, but Baptism on the inner afterbirths as doubtfully invalid. The reason is that they judge the decidua certainly, but the other afterbirths only probably, not to be parts of the fetus. According to others, Baptism conferred on whatever afterbirth is doubtfully valid. Many allege as the reason that the afterbirths are united with, or constitute as it were one continuum with, the umbilical cord, which probably belongs to the fetus; and thus Baptism conferred on the afterbirths would not be certainly invalid. There is added, they say, with regard to the inner afterbirths, that it is not yet wholly established that they do not belong to the fetus.[3] In what way, all things considered, the fetus must be baptized will be explained in n. 93.
3. Baptism on the umbilical cord is more probably valid than on the afterbirths, because the cord is united immediately with the infant, while the afterbirths are united with the infant by means of the cord.[4]

b) That the water touch the one to be baptized with successive motion, unless several parts of water touch several parts of the body at the same instant, as happens, for example, in Baptism by sprinkling. For the rest, successive motion can occur in two ways, namely both by moving the body to the water, as in immersion, and by moving the water to the body, as in pouring and in sprinkling.

Moreover, a small quantity of water suffices, provided nevertheless that it flows over a sufficient part of the body; hence only one or another little drop, even if it flows, will leave Baptism practically doubtful (St. Alphonsus, VI, 107, q. 6). It also suffices that the baptizer, by the motion of a finger or of a moistened cloth, wash a part of the body (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). Note, however, that according to the Holy Office, Baptism conferred "by way of anointing on the forehead, with the thumb moistened in baptismal water," had to be repeated.[5]

2. Of the one to be baptized; namely, in such a way that the man can morally be said to have been washed. Further, Baptism is certainly valid if the washing is done on the whole body or on the head, whether on the forehead, cheek, or crown; most probably if on another more principal part, as on the shoulder-blades, shoulders, or chest; it is more doubtful if on a less principal part, as on the hand, finger, or foot. The reason why Baptism conferred otherwise than on the whole body or on the head remains doubtful is "because ... in none of the exterior parts does the integrity of life consist as in the head" (St. Thomas, III, q. 68, a. 11, ad 4; St. Alphonsus, VI, 107, qq. 3 and 4). Hence canon 746, §§ 2 and 3: If the infant has put forth the head and danger of death threatens, let him be baptized on the head; nor afterwards, if he comes forth alive, is he to be baptized again under condition. If he has put forth another member, let him be baptized on it under condition if danger threatens; but then, if he is born alive, he is again to be baptized under condition.
3. Done by the baptizer himself. Therefore it does not suffice that the washing be done by the one to be baptized, or by a third party, or by a natural cause alone. Therefore:

a) Baptism would certainly be invalid: 1. if someone, seeing another washing himself or falling into a river, were to pronounce the form; 2. if someone were to utter the form while a third party poured the water (n. 20).

b) It would be doubtfully invalid if the baptizer himself were to place the one to be baptized under water poured by a third party, provided that the third party is not employed as applying the matter.

c) Baptism would be almost certainly valid if the baptizer himself moved the one to be baptized to water falling from a roof or from the sky, or springing from a fountain (St. Alphonsus, VI, 106).

Corollary I. If Baptism is conferred by immersion, it does not suffice that someone be held motionless in motionless water, because the baptizer cannot be said to wash the one to be baptized. Besides, according to some authors it is also required that the one to be baptized be drawn out of the water, according to that saying of Paul: Do you not know that all we who have been baptized in Christ Jesus have been baptized in His death? For we have been buried together with Him through Baptism into death, so that, as Christ rose from the dead by the glory of the Father, so we also may walk in newness of life; for if we have been planted together in the likeness of His death, we shall also be in that of His resurrection.[6]

Corollary II. They also ask about the throwing of the one to be baptized, for example an infant, into a river. Now Baptism of this kind is doubtfully valid, for example because there is not had, as we suppose, emergence. Moreover, a manner of acting of this kind seems absolutely illicit, because the said throwing of itself tends only to killing. "Nevertheless it is licit to baptize a child soon to die with even icy water, if other water cannot be had, even if it were feared that death would be hastened by this ... because then death would not occur of itself, but accidentally; since such an action of itself does not tend to killing, but to washing" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 100). The same, with the same circumstances supposed, holds concerning poisoned or boiling water from which the infant would be killed.

[1] John 3:5.

[2] Eph. 5:26; Tit. 3:5; Acts 22:16; Heb. 10:22.

[3] The fetus is enveloped in three membranes or afterbirths, which are: 1. the exterior afterbirth, which is called the decidua; 2. the inner afterbirths, namely the chorion and amnion. Cf. Cavellmann-Bergmann, Pastoral-Medizin, p. 242; Nouvelle Revue Theologique 1912, p. 581.

[4] Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1927, p. 146.

[5] 14 December 1898 (Collectanea, n. 2028); cf. Holy Office, 8 November 1770; 9 July 1779 (Collectanea, nn. 486, 530).

[6] Rom. 6:3-5.

55 II. The proximate matter required for liceity in solemn Baptism is gathered from canon 758 and the Roman Ritual. The cited canon declares: "Although Baptism can be conferred validly either by pouring, by immersion, or by sprinkling, nevertheless the first or second mode, or one mixed from both, which is more in use, is to be retained, according to the approved ritual books of the diverse Churches." Therefore the third mode, by sprinkling, is no longer to be used. The Roman Ritual defines the mode of baptizing more by these words: "The priest takes baptismal water in a small vessel or pitcher and pours it three times over the head of the infant in the form of a cross ... But where there is a custom of baptizing by immersion, the priest takes the infant and, taking care that he not be harmed, cautiously immerses him and baptizes by a triple immersion."[1] The triple pouring or immersion in solemn Baptism obliges under grave obligation (St. Thomas, III, q. 66, a. 8; St. Alphonsus, VI, 107, q. 5); in private Baptism it is recommended insofar as it can be done.

[1] Title II, chapter 2, nn. 19, 20. In almost all Churches which use the Latin rite, Baptism is conferred by pouring.

Section III. On the Form

56 The legitimate form of Baptism is:

For the Latin Church: I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. This is clear from the Fourth Lateran, Florentine, and Tridentine Councils,[1] and likewise from the Roman Ritual.[2] That Amen is not to be added at the end is clear both from the cited documents and from the response of the Sacred Congregation of Rites on 9 June 1853.

For the Greek Church: The servant of Christ, N., is baptized (here the name of the one to be baptized is placed) in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. This is established from the Council of Florence and from the decree of Eugene IV for the Armenians.

[1] Session 7, canon 4, On Baptism.

[2] Title II, chapter 2, n. 8.

57 I. For validity, so that it be certain, it is required that there be expressed in the form: 1. the person baptizing (I); 2. the person to be baptized (you); 3. the act of baptizing (baptize); 4. the unity of the divine nature (in the name); 5. the express distinction of the three Persons, and indeed by proper names: Father, Son, and Holy Spirit. That the act of baptizing and the distinct invocation of the three Persons must be expressed, all concede. Concerning the rest there is dispute. Therefore let there be expressed:

1. The person baptizing. Whether the expression of this in the form of the sacrament is required for validity can be disputed. For the rest, it certainly suffices that it be expressed implicitly, as is done in the form of the Greeks, where they say that is baptized has the same force as is baptized by me (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 66, a. 5; St. Alphonsus, VI, 108).

Corollary. The word I is not essential in the Latin and Greek languages, because the first person, as it is said, is expressed through the word baptize; the same cannot be said of several more recent languages.[1]

2. The person to be baptized indeed seems to have to be expressed, "because, just as the washing, so also the form must be concerned with a certain person" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 108). Yet it seems to suffice that it be expressed implicitly; this can be done even if the word you is omitted. Hence the Holy Office on 8 September 1633 declared valid the form of the Armenians: Now my hand baptizes in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.[2] But the declaration of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, dated 11 September 1841, that Baptism is rendered invalid through omission of the word you, was omitted in the new edition.

3. The act of baptizing, and indeed the present act or act now being placed, must be expressed, as is clear: 1. from the Council of Florence;[3] 2. from proposition 27 condemned by Alexander VII: "Baptism conferred under this form was at some time valid: In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, these words being omitted: I baptize you";[4] 3. from the Decretal of Alexander III;[5] 4. from this reason of St. Thomas: "Because the washing of a man in water can be for many things, it is necessary that it be determined in the words of the form for what it is done; and this indeed is not done by the fact that it is said: In the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit, because we ought to do all things in such a name, as is had in Colossians 3. And therefore, if the act of Baptism is not expressed either according to our mode or according to the mode of the Greeks, the sacrament is not perfected" (III, q. 66, a. 5, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 108).

But the present act of baptizing, or the act now being placed, must be expressed; otherwise, considering the form, nothing would be effected now.

Corollary I. The word baptize, or another equivalent, such as wash or lave, is essential; but not anoint, because it does not involve the signification of washing. But in order that a certainly valid word be used, it is better in the vernacular language to use a word derived from the Latin baptizare, such as baptiser, to baptize, unless there is had a word which by usage has been consecrated for signifying sacramental washing, such as doopen, taufen.

Corollary II. There is doubt concerning the form: I christianize you, or concerning the English formula: I christen thee, because it expresses rather the effect of the sacramental action than the action itself. Yet if that or a similar formula somewhere by common acceptance signifies the action of baptizing, it is certainly valid. Hence it is valid among the Yugoslavs, as is clear from the Slavic Ritual, which was approved by the Holy See in 1894 and contains for the Greek rite the form: krescaetsja (= is christianized), for the Latin rite: Ia te krstim (= I christianize you).

[1] The Sacred Congregation of the Council on 11 February 1797 declared valid Baptism conferred thus, provided that a bad or heretical mind is set aside: Enfante, te baptize en nom de Pere, de Fils et de Saint-Esprit.

[2] Collectanea, n. 74.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 696.

[4] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1317.

[5] Chapter 1, X 3, 42.

58 4. The unity of the divine nature likewise seems to have to be expressed, considering the words of Christ: Baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit.

Corollary I. In the name is essential, at least insofar as it signifies unity; hence it would be invalid: 1. with the words in the name omitted, to say in the Father, etc.; 2. in place of in the name, to use the words in the names (St. Alphonsus, VI, 111).

Corollary II. The following forms are valid: 1. I baptize you in the name of the Father, in the name of the Son, in the name of the Holy Spirit;[1] 2. I baptize you in the name of the Father, I baptize you in the name of the Son, I baptize you in the name of the Holy Spirit;[2] 3. I baptize you in the name of the Father and in the name of the Son and in the name of the Holy Spirit;[3] 4. I baptize you with the name of the Father, etc.[4] Further, the four assigned forms, according to the mind of the Sacred Congregations, are valid if, a depraved or heretical mind being set aside, they are used. 5. I baptize you into the name of the Father, etc.; for this form plainly agrees with the form handed down in Sacred Scripture.[5]

Corollary III. Since it is somewhat doubtful whether the words in the name signify the name having been invoked or by the authority, the following forms are doubtful: 1. I baptize you by the authority of the Father, etc.; 2. I baptize you name of the Father, in being omitted (St. Alphonsus, VI, 112, dub. 2). In the case of Faesulae,[6] Baptism conferred in Italian in this way, Io ti battezzo 'nnome del Padre, etc., is indeed judged valid; but the consultor argued from the usage in the Italian language, or in the Etruscan idiom, of omitting the letter i before m and n. Hence the declaration cannot be referred to another language.

[1] Cf. Holy Office, 11 January 1882, and Sacred Congregation of the Council, 4 May 1641.

[2] Holy Office, 11 January 1882.

[3] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 4 May 1641.

[4] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 16 August 1828; 24 May 1823; Holy Office, 23 May 1720. See Thesaurus resolutionum, vol. 83, fol. 134 and following.

[5] Cf. the Greek text, Matthew 28:19; Acts 19:5; 1 Cor. 1:13.

[6] 12 September 1801.

59 5. The express distinction of the three Persons. It is required that the three Persons be expressed explicitly, and, in order that every doubt about validity be excluded, by proper names, and those common or such as are accustomed to be used, and so joined that the distinction is sufficiently signified. This is clear from the words of Christ: Baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; likewise from Tradition[1] (St. Thomas, III, q. 66, a. 5 and ad 7; St. Alphonsus, VI, 108, 109). Therefore the three Persons:

a) Must be expressed. It is indeed disputed whether, by special dispensation in the time of the Apostles, Baptism conferred under the form in the name of Jesus was valid. But after the times of the Apostles all concede that Baptism conferred in this way is not valid. This is drawn from the words of Christ: Baptizing them in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Likewise from Tradition.[2] Hence the forms are invalid: in the name of God; in the name of Christ (St. Alphonsus, VI, 108).

b) Explicitly, as is proven by the arguments brought forward under a). Hence likewise the forms are invalid: "in the name of the Most Holy Trinity"; "in the name of the three Persons" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 111).[3]

c) By proper names. This is urged by the words of Christ and the ancient practice of the Church. The form is very doubtful: "in the name of the Omnipotent and the Wise and the Good."

d) And by common names. "As," says St. Thomas, "water is taken for Baptism because its use is more common for washing, so for signifying the three Persons in the form of Baptism those names are assumed by which the Persons have been more commonly accustomed to be named in that language; nor is the sacrament perfected in other names" (III, q. 66, a. 5, ad 7). Therefore in the Latin language it should be said: "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." But the following forms are doubtful: "in the name of the Begetter and of the Begotten and of the One Proceeding from Both"; "in the name of the First and Second and Third Person of the Most Holy Trinity"; "in the name of the Father and of Jesus Christ and of the Holy Spirit" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 109). The form "in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit and of Mary" is invalid if of Mary is said in the same sense as of the Father, etc.; but it is valid if the minister wills to invoke her as a helper in obtaining grace (St. Alphonsus, VI, 108).

e) And joined in such a way that the distinction is sufficiently signified. Now: 1. The form is certainly valid if the conjunction and is omitted only between Father and Son, and therefore it is said: "in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit." The reason is that the very word Son designates a distinct Person. Then, the usage is sufficiently customary of denoting distinct members in this way. There is added the response of the Sacred Congregation of the Council.[4] 2. The forms are somewhat doubtful: 1. if the conjunction is omitted twice: "in the name of the Father, the Son, the Holy Spirit"; 2. if it is expressed only between Father and Son: "in the name of the Father and of the Son, the Holy Spirit." The reason for both is that then Holy Spirit can seem to be an apposition of Son; for the name Holy Spirit belongs both to the Father and to the Son (St. Alphonsus, VI, 112). Responses are indeed reported which declared valid Baptism conferred in this way: Mi te abattezzo in nome del Padre e del Figliuolo, dello Spirito Sancto; but the matter is not sufficiently certain and clear to remove every doubt.[5]

[1] Rath, De Baptismo, n. 287.

[2] Cf. Rath, De Baptismo, n. 287.

[3] Nicholas I in the year 876 to the Bulgarians holds as valid Baptism conferred in the name of the Most Holy Trinity or only in the name of Christ, and argues from Acts; cf. Acts 2:38; 19:5 (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 335).

[4] 12 September 1801.

[5] Cf. Lehmkuhl, Theologia Moralis, II, n. 90, note 1.

60 II. For liceity it is required that Latins use the formula of the Roman Ritual, and Greeks the formula shown in their Rituals. Besides, observe that by any change a grave sin is easily committed; for some doubt about the validity of so necessary a sacrament will easily arise.

Corollary. From what has been said both in the present number and in the treatise on the Sacraments in general (n. 23), it is gathered that faulty pronunciation of the form is generally not substantial if it is made from haste, inadvertence, or because of stammering; more easily if it is made with a heretical mind.

Part III. On the Effects of Baptism

61 The effects of Baptism are:

I. Sanctifying grace, of itself first grace, accidentally second grace (n. 6), with the infusion of all the virtues and gifts of the Holy Spirit attached.

II. Sacramental grace; this consists in the fact that the sanctifying grace which Baptism confers is both ordered to this, that man be spiritually regenerated and live Christianly, and carries with it a right to actual graces in order to living Christianly. This spiritual regeneration involves the remission of all guilt, both original and personal; the remission of all punishment, both eternal and temporal, with the things to be posited being posited, that is, sorrow for sins.

III. Character. 1. The existence of character is clear from the things said in n. 8.

2. Effects of character. Baptismal character effects that man:

a) Is deputed to the worship of God according to the rite instituted by Christ and exercised in the Church, especially with regard to the sacraments, for the reception of which, therefore, he is rendered capable by character (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 35, a. 3; III, q. 63, a. 6; St. Alphonsus, VI, 79; cf. can. 737, § 1).

b) Becomes a member of the Church, and is obliged to lead a Catholic life, and is subjected to the authority and laws of the Church, that is, of the spiritual society instituted by Christ (cf. can. 87).

Corollary. In order that the baptized be bound to live Catholicly and obey the Church, it is not required that, after attaining the use of reason, they be asked whether they wish to hold the baptismal promises as ratified and in fact hold them as ratified.[1] Nor should you say: It is repugnant that someone be subjected to authority and laws without the consent of his will. That this is not repugnant is clear even from the fact that without the consent of their will infants are subjected to the authority and precepts of parents, and citizens to the authority and laws of their country.

[1] Council of Trent, Session 7, On Baptism, canon 14.

Part IV. On the Necessity of Baptism

Baptism is necessary by necessity of means and of precept.[1]

[1] On the notion of each necessity, see vol. I, n. 484.

Section I. On Necessity of Means

62 After the sufficient promulgation of the Gospel, the sacrament of Baptism is necessary for salvation by necessity of means, yet not absolutely but hypothetically. It is said:

I. After the sufficient promulgation of the Gospel. Thus the Council of Trent.[1] Now sufficient promulgation for some, but not for all, was effected through the sermon of St. Peter on the day of Pentecost. For the rest, authors more commonly teach that the promulgation of the Gospel for different nations took place at different times, and that for the whole world it has already long since occurred, although its diffusion has not yet been extended everywhere.

II. The sacrament of Baptism is necessary for salvation by necessity of means; this proposition is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that Baptism is free, that is, not necessary for salvation, let him be anathema."[2] Cf. canon 737, § 1.

III. Yet not absolutely, but hypothetically; by these words it is signified that there are means which can supply the place of Baptism, namely Baptism of desire and perhaps Baptism of blood, concerning which we shall speak in the scholia.

[1] Session 6, chapter 4.

[2] Session 7, On Baptism, canon 5.

Scholion I. On Baptism of Desire

63 I. Notion. Baptism of desire is so called because it is the effect of the Holy Spirit, who is also called Flamen (from breathing or inspiring). Now Baptism of desire is an act of perfect charity or perfect contrition.

64 II. Suppletive Character. Baptism of desire is a suppletive means of Baptism, that is, it does not justify except dependently on a desire, whether explicit or implicit, for Baptism. Now an implicit desire for Baptism is always included in an act of charity or perfect contrition elicited by one not baptized; for in such an act there is contained a general purpose of fulfilling all things which have been established by God, among which is the reception of Baptism by one not baptized.

65 III. Suppletive Force. An act of charity or perfect contrition supplies the place of Baptism with respect to justification, or the infusion of grace, and consequently with respect to all things which cannot be separated from it, namely the remission of original and actual sins, at least mortal sins, the remission of eternal punishment, the infused virtues, and the gifts of the Holy Spirit; but not with respect to sacramental grace, character, and the remission of all punishment.

66 IV. The requisites for Baptism of desire to justify are only those which constitute Baptism of desire.

67 V. The manner in which Baptism of desire produces its effects. Baptism of desire produces its effects only ex opere operantis; otherwise than the sacrament, which operates ex opere operato,[1] and Baptism of blood, which operates at least partly, as it were, ex opere operato.[2]

Corollary. For one who has been justified through Baptism of desire, there remains the obligation of receiving the sacrament of Baptism, if this can be done; nor can he receive other sacraments before that.

[1] Others say: ex opere operato actively.

[2] Others say: ex opere operato passively.

Scholion II. On Baptism of Blood

68 I. Notion. Baptism of blood is martyrdom endured by one not baptized.

69 II. Suppletive Character. 1. Martyrdom in little children not baptized is not a suppletive means of Baptism, that is, it does not justify them dependently on a desire for Baptism. With respect to the fruitful martyrdom of adults, even if you posit that a desire for Baptism is contained in such martyrdom, nevertheless it seems doubtful whether justification takes place dependently on the aforesaid desire; in a word: it is doubtful whether or not Baptism of blood was instituted by God as a suppletive means of the sacrament; perhaps the desire for Baptism is required only as removing an obstacle, with respect to the infusion of grace.

70 III. Suppletive Force. Martyrdom in the non-baptized, both adults and infants, supplies the place of Baptism with respect to the remission of all guilt and punishment (vol. I, n. 418).

71 IV. The requisites for Baptism of blood to justify. 1. In little children no disposition is required.

2. In adults there are required the same things which are required for martyrdom strictly so called (vol. I, n. 418). Besides, if the adult has committed grave personal sin, according to some there are required acts of charity or perfect contrition; according to others attrition suffices; according to others, per se an act of charity or perfect contrition is required, while per accidens attrition suffices (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 98).

72 V. The manner in which Baptism of blood produces its effects. According to some, justification in itself is effected ex opere operantis, while from a quasi ex opere operato there is given a higher degree of justification; similarly, some remission of punishment is given ex opere operantis, while total remission of punishment is granted by a quasi ex opere operato. According to others, both justification and the remission of all punishment are effected by a quasi ex opere operato. According to others, the effects are produced in the manner of the former opinion if the martyr elicits an act of charity or perfect contrition; in the manner of the latter opinion if he is only attrite; wherefore the dogmatic theologians should be consulted.

Corollary. An adult who knows that martyrdom is imminent is certainly bound, if he can, to receive Baptism; likewise, if he is a sinner and baptized, to confess, or, if he cannot confess, to elicit perfect contrition, and this already because according to what has been said mere attrition with martyrdom probably does not suffice for justification; and so the hope of martyrdom does not free them from these things.

Section II. On Necessity of Precept

73 The necessity of precept already follows from the necessity of means. Moreover:

I. Adults not yet baptized, or doubtfully baptized, are bound to receive Baptism as soon as they can receive it worthily and, considering the circumstances and the dignity of the sacrament, suitably.

"For adults," says St. Thomas, "the sacrament of Baptism is not to be conferred immediately when they are converted, but it must be deferred until some certain time, first indeed because of the caution of the Church, lest she be deceived in conferring the sacrament on those who approach falsely, according to that passage of 1 John 4: Believe not every spirit, but prove the spirits whether they are of God; and this proving is taken concerning those approaching Baptism when for some space of time their faith and morals are examined. Secondly, this is necessary for the benefit of those who are baptized, because they need some space of time for this, that they may be fully instructed concerning the faith and exercised in those things which pertain to the Christian life. Thirdly, this is necessary for a certain reverence of the sacrament, while in the principal solemnities, namely of Easter and Pentecost, men are admitted to Baptism, and thus they receive the sacrament more devoutly" (III, q. 68, a. 3).

II. An adult who without reason defers Baptism for a long time sins gravely, because he is bound to be enrolled in the Church and to live as a Christian.

For the rest, compare what is to be said concerning the time of conferring Baptism (n. 87).

Dissertation II. On the Ministration of Baptism

We must speak first about the person ministering, then about the manner of ministering.

Part I. On the Person Ministering

74 I. Every priest is the ordinary minister of solemn Baptism in this sense, that by the force of his ordination he is deputed principally, not secondarily as a deacon is, for baptizing, and can always be delegated by the proper pastor of the person to be baptized to baptize, and that solemnly (cf. canon 738, § 1).

75 II. A deacon is the extraordinary minister of Baptism in this sense, that by the force of his ordination he is deputed secondarily for baptizing, and can be delegated by the Ordinary or by the proper pastor of the person to be baptized, for a just cause, to baptize, and that solemnly. Hence he is not to use his power without the delegation or permission of the local Ordinary or of the pastor, to be granted for a just cause, which, where necessity urges, is legitimately presumed (cf. canon 741; St. Alphonsus, VI, 116, doubt 1). It was said:

1. A deacon is deputed secondarily, because he is ordained rather to assist a minister of a higher order, and secondarily to supply his place.
2. For a just cause to be granted: for example, if the pastor is absent or ill or subject to excommunication or occupied in hearing confessions; perhaps also if the parents desire it, for example because of consanguinity, etc.
3. Where necessity urges, granted permission is not required, but presumed permission suffices. Now necessity urges if the person to be baptized is in the article or danger of death; likewise if it is foreseen that the priest will be absent for a long time, and no other can be approached.[1]

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 21 January 1788; 16 January 1804; 11 September 1841 (Collectanea, nn. 593, 674, 939).

76 III. With respect to the right of baptizing solemnly, hold the following:

1. The Ordinary of the place and the pastor enjoy the right of baptizing solemnly their own subjects, or rather the inhabitants of their territory; this does not belong to another priest except by permission of the same pastor or of the local Ordinary, which in a case of necessity is legitimately presumed (canon 730, § 1). He who performs this without due permission sins gravely (St. Alphonsus, VI, 115); likewise parents violate the right of the pastor when, without necessity or permission, they bring their child to another priest to be baptized.
2. Even a traveler is to be baptized solemnly by his own pastor in his own parish, if this can be done easily and without delay; otherwise any pastor can solemnly baptize a traveler in his own territory (canon 730, § 2).
3. Where parishes or quasi-parishes have not yet been established, account must be taken of special statutes and received customs, so that it may be established to which priest, besides the Ordinary, the right of baptizing belongs in the whole territory or in part of it (canon 740).

Note. The Baptism of adults, where it can conveniently be done, is to be referred to the local Ordinary, so that, if he wishes, it may be conferred more solemnly by him or by his delegate (canon 744).

77 IV. With respect to the territory in which solemn Baptism may be conferred, canon 739 establishes: In another's territory no one may, without due permission, confer solemn Baptism, not even on inhabitants of his own place.

Corollary I. If a woman gives birth outside her own parish, she ought to see that the child is baptized in her own parish, if this can be done easily and without delay; otherwise she can choose either her own parish or that in which she gave birth to the child, or even another (canon 738, § 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 115).

Corollary II. Those without fixed domicile can choose whichever church they prefer (cf. canon 94, § 2).

78 V. Every human being is the minister of Baptism in this sense, that he can baptize validly; in a case of necessity also licitly, though not solemnly (canon 742, § 1). If, when a case occurs, several are present, the prescribed order, to be assigned under 2 below, is to be observed. I said:

1. In a case of necessity; wherefore note:

a) Extreme necessity is not required, but a well-founded danger suffices, lest an infant soon to die should die. The Holy Office, to the question "whether a midwife, when she foresees that Baptism will have to be deferred for a long time, can immediately wash a newborn, although he is found in good health, even without the knowledge of one or both spouses, the pastor nevertheless having been warned of this," responded on 11 January 1899: "It must be urged that Baptism be administered as soon as possible; but then it will be permissible for the midwife to confer it when danger is positively feared that the child will die during the time of the delay."

b) To danger of death is equivalent a necessity which can arise especially in mission places from the lack of any priest whatever or from difficulty in approaching him; namely, the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide several times approved the practice prevailing in several places by which catechists or other approved laypersons baptize the infants of Christians quickly, for example not beyond eight days from birth, even when they are in good health.[1]

2. The order to be observed among several ministers of necessity is set forth in these words by canon 742, §§ 2 and 3: If nevertheless a priest is present, he is to be preferred to a deacon, a deacon to a subdeacon, a cleric to a layperson, and a man to a woman, unless for the sake of modesty it is fitting that a woman rather than a man baptize, or unless the woman knows better the form and manner of baptizing. A father or mother is not permitted to baptize his or her own child, except in danger of death, when no other is present who can baptize. Thus also the Roman Ritual.[2] Now the prescribed order must be understood so that: 1. any of the faithful, even a woman, existing in union with the Church, must be preferred to any unbeliever, heretic, schismatic, or excommunicate to be avoided, even if he is a priest; 2. a woman is to be preferred to the father, but not to the mother.

3. An inversion of the order is per se illicit because of the precept of the Code and the Roman Ritual; but it is a grave sin only then: 1. when a non-priest is preferred to a priest existing in union with the Church; 2. when a non-Catholic or a person to be avoided is preferred to a Catholic. There is indeed doubt when a layperson is preferred to a deacon, since from the text of the law he is a minister by office (canon 741); but because he is only a secondary minister, it does not seem sufficiently established that there is grave sin. Besides, a just cause always seems to excuse from every sin; hence canon 742, § 2: "unless for the sake of modesty it is fitting that a woman rather than a man baptize, or unless the woman knows better the form and manner of baptizing" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 117).

Corollary. Let the pastor see to it that the faithful, especially midwives, physicians, and surgeons, thoroughly learn the correct manner of baptizing for a case of necessity (canon 743).[3] If Baptism was administered neither by the proper pastor nor in his presence, the minister should as soon as possible inform the proper pastor of the baptized person by reason of domicile concerning the Baptism conferred (canon 778). In private Baptism, so far as it can be done, two witnesses, or at least one, are to be used, by whom the conferral of Baptism can be proved (canon 742, § 1).

[1] 21 January 1788 (Collectanea, n. 533); 16 January 1804 (Collectanea, n. 674); 11 September 1841 (Collectanea, n. 939).

[2] Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 1, n. 16.

[3] Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 1, n. 13.

Part II. On the Manner of Administering Baptism

It has been explained above what things are generally required for administering the sacraments validly and licitly. It is sufficient to develop more fully one of the requisites for licit ministration, and to apply it to Baptism, namely the obligation of ministering the sacrament duly, that is, according to the prescriptions of the Church. For the sake of completeness we shall explain both the things which must be observed in the conferral of Baptism and the things which must be observed after it. The prescriptions of the Church regard first the rites and ceremonies, then the sponsors to be used, then the time and place, and finally the notation and proof of Baptism conferred.

Section I. On the Rites and Ceremonies of Baptism

79 I. The rites and ceremonies to be used. 1. Per se Baptism is to be conferred solemnly (canon 755, § 1), that is, with all the rites and ceremonies which are prescribed in the ritual books being observed (canon 737, § 2). Now:

a) The prescribed rites and ceremonies differ according as Baptism is to be conferred on adults or on little children. Nevertheless the local Ordinary can, for a grave and reasonable cause, allow the ceremonies prescribed for the Baptism of infants to be used in the Baptism of adults (canon 755, § 2); wherefore note that the Baptism of adults is indeed more beautiful, but longer, so that it can more easily produce weariness both for the neophytes and for those standing by.

b) The offspring must be baptized in the rite of the parents. If one parent belongs to the Latin rite and the other to an Eastern rite, the offspring is to be baptized in the rite of the father, unless another provision is made by special law. If only one is Catholic, the offspring must be baptized in the rite of this one (canon 756). From these things it follows that, so far as it can be done, care must be taken that the offspring be baptized by a minister belonging to the rite in which the offspring must be baptized;[1] since each person is bound to follow his own rite in confecting and ministering the sacraments (canon 733, § 2; n. 27).

c) The interrogations are to be made in the Latin language; but from the response of the Holy Office[2] it is permitted that the minister, after he has said the interrogation and responses in the Latin language for himself, repeat the interrogation in the vernacular language, so that he may receive the response of the sponsors.[3]

2. In danger of death, Baptism may be conferred privately; and, if it is conferred by a minister who is neither a priest nor a deacon, only those things are to be done which are necessary for the validity of Baptism; if by a priest or deacon, the ceremonies which follow Baptism are also to be observed, if there is time (canon 759, § 1).

It is disputed whether, if the danger of death is fairly remote, the ceremonies preceding Baptism also must be performed. Now this is denied quite probably, because the canon speaks only of the subsequent ceremonies, and perhaps does so in order that every danger that someone might die before Baptism may be radically forestalled.

3. Outside danger of death, the local Ordinary cannot permit private Baptism, unless the case concerns heretics who in adult age are baptized conditionally (canon 759, §§ 1 and 2). In such a case even the ceremonies which follow Baptism can be omitted.

[1] Here note canon 98, § 1: "Among the various Catholic rites one belongs to that rite with whose ceremonies he was baptized, unless perhaps Baptism was conferred by a minister of another rite by fraud, or because of grave necessity, when a priest of the proper rite could not be present, or by apostolic dispensation, when the faculty was given that someone be baptized in a certain rite, yet without remaining ascribed to it." Moreover, one who, at the prayers of the parents, contrary to the prescription of canon 756, was baptized by a minister of another rite, belongs to the rite in which he ought to have been baptized according to the prescription of canon 756. Thus the Pontifical Commission, 16 October 1919 (A.A.S. 1919, p. 476).

[2] 25 August 1880 (Collectanea, n. 1538).

[3] In some places it has been conceded that the interrogations be made in the vernacular language alone.

80 II. The obligation of the rites and ceremonies is grave from its genus. Hence it would be mortal to omit a ceremony of greater moment, on account of a special end or signification. Such are the use of consecrated water, the anointing both that which must be performed before and that which must be performed after Baptism, the use of oil and chrism consecrated in the present year, insufflation, the imposition of saliva and salt, the profession of faith, and the threefold ablution. Besides, several ceremonies of lesser moment omitted together can coalesce into grave matter (St. Alphonsus, VI, 107, question 5a, 141, 142).

81 III. Ceremonies to be supplied. 1. Ceremonies which in the conferral of Baptism were omitted for any reason whatever are to be supplied as soon as possible in church, unless the case concerns heretics who in adult age have been baptized conditionally and privately by permission of the Ordinary (canon 759, § 3). Now the ceremonies from the Baptism of infants are used if Baptism was conferred in infancy, even if the supplying is done in adult age;[1] otherwise those from the Baptism of adults are used.

2. When Baptism is repeated conditionally, the ceremonies, if indeed they were omitted in the former Baptism, are to be supplied, except in the case in which an adult heretic is baptized conditionally and privately by permission of the Ordinary; but if they were used in the former Baptism, they can be repeated in the second or omitted (canon 760). The same things seem to have to be said of the case in which a heretic, as one certainly baptized invalidly in heresy, is baptized absolutely.

3. If a heretic validly baptized is converted to the faith, the ceremonies likewise are to be supplied, unless for a reasonable cause it seems otherwise to the local Ordinary.[2]

Note. From baptismal vows no new obligation arises.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, 27 August 1836, n. 2743, III.

[2] Roman Ritual, title II, chapter 3, n. 12.

Section II. On Sponsors

82 I. Notion. Sponsors, or receivers, are those who lift the baptized person from the sacred font or receive him from the minister of Baptism. St. Thomas sets forth the reason for this institution in these words: "Spiritual regeneration, which is effected through Baptism, is in a certain way likened to carnal generation; hence it is said in 1 Peter 2: 'As newborn infants, desire the rational milk without guile.' Now in carnal generation the recently born little child needs a nurse and teacher; hence also in the spiritual generation of Baptism someone is required who performs the office of nurse and teacher, by informing and instructing him, as one newly received into the faith, concerning those things which pertain to the faith and Christian life" (III, q. 67, a. 7).

83 II. The obligation of taking a sponsor. 1. From the most ancient custom of the Church, no one is to be baptized solemnly unless, so far as it can be done, he has his sponsor (canon 762, § 1; Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 2, on reform of marriage). Also in private Baptism a sponsor is to be used if one can easily be had; if he was not present, he is to be used when the baptismal ceremonies are supplied (canon 762, § 2). When Baptism is repeated conditionally, the same sponsor is to be used, so far as it can be done, who perhaps was present at the former Baptism; outside this case, in conditional Baptism a sponsor is not necessary (canon 763, § 1).

It is said, so far as it can be done; hence Baptism is rather to be conferred without a sponsor than to be deferred for a long time because of the lack of a sponsor.

2. Only one sponsor, even of a different sex from the one to be baptized, or at most one male and one female, are to be used (canon 764). It makes no difference of what sex the sponsor is; but if several are used, they must be one male and one female; more than two cannot be admitted.

3. The obligation of taking a godfather or godmother is grave if solemn Baptism is in question; if private Baptism or the supplying of ceremonies is the matter under discussion, the obligation seems only light, just as also the obligation of using the same sponsor if Baptism is repeated conditionally. He who takes two male sponsors or two female sponsors sins lightly if both are of the same sex as the one to be baptized; gravely, if they are of different sex, because kinships are multiplied contrary to the mind of the Church (St. Alphonsus, VI, 155, 159).

84 III. The requisites for someone to be taken as sponsor. 1. In order that someone be validly constituted sponsor, it is required: 1. that he be baptized, have attained the use of reason, and have the intention of carrying out that office; 2. that he belong to no heretical or schismatical sect, nor be excommunicated or infamous with infamy of law by condemnatory or declaratory sentence, or excluded from legitimate acts, nor be a cleric deposed or degraded; 3. that he be neither father nor mother nor spouse of the person to be baptized; 4. that he be designated by the person to be baptized himself, or by his parents or tutors, or, these failing, by the minister; 5. that in the act of Baptism he physically hold or touch the one to be baptized, either by himself or by a procurator, or immediately lift or receive him from the sacred font or from the hands of the one baptizing (canon 765).

Note. If more are designated than the law permits, some judge that all those designated become sponsors whether they touch simultaneously or successively, unless it is known who were designated first, in which case only these are constituted sponsors. Others with St. Alphonsus (VI, 154, doubt 2) distinguish and teach: if they touch successively, the first man and the first woman who touch become sponsors, not others; if all touch simultaneously, according to some no one, according to St. Alphonsus all are constituted sponsors.

2. In order that someone be licitly admitted as a sponsor, it is required: 1. that he have reached the fourteenth year of his age, unless for a just cause something else seems good to the minister; 2. that he not be excommunicated or excluded from legitimate acts or infamous with infamy of law because of a notorious delict, even though no sentence has intervened, nor be interdicted or otherwise publicly criminal or infamous with infamy of fact;[1] 3. that he know the rudiments of the faith; 4. that in no religious institute he be a novice or professed, unless necessity urges and the permission of at least the local superior is expressly had;[2] 5. that he not be constituted in sacred orders, unless the express permission of his own Ordinary is added (canon 766). It was said licitly, which does not prevent all those excluded from being able to be validly taken, with the things saved which were set forth under 1. Besides, whenever someone must be rejected, he can nevertheless, if otherwise grave inconvenience would follow, be permitted to assist at the Baptism as a witness, omitting the things which belong to sponsors[3] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 156). For the rest, one who is ignorant that touching must be done is very easily kept from touching; commonly it suffices not to warn him. Finally, the minister of Baptism, if he wishes to act as sponsor, which is licit for him,[4] should choose a procurator who fulfills the parts of the sponsor, namely so that the observance of the ceremonies may be better provided for.

3. In doubt whether someone can validly or licitly be admitted to the office of sponsor or not, the pastor, if time permits, should consult the Ordinary (canon 767).

[1] By common law there are not excluded, for example, those who do not assist at Mass on Sunday or have neglected, even several times, the precept of annual confession or of Easter Communion. For the rest, the same persons are not included in different regions under the name of publicly criminal persons or persons infamous with infamy of fact.

[2] Nor can a religious who has been made bishop undertake the office of sponsor (cf. canon 627, 2).

[3] Holy Office, 9 December 1745; 5 July 1878 (Collectanea de Propaganda Fide, nn. 345, 447, 1495).

[4] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 14 January 1873.

85 IV. The choice of sponsors per se belongs to the person to be baptized, if he is his own master; otherwise to the parents or tutors; but if these are lacking, to the pastor (canon 765, 4).[1] Therefore it is prohibited to the pastor, and indeed under grave obligation, to reject suitable persons chosen by the person to be baptized or by his parents or tutors, and to substitute others; indeed this kind of illegitimate substitution seems to be invalid, since someone, in order validly to be a sponsor, must be designated by the minister only when the person to be baptized and his parents or tutors are lacking (cf. canon 765, 4).

Note. The Provincial Council of Utrecht wisely admonishes:[2] "If the pastor understands before Baptism that an unworthy person has been chosen by the parents for the office of sponsor, let him teach them the law of the Church in time, and prudently induce them to choose another. If an unworthy person presents himself unexpectedly, let the priest signify to him in an honorable manner that the law of the Church does not permit him to be admitted, but let him by no means rebuke him before others; indeed, let him easily permit him to assist as a witness; and lest, Baptism having been delayed to another time, the infant be exposed to danger of dying without it, let him baptize even without any sponsor."

[1] Council of Trent, session 24, chapter 2, on reform of marriage; Roman Ritual, 2, chapter 1, n. 24.

[2] Page 76.

86 V. The effects of sponsorship. 1. From Baptism only the one baptizing and the sponsor contract spiritual kinship with the baptized person (canon 768). This kinship, concerning which more fully in the treatise on Matrimony, is not contracted: 1. if a sponsor is used in supplying the ceremonies (canon 762, § 2); 2. when Baptism is repeated conditionally, neither by the sponsor who was present at the former Baptism nor by him who was present at the later one, unless the same sponsor was used in both Baptisms (canon 763, § 3).

2. The kinship which has been contracted constitutes an impediment diriment of marriage between the baptized person and the one baptizing and the sponsor (canon 1079), and causes a sin of lust committed by the aforesaid persons with the baptized person to be spiritual incest (St. Alphonsus, VI, 146, 147). Now "the receivers are to be admonished concerning the spiritual kinship which they contracted with the baptized person";[1] likewise concerning the impediment that has arisen.

3. It belongs to sponsors, from the office undertaken, to have the spiritual child perpetually commended to themselves, and, in those things which concern instruction in the Christian life, diligently to see to it that he show himself throughout his whole life such as, in the solemn ceremony, they promised he would be (canon 769). The obligation of sponsors is grave, but it binds only when parents or tutors are lacking. Practically, sponsors, where the baptized are "nourished among Catholic Christians, can sufficiently be excused from this care, presuming that they are diligently instructed by their parents; yet if in any way they should perceive the contrary, they would be bound, according to their manner, to spend care on the salvation of their spiritual children" (St. Thomas, q. 67, a. 8).

[1] Roman Ritual, title II, chapter 2, n. 31.

Section III. On the Time and Place of Conferring Baptism

87 I. Time. 1. Private Baptism, when necessity urges, is to be administered at any time and place (canon 771).

2. Even solemn Baptism can be administered on any day; nevertheless it is fitting that the Baptism of adults, according to the most ancient rite, be conferred, if it can conveniently be done, on the vigils of Easter and Pentecost, especially in metropolitan or cathedral churches (canon 772).

88 II. Place. 1. Private Baptism, when necessity urges, is to be administered at any time and place (canon 771). The same holds for private Baptism which is conferred outside urgent necessity, that is, for Baptism which, by permission of the Ordinary, is administered privately and conditionally to an adult heretic (cf. canon 759, § 2); and for every conditional Baptism which is conferred without ceremonies (cf. canon 760); if the ceremonies are supplied, this is to be done in a church or public oratory (cf. canon 759, § 3).

2. With respect to solemn Baptism, the following hold:

a) The proper place for administering solemn Baptism is the baptistery in a church or public oratory (canon 773). Hence every parochial church, any contrary statute or privilege or custom being revoked and reprobated, is to have a baptismal font, saving the legitimate cumulative right already acquired by other churches (canon 774, § 1).[1] Besides, for the convenience of the faithful the local Ordinary can permit or order that a baptismal font be placed also in another church or public oratory within the boundaries of the parish (canon 774, § 2).

b) If the person to be baptized, because of the distance of places or other circumstances, cannot approach or be transferred to the parish church, or to another church which enjoys the right of a font, without grave inconvenience or danger, solemn Baptism can and must be conferred by the pastor in the nearest church or public oratory within the boundaries of the parish, even though these lack a baptismal font (canon 775).

c) But in private houses solemn Baptism must not be administered, except in these circumstances: 1. if those to be baptized are the children or grandchildren of those who actually hold supreme rule over peoples or have the right of succession to the throne, whenever they have duly requested this; 2. if the local Ordinary, according to his prudent judgment and conscience, has judged that it should be conceded in some extraordinary case for a just and reasonable cause (canon 776, § 1).[2] In the cases mentioned, Baptism is to be conferred in the chapel of the house or at least in another decent place, and with baptismal water blessed in the usual way (canon 776, § 2).

In places of the missions, where Catholics live far from a church and infants cannot be brought to the church without great dangers and inconveniences, in those places, I say, the permission to baptize solemnly at home seems to persist.[3]

Note. Let pastors see to it that a Christian name be imposed on the one who is baptized; but if they cannot obtain this, let them add to the name imposed by the parents the name of some Saint, and write both names in the book of the baptized (canon 761). This addition can be made in a low voice.[4] Note, however, that there are many names of saints which occur rarely, or have been taken from other languages and altered.

[1] The Pontifical Commission, 12 November 1922, reply to IV, declared that canon 774, § 1 is to be understood so that a church which has the right of a font cumulatively with other parochial churches of the whole city obtains it also before parochial churches newly erected in the city with a baptismal font. But the cumulative right of a font cannot in future be obtained by custom, which must be called corruption. A church which before the promulgation of the Code had an exclusive right of font before other parochial churches, after the promulgation of the Code and the erection of a font in the same churches according to the prescription of the cited canon, obtains only a cumulative right, saving the prescription of canon 778 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 662). Canon 778 prescribes that the pastor of the baptized person be informed.

[2] The Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, 22 July 1925 (A.A.S. 1925, p. 452), to the question "whether the practice is conformable to law according to which infants who are not in danger of death, but cannot be transferred to the church without danger, are solemnly baptized at home by the pastor or by another priest with the pastor's permission," responded that it is conformable to law that, if the infant is not in danger of death but cannot without danger be transferred to the church according to canon 775, the Ordinary, by force of canon 776, § 1, n. 2, can permit, according to his prudent judgment and conscience, for a just and reasonable cause, in some extraordinary case, that Baptism be solemnly administered at home; but judging the gravity of the extraordinary case is left to the prudence and conscience of the Ordinary himself in individual cases.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 4 February 1871 (n. 3234, reply to III).

[4] Holy Office, June 1883.

Section IV. On the Notation and Proof of Baptism Conferred

89 I. Notation. 1. Pastors must carefully and without any delay enter in the baptismal book the names of the baptized, with mention made of the minister, the parents and sponsors, and the place and day of the Baptism conferred (canon 777, § 1).

But where illegitimate children are concerned, the mother's name is to be inserted if her maternity is publicly established, or if she herself spontaneously asks this in writing or before two witnesses; likewise the name of the father, provided he himself spontaneously asks this of the pastor either in writing or before two witnesses, or is known from a public authentic document; in other cases the newborn is to be inscribed as the child of an unknown father or of unknown parents (canon 777, § 2). Moreover the Pontifical Commission responded[1] that the names of parents are to be inserted in such a way that every occasion of infamy is avoided; but in particular cases recourse must be had to the Sacred Congregation of the Council.

2. If Baptism was administered neither by the proper pastor nor in his presence, the minister should as soon as possible inform the pastor of the baptized person by reason of domicile concerning the

Baptism conferred (canon 778). "If the baptized person lacks a domicile, the pastor of the quasi-domicile, or, if he was without fixed domicile, the pastor of the place of Baptism, seems to be the one to be informed."[2]

3. The use of the baptismal book is prescribed under grave obligation, regard being had, namely, to the grave end of the law, that is, the proof of Baptism received, which, if the baptismal register is lacking, would sometimes be impossible.

[1] 14 July 1922, reply to VIII (A.A.S. 1922, p. 528).

[2] Vermeersch-Creusen, Epitome, n. 55.

90 II. Proof. To prove Baptism conferred, if prejudice is done to no one, one witness beyond all exception suffices, or the oath of the baptized person himself, if he received Baptism in adult age (canon 779).

Dissertation III. On the Reception of Baptism

Part I. On the Person Receiving

The subject capable of Baptism is every and only wayfaring human being not yet baptized (canon 745, § 1; On the Sacraments in general, n. 38). Having noted these things about the subject generally, we shall speak specifically about the different subjects.

Section I. On Infants

91 Preliminary Note. When Baptism is in question, under the name of little children or infants, according to the norm of canon 88, § 3, come those who have not yet attained the use of reason, and to these are reckoned the insane from infancy, in whatever age they may be constituted[1] (canon 745, § 2, 1).

I. Infants before the use of reason can be baptized validly. This is of faith from the Council of Trent.[2]

II. Infants must already be baptized before the use of reason. Now:

1. It is clear that this is prescribed under grave obligation and by divine law itself if danger of death is imminent.
2. Outside danger of death, there is the obligation of baptizing them as soon as possible, as is clear from canon 770 in these words: Infants are to be baptized as soon as possible; and pastors and preachers are frequently to remind the faithful of this grave obligation of theirs.

It is disputed how much delay, if the infant is healthy, is to be considered grave. Some say fifteen or more days, others one or another day, others with St. Alphonsus (VI, 118) require a delay which exceeds ten or eleven days; this estimation of the holy Doctor is to some extent confirmed by the Instruction of the Sacred Consistorial Congregation concerning the visitations of bishops.[3]

[1] Those of seven years are presumed to have the use of reason; those not yet seven are presumed not to have the use of reason (canon 88, § 3).

[2] Session 5, canon 4.

[3] N. 148 (A.A.S., vol. II, p. 39).

Section II. On Abortive Fetuses

An abortive fetus is a fetus prematurely projected from the womb (vol. I, n. 733).

92 I. Every abortive fetus brought forth at any time must be baptized, unless it is wholly certain that he is dead (cf. canon 747). The reason is that in the case it is at least somewhat probable that a wayfaring human being is present (vol. I, n. 732).

The same must be said of everything which is cast out from the womb of a pregnant woman and concerning which it is doubted whether it is a fetus or a mole, as it is called. For the rest, even if it seems to be a mole, this should be carefully dissected, so that it may be inspected whether perhaps a fetus lies hidden in it; likewise, if a pregnant woman suffers a flow of blood, it is expedient that the flow be moved and palpated, because sometimes something is found in it concerning which it is rightly doubted whether it is a fetus (St. Alphonsus, VI, 124).

II. Abortive fetuses, brought forth at any time, if they certainly live, are to be baptized absolutely; if doubtfully, conditionally[1] (canon 747). If the fetus brought forth is still enclosed in membranes or in a vesicle, proceed in this way: Place the vesicle on a table or in a basin or dish, and place a bowl of water nearby. Then first either pour some water over the vesicle or immerse the vesicle itself in the water of the bowl,[2] meanwhile saying: If you can be baptized, I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Then, holding the vesicle somewhat obliquely in the bowl of water, open it with the thumb and index finger of each hand, so that the liquid flows out from it. Then again say, moving the fetus somewhat here and there in the water: If you can be baptized, I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit. Afterward you must again draw the fetus out of the water (n. 54).

Note 1. They say that even very small abortive fetuses sometimes preserve life for a longer time, indeed for several days. Nevertheless there is danger that they may soon die; hence inquiry into whether the fetus is alive should not be prolonged too much.

Note 2. The things explained above must be especially inculcated to midwives and mothers. And although pastors are bound more than others to this instruction, nevertheless confessors too, from a confession heard, can and not rarely must prudently take occasion to ask whether they have been sufficiently instructed.

[1] Before the sixth month there can scarcely be certainty about the life of the fetus, whether it exists in the womb or is brought forth before the sixth month; in the latter case it is either dead or appears dead. Today, however, by means of the stethoscope the pulsations of the heart can ordinarily be perceived from the fifth month.

[2] Therefore the vesicle is not immediately ruptured, but is first immersed in water and cut there, namely because rupture outside water, on account of the contact of air, according to some, though others deny this, can be so dangerous that the fetus dies before Baptism has been conferred.

Section III. On Fetuses Not Yet Brought Forth

93 No one enclosed in the womb of the mother is to be baptized until there is probable hope that, duly brought forth, he can be baptized (canon 746, § 1). Therefore a fetus not yet duly brought forth cannot be baptized unless, Baptism being delayed, he will probably die without Baptism.

When the case occurs, proceed in this way:

I. If the infant has put forth the head and danger of death is imminent, let him be baptized on the head; nor afterward, if he comes forth alive, is he to be baptized again conditionally (canon 746, § 2).

II. If he has put forth another member and danger is imminent, let him be baptized on that member, however small it may be, for example on a finger or toe (cf. canon 746, § 3). But if you receive the occasion of baptizing again on a more principal member, for example on the hand or foot, then on that member you must baptize again, and indeed as often as you can on a member more worthy than before, for example on the breast or back or shoulders, until you have baptized on the head; for only then, when you have duly baptized on the cleansed head, is one of the Baptisms certainly valid. But if after you have baptized on a finger or toe you can immediately baptize on the head, then omit the other members which I have named between these two extremes and baptize immediately on the head.

Note. In cases in which you cannot immediately baptize on the head, each time in washing the member you must use these words: If you can be baptized, I baptize you, etc.[1]

III. If the infant is entirely hidden in the womb, he is to be baptized conditionally. If afterward he is brought forth, he must again be baptized conditionally (canon 746, § 5).[2] A fetus enclosed in the womb is to be baptized conditionally, both because in practice it will be doubtful whether the infant was truly washed or was washed on the head, and because it is somewhat doubted whether a human being not yet born according to common estimation can be reborn.[3] But, "just as original sin is contracted by generation alone, so likewise, in order that a man be regenerated by grace, it suffices that he has already been generated. And therefore Baptism is called regeneration by the Council, which does not require birth from the womb, since this is not called generation, but only that nativity which takes place in the womb and by which man becomes a son of Adam" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 107). For the rest, note:

1. The obligation of baptizing an infant in the womb of the mother before the completed fifth month of pregnancy will rarely be present. The reason is that on the one hand there is often great doubt about the life of the infant and about the required washing having been performed; on the other hand intrauterine Baptism, because of the destruction of the afterbirth membranes, will both increase the danger to the mother and bring on the danger of accelerating the death of the offspring.[4] After the completed fifth month of pregnancy the obligation can more easily be present.
2. Concerning the manner of baptizing a fetus in the womb of the mother, I note: the infant, the afterbirth membranes having been perforated,[5] can be reached and baptized by means either of a small syringe filled with water, or of a sponge filled with water, or of a moistened finger.[6] Water mixed with corrosive mercuric chloride is usually used, and this licitly where otherwise there is true danger of disease for the mother (n. 53).

Note. It is clear that intrauterine Baptism must commonly be conferred by a physician or by a midwife, both because of decency and because of the difficulty and dangers attached to the matter. But if on the one hand it is foreseen that the infant will probably die in the womb, and on the other hand intrauterine Baptism cannot be conferred, it sometimes remains that the infant be extracted from the womb and, once extracted, baptized, absolutely indeed if he certainly lives, if doubtfully, conditionally (canon 746, § 4).[7] Now the infant is extracted by means of some incision of the mother, especially by Caesarean section, as it is called. Concerning these we shall speak in a scholion.

[1] Theoretically, more perfectly thus: In cases in which you cannot immediately baptize on the head, the first time in washing the member you must use these words: If you can be baptized, I baptize you in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit; at other times: If you are not baptized and can be baptized, I... etc. (cf. Roman Ritual, title II, chapter 1, n. 16; canon 746, §§ 2 and 3).

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 12 July 1794 and 16 March 1877.

[3] For the opinion which holds that an infant in the womb of the mother cannot validly be baptized, St. Thomas cannot be cited; for he supposes that Baptism cannot be conferred except by washing the body of the mother, so that he does not deny that the infant is validly baptized if the water touches him immediately (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 68, a. 11).

[4] Cf. Capelmann-Bergmann, Medicina pastoralis, II, p. 109; Pastoral-Medizin, p. 243; Antonelli, Medicina pastoralis, II, n. 16.

[5] Baptism first on the afterbirth membranes is omitted, because contact of air is not feared, contrary to the case in which a fetus already brought forth is to be baptized. The perforation of the afterbirth membranes, so that the fetus may be baptized rather certainly than very doubtfully over the membranes, is quite probably licit, because it yields equally immediately to a good effect, namely the possibility of baptizing the fetus, and to an evil, that is, the death of the infant to follow from the outpouring of the amniotic fluid.

[6] Cf. Capelmann-Bergmann, Pastoral-Medizin, p. 242.

[7] Roman Ritual, II, chapter 1, n. 20.

Scholion. On Caesarean Section and Other Incisions

Besides Caesarean section, symphysiotomy, pubiotomy, and combined operations are distinguished.[1]

[1] Cf. Antonelli, Medicina pastoralis, I, n. 308 and following; Capelmann-Bergmann, Pastoral-Medizin, p. 57 and following.

94 I. Notions. 1. Caesarean section is an operation by which, the maternal womb having been cut, the fetus is extracted from the womb. It is called Caesarean section from Julius, who was brought into the light by cutting and thence was called Caesar. Now Caesarean section can be done either on a living mother or on the body of a mother recently dead.

2. Symphysiotomy is an operation by which the cartilage, the symphysis, which joins the two pubic bones, is cut, whereby it happens that the width of the pelvis is increased and the fetus can more easily come forth into the light.

3. Pubiotomy is an operation by which one or both pubic bones are cut, and in that way the exit of the fetus is rendered easier.

4. Combined operations are constituted by symphysiotomy together with artificial premature delivery.[1]

[1] Cf. Antonelli, loc. cit.

95 II. Morality. 1. Caesarean section or another incision of the living mother, according to the circumstances:

a) Is licit if there is a well-founded hope of saving both the mother and the offspring, and by the section the hope of baptizing the offspring is increased.[1] It is said:

1. If there is a well-founded hope of saving both the mother and the offspring; for otherwise the section would involve homicide. "Evils are not to be done," says St. Thomas, "that goods may come, as is said in Romans 3:8; and therefore a man ought not to kill the mother in order to baptize the child" (III, q. 68, a. 11, ad 3; St. Alphonsus, VI, 106). Now hope of saving the offspring is not present except after 28 weeks from conception; before that he is not viable. For the rest, observe that hope of performing the operation with a happy outcome is present today much more easily than formerly because of the progress of surgical art.[2]

2. And by the section the hope of baptizing the offspring is increased. For it is licit for the mother to expose herself to danger of death so that the spiritual salvation of the offspring may be better provided for.

b) It is obligatory, that is, it must be sustained by the mother, if: 1. there is a well-founded hope of saving the mother and the offspring; and 2. by the section the hope of baptizing the offspring is notably increased. The reason is that the mother is bound to prefer the eternal life of the offspring to her own temporal life. Now since the infant can commonly be baptized either in the womb of the living mother, or after, the mother being dead, he has been cut out, therefore section of the living mother will very rarely be obligatory. If the case obtains, prudence will commonly require that the section be urged upon the mother rather than imposed.

2. Section on the body of a dead mother:[3]

a) Is laudably done whenever there is even the least hope of extracting a living fetus. Now some hope is already had about the fortieth day from conception, indeed even before, since they narrate that it has happened that fetuses have been extracted alive at the assigned time.[4]

b) Is obligatory, and indeed under grave obligation, whenever there is probable hope of extracting a living fetus. Now probable hope seems to be present after about the completed fourth month from conception.[5] But the obligation once begun "perseveres until the morally certain death of the offspring... How long life can be preserved for infants in the womb of a deceased mother cannot be determined: this depends much on the character of the illness from which the pregnant mother died; but there is no doubt that a fetus can survive the mother for an hour, indeed for several."[6]

[1] It suffices practically to note this; for there are also other cases in which the section is licit, for example if not only is there a well-founded hope of saving the mother and the offspring, but by the section the hope of saving the mother is increased, while the hope of baptizing the offspring is not diminished, etc.; but these cases cause no difficulty.

[2] Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1907, p. 15.

[3] Note that the death of the mother is not certainly established unless the first signs of putrefaction are present.

[4] Cangiamilla, Embryologia sacra, book II, chapter 5.

[5] Cf. Capelmann-Bergmann, op. cit., p. 62.

[6] De Smet, De Sacramentis, n. 313. Cf. Ferreres, Mort reelle et mort apparente.

96 III. By whom is it to be performed? 1. Section of a living mother, as is clear, belongs only to an expert; one who is not an expert would become guilty of homicide.

2. Section of a mother not certainly dead, but perhaps only apparently dead:

a) If revival, as it is called, is held as possible, the section should be done by an expert if one is present, because otherwise the operation would expose the life of the mother to graver danger without sufficient reason. If an expert is lacking, generally whoever is sufficiently skilled is bound, or at least one who has hope of extracting the fetus; because then there is sufficient reason for admitting the graver danger. Now revival is held as possible if the mother succumbs after a crisis of the nerves, whether induced by vehement pain or by another cause.

b) If revival is held as impossible, namely if the mother is seen to succumb after longer pains, the section again belongs primarily to an expert, who can admit the danger of accelerating death if it is present. If an expert is lacking, generally another is bound, as was said above.

3. If the mother is certainly dead, the things just said under b) hold.

I said above, generally he is bound, etc., because authors do not agree to what extent even a priest must, or licitly can, perform the section, or command that it be performed, that is, by ordering see to it that it is done. Now he certainly cannot proceed to the said operation if the common good stands in the way, namely if, considering the circumstances, it must be feared that by this kind of manner of acting the priest would become less capable of promoting the salvation of people, or that other inconveniences would arise from it for the faithful.[1] If danger to the common good certainly is not imminent, some judge that the priest is bound, because natural law, to which the decrees are not thought to be contrary, imposes the obligation. Others teach that he is prohibited from performing the section. They rely on decrees of the Holy Office.[2] The first decree indeed regards in itself circumstances in which the common good stood in the way; but the second, they say, which refers the petitioner to the first, seems to signify that a general prohibition is intended. Finally, others hold each opinion as truly doubtful, and consequently think that a priest can perform the section or command that it be performed, but is not bound. The matter seems truly doubtful to me also; but for that reason I think that natural law, as possessing priority, should prevail, or that the section is to be performed, except, of course, in the case in which danger to the common good stands in the way.

Corollary. All to whom the matter becomes known are per se bound prudently to see to it that the section is done, but especially relatives and the pastor. Therefore a surgeon should be called as quickly as possible, and meanwhile the uterus of the deceased mother should be kept warm.[3] Nor should the section be omitted, even if a fairly notable time has elapsed from the death of the mother; for they narrate that it has happened that fetuses have survived the mother for 24, indeed for 48 hours and beyond.[4] Hence a physician asserting that the fetus has certainly died should not easily be believed. Indeed Dr. Brillaud even contends: "Since medical science knows no sign by which it may be judged with certainty that the fetus is dead, the Caesarean operation after death must always be undertaken."[5]

[1] Civil laws commonly stand in the way.

[2] 15 February 1780 (Collectanea, n. 541) and 13 December 1899.

[3] Older authors add that the mouth of the mother is to be opened; but according to physicians the infant does not breathe in the womb of the mother.

[4] Eschbach, Disputationes physico-theologicae, p. 356.

[5] In Eschbach, op. cit., p. 363.

97 IV. The manner of performing the section. 1. The section is made from the navel to the genitals or pubic bone; but lest the intestines be injured, this precaution is to be used: once a small opening has been made, the operator immediately puts into it the index finger placed beneath the back of the scalpel or knife, and in the aforesaid manner cuts first the skin, then the other coverings which cover the intestines. When this has been done, the uterus, if the pregnancy is more advanced, will appear of itself; otherwise it will be found back behind the bladder. If this is filled with urine and impedes the finding of the uterus, let it be compressed by the hand and emptied.

2. The uterus, once found, is immediately cut, proceeding from the upper and anterior part to the lower; then the afterbirth membranes also are cut or ruptured, by which the fetus is enveloped.

3. The infant or fetus is extracted, and if certain or doubtful signs of life appear, he is to be baptized at once. If nevertheless danger of death is thought or feared to be present, the fetus is to be baptized before he is extracted.

4. After Baptism has been conferred, if the infant survives with hope of preservation, the umbilical cord is cut at a distance of two or three inches from the abdomen and is strongly tied with thread at a distance of one inch from the abdomen; when these things have been done, he is handed over to be nourished.[1]

Question. What should be done by a confessor who, from the confession of a sick girl, discovers that she is pregnant?

Response 1. If the girl is already pregnant from about the fourth month, she is bound under grave obligation to see to it that after her death she be cut; nor is she excused on account of the loss of reputation. Therefore let the girl reveal her condition to a prudent person either by word of mouth, or let her hand over to him a writing to be read after death, in which she declares her pregnancy and her will that after death the infant be extracted and baptized.

Response 2. If the girl is ignorant of the grave obligation, and it is feared that, once taught, she will not obey it, let the confessor proceed only by persuading.

[1] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis, II, n. 57.

Section IV. On Monsters

98 I. Monsters and prodigies are always to be baptized at least conditionally (canon 748). Namely, if the monster has a head and breast, or at least a head, even if beast-like, it is certainly a human being; since it cannot be anything else, because there cannot be generation between a human being and a brute: hence it is to be baptized absolutely. Otherwise Baptism is to be conferred conditionally; this also holds concerning one about whom it is doubted whether or not he ought to be reckoned among monsters and prodigies (St. Alphonsus, VI, 125).

II. If the monster has two heads and two sufficiently distinct breasts, there is a double human being; hence a double Baptism is to be conferred. If nevertheless danger of death is imminent, both are to be baptized at once under the form: I baptize you, etc.

III. But in doubt whether there is one human being or several, one is to be baptized absolutely, the others conditionally (canon 748). In practice, proceed in this way:

1. If the doubt arises from the fact that the monster does not have two sufficiently distinct heads and two sufficiently distinct breasts, then first one must be baptized absolutely, and afterward the other conditionally in this way: If you are not baptized, I..., etc.
2. If the doubt arises from the fact that the monster has two heads and one breast, proceed in the same way as was said under 1.
3. If the doubt arises from the fact that the monster has two breasts and, apparently, only one head, then let the head be baptized absolutely, then each breast conditionally: If you are not baptized, I..., etc.[1]

[1] Namely, if, as commonly happens, it is doubtful which breast belongs to the baptized head.

Section V. On Infants of Non-Catholics

99 An infant of non-Catholics, that is, of unbelievers, heretics, schismatics, and Catholics who have fallen into apostasy or heresy or schism, is licitly baptized:

I. When he is in such danger of life that it is prudently foreseen that he will die before he reaches the use of reason (canon 750, § 1), or when "it is very prudently doubted that, from the infirmity by which they are actually affected, they will not live, but will die before the age of discretion."[1]

Therefore a probability founded on this, that in some place, for example, half of infants die before the use of reason, does not suffice; nor a probability arising from this, that in some region a contagious disease is raging and there is grave danger that the disease may be transferred to infants.[2] If it is doubted whether an infant who is in danger of death has reached the use of reason, "let the missionaries try to instruct them in the better way in which it can be done; otherwise let them be baptized conditionally."[3]

II. When the infant appears perpetually insane;[4] in this case there can be no discussion of education properly so called (St. Alphonsus, VI, 130).

III. Outside the case of danger of death or insanity, the infant is licitly baptized, provided that his Catholic education is safeguarded: 1. if the parents or tutors, or at least one of them, consents; 2. if the parents, that is, father, mother, grandfather, grandmother, or tutors, are lacking, or have lost their right over him, or can in no way exercise it (canon 750, § 2). It is said:

1. Provided that his Catholic education is safeguarded. Now, considering the responses of the competent Authority,[5] it suffices that, all things considered, the Catholic education be in some way safeguarded, or that, all things having been seen, a noteworthy hope of Catholic education shines forth. Here, however, note that this kind of hope is more easily present in the case in which either parent is Catholic and the Catholic party consents, than in the case in which each parent is non-Catholic.

2. If the parents... consent; and so even the consent of the mother alone or of a female tutor suffices. And this holds even if it is foreseen that the other parent will afterward see to it that the infant is baptized by a heretical minister.[6] Now the said consent is required per se if it is a question of an infant of unbelievers. This is clear from the Instruction of Benedict XIV Postremo mense;[7] the same is taught by the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide.[8] But the reason seems to be that the Church, by conferring Baptism on the offspring of parents over whom she has no right, places that offspring in such a condition that it can and per se must be separated from the parents. But this seems to involve a violation of right (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 10, a. 12; St. Alphonsus, VI, 132). If the discussion concerns an infant of baptized non-Catholics, consent is not required per se, because the Church has a right over them as her subjects. It is, however, commonly required per accidens, because if it is lacking, hope of Catholic education will commonly be absent. Hence canon 751 declares that, with respect to infants of two heretics or schismatics, or of two Catholics who have fallen into apostasy or heresy or schism, generally the norms established by canon 750 are to be observed.

3. If the parents... have lost their right over him, or can in no way exercise it. The case would occur if the infant had been entrusted to a Catholic, or had been abandoned and received in a Catholic hospital or by a Catholic.[9] But if the parents have entrusted the infant to a Catholic to be educated, per se he ought not afterward be returned to them, even if they ask for him back and the infant has not yet been baptized; since the prior offering and acceptance ought not afterward be rescinded to the prejudice of the eternal salvation of the one offered (St. Alphonsus, VII, 130).

4. Finally, it is permitted to baptize infants offered by unbelievers if the missionary has a well-founded motive for believing that their parents too will in the future seek Baptism.[10]

[1] Holy Office, 18 July 1894 (Collectanea, n. 1877); Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 15 February 1781.

[2] Instruction of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 17 April 1777, reply to VIII (Collectanea, n. 522).

[3] Instruction of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 17 April 1777, reply to VIII (Collectanea, n. 522).

[4] Holy Office, 18 July 1892.

[5] Instruction of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 17 April 1777 (Collectanea, n. 522).

[6] Cf. Holy Office, 12 October 1600; 29 November 1672, reply to I (Collectanea, n. 205); Instruction of the Holy Office, 1827; Holy Office, 6 July 1898, reply to IV (Collectanea, n. 2007).

[7] 28 February 1747.

[8] Holy Office, 29 November 1672, reply to I (Collectanea, n. 205).

[9] The cited Instruction of Benedict XIV.

[10] Holy Office, 11 December 1850, reply to IV (Collectanea, n. 1054).

100 Corollary I. An infant of non-Catholic parents, whether legitimately or illegitimately baptized, per se must be withdrawn from the care of the parents so that he may be educated Catholicly. But in practice the Church will not be able to use her right (St. Alphonsus, VI, 127, 128).

Corollary II. The fact that parents baptized Catholic live so non-Catholicly that there is little hope of Christian education is not a reason for refusing Baptism.[1] The same must be said of infants of Catholics who have given their name to socialism.

Corollary III. If a Catholic mother desires that the infant be baptized Catholicly, but the non-Catholic father wishes him to be baptized after some time by a heretical minister, proceed in this way: If the offspring will soon be baptized by a heretical minister, it is better to wait and afterward baptize the offspring conditionally. If one must wait longer, it is better to baptize the infant Catholicly at once. In the case, per se indeed, the heretical spouse is to be warned about the Baptism conferred; but if grave inconvenience stands in the way of warning, a second Baptism can be permitted. Besides, prudence will sometimes suggest that the Baptism be conferred by someone other than the pastor himself; let a Catholic and trustworthy person be chosen.

[1] Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 31 January 1796 (Collectanea, n. 625).

Section VI. On Adults

When Baptism is in question, those are considered adults who enjoy the use of reason (canon 745, § 2). Moreover:

101 I. Adults are bound, as soon as it can morally be done, to acquire sufficient instruction for themselves and to receive Baptism. If they are sufficiently instructed and rightly disposed and ask for it, per se they must be baptized, even if they are minors and their parents contradict it (canon 745, § 2). The reason is that with respect to eternal salvation they are in their own right (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 10, a. 12; St. Alphonsus, VI, 128). I said per se, since circumstances or even the common good sometimes require that Baptism be delayed.

The Holy Office,[1] to the question "whether a girl of ten years living in a monastery can safely be admitted to the profession of the Catholic faith, her heretical father being unwilling," responded: "Let the Vicar Apostolic first take care with all his strength to obtain the consent of the girl's father. If consent is not obtained, let him seriously weigh the inconveniences which are foreseen to arise from the admission of such a girl into the Church, both with respect to grave damage to the Catholic school and mission; and insofar as no inconveniences, or only contemptible ones, are foreseen, let him admit her without delay; but insofar as grave inconveniences are foreseen as future, let him defer her admission to the formal and public profession of the Catholic faith, unless danger of death is imminent; and meanwhile let him take care to exhort her to persevere in her good purpose, and to pray God that He deign to remove all obstacles; and at the same time let him see to it that she continue in the monastery, so that in this way she may complete and perfect her Catholic education." Therefore great prudence is necessary, and in cases of this sort a new reason is found for observing canon 744, by force of which the Baptism of adults, where it can conveniently be done, is to be referred to the local Ordinary.

Corollary. Children baptized against the will or without the knowledge of their parents per se can, if they are exposed to dangers of faith, withdraw themselves from their parents and be helped in this by others; but prudence commonly prohibits these things from being put into practice, all the more because civil law commonly stands in the way.

[1] 16 July 1881.

102 II. With respect to the Baptism of dying adults, these things specifically must be noted:

1. A dying adult who can no longer ask for Baptism, but who either previously or in the present state with some probability manifested an at least more or less explicit intention of receiving Baptism, is to be baptized conditionally; if afterward he recovers and a doubt remains concerning the value of the Baptism conferred, Baptism is again to be conferred conditionally (cf. canons 752, § 3 and 754, § 3).
2. A dying adult who can no longer ask for Baptism, but who with some probability is judged contrite or attrite, or to have the will of employing the means of salvation, in our opinion can, but need not, be baptized conditionally if he more or less explicitly rejects Baptism, as if the case concerns a Jew (n. 41). If that does not obtain, per se he seems to be baptized conditionally (n. 41). I said per se, because prudence can prohibit this doctrine from being brought into practice.

Section VII. On the Insane and the Furious

103 I. The insane and the furious who are such from birth, or at least before attaining the use of reason, are to be baptized, even against the will of their parents insofar as prudence permits it (cf. canon 754, § 1; n. 99). Those who became insane or furious after the use of reason are to be treated as adults, and therefore cannot be baptized unless, before they became insane, they had the desire of receiving Baptism; but if it is certain or probable, even slightly, that this took place, they are to be baptized when danger of death is imminent (canon 754, § 3), or even during the course of life if it is rightly feared that, when danger of death is imminent, Baptism will be omitted.

II. Those who have lucid intervals, while they are in possession of their mind, are to be baptized if they wish (canon 754, § 2). They are also to be baptized, as was said concerning other insane persons, when danger of death is imminent, if before they became insane they showed a desire of receiving Baptism (canon 754, § 3).

III. One who labors under lethargy or frenzy is to be baptized only when awake and willing; but if danger of death threatens, let the things said concerning the insane and concerning those who have lucid intervals be observed (canon 754, § 4).

Scholion. On the Doubtfully Baptized

104 I. Those doubtfully baptized or doubtfully validly baptized must be rebaptized under condition whenever, after diligent examination has been instituted, a prudent doubt remains about the conferral and its validity (cf. canon 732, § 2). It is said:

1. After diligent examination has been instituted. The reason is that the examination instituted perhaps will procure sufficient certainty about the value of Baptism, so that, the examination being neglected, it would be rash and injurious to the sacrament to repeat Baptism immediately (St. Alphonsus, VI, 136 and following). Some authors indeed judged that those baptized by a layperson can be rebaptized even when no inquiry has been carried out; indeed there were synods which in such a case simply prescribed repetition. But that this opinion must be rejected is clear from the fact that it can happen that the value of Baptism conferred by a layperson is morally certain. Hence the said synods were afterward corrected, and Benedict XIV teaches that they are to be disapproved.[1]

2. Whenever a prudent doubt remains about the conferral and its validity. With respect to proof of Baptism, canon 779 establishes: "To prove Baptism conferred, if prejudice is done to no one, one witness beyond all exception suffices, or the oath of the baptized person himself, if he received Baptism in adult age." But authors dispute what things for the most part are required so that one may be permitted to trust, with moral certainty, the testimony of a layperson concerning Baptism duly conferred. Some judge that it suffices that a physician or midwife, taught the method of baptizing, testifies in the particular case that he or she baptized duly, provided nothing occurs which weakens the testimony.[2] Others besides require that the physician or midwife of unimpaired reputation has often been found to baptize duly. Others require that the testimony of the layperson be confirmed by at least one witness. But the circumstances must be inspected, which certainly can be such that certainty about the value of Baptism is had, although the layperson has not often been found to have baptized duly, or his testimony is not confirmed by another witness. Nor do I think that this is simply denied by any author.[3] Nevertheless midwives should be admonished that they baptize in the presence of one or another witness, who attends to the manner of baptizing, warns the midwife if she errs, and afterward can testify concerning Baptism duly conferred. The same must be applied in many regions to catechists, since very great is the levity of many peoples in asserting even grave matters.

Corollary I. Those who, a long time after Baptism received, begin to doubt whether they were duly baptized by a pastor or by a midwife should put away scruples. It must be judged that he was duly examined at the proper time, if it was necessary. Besides, according to many, one born of Catholic parents and educated among Catholics, although no testimony concerning Baptism exists, is not to be rebaptized. Nevertheless the presumption deduced from these things is today rather often destroyed by a contrary presumption in regions where negligence of parents is not rare, for example by easily deferring Baptism. Therefore if, after inquiry, a prudent doubt remains, Baptism is to be repeated under condition. Moreover, the sole reason that no positive testimony exists is not sufficient for repeating Baptism before ordination.[4] Nor in the case of a mixed marriage, before the marriage, must the non-Catholic party be baptized under condition because of doubt about Baptism, if that party wishes to remain in heresy.[5]

Corollary II. Exposed and found infants, unless, the matter having been diligently investigated, their Baptism is established, are to be baptized under condition (canon 749). In practice they commonly must be baptized under condition, and this even if a slip is attached by which the conferral of Baptism is signified, unless the person who wrote the slip is both certainly known and held for certainly worthy of trust, or it is proved from another source that Baptism was duly conferred (St. Alphonsus, VI, 135).[6] Considering the documents cited in the note, per se inquiry must first be made, unless there is danger in delay; in practice, however, in some regions it is not customary to do this. The things which have been said about exposed infants are also to be applied to infants abandoned by vagrant parents, and this even if they have already been born, for example, three or five or more years, unless there is indubitable certainty about Baptism received.

Corollary III. Those baptized by a layperson, for example by a physician or by a midwife, must not rarely be baptized under condition, because, when inquiry has been made, a doubt often remains. Except if a duly instructed, Catholic, sincere person of proven solidity affirms that he or she baptized duly. If the case concerns a non-Catholic person, some doubt will more easily remain; indeed if a hater of religion, for example a Jew, baptized, there can be reason for doubting due intention.

If an infant was baptized by a layperson, let the priest inquire: 1. what form he used; 2. whether the water was natural; onto what part it was poured; whether it touched the skin, or only the hair or the uncleanness of birth; whether it was poured in sufficient quantity, so that it flowed; whether he washed the infant and pronounced the form with sufficient simultaneity.

Corollary IV. Converted heretics commonly must be baptized under condition, because, when examination has been instituted, doubt about the value commonly remains. The Holy Office declared that examination must be instituted.[7] Inquiry should be made whether the sect to which the newly converted person belonged holds Baptism in great esteem and is accustomed to take great care about the form and matter; whether the little minister is religious, and in what manner he was accustomed to baptize. When the matter has been examined, outside the case of imminent danger of death, the judgment of the Bishop must always be sought; he will judge in particular cases whether some probable doubt concerning validity underlies.

[1] De Synodo dioecesana, book 7, chapter 6, n. 7.

[2] Benedict XIV, De Synodo dioecesana, book 7, chapter 7, n. 11.

[3] The Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide on 8 September 1869 for the East Indies established: "In order that the missionary not be bound to baptize under condition those baptized by a trustworthy catechist, it is required that there be two witnesses who can testify that Baptism was legitimately conferred; excepting, however, certain cases in which, with the individual circumstances weighed, and with attention paid to the skill and probity of the catechist, to whom nevertheless trust is not to be granted too easily, it can happen that no probable doubt at all about the validity of Baptism arises, even if two witnesses were not present."

[4] Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 30 September 1848 (Collectanea, n. 1034).

[5] Holy Office, 13 April 1878.

[6] Holy Office, 5 January 1724 (Collectanea, n. 299).

[7] 20 November 1878 (Collectanea, n. 1504); 21 February 1883 (Collectanea, n. 1590).

105 II. The order to be observed in reconciling a heretic from the responses of the Holy Office is this:[1]

1. If Baptism is conferred absolutely, no abjuration nor absolution is required, because the sacrament of regeneration washes away all things.
2. When Baptism has been judged valid, only the abjuration or profession of faith is received, which is followed by absolution from censures.
3. If Baptism is to be repeated under condition, it is permitted to proceed in a twofold order, namely:

a) Either thus: 1. Abjuration or profession of faith; 2. conditional Baptism; 3. sacramental confession with conditional absolution.

b) Or thus: 1. Abjuration or profession of faith; 2. sacramental confession without absolution; 3. conditional Baptism; 4. a summary repetition of the confession and conditional absolution.

With respect to abjuration, the Profession of Faith which is found at the beginning of the Code suffices; and it "is held juridically performed when it is made before the local Ordinary himself or his delegate and at least two witnesses" (canon 2314, § 2).

[1] 20 July 1859 (Collectanea, n. 1178); 2 December 1874 (Collectanea, n. 1426).

Part II. On the Manner of Receiving Baptism

With respect to the reception of Baptism, both valid and licit, we refer to those things which we noted in the treatise On the Sacraments in general (n. 39 and following). Nevertheless, it is pleasing to enlarge what was said about licit reception with these things concerning the Baptism of an adult. Therefore in an adult to be baptized there are required:

106 I. Faith. This is clear from these words of Christ in Mark 16:16: "He who believes and has been baptized will be saved." Now explicit faith is required in those things which certainly or probably must be believed by necessity of means: in those certainly to be believed, because otherwise the sacrament would certainly be received fruitlessly; in those probably to be believed, because it would probably be received fruitlessly (vol. I, n. 488).

107 II. Instruction, according to these things in canon 752:

1. An adult is not to be baptized unless knowing and willing and well instructed (§ 1).
2. But in danger of death, if he cannot be instructed more diligently in the principal mysteries of faith, it is sufficient, for Baptism to be conferred, that he in some way show that he assents to them and seriously promise that he will observe the commandments of the Christian religion (§ 2).
3. Indeed, if because of impending death or other circumstances instruction cannot be premised, nevertheless Baptism is to be conferred, even if explicit faith is lacking in those things which are only probably to be believed by necessity of means.
4. Finally, if it is doubted whether a dying person has reached the state of discretion, let him be instructed in the better way in which it can be done.[1]

[1] Holy Office, 18 July 1892, reply to IV (Nouvelle Revue Theologique, 1897, p. 95).

108 III. Attrition, and indeed supernatural attrition, concerning mortal sins, if any have been committed by the one to be baptized (canon 752, § 1). Habitual attrition suffices, that is, attrition elicited and not retracted. Attrition cannot be had concerning original sin; nevertheless a certain displeasure about it is required. Contrition and attrition are "sorrow regarding and in some way breaking down the hardness of the will; and therefore they can exist only concerning those sins which come upon us from the hardness of our will; and because original sin has not been introduced by our will, but contracted from the origin of a vitiated nature, therefore concerning it there cannot be contrition, properly speaking, but only displeasure or sorrow" (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 2, a. 2). The required displeasure is always had in him who supplies the other requisites.

Hope and initial love are also required; but these too are always found in him who enjoys the dispositions explained.

109 IV. It is fitting that both the priest who is about to baptize adults and the adults themselves, if they are healthy, be fasting. Unless grave and urgent causes stand in the way, a baptized adult should immediately assist at the sacrifice of the Mass and receive Holy Communion (canon 753).[1]

Corollary. Confession of sins is not to be imposed on an adult to be baptized absolutely. Nevertheless it is usefully instituted, so that the one to be baptized may be admonished about vices and better disposed for Baptism (St. Thomas, III, q. 68, a. 6). Nor are satisfactory works to be imposed, because Baptism is ordered to removing every debt both of guilt and of punishment.

[1] Roman Ritual, title 2, chapter 3, n. 7.

Treatise III. On Confirmation

(St. Thomas, III, q. 72; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 161-188; Homo Apostolicus, tract 14, nn. 39-53).[1]

We must speak first about Confirmation considered in itself, then about its ministration, finally about the reception of Confirmation.

[1] Cf. Dolger, Das Sakrament der Firmung historisch-dogmatisch dargestellt; Umberg, Die Schriftlehre vom Sakrament der Firmung.

Dissertation I. On Confirmation Considered in Itself

110 Confirmation is a sacrament by which the Holy Spirit is conferred for strength in faith through anointing and imposition of the hand under a certain form of words. Confirmation is the complement of Baptism, insofar as, namely, it increases and strengthens the spiritual life received through Baptism (n. 115), and joins to the army of the Lord the human being who has been enrolled by Baptism in the family of Christ (n. 115). It is called Confirmation from the word confirming, that is, making firm. With these things premised, we shall treat first of the existence, then of the essence, then of the effects, finally of the necessity of Confirmation.

Part I. On the Existence of the Sacrament of Confirmation

111 Confirmation is a true sacrament of the New Law. This is of faith from these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that the Confirmation of the baptized is an idle ceremony and not rather a true and proper sacrament... let him be anathema."[1]

It is doubtful at what time Christ instituted Confirmation. According to some, at the Last Supper; according to others, after the resurrection and before the ascension, namely while He was speaking with the Apostles about the kingdom of God and completing the mysteries of salvation;[2] according to others, on the day of Pentecost.

[1] Session 7, On Confirmation, canon 1.

[2] Acts 1:3.

Part II. On the Essence of Confirmation

Section I. On the Matter

112 I. Remote matter. 1. For validity, so that this be undoubted, there are required: 1. chrism, that is, a composition from olive oil and balsam; 2. consecrated; 3. by a bishop; 4. and this by a special consecration of chrism. Now from the aforesaid:

a) Olive oil is certainly required, as is clear from the universal and constant tradition of the Church[1] (St. Thomas, III, q. 72, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 162).

b) The admixture of balsam is most probably required, regard being had both to the decree of Eugene IV for the Armenians, which hands down that the matter is chrism confected from oil and balsam, and from the practice of the Church. The reason for doubting is taken from the fact that Paul IV and Pius V conceded to the Indians the privilege of using in place of balsam a liquid which is called balsam by them, but is not; likewise from the fact that the use of balsam does not appear before the sixth century, although even before that oil came under the name of chrism.

c) Some consecration or blessing likewise seems to be required, attention again being paid to the decree of Eugene IV and to the practice of the Church (St. Alphonsus, VI, 163).

d) Consecration by a bishop is certainly prescribed, but it is not so certain that it is required for validity (cf. canon 781, § 1). The power of consecrating chrism seems in antiquity sometimes to have been conferred on a simple priest.[2] It is also certain that the faculty of confirming with chrism consecrated by a bishop can be granted to a simple priest (canon 781, § 1).

e) A special consecration or blessing, that is, the consecration proper to chrism, likewise seems to be required; this is already suggested by the very necessity of chrism.

Corollary. Since olive oil is certainly required for validity, note that nut oil or other kinds of oil can never be used.

2. For liceity it is required that certainly valid matter be used, and that the chrism have been consecrated on the most recent Lord's Supper day (canon 734, § 1). Hence it is not permitted to confirm with old chrism, unless necessity urges. It is said, certainly valid matter; this does not prevent Confirmation from being conferred under condition, at least in danger of death, with oil of catechumens if chrism consecrated by a special blessing cannot be had; for the great usefulness of the sacrament suffices so that it can be exposed to the danger of nullity (St. Alphonsus, VI, 162).

[1] Cf. Innocent III, Decretals, book I, title 15, at the beginning of chapter 1, Cum venisset.

[2] Dolger, op. cit., pp. 108-112.

113 II. Proximate matter. 1. For validity, so that this be undoubted, there are required: 1. anointing; 2. on the forehead; 3. made immediately by the hand of the minister, not through an instrument; 4. in the form of a cross (cf. canon 780). But what degree of certainty belongs to each of the things enumerated, see among the dogmatic theologians.

The imposition of the hand is certainly required for the essence of Confirmation, as is already clear from Sacred Scripture itself.[1] But, according to the opinion which today is commonly held as certain, the required imposition of the hand is neither that imposition or extension of the hand which is had at the beginning of the rite and is made over all those to be confirmed under the prayer: Almighty, everlasting God, etc. (cf. canons 780 and 781, § 2);[2] nor is it that imposition of the hand by which the minister, during the anointing itself, places the rest of the hand on the head of the one to be confirmed;[3] but it is the anointing itself, so that this is at once both anointing and imposition of the hand.

2. For liceity it is required that certainly valid proximate matter be used, and that the anointing be made with the thumb of the right hand; for this is the usage of the Church, which nevertheless quite probably obliges only under light obligation, because in the consecration of a bishop the thumb and index finger of each hand, indeed even both whole hands, are anointed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 165).

[1] Acts 8:17; 19:6; Hebrews 6:2.

[2] Decree for the Armenians; Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 6 August 1840 (Collectanea, n. 908).

[3] Innocent III, Decretals, book I, title 15, chapter 1.

Section II. On the Form

114 The legitimate form is:

I. For the Latin Church: "I sign you with the sign of the cross and confirm you with the chrism of salvation, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit." Probably these suffice for the essence: I sign and confirm you; or, I confirm you with the chrism of salvation; since these alone are found equivalently in the form of the Greeks. Nevertheless it is also probable that all things in the form are essential; this depends on the question what the direct power of the Church is concerning the value of the sacraments (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 72, a. 4; St. Alphonsus, VI, 167, 168).

II. For the Greek Church: "The seal of the gift of the Holy Spirit." Yet it is disputed whether the invocation of the Most Holy Trinity also, which in the Greek Euchologia is premised to chrismation, pertains to the essence. Several of those who judge that in the Latin form all things, even the expression of the Most Holy Trinity, are essential affirm this; and they are bound to affirm it unless they admit that Christ did not determine the form of Confirmation in a fixed specific form.

Part III. On the Effects of Confirmation

115 The effects of Confirmation are:

I. Sanctifying grace; per se second grace or an increase of grace, per accidens more probably first grace (n. 6); there is joined an increase of the virtues and gifts of the Holy Spirit.

II. Sacramental grace: this consists in the fact that the sanctifying grace which Confirmation increases is both ordered to this, that the faithful constantly hold and constantly profess the faith, and carries with it the right to actual graces to be received in order to those effects (St. Thomas, III, q. 62, a. 1; St. Alphonsus, VI, 169).

III. Character. 1. The existence of character is clear from what was said in n. 8.

2. The effects of character. It causes the baptized person to be constituted a soldier of Christ and to be deputed to profess the faith fearlessly (St. Thomas, III, q. 72, a. 5).

Part IV. On the Necessity of Confirmation

116 I. Necessity of means is rightly denied (canon 787); for Confirmation is necessary neither for acquiring sanctifying grace, because it is ordered to increasing it, nor for obtaining actual graces by which the spiritual life can be preserved, since a right to graces simply necessary is already given through Baptism.

117 II. Necessity of precept. There is an obligation of receiving Confirmation; and that obligation seems to be grave. It is said:

1. There is an obligation. This is clear: 1. From canon 787: "It is permitted to no one, when the occasion is offered, to neglect it"; add canon 1021, § 2: "Catholics who have not yet received the sacrament of Confirmation are to receive it before they are admitted to marriage, if they can do so without grave inconvenience." 2. From these words by which Pope Urban draws out the obligation from the end and character of Confirmation: "All the faithful, through the imposition of the hands of bishops, ought to receive the Holy Spirit after Baptism, so that they may be found fully Christians."[1] 3. From those things by which we shall prove the grave obligation.
2. The obligation seems to be grave. I understand a grave obligation per se, not only sometimes per accidens. Namely, all concede that one who neglects to receive Confirmation can per accidens sin gravely: 1. by reason of scandal; 2. by reason of contempt; 3. by reason of a particular danger and spiritual weakness (St. Alphonsus, VI, 182). But it is disputed whether a grave obligation per se must be asserted. With St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), against several more recent authors, it seems that it must be affirmed. For first, St. Paul[2] reckons Confirmation among the fundamental institutions of Christianity; this hints that it obliges under grave obligation, all the more because all the other things enumerated there[3] oblige under grave obligation.[4] Then Benedict XIV, in the bull Etsi pastoralis,[5] declares with respect to the Italo-Greeks who had been confirmed by a non-competent priest and therefore invalidly: "that they are held guilty of grave sin if, when they can approach Confirmation, they refuse and neglect it."[6]

Now Benedict XIV by these words intends and signifies a grave obligation existing per se, not only that which held the Italo-Greeks per accidens by reason of special circumstances. For: a) This is the more obvious sense, since the preceding words regard all, so that even the words cited seem to regard all and not only the Italo-Greeks; for the rest, for a whole century all theologians understood the words of the Supreme Pontiff in the aforesaid sense. b) The Instruction of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide,[7] approved by Clement XIV, which teaches that the obligation is present per se, refers to the bull of Benedict XIV. c) Benedict XIV himself sufficiently signifies that this is the meaning of his bull, as can be seen in the unpublished works of Pope Benedict XIV.[8] Observe also that Benedict XIV, as a private doctor, held as certain and almost common the opinion which teaches that there is per se a grave obligation of receiving Confirmation.[9] Besides, the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide,[10] which Clement XIV "approved and commanded to be inviolably observed by all whom it concerns," declares: This sacrament "cannot be rejected and neglected without guilt of grave sin when a suitable occasion of receiving it is present."[11] Moreover a sacrament which is held as the complement of Baptism, or which pertains to the integrity of Christian being, seems to be imposed under grave obligation. But Confirmation is of this kind; hence Pope Urban, to use his words again: "All the faithful, through the imposition of the hands of bishops, ought to receive the Holy Spirit after Baptism, so that they may be found fully Christians." Then Confirmation confers the Holy Spirit, who is called "the Promise of the Father"; it confers grace which both in the Old and in the New Testament is assigned as the proper gift of the Messianic kingdom. Now it is difficult to admit that these things are not to be pursued under a precept, and that a grave one.[12]

Corollary I. It seems it must be said that the obligation of Confirmation is not only of ecclesiastical law, but also of divine law, since several of the arguments brought forward indicate divine law.

Corollary II. Per se the sacrament must be repeated under condition if a prudent doubt exists whether it was truly or validly conferred (canon 732, § 2).

Corollary III. Those more advanced in age who are very ashamed to receive the sacrament with children can, if they cannot be confirmed privately, scandal being excluded, be left in good faith.

[1] In canon Omnes, 1, distinction 5, De consecratione.

[2] Hebrews 6:2.

[3] Hebrews 6:1-2.

[4] Cf. Umberg, op. cit., p. 200.

[5] 26 May 1742.

[6] The complete text here is: "Although those confirmed by a simple priest are not to be compelled to receive this kind of sacrament of Confirmation from a bishop if scandals could arise from such compulsion, since the sacrament of Confirmation does not have such necessity that without it someone cannot be saved, nevertheless they are to be admonished by the Ordinaries of places that they are held guilty of grave sin if, when they can approach Confirmation, they refuse and neglect it."

[7] 4 May 1774 (Collectanea, n. 503).

[8] These were edited by Dr. F. Heiner; there, on p. 215, Benedict XIV declares that in his Constitution Etsi pastoralis he established several things, among them: "That, although one of the Italo-Greeks has received Chrismation from some simple priest, he must not be forced to receive Chrismation from the bishop when some grave scandal could perhaps be feared from this step; nevertheless, since this sacrament is not absolutely indispensable for eternal salvation, the Ordinary of the place to whom the Italo-Greek is subject ought wisely to admonish him that, in order not to be guilty of grave sin, when the occasion of being confirmed comes, he should not neglect it, since in this case contempt of the sacrament would have place, as we also demonstrated in our sixth Instruction."

[9] "It is certain," he writes, "that men already in adult age must, either in fact or at least in desire, be confirmed by necessity of precept, which is also numbered among the precepts of God. It is called a precept of the Church when one endowed with the use of reason, if a bishop, the minister of this sacrament, is present, is impeded by no legitimate cause from receiving it. Thus almost all theologians teach, and those who are especially commended by praise of wisdom; they testify that those are stained with grave fault who, because of contempt or yawning sluggishness, omit to have the soul fortified with the grace of this sacrament" (Institutiones Ecclesiasticae, VI, n. 10).

[10] 4 May 1774 (Collectanea, n. 503).

[11] The complete text here is: "For the rest, let missionaries not omit also to exhort the peoples entrusted to them to receive Confirmation at the due time, and also that parents see to it that their children are confirmed; for although this sacrament is not of necessity of means for salvation, nevertheless it cannot be rejected and neglected without guilt of grave sin when a suitable occasion of receiving it is present. Now this doctrine, if it is true for all Christ's faithful everywhere, has much more place in those who live in lands of heretics or pagans, in which persecutions sometimes arise against Catholics."

[12] "If Confirmation," says Pohle, "were a merely useful and not a necessary sacrament, why would it have been instituted and ordained by Christ as the supplement and completion of Baptism for all Christians?" (Lehrbuch der Dogmatik, vol. III, p. 158). Cf. Umberg, op. cit., p. 198.

Dissertation II. On the Ministration of Confirmation

118 I. The person ministering. 1. A bishop can validly confer Confirmation. This is of faith from the Council of Trent.[1] Therefore a bishop can always validly minister the sacrament.

2. A presbyter in fact cannot validly confer Confirmation without delegation. Thus all. But it is disputed whether or not even a presbyter per se or of himself enjoys the faculty of validly ministering Confirmation. Some affirm this; nevertheless they add that, by force of ecclesiastical or even divine disposition, the valid exercise of the said power does not belong to the presbyter. Others deny that a presbyter can per se or of himself confer Confirmation validly, but say that he enjoys only an incomplete power of confirming, to be completed by delegation. Among these, however, some teach that this kind of delegation, regard being had only to divine law, belongs even to a bishop; others judge that it is reserved, not only in fact but also by force of divine law, to the Supreme Pontiff alone.[2] From what has been said, draw out the things which follow.

3. The ordinary minister of Confirmation is the bishop alone (canon 782, § 1). The extraordinary minister is a presbyter to whom this faculty has been granted either by common law or by a special indult of the Apostolic See (canon 782, § 2). Now:

a) Besides Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church according to the norm of canon 239, § 1, n. 23,[3] an abbot or prelate nullius, a vicar and prefect apostolic enjoy this faculty by the law itself; these, however, cannot use it validly except within the boundaries of their territory and only during their office (canon 782, § 3). To the said persons are also reckoned the pro-vicar and pro-prefect to whom the care of the vicariate or prefecture has come according to the norm of canon 309 (canon 310, compared with canon 294, § 2). The aforesaid persons can validly confirm all within the boundaries of their territory.

b) A presbyter of the Latin rite to whom this faculty belongs by force of an indult validly confers Confirmation only on the faithful of his own rite, unless another thing has been expressly provided in the indult (canon 782, § 4). If, however, the indult is local, in the territory designated for him he validly confirms all the faithful of his own rite, even outsiders. If the indult is personal, he validly confirms only those persons who are comprehended by the indult.

c) Priests of the Eastern rite, by force of immemorial custom, validly and licitly administer Confirmation together with Baptism to infants of their own rite, except in those churches to which by a special statute the Latin discipline has been extended,[4] as has taken place in Bulgaria, Italy, and the adjacent islands. But "it is unlawful for priests who enjoy the faculty or privilege of conferring Confirmation together with Baptism on infants of their own rite to minister the same to infants of the Latin rite" (canon 782, § 5); since these words do not exclude validity, the conferral does not seem invalid.

[1] Session 7, On Confirmation, canon 3.

[2] Cf. Gilsamann, Zur Lehre der Scholastik vom Spender der Firmung; De Smet, Tractatus dogmatico-moralis de sacramentis in genere, de Baptismo et Confirmatione, n. 400 and following.

[3] Cardinals confirm validly everywhere, with the burden, however, of recording the name of the confirmed person (canon 239, § 1, n. 23).

[4] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 87.

119 II. Liceity of ministering. 1. A bishop legitimately ministers this sacrament in his own diocese even to outsiders, unless an express prohibition of their proper Ordinary stands in the way (canon 783, § 1). In another diocese he needs the permission of the local Ordinary, at least reasonably presumed, unless the case concerns his own subjects to whom he confers Confirmation privately and without staff and mitre (canon 783, § 2).

2. A presbyter who is furnished with a local apostolic privilege licitly confirms even outsiders in the territory designated for him, unless their Ordinaries have expressly forbidden it (canon 784).

120 III. Obligation of ministering. 1. A bishop is bound by obligation to confer this sacrament on subjects rightly and reasonably asking for it, especially at the time of the visitation of the diocese. A presbyter endowed with apostolic privilege is held by the same obligation toward those in whose favor the faculty has been granted (canon 785, §§ 1 and 2). Nevertheless they are not bound to confer Confirmation on a dying person who asks for it; for they cannot furnish that office to one and deny it to another, but to satisfy all would be an excessive burden (St. Alphonsus, VI, 175).

2. An Ordinary impeded by a legitimate cause or lacking the power of confirming must, so far as it can be done, provide at least within every five-year period that this sacrament be administered to his subjects (canon 785, § 3).

3. If he has gravely neglected to minister the sacrament of Confirmation to his subjects by himself or through another, the Metropolitan is bound to inform the Holy See (canon 785, § 4). Grave neglect seems to be present if the occasion of receiving Confirmation is deferred beyond five years.

121 IV. Things to be observed in ministering regard time, place, sacred vestments, ceremonies, and sponsors.

1. Time. This sacrament can be conferred at any time; but it is especially fitting that it be administered in the week of Pentecost (canon 790). It is only of counsel that the one confirming and those to be confirmed be fasting (St. Alphonsus, VI, 174, question 1).

2. Place. The proper place for administering Confirmation is a church; nevertheless the minister, for a cause which he has judged just and reasonable, can confer it in any decent place (canon 791). A bishop has the right of administering it within the boundaries of his diocese also in exempt places (canon 792).

3. Sacred vestments are set forth in the Pontifical; to omit most of them would be grave (St. Alphonsus, VI, 184, note 1).

4. Ceremonies to be observed by a bishop are found in the Roman Pontifical; those to be observed by a presbyter are contained in the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide.[1] Their obligation is grave from its genus (St. Alphonsus, VI, 184).

5. Sponsors: a) A sponsor, if he can be had, is to be used (canon 793), and this under grave obligation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 185). Moreover:

1. There is to be only one sponsor for each person to be confirmed (canon 794, § 2); hence the person to be confirmed cannot have two sponsors.

2. The same person can be sponsor for only one or two, unless for a just cause something else seems good to the minister (canon 794, § 1). Therefore the minister can for a just cause permit that the same person be sponsor even for several, indeed that one man be sponsor for all males, and one woman for all females.[2]

b) In order that someone be validly constituted sponsor, it is required: 1. that he himself also be confirmed, have attained the use of reason, and have the intention of carrying out that office; 2. that he be ascribed to no heretical or schismatical sect, nor be excommunicated or infamous with infamy of law by a condemnatory or declaratory sentence, or excluded from legitimate acts, nor be a cleric deposed or degraded; 3. that he not be the father, mother, or spouse of the person to be confirmed; 4. that he be designated by the person to be confirmed or by his parents or tutors, or, if these are lacking or refuse, by the minister or by the pastor; 5. that in the very act of Confirmation he physically touch the person to be confirmed, either by himself or through a procurator (canon 795).

c) In order that someone be licitly admitted to the office of sponsor, it is required: 1. that he be someone other than the sponsor of Baptism, unless a reasonable cause, in the judgment of the minister, suggests otherwise, or Confirmation is legitimately conferred immediately after Baptism; 2. that he be of the same sex as the person to be confirmed, unless in particular cases something else seems good to the minister for a reasonable cause; 3. that the prescriptions of canon 766 also be observed (canon 796).[3]

d) From valid Confirmation there arises between the confirmed person and the sponsor a spiritual kinship, from which the sponsor is bound by obligation to have the confirmed person perpetually commended to himself and to care for his Christian education (canon 797). Nevertheless the said kinship does not carry with it an impediment of marriage.

[1] 4 May 1774 (Collectanea, n. 503).

[2] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, 24 June 1823; 12 July 1823; Holy Office, 16 June 1884 (Collectanea, n. 1619).

[3] Canon 766 sets forth the requisites for someone to be licitly admitted as sponsor in Baptism (n. 84).

122 V. Notation and proof of Confirmation ministered. 1. The pastor is to inscribe in a special book the names of the minister, of those confirmed, of the parents and sponsors, and the day and place of Confirmation (canon 798). Besides, it should be noted in the book of the baptized if the baptized person has received Confirmation (canon 798). If the proper pastor of the confirmed person was not present, concerning the Confirmation conferred the minister, either by himself or through another, should as soon as possible inform the same pastor (canon 799).

2. To prove Confirmation conferred, provided prejudice is done to no one, one witness beyond all exception suffices, or the oath of the confirmed person himself, unless he was confirmed in infant age (canon 800), that is, before the completed seventh year (canon 88, § 3).

Dissertation III. On the Reception of Confirmation

123 I. The person receiving. Every and only baptized person not yet confirmed can validly be confirmed (canon 786; n. 38). Per se even those perpetually insane are to be anointed, namely so that at least according to being they may be constituted perfect and complete Christians; and this must be urged even more if the discussion concerns the partially insane (St. Alphonsus, VI, 180).

124 II. The age of reception. In the first twelve centuries there was the usage of conferring Confirmation together with Baptism. This practice still flourishes in the Greek Church; but in the Latin Church it has been changed, except in some regions in which even little children are presented to be confirmed, as in Spain and in Latin America. For the rest, with respect to the Latin Church this rule holds: the administration of Confirmation is suitably deferred to about the seventh year of age; nevertheless it can be conferred even before then if the infant is constituted in danger of death, or if it seems expedient to the minister for just and grave causes (canon 788), for example if otherwise the infants would lack the occasion of receiving the sacrament for a very long time (St. Alphonsus, VI, 178). In other cases it cannot be conferred before about the seventh year of age.[1] It is not expedient to defer Confirmation longer than about the seventh year of age, since "thus the young adolescents confirmed become more pliant for grasping precepts, and more suited for receiving the Eucharist afterward, and from having received it they receive more abundant advantages."[2] Cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 65, aa. 1 and 2.

[1] Pontifical Commission, 16 June 1931, reply to II (A.A.S. 1931, p. 353); compare, however, with respect to the custom which flourishes in Spain and elsewhere, the response of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, 13 June 1932 (A.A.S. 1932, p. 271).

[2] Thus Leo XIII in the brief Abrogata, 22 June 1897.

125 III. Things to be observed in reception. In the one receiving there are required: 1. the state of grace (canon 786), which, if it has been lost, is to be recovered through confession or through perfect contrition; 2. sufficient instruction, if the one to be confirmed possesses the use of reason (cited canon), namely instruction in the rudiments of faith and in the principal things which regard the sacrament of Confirmation.[1] It is only of counsel that the one to be confirmed, if it can conveniently be done, be fasting.[2] Finally, those to be confirmed, if there are several, are to be present for the first imposition or extension of hands, nor are they to depart until the rite has been completed (canon 789). It is said, if there are several, for if there is only one person to be confirmed and he is absent, the ceremony cannot even be begun.

Note. The precept of the Roman Pontifical of wearing a linen band until the chrism has dried is no longer observed, but immediately after the anointing the chrism is wiped from the forehead of the confirmed person (St. Alphonsus, VI, 180).

[1] The Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 4 May 1774, says thus: "Those to be anointed with sacred chrism must first be diligently instructed, according to the teachings of the Roman Catechism, concerning the nature, dignity, effects, and dispositions prerequired for receiving this sacrament worthily. Likewise they must be instructed concerning the rudiments of faith, the precepts of the Decalogue and of the Church, the acts of the theological virtues, and they must hold in memory the Lord's Prayer and the Apostles' Creed" (Collectanea, n. 503).

[2] Cf. Roman Pontifical.

Treatise IV. On the Most Holy Eucharist

(St. Thomas, III, qq. 73-83; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 189-424; Homo Apostolicus, tract 15).[1]

The Most Holy Eucharist is not only a sacrament, but also a sacrifice. Now the foundation of the whole doctrine on this matter is the real presence of Christ in the Eucharist. Hence we shall speak first about the real presence of the Lord in the Eucharist, then about the Most Holy Eucharist as it is a sacrament, finally about the Most Holy Eucharist as it is a sacrifice. These three things are set forth in these words of canon 801: In the Most Holy Eucharist, under the species of bread and wine, Christ the Lord is contained, offered, and received.

[1] Cf. Billuart, Tractatus de almo Eucharistiae sacramento (VI, vol. VI); Rath, De Eucharistia.

Dissertation I. On the Real Presence of Christ in the Eucharist

126 (St. Thomas, III, qq. 75-77; Contra Gentiles, book 4, chapters 62-67.)

I. The truth of the real presence of Christ. In the Most Holy Eucharist Christ is truly, really, and substantially present. This is of faith from the Council of Trent solemnly declaring: "If anyone denies that in the sacrament of the Most Holy Eucharist there are contained truly, really, and substantially the body and blood, together with the soul and divinity, of our Lord Jesus Christ, and therefore the whole Christ, but says that He is in it only as in a sign, or figure, or power, let him be anathema."[1] "The Council," says St. Alphonsus, "says truly, so that it may exclude a figurative presence; for figure is opposed to truth; really, to repel an imaginary presence, apprehended by faith, which the Sacramentarians admitted; substantially, so that it may remove the opinion of Calvin, who asserted that the Eucharist does not contain the body, but only the power of Jesus Christ, who communicates Himself to us" (Opera dogmatica, vol. I, p. 555, ed. Walter).

[1] Session 13, canon 1.

127 II. The manner in which Christ is made present. Christ is made present in the Most Holy Eucharist through transubstantiation; concerning this I note:

1. The proposition stated is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that in the most holy sacrament of the Eucharist there remains the substance of bread and wine together with the body and blood of Our Lord Jesus Christ, and denies that wonderful and singular conversion of the whole substance of bread into the body and of the whole substance of wine into the blood, the species of bread and wine alone remaining, which conversion indeed the Catholic Church most fittingly calls transubstantiation, let him be anathema."[1]
2. Transubstantiation, according to the cited words of Trent, is: "The conversion of the whole substance of bread into the body and of the whole substance of wine into the blood of Christ, the species of bread and wine alone remaining." It is said:

a) Conversion; therefore consubstantiation is excluded, which admits a simple conjunction, and impanation, which admits the hypostatic union of the body and blood of Christ with bread and wine.

b) Conversion... of the substance of bread and wine. Therefore it is distinguished from accidental transformation, in which the same substance remains and only receives, for example, a new figure, as if a stone is transformed into a statue.

c) Conversion of the whole substance. Hence it is distinguished from substantial transformation, in which there is not a conversion of the whole substance, namely while the matter of the prior substance remains, as if daily foods pass into the substance of our body.

Transubstantiation regards a double term, namely the term from which and the term into which; or the term which passes away, namely bread and wine, and the term which succeeds, namely the body and blood of Christ. Now:

It is disputed first how the term from which, or the substance of bread and wine, passes away. Some judge that it is annihilated. Others, such as St. Thomas (III, q. 75, a. 3) and St. Alphonsus (Opera dogmatica, vol. I, p. 562, ed. Walter), teach that it ceases through a true and simple conversion, because in annihilation, which is reduction to nothing, the concept of conversion into another thing is not verified.

It is disputed besides how the term into which, or the body and blood of Christ, succeeds. Some, such as the Scotists, think that this is done by way of adduction, insofar, namely, as God in the consecration effects with respect to the body of Christ, without local motion, what local motion effects in the natural order; that is, God gives to the body of Christ non-distance from this space and from these accidents of bread and wine. Others, among whom are several Thomists, teach that this is done through production, or reproduction, of the body and blood of Christ, and this not simply, but by way of conversion from the substance of bread and wine; this opinion better corresponds to the concept of the conversion of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ. Others[2] say that transubstantiation is a simple action by which God immediately changes whatever entity is in the substance of bread into that which is entity in the substance of the body of Christ; yet in such a way that the body of Christ is in no way changed, but the whole change takes place in the bread, whose substance passes away while the dimensions remain. According to this explanation, Christ suffers nothing in the consecration, receives nothing, but becomes present where He was not before, not locally but sacramentally, from this alone, that by force of the conversion He is now really contained under the dimensions of bread, under which the substance of bread was previously contained.[3]

d) The species of bread and wine alone remaining. Concerning the species, note:

1. The species of bread and wine have objective reality; this is "the perpetual and constant doctrine of the Catholic Church,"[4] and therefore at least theologically certain.
2. The species inhere in no substance as a subject, but are sustained divinely.

I said, in no substance: neither in the substance of bread and wine, since it has passed away; nor in the body of Christ, which in the sacrament is entirely glorious and exists supernaturally.

I said, are sustained divinely: understand this so that God immediately sustains only the quantity, but accidents distinct from quantity inhere in the quantity as in a subject (St. Thomas, III, q. 77, a. 2).

Corollary. From the Eucharistic species a new substance is generated. This is explained in different ways by different authors. According to some, to set forth the principal opinion, in the last instant of corruption matter is produced by God, from which a new form is educed (St. Thomas, III, q. 77, a. 5). But it is disputed whether the said production is done by way of creation or by way of conversion of quantity into matter. And thus it is also explained how the species can nourish (St. Thomas, III, q. 77, a. 6).

[1] Session 13, canon 2.

[2] Thus Billot.

[3] Tanquerey, n. 406.

[4] Roman Catechism, part 2, On the Eucharist, n. 44.

128 III. The manner in which Christ is present is circumscribed in these terms:

1. The whole Christ is present under each Eucharistic species. This is of faith from the Council of Trent.[1]

By force of the words, under the species of bread only the body becomes present, and under the species of wine only the blood. By force of natural connection and concomitance, under the species of bread the blood and soul exist, and under the species of wine the body and soul exist.

2. The whole Christ is contained under each part of the species both before and after division. That the whole Christ is contained under each part after division is of faith from the Council of Trent.[2] With respect to presence under each part before division, it is theologically certain.

[1] Session 13, canon 3.

[2] Session 13, canon 3.

129 IV. The time during which Christ is present. Christ is present in the manner which we have stated from the moment of consecration until the essential alteration of the species; and this is had when the species are so altered that, if the substance of bread and wine had persisted, this substance according to common estimation would have ceased to persist. Moreover:

1. Authors do not agree when the species are corrupted. Von Olfers judges that the species of bread is changed already in the mouth itself; yet Capellmann-Bergmann[1] rejects this entirely. Nevertheless even for the sake of security the species should not be kept long in the mouth, namely so that Christ is certainly eaten and the grace of the sacrament is certainly conferred (St. Alphonsus, VI, 226; n. 171). With respect to corruption in the stomach, some assign half an hour, others a much longer time, especially for the infirm; and it is certain that the matter depends on the condition of the stomach. With attention to all these things, I say:

a) Because of doubt about the presence of the species, it is illicit to provoke vomiting or to wash the stomach within two to three hours after the reception of the Eucharist, especially since these things are ordinarily not done except because of illness.

b) Whatever may be true about the duration of the presence, it is permitted to anyone to eat after he has spent a reasonable time in thanksgiving, because the sacraments must be ministered and received in a human manner (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 80, a. 8, ad 6; St. Alphonsus, VI, 283).

2. If unconsecrated wine is mixed in a small quantity with consecrated wine, Christ remains present. If another liquid is mixed with consecrated wine, the matter depends both on the quantity and on the quality of the other liquid. If unconsecrated wine is mixed in a greater quantity with consecrated wine, it is disputed whether the presence of Christ endures. Some affirm this, because, as modern chemists teach, the molecules of the consecrated species retain their individuation. Others with St. Thomas (III, q. 77, a. 8) deny it, because the consecrated species, at least according to common estimation, do not remain the same numerically, but receive a new individuation from the greater quantity.

Note. When flesh or blood appears in the Most Holy Eucharist, it is not the flesh or blood of Christ. Apparitions of this kind are explained either from this, that species are formed by God in the eyes of those seeing, and thus it happens as if flesh or blood were truly seen; or from this, that a miraculous figure is formed which represents the flesh or blood of Christ. Hence to such figures, which are called relics of the Most Holy Blood, only relative worship is rendered (St. Thomas, III, q. 76, a. 8).

[1] Cf. Von Olfers, Pastoral-Medizin, p. 44 and following; Capellmann-Bergmann, op. cit., p. 270 and following; ibid., p. 271.

Scholion I. On the Custody of the Holy Eucharist

130 I. Liceity of reserving the Holy Eucharist. That the Holy Eucharist can licitly be preserved in the sacrarium after the sacrifice has been completed is of faith from Trent: "If anyone says that it is not permitted for the Sacred Eucharist to be reserved in the sacrarium, but that immediately after the consecration it must necessarily be distributed to those present, or that it is not permitted for it to be carried honorifically to the sick, let him be anathema."[1]

[1] Session 13, canon 7.

131 II. Places for reserving the Holy Eucharist. In order that the Holy Eucharist must or can be reserved in the places soon to be assigned, two things are required: 1. that there be someone who has care of it; 2. that regularly a priest celebrate Mass at least once a week in the sacred place (canon 1265, § 1). These things being posited:

1. It must be kept in a cathedral church, in the principal church of an abbey or prelature nullius, of a vicariate and prefecture apostolic, in any parochial or quasi-parochial church, and in a church attached to a house of exempt religious, whether men or women (canon 1265, § 1, 1).

2. It can be kept, with the permission of the local Ordinary, in a collegiate church and in the principal oratory, whether public or semi-public, both of a pious or religious house and of an ecclesiastical college which is governed by secular clerics or by religious (canon 1265, § 1, 2). The same seems to be applied a fortiori to succursal churches, over which a priest presides who is bound to exercise the care of souls for a determined part of the parish. The Pontifical Commission declared[1] that the Ordinary can permit this if immemorial custom is added.

3. In order that it can be kept in other churches or oratories, an apostolic indult is necessary; the local Ordinary can grant this permission only to a church or public oratory for a just cause and by way of act (canon 1265, § 2).

Note 1. It is permitted to no one to retain the Most Holy Eucharist with himself or to carry it with him on a journey (canon 1265, § 3). Exceptions: 1. if, insofar and for as long as otherwise the security of the Holy Eucharist would not be sufficiently provided for; 2. if, which is to be prevented so far as can be done, the Holy Eucharist cannot be kept decently in the church.

Note 2. Churches in which the Most Holy Eucharist is reserved, especially parochial churches, should be open to the faithful daily for at least some hours (canon 1266).

4. Any contrary privilege having been revoked, in the religious or pious house itself the Most Holy Eucharist cannot be kept except either in the church or in the principal oratory; nor among nuns within the choir or enclosure of the monastery (canon 1267). The cited canon sets forth to what extent the Holy Eucharist can be reserved in two places, that is, both in the church and in the principal oratory. Now, considering the response of the Pontifical Commission,[2] it must be established thus:

a) If a religious or pious house has a public church attached and uses it for carrying out ordinary and daily exercises of piety, the Most Holy Sacrament can be reserved only in that church.

b) If a religious or pious house does not use the attached church for ordinary and daily exercises of piety, by privilege or permission of the local Ordinary (cf. canon 1265, § 2), the Holy Eucharist can be kept in the principal oratory of the same religious or pious house, and indeed without prejudice to the right of the church, if it has any, for example because it is attached to a house of exempt religious; in this case it can be reserved both in the church and in the oratory. But it can be kept in only one oratory, unless in the same material building there are distinct and separate families, so that they are formally distinct religious or pious houses; this obtains, for example, in the case in which in a college there is a community of sisters who devote themselves to the service of the college; likewise in the case in which in a religious house there are, besides the students living in common, religious partly devoted to education and partly to other works. It is doubtful whether the novitiate constitutes a religious house formally distinct from the other community of the house.

[1] 20 May 1923 (A.A.S. 1924, p. 155).

[2] 2 June 1918 (A.A.S. 1918, p. 346).

132 III. The manner of reserving the Holy Eucharist. 1. The Most Holy Eucharist cannot be kept continuously or habitually except on one altar only of the same church (canon 1268, § 1). It is said, habitually; hence nothing prevents the Holy Eucharist from sometimes being kept also on another altar for some time, for example so that Communion may be distributed more conveniently. It is to be kept in the most excellent and noble place of the church, and therefore regularly on the high altar, unless another place seems more convenient and becoming for the veneration and worship of so great a sacrament, with the prescription of liturgical laws being observed as regards the last days of Holy Week (canon 1268, § 2). But in cathedral, collegiate, or conventual churches in which choral functions must be performed at the high altar, lest an impediment be brought to ecclesiastical offices, it is fitting that the Most Holy Eucharist regularly not be kept on the high altar, but in another chapel or altar (canon 1268, § 3). Let rectors of churches take care that the altar on which the Most Holy Sacrament is reserved be adorned before all the others, so that by its very arrangement it may move the piety and devotion of the faithful more (canon 1268, § 4).

2. The Most Holy Eucharist must be kept in an immovable tabernacle placed in the middle part of the altar (canon 1269, § 1). Nevertheless, if some grave cause approved by the local Ordinary persuades it, it is not forbidden that the Most Holy Eucharist be reserved at night outside the altar, yet on a corporal, in a safer and decent place, with the prescription of canon 1271 being observed (canon 1269, § 3); the cited canon prescribes that a lamp be lit before the tabernacle (cf. p. 94). For the rest, note:

a) The tabernacle should be skillfully constructed, solidly closed on every side, decently adorned according to the norm of liturgical laws, empty of every other thing, and so carefully guarded that danger of any sacrilegious profanation is kept away (canon 1269, § 2). It is said: adorned according to the norm of liturgical laws. Now the said laws prescribe that the tabernacle be covered within with white silk, unless it is gilded;[1] that it be blessed and outwardly covered with a conopaeum or veil of a color either white or adapted to the office; for black, violet is used.[2] But if the form of the tabernacle does not allow the use of a conopaeum, at least a broad cloth hanging from above, a baldachin, is to be used, which covers the altar. Nor is it permitted to place images or relics of Saints before or above the tabernacle, even of the Holy Cross. Nevertheless a cross with an image of the Crucified can be placed above the tabernacle. It is said: empty of every other thing; hence not even the sacred oils can be kept in the tabernacle.[3]

b) The key of the tabernacle in which the Most Holy Sacrament is reserved must be guarded most diligently, the conscience of the priest who has care of the church or oratory being gravely burdened (canon 1269, § 4). It no longer seems, as formerly, to be prescribed that the priest himself guard the key.

3. The Holy Eucharist must be kept in a pyx of solid and decent material, clean and well closed with its own lid, covered with a white silk veil and, as far as the matter allows, adorned. The consecrated particles should be of such a number as can suffice for the Communion of the sick and of other faithful (canon 1270). Now the pyx or ciborium, likewise the monstrance and lunette, can be of gilded copper, although it is more fitting that the pyx and lunette be silver. It is not prescribed that the pyx and lunette, if they are silver, be gilded. But the pyx and monstrance, or at least the lunette, are to be blessed, not consecrated, and this more probably under sin, though only venial (St. Alphonsus, VI, Quaestiones reformatae, 74).
4. Before the tabernacle in which the Most Holy Sacrament is reserved, at least one lamp should shine continually day and night, to be nourished with olive oil or beeswax; but where olive oil cannot be had, it is permitted to the prudence of the local Ordinary that it be changed for other oils, as far as possible vegetable oils (canon 1271). The obligation of the lamp is grave from its genus, so that neglect through an entire day or through several nights would constitute mortal sin (St. Alphonsus, VI, n. 248).
5. Consecrated Hosts, whether for the Communion of the faithful or for exposition of the Most Holy Sacrament, should both be fresh and be frequently renewed, the old ones being duly consumed, so that there be no danger of corruption, with the instructions which the local Ordinary has given concerning this matter being carefully observed (canon 1272). The Ceremonial of Bishops wills that hosts be renewed every week;[4] nevertheless it seems to suffice that this be done within two weeks. Moreover, new consecrated Hosts should not be mixed with old, but the old should first be distributed or consumed.[5]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 20 June 1899, reply to IV, n. 4035.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 20 June 1899, reply to IV, n. 4035.

[3] Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 1, n. 6; Sacred Congregation of Rites, 12 March, reply to IV, n. 2740.

[4] Book II, chapter 6, n. 51.

[5] Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 1, n. 7.

Scholion II. On the Worship of the Holy Eucharist

133 I. Necessity of worship of the Holy Eucharist. Christ in the Eucharist must be adored with the worship of latria, even external. This is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that in the holy sacrament of the Eucharist Christ, the only-begotten Son of God, is not to be adored with the worship of latria, even external, and therefore is not to be venerated with a special festive celebration, nor solemnly carried around in processions according to the praiseworthy and universal rite and custom of holy Church, or is not to be publicly proposed to the people that He may be adored, and that His adorers are idolaters, let him be anathema."[1] Now the sacramental species, since they pertain to the sacramental Christ, are to be adored together with the body and blood of Christ. But they constitute not the motive but the term of this adoration, and therefore the adoration, insofar as it regards the species themselves, must be called relative.

[1] Session 13, canon 6.

134 II. Zeal for the worship of the Holy Eucharist. Those who labor in the religious instruction of the faithful should omit nothing to excite piety toward the Most Holy Eucharist in their souls, and especially exhort them that, not only on Sundays and feasts of precept, but also on weekdays within the week, they frequently, so far as can be done, assist at the sacrifice of the Mass and visit the Most Holy Sacrament (canon 1273). Specifically, the following are noted in the Code:

1. Exposition of the Holy Eucharist. A twofold exposition is distinguished: private, which is made with the pyx, and public, which is made with the monstrance. Now private exposition can be made for any just cause without the permission of the Ordinary in churches or oratories to which it has been given to reserve the Most Holy Eucharist. But public exposition on the feast day of Corpus Christi and within the octave can be made in all churches during the solemnities of the Masses and at Vespers; but at other times only for a just and grave cause, especially a public one, and with the permission of the local Ordinary, even if the church belongs to an exempt religious institute (canon 1274, § 1), with the prescription of canon 1171 remaining firm, as the Sacred Congregation of the Council says,[1] that is, with parochial rights, privileges, and legitimate customs being saved, and with the right of the Ordinary of predefining, for a just cause, the hours of sacred rites in churches which do not belong to an exempt religious institute being saved.

Note 1. According to the rubrics, the pyx to be exposed cannot be taken out from the tabernacle, but can only be brought forward to its entrance.[2] But where a contrary custom is legitimately sustained, this kind of exposition of the pyx on a throne is, with respect to liceity, to be equated with public exposition. Finally, the custom of exposing the Holy Eucharist without the permission of the Bishop, where this is required by law, cannot be preserved.[3]

Note 2. The minister of exposition and reposition of the Most Holy Sacrament is a priest or deacon; but the minister of Eucharistic Benediction is the priest alone, nor can a deacon impart it except in the case in which, according to the norm of canon 845, § 2, he has carried Viaticum to the sick (canon 1274, § 2).

2. The supplication of the Forty Hours should be held every year in all parish churches and other churches in which the Most Holy Sacrament is habitually reserved, on days established with the consent of the local Ordinary, with the greatest solemnity possible; and if somewhere, because of particular circumstances of things, it cannot be done without grave inconvenience and with the reverence due to so great a sacrament, let the local Ordinary see to it that at least for some continuous hours, on fixed days, the Most Holy Sacrament be exposed in a more solemn rite (canon 1275).

[1] 14 July 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 529).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 23 May 1835, n. 2725, reply to IV; 16 March 1876, n. 3394, reply to I; 28 April 1902, n. 4096, reply to VII; 16 February 1906, n. 4180, reply to II.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 14 March 1861, n. 3104, reply to XIV.

Dissertation II. On the Most Holy Eucharist as It Is a Sacrament

(St. Thomas, III, qq. 73-74; qq. 78-80; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 189-303; Homo Apostolicus, tract 15, nn. 1-58.)

We shall treat first of the Most Holy Sacrament considered in itself, then of its ministration, finally of the reception of the Most Holy Sacrament.

Part I. On the Most Holy Sacrament Considered in Itself

135 The Most Holy Eucharist is usually defined: The sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Lord for the spiritual refreshment of the soul.

This definition having been handed down, we shall speak first, briefly, about the existence, then about the essence, then about the effects, finally about the necessity of the Eucharist.

Section I. On the Existence of the Sacrament of the Eucharist

136 I. The Most Holy Eucharist is a true sacrament; this proposition is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says... that the Eucharist... is not truly and properly a sacrament, let him be anathema."[1]

Note. The sacrament of the Eucharist was instituted at the Last Supper. "For thus," says the Council of Trent, "all our forefathers, as many as were in the true Church of Christ who have discussed the Most Holy Sacrament, most openly professed that our Redeemer instituted this so admirable sacrament at the Last Supper."[2]

[1] Session 7, canon 1, On the Sacraments in general.

[2] Council of Trent, Session 13, chapter 1.

137 II. The sacrament of the Eucharist is one sacrament in species, and indeed in the lowest species, even though it exists under the double species, namely of bread and wine. For otherwise the dogma concerning the sevenfold number of the sacraments would not stand. Now the reason is that "although each species is materially different, nevertheless morally each constitutes one sacrament, since each signifies one banquet consisting of food and drink" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 191).

"A thing is called one," says St. Thomas, "not only because it is indivisible, or because it is continuous, but also because it is perfect, as one house and one man are said to be one. Now that is one by perfection to whose integrity all things concur which are required for its end; as man is integrated from all the members necessary for the operation of the soul, and a house is integrated from all the parts which are necessary for dwelling. And thus this sacrament is called one: for it is ordered to spiritual refreshment, which is conformed to bodily refreshment. But for bodily refreshment two things are required, namely food, which is dry nourishment, and drink, which is liquid nourishment; and therefore for the integrity of this sacrament two things also concur, namely spiritual food and spiritual drink, according to that passage of John 6: My flesh is truly food, and my blood is truly drink" (III, q. 73, a. 2).

138 III. The sacrament of the Eucharist is numerically multiple. Thus the much more common and much more probable opinion. The reason is that the species, which constitute the sacrament in the direct order (n. 139), are numerically multiple.

But authors differ in assigning the principle of numerical distinction; in this matter three principal opinions are defended. Some seek the number from the physical unity or plurality of the species, because, they say, number follows the unity or plurality of quantity.[1] Others derive the number from the unity or plurality of refreshment, or of the proposition of the sacrament for the sake of adoration.[2] The third opinion, recognizing part of the truth in each preceding opinion, teaches that a distinction must be made between numerical unity taken physically and taken morally. For numerical unity is derived from unity of quantity. But this quantity is either physical, or of continuous parts, or moral, or of contiguous parts joined because of some end or in some order. Therefore there is likewise a twofold numerical unity, physical and moral. Hence the physical unity of this sacrament is taken from the physical continuity of the species; moral unity from moral continuation, insofar as they are proposed or received by way of one thing. St. Alphonsus follows this opinion as the more probable. "Several consecrated species," he says, "although discontinuous, even if physically they are several sacraments, nevertheless morally they are one sacrament from the moral conjunction which they have while they are proposed or received by way of one thing" (VI, 191). "Whence," the same holy Doctor says:

1. If one species or one host is distributed to several persons or to the same person at morally distinct times, they are different sacraments numerically.
2. Conversely, if both species or several parts of the same species, or even of species consecrated at different times, are ministered to someone at the same time, there is one sacrament.
3. Thus likewise, if different consecrated species are proposed at the same time and on the same altar, there will be one sacrament; but if they are divided and proposed on different altars, they are different sacraments (VI, 191, question 2).

[1] Thus, for example, the Salmanticenses, disputation 2, doubt 4, n. 58 and following.

[2] Thus, for example, John of St. Thomas, disputation 26, article 3.

Section II. On the Essence of the Sacrament of the Eucharist

139 The Most Holy Eucharist, like the other sacraments, consists of proximate matter and form. But for the sake of completeness, a discussion must also be made about remote matter. Now the remote matter, that is, that from which the sacrament is confected, is bread and wine; the proximate matter is the species together with the body and blood of Christ; but the form is the words of consecration, insofar as they virtually persevere. Namely, the aforesaid words, insofar as they were sensibly uttered, effected or confected the sacrament; but insofar as they virtually persevere, they constitute the sacrament as confected and remaining. Hence the words of consecration, insofar as they are sensibly uttered, are called the form of the sacrament in fieri; insofar as they virtually endure, they are the form of the sacrament in facto esse. Thus commonly the Thomists and others, while others teach that the form is not the words of consecration, since these have passed away, but the sacramental signification, that is, the refreshment of the soul through the increase of grace.

With respect to the proximate matter it is disputed in what way each element concurs in constituting the proximate matter, that is, whether the proximate matter is the body and blood connoting the species, or the species connoting the body and blood, or whether each element equally must be called the proximate matter. According to St. Thomas (III, q. 77, a. 7), the proximate matter is the species alone in the direct order, connoting the body and blood in the oblique order. The principal reason for this doctrine is taken from the fact that the sacraments are in the direct order sensible signs. But in the Most Holy Sacrament the sensible sign is had only in the species, connoting the body and blood of the Lord. Thus also teaches the Catechism of Trent.[1]

With these things noted about the essence of the sacrament in general, we shall speak specifically about the remote matter and form.

[1] Part 2, chapter 4, question 8.

Chapter I. On the Remote Matter

140 The matter from which the sacrament of the Eucharist is confected, or the matter around which, as others say, is bread and wine. This doctrine, after the Third Council of Carthage, the Fourth Lateran Council, and Florence, is expressed by the Council of Trent in these words: "It was always firmly believed in the Church, and now this Synod again declares it, that through the consecration of bread and wine a conversion takes place."[1] We shall speak about each matter separately.

[1] Session 13, chapter 4; cf. canon 2.

Article I. On the Matter of Bread

141 I. The matter required for validity is bread, composed of wheaten flour and water, and uncorrupted with respect to substance. It does not matter for validity whether it is unleavened or leavened. I said:

1. Bread. Therefore invalid matter is: a) a raw or uncooked mass of flour; b) a mass which was not baked by fire but boiled after the manner of porridge or cake; c) a fried mass. The reason is that all these things do not come under the name of bread. Nevertheless it does not matter whether the bread has been baked by electric fire or by another fire.
2. Composed of wheaten flour and water. That wheaten bread is required is clear: 1. from the Council of Florence[1] and from various liturgies;[2] 2. from the fact that Christ used wheaten bread, and this bread alone is and was usual in Palestine.[3] Therefore invalid matter is:

a) Food confected from matter which is not grain, for example from flour of beans, potatoes, etc.

b) Bread confected from grain which is not wheat, for example from millet, barley, oats, maize, rice, or rye; the grain which in Dutch is called emer is doubtful matter.

By the name spelt there is sometimes designated a kind of wheat, sometimes grain which in no way or doubtfully belongs to the genus of wheat. Therefore in practice attention should be paid to the quality and to the judgment of experts. For the rest, it does not matter whether the wheat is summer or winter wheat.

3. Composed of wheaten flour and water. This is clear from the fact that bread thus composed was used by Christ, and was usual in Palestine.[4] Therefore invalid matter would be flour kneaded only with oil, honey, wine, butter, or milk; flour kneaded with artificial or at least non-usual water, such as rose water, is doubtful matter[5] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 199).

Admixture made with wheat certainly does not obstruct validity if the quantity of wheat notably prevails; it certainly obstructs if the quantity of wheat is notably smaller; otherwise, that is, if the suitable and unsuitable quantity is equal or differs little, the species has at least probably been changed, and therefore the matter is at least doubtfully valid (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 74, a. 3, ad 3; St. Alphonsus, VI, 201).[6] Thus, with regard to the quantity of the admixed matter; with regard to its quality, a smaller quantity can sometimes suffice to change the wheat to which it is admixed.

4. Uncorrupted with respect to substance. Bread notably corrupted is in practice doubtful matter; but moldy bread, or bread only tending toward corruption, is valid matter.
5. For validity it does not matter whether the bread is unleavened or leavened. This is clear from the Council of Florence[7] (cf. canon 816).

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 692.

[2] Cf. Roman Missal, On Defects, title 3, n. 4.

[3] Vigouroux, Dictionnaire de la Bible, word pain, p. 1951.

[4] Vigouroux, loc. cit.

[5] Roman Missal, On Defects, title 3, n. 2.

[6] Cf. Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, 16 March 1929 (A.A.S. 1929, p. 632).

[7] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 692.

142 II. The matter required for liceity is bread:

1. Merely wheaten (canon 815, § 1), indeed altogether pure, to which, namely, matter diverse from wheat or water has not been admixed; indeed it is better that the flour have been purified by a sieve.

2. Entirely uncorrupted; hence not at all moldy. But for how much time after their baking hosts remain entirely uncorrupted depends on the circumstances of weather, place, manner of preserving them, etc.

3. Recently confected, so that there is no danger of corruption. Thus canon 815, § 1. And the Roman Ritual:[1] "But the hosts or particles to be consecrated should be fresh." Now the Sacred Congregation of Rites, in the case of Ghent,[2] reprobated the custom of consecrating hosts confected three months previously in wintertime or six months previously in summer; and the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments[3] rejected the practice of procuring for oneself so many hosts as would suffice for two or three months. Now, although in the judgment of chemists the danger of corruption is commonly exaggerated, nevertheless, considering the mind of the Church, it should be urged that hosts to be consecrated not have been baked more than two weeks or a month previously.[4]

4. Of circular and thin shape in the Latin Church; square in the Greek Church. Thus from ancient practice. Besides, the host should be:

5. Whole, clean, and, according to use, larger for the priest. If the fracture or spot is enormous, or if the host begins to grow moldy, its use is prohibited under grave obligation. Hence it is not permitted to use this kind of host except for a grave cause, for example if the defect is detected after the oblation has been made, provided, however, that scandal does not arise from its use, and that the host is not so broken that the grave rites cannot be carried out[5] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 204). The use of a host simply broken or spotted, or smaller, is prohibited only under light obligation. Therefore a just cause excuses, for example if otherwise a sick person would lack Viaticum or the people would lack Mass; indeed, quite probably the devotion of the priest alone suffices (St. Alphonsus, VI, 205).

6. Unleavened in the Latin Church, leavened in the Greek;[6] for canon 816 establishes: In the celebration of Mass, a priest, according to his own rite, must use unleavened or leavened bread wherever he offers the sacred sacrifice.

Considering the cited canon, the opinion no longer seems to hold which conceded that a priest, as a traveler living in a region of another rite, might consecrate the bread of that rite if bread of his own rite was not available. For the rest, the obligation of using bread of one's own rite is considered so great that not even for ministering Viaticum to a sick person is it permitted to consecrate bread of another rite. The reason is that the common good, because of which the law was passed, that is, the necessity of preserving for each Church its own rite, in the mind of the Church prevails over the divine precept of receiving Viaticum; this necessity of the common good, of course, was once more evident than today. Nevertheless the use of bread of another rite is licit for completing the sacrifice; as if after the wine has been consecrated the bread used should be detected as corrupted, and only bread of another rite should be available (St. Alphonsus, VI, 203).

The distribution and reception of the Holy Eucharist confected in another rite will be discussed later.

[1] Title IV, chapter 1, n. 7.

[2] 16 December 1826 (Collectanea, n. 2650).

[3] 7 December 1918.

[4] Concerning consecrated Hosts, see n. 132.

[5] Roman Missal, On Defects, title X, n. 9.

[6] Certain Orientals, however, such as Armenians and Maronites, use unleavened bread; cf. Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, 20 May 1838.

Article II. On the Matter of Wine

143 I. The matter required for validity is wine from the vine, whether white or red, whether mixed from each, whether strong or weak. There is required:

1. Wine, as is clear from what was said in n. 140 and from the things to be said under 2.
2. Wine from the vine, as is deduced: 1. from the fact that Christ used that matter;[1] 2. from the Decree of Eugene IV; 3. from universal Tradition; 4. from the fact that only the assigned liquid, according to common estimation, is called true wine.
3. Whether white, etc. The reason is that all the wines assigned are true wine.

Corollary I. Valid matter is:

a) Must, that is, recently fermented wine not yet cleared from sediment; indeed, as they deduce from chapter Cum omne, De consecratione, distinction 2, and from the Roman Missal,[2] even wine recently expressed from grapes and not yet fermented. Vermeersch,[3] however, requires that it have begun to ferment.

b) Wine from dried grapes, provided it is duly prepared, so that "from color, odor, and taste it is recognized to be true wine";[4] in which case it is also licit to use it.

c) Wine to which a small amount of another liquid has been admixed. If a notable quantity is admixed, the matter easily becomes doubtful.

Corollary II. Invalid matter is:

a) Liquid expressed from fruits other than grapes, for example from apples, cherries, currants, or from grains, even if perhaps it is called wine; likewise spirit of wine. The same seems to have to be said of wine made by chemical art, even if it consists of the same elements as ordinary wine. The reason is that it is not wine from the vine.

b) Juice not yet expressed from grapes. Likewise verjuice or omphacium, that is, juice from unripe grapes.[5] Likewise lora, that is, liquid from grapes previously pressed and, a great quantity of water having been poured over them, pressed again. But if water is poured in a smaller quantity, the matter will be valid or doubtful.[6]

c) Sapa or defrutum, because although it contains the substance of wine, nevertheless it has obtained the nature and use of food.

d) Vinegar, because it differs substantially from wine. If wine becomes sour from initial corruption, the matter will easily be doubtful; otherwise if it is from the fact that the grapes were not perfectly ripe.

e) It is disputed whether frozen wine is valid matter. Now it seems to have to be affirmed, both because by its nature it is drinkable, and because the Blood of Christ remains under the species of frozen wine;[7] this proves that wine is not corrupted by freezing.

Nor should you object: just as the water of Baptism must be liquid, so also the wine of the Most Holy Eucharist. Response: I deny the parity; for the water of Baptism must be liquid by reason of washing, that is, of the proximate matter of Baptism; but drinking, by reason of which wine would have to be liquid, is not the proximate matter of the Most Holy Eucharist.

[1] Matthew 26:29.

[2] On Defects, title IV, n. 2.

[3] Theologia Moralis, III, 371.

[4] Holy Office, 22 July 1706 (Collectanea, n. 270); 7 May 1879 (Collectanea, n. 1518).

[5] "Today, however, often from unripe grapes wine is made which has the appearance of true wine, sugar being added, which is lacking to the grapes. But when the quantity of sugar thus added would exceed that which is found in must, the matter would be at least illicit" (Geniot-Salsmans, Theologia Moralis, II, n. 121).

[6] Today, after grapes have been pressed once, a solution of sugar is commonly poured over them several times, and a quantity of wine five times greater than that which would have been obtained from the berries once pressed is obtained.

[7] Roman Missal, On Defects, title X, n. 11.

144 II. The matter required for liceity is wine:

1. Fermented and cleared from sediment. It would be a grave sin without grave necessity to consecrate wine not yet cleansed from sediment. Nevertheless it is permitted to use wine cleansed from sediment through evaporation and condensation, provided fermentation is not excluded.[1] Likewise it is a grave sin without grave cause to use wine notably infected with sediment. Nevertheless it is permitted to consecrate wine that is merely turbid.
2. Pure, that is, not mixed with foreign matter, for example with aromatics. Nevertheless the Holy Office[2] permitted that spirit of wine be admixed to weak wine, "provided the spirit has been extracted from the produce of the vine and the alcoholic quantity, together with that which the wine in question naturally contains, does not exceed the proportion of 12%, and the admixture is made when it is very fresh." Indeed the same Congregation permitted[3] that the spirit of wine be increased up to 17-18 percent, if this is required for preserving very strong and extraordinarily sweet wines. The use of port wine seems illicit, because it contains too much spirit of wine, namely 18-21 percent.

3. Not becoming sour. "If the wine has begun to become sour or corrupted, or has been somewhat sharp... the sacrament is confected, but the one confecting sins gravely."[4] These words, with several authors, are to be taken thus:

a) If the wine becomes sour from initial corruption, in which case the matter becomes doubtful, that is, it becomes doubtful whether it is wine or vinegar, proceed according to what was said in n. 147.

b) If the wine becomes sour from natural sharpness, arising from the fact that the grapes were not perfectly ripe, the matter is valid but illicit; in this case these things hold:

1. If it becomes notably sour, it is permitted to use it when grave necessity urges, provided it is certainly wine (St. Alphonsus, VI, 207).
2. If it becomes only slightly sour, per se indeed, as the Roman Missal expressly declares, it is mortal to use it; but these things are not to be urged so far that it would not be permitted to use it if other wine is lacking (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). Finally, one who celebrates in another's church, or as a religious subject does not have care of the wine, should proceed without scruple even if the wine is a little sour, the danger being thrown back upon the rector of the church or upon the superior.
4. A very small amount of natural water should be admixed to the wine (canon 814). The admixture, however, must be made by way of ceremony, that is, at the altar and in the chalice; hence an admixture before the sacred rite, even by the priest himself, for example made in the cruet, does not suffice. If the admixture has been omitted and this is noticed before the consecration, it must be made immediately; if it is noticed after the consecration, it must be omitted.[5] For the rest, observe:

a) The admixture of water is not required for validity, as the Roman Missal has it.[6] Nevertheless it is prescribed, as is clear from the Council of Trent,[7] from canon 814, and from the rituals. Yet more probably it is not of divine law but only of ecclesiastical law; this is deduced from the fact that neither in Sacred Scripture nor in Tradition is a divine origin indicated, and ecclesiastical documents, notably the Council of Trent,[8] rather insinuate that it is an ecclesiastical precept (St. Alphonsus, VI, 208).

b) The precept obliges under grave obligation, as the Roman Missal says.[9] The reason is that its ends are grave, namely so that there may be signified: 1. the water and blood which flowed together from the side of Christ; 2. the union between Christ, who is represented by the wine, and the faithful, who are represented by the water;[10] 3. the union of the twofold nature in Christ (St. Thomas, III, q. 74, a. 6; St. Alphonsus, VI, 208). Indeed the obligation is considered so grave that scarcely ever is it permitted to consecrate without water admixed. Natural water is required, so that one would sin gravely who used, even in necessity, water which was not natural (St. Alphonsus, VI, 208, 2).

c) Only a very little or little water must be admixed.[11] One or another small drop suffices, although a somewhat greater quantity is urged. Yet it must especially be guarded against that the admixture be made up to a third part of the quantity, since that would render the matter doubtful (St. Alphonsus, VI, 210).

d) The admixed water, according to the opinion of all, is converted into the Blood. But it is disputed whether it is converted into the Blood without first having been converted into wine, or whether it is converted first, at least according to common estimation, into wine, then into the Blood. Those who admit the first argue from the fact that the molecules of the admixed water remain numerically the same, or retain their individuation. Those who hold the second reason from the fact that the molecules of water do not remain numerically the same, but receive a new individuation from the greater quantity.

[1] Holy Office, 5 August 1896 (Collectanea, n. 1950); 22 May 1901 (Collectanea, n. 2113).

[2] 30 July 1890 (Collectanea, n. 1735).

[3] 5 August 1896 (Collectanea, n. 1950); 22 May 1901 (Collectanea, n. 2113).

[4] Roman Missal, On Defects, title IV, n. 2.

[5] Cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 74, a. 5, ad 2; Benedict XIV, Institutiones, 77, n. 2.

[6] Roman Missal, On Defects, title IV, n. 7.

[7] Session 22, chapter 7.

[8] Loc. cit.

[9] On Defects, title IV, n. 2.

[10] Council of Trent, session 22, chapter 7.

[11] Council of Florence; Roman Missal, Ritus servandus, title VII, n. 4.

Scholion. On a Defect of Valid or Certainly Valid Matter Detected in Mass

145 I. If a priest in Mass notices that the host is corrupted or is not wheaten, let him proceed thus:

1. If he notices this before the consecration, then, that host having been removed, let him place another and, the oblation having been made, at least conceived mentally, continue from the place where he left off.

2. If he notices this after the consecration, even after the consumption of that host:

a) If before the consumption of the Blood, after another host has been placed and the oblation made, at least conceived mentally, let him consecrate it, beginning from the words: Who the day before He suffered; then let him consume it, even if he has already consumed the former host. If he has not consumed the former host, let him consume it after the consumption of the Blood, hand it to another to be consumed, or preserve it reverently somewhere.

b) If after the consumption of the Blood, new bread and wine with water must again be placed; and the oblation first having been made as above, he consecrates each, beginning from those words: Who the day before; and immediately consumes each, and continues the Mass.[1]

[1] Cf. Aertnys-Damen, who set these things forth in order (vol. II, n. 114); Roman Missal, On Defects, title III, nn. 4-6.

146 II. If a priest in Mass notices that there is not wine in the chalice, but another matter or corrupted wine, let him proceed thus:

1. If he notices this before the consumption of the Body, then, the invalid matter having been placed in another vessel, let him again place wine with water in the chalice and, the oblation having been made, at least conceived mentally, consecrate beginning from the words: In like manner, etc., and continue where he left off.

2. If he notices this after the consumption of the Body or of that invalid matter,[1] it must be done thus:

a) If Mass is celebrated privately, that is, in a non-public place, let him place another host to be consecrated again, and wine with water in the chalice, let him offer each, and consecrate each, beginning from the words: Who the day before, and consume, although he is not fasting.

b) If Mass is celebrated in a public place, where several are present, to avoid scandal it suffices to place only wine with water and, the oblation having been made as above, to consecrate, immediately consume, and continue the rest.[2]

[1] If the priest detects the defect in the consumption of the chalice, he can swallow the draft which he has in his mouth (St. Alphonsus, VI, 288). If nevertheless he has done this, he cannot, for example on the feast of the Nativity of the Lord, celebrate other Masses.

[2] Roman Missal, On Defects, title IV, nn. 4 and 5. According to others, even in the case in which he celebrates privately, it is permitted to consecrate only wine, because there remains one sacrifice and the order of consecration is not inverted.

147 III. If the priest after the consecration notices that the matter is doubtfully valid, let him proceed in the same manner as was explained above. It is disputed, however, whether the other consecration must be done absolutely or under this condition: if the prior matter was not consecrated. Most favor conditional consecration, because otherwise, if perhaps the prior matter was consecrated, another consecration would not correspond to the new consecration (St. Alphonsus, VI, 206).

Matter doubtfully consecrated is to be consumed after the consumption of the Blood; if this cannot be done, it is to be treated as is explained in the Roman Missal.[1]

IV. If the whole Blood is spilled, so that nothing remains, let the priest again place wine and water, offer, and consecrate from that place: In like manner, etc.[2]

[1] On Defects, title X, nn. 6 and 7.

[2] On Defects, title X, n. 13.

Chapter II. On the Form

148 I. The legitimate and usual form is:

1. For the Latin Church: For this is my body. For this is the chalice of my blood, of the New and Eternal Testament, the mystery of faith, which for you and for many shall be poured out unto the remission of sins. "The words of consecration," says the Roman Missal,[1] "which are the form of this sacrament, are these: For this is my body, and: For this is, etc."
2. For the Greek Church: Take and eat: this is my body, which is broken for you unto the remission of sins. Drink ye all of this: for this is my blood of the New Testament, which is poured out for you and for many unto the remission of sins.

Now the form is to be uttered not merely recitatively or historically, that is, as uttered by Christ Himself, but also assertively or significatively, that is, with the mind of asserting that this is the body and blood of Christ (St. Alphonsus, VI, 220).

Note. The epiclesis, as it is called, does not pertain to the form. Now the epiclesis is an invocation of the Holy Spirit by which the Church prays that the bread and wine may become for us the body and blood of Christ. It occurs in the Roman Liturgy before the consecration, in the Eastern liturgies after the consecration. Now that this epiclesis is either the sole or at least the principal form of the Most Holy Sacrament, as having the sole or principal force of effecting transubstantiation, several Greek schismatics have admitted from the fourteenth century, and a few Catholics agreed with them. But this opinion is to be rejected, as is clear from the Decree for the Armenians to be cited under II; likewise from the letter of Pius VII, Adorabile Eucharistiae, 8 May 1822, to the Antiochian Patriarch and the bishops of the Greek Melchites. The epiclesis, as the Greeks confessed with Bessarion[2] in the Council of Florence,[3] on the one hand is a ceremony by which that which the words of consecration effect is explained, and on the other hand is a prayer by which the Church asks that the body and blood of Christ may not only simply be such, but may also become fruitfully for the faithful, by the grace of the Holy Spirit, the body and blood of Christ (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 83, a. 4, ad 7).

[1] Roman Missal, On Defects, title V, n. 1.

[2] De Sacr. Euch. (Migne, Patrologia Graeca, 161, col. 514 and following).

[3] Session 25 (Hardouin, vol. 18, col. 512 D-536 inclusive).

149 II. The essentials of the form are determined in these things:

1. These are certainly essential: This is my body; and: This is my blood, or: This is the chalice of my blood. This is a certain opinion. "The form of this sacrament," says Eugene IV in the Decree for the Armenians, "is the words of the Savior, by which He confected this sacrament. For the priest, speaking in the person of Christ, confects this sacrament."

2. These are certainly not essential:

a) The word for, both in the consecration of the bread and in the consecration of the wine.

b) The words preceding the form, namely Who the day before, etc., and In like manner, etc., almost certainly do not pertain to the essence, since in the instruction of Eugene they are not reckoned among those things which pertain to the form (St. Alphonsus, VI, 222).

3. There is dispute about the words New through of sins. Some judge that they pertain to the essence, because it must be expressed that the consecration is sacrificial, or that the presence of Christ is an immolative presence. Nevertheless the contrary opinion is more common and more probable, both because St. Paul has only these words: This chalice is the new Testament in my blood; and because in different liturgies different words from the cited words are omitted; and because the analogy of the consecration of bread is added. Nevertheless in practice the first opinion must be followed, as is clear (St. Alphonsus, VI, 223).

Corollary I. The forms are invalid: 1. This body is mine; this blood is mine; for then before the consecration the body and blood are asserted to be present, though they are constituted present through the consecration. It is otherwise if someone only transposed the words, so that the sense would be: "This, it is my body." 2. If someone deliberately used the word this adverbially; otherwise if by error. 3. If someone omitted is, because the circumstances do not sufficiently indicate that that word is understood, or at least do not sufficiently signify that it is understood in the sense which imports production.

Corollary II. The forms are doubtful: 1. That is my body; that is the chalice, etc., because although the pronoun that is rather often used for this, nevertheless it does not certainly signify a thing present to the speaker. The forms are still more doubtful: That over there is my body; that over there is the chalice, etc. 2. This is my flesh, because flesh, strictly speaking, does not signify the whole body.

Corollary III. The form is valid: This thing, this substance, is my body. It is otherwise: This bread is my body (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 221-223).

150 III. With respect to liceity, observe that an omission, addition, or change knowingly made, even if it does not obstruct validity, easily constitutes grave sin. Nevertheless there can be only venial sin, for example if someone omitted only the word for. For the rest, the words should be uttered distinctly, reverently, and, as the Missal admonishes, secretly, not in a loud voice or with vehement expulsion of words from the mouth. In order that every danger of erring may be avoided, it is better to read the form from the altar card.

IV. With respect to errors to be corrected, note that if the form must be repeated, one must always begin from the words Who the day before, or In like manner.[1] For the rest, receive these things from the Missal: "If the celebrant does not remember that he said those things which are commonly said in the consecration, he ought not for that reason be troubled. If, however, it is certain to him that he omitted something of those things which are of the necessity of the sacrament, that is, the form of consecration, or part of it, let him resume the form itself and continue the rest in order. But if he very probably doubts that he omitted something essential, let him repeat the form at least under a tacit condition. But if the things are not of the necessity of the sacrament, let him not resume them, but proceed further."[2]

[1] Roman Missal, On Defects, title III, nn. 5, 6, 7; title IV, nn. 3, 4; title X, nn. 3, 13.

[2] Roman Missal, On Defects, title V, n. 2.

Section III. On the Effects of the Sacrament of the Eucharist

The primary effect of the Most Holy Eucharist, to which the others are reduced, is perfect union with Christ in charity and with neighbor in Christ. Specifically, the following are enumerated:

151 I. With respect to the soul. 1. Sanctifying grace, per se second grace, per accidens more probably first grace (St. Thomas, III, q. 79, a. 7, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 269; n. 6).

2. Sacramental grace; this consists in the fact that the sanctifying grace which the Holy Eucharist confers is both ordered to perfecting charity, or union with God and the faithful, and confers a right to actual graces to be received in order to that effect.

3. Fervor of charity, to which spiritual sweetness is attached. "But the love of God is not idle; for it does great things if it exists; and therefore through this sacrament, so far as concerns its power, not only is the habit of grace and virtue conferred, but it is also excited into act, according to that passage of 2 Corinthians 5: The charity of Christ urges us. And thence it is that by the power of this sacrament the soul is spiritually refreshed, by the fact that the soul is spiritually delighted and in a certain way intoxicated with the sweetness of the divine goodness, according to that passage of Canticles 5: Eat, friends, and drink, and be inebriated, dearly beloved" (St. Thomas, III, q. 79, a. 1, ad 2).

4. Remission of venial sins[1] (St. Thomas, III, q. 79, a. 4; St. Alphonsus, VI, 269). But it is disputed whether the Most Holy Eucharist remits venial sins both immediately, or ex opere operato, and mediately, or ex opere operantis, or only mediately, namely by exciting acts of charity by which venial sins are directly remitted; concerning this, compare what is to be said in the treatise on Penance.

5. Remission of temporal punishment (St. Thomas, III, q. 79, a. 5; St. Alphonsus, VI, 269). Again it is disputed whether both immediately, or ex opere operato, and mediately, ex opere operantis, or only mediately, by moving to acts of charity by which not only guilt but also punishment is remitted; concerning this, again compare what is to be said in the treatise on Penance.

[1] Council of Trent, Session 13, chapter 2.

152 II. With respect to the body, the Most Holy Eucharist especially diminishes concupiscence of the flesh (St. Alphonsus, VI, 269). But whether it effects this immediately and mediately, or only mediately, is doubtful (St. Alphonsus, VI, 269).

153 III. With respect to body and soul. 1. Spiritual sweetness, of itself overflowing into the body (St. Thomas, III, q. 79, a. 1, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 269).

2. The glorious resurrection of the body.[1]

[1] John 6:55.

154 IV. With respect to others, it is useful to note specifically a certain social effect, namely mutual union among the faithful, to which effect attention is already given more today. "For we, being many, are one bread, one body, all who partake of one bread."[1]

Question. At what time does the Eucharist confer grace?

Response 1. It certainly confers it at the time at which the species are eaten and drunk, that is, are carried into the stomach. Hence: 1. "The species are not to be retained in the mouth so long that they wholly perish, because then Christ would not be eaten, nor would the grace of the sacrament be conferred" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 227). 2. If someone had received the host indisposed, and then, disposed, received the blood, he would receive grace (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

Response 2. It is disputed whether the Eucharist, with disposition increased, continues to confer grace for as long as the species remain uncorrupted. It seems it must be affirmed, because the Eucharist is rightly judged to operate after the manner of nourishing food.

[1] 1 Cor. 10:17.

Section IV. On the Necessity of the Sacrament of the Eucharist

The necessity both of means and of precept must be examined, yet only of divine precept, because the ecclesiastical precept was discussed in vol. I, n. 1108.

Chapter I. On Necessity of Means

155 I first note these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that Eucharistic Communion is necessary for little children before they have arrived at the years of discretion, let him be anathema."[1] Wherefore note that here the matter concerns real reception of the Most Holy Eucharist; hence it is of faith that such reception is not necessary for little children. These things being noted, with respect to necessity of means I say:

I. It is disputed whether or not the Most Holy Eucharist is necessary by necessity of means for justification, this necessity being taken in the proper sense, namely so that it is necessary by way of efficient cause. Some affirm this because of these words of St. John: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink His Blood, you will not have life in you."[2] Hence in their opinion the Most Holy Eucharist, if it can conveniently be done, must be received in reality; if this cannot conveniently be done, it must be received in desire; but little children receive it in this way through the Church. In this opinion it must also be admitted that Baptism and Penance do not justify except with desire for the Most Holy Eucharist.

Others deny that the Most Holy Eucharist is necessary by necessity of means for obtaining justification, both because Sacred Scripture[3] assigns Baptism as a sufficient means for acquiring first grace, and because the Most Holy Eucharist is the sacrament of the living and therefore per se supposes grace, and because it is very difficult to admit that a sacrament which by a great part of human beings, that is, by little children per se, or by force of natural condition, cannot conveniently be received in reality, and therefore must be received in desire, that such a sacrament, I say, has been constituted necessary by necessity of means. I said: cannot conveniently be received in reality, and this indeed in such a way that it is forbidden by the Church to give the Most Holy Eucharist to little children.

Nevertheless a peculiar necessity of means is rightly admitted, namely by way of final cause, insofar, namely, as the Most Holy Eucharist is the end of all the sacraments, so that they, even Baptism and Penance, do not confer grace except by looking toward the Most Holy Eucharist (St. Alphonsus, III, 192).

II. It is disputed besides whether or not the Most Holy Eucharist is necessary by necessity of means for preserving grace. Some deny this, because there are other means also for preserving grace. Others affirm it, "because just as the life of the body cannot long be preserved without material food, so the life of the soul cannot be preserved without this spiritual food, at least in desire, and indeed explicit desire in one who notices the necessity of this sacrament" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 193). At least moral necessity seems commonly to be admitted.

With respect to the opinion of St. Thomas on the necessity of the Most Holy Eucharist, cf. III, q. 73, a. 3; III, q. 79, aa. 1 and 3; III, q. 80, aa. 2 and 11.

[1] Session 21, canon 4; cf. chapter 4.

[2] John 6:54.

[3] Mark 16:16; Gal. 3:27; Titus 3:5.

Chapter II. On Necessity of Divine Precept

156 I. The existence of a divine precept is clear first from Sacred Scripture. "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink His blood, you will not have life in you";[1] these words, if they do not exhibit necessity of means, at least exhibit a precept. Then, according to the Council of Trent, the Lord "commanded us in its reception to cherish His memory and to announce His death."[2] Finally, it is insinuated from the fact that Christ, by instituting the sacrament by way of food and drink, sufficiently hinted that its reception is commanded, just as the use of bodily food is commanded. Now that the precept is grave follows both from the gravity of the matter and from the most grave punishment by which it was sanctioned by Christ (St. Alphonsus, VI, 295).

[1] John 6:54.

[2] Session 13, chapter 2.

157 II. The subject of the divine precept is adults who enjoy the use of reason, and indeed all of them. It is said:

1. Adults who enjoy the use of reason. Therefore little children are not bound, nor those who are equated with them, that is, the perpetually insane (cf. canon 88, § 3); this is clear already from the fact that the Church prohibits the Eucharist from being conceded to them (canon 854; Roman Ritual).[1]

2. And indeed all of them, even: 1. unbelievers, insofar, namely, as they are bound to receive Baptism and, Baptism having been received, to communicate; 2. children. With respect to children this is first proved from the words of Christ cited above, which are pronounced without restriction and therefore must be judged to regard all who are capable of the precept. Then the ecclesiastical precept also binds children. But the Church only determines divine law. Then the decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments Quam singulari[2] insinuates this, both by alleging reasons which militate equally for the divine precept and for the ecclesiastical, and by citing testimonies of authors who defend the divine precept. Pius X sufficiently signifies the same in his Letter to the Archbishop of Cologne.[3] Finally no reason can be assigned why the divine-positive law would not comprehend children, since they are capable of law equally as other adults are.

[1] Title IV, chapter 1, nn. 10 and 11. In the Eastern Church the Eucharist has customarily been given to infants.

[2] 8 August 1910.

[3] 31 December 1910 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis, vol. 3, p. 18).

158 III. The time at which it obliges. 1. The divine precept obliges per se: 1. several times during the course of life; 2. in danger of death. It is said:

a) Several times during the course of life. This is deduced from the fact that Christ, by instituting the Holy Eucharist by way of nourishment, sufficiently signifies that it must be received at least several times. Now the one who fulfills the ecclesiastical precept certainly satisfies the divine precept of communicating several times during the course of life (St. Alphonsus, VI, 295).

b) In danger of death. For if the Eucharist is to be received several times in life, it certainly must be received at that moment at which it is of the greatest interest, and is more difficult, to preserve and nourish the spiritual life. There are added the most ancient law and practice[1] of ministering the Eucharist to those constituted in danger of death, even with harm to the minister;[2] these introduce the suspicion that the Holy Eucharist must be received in danger of death by precept of Christ (St. Alphonsus, VI, 291).

Now grave danger of death is understood; this is present either physically, as if someone is gravely ill; or, morally speaking, as if there is imminent execution of a capital sentence, a dangerous operation, battle, shipwreck, difficult childbirth, or a journey full of danger.

Moreover, the precept of communicating in grave danger which is physically present is to be understood so that as soon as someone is gravely ill, he can fulfill the precept, but when death is more imminent, he must fulfill it.

2. The divine precept obliges per accidens when the Eucharist is held as a morally necessary means of avoiding sins, namely insofar as other means are lacking or at least are not applied; concerning this, note that for the most part those who do not approach the Holy Eucharist attend neither to prayer nor to mortification. "But in that case... a man by omitting it would not sin against its precept, but against the virtue against which he suffers temptation" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 295).

Question 1. Whether one is bound to communicate when danger of death is imminent, if he communicated a few days before when he was not yet constituted in danger.

Response. Several deny it, but with St. Alphonsus (VI, 285) it seems it must be affirmed, because according to what was said above the obligation seems attached to the danger of death itself, so that it cannot be satisfied before.

Question 2. Whether one is bound to communicate when danger of death is imminent, if he communicated the same day when he was not yet constituted in danger.

Response. Such a person certainly can communicate again on the same day; indeed this is urged for him by canon 864, § 2. For the rest, some judge that he is not bound, because the divine precept has already been satisfied, and there is no ecclesiastical precept. There is added the fact that canon 804, § 2 declares: Even if they have been refreshed by Holy Communion on the same day, nevertheless it is strongly to be urged that those brought into danger of life communicate again. But with St. Alphonsus (VI, 285, doubt 3) we judge that he is bound, because according to the things said in the response to the first question he has not yet satisfied the divine precept. As regards canon 864, § 2, I respond that the Code abstracts from the interpretation of divine law, concerning which there is dispute among doctors; and therefore by the cited canon our question is not settled, but, while the dispute stands, the legislating Church, so far as depends on her part, proceeds only by urging. Therefore one who communicated in the morning is bound to communicate again if, for example, in the course of the day he was dangerously wounded or suddenly seized by illness.

It must be said otherwise if at the time of the prior Communion, even one received from devotion alone, grave danger was already present, although afterward it grows worse. In such a case one is neither bound nor able to communicate. He is not bound because he has already satisfied the divine precept. Nor can he, because in this hypothesis there is no reason why the prohibition of communicating twice should be judged not to urge. St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) also applies this doctrine to the case of apoplexy or something similar, because the illness is presumed already to have pre-existed. Here, however, note that in doubt whether grave danger was present at the time of Communion, its reception can be repeated.

Note. From ecclesiastical law I add these things: Holy Viaticum is not to be deferred too much for the sick; and those who have care of souls should carefully watch that the sick be refreshed by it while fully in possession of themselves (canon 865). Likewise, "while danger of death endures, Holy Viaticum, according to the prudent counsel of the confessor, may and fittingly should be administered several times on distinct days" (canon 864, § 3).

[1] Already the First Council of Nicaea, canon 13, calls that law ancient (Hefele, Histoire des Conciles, Paris ed. 1907, vol. 1, p. 7, p. 593 and following).

[2] Nor does it stand in the way that Viaticum was once sometimes denied to some dying persons, for example those condemned to death; since this practice was not universal, was rather often disapproved by ecclesiastical authority, and rested on the opinion that the divine precept could not conveniently be fulfilled in such circumstances (Rath, De Eucharistia, n. 219). Indeed I would not even deny that such things, although pertaining to divine law, can be moderated by the Church because of the common good.

159 IV. The manner of fulfilling the divine precept; concerning this it suffices to note these things: there is no obligation of receiving the Eucharist under both species. This is of faith from the Council of Trent defining: "If anyone says that by the precept of God or by necessity of salvation all and each of Christ's faithful must receive each species of the Most Holy Sacrament of the Eucharist, let him be anathema." Indeed in the Latin rite it is not even permitted to minister the Eucharist under the species of wine (canon 852). But it is clear that the precept is not satisfied by sacrilegious Communion. Let the confessor see, however, whether it is expedient to warn the dying penitent about the obligation of communicating again. If Viaticum is ministered again, let this be done on another day under the pretext of Communion from devotion; indeed if otherwise the dying person would be exposed to danger of infamy, there is sufficient reason for ministering Viaticum secretly and even without the pastor's knowledge. If there is danger in delay, let it be ministered on the same day on which Communion was sacrilegiously received.

Part II. On the Ministration of the Most Holy Sacrament

By the word ministration we comprehend both the confection and the dispensation of the Eucharist. Hence:

Section I. On the Confection of the Most Holy Sacrament

160 I. The minister of confection. Only and every priest can confect the sacrament of the Eucharist; this proposition is of faith. The Fourth Lateran Council defines: "Certainly no one can confect this sacrament except a priest who has been duly ordained."[1] And the Council of Trent says: "If anyone says that by those words, Do this in commemoration of me, Christ did not institute the Apostles priests, or did not ordain that they and other priests should offer His body and blood, let him be anathema."[2] For the rest, note:

1. It is not permitted for several priests to concelebrate, except in the Mass of ordination of priests and in the Mass of consecration of bishops according to the Roman Pontifical (canon 803).
2. Even if several concelebrate, there is only one sacrament in number (n. 20).
3. In the case in which several concelebrate, according to some, each one confects the sacrament only when they pronounce the words at the same time. Hence if someone intended to consecrate independently of the others, and pronounced the words before the others, he alone would confect the sacrament. To guard against this, the concelebrating priests should intend to consecrate only then when they pronounce the words at the same time with the principal celebrant. According to others, the concelebrants form a college in solidum, which as such confects the sacrament, and therefore through the utterance of the words by each one constitutes, as it were, one form, which is completed only when all have pronounced the words. Hence all should intend a collegial consecration.[3]

In practice it suffices, and is better, to consecrate according to the mind of the Church.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 430.

[2] Session 22, canon 2.

[3] Cf. de la Taille, Myst. fidei, Elucidation 28, Appendix D.

161 II. The mode of confection. 1. As regards valid confection, it suffices to add to, or emphasize in, those things which we have said about valid confection of the sacraments in general (n. 13), the following points: For the valid consecration of some matter it is required: 1. that the matter be present to the one consecrating; 2. that the intention of the one consecrating not be directed toward indeterminate matter; 3. that it truly be directed toward the present matter. But as regards validity it does not matter whether the quantity is great or small, provided it is perceptible by sense. It is said:

a) That the matter be present, namely in such a way that, according to the prudent judgment of men, it can be demonstrated by the pronouns this and here. But in order that it may be demonstrated in that way, "it is not required that the matter be seen, or touched, or struck by the sound of the words; whence the practice of those who bring their mouth very near so as to breathe their breath into the chalice and onto the bread is commonly not approved" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 212). It is required, however, that the matter: 1. not be too distant; 2. not be morally separated from the one consecrating by an intervening body. It is said not be too distant, "for example a hundred paces, even if it can be seen... But how much nearness suffices is doubtful, and depends on the judgment of prudent men" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 213). A distance of thirty or even twenty paces would render the consecration doubtfully valid (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). It is said not be morally separated from the one consecrating by an intervening body. Now an intervening body does not morally separate the matter from the one consecrating if it is interposed only by way of containing, or only by way of covering; otherwise, if it is interposed by way of dividing (St. Alphonsus, VI, 213, 1).

Corollary I. Wine can be validly consecrated in a covered chalice, hosts in a closed ciborium, or in an open tabernacle.

Corollary II. "Matter placed behind a wall or behind the back, or enclosed in a tabernacle, is invalidly consecrated" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 213); yet it seems otherwise if the matter is held by the hand behind the back or is seen with the face turned.

Corollary III. A host hidden immediately under the corporal can doubtfully be consecrated; but it seems this must be denied of a host hidden under the altar cloth, in the missal, or under a cushion (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 212).

b) That the intention of the one consecrating not be directed toward indeterminate matter; "both because the pronouns This and Here require this, and because actions concern singular things, which must be certain and determinate" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 214).

Corollary. "If someone has eleven hosts before him, and intends to consecrate only ten, not determining which ten he intends, in this case he does not consecrate."[1]

c) That the intention be truly directed toward the present matter; this condition is clear, but it is often not so clear whether it has been fulfilled, as will become evident from what is to be said.

Corollary I. If someone "thinks that one or two or six hosts to be consecrated are present, when there are more, whether placed by himself or by another, all are consecrated; because a speculative and private error does not obstruct the practical and absolute intention of consecrating all that are present; and each one is judged to have this intention as conforming to the custom of the Church" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 216). Likewise, "if after the consecration the priest notices that there are two joined together, he will take both as consecrated" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.), because he is judged to have had the intention which he ought to have, namely of consecrating whatever he holds in his hands.[2] But if before the consecration, after he has offered, he notices the other, he will set it aside, and after Mass he himself or another will consume it as blessed bread.[3]

Corollary II. If someone has brought several hosts to the altar, or in a reasonable way has noticed that they were brought by another for him to consecrate, or before the sacrifice has been warned about hosts to be consecrated, all are consecrated, even if while he consecrates he does not remember them so expressly, or even if he does not uncover them at the oblation, at least if they are on the corporal; for this "opinion is safe in practice, because the preceding intention virtually perseveres with respect to them" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 216, compared with 217).

But what if a pyx has been placed outside the corporal, either by the celebrant himself, namely through error, or by another who nevertheless warned the celebrant that these hosts were to be consecrated?

Response 1. If the celebrant thought of it at the time of consecration or within the Mass, most affirm. Nevertheless, even in this hypothesis there remains a reason for doubting whether the mentioned thought involves, or at least practically carries with it, the intention of consecrating the hosts thought of absolutely, that is, even though they are placed outside the corporal. This will become clearer from what will be said presently.

Response 2. If the celebrant did not think of it at the time of consecration or within the Mass, the matter is more doubtful. Several authors, especially more recent ones, judge that the pyx is morally certainly consecrated. But with St. Alphonsus (VI, 217) we hold the matter as doubtful. That is, the whole matter depends on the intention of the celebrant, or on whether his intention regarding the said pyx is to be interpreted in this way: "I will to consecrate those hosts absolutely or in any case, that is, whether they are placed on the corporal or outside it"; or in this way: "I will to consecrate them, provided they are placed on the corporal." Now if we attend to the fact that a priest habitually knows that the consecration of matter placed outside the corporal is prohibited under grave sin, it is neither clear, nor, as we shall see, proved by any argument of the adversaries, that the intention of the celebrant must be interpreted in the former way. Add that very many authors, and very grave ones, hold the consecration of the said hosts as doubtful. Thus, for example, besides St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), Benedict XIV,[4] Suarez,[5] the Salmanticenses,[6] Billuart,[7] Roncaglia,[8] Patuzzi,[9] Concina,[10] Ferraris,[11] Tamburini,[12] Sporer,[13] Dens,[14] Voit,[15] Marc,[16] Lehmkuhl,[17] Aertnys-Damen,[18] Tanquerey,[19] Rath,[20] etc.

Objection 1. In the case as it is posed, all things required for consecration are present, namely matter, form, and intention.

Response. As is clear from what has been said, the question is precisely whether the required intention is present, in other words, whether the intention of the celebrant must be interpreted in the sense of the adversaries.

Objection 2. If hosts placed outside the corporal are not consecrated, because it is in itself prohibited under grave sin to consecrate them, likewise wine to which a small amount of water has not been mixed is not consecrated; for such a consecration is in itself prohibited under grave sin.

Response. I deny the parity. Namely, the priest principally intends to consecrate; from this it follows that in the case opposed to us he wills the consecration of the wine, notwithstanding the defect unknown to him. But it does not follow that he wills the consecration of hosts placed outside the corporal, because a consecration can occur without their consecration.

Hosts consecrated in this doubtful way, if they are few, should be consumed after the consuming of the Blood, or at least after the ablution, that is, before the purification; if they are many, they should be consecrated again conditionally in another Mass.

Response 3. If someone once and for all elicited the intention of not consecrating hosts which remained outside the corporal, he seems never to consecrate the aforesaid hosts, because the subsequent intention, and the specifically contrary one, seems to be interpreted in conformity with, or to respond to, the prior intention.

Corollary III. Hosts placed on the corporal but outside the altar stone are consecrated; this is not prohibited even under venial sin if the altar is fixed. The same must be said of hosts in a pyx which has been left closed, since the light rubric which prohibits that does not prevent the priest from being able, I will not say obliged, and therefore presumed, to have the intention of consecrating the pyx in any case, that is, even if through forgetfulness it was not uncovered.

Corollary IV. Hosts placed on the altar wholly without the priest's knowledge, and separated from the heap to be consecrated, are not judged consecrated, because the priest is presumed not to have the intention of consecrating them (St. Alphonsus, VI, 215).

Corollary V. Little drops of wine adhering externally to the chalice are not consecrated, because the priest is not presumed to comprehend them. But little drops adhering to the inside of the chalice, yet separated, about which the minister expressly intends nothing, are, according to some, consecrated; according to others, they are not consecrated. Others distinguish between drops near the bottom and remote ones. Others doubt. It is better to have the intention only of consecrating the wine which exists as one thing in the chalice. Similarly it is expedient to consecrate crumbs adhering to hosts, but not separated crumbs on the paten or corporal; nor is it an obstacle that, by consuming them, the fast is violated, for irreverence toward the sacrament is to be guarded against more than violation of the fast. But if the crumbs are in the ciborium, he should intend to consecrate them, since the danger of losing them is absent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 215).

Corollary VI. If it happens that consecrated and unconsecrated hosts are mixed together and cannot be distinguished, the heap, insofar as it is not consecrated, should be consecrated. Others say that it should be consecrated with the limited intention of consecrating the hosts not yet consecrated; but because some doubt whether the latter mode is sufficiently safe,[21] the former should be chosen.

d) As regards validity, it does not matter whether the quantity is great or small, provided it is perceptible by sense. Matter seems invalid if it is "so small that it cannot be perceived by sense; both because it cannot be demonstrated, and because a sacrament must be a sensible sign... Understand this if it is not within the whole, but outside it; because within the whole even its smallest particles are consecrated, as is clear from Trent" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 213, 3).[22]

[1] Roman Missal, On Defects, title VII, n. 1.

[2] Roman Missal, On Defects, title VII, n. 2.

[3] Roman Missal, loc. cit.

[4] De Sacrificio Missae, book 3, chapter 18, n. 6; in the same place he speaks of a pyx which is outside the sacred stone, but the reason is equal.

[5] De Eucharistia, disputation 43, section 6; in the same place he likewise speaks of hosts which are not placed upon the altar, but, as we have said, the reason is equal.

[6] Cursus Theologiae Moralis, tract 4, chapter 4, n. 125.

[7] De Eucharistia, dissertation 3, article 6.

[8] Universa Theologia Moralis, tract 18, chapter 2, question 8.

[9] Theologia Moralis, tract 10, dissertation 1, chapter 4, n. 9.

[10] Book 3, De Eucharistia, dissertation 1, chapter 2, n. 8.

[11] Word "Missa," article 8, n. 34.

[12] De Sacrificio Missae, book 2, chapter 1, section 3, case 4, nn. 11-20.

[13] Theologia Sacramentalis, part 2, section 2, n. 169.

[14] De Eucharistia, n. 11, question 4, ad 3.

[15] De Eucharistia, nn. 286 and 287.

[16] Institutiones Alphonsianae, n. 1527.

[17] Theologia moralis, vol. II, n. 168. Lehmkuhl (loc. cit.) doubts about the consecration, because it is doubtful whether in the proposed hypothesis the priest had the intention of consecrating the aforesaid hosts, or only the purpose of afterward taking them for the sacrifice, that is, of afterward eliciting the intention of consecrating them. But I think that there is ordinarily no place for this doubt; in other words, generally in the proposed hypothesis the intention of consecrating the hosts is already elicited beforehand. The doubt is, as we have said, in what sense the said intention is to be interpreted.

[18] Theologia moralis, vol. II, n. 117.

[19] Synopsis Theologiae Dogmaticae, 4th ed., vol. II, n. 94.

[20] De Eucharistia, n. 183.

[21] They doubt because in this case the matter to be consecrated seems not sufficiently determined to them.

[22] Session 13, canons 2 and 3.

162 2. For licit consecration it is required:

a) That the consecration of one matter not be made without the consecration of the other (canon 817). The consecration of only one matter is indeed valid, but is prohibited under grave sin. I said:

First, the consecration of only one matter is valid; this is clear: 1. from the fact that the Church adores the sacred Host before the wine has been consecrated; 2. from the fact that the form by which one matter is consecrated has a complete signification, so that it must be judged to effect what it signifies. Some, though few, except the case in which the minister would consecrate one matter with the intention of not consecrating the other, in other words, of not confecting the sacrifice. They judge, namely, that the power of consecrating in this way is lacking, because the said power has been granted in order to the sacrifice, for whose essence the consecration of both matters is more probably required (St. Alphonsus, VI, 196, doubt 3).

Second, the consecration of only one matter is prohibited under grave sin; namely, it is certainly prohibited under grave sin by ecclesiastical law (canon 817), and more probably also by divine law. This is deduced from the fact that, according to the will of Christ, consecration must at the same time be the oblation of the sacrifice, for which the consecration of both matters is more probably required. There is added the fact that Christ, after both consecrations, imposed the command of doing what He Himself had done. Hence it is commonly admitted that the consecration of only one matter is not licit even for the sake of Viaticum (St. Alphonsus, VI, 195).

b) That the consecration be made within the celebration of Mass, not outside it (canon 817).

c) That the consecration of bread precede the consecration of wine; this Christ both did, and it is commanded at least by ecclesiastical law under grave sin, except in the case in which the minister after the consecration of wine notices that he has not consecrated the bread.[1]

d) That it be consecrated: 1. on a fixed or portable altar; 2. upon a corporal. Therefore if the altar is fixed, it suffices that the matter be on the altar and upon the corporal. If the altar is portable, it is required that the matter be upon the corporal and on the consecrated stone. Moreover, it suffices that the foot of the ciborium exist for the greater part in the assigned place; for the rest, the aforesaid things are prescribed under grave sin (St. Alphonsus, VI, 217, 219).

e) That the pyx be opened at the time of the offertory and of the consecration.[2] This rubric obliges only under venial sin.

f) That the hosts to be consecrated together with the host of the Mass be present at least by the offertory. If after the offertory, but before the Preface has begun, they are offered, they are licitly consecrated, the oblation being supplied mentally. If they are offered after the Preface has begun, but before the Canon has begun, a moderate cause is required, because the rite of consecration, which is already begun by the Preface, must be observed. A reason would be present if otherwise one or another person would have to wait a long time for Communion; nevertheless in such a case it is also permitted to give him a particle of the large host. If they are offered after the Canon has begun, a grave cause is required, for example lest a multitude have to wait a long time, or lest a sick person die without Viaticum. Nevertheless the oblation of the hosts should always be supplied mentally (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 217).

[1] Roman Missal, On Defects, title III, nn. 4, 5, 6.

[2] Roman Missal, Order and Rite of Mass, title VII, n. 3; title VIII, n. 5.

Section II. On the Dispensation of the Most Holy Sacrament

Chapter I. On the Person Dispensing

In order that someone legitimately dispense the Eucharist, the power of order and the power of jurisdiction are required.

163 I. The power of order. Considered with respect to the power of order:

1. Only a priest is the ordinary minister of the dispensation of the Holy Eucharist (canon 845, § 1), that is, by virtue of his ordination he is deputed to dispense it principally, not secondarily, as a deacon is. For: 1. to the one alone to whom it belongs to confect the Holy Eucharist, to him alone it belongs to dispense it principally; 2. Tradition is added, which the Council of Trent attests in these words: "It was always the custom in the Church of God that the laity receive Communion from priests; ... this custom, as descending from Apostolic Tradition, must with right and merit be retained"[1] (cf. St. Thomas, III, q. 82, a. 3).
2. A deacon is the extraordinary minister of the dispensation of the Holy Eucharist (canon 845, § 2), that is, by virtue of his ordination he is deputed to dispense it only secondarily, that is, dependently upon the permission of the local Ordinary or the pastor, which cannot be granted except for a grave cause (cited canon). Hence a deacon is rightly called only an extraordinary minister. That a deacon is truly an extraordinary minister is clear from Tradition[2] (cf. St. Thomas, loc. cit., ad 1). It is said:

a) Dependently upon the permission of the local Ordinary or the pastor. To these is equivalent a quasi-pastor, but not the rector of a church or a religious superior as such.

b) Permission cannot be granted except for a grave cause, for example if the priest were impeded in his ministry and, unless the deacon dispensed the Holy Eucharist, its dispensation would be delayed longer than is fitting (St. Alphonsus, VI, 237, question 1).[3] If a grave cause is present and the pastor cannot conveniently be approached, permission is legitimately presumed (canon 845, § 2). But a deacon who illicitly dispenses the Holy Eucharist sins gravely; likewise the local Ordinary and the pastor who grant permission without a just cause, since in a grave matter they violate the hierarchical order (St. Alphonsus, VI, 234). Nevertheless the deacon does not become irregular, since, being a minister, even if only an extraordinary one, he does not entirely usurp an order not his own (cf. canon 985, 1).

[1] Session 13, chapter 8.

[2] St. Justin Martyr, Apology I, chapters 65, 67, Migne 6, 427-430; Fourth Council of Carthage, canon 38; it occurs among the ancient statutes of the Church, in Hefele, loc. cit., vol. 2, part 1, p. 166; Apostolic Constitutions, book 8, chapter 13, Funk ed. 1906, p. 519.

[3] Cf. S.R.C., 25 February 1777, n. 2504.

164 II. The power of jurisdiction is likewise required, and this either ordinary or delegated; delegated, I say, either by law or by him who has ordinary power. Ordinary power belongs to all who exercise a pastoral office, such as the Ordinary, the pastor, all who in law come under the name of pastor, etc. These things having been noted in general, something must be said specifically about the dispensation of the Eucharist on the occasion of Mass or outside it, about carrying Communion to the sick, and about the dispensation of Viaticum.

1. Dispensation on the occasion of Mass or outside it. a) Any priest can minister Holy Communion within Mass and, if he celebrates privately, also immediately before and immediately after it (canon 846, § 1).

b) Even outside Mass any priest has the same faculty. Nevertheless, if the priest is a stranger, that is, not assigned to the church, the at least presumed permission of the rector of the church is required (canon 846, § 2).

2. Carrying Communion to the sick. First note that a twofold carrying is distinguished, public and private. It is public if it is done manifestly, with solemnity; otherwise it is called private.[1]

a) Public carrying. First, public carrying is prescribed unless a just and reasonable cause suggests otherwise (canon 847).

Second, the right and office of carrying Holy Communion publicly to the sick, even non-parishioners, outside the church, belongs to the pastor within his own territory (canon 848, § 1). Other priests can do this only in a case of necessity or with the at least presumed permission of the same pastor or of the Ordinary (canon 848, § 2). It is said only in a case of necessity, for example if the pastor and another to whom permission perhaps has been granted are impeded for too long.

b) Private carrying. First, private carrying is licit only when a just and reasonable cause suggests it (canon 847). But the judge of a just and reasonable cause is only the local Ordinary.[2] If, however, he has judged that such a cause is present, and has signified this either explicitly or tacitly, for example by not contradicting custom or common opinion,[3] he cannot prevent it from being carried secretly. Now, when a just and reasonable cause has been posited and admitted by the Ordinary:

Second, any priest can carry Communion privately to the sick, with the at least presumed permission of the priest to whom custody of the Most Holy Sacrament has been committed (canon 849, § 1).

3. Dispensation of Viaticum. a) By the name Viaticum here is understood Communion which is considered, or, so to speak, is held in the external forum as fulfilling the precept of receiving the Holy Eucharist in danger of death, about which canon 864, § 1 speaks; but not that Communion which the sick person receives afterward, nor that which one constituted in danger of death previously received, although this Communion, speaking accurately, should be called fulfilling the precept.[4]

b) One who illegitimately administers Viaticum is judged to sin gravely, since he violates a grave right of the competent person.

c) As regards the persons who legitimately administer Viaticum, receive these points:

a) To carry Holy Communion by way of Viaticum, whether publicly or privately, to the sick, even non-parishioners, outside the church, belongs to the pastor within his own territory. Other priests can do this only in a case of necessity or with the at least presumed permission of the same pastor or Ordinary (canon 850 compared with 848).

b) Canons, according to the order of precedence, must minister the sacraments to a bedridden bishop (canon 397, 3).

c) Superiors in every clerical religious institute can and must, personally or through another, minister Eucharistic Viaticum and Extreme Unction to sick professed members, novices, and others dwelling day and night in the religious house for the sake of service, education, hospitality, or ill health (canon 514, § 1). These things also hold for conferring these sacraments outside the religious house, if it concerns professed religious or novices, yet with the right of the pastor preserved as regards the public carrying of the Holy Eucharist.[5]

d) In a house of nuns, the ordinary confessor, or the one who acts in his place, has the same right and office (canon 514, § 2). Under the name of nuns also come religious women whose vows by institute are solemn, but for some places by prescription of the Apostolic See are simple (canon 488, 7).

e) In another lay religious institute this right and office belongs to the local pastor or to the chaplain whom the Ordinary has substituted for the pastor (canon 514, § 3).

f) The rector of a seminary, not the pastor, or his delegate can minister Viaticum and Extreme Unction to all who are in the seminary and are gravely bedridden (canon 1368).

g) Particular law commonly permits those who have domicile or quasi-domicile in ecclesiastical colleges specially entrusted by the bishop to a director or rector, or approved by him, to be able to receive Viaticum and Extreme Unction from the rector himself or from his delegate. This right does not belong to the pastor if the particular law intends the said colleges to be withdrawn from the care of the pastor (cf. canon 464, § 2).

h) Finally, if priest and deacon are lacking, even a subdeacon, cleric, and layperson can with sufficient probability minister Viaticum, provided that scandal is absent or prevented. For the ecclesiastical prohibition is not judged to comprehend this case; all the more because in antiquity even laypeople brought the Eucharist home for the sake of communicating (St. Alphonsus, VI, 237, question 3). If the case concerns a dying priest or deacon, the layperson should only bring the ciborium, and the dying person himself, if he can, should give Viaticum to himself. Note besides that a priest is equivalently lacking if singular dexterity is required in communicating the dying person; hence at times it can be entrusted, for example to a sister, to give Viaticum, for instance, with a spoon. I add with St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) that in a case of supreme necessity, which can occur for example in time of plague, the bishop can commit the ministration of Viaticum to a layperson.

Corollary. Although in itself no one except the celebrating priest can minister Communion to himself, nevertheless this is permitted:

1. If the case concerns Viaticum, to a priest and deacon, if another priest and deacon are lacking; to an inferior cleric, if priest, deacon, and another inferior cleric are lacking; to a layperson, if priest, deacon, and inferior cleric are lacking. This doctrine is rightly admitted both because the divine precept of receiving Viaticum seems to prevail, and because "formerly lay faithful carried the Eucharist into their homes and communicated themselves with their own hands; and this indeed was permitted because of necessity" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 237, question 2). It is confirmed by a response of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide,[6] which declared that in time of persecution it is permitted that confessors of the faith condemned to death, and to whom the sacrament of the Most Holy Eucharist is brought in prison, may secretly receive it in their hands and secretly communicate themselves, lest the priest communicating them in the ordinary manner be known and seized, provided nevertheless that so great a sacrament is not exposed to any irreverence or other danger.[7]
2. If the case concerns Communion to be received only for the sake of devotion, a priest can with sufficient probability minister Communion to himself if another priest is lacking (St. Alphonsus, VI, 238).
3. Where the necessity of preventing profanation of the Most Holy Sacrament is urgent, even laypeople can consume the species and distribute them to one another.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, 23 December 1912 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1912, p. 725, ad III).

[2] Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, 5 January 1928.

[3] The Ordinary should be easy in admitting a just and reasonable cause. Hence the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, in the decree of 5 January 1928, adds "with this mind, which is the following: If from common experience and opinion there is no inconvenience in the diocese or in some particular place for the private carrying of Holy Communion to the sick, Ordinaries must beware lest, by rules too strictly defined or general rules prescribing public carrying, or by a reservation made to themselves of giving permission in individual cases of carrying the sacrament of the Eucharist privately, the consolation of Communion, even daily Communion, be impeded for the sick." And in the annotations to the Decree, the Acta Apostolicae Sedis warns: Most Reverend local Ordinaries must carefully watch lest in a matter of such great importance the end intended by the Church be frustrated in any way. For no one is unaware that in our times Holy Communion, even daily Communion, is commended most highly to the Christian faithful. Now who, more than a sick person, is to be said to need the help and consolation of so great a sacrament for bearing the distresses of illness?

[4] This Communion is also called Viaticum by the Code (canon 864, § 3).

[5] Pontifical Commission, 16 June 1931, under I (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1931, p. 353).

[6] 10 August 1841.

[7] Gaude in the cited place of St. Alphonsus.

Chapter II. On the Things to Be Observed in the Dispensation of the Holy Eucharist

Something must be said about the time, place, and mode of distributing the Holy Eucharist, and about the mode of carrying it to the sick.

Article I. On the Time of Dispensing the Holy Eucharist

165 I. Ordinary Communion; under this name also comes Communion of devotion to be received by a sick person.

1. Ordinary Communion can be distributed on all days (canon 867, § 1), except Friday of Holy Week, on which it is permitted only to carry Sacred Viaticum to the sick (canon 867, § 2). Viaticum is understood as it was explained above (n. 164); therefore Communion cannot be ministered on Friday of Holy Week to a sick person to whom Viaticum so understood has already previously been conferred. Nevertheless, Easter Communion could be given to one who can receive it conveniently enough only on Friday of Holy Week, for the law of communicating at Easter prevails over the liturgical law of not distributing Holy Communion on the aforesaid Friday.

2. Ordinary Communion can be distributed only at those hours at which the sacrifice of Mass can be offered, and likewise at other hours if a reasonable cause suggests it (canon 867, § 4). A reasonable cause for ministering Communion earlier or later than is permitted in itself is present, for example, if a sick person cannot observe the fast until one hour before dawn, or if someone, prevented from receiving Communion earlier, has remained fasting beyond one hour after noon. For the rest, note:

a) The faculty of distributing Communion at the hours at which Mass can be celebrated is to be taken in a broad sense, so that at whatever time, whether by common law or by privilege, it is permitted to celebrate, Communion also can be distributed. Hence it can be distributed in the oratory of a religious or pious house, where according to canon 821, § 3 Mass can already be begun at midnight; this is clear from the cited canon itself. Likewise it can be distributed in a conventual or parochial Mass (canons 821, § 1; 867, § 4; 863).

b) An indult of anticipating Mass can, with sufficient probability, also be extended to the distribution of Communion, even if in fact Mass is not anticipated.

c) On Holy Thursday the Holy Eucharist seems able to be distributed only before and during the solemn Mass; both because after the solemn Mass another Mass can no longer be celebrated, and because according to the rubric of the Missal only some species are to be reserved for the sick.

d) On Holy Saturday Holy Communion cannot be ministered to the faithful except during the solemnities of Masses or continuously and immediately after they have been completed (canon 867, § 3). Hence it is prohibited in churches where Mass is not celebrated. Moreover, considering the obvious sense of the canon, it seems to be required that the distribution of Communion be made jointly with Mass, so that it forms one thing with it. Yet this does not prevent there from being a reason excusing from the law, as if men, after having completed spiritual exercises, could not wait for the solemnities of Masses. Indeed, considering also the custom persisting in Rome, it can seem to someone that canon 867, § 3 speaks only of the place where the solemnities of Masses take place, but not, for example, of a separate chapel.[1]

e) A celebrating priest is not permitted to distribute the Eucharist within Mass to faithful so distant that he himself loses the altar from view (canon 868). Therefore the interpretation of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, 7 February 1874 (n. 3322), according to which it would suffice that the voice of the celebrant be heard, even if the altar were lost from view, seems to fall away. But the decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Rites (n. 2672), 7 December 1844 (n. 2885), 24 March 1860 (n. 3099, ad I), and 11 May 1878 (n. 3448, ad VIII), which agree with the Code, remain. Nevertheless others judge that the canon is not to be urged in this way.

3. It is not necessary that Communion be united with Mass, but it can also be distributed outside it. But if it is united with Mass, it must be done within Mass immediately after the Communion of the celebrant; and if Mass is celebrated privately, for a reasonable cause it can also be done immediately before and immediately after Mass (canon 846). These things also hold in a Mass for the dead.[2]

[1] Cf. Response of the President of the Commission for the Code, 10 July 1909 (Il Monitore Ecclesiastico 1922, p. 371; 1924, p. 21).

[2] Cf. Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 2, n. 11. Cf. S.R.C., 19 December 1829, n. 2672, ad 1; 23 July 1868, n. 3177; 24 March 1860, n. 3099.

166 II. Viaticum can be ministered on any day, even Friday of Holy Week (canon 867, §§ 1 and 2), and at any hour of the day or night (canon 867, § 5).

Article II. On the Place of Dispensing the Holy Eucharist

167 I. Ordinary Communion, under which name also comes Communion of devotion to be carried to the sick. Now: Holy Communion can be distributed wherever it is permitted to celebrate Mass, even in a private oratory, unless the local Ordinary, for just causes, has prohibited this in particular cases (canon 869). These things are also to be applied to Easter Communion. It is said wherever it is permitted to celebrate Mass. Hence permission granted either by the local Ordinary or by a major superior according to canon 822, § 4 - that is, of celebrating outside a church and oratory, but in a decent place, never however in a bedroom; which permission can be granted by the said persons, only for a just and reasonable cause, in some extraordinary case, and by way of an act - carries with it permission to distribute Communion in the same place. This is deduced from canon 869 joined with canon 822, § 4.

Hence the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, to question I: "Whether the faithful living in mountain villages, whenever the Holy Eucharist is carried to the sick, can be refreshed by the Holy Synaxis in a sacred place, or even, since it concerns so sacred a thing, in a decent and honorable place which exists on the route, since they cannot go to church on that day"; to that question, I say, it responded: "Affirmatively according to canon 869 joined with canon 822, § 4, that is, provided the local Ordinary grants this according to the norm of the cited prescription, namely for individual cases and by way of an act."[1] And to question II: "Whether Holy Communion and the sacrament of Confession can be administered to those who are in the house of the sick person"; it responded: "As regards Communion, provision has been made in the first response." Moreover, note:

1. In the proposed hypothesis it is not required that Mass in fact be celebrated, but the faculty of celebrating in some place suffices.
2. The power of granting the permission of celebrating of which we have spoken is ordinary, and therefore can be delegated by the local Ordinary and by a major superior.

Corollary. Missionaries who enjoy the faculty of celebrating outside sacred places can minister the Eucharist in a place where in fact they do not celebrate, but where they can celebrate. Likewise pastors who enjoy a faculty received from the Ordinary of permitting Mass to be celebrated outside sacred places can permit Holy Communion to be ministered, even though Mass is not celebrated. But a just cause, some extraordinary case, and that it be done by way of an act are always required.

[1] 5 January 1928 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1928, p. 79).

168 II. Viaticum can be ministered in almost any place. In itself, indeed, it is unbecoming for Viaticum to be carried to a brothel; but if a penitent prostitute cannot in time be removed from such a house, it seems Viaticum can be ministered to her, provided scandal and the danger of positive irreverence are absent. Moreover, let the priest take care not to be deceived and not to suffer harm to his reputation; hence let him have as companion a safe man and indeed, if it can be done, a public minister.

Article III. On the Mode of Dispensing the Holy Eucharist

169 The mode or rite of distributing the Holy Eucharist is set forth in the Roman Missal[1] and in the Roman Ritual.[2] Specifically, note:

1. The Most Holy Eucharist is to be given under the species of bread alone (canon 852); from this, as is taught sufficiently commonly, one cannot depart even for giving Viaticum (St. Alphonsus, VI, 245).

2. A priest of the Latin rite should distribute Communion with unleavened bread; a priest of an Eastern rite, with leavened bread, even to faithful of another rite. But where necessity urges and no priest of a different rite is present, it is permitted for an Eastern priest who uses leavened bread to minister the Eucharist in unleavened bread, and conversely for a Latin or an Eastern priest who uses unleavened bread to minister in leavened bread; but each must preserve his own rite of ministering (canon 851, §§ 1 and 2). Necessity urges sufficiently if on that day the faithful person could not receive Communion without grave inconvenience unless the priest gave him the species of another rite (cf. canon 866, § 1). Therefore it is required that a priest of the other rite be lacking and unable to be approached, and that the present priest be unable to consecrate bread of his own rite.

3. Sacred vestments and a light must be used, and the prayers assigned in the Ritual must be recited.[3] Now it would be a grave sin to omit every sacred vestment. It is venial to use only a stole or only a surplice, or to minister without a light, or to omit the preceding and following prayers. Nevertheless it would be permitted to minister Communion without a sacred vestment and without a light both in a case of necessity and for another truly grave cause, for example if someone sacrilegiously received Viaticum and it must again be carried secretly and clandestinely; likewise in houses where something prevents the inhabitants from suspecting that Communion is being brought (St. Alphonsus, VI, 241).[4]

Not only one who distributes Communion within Mass, but also one who distributes it immediately before or immediately after, can do this in the vestments of Mass; this also holds of a Mass for the dead.[5]

4. The Holy Eucharist must be distributed with the thumb and index finger of the right hand. Nevertheless, it would be permitted to offer it with other fingers if otherwise the people or the dying person would be deprived of Communion. Any just cause does not seem to suffice, since the index finger and thumb are deputed by the rite of the Church for this ministry. But if danger of contagion is feared, the sacred species can be placed in a vessel or in a spoon with a little water, and thus brought to the mouth of the sick person. If the sick person, because of dryness of the mouth, cannot swallow the host, either let the species be given in the mode explained, or after Communion has been taken let a draught of wine or a very small drink of cold, fresh, and, if possible, icy water be given to the sick person (St. Alphonsus, VI, 244, 288).

5. It is not permitted to give "several Eucharistic forms or particles, nor larger ones, but the customary ones."[6] Nevertheless, if a sufficient number of consecrated hosts is lacking, it is permitted to divide small hosts,[7] but at most into two or three parts, unless there is a special reason for dividing even into more parts, for example if the priest rarely comes somewhere. Likewise, if someone otherwise would have to wait too long, it is permitted to remove a particle from the host of the Mass (St. Alphonsus, VI, 245).

[1] Order for Celebrating Mass, title X, n. 6.

[2] Title IV, chapter 2.

[3] The Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, 16 March 1929 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1929, p. 638), prescribed that besides the linen cloth extended before those communicating, a paten made of silver or gilded metal is to be used.

[4] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 9 December 1822 (Collectanea, n. 778).

[5] S.R.C., 19 December 1829, n. 2672, ad 2; 23 July 1868, n. 3177.

[6] Decree of Innocent XI, 12 February 1679.

[7] S.R.C., 16 March 1833, n. 2704, ad 1.

Article IV. On the Mode of Carrying the Holy Eucharist to the Sick

170 As we said above (n. 164), public and private carrying are distinguished. Public carrying is set forth in the Roman Ritual.[1] In private carrying, according to canon 849, § 2, "reverence and decorum owed to so great a sacrament should be carefully provided for, with the norms prescribed by the Apostolic See being observed."

The norm is presented by the Roman Ritual in these words: "When, for a just and reasonable cause, Holy Communion is privately carried to the sick, the priest should at least always have a stole covered by his own clothes; he should place the pyx in a little bag or burse, which, suspended from his neck by cords, he should put in his bosom; and he should never proceed alone, but should be accompanied by at least one faithful person, in the absence of a cleric. But when he has arrived at the room of the sick person, the priest should also put on a surplice with the stole, if he has not already put it on."[2] For the rest, observe:

1. When the Holy Eucharist is carried openly, it is in itself forbidden to walk with covered head. But the prohibition seems to regard only public carrying. Moreover Ordinaries can - as it seems, now all - permit ministers, on account of cold or inclement weather, to use a small cap outside a city or town, even one so large that it covers the ears[3] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 241). Indeed, if otherwise harm to the priest's health is to be feared, there is an excusing cause. Nothing also prevents an artificial covering from being used against rain or snow.

2. It is also permitted, scandal nevertheless being excluded, for a sufficiently grave cause, for example because of weather or distance, to carry the Eucharist on horseback,[4] in a carriage (St. Alphonsus, VI, 243), likewise in an automobile, in a tram, or by railway. Likewise it is permitted in a case of necessity, namely lest someone be deprived of Viaticum, to run (St. Alphonsus, VI, 242), and likewise to use what is called a bicycle or motorcycle.[5] Particular statutes, which here are milder and there stricter, should moreover be attended to. For the rest, local Ordinaries should take care

"lest abuses creep into ecclesiastical discipline, especially concerning the administration of the sacraments" (canon 336, § 2). Moreover, note:

a) If Viaticum is ministered, it is to be said: "Receive, brother (sister), the Viaticum of the Body of our Lord Jesus Christ, who may guard you from the malignant enemy and bring you to eternal life. Amen."[6]

b) If for a just cause the priest has taken with him only one host, then, after it has been given to the sick person, the pyx or little case can be washed in the house of the sick person and the ablution given to the sick person; then the pyx should be wiped with a purificator (St. Alphonsus, VI, 251).

[1] Title IV, chapter 4.

[2] Title IV, chapter 4, n. 29. By force of a special indult of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 8 February 1875, which was abrogated neither by the general decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, 23 December 1912, ad III, nor by canon 847 (cf. canon 4), private carrying is licit in the ecclesiastical province of Utrecht (Supplementum ad Rituale Romanum pro usu cleri provinciae ecclesiasticae Ultraiectensis, n. 22).

[3] Cf. In Coloniensi, S.R.C., 13 November 1862; In Oriolensi, 22 April 1871, n. 3246, ad I; Supplementum ad Rituale Romanum pro usu cleri Provinciae ecclesiasticae Ultraiectensis, n. 21.

[4] Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 4, n. 13.

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments, 13 June 1919.

[6] Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 4, n. 19.

Part III. On the Reception of the Most Holy Sacrament

We shall speak first about the notion and division of the reception of the Eucharist, then about the person receiving, and then about the mode of receiving it.

Section I. On the Notion and Division of Reception of the Holy Eucharist

171 The reception of the Eucharist can be distinguished as threefold, namely material, sacramental, and spiritual.[1]

I. Material reception is that by which it is so received that the sacrament is not applied to the one receiving, in other words, so that the sacrament does not become a title of grace applied to him. It is received materially: 1. by one not baptized; 2. by a baptized adult who lacks intention.

II. Sacramental reception is had when the sacrament is applied to the one receiving, or when it becomes a title of grace applied to the one receiving. Sacramental reception is twofold, namely sacramental only, and sacramental and spiritual, according as it is received with or without an obstacle to the effect, that is, to the grace to be received.

As regards the requisites for sacramental reception, receive these points:

1. For sacramental reception, eating is certainly required, whether true or equivalent. This is drawn from these words of Christ: "Unless you eat the flesh of the Son of man and drink His blood, you will not have life in you";[2] "Take and eat; this is my body";[3] "... drink ye all of this, for this is my blood of the New Testament, which shall be shed for many unto remission of sins."[4]
2. For sacramental reception, the passage of food into the stomach is certainly required. For if this is lacking, according to common estimation no one is said to eat.
3. It is disputed whether or not a vital passage into the stomach through the esophagus, whether natural or artificial, is required, or whether passage into the stomach by means of a tube inserted into the esophagus or into another part of the body suffices. Some judge that passage by means of a tube suffices, because there is at least equivalent eating. Others admit the contrary, because, considering the obvious sense of the words of Christ, there seems to be required an act which truly is, or at least according to common estimation is called, eating. Now one who is fed by means of a tube is not said to eat, but to be nourished artificially.

III. Spiritual reception is the desire or vow, conceived from faith and charity, of receiving the Eucharist really.[5] Now spiritual Communion produces ex opere operantis fruits very similar to those which real Communion effects ex opere operato. Hence the Council of Trent declares that those communicate spiritually "who, eating in desire that heavenly bread set before them, by living faith which works through love, perceive its fruit and usefulness."[6] But in order that someone may acquire the aforesaid fruits, let him elicit an act of faith, charity or perfect contrition, and desire toward Christ in the Eucharist. One who is only attrite concerning a mortal sin perhaps committed, by desiring Communion indeed performs a good work, but does not communicate spiritually, and therefore does not receive the special fruits annexed to spiritual Communion.

In the following, the discussion will be only about sacramental Communion.

[1] "As regards use, the Council of Trent speaks thus: 'Our fathers rightly and wisely distinguished three ways of receiving this holy sacrament. For they taught that some receive it sacramentally only, as sinners; others only spiritually, namely those who, eating in desire that heavenly bread set before them, by living faith which works through love, perceive its fruit and usefulness; and thirdly, others both sacramentally and spiritually; and these are those who first so prove and prepare themselves that, clothed in the wedding garment, they approach this divine table'" (Session 13, chapter 8).

[2] John 6:54.

[3] Matthew 26:26.

[4] Matthew 26:27-28.

[5] Council of Trent, session 13, chapter 8.

[6] Loc. cit.

Section II. On the Person Receiving

172 I. In order that the Holy Eucharist can be validly ministered to someone, it suffices that he be baptized and, if he has arrived at the years of discretion, that he have the intention of receiving the sacrament (nn. 38, 40).

173 II. In order that the Holy Eucharist be licitly ministered to someone, indeed, if he asks for it, that it ought to be ministered, it suffices that he be baptized and not prohibited by law. It will be clear from what is to be said about children, about the insane, about the unworthy, etc., to what extent someone is prohibited by law.

1. Children. As regards the Communion of children, the Code, though with certain additions, briefly repeats what is contained more fully in the decree of the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments Quam singulari.[1] Now:

a) The Eucharist is not to be ministered to children who, because of the weakness of age, do not yet have knowledge and taste of this sacrament (canon 854).[2]

b) As regards the required knowledge, these things now hold:

First, in danger of death, in order that the Most Holy Eucharist can and ought to be ministered to children, it is enough that they know how to distinguish the Body of Christ from common food and to adore it reverently (canon 854, § 2). Although these requisites, if the family is religious, can be presumed, it is nevertheless better to make oneself more certain about them. Moreover, a child who has attained the use of reason, if his condition permits it, should commonly, at least as a precaution, be expressly taught, and indeed before Communion is ministered, the things which must be known by necessity of means.

Second, outside danger of death, a fuller knowledge of Christian doctrine and a more accurate preparation is rightly required, namely that by which they themselves, according to their capacity, perceive at least the mysteries of faith necessary by necessity of means for salvation, and approach the Most Holy Eucharist devoutly according to the measure of their age (canon 854, § 3). "Therefore, to use the words of the decree cited above, not a perfect knowledge of matters of faith is required, since certain elements only are enough, that is, some knowledge." It is enough, therefore, that the child: 1. know the things to be known by necessity of means; 2. distinguish Eucharistic bread from common bread, and therefore know that under the host Christ, or the Infant Jesus, is present and that He is united with us through Communion. But in order that he sufficiently discern Eucharistic bread from common bread, he should moreover: 3. know that natural fasting and the state of grace are required for licit Communion. Finally, in order that he may understand what the state of grace involves and requires, 4. he should have some notion of mortal sin and of the means by which lost grace must be recovered, namely the sacrament of Penance. Observe, however, that that knowledge of the aforesaid things suffices which a child can have who enjoys some use of reason, or who begins to reason.[3] Nor is it required that he hold in memory the formulas by which the aforesaid truths are presented in the Catechism. But if the required knowledge is present, the child can also approach the Most Holy Eucharist devoutly according to the measure of his age.

c) The obligation of the precept of Confession and Communion, which burdens the child, and generally the prepubescent, falls also and especially upon those who ought to have care of him, that is, upon parents, guardians, the confessor, teachers, and the pastor (canon 860). Therefore the obligation rests upon the aforesaid persons of taking care that the child, after he has begun to reason, learn the necessary things to be known and, once knowledge has been acquired, fulfill the precepts in due time.

d) Judgment about the sufficient disposition of children for first Communion belongs to the priest hearing their confessions and to their parents or those who are in the place of parents (canon 854, § 4), for example teachers in a college.

e) But it is the office of the pastor to watch carefully, even through an examination if he has prudently judged it opportune, lest children approach the Sacred Synaxis before having attained the use of reason or without sufficient disposition; and likewise to take care that those who have attained the use of reason and are sufficiently disposed be refreshed by this divine food as soon as possible (canon 854, § 5). From these things do not deduce that the pastor can of himself subject children to an examination. He can do this if he has prudently judged it opportune; and that happens only when he has a positive reason for doubting about the requisites for Communion.

[1] 8 August 1910.

[2] Concerning the contrary custom formerly in force and even now persisting among the Greeks and Orientals, the cited decree Quam singulari speaks thus: The Church "from its very beginnings took care to bring little children near to Christ through Eucharistic Communion, which it was accustomed to administer to them even as infants. This, as was prescribed in almost all Rituals up to the thirteenth century, was done in Baptism, and this custom obtained longer in some places; among the Greeks and Orientals it still perseveres. But to remove the danger that especially nursing infants might spit out the consecrated bread, the custom prevailed from the beginning of ministering the Eucharist to them under the species of wine alone. Nor were infants refreshed with the divine banquet only at Baptism, but afterward more often. For it was also the custom of certain churches to give the Eucharist to little children immediately after the clergy, and elsewhere, after the Communion of adults, to give them the remaining fragments. This custom then became obsolete in the Latin Church, and infants did not begin to become sharers of the sacred table unless they had some use of dawning reason and some knowledge of the august sacrament. This new discipline, already received by several particular synods, was confirmed by the solemn sanction of the Fourth Ecumenical Lateran Council, in the year 1215, by the promulgation of the famous canon XXI, by which sacramental Confession and Holy Communion are prescribed for the faithful after they have reached the age of reason."

[3] Cf. the decree Quam singulari, 8 August 1910.

174 2. The insane are some perpetually insane, others not perpetually insane, others insane only about one or another point, and others semi-insane.

a) The perpetually insane. To these, since they are equated with little children, the Holy Eucharist cannot be ministered,[1] not even in danger of death. The reason for the prohibition is that they neither have, nor ever had, knowledge and taste of the Holy Eucharist.

b) The insane, but not perpetually so, the delirious, epileptics, the possessed, and those obsessed.

First, outside danger of death, the Eucharist cannot be ministered to the aforesaid while they are not in possession of themselves. "Nevertheless it will be permitted, if at some time they have lucid intervals and show devotion while they remain in that state, if there is no danger of unworthiness"[2] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 302).

Second, in danger of death it should not be given: 1. if it is sufficiently certain that they are constituted in sin and impenitent, for example if in the act of sin, or after a scandalous life, they have fallen into insanity, delirium, or deprivation of the senses; 2. if a danger of positive irreverence is present. In doubt whether such danger is present, that is, the danger that the sick person may expel the Sacred Host or move indecently during the ministration, it is useful to give him an unconsecrated particle before the Holy Eucharist; 3. if it is clear that they lack and have always lacked sufficient knowledge and devotion toward the Eucharist (St. Thomas, III, q. 80, a. 9; St. Alphonsus, VI, 302). Nevertheless imperfect knowledge suffices; likewise devotion broadly taken, or such that someone can be presumed to will to receive the Eucharist in danger of death. Outside the enumerated cases, according to the opinion of almost all authors, it is permitted to minister the Eucharist to them.[3]

For the rest, nothing can obstruct liceity except the defect of actual devotion in the one receiving or the prohibition of the Church. But since the sacraments are for human beings, the greatest good of the one receiving prevails over the reverence owed in itself (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). The Roman Ritual[4] can be understood of ordinary circumstances, that is, abstracting from danger of death. But it is disputed whether there is an obligation of giving Viaticum to the aforesaid. Now with St. Thomas (III, q. 80, a. 9), St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.), and most theologians, against some, it must be affirmed. For if it is permitted to give that greatest good to the dying person, there is also an obligation of giving it; all the more because the dying person must be said at least implicitly to ask for the sacrament, namely because his intention or profession of the Christian religion involves at least an implicit petition for Viaticum (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). From these things it follows that the practice of not ministering Viaticum to the persons of whom we have spoken is truly an abuse.

c) Those insane only about one or another point can communicate at least sometimes, provided the insanity does not regard the substance of the Holy Eucharist. The reason is that at least it is doubtful whether human beings of this kind lack the faculty of placing human acts; and in doubt, favor must be shown to them.

d) The semi-insane and the elderly becoming childish again. Communion is to be given to these: 1. in danger of death; 2. at Easter (St. Alphonsus, VI, 303); 3. if they enjoy greater discretion, they can also communicate more often. These things also hold of those deaf and mute from birth, unless they have been specially instructed in some institute (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

[1] Cf. Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 1, n. 10.

[2] Roman Ritual, loc. cit.

[3] Cf. Fourth Council of Carthage (cause 26, question 6, chapter Is qui poenitentiam); First Council of Orange (cause 26, question 6, chapter Qui recedunt); Decretals of Gregory IX (De poenitentiis et remissionibus, chapter Quod in te), and the Roman Catechism (De Eucharistia, n. 64).

[4] Title IV, chapter 1, n. 10.

175 3. The unworthy are either publicly or occultly unworthy. Now:

a) The publicly unworthy are to be kept away from the Eucharist, such as the excommunicated, the interdicted, and the manifestly infamous, unless their repentance and amendment are clear and they have first made satisfaction for public scandal (canon 855, § 1). Besides those enumerated, all public sinners are to be counted among the publicly unworthy. Moreover, those who are indecently dressed seem able to be repelled, even if they cannot be said to be gravely guilty; but great prudence is needed in such a case. The publicly unworthy must be repelled whether they ask publicly or secretly, unless nevertheless the minister has positively known that they are repentant, and they have first satisfied for public scandal. See these things explained in the treatise on the sacraments in general, n. 28.

b) Occult sinners are to be repelled only when they ask secretly and the minister has positively known outside confession that they have not been amended; but not if they ask publicly and he cannot pass them over without scandal (canon 855, § 2).

176 4. Those suffering from a cough. To these, unless the cough is constant, Communion can be given. For the phlegm which is expelled by coughing comes not from the stomach and esophagus, but from the lungs or bronchi. Only then, if the sick person is suddenly afflicted by a very violent cough, is there danger that the sacred species may be ejected by the force of the cough.

177 5. Those suffering from frequent vomiting cannot communicate unless it is clear, for example from the declaration of those standing by, or more advisedly of a physician, that noteworthy danger is absent. Note, however, that often a particle of the host can be given to them without danger of vomiting.

178 6. As regards those who cannot take the species except in an artificial way, for example through a tube inserted into the esophagus or another part of the body, receive these points:

There is no obligation of communicating or of ministering in this way, not even in danger of death; both because it is doubtful whether such taking is sacramental (n. 171), and because the Holy Office, on 27 January 1886, concerning a similar case,[1] responded: "As it is explained, it is not expedient," which, considering the style of the Curia, seems to involve a prohibition; and on 27 November 1919, to a petition in which the faculty of taking the Holy Eucharist through a tube inserted into the stomach was asked, it responded: "Negative."[2] Nevertheless, considering the probability of sacramental taking together with the lack of a general prohibition, I would not condemn one who in danger of death communicated in this way.

The fact that someone uses an artificial esophagus does not prevent him from truly absorbing food, or passing it into the stomach through a vital act. Therefore such a person without doubt receives the Holy Eucharist sacramentally, and therefore can communicate just as others can.

Note. In doubt whether a dying person can swallow the species, those standing by should be asked whether he still takes food; or an experiment should be made by giving him some food or an unconsecrated host. In what way the Eucharist can be ministered if the dying or sick person cannot swallow the species because of dryness of the mouth, see n. 169.

[1] The case concerned a sick person for whom an opening for receiving food had been made below the chest; this case does not formally differ from the case of a tube inserted into the esophagus.

[2] In Nederlandsche Katholieke Stemmen, 1921, p. 16.

Section III. On the Mode of Receiving

Chapter I. On the Disposition of the Soul

179 I. The state of grace. That the state of grace is required is clear from Sacred Scripture,[1] and from what was said about the sacraments in general, n. 43. In the same place it was likewise proved that broad moral certitude about the state of grace is required.

1. One who is conscious to himself of mortal sin is bound per se to recover lost grace through Confession. Per accidens he sometimes satisfies by an act of contrition, as will be explained under 4. That Confession is required per se is clear from the Council of Trent: "One who wishes to communicate must recall to memory that precept of his, that is, of the Apostle: Let a man prove himself. But ecclesiastical custom declares that this proof is necessary, so that no one conscious to himself of mortal sin, however much he may seem to himself contrite, ought to approach the Holy Eucharist without previous sacramental Confession. This holy Synod has decreed that this must perpetually be observed by all Christians, even by those priests upon whom, by office, it is incumbent to celebrate, provided that a supply of a confessor is not lacking to them."[2] Canons 807 and 856 are added.

It is disputed, however, whether the precept of premising Confession is divine or ecclesiastical; likewise, if it is ecclesiastical, whether it was imposed by Paul or introduced by custom. Concerning this, note: 1. nothing can be deduced from the cited place of Trent, since from the history[3] and acts[4] of the Council it is clear that the Fathers adhered to different opinions and did not intend to reject any one. 2. It is difficult to admit that an obligation of this kind was imposed by Paul upon the whole Church, unless it is positively proved; but a solid argument is lacking. Hence the said precept seems either to be divine or to have been introduced by ecclesiastical custom; which is to be preferred, I do not know.

Nor should you object: According to Trent, ecclesiastical custom declares that the proof of which Paul speaks is placed in Confession; therefore custom did not introduce the obligation of confessing. Response: According to Trent, ecclesiastical custom does not declare that the proof of which Paul speaks is placed in Confession, but that proof through Confession is necessary; by this it is left undecided whether such proof was introduced by Christ, by Paul, or by ancient custom.

2. One who, all things considered, doubts whether after his last Confession he sinned gravely, is not bound to confess, but satisfies by an act of contrition. For the Council of Trent speaks only of one who is conscious of mortal sin; this cannot be said of one who doubts (St. Alphonsus, VI, 473). Nevertheless, if he does not confess, that he is bound to an act of contrition was proved in the treatise on the sacraments in general (n. 43). I said all things considered, because Confession is prescribed if from the circumstances it must be presumed that a grave sin was committed (De Sacramentis in genere, loc. cit.).

It is disputed whether before Communion one must confess again who, all things considered, doubts whether he has worthily confessed the sin committed. But according to the principles of St. Alphonsus it must be affirmed, because he doubtfully satisfied the law of worthy Confession. Nevertheless I again said all things considered; for if the doubt arises from doubt about the mode in which the Confession was made, for example whether it was instituted with true attrition or not, it can be presumed that it was rightly made (vol. I, n. 229).

3. One who confessed worthily, but forgot a mortal sin, with sufficient probability is not bound to confess again before he communicates. Most older theologians reject this doctrine, because the Council of Trent, which binds one who is conscious to himself of mortal sin to previous Confession, in the obvious sense speaks of the Confession of all mortal sins of which he is conscious to himself before Communion. But St. Alphonsus (VI, 257), and after him almost all more recent authors, hold as sufficiently probable that only a worthy previous Confession is prescribed, in other words, that it suffices that someone has been justified through Confession, or that sins have been remitted through Confession, whether directly, or, as in the case of a sin omitted through forgetfulness, indirectly. Considering the not-to-be-despised explanation of the Council of Trent and the authority of the authors, we hold this opinion as safe in practice.
4. One who per se is bound to Confession, per accidens is not bound to it, but satisfies by an act of perfect contrition, if both there is a necessity of communicating or celebrating, and the supply of a confessor is lacking (canons 807, 856).

a) The necessity of celebrating or communicating is understood as grave or urgent, as the Council of Trent, loc. cit., and the Code (cited canons) have it. Necessity is present:

First, if Communion or Mass cannot be omitted without infamy or scandal, as if a layperson has already approached the Communion rail; if a priest has already begun Mass, or has arrived at the altar, or is eagerly awaited by the faithful (St. Alphonsus, VI, 260). Necessity also seems to be present if someone, for example, goes to church with his family intending to communicate and is not absolved. As regards those who in colleges, etc., communicate daily, infamy does not seem to be a sufficient reason, nor one to be admitted by the confessor, because either they rarely sin, and then they can more easily allege another motive, for example a broken fast; or they sin more often, and then they are bound to arrange their Communions so that they are no longer known to communicate daily. Therefore the obligation of Confession is also to be urged more, especially in younger persons, lest the reverence due to the Eucharist be diminished, the horror of sin be lost, and the efforts to root out a depraved habit be lessened.[5]

Second, if Mass must be continued; namely: 1. if the consecration has already begun, the priest should not interrupt Mass in order to confess, but, having elicited an act of contrition, should continue it. 2. If the consecration has not yet begun, the same seems to be said of a priest who remembers a grave sin or becomes guilty of one, since the Missal states without distinction: "If in the very celebration of Mass the priest remembers that he is in mortal sin, let him be contrite with the purpose of confessing and satisfying."[6] But the priest who "remembers that he is excommunicated or suspended, or that the place is interdicted... if scandal is not feared, ought to leave the Mass already begun."[7] The reason of scandal, or infamy, will commonly excuse from leaving Mass, so that Mass should rather be continued, after an act of contrition has been elicited.

Third, if Viaticum must be consecrated for a dying person and another who may celebrate is lacking. Likewise if there is danger that the sacrament may be profaned and that danger cannot be averted in another equally safe way (St. Alphonsus, VI, 260).

Fourth, if there is, whether for a pastor or for an assistant, an obligation of celebrating by office, for example on a feast day so that the people may hear Mass, for funerals, or for blessing nuptials, and another who may celebrate in his place is lacking (St. Alphonsus, VI, 261). But there is not a necessity of celebrating or communicating which of itself is sufficiently grave if the priest suffers from the omission of Mass only the privation of the stipend; likewise if he must celebrate only from a vow, or from the precept of a superior, or so that he himself may hear Mass of precept, or so that another may satisfy the precept of Easter Communion. But with sufficient probability a necessity of celebrating per se sufficiently grave is present if otherwise the priest himself cannot satisfy the precept of Easter Communion; likewise, for a layperson, a necessity of communicating per se sufficiently grave is had if otherwise he cannot fulfill the precept of Easter Communion. The reason is that annual Communion obliges in some way from divine law (St. Alphonsus, VI, 261).

b) The supply of a confessor is lacking:

First, if no one is present who can, and licitly can, and wills to hear Confession, and another cannot be approached without grave difficulty. But the difficulty which arises from the journey to be made can be increased on the one hand by infirmity, by the imminent time of celebrating, etc., and on the other hand lessened by the fact that the journey can be made by carriage, railway, etc. Abstracting from the aforesaid special circumstances, according to St. Alphonsus a journey of one and a half leagues excuses (VI, 264). Therefore the supply of a confessor is not lacking because the ordinary confessor cannot be had.

It is disputed whether or not the supply of a confessor is lacking if only a confessor is present, or can be approached, to whom someone cannot confess without extraordinary shame arising from an extraordinary circumstance; for example, if an uncle would have to confess a very shameful sin to his nephew. Some affirm, but it seems it must be entirely denied. For: 1. an intrinsic inconvenience does not excuse from law (De Legibus, vol. I, n. 169). But that extraordinary circumstance only causes the intrinsic inconvenience, namely shame, to become greater, not to become extrinsic. There is added that the more benign opinion gives occasion to laxity and weakens the law, since limits cannot be assigned. Finally, the aforesaid opinion was formerly commonly rejected, either explicitly or implicitly.

Objection. The law of premising Confession to Communion is probably only ecclesiastical. Hence it is permitted, at least by epikeia, to regard extraordinary shame as an excusing cause.

Response. Passing over the antecedent, I observe that the two latter arguments adduced by us also exclude epikeia.

Second, if no one is present except one ignorant of the language, or lacking jurisdiction, or an excommunicated person to be avoided. Concerning the case in which someone has fallen into a reserved sin and the priest present per se lacks jurisdiction over it, see the treatise on Penance.

Third, if someone cannot confess to a confessor who is present or can be approached without grave harm extrinsic to Confession; harm, I say, whether to himself, to the confessor, or to a third party, as is more fully explained in the treatise on Penance (St. Alphonsus, VI, 264).

[1] 1 Cor. 11:29.

[2] Session 13, chapter 7.

[3] Pallavicini, cited work, book 12, chapter 2.

[4] Theiner, cited work, vol. I, p. 488 and following.

[5] Cf. Vermeersch, Epitome, 3rd ed., vol. II, n. 120.

[6] On Defects, VIII, n. 4.

[7] Roman Missal, loc. cit., n. 5.

180 II. Actual devotion. Although a voluntary defect of this devotion does not simply prevent the fruit of Communion, it nevertheless causes one to receive much slighter fruits. Moreover, one who at the time of Communion is voluntarily distracted commits a venial sin of irreverence. Likewise he also seems to commit a venial sin of irreverence who communicates either from a venially evil motive, for example from vainglory, or with an actual or virtual affection for venial sin. In such a case there seems to be a certain positive irreverence. It must be said otherwise of one who communicates with habitual venial sin, because there is rather a defect of perfect reverence than positive irreverence (St. Alphonsus, VI, 270).

Corollary I. Nocturnal pollution, in relation to Communion to be received on the following day, is to be judged thus: It never prohibits it under grave sin, provided the grave sin perhaps committed has been removed by Confession. For the rest:

1. If it occurred with grave sin, although remitted by Confession, "one should abstain from Communion and celebration unless something else seems good to the confessor."[1]
2. If it occurred with venial sin or without sin, Communion is prohibited under venial sin by reason of the effects, namely if because of dishonorable fantasies it obstructs the required devotion. Yet it is prohibited only insofar as either one must abstain from Communion, or effort must be applied to removing the impediment[2] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 272).

Corollary II. Conjugal intercourse practically does not impede Communion; nor, for the most part, should spouses be positively advised to abstain from intercourse on the night before the day of Communion. To those asking, let it be said that it is licit, and at most let it be added that abstinence is a thing of greater perfection.

[1] Missal, On Defects, title IX, n. 5.

[2] Cf. Missal, loc. cit.

181 III. Preparation and thanksgiving. In order that one may receive richer fruits, he should not omit remote and proximate preparation, and thanksgiving.

1. Preparation can be distinguished as twofold: remote and proximate. Remote preparation consists especially in purity of heart; proximate preparation, in acts of faith, hope, charity, etc., and "let it be made according to the powers, conditions, and offices of each one."[1]
2. Thanksgiving should likewise be carried out carefully, and not be finished in a few minutes. For the rest, it too, as the cited Decree has it, "should be made according to the powers, conditions, and offices of each one" (cf. St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 155).

Corollary. To eat or drink immediately after Communion is venial, unless a reasonable cause excuses (St. Alphonsus, VI, 283). To spit immediately after it has been cast into the stomach is unbecoming; if it were done with danger of ejecting a particle, it would be a sin.

[1] Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council Sacra Tridentina Synodus, 20 December 1905.

Scholion. On Frequent and Daily Communion

Canon 863 admonishes that the faithful are to be stirred up to be refreshed frequently, even daily, with the Eucharistic bread, according to the norms handed down in decrees of the Apostolic See. But the norms of which the cited canon speaks are contained in the Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council Sacra Tridentina Synodus,[1] and in other documents to be cited insofar as needed.

[1] 20 December 1905.

182 I. Requisites for daily Communion. "Frequent and daily Communion, as being most desired by Christ the Lord and by the Catholic Church, should be open to all Christ's faithful of whatever order or condition; so that no one who is in the state of grace and approaches the sacred table with a right and pious mind can be prohibited from it" (cited Decree, n. 1). "But a right mind consists in this, that one who approaches the sacred table does not indulge custom, vanity, or human reasons, but wills to satisfy God's good pleasure, to be united to Him more closely by charity, and by that divine medicine to meet his infirmities and defects" (n. 2). Now:

1. An intention which is predominantly supernatural suffices to this extent, that one who approaches with such an intention cannot be kept away from Communion.
2. It suffices that the good ends assigned be intended implicitly.
3. Custom, whether one's own or that of others, will in practice rather often be more the occasion than the principal reason. Vanity will be the principal reason if someone becomes conceited because of frequency of Communion and willingly speaks about it to others in the manner of little devotees.[1]

[1] Instruction to the Bishops of Prussia, 8 December 1906.

183 II. The office of the confessor. 1. "In order that frequent and daily Communion may be done with greater prudence and be increased by richer merit, it is fitting that the counsel of the confessor intervene" (n. 5). Therefore the confessor, especially if he is asked, enjoys the right of judging about the state and disposition of the penitent; indeed it is entirely fitting that his counsel be sought. I said it is fitting, because it is disputed whether the word it is fitting in this case involves a true obligation. With sufficient probability it is denied, and the counsel of the confessor is declared necessary only insofar as, by seeking it, one proceeds with greater prudence and greater merit can be hoped for. In a word: the word it is fitting probably signifies only the necessity of greater prudence and greater merit. Moreover, the confessor does not grant permission to communicate daily, but only declares that the requisites for permission are present; the permission itself, or the right, is conferred by the Church or by Christ. Finally, a penitent who is certain about the required disposition is not bound to acquiesce in a confessor turning him away from daily Communion, but can use the right granted to him. But these things are merely theoretical.

2. "Let confessors nevertheless beware lest they turn anyone away from frequent or daily Communion who is found in the state of grace and approaches with a right mind" (n. 5).

Question. Whether the practice of daily Communion can finally be forbidden to one who permanently, without any amendment, falls back into venial sins.

Response. Some deny, because according to number 3 of the decree, it suffices "that those using frequent and daily Communion be free from mortal sins, with the purpose of never sinning in the future," certainly gravely. Others affirm, because the decree itself in n. 3 declares that it cannot happen "that those communicating daily should not little by little free themselves from even venial sins and from their effect." Therefore a permanent defect of amendment is a sign of a defect of right intention in the past, and it introduces a vehement prejudice for the future,[1] unless special circumstances or signs remove the said prejudice. Hence the practice of daily Communion is finally to be forbidden unless there is now hope that the penitent will approach with a right intention. To the argument of the adversaries they respond that the words opposed from number 3 of the decree regard only the required state of grace, but by no means exclude the obligation of bringing a right intention in approaching Holy Communion. Yet one who adheres to this opinion should take care not to bring it into practice too hastily; moreover, let him stir the penitent to greater fervor, and as soon as a founded hope of bringing a right intention is present, let him cease from turning him away from daily Communion.

[1] This argument, however, is weakened somewhat by responding that the quoted words, which are not judged to pertain to the doctrinal part, are not to be urged too much.

184 III. The office of others. 1. The faithful are to be stirred up to be refreshed frequently, even daily, with the Eucharistic bread, according to the norms handed down in the decrees of the Apostolic See; and those assisting at Mass, being duly disposed, should communicate not only by spiritual affection, but also by sacramental reception of the Most Holy Eucharist (canon 863). The cited Decree, n. 6, inculcates the same upon pastors, confessors, and preachers. Add the response of the Sacred Congregation of the Council,[1] by which it is declared that "the frequency of Holy Communion is commended according to the first article of the Decree even to children, who, once admitted to the sacred table... must not be prohibited from frequent participation in it, but rather are to be exhorted to it; with the contrary practice in force in some places being reproved."

2. Frequent and daily Communion is also to be promoted as much as possible in seminaries of clerics, whose students long for service of the altar; likewise in other Christian schools of every kind[2] (cited Decree, n. 7). Religious superiors should promote among their subjects the frequent, even daily, reception of the Most Holy Body of Christ; and frequent, indeed even daily, access to the Most Holy Eucharist should be freely open to religious who are rightly disposed (canon 595, § 2). As regards religious, observe besides:

a) If there are religious institutes of either solemn or simple vows in whose rules or constitutions, or even calendars, Communions are found to be assigned or ordered on certain days, these norms have only directive force (canon 595, § 4).

b) But if after the last sacramental Confession a religious has been a grave scandal to the community, or has committed a grave and external fault, the superior can prohibit him from approaching Holy Communion until he has again approached the sacrament of Penance (canon 595, § 3). The words scandal, and grave and external fault, are now to be taken at least in the theological sense. The prohibition falls away as soon as the subject has confessed.

Note. The law of reading the Decree Sacra Tridentina Synodus annually in religious houses is no longer in force (cf. canon 6, 6).

[1] 15 September 1906 (Monitore Ecclesiastico, vol. 18, p. 346).

[2] Under the name of schools are comprehended "all pious institutes in which boys or girls are instructed and educated" (Acta Sanctae Sedis, vol. XXI, p. 506).

185 IV. Daily Communion is commended to all by: 1. the desire of Christ and the Church, as is more fully explained in the prior part of the cited Decree; 2. the end and fruit of Communion. Concerning this observe that its end consists especially in this, "that Christ's faithful, united to God through the sacrament, may thence take strength to restrain lust, to wash away the slight faults which occur daily, and to prevent the graver sins to which human frailty is liable; but not principally that the honor and veneration of the Lord be consulted, nor that it be, as it were, wages or a reward of their virtues for those receiving" (cited Decree).

Corollary. The practice of persuading either the faithful or the members of some community to abstain from Communion on one or another day each week must be disapproved. For this practice cannot be reconciled with the cited decree and other ecclesiastical documents, which exhort daily Communion to be brought into practice and promoted, and prohibit the confessor "from turning anyone away from frequent or daily Communion who is found in the state of grace and approaches with a right mind" (n. 5). Nor should members of a community be persuaded to abstain from daily Communion on the occasion of spiritual exercises.

Chapter II. On the Disposition of the Body

186 The disposition of the body comprehends cleanliness of body, decency of dress, and the natural fast.

As regards cleanliness of body, it suffices to note these things:

1. Dirt adhering to the body and appearing should be washed away before the reception of the Eucharist.
2. Stains inherent in the body are commonly not attended to, unless they are apparent, notable, and removable. If there is hope that they will soon be removed, and Communion can conveniently be deferred, it is fitting to defer it. Nevertheless, a priest infected with a disease that brings horror should not celebrate publicly; he can celebrate secretly (St. Alphonsus, VI, 275).

As regards decency of dress, observe that it depends much on the custom of places and the condition of persons. For the rest:

1. So far as can be done, one should not approach in torn and dirty clothes.
2. Women should avoid superfluous ornament and especially immodest or indecent dress. One who approached too immodestly would have to be kept away from Communion; but one must proceed with the greatest prudence.
3. It is fitting that soldiers approach with arms laid aside.
4. "If Communion is to be given to priests or others from the clergy, let it be given to them kneeling at the steps of the altar, or, if it can conveniently be done, let them be distinguished from the laity within the altar rail. But let priests communicate with a stole."[1] Deacons, if they approach Holy Communion privately, do so with a stole worn transversely over the cotta.[2] Those who acted otherwise would sin venially (St. Alphonsus, VI, 275-276).

As regards the natural fast, several things must be noted:

[1] Roman Ritual, title IV, chapter 2, n. 4.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 4 July 1879, n. 3499, ad II.

187 I. The existence of the precept. The precept of the natural fast, introduced formerly by custom and confirmed by several councils,[1] was established by canon 858, § 1, in these words: "One who has not observed the natural fast from midnight cannot be admitted to the Most Holy Eucharist, unless danger of death urges, or there is necessity of preventing irreverence toward the sacrament." It is a precept only of ecclesiastical law (St. Alphonsus, VI, 278).

[1] Council of Hippo, year 393, canon 28; Council in Trullo, canon 29; Council of Constance, year 1415, session 13.

188 II. The object of the precept consists in this, that from midnight the communicant has transmitted nothing digestible and coming from outside into the stomach or another organ serving the digestion of foods, and retained it there. Therefore, in order that the natural fast be violated, it is required:

1. That something be taken after midnight. Now:

a) Midnight, according to canon 33, § 1, can be computed according to: 1. usual time; 2. local time, both true and mean; 3. legal time, both regional and other extraordinary time (vol. I, n. 167).

b) Midnight must be taken physically, not morally; but the completed hour is commonly indicated by the first stroke of the clock (St. Alphonsus, VI, 282), and sometimes by the last stroke.

Here it is customary to ask what one can do who, while eating or drinking, hears the first stroke of the clock; namely, whether someone can communicate even if he does not spit out what he has in his mouth. Several more recent authors affirm, because, they say, the Church is not judged to oblige one to such rusticity. But the Church does not oblige one to that, even if it commands: "If you swallow, it is not permitted for you to communicate." Hence if, considering the circumstances, you cannot spit out without rusticity, swallow it and abstain from Communion. Thus theoretically; for in practice it will scarcely be clear that the fast has been violated, because approved clocks will scarcely be lacking which indicate midnight somewhat later and which it is permitted to follow (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

What if someone passes from one place to another, in which a different time prevails; for example, someone eats at Maastricht at 11:30, then departs for Aachen and communicates there, although 11:30 at Maastricht is 12:30 at Aachen? I think he acts illicitly, because the time of the fast seems to be computed in order to the time at which Communion is received; but the time of Communion must be computed according to the time of the place in which someone communicates.

2. That something be taken which comes from outside. Hence the swallowing of saliva, or blood from the gums, or fluid flowing from a pustule which exists in the mouth, does not obstruct the fast; nor the skin of the lips, for these pertain to the interior parts of the mouth, whose extremities and curvature they are. It is otherwise if someone, for example, sucks blood from a wound on the finger, or tears flowing from the eyes. Nevertheless, it is not required that something be put into the mouth from outside after midnight, but it suffices that after midnight it be swallowed. Hence the fast is violated if someone at night puts sugar into his mouth to be dissolved and swallowed after midnight, even partly (St. Alphonsus, VI, 279).

3. That something be taken which has the character of food or drink. Certainly that which is not digestible does not pertain here (St. Alphonsus, VI, 281). Nor does that seem to pertain here which can only in some way be altered in the stomach and, according to common estimation, does not have the character of food, such as fingernails. For the rest, "it does not matter," says St. Thomas (III, q. 80, a. 8, ad 4), "whether something nourishes or does not nourish"; nor does it matter at all that the thing is taken by way of medicine.[1] Considering all these things, the following do not violate the fast, although some of the things to be enumerated, according to chemists, are not excluded from every alteration in the stomach: glass, hair, silk, wool, linen, a pebble of metal, little fruit-stones wholly cleansed, wood, straw, fingernails. The following violate it: bones, wax, chalk, metal dust, artificial silk.

4. That what is taken not be retained in the mouth, but transmitted into the stomach. If the thing taken is not passed into the stomach, there is neither eating nor drinking nor, as we suppose, nutrition. It is the same, however, whether food or drink is introduced into the stomach in a natural or artificial manner (n. 171). Considering this condition, one is not bound, unless perhaps by reason of danger, to abstain from Communion who vomits whole the food taken,[2] or washes the stomach by means of a tube and ejects the water. Nevertheless one should abstain from using a tube anointed with oil, because some oil will almost certainly remain. Moreover, he who is nourished by a clyster seems to violate the fast, because although foods are not received in the stomach, nevertheless nutrition takes place, so that Christ is no longer the first food of those communicating. The Holy Office,[3] indeed, responded, when a priest sought the faculty of proceeding in this way: "The Most Holy Father is to be petitioned for the grace, according to the prayers"; and this grace was afterward granted by the Supreme Pontiff. But it seems to be a dispensation rather than a declaration.

[1] Roman Missal, On Defects, title IX, n. 1.

[2] But these things are merely theoretical, because it will not be sufficiently clear that everything has been vomited.

[3] 23 April 1890.

189 III. Further determination of the object. Lest the ecclesiastical law smell of pharisaical superstition, certain, so to speak, exceptions are admitted. Namely, the following do not violate the fast:

1. One who by chance swallows remains of foods adhering to the teeth; this is clear from the Roman Missal.[1] The same is said with sufficient probability of one who does this voluntarily (St. Alphonsus, VI, 279).[2]

2. One who by chance or voluntarily inhales the smoke of foods, tobacco, incense, etc. (St. Alphonsus, VI, 280, doubt 2); likewise one who uses a medicine which sends the medicine into the bronchi under the form of vapor.

3. One who by chance or voluntarily swallows a very small quantity wholly joined with saliva, for example of water after someone has washed his mouth and spat out the water, or of the juice or very small particle of tobacco which remains inseparably mixed with the saliva when someone crushes tobacco with his teeth and spits out the phlegm. Nevertheless chewing of this kind is prohibited under venial sin because of irreverence, unless a just cause is present (St. Alphonsus, VI, 280, doubt 3).

4. One who by chance swallows a sufficiently small quantity, for example a fly, dust, snow, rain, or a little drop of blood flowing from the nose (St. Alphonsus, VI, 280, doubt 1). The fact that passage into the stomach is merely noticed does not impede Communion.

5. One who uses nasal tobacco and by chance passes something into the stomach (St. Alphonsus, VI, 280, doubt 1). For the rest, it should be advised that the use of tobacco, both nasal and smoking, be omitted before Communion, although it is not prohibited.

The reason for all these things is that the law is to be taken in a human way, lest, as we have hinted, it smell of pharisaical superstition. There is added that otherwise it would give occasion to continual anxieties.

6. Finally, sometimes an exception is had from the disposition of the liturgy, namely if an adult is baptized, "with the salt," says the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide,[3] "tasted beforehand by catechumens in the conferral of Baptism, even if it seems to break the fast, nevertheless there is still no doubt that after Baptism has been received they, the adults, can be admitted to Holy Communion, indeed ought to be." Finally, the law does not regard the case in which the ablution is given to one licitly communicating, or together with the host a little water or wine, although something is swallowed before the sacred species (St. Alphonsus, VI, 288).

Corollary I. One who doubts whether he has violated the fast, in other words whether he has taken something, whether he took it after midnight, whether that which he took obstructs the fast, can communicate, because in a doubt of fact founding the law the condition of liberty is better. But in all the cases mentioned, the fact founding the law is doubtful (St. Alphonsus, VI, 282; I, 38, 39).

Corollary II. One who at night does not know what hour it is, and, without asking the hour, eats with the intention of afterward communicating, sins, because he rashly admits the danger of violating the law. Nevertheless after the fact, if the truth can no longer be investigated, it is permitted to him, the things to be posited being posited, to communicate.

[1] On Defects, title IX, n. 3.

[2] The Roman Missal, loc. cit., says thus: "If the remains of food remaining in the mouth are swallowed, they do not impede Communion, since they are swallowed not by way of food, but by way of saliva."

[3] 13 February 1906.

190 IV. The gravity of the precept. The precept is grave from its whole genus, both as regards the time and as regards the thing to be taken. This is clear both from the consensus of all authors and from the ends of the precept.

"One end is mystical, namely that it may be signified that Christ is the first food of man. Other ends are that those communicating may be more disposed to devotion, and that every danger of the sacrament being vomited may be avoided; which danger indeed sometimes arises from the disordered use of food or drink. But the said ends are not obtained with sufficient certainty unless every use of food or drink before Communion is absolutely prohibited" (St. Thomas, III, q. 80, a. 8; St. Alphonsus, VI, 278).

191 V. The causes because of which it is permitted to communicate not fasting are:

1. Urgent danger of death (canon 858, § 1), namely such that Communion can be given by way of Viaticum; this was explained in n. 158. But danger of death exempts from the law of fasting, even if someone could observe it without inconvenience, since the cited canon speaks absolutely. And this holds as regards all, both as regards those for whom danger of death threatens from outside, for example from imminent battle or from the sentence of a judge, and as regards the gravely sick; for the canon does not distinguish.

Corollary I. A sick person constituted in danger, as long as the danger endures, can communicate as often as desired, or daily, not fasting, and this even if when healthy he had been accustomed to communicate rarely. The reason is that one constituted in danger of death is absolutely exempted from the law (St. Alphonsus, VI, 285; cf. canon 864, § 3).

Corollary II. Just as it is permitted for one constituted in danger to communicate not fasting, so also a priest can celebrate not fasting in order to give Viaticum to himself, because to celebrate is not more than to communicate. The same is permitted with sufficient probability in order to give Viaticum to another, because by divine precept, to which ecclesiastical law yields, he is bound to receive Viaticum; but the case is of little practical importance, because the Eucharist is usually reserved (St. Alphonsus, VI, 286).

2. Long infirmity. The sick, however, who have already been bedridden for a month without certain hope that they will recover soon, can, by the prudent counsel of the confessor, receive the Most Holy Eucharist once or twice a week, even if they have previously taken some medicine or something by way of drink (canon 858, § 2).[1] As regards the interpretation of this canon, observe that it seems one must incline toward the more benign side, because it concerns a favor, and one universal and granted by way of derogation from the law, not by way of dispensation. These things having been noted, I explain briefly the faculty granted. Therefore, in order that someone may enjoy the privilege, it is required:

a) That he be sick, or affected by some illness. Nevertheless it suffices that someone be worn out by old age, because old age itself is judged to be a certain infirmity.

b) That he be bedridden. Yet this must be understood so that the privilege also belongs to the sick who, as the Sacred Congregation of the Council[2] responded, "cannot lie in bed, or can rise from it for some hours of the day." The same seems to be said of those who, suffering from a chronic disease, according to the different condition of the disease, now lie in bed, now perform some domestic tasks, yet cannot go out without notable inconvenience. But those are excluded who can attend to domestic cares and go out conveniently enough. For the word bedridden cannot sufficiently be applied to the aforesaid. Then the more benign interpretation can give occasion to scandal and to a looser application; namely, there is fear lest gradually several persons, with necessity as a pretext, will wish to communicate not fasting.

c) That he has been bedridden for a month. Therefore the sick person cannot use the privilege before he has lain ill for a month.

d) That, after he has lain ill for a month, there is absent certain hope, that is, moral certitude, of recovery to be attained soon, for example after three or four days.

e) That one proceed by the prudent counsel of the confessor. Nevertheless, the request for counsel and the approval of the confessor are not judged to be a condition which, if neglected, would cause the sick person to sin gravely by communicating not fasting. Indeed, I think that per se there is not even an obligation of seeking counsel, although it is especially fitting, and per accidens can even be necessary, namely so that there may be sufficient certainty about the required conditions. The confessor can give counsel both within and outside Confession; for no restriction occurs in the concession of the privilege. Yet let him proceed prudently, namely by seriously inquiring whether the required conditions are present. For the rest, observe:

First, when the explained conditions have been fulfilled, the sick can use the indult even if they would be able to observe the fast, since the canon requires nothing besides the explained conditions. There is added that the stricter opinion would give occasion to anxieties. They can communicate both at home and in church; yet the latter commonly cannot be done by the bedridden.

Second, by force of the concession "they can receive the Most Holy Eucharist once or twice a week, even if they have previously taken some medicine or something by way of drink" (canon 858, § 2). Medicine can be taken even if it is solid, such as, for example, a pill. But it is required that the matter to be taken directly serve the curing of the illness, so that solid foods used to recover strength are excluded. Besides medicine it is permitted to take something by way of drink. Yet it is not required that what is taken have the character of drink, but it suffices that it be taken by way of drink, like liquid food. Therefore the response of the Holy Office[3] can be applied, by which it is permitted "to take broth, coffee, milk, or another liquid food, even if some substance has been mixed into it, for example light little pills of flour (semolino), grated bread reduced to crumbs (pangratto), a diluted egg, etc., provided the mixture does not lose the nature of liquid food." Chocolate can be added, but not sugar or solid chocolate, not even when they are not swallowed except after they have been dissolved in the mouth; for it is clear that the taking which occurs by mouth must be considered. Moreover, the sick person can also take some medicine or something by way of drink several times before Communion.

Third, nothing prevents one who can use the explained privilege and therefore communicates not fasting twice in a week from receiving Communion also on other days, after accepting the burden of the fast.

Question. Whether Easter Communion to be received excuses from the law of fasting in the case in which someone otherwise would be deprived of it, because on the one hand he cannot observe the fast without very grave inconvenience even if Communion were given very early, and on the other hand he cannot use the indult of which we have spoken.

Now several think this must be denied, because canon 858, § 1 declares that the fast must be observed unless danger of death urges, or the necessity of preventing irreverence toward the sacrament. But the cited canon cannot be so urged that other cases, for example infamy and scandal to be avoided, are excluded.[4] Whether our case truly ought to be excluded is theoretically doubtful to me; but, with the doubt posited, in practice one can stand for the spiritual good of the person about to communicate and for the somewhat divine law of annual Communion, while the ecclesiastical law of the natural fast is set aside. Nevertheless scandal and abuses must be guarded against. Moreover, if the difficulty would vanish by deferring Communion, let the delay be made. Finally, in the proposed case it would also be permitted to minister the Holy Eucharist at night (canon 867, § 4).

3. Scandal, that is, the sin of one's neighbor, to be avoided; for example if Mass cannot be omitted without the danger of rash judgments or backbiting; likewise without the danger that several persons will omit, with grave sin, to assist at another Mass. Observe, however, that the sole reason that the people on a feast day would lack Mass does not suffice. Nevertheless it suffices with sufficient probability that otherwise a dying person could not receive Viaticum (St. Alphonsus, VI, 286, 287). To avoiding scandal there is often added:

4. Infamy to be avoided. This reason is present if the priest is already at the altar, unless he is of known probity (St. Alphonsus, VI, 287); likewise if a layperson is already sitting at the Communion rail.

5. Irreverence toward the Most Holy Sacrament to be guarded against (canon 858, § 1), as if there is danger that the species may perish or be profaned.
6. The sacrifice to be completed. This reason can be present in three cases, namely: 1. if after the consecration the priest remembers that he is not fasting, he must continue Mass. 2. If after the consuming of the host or chalice he notices that the matter is invalid, he must consecrate and communicate again.[5] 3. If after the consecration, even of bread alone, the priest dies or faints, and no fasting priest is present, a priest who is not fasting must complete the Mass from the place where the prior one stopped.[6]

Finally, partly because of moral union with the completed sacrifice, partly because of irreverence toward the sacrament to be avoided, it is permitted for one not fasting to consume particles of the consecrated species, as is explained in n. 274.

[1] Cf. Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, 7 December 1906.

[2] 6 March 1907.

[3] 7 September 1897.

[4] The same once had to be said about ecclesiastical documents brought forward by adversaries, namely the Council of Constance, session 13, and the Constitution of Benedict XIV Quadam de more, 24 March 1756.

[5] Roman Missal, On Defects, title III, n. 5 and title IV, n. 5.

[6] Roman Missal, On Defects, title X, n. 3.

192 VI. Dispensation, which can be obtained from the Holy See, and is granted through the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments if it concerns seculars, and through the Sacred Congregation of Religious if it concerns religious.[1] Moreover, Nuncios, Internuncios, and Apostolic Delegates can concede to the bedridden of whom canon 858, § 2 speaks that even before the end of the month they may communicate once a week, without observing the fast according to the norm of the cited canon. They can grant the same to sick persons not bedridden who labor under such a disease that, in the judgment of a physician, they cannot observe the fast without danger. Finally, the faculties of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide grant to bishops, vicars, and prefects apostolic the power "of granting to bedridden sick persons about whom there is no certain hope that they will recover soon, even before the end of the month from which they have been bedridden, that they may receive Holy Communion two or three times a week, and, if it concerns priests or religious, even daily, without observing the fast, that is, even if they have previously taken some medicine or something by way of drink."[2]

[1] Thus the meeting of Cardinals, 7 December 1922 (cf. Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1929, p. 39).

[2] Vermeersch, Commentarius de Formulis faciendis, n. 57.

193 VII. Epikeia is also admitted in this matter, but with the greatest difficulty, so that scarcely a case occurs in which Communion can be received by one not fasting from epikeia alone. It is disputed whether the case would be present if a newly ordained priest about to celebrate his first Mass had broken the fast, and very grave inconveniences would follow, considering the circumstances, if the Mass were not celebrated. In such a case, the reason of avoiding infamy will not easily be present, because such a man will rather be ridiculous than infamous. Sometimes the reason of scandal will not be entirely lacking. Observe, however, "that scandal is then said to exist when an occasion is given for detracting or judging rashly, but not when an occasion of mere wonder is given" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 257).

Dissertation III. On the Most Holy Eucharist as Sacrifice

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 85; q. 86, a. 1; q. 100, a. 2, ad 2; III, q. 22; q. 79, a. 7, ad 2; q. 82; q. 83; q. 85; q. 86, a. 1; q. 100, a. 2, ad 2; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 304-424; Homo Apostolicus, tract 15, nn. 59-88.)

194 I. The notion of sacrifice. Sacrifice is the offering of a sensible thing, through some change of it, made to God, and that legitimately, to testify to His supreme dominion and our subjection (St. Alphonsus, VI, 304).

1. The sensible thing itself is the remote matter; the offering of the sensible thing through some change of it is the proximate matter of sacrifice. The end of professing the supreme dominion of God and our subjection is the form of the sacrifice, which, namely, informs the whole act.
2. All admit that some change is required. But it is disputed whether a change for the worse, or destructive change, is required, or a change for the better, insofar, namely, as the thing offered through its sacrification becomes morally more perfect and more pleasing to God.
3. Of those who require a destructive change, some demand a real change, whether physical, as in the killing of an animal, or moral, by which, namely, the thing becomes unfit for common use, as in the pouring out of oil. Others judge that a mystical change suffices.

195 II. The division of sacrifice. Sacrifices are distinguished:

1. By reason of matter, into victims or hosts, oblations, and libations, according as an animal, or an inanimate solid thing, or an inanimate liquid thing is offered.
2. By reason of mode, into bloody and unbloody.
3. By reason of end, into latreutic, eucharistic, propitiatory or expiatory, and impetratory, according as they are principally offered in homage to God, or in thanksgiving, or for remission of guilt or punishment, or for obtaining goods (St. Alphonsus, VI, 304).

196 III. The principal sacrifices of the Old Testament were:

1. Holocausts, which were principally offered in homage to God. In these the whole thing was consumed by fire.
2. Peace offerings, which were chiefly offered in thanksgiving or for obtaining benefits. In these one part was consumed by fire, another fell to the use of the priests, who ate it in the court of the temple.
3. Offerings for sin, which were principally offered for the remission of guilt or punishment. In these one part was consumed by fire, another fell to the use of the priests, and a third to the use of those offering, who consumed it as a sign of union with God.

Now all the sacrifices of the Old Testament prefigured:

197 IV. The sacrifice of Christ on the cross, by which Christ offered Himself on the cross, and by which He perfected the redemption of the human race, that is, so consummated satisfaction for sins and merit for obtaining all graces that satisfaction and merit cannot be further increased, according to that saying of the Apostle: "For by one oblation He has perfected forever those who are sanctified."[1]

Nevertheless the sacrifice of the cross does not exclude the sacrifice by which the satisfaction and merit completed on the cross are continually applied, that is:

[1] Heb. 10:14.

198 V. The Eucharistic sacrifice, or the Mass, about which something must be said specifically. We shall treat first of the sacrifice of the Mass considered in itself, then of the celebration of the sacrifice of the Mass.

Part I. On the Sacrifice of the Mass Considered in Itself

199 The sacrifice of the Mass is aptly defined: the unbloody sacrifice of the New Testament, in which Christ, through the priest, offers Himself under the species of bread and wine to His Father.[1]

This definition having been given, something must be said briefly first about the existence and essence, then about the efficacy and effects of the sacrifice of the Mass.

[1] Cf. Council of Trent, session 22, chapter 1.

Section I. On the Existence and Essence of the Sacrifice of the Mass

200 I. The existence of the sacrifice of the Mass. In the Mass a true and properly so-called sacrifice is offered; this proposition is of faith from these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that in the Mass a true and proper sacrifice is not offered to God, or that to be offered is nothing other than Christ being given to us to be eaten, let him be anathema."[1]

[1] Session 22, canon 1.

201 II. The essence of the sacrifice of the Mass. It suffices to note briefly the principal things which pertain here:

1. The victim to be sacrificed is Christ as existing under the species. It is said:

a) Christ; this the Council of Trent teaches in these words: "In this divine sacrifice which is performed in the Mass, that same Christ is contained and immolated unbloodily who once offered Himself bloodily on the altar of the cross."[1]

b) As existing under the species. For the Mass is a true and properly so-called sacrifice, and therefore the offering of a visible victim, namely a visible sacrifice. But Christ is not visible to us, nor can He be visibly sacrificed by us, except insofar as He exists under the species. Hence the Council of Trent says: "Our Lord... at the Last Supper, on the night on which He was betrayed, in order that He might leave to His beloved spouse the Church a visible sacrifice, as the nature of human beings requires,... offered His body and blood under the species of bread and wine to God the Father, and under the symbols of those same things commanded the Apostles... and their successors in the priesthood to offer them."[2]

Note. Bread and wine are only the matter from which the victim is confected. But the species of bread and wine are not constitutive or essential parts of the victim, but are the condition without which the victim is not given.

2. The principal offerer is Christ Himself; the secondary offerer is the priest.[3] Co-offerers are added, that is, the Church or the whole faithful people, the minister, and those assisting (St. Alphonsus, VI, 307).

3. What the sacrificial action is, or the constitutive act, or the properly so-called essence of the sacrifice of the Mass, is not one opinion among authors. Now:

a) According to the opinion of all today, consecration pertains to the sacrificial action; and according to the more common opinion, the consecration of both species. It is disputed whether Communion also pertains to the essence. Those who deny this admit that it is an integral part of the sacrifice.

b) Of those who judge that the essence of the sacrifice of the Mass is constituted by consecration alone, some formally place the sacrificial action in consecration insofar as it places Christ in the more abased state of food and drink; others place it in consecration insofar as in it there is a mystical destruction, either because the words of themselves tend toward the real separation of body and blood, or because the sacramental species exhibit a sacramental representation of that separation.

[1] Session 22, chapter 2.

[2] Session 22, chapter 1.

[3] Session 22, chapter 2.

202 III. The character of the sacrifice of the Mass. The sacrifice of the Mass is both an absolute and a relative sacrifice: absolute, insofar as considered in itself it has all the elements of a true sacrifice; relative, insofar as it essentially says relation to the sacrifice of the cross, or insofar as it is essentially representative and commemorative of the sacrifice of the cross[1] (St. Thomas, III, q. 79, a. 7; q. 83, a. 1).

[1] Council of Trent, session 22, chapter 1.

203 IV. The agreement of the Mass with the sacrifice of the cross, and its difference from it.

1. Both sacrifices agree as regards substance, namely as regards the victim and the principal offerer. Therefore the Mass, by reason of substance, is identified with the sacrifice of the cross, so that this sacrifice is truly repeated as often as Mass is celebrated.
2. They differ:

a) In the fact that the sacrifice of the cross was absolute, as it is called, while the Mass is essentially also relative, or is referred to the sacrifice of the cross.

b) By reason of the secondary offerer, namely, on the cross there was only the principal offerer, namely Christ; in the Mass there are the principal offerer, namely Christ, and the secondary offerer, namely the priest.

c) By reason of the mode of offering, which was bloody on the cross, but is unbloody in the Mass.

d) By reason of the end and effects, insofar as the sacrifice of the cross perfected satisfaction and merits, whereas the Mass applies them to us.

Section II. On the Efficacy and Effects of the Sacrifice of the Mass

204 By the efficacy of the sacrifice of the Mass is understood the very power of effecting which it has by reason of the thing offered and of the principal offerer. Now it is clear that this efficacy is infinite. But if it is asked whether the effects produced are themselves also infinite, one must distinguish. The effects which directly regard God, namely the latreutic and eucharistic effects, are infinite; in other words, the sacrifice of the Mass exhibits to God infinite or condign adoration, praise, and thanksgiving. But the effects which directly regard man, namely the propitiatory and impetratory, are limited.

As regards the effects of the Mass, we shall investigate further what the effects of this sacrifice are, in what way they are produced, in what measure different effects come to different persons, and what is required so that a special fruit may come to someone.

205 I. The effects of the Mass correspond to its ends. Hence, just as the end is fourfold, so also the effect is fourfold, namely latreutic, eucharistic, propitiatory, and impetratory; in other words: 1. it renders adoration and praise to God; 2. it gives thanks to God for benefits received; 3. it placates offended divine justice and obtains remission of guilt and punishment; and 4. it obtains other spiritual and temporal goods.

Of the said effects, those which directly tend to our utility, namely the propitiatory and impetratory, are customarily indicated by the name fruits.

206 II. The mode by which the effects are produced. The effects of the Mass can be understood to be produced in three ways:

1. Ex opere operato and ex opere operantis, according as the effect proceeds by reason of the sacrifice itself, that is, by reason of the victim offered and the principal offerer, or by reason of the work of the co-offerers, that is, of the Church, the minister, and the faithful.
2. Immediately and mediately, according as the effect proceeds not through an intermediate effect, or through an effect of this kind.
3. Infallibly and fallibly. Now:

1. The latreutic and eucharistic effects are produced:

a) Ex opere operato, and indeed immediately and infallibly.

b) Ex opere operantis, and indeed immediately, and: 1. certainly and infallibly from the work of the Church co-offering; 2. whether or not, and how much, from the work of the other co-offerers depends on their disposition.

2. The propitiatory and impetratory effects are produced:

a) Ex opere operato; moreover ex opere operantis, namely of the Church co-offering, which moves God in a special way; likewise of the other co-offerers, the priest and the faithful, who can contribute to the aforesaid effects according to greater or lesser disposition.

b) Immediately are produced the placation of divine justice, relaxation of temporal punishment after guilt has been remitted, actual graces, and other spiritual and temporal goods. Mediately are produced remission of guilt, namely through the grace of repentance, and increase of habitual grace, namely through actual graces.

c) Some remission of temporal punishment after guilt has been remitted is produced infallibly, if the Mass is offered for the just. Other fruits are produced fallibly, because something can stand in the way either on the part of Christ, or on the part of the subject placing an obstacle. Nevertheless, it can be said that all fruits are produced infallibly in first act, insofar as the impetration of Christ is of itself always heard.

207 III. The measure according to which the effects come to those for whom Mass is offered.

Preliminary note I. Here the discussion concerns the effects which directly regard our utility, in other words, the propitiatory and impetratory effects, which effects, as we have already noted, are called fruits.

Preliminary note II. By reason of those to whom the fruits of the Mass come, a threefold fruit is distinguished, namely general, special or middle or ministerial, and most special or personal. The general fruit is that which comes to the whole Church; namely, since the priest always offers in the name of Christ and of the Church for the whole Church, it cannot happen that every sacrifice does not produce a fruit coming to the whole Church. The special fruit is that which comes to the one or ones to whom the priest specially applies the Mass. The most special fruit is that which comes to the celebrant. Namely, it cannot happen that a peculiar fruit does not come ex opere operato to the one offering worthily. But more commonly they judge that the priest cannot yield this fruit. To this fruit is referred that which comes to those contributing to the sacrifice (St. Alphonsus, VI, 312, 318). These things having been noted beforehand, I say:

1. The measure according to which the general fruit is distributed seems to be judged from the greater or lesser dignity and holiness of the members of the Church, and from the special commemoration made by the priest.

2. The measure of the most special fruit, insofar as it comes to the celebrant, is greater to the degree that the disposition and devotion of the priest are more perfect. Insofar as this fruit comes to the co-offerers, it will be greater or lesser according to the measure of cooperation in the sacrifice, disposition, and devotion. Nor is this fruit diminished by the greater number of co-offerers.

3. The measure of the special fruit is determined by these things:

a) It will be more abundant to the degree that the disposition of the one for whom Mass is offered is more perfect. Since this disposition can be increased indefinitely, the special fruit, equally with the general and most special fruit, is therefore called intensively indefinite.

b) It is disputed whether the special fruit is extensively infinite; in other words, whether the same measure comes to each one, whether Mass is offered for one or for several. Now some simply affirm. Others affirm with respect to the impetratory fruit, and deny with respect to the propitiatory. Others simply deny;[1] and we agree with them. For the Church approves and commends the practice of celebrating for a determined person. But if the opinion of the adversaries were true, a determination of this kind would be useless, because in it, with respect to the determined person, it would not matter whether the celebration were made for one or for all. Indeed it would be altogether better always to celebrate for all, because by the application of a determined person the rest would lack the fruit, without utility for that determined person.

[1] As regards St. Alphonsus, in the moral work, n. 312, he says both opinions are probable, but the first seems to him more probable. But in two later works, namely in the work In Tridentinum, session 22, n. 22, and in the little work on Mass stipends, whose title is De abusibus in acceptandis Missis, nn. 26-28, he teaches the second opinion absolutely and calls it common. Whence he seems to have changed his opinion (Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis, vol. II, n. 185).

208 IV. The application of the special fruit. I said of the special fruit; for the general and most special fruits do not need application. The former, by the very fact that the sacrifice is offered, comes to the whole Church; the latter, by the very fact that he offers worthily, comes to the priest offering. But the special fruit needs the application of the priest; hence something must be said about it.

1. The notion and division of application. Application is the intention of the priest of specially offering Mass for some cause or causes, or for some person or persons. Application can be distinguished as twofold, public and private. Public application is had when the faithful are publicly advised of the Mass to be offered for such a one, or when someone's name is inserted into the prayers. Private application is had when neither are the faithful publicly advised nor is a name inserted into the prayers.

2. The power of applying. The priest can apply the special fruit; this is clear both from universal practice and from the condemned doctrine of the Synod of Pistoia.[1] If the application is positively excluded, the special fruit remains in the treasury of the Church. If it is applied expressly to no one, or to one incapable, according to some the fruit remains in the treasury of the Church; according to others, it comes to the priest himself or to those for whom he is specially bound to offer, because they judge that the priest implicitly intended this (St. Alphonsus, VI, 336).

3. The persons for whom application can be made. It is permitted to apply Mass for any of the living, and also for the dead expiating their sins in the fire of purgatory, with the prescription of canon 2262, § 2, n. 2 saved (canon 809). Therefore:

a) As regards the living, Mass can be applied for all. Nevertheless: 1. it is permitted only privately, and scandal being removed, to apply it for the excommunicated; heretics and schismatics are regarded as such by the external judgment of the Church, but not unbelievers. Hence, if scandal is absent, it can also be applied publicly for these;[2] a fortiori catechumens are not excluded from it. 2. For an excommunicated person to be avoided, it is permitted to apply it only privately and for his conversion alone (canon 2262, § 2, 2).

b) As regards the dead, the damned being excluded, Mass can likewise be applied for all. Nevertheless for those excluded from ecclesiastical burial (canon 1240), it is permitted to apply it only privately; for any funeral Mass, even anniversary, and other public funeral offices must be denied to these (canon 1241).

Note 1. Let the priest take care that there is not something of evil, error, or superstition in unbelievers offering alms.[3]

Note 2. Even if someone were excluded by the Church from application, nevertheless the priest could pray for him by private intention in the Memento of the living; likewise he could apply to him the fruits coming to the priest ex opere operantis, insofar as this is of the priest, but not the fruits ex opere operato, or ex opere operantis insofar as this is done in the name of the Church.

Note 3. Masses can also be offered or applied in honor of the Saints; this is clear from these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that it is an imposture to celebrate Masses in honor of the Saints and for obtaining their intercession before God, as the Church intends, let him be anathema."[4] In what sense, or for what end, this is done, the same Council teaches in these words: "And although the Church has sometimes been accustomed to celebrate certain Masses in honor and memory of the Saints, nevertheless she does not teach that sacrifice is offered to them, but to God alone, who crowned them. Hence neither is the priest accustomed to say: I offer sacrifice to you, Peter or Paul; but giving thanks to God for their victories, he implores their patronage, so that they may deign to intercede for us in heaven, whose memory we make on earth."[5]

4. The requisites for valid application are:

a) That it be made by the celebrant himself, who cannot leave it to be made by anyone, not even Christ. Namely, Christ, who conferred upon the priest the power of applying, is judged to have committed its exercise to the priest alone. Hence the application would be invalid: "I apply the Mass to him to whom Christ applies it." It must be said otherwise of this application: "I apply the Mass to him to whom Christ is more pleased that it be applied" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 334).

b) That it be made before the sacrifice is perfected as regards its essence; hence according to some, before the consecration of the blood; according to others, before every consecration. In practice, so that every danger of frustration may be guarded against, let it be made before the consecration. Indeed, it is better to make it before the Offertory, or rather before Mass, so that both the Offertory and the other liturgical prayers and actions may benefit the one giving the stipend.

c) That it be made through at least a habitual intention, that is, one made and not retracted. A habitual intention suffices, because application is made by way of donation, which obtains its effect even if time or acts intervene between the conceived intention and the execution given to it (St. Alphonsus, VI, 335). Nevertheless, it is advised that application not be extended for too long a time, and that at least sometimes, for example at the beginning of the month for the whole month, it be determined. An interpretative intention, since it does not truly exist, does not suffice.

d) That it be determined as regards the person or cause. Hence if someone has received a stipend from five persons, or five stipends for different deceased persons, the intention of applying for one of the five does not suffice if no one has been determined explicitly or implicitly. Nevertheless an implicit determination suffices, for example the intention: 1. of applying for him who offered the stipend, or who has been assigned by the celebrant in the booklet for this day; 2. of applying according to the mind of him who transmitted the stipend, provided that he formed the intention; 3. of applying according to the order established by another, for example by a superior or by the rector of the church. It is no obstacle that the celebrant perhaps does not know the intention or errs about it. Likewise a disjunctive determination suffices, as if someone says: "I say Mass for the intention of the pastor, if he has established one for me; otherwise for that intention" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 335).

If a priest has collected a heap of stipends and does not know in what order they were given, the intention of celebrating according to the order in which they were in fact given or accepted suffices; or, with respect to several stipends given at the same time for different persons, according to the order in which they were destined by the one giving, if the designation occurred; otherwise, in proportion to the right of each one comprehended in the number. All these things are at least known to God. Likewise the intention of applying all and each Masses, in proportion to the right, to all for whom they were given suffices. Namely, since the fruit of the Mass is divisible, after all the Masses have been celebrated each one has obtained his own.

If the priest himself did not collect the Masses but received a heap from another, for example from a bishop or from the administrator of a pious place, it is per se the part of the distributor to set the order beforehand, and of the celebrant to apply according to the order set beforehand. But if the distributor did not set the order beforehand, the priest can celebrate according to either order explained above (St. Alphonsus, VI, 335).

e) That it not be made under a suspensive condition, for example for the intention of him who will first offer the stipend. For an application made in this way regards a future intention, and therefore would involve suspension of the effect. Hence canon 825, 1: "It is never permitted to apply Mass to the intention of one who, after an alms has been offered, is going to ask for the application, but has not yet asked, and to retain the alms given afterward for a Mass previously applied." Nevertheless this does not prevent a Mass from being celebrated, for example, for a deceased person for whom it is foreseen that a

Mass will be requested; and afterward, if a Mass is requested, from signifying that some Mass has been said, and from accepting the stipend if it pleases the one asking. Such an application does not depend on a future intention, and therefore does not suspend the effect (St. Alphonsus, VI, 337), nor does it depend on the intention of the one who will ask for the application. For the rest, an intention under a condition about the past or present is always valid, except in the case about which we are now going to speak.

f) That it not be made under a condition not naturally knowable; since God, who has disposed things conformably to a human mode of acting, is not judged to have conferred upon the priest the faculty of applying dependently upon such a condition. Hence the application seems invalid: "I apply the Mass for you, if you are predestined."

What if someone has elicited two contrary intentions?

Response 1. The later prevails, if he conceived it while mindful of the prior intention.

Response 2. If he conceived the later while forgetful of the prior intention, the later likewise prevails, unless, as it seems must be said, he made the prior intention in such a way that he willed it to prevail even if through forgetfulness he were going to elicit another. For the rest, in doubt which intention prevails, afterward let Mass be celebrated for the intention which did not prevail, and thus all things are safe.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1530.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 11 March 1848 (Collectanea, n. 1028); Holy Office, 12 July 1848 (Collectanea, n. 1274).

[3] Holy Office, 12 July 1865 (Collectanea, n. 1274).

[4] Session 22, canon 5.

[5] Session 22, chapter 3.

Part II. On the Oblation of the Sacrifice of the Mass

(St. Thomas, II-II, q. 100, a. 2, ad 2; III, q. 82; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, nn. 307, 313-333; Homo Apostolicus, tract 15, nn. 59-88.)

Section I. On the Person Offering

209 I. The principal minister is Christ the Lord. "It is the same one," says the Council of Trent, "now offering through the ministry of priests, who then offered Himself on the cross."[1]

II. The secondary minister is every and only priest. "If anyone says," the same Council of Trent says, "that by those words: Do this in commemoration of me, Christ did not institute the Apostles priests, or did not ordain that they and other priests should offer His body and blood, let him be anathema."[2]

III. In some sense all the faithful can be called ministers of the sacrifice of the Mass, namely insofar as they contribute something to the sacrifice. They do this insofar as they are members of the Church, in whose name the priest celebrates; insofar as they assist at the sacrifice and conform themselves to the intention of the principal and secondary minister; and insofar as they causally concur in the sacrifice, for example by giving a stipend or by serving the priest celebrating (St. Alphonsus, VI, 307).

Corollary I. Several priests can indeed offer the sacrifice of the Mass together, but this is illicit except in the Mass of the ordination of priests, and in the Mass of the consecration of bishops according to the Roman Pontifical (canon 803; n. 20).

Corollary II. A priest who is a stranger to a church, that is, not assigned to the church in which he asks to celebrate, can be admitted as follows:

1. If he shows authentic and still valid commendatory letters from his Ordinary if he is secular, or from his superior if he is religious, or from the Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Church if he is of an Oriental rite, he is to be admitted to the celebration of Mass, unless meanwhile it is clear that he has committed something on account of which he ought to be repelled from the celebration of Mass (canon 804, § 1).
2. If he lacks those letters, but his probity is very well known to the rector of the church, he can be admitted. But if he is unknown to the rector, he can still be admitted once or twice, provided that, clothed in ecclesiastical dress, he receives nothing, under any title, from the celebration from the church in which he sacrifices, and signs his name, office, and diocese in a special book (canon 804, § 2). It is said provided that he is clothed in ecclesiastical dress, that is, provided that the stranger, by the form of his dress, manifests that he is a priest.
3. Special norms concerning this matter, given by the local Ordinary, with the prescriptions of this canon saved, must be observed by all, even exempt religious, unless it concerns admitting religious to celebrate in a church of their own religious institute (canon 804, § 3).

[1] Session 22, chapter 2.

[2] Session 22, canon 2.

Section II. On the Obligation of Offering

The obligation of offering can arise from order received, from office, from the precept of a superior, from promise, and from stipend. Hence:

Chapter I. On the Obligation by Reason of Order Received

210 I. Christ imposed upon the college of the Apostles and of priests the precept of celebrating repeatedly. This is of faith from the Council of Trent,[1] which declared: "If anyone says that by those words: Do this in commemoration of me, Christ did not institute the Apostles priests, or did not ordain that they and other priests should offer His body and blood, let him be anathema."

II. Individual priests also are bound to celebrate repeatedly, according to canon 805: All priests are bound by the obligation of sacrificing several times a year; but let the bishop or religious superior take care that they do this sacred work at least on each Sunday and on other feasts of precept. It is said several times a year, that is, three or four times per year.

It is disputed whether the obligation of individuals to celebrate repeatedly is of divine law or only ecclesiastical law. Now most authors with St. Thomas (III, q. 82, a. 10) maintain divine law, because a true disorder seems to exist in the fact that one ordained for rendering so great honor to God and for providing so great utility to human beings frustrates such an end (St. Alphonsus, VI, 313; Examen Ordinandorum, n. 111).

III. One who can conveniently celebrate and does not celebrate because of sloth, according to several authors sins lightly, because a venial disorder is had in the fact that one ordained for celebrating neglects so great a good of God and human beings, which he can provide with such ease (St. Alphonsus, VI, 359). For the rest, the same things which commend daily Communion to the faithful persuade priests to daily celebration.

[1] Session 22, canon 2.

Chapter II. On the Obligation by Reason of Office

Those who have care of souls are bound by office either to celebrate or to take care that Mass be celebrated on those days on which the people committed to them are bound to hear Mass. Hence the Council of Trent says: "Let the bishop take care that those... who have had care of souls celebrate Mass as frequently as is sufficient to satisfy their office."[1]

[1] Session 23, chapter 14, on reform.

211 I. The source of the obligation is divine right or law, as the Council of Trent expressly teaches.[1] Now bishops are bound by absolute or immediate divine law; namely, the Holy Spirit Himself placed them to rule the Church of God, so that they cannot be lacking in the organism of the Church. But to the office of ruling and feeding is annexed the obligation of applying. Pastors are bound by hypothetical or mediate divine law; namely, on the hypothesis that by the Supreme Pontiff or by the bishops they are called into a share of pastoral solicitude, or for ruling a part of the flock. Thus from the Constitution of Leo XIII In suprema.[2] From these things it is also explained why pastors obtain some moderation of the obligation more easily than bishops (St. Alphonsus, VI, 324, question 2).

[1] Session 23, chapter 1, on reform.

[2] 10 June 1882.

212 II. The subject and object of the obligation. 1. Bishops, after having taken possession of the see, with every excuse from scantiness of revenues or any other exception removed, must apply Mass for the people committed to them on all Sundays and other feast days of precept, even suppressed ones (canon 339, § 1).

a) The feast days on which application is prescribed, according to the declaration of the Pontifical Commission,[1] are to be taken according to the catalogue established by Urban VIII in the Constitution Universa,[2] and again promulgated by the Sacred Congregation of the Council,[3] with the feast of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary added from the Constitution of Clement XI Commissi nobis,[4] and by force of the cited canon. They are therefore: the Nativity of the Lord, Circumcision, Epiphany, Easter with the two following days, Ascension, Pentecost with the two following days, Trinity, Corpus Christi, Invention of the Holy Cross, Purification, Annunciation, Assumption, Nativity of the Blessed Virgin, Immaculate Conception, Dedication of St. Michael, Nativity of St. John the Baptist, all the Holy Apostles, St. Stephen, Holy Innocents, St. Lawrence, St. Sylvester, St. Joseph, St. Anne, All Saints, and the feast of one of the principal patrons in any kingdom or province, and likewise of another principal patron in any city, town, or village where it happens that these patrons are had and venerated. Moreover, if somewhere by concession of the Holy See a particular feast of precept is celebrated, on this feast too there is the obligation of applying for the people (canon 339, § 1).

There is dispute about the obligation on feast days which previously were of precept from particular law, but now have been suppressed by force of the Code. Now the obligation seems to be maintained, both because of a particular response issued,[5] and because canon 466, § 1 generally declares that on feast days of precept, even suppressed ones, the obligation persists.

b) Although a bishop governs two or more dioceses equally principally united, or besides his own diocese has another or others in administration, nevertheless he satisfies the obligation by the celebration and application of one Mass for the whole people committed to him (canon 339, § 5).

As regards titular bishops, canon 348, § 2 states: It is fitting from charity, yet without obligation, that they sometimes apply the sacrifice of the Mass for their diocese.

2. A capitular vicar is bound in the same way as a bishop to apply Mass for the people (canon 440).

3. Vicars and prefects apostolic must apply the sacrifice of the Mass for the peoples committed to them at least on the solemnities of the Nativity of the Lord, Epiphany, Easter, Ascension, Pentecost, the Most Holy Body of Christ, the Immaculate Conception and Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary, St. Joseph her spouse, the holy Apostles Peter and Paul, and All Saints (canon 306).

4. An apostolic administrator, if he has been constituted permanently, is bound to apply as a bishop; if he has been given for a time, he is not bound by the obligation, which burdens a bishop, of applying Mass for the people (canon 315).

5. Pastors,[6] after having taken possession of the parish, are bound on the same days and by the same obligation as bishops to apply Mass for the people committed to them (canon 466, § 1). Nevertheless:

a) A pastor who perhaps governs several parishes equally principally united, or besides his own parish has another or others in administration, must apply only one Mass for the peoples committed to him on the prescribed days (canon 466, § 2). The same holds of a vicar-economus who governs several parishes during a vacancy.[7] If, however, the matter concerns the feast of the patron of the place, the pastor who, besides his own parish, has another or several others in administration, is bound to apply Mass for the people not only on the feast day of the patron of his own parish, but also on the feasts of the patrons of the other parish or parishes, unless the patrons occur as to be honored on the same day, either because the same one is the patron, or because the feast of the patrons is celebrated on the same day from liturgical laws.[8]

b) The local Ordinary can for a just cause permit the pastor to apply Mass for the people on another day than the one on which he is bound by law (canon 466, § 3); this permission can also be granted habitually.

c) The pastor should celebrate the Mass to be applied for the people in the parish church, unless circumstances of things require or suggest that Mass be celebrated elsewhere (canon 466, § 4); for example if because of a special feast there is a concourse of the people in some chapel or succursal church within the limits of the parish. Likewise one who applies through another must per se take care that the other celebrate in the parish church.[9]

d) A solemn or sung Mass is not prescribed, but a private Mass suffices.[10]

6. Quasi-pastors are bound on the same days as vicars and prefects apostolic, under 3, to apply Mass for the people committed to them (canon 466, § 1).

7. A vicar-economus, constituted while the parish is vacant, is bound as a pastor (canon 473, § 1).

[1] 17 February 1918, ad II (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1918, p. 170).

[2] 13 September 1642.

[3] 28 December 1919 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1920, p. 42).

[4] 6 December 1708.

[5] In Il Monitore Ecclesiastico 1920, p. 72.

[6] Who come under the name of pastor and quasi-pastor, see in the treatise on Matrimony.

[7] Pontifical Commission, 14 July 1922, ad VI (Acta Apostolicae Sedis, p. 528).

[8] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 12 November 1927 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1928, p. 84).

[9] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 23 December 1872.

[10] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 27 February 1847, n. 2939, ad IV; 22 July 1848, n. 2967.

213 III. A fuller explanation of the object of the obligation. 1. On the feast of the Nativity of the Lord, and if some feast of precept falls on a Sunday, it suffices that they apply one Mass for the people (canon 339, § 2). If a feast is transferred in such a way that on the day to which it is transferred not only is the office with the Mass of the transferred feast performed, but also the obligations of hearing Mass and abstaining from servile works are observed, the Mass for the people must be applied on the day to which it is transferred; otherwise on the day from which it is transferred (canon 339, § 3).

2. One who is bound by the obligation of applying must himself apply Mass personally (canon 339, § 4, compared with canons 306 and 466, § 1). Nevertheless, a legitimately absent pastor can apply Mass for the people either personally in the place where he is staying, or through the priest who takes his place in the parish (canon 466, § 5). If someone on the same day is urged by the burden of both Masses, namely for the people and conventual, let him celebrate and apply the latter personally, and the former through another or personally on the following day (canon 419, § 2).

3. A pastor legitimately absent, if he does not apply personally, and likewise one legitimately impeded from personally applying Mass for the people, should apply through another on the appointed days.

Legitimately impeding causes are: 1. physical or moral inability; 2. the obligation of celebrating conventual Mass, if the pastor is also a canon (canon 419, § 2). But the following do not legitimately impede: 1. the mere custom of applying through another;[1] 2. the custom of applying now personally, now through another, for example through a chaplain, if the latter celebrates solemn Mass;[2] 3. the liturgical precept which wills that the Mass for the people be conformed to the office. Hence if the external solemnity of some feast is transferred, and in the transfer a votive Mass is sung, the pastor cannot, so that he himself may celebrate that votive Mass, leave the application for the people to the chaplain or another; 4. the celebration of a funeral Mass, even with the corpse present.[3]

4. One who can apply neither personally nor through another on the appointed days should apply as soon as possible, either personally or through another, on another day (cited canon).

5. The real obligation, that is, either of applying for the people or of taking care that it be applied for them, is grave. The obligation of applying personally, at the fixed time, and, if the matter concerns a pastor, in the parish church, is grave from its genus, so that he would sin gravely who frequently neglected these things.

6. One who has not satisfied the obligation should as soon as possible apply for the people as many Masses as he omitted (canon 339, § 6, compared with canons 306 and 466, § 1).

7. One who applies Mass for the people in place of the pastor can receive a stipend for that Mass; but an impeded pastor is bound at his own expense to take care that it be applied for the people.

[1] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 22 September 1847.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 9 April 1881.

[3] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 26 January 1771.

Chapter III. On the Obligation by Reason of Precept or Promise

214 I. The celebration of Mass can be commanded by a competent superior. This is clear from what was said about the object of law and precept (vol. I, n. 117).

II. The application of Mass can be commanded as follows:

1. The Supreme Pontiff can certainly do this, insofar as he determines divine law, as if he prescribes that those having care of souls should sometimes celebrate for the people.

2. Religious superiors can do the same, at least by force of dominative power, with respect to their subjects, provided that the vow emitted in religion is so understood;[1] they can transfer to subjects the obligation of justice annexed to a stipend received (St. Alphonsus, VI, 317, question 4).

3. It is disputed whether ecclesiastical superiors who enjoy only the power of jurisdiction can do the same; likewise whether the superior of a religious institute can do the same by force of the same power. The Sacred Congregation of the Council, in the Vigevano case,[2] admits the affirmative opinion (cf. vol. I, n. 117).

III. One who has promised a Mass gratuitously is bound under venial sin, namely from fidelity, to stand by what was promised, unless he intended to bind himself under grave sin, or from justice (St. Alphonsus, VI, 317, question 4; vol. I, n. 864).

[1] Sacred Congregation of Religious, 3 May 1914.

[2] 8 May 1920 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1920, p. 536).

Chapter IV. On the Obligation by Reason of Stipend

Article I. On the Stipend Considered in Itself

215 I. Notion and origin. A stipend is an offering, that is, money or a thing estimable by price, which someone offers to a priest under this burden: that the priest apply the special fruit of the Mass to his, that is, the offerer's, intention. Hence the contract constituted once the stipend has been accepted takes on the nature of the contract: I give that you may do (cf. canon 1544, § 2).

The most remote origin is found in the offerings which the faithful in antiquity, when they came together for performing sacred rites, brought to the altar within the Mass itself (at the Offertory), both as a sign of communion with the Church and of participation in the Sacrifice itself, and also to provide for the necessary expenses of divine worship and for the support of the clergy (who were leading a common life) and of the poor.

In the first centuries of the Church, indeed, offerings of this kind were made only in bread and wine, then also in produce, oil, and incense. But already long before the eighth century the custom prevailed that, in place of the aforesaid offerings, or at least together with them, money was contributed as an offering for the sacrifice, destined for the common chest or treasury of the church. Then, as the common life of clerics gradually ceased, and especially as the private Masses of individual priests multiplied, the faithful began also to bestow an offering in money specifically upon individual priests for a sacrifice to be specifically applied for them. Traces of this practice are already found in documents of the eighth century; its universal use already came down in the twelfth century.[1]

[1] Vlaming, Institutiones Iuris Ecclesiastici, n. 349.

216 II. Division. Stipends are divided into manual stipends, stipends after the manner of manual stipends, and founded stipends. Manual stipends are those which are offered by the faithful for Masses, either from their own devotion, as it were into the hand, or from an obligation, even perpetual, imposed by a testator upon his own heirs (canon 826, § 1). The latter burden the patrimony of some family. Stipends for founded Masses are called "after the manner of manual stipends" when they cannot be applied in their own place, or by those who ought to apply them according to the tables of the foundation, and therefore by law or by indult of the Holy See must be handed over to other priests so that satisfaction may be made for them (canon 826, § 2). Thus stipends of founded Masses become after the manner of manual stipends when they are transmitted to others who satisfy them. Founded stipends are those which are received from the revenues of foundations (canon 826, § 3; n. 233).

217 III. Lawfulness. According to the received and approved custom and institution of the Church, it is lawful for any priest celebrating and applying Mass to receive an alms or stipend (canon 824, § 1). The reason is that the stipend is not given and accepted after the manner of a price, that is, as a thing with which the Mass is exchanged - which would be simoniacal - but as a thing which is owed to the priest insofar as it is just that one who must serve the utility of others be supported by those others, according to these words of Sacred Scripture: "The laborer is worthy of his food";[1] "Who ever serves as a soldier at his own expense?"[2] (St. Thomas, II-II, q. 100, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 316, 320, doubt 4).

Thus it is lawful, even for a wealthy priest, to accept a stipend for a Mass. Nevertheless it would be little praiseworthy to celebrate principally on account of the stipend. Indeed, St. Alphonsus judges that one who acts thus is not easily excused from venial sin, "since it is a certain disorder to direct spiritual things to temporal things" (VI, 317; III, 55, question 6).

Note 1. It is also lawful, as Benedict XIV teaches,[3] for priests celebrating with the bishop, for example in the Mass of ordination, to accept a stipend. Likewise it is permitted for newly ordained priests to receive an alms for the three Masses imposed upon them by the bishop (St. Alphonsus, VI, 829).

Note 2. One who celebrates several times in a day, if on one occasion he applies from a title of justice, cannot, except on the day of the Nativity of the Lord, receive an alms for another Mass, apart from some remuneration from an extrinsic title (canon 824, § 2). It is said:

1. From a title of justice, for example because of a stipend received, or if a pastor from office applies for the people; in this case, therefore, the pastor cannot receive a stipend for either Mass. For the rest, it is the same whether the Mass which has a stipend annexed is said in the first place or in the second place.
2. He cannot receive an alms for another Mass. Nevertheless nothing prevents him - provided that he does not receive an alms - from saying another Mass from a title of fidelity or charity; or even of justice, provided that the title of justice is not founded in stipend or in office.[4]
3. From an extrinsic title, for example of chant, hour, or place.[5]

Note 3. From canon 825 it is never lawful:

1. To apply a Mass to the intention of one who is going to request the application with an alms offered, but has not yet requested it, and to retain the alms afterward given for the Mass previously applied (n. 1; cf. n. 208).
2. To receive an alms for a Mass which is owed and applied by another title (n. 2). By another title, whether of justice, fidelity, obedience, etc. The reasons are: both because in the case the one who gave the stipend is more probably deprived of some fruit to which he has a right (n. 207); and because the one giving the stipend, according to received usage, judges that the Mass is applied for himself alone, while the priest accepting the stipend tacitly binds himself to that.
3. To accept a double alms for the application of the same Mass (n. 3; cf. n. 207).
4. To receive one alms for the celebration alone and another for the application, unless it is certain that one offering was made for celebration without application.

[1] Matthew 10:10.

[2] 1 Corinthians 9:7.

[3] De sacrificio Missae, book III, chapter 11.

[4] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, 14 September 1878 (Collectio, n. 1500).

[5] By these words the prohibition of the Sacred Congregation of the Council (15 October 1915), which existed on 2 November, was removed (Pontifical Commission, 13 December 1923, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1924, p. 116). Moreover, Pius IX, by decree of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 15 October 1863, granted to Ordinaries of missions the faculty of allowing, when a just and grave cause intervenes, that priests subject to them may receive a stipend even for a second Mass to be celebrated on the same day. Even outside mission territory such indults are sometimes granted, but only conditionally, namely under the condition that the Masses be applied according to the mind of the bishop, who will receive the alms so that he may expend them for pious causes. If these pious causes are not further indicated, it is also lawful, indeed preferable, that the bishop expend them "in favor of poor priests, not excluding those who repeat the Sacred rite, insofar as they need assistance" (Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, 7 August 1909, Acta Apostolicae Sedis I, pp. 767-771; cf. especially the report of the consultor prefixed to this decision). In the case, however, the whole alms is to be sent to the bishop (Sacred Congregation of the Council, 27 February 1905; N. K. St., p. 134). Thus Aertnys-Damen, vol. II, n. 202.

218 IV. The just stipend. It belongs to the local Ordinary to define the manual stipend for Masses in his diocese by decree, issued as far as possible in diocesan synod; nor is it lawful for a priest to demand more than this (canon 831, § 1). Where a decree of the Ordinary is lacking, the custom of the diocese is to be observed (canon 831, § 2). Even religious, although exempt, must stand, concerning the manual stipend, by the decree of the local Ordinary or by the custom of the diocese (canon 831, § 3). Moreover:

1. A larger stipend than the local Ordinary or the custom of the diocese has established cannot be demanded. Nevertheless, when more ample stipends are generally provided, it does not seem illicit to say: "I cannot personally discharge your stipends unless you give as much as others have given."[1] Besides, it is not per se prohibited to require compensation for extraordinary labor or inconvenience, for example if a sung Mass is requested, or one to be said at a certain time or place, or if a journey must be made (St. Alphonsus, III, 55).

Corollary. One who demands a stipend larger than the statute permits sins against religion, for the law obliges from this virtue; likewise he sins against justice if he demands more than is fitting. He is not, however, guilty of simony unless he sells something spiritual, for example by demanding a larger stipend because of an indulgence annexed to an altar.

2. A larger stipend freely offered can be accepted (canon 832); nor can the bishop prohibit a larger one from being offered.[2]

3. Likewise a smaller stipend can be accepted, unless the local Ordinary has prohibited it (canon 832). If a prohibition has been made, it is not judged prohibited to accept a smaller stipend if a reason of mercy requires it.

4. If someone has offered a sum of money for the application of Masses, without indicating their number, this number is to be computed according to the alms of the place in which the offerer was staying, unless it ought legitimately to be presumed that his intention was otherwise (canon 830). These things are also to be applied to a testator.

[1] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 207.

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 16 January 1649.

Article II. On the Acceptance of Stipends and on the Obligation Arising from It

219 I. Acceptance of stipends. 1. It is lawful for no one to receive so many burdens of Masses to be celebrated by himself that he cannot satisfy them within a year - understand: from the day the obligation was undertaken - (canon 835), whether because the number offered exceeds the days of the year, or because the priest has already undertaken so many burdens that he cannot fulfill new ones within a year. The decree Ut debita contained the same disposition, with this addition: "yet always preserving the contrary will of those offering"; since this addition has been omitted in the Code, the liberty seems more restricted. Nor, however, should the new law be taken in such a way that, for example, it would be considered illicit to receive a stipend for twelve anniversary Masses.

2. In churches in which, on account of the peculiar devotion of the faithful, alms for Masses flow in such abundance that all the Masses cannot be celebrated there in due time, the faithful are to be warned, by a notice placed in a conspicuous and obvious place, that the Masses offered will be celebrated either there, when this can conveniently be done, or elsewhere (canon 836).

220 II. The obligation arising from a stipend regards both the celebration and application according to the intention of the one giving the stipend, and the circumstances intended by him, and the time determined either by him or by the Church. It is, moreover, an obligation of justice; nor does it stand in the way of this obligation that the one giving the stipend is ignorant of the norms established by the Church concerning time. It suffices that he intends the Mass as it is to be said according to the Church; but the priest, by accepting the stipend, tacitly binds himself to the norms established by the Church.

221 1. Celebration and application according to the intention of the one giving the stipend is imposed principally, and indeed for each individual stipend. Hence canon 828: "There are to be celebrated and applied as many Masses as there have been stipends, even small ones, given and accepted." Moreover, the omission of even only one Mass is certainly grave if the matter of the stipend with respect to the giver is grave, and there is not question of a large number of Masses to be celebrated for the same intention.

It is disputed, first, whether the omission of one Mass to be celebrated because of a stipend whose matter is light is grave. Several deny it; but with St. Alphonsus (VI, 317, q. 3) and others we affirm it. For an obligation owed from justice is grave if there is question of a grave thing, such as a Mass is. But that he who is deprived of the good of the Mass can obtain another Mass with a small stipend in no way prevents the one who is bound from justice to furnish a grave good from being bound under grave sin to do this.

It is disputed, second, whether the omission of one Mass is grave if there is question of a large number of Masses to be celebrated for the same intention. But the argument alleged above seems also to support the opinion which teaches that the omission is grave in this case too.

It is disputed, third, whether one who has received a small stipend is bound under grave sin to restore it in the case in which he can neither say the Mass himself nor take care that it be said by another, for he is bound to these things. Now this seems altogether to be denied, since it does not appear that the obligation of restoring a light thing is grave.

222 2. Due circumstances. On this point, first let canon 833 be noted: The offerer is presumed to have asked only for the application of the Mass; if, however, the offerer expressly determined that certain circumstances were to be observed in the celebration of the Mass, the priest, accepting the alms, must stand by his will. These points are especially to be noted:

a) The circumstance of place. Founded Masses must be celebrated in the place designated by the founder. It would be a grave sin often and without just cause to depart from this rule (St. Alphonsus, VI, 329). Nevertheless the beneficiary is not bound personally to celebrate the Masses, unless the founder expressly established this (St. Alphonsus, VI, 330). Moreover, the bishop can, by interpreting the will of the founder, permit by way of dispensation that for a just cause the Mass be celebrated in another place (St. Alphonsus, VI, 329).

As regards manual Masses, the circumstance of place must be observed under grave sin if, considering the circumstances, the place must be judged to pertain to the substance of the obligation, as easily happens if there is question of a nuptial Mass, a funeral Mass, or a Mass to be celebrated before a miraculous image. If the assigned place does not pertain to the substance of the obligation, neglect of it is light, and for a just cause not foreseen it becomes lawful.

b) The circumstance of a privileged altar. Concerning this, note:

alpha) One who is bound to celebrate at a privileged altar does not satisfy by applying another plenary indulgence to the deceased.[1] beta) A priest having the personal privilege of a privileged altar satisfies, even though he celebrates at an altar that is not privileged.[2] gamma) The quality of a Requiem Mass, feria, or vigil, and likewise the addition of the prayer for the deceased, is no longer required for the value of the indulgence.[3] delta) One who has not satisfied the circumstance of a privileged altar is bound to compensation, for example to applying another plenary indulgence to the soul of the deceased; he can accomplish this, for example, by saying the prayer En ego, etc. (St. Alphonsus, VI, 329).

c) The circumstance of the quality of the Mass - for example, of a Requiem or votive Mass - if it is expressly determined,[4] must be observed under venial sin, but not under grave sin, because there is no question of the substance, but only of an accessory of the contract. But if the rubrics prohibit the quality of the Mass from being observed, generally, from the presumed consent of the one giving the stipend, the obligation is satisfied by another Mass. It is more advisable, however, that if it can conveniently be done, the requested Mass be said on another day.[5] If the priest foresees that the requested quality of the Mass cannot be observed on the assigned day, the offerer should be forewarned.

d) The circumstance of Gregorian Masses entails that thirty Masses be celebrated for the same deceased person (by one priest or by several priests), and this through thirty uninterrupted days. Moreover, one who voluntarily interrupted the series is bound to begin it anew; if someone did this involuntarily, it suffices that he complete the number and in some way compensate the detriment, for example by applying a plenary indulgence.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 2 May 1852; 24 July 1885 (Acta Sanctae Sedis, vol. 18, p. 94).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, 15 March 1852.

[3] Holy Office, 19 February 1913 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1913, p. 122).

[4] The quality of the Mass is expressly determined if a Mass of Requiem or a votive Mass, for example of St. Gerard, is requested; but not if it is requested for a certain intention. It is disputed whether or not it is sufficiently determined if a Mass is requested for a deceased person, or in honor of St. Gerard, or for a living person. Most deny it; indeed they rightly judge that generally only the application is intended, and in no way the quality of the Mass. Others say otherwise, but the response of the Sacred Congregation of Rites (3 March 1761, n. 2461, ad VII), on which they rely, does not settle our question when rightly posed. For the Sacred Congregation responded: "On days on which private votive Masses or Masses of the dead can be said, a priest bound to them by reason of a foundation or an accepted manual stipend does not satisfy his own obligation by saying the Mass of the occurring day; for the expressed will of testators or petitioners, provided it is reasonable, must be fulfilled." But we ask when he is bound to the quality of the Mass.

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, 30 June 1896, n. 3922, General Decree, § IV, n. 3; 13 June 1899, n. 4031, ad IV.

223 3. Due time. Founded Masses and Masses after the manner of manual Masses must be celebrated on the day and at the hour designated by the founder. It would be a grave sin often and without just cause to depart from this rule (St. Alphonsus, VI, 329). Nevertheless the bishop can, by interpreting the will of the founder, permit by way of dispensation that for a just cause the Mass be celebrated on another day or at another hour (St. Alphonsus, VI, 329).

As regards manual Masses, receive these points:

a) If the offerer has expressly assigned a time, the Masses must absolutely be celebrated at that time (canon 834, § 1). A lengthy delay is a grave sin; likewise a slight delay is grave if it is such that a Mass requested for an instant necessity is not said in good time, according to what is to be said under c.

b) If the offerer has expressly left the time to the judgment of the priest, the priest will be able to celebrate them at the time which is more pleasing to himself, with the prescription of canon 835 remaining firm (canon 834, § 3); compare that canon with n. 219.

c) If the offerer has expressly assigned no time for the celebration of manual Masses:

alpha) Masses offered for an urgent cause must be celebrated as soon as possible within the useful time (canon 834, § 2, 1). Neglect of the useful time is gravely illicit and carries with it the obligation of restoring the stipend.

beta) In other cases the Masses must be celebrated within a moderate time, according to the greater or smaller number of Masses (canon 834, § 2, 2). In this matter, the decree Ut debita can be taken as a norm; it established that "the useful time for fulfilling obligations of manual Masses is one month for one Mass, six months for one hundred Masses, and another longer or shorter space of time more or less, according to the greater or smaller number of Masses" (n. 2).[1] Besides, the Sacred Congregation of the Council responded that the prescribed terms are to be understood separately with regard to each one who offers a stipend, not cumulatively with regard to all who offer. For the rest, a delay greater than is just, such as by force of natural law seems to be one which exceeds the time assigned above, is gravely or lightly illicit, according as it is notable or light. Moreover, a delay longer than a month beyond the legitimate time, and indeed even a shorter delay if there is question of the recently deceased, seems notable. Finally, it is equitable that some number from the Masses for the recently deceased be celebrated as quickly as possible (St. Alphonsus, VI, 317, question 2).

[1] As regards intermediate numbers, the Sacred Congregation of the Council responded on 27 February 1905: "the matter is left to the discreet judgment and conscience of priests according to the decree and the rules handed down by approved doctors." Hence these can be established:

Time	Number of Masses
2 months	20
3 months	40
4 months	60
5 months	80

Time	Number of Masses
6 months	100
12 months	200

Moreover, a further delay can be granted by the Holy See. 27 February 1905, ad XI.

224 III. Cessation of the obligation. Although the alms for Masses already received have perished without the fault of the one who is burdened with celebrating, the obligation does not cease (canon 829). The reason is clear: for the fact that the priest is deprived of his own thing, that is, of the stipend received, does not deprive another of the right, received and perfected through the handing over of the stipend, that Mass be applied to his intention. Nevertheless, one who has lost the alms, for example, can take care that another celebrate the Mass for a smaller stipend.

Article III. On the Distribution and Transmission of Masses

225 I. To what extent someone must or can distribute or transmit Masses you may gather from these points:

1. One who has Masses to be celebrated by others should distribute them as soon as possible, with the prescription of canon 841 remaining firm; but the legitimate time for their celebration begins from the day on which the priest who is going to celebrate them received them, unless something else is clear (canon 837). There is question, for example, of the administrator of a pious cause, of an executor of a testament, of an heir. Let them distribute the Masses as soon as possible, lest the celebration be delayed too much.

2. Those who have a number of Masses of which they may freely dispose can give them to priests acceptable to themselves, provided they know well that these priests are above every exception or are recommended by the testimony of their own Ordinary (canon 838).[1] It is said to priests; hence it is not lawful to hand them over, for example, to booksellers, etc. Nevertheless nothing prevents their being handed over to a priest who distributes them among other priests. They can also be handed over to priests who live or are staying in another diocese,[2] since the Code does not distinguish and requires only that the priest be above every exception, that is, truly trustworthy, or recommended by his own Ordinary, that is, the Ordinary of the one accepting, although perhaps he is living in another diocese. Moreover, the disposition of some provincial councils, by which it is forbidden for stipends to be sent to another diocese without the permission of the Ordinary, is sustained only - unless a privilege is added[3] - with respect to founded Masses, Masses after the manner of manual Masses, or manual Masses given with regard to a pious cause.[4] From these things you may deduce what the local Ordinary can do in this matter.

3. All and individual administrators of pious causes, or persons bound in any way to fulfill Mass burdens, whether clerics or laypersons, at the end of each year should hand over to their Ordinaries, according to the manner to be defined by these Ordinaries, the Mass burdens for which satisfaction has not yet been made. This time, however, is to be taken in such a way that in Masses after the manner of manual Masses the obligation of depositing them runs from the end of that year within which the burdens ought to have been fulfilled; but in manual Masses, after a year from the day the burden was undertaken, with the different will of those offering preserved (canon 841,

§§ 1 and 2). Namely, those offering manual stipends can grant that the Masses be delayed more than a year.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, 17 July 1655.

[2] By these provisions the decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council (22 May 1897, Acta Sanctae Sedis, vol. 40, p. 344), by which stipends could not be transmitted to priests residing outside the diocese except through their Ordinary, or at least after he had been heard and had consented, was removed. Likewise the decrees which prohibited the direct transmission of Masses to Oriental priests seem to have been removed.

[3] A privilege of this kind was granted for a time to the bishops of Holland.

[4] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 19 February 1921.

226 II. Those who hand over to others for celebration Masses received from the faithful or in any way committed to their trust are held by the obligation until they have obtained testimony from them of the obligation accepted and of the stipend received (canon 839). Thus positive law does not extend itself more broadly; but with natural law considered, one would not be immune from obligation if he transmitted a Mass whose obligation of celebration he himself had undertaken, and afterward learned that the celebration of the Mass was being neglected (cf. n. 224).

227 III. One who transmits Masses is bound to transmit the stipend, as follows:

1. One who transmits manual Mass stipends to others must transmit what has been accepted in full, unless either the offerer expressly permits something to be retained, or it is certainly clear that the excess above the diocesan tax was given in consideration of the person (canon 840, § 1). Thus, per se, the celebrant has the right to receive the whole stipend, and indeed either in its own species, or, if the priest who is going to celebrate consents, in an equivalent,[1] for example in books. Likewise, even without the consent of the celebrant, if there is question of vicars living in the pastor's house, the excess of the common stipend can be given to them in board and service.[2] Finally, as regards the same vicars, the custom can be sustained that they always celebrate according to the intention of the pastor, who grants them board and service, while they receive a determined pension from the treasury of the church or from the pastor.[3]

One who transmits a manual offering can retain something: 1. when the offerer expressly permits it; 2. when it is certain that the excess above the diocesan tax was given in consideration of the person, for example because the one to whom the Mass was offered is poor, or a relative, friend, or even pastor of the offerer;[4] 3. if the excess of the customary tax pertains to stole fees, as if there is question of a nuptial or funeral Mass.[5] In other cases the one who is going to celebrate has the right to the whole stipend. Nothing, however, prevents him, by yielding his right altogether spontaneously, from leaving the offering or part of it to the one transmitting. But now, just as before, it seems illicit to ask the one who is going to celebrate to yield the stipend or part of it. For, considering the Constitution of Benedict XIV Quanta cura,[6] where a request of this kind is called an execrable abuse, and canon 827, it must be doubted whether the old law has been changed. In doubt, however, one must not depart from the old law (canon 6, 4).

2. In Masses after the manner of manual Masses, unless the mind of the founder stands in the way, the excess is legitimately retained, and it suffices to remit only the manual alms of the diocese in which the Mass is celebrated, if the ample alms takes the place in part of the endowment of the benefice or pious cause (canon 840, § 2). Whether or not the added condition has place is to be gathered: 1. from the tables of the foundation themselves, when they expressly testify that the whole annual fruit of the foundation was designated as stipend; 2. from the nature of the benefice to which the foundation is annexed, namely if all or the greatest part of the revenues of the benefice consist in these stipends; 3. from custom, when more ample stipends have always been held as a part of the revenues; and 4. from an authentic declaration of the Ordinary.[7]

[1] The decree Ut debita prescribed that stipends were to be handed over in full and in their own species (article 9).

[2] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 25 February 1905, in the Breda case, ad I (Acta Sanctae Sedis, vol. 38, p. 15); 25 February 1910, in the Luxembourg case (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1910, p. 203).

[3] Sacred Congregation of the Council, in the Breda case, ad III (Acta Sanctae Sedis, loc. cit.); 10 January, in the Montesson case (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1920, p. 70).

[4] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, 6 April 1742 (Collectio, n. 336); Sacred Congregation of the Council, 31 January 1880.

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, 25 July 1874 (Collectio, n. 1422); 11 May 1888.

[6] 30 June 1741.

[7] N. K. Stemmen, 1918, p. 9; Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 212.

228 Corollary I. At the request of either party it is lawful to exchange intentions, while the unequal stipend is retained, if this is done so that offices are exchanged;[1] otherwise, if it is done principally for the sake of taking profit.[2] The reason for the former is that every base gain is absent. The reason for the latter is that illicit gain does not seem to be absent; cf. canon 827 (St. Alphonsus, VI, 322, doubt 4).

Corollary II. One who by office has care of distributing stipends can demand a moderate payment from those to whom the Masses are distributed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 322, doubt 8). And generally, one who transmits Masses can deduct expenses of administration and transfer.[3] Administrators of churches, however, cannot retain part of the stipend for the expenses of altars, servers, light, wine, hosts, etc., unless the church is pressed by poverty[4] (St. Alphonsus, 322, doubt 5). Nor is it lawful to subtract anything from the manual alms which the faithful are accustomed to hand over to more celebrated shrines, in order to provide for their dignity and ornament.[5]

Corollary III. One who unduly retains part of a stipend sins against strict justice, and therefore is bound to restitution from the same virtue, as follows:

1. An executor of a testament who retains part of the sum to be expended in Mass stipends certainly violates strict justice. The same, according to the Constitution of Benedict XIV Quanta cura, § 1 sq., must be said of those who collect stipends for this end: that Masses be celebrated elsewhere, where stipends are smaller.

2. There is dispute about others; but with St. Alphonsus (VI, 322, doubt 1) it seems altogether to be affirmed. For ownership of the stipend is not acquired except according to the intention of the giver. But the intention of the giver seems to be that the one who fulfills the burden also receive the stipend. Objection. Nothing prevents the recipient of the stipend from fulfilling the burden through another. Response. Granted; but from the intention of the one giving the stipend, in other words, by force of this contract, that other person who fulfills the burden seems to receive a right in the stipend given. From what has been said, against some authors it is also deduced that the stipend must be restored to the celebrant, not to the one giving the alms (St. Alphonsus, VI, loc. cit.).

[1] For example, a missionary occupied with spiritual exercises takes upon himself the Mass and intention announced for the sixth hour, so that a chaplain, a sufficiently sick old man, may be able to celebrate; and he hands over to this chaplain his own intention to be discharged, without any discussion about exchanging stipends.

[2] For example, someone has a Mass with an ample stipend to be celebrated today. But, hindered unexpectedly from celebrating, he summons another priest and proposes to him, who has a smaller stipend, that the Masses be exchanged, namely so that he himself takes upon himself the other priest's intention to be discharged on the following day.

[3] Sacred Congregation of the Council, in the Breda case, 25 February 1905, Mens est.

[4] Constitution of Innocent XII, Nuper, ad VII.

[5] Decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council Ut debita (article 11).

Article IV. On Abuses to Be Avoided in Accepting Stipends

229 From Mass stipends, thus canon 827, every kind even of negotiation or commerce is altogether to be kept away. This canon is neglected: 1. by those who of their own accord retain part of the stipend (n. 227); 2. by those who ask others that, when Masses have been transferred, they may retain part of the stipend (n. 227); 3. by booksellers or merchants who collect stipends and, in place of them, give books, periodicals, or other merchandise to priests who are going to celebrate the Masses,[1] whether with profit (commerce) or without profit (a species of commerce). The author of the stipend, however, can offer other things to the one who is going to celebrate, in place of money.

[1] Decree Ut debita of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, 11 May 1904 (article 8); cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, 9 September 1874; decree Vigilanti studio, 23 May 1893.

Article V. On the Safeguards of the Law

230 I. Supervision. The right and duty of watching so that Mass burdens are fulfilled belongs, in churches of seculars, to the local Ordinary; in churches of religious, to their superiors (canon 842).

231 II. Notation of Masses. 1. Rectors of churches and of other pious places, whether secular or religious, in which alms for Masses are customarily received, should have a special book in which they accurately note the number, intention, alms, and celebration of the Masses received (canon 843, § 1). Ordinaries are held by the obligation of examining books of this kind, either personally or through others, at least once each year (canon 843, § 2). Ordinaries, that is, local Ordinaries or major superiors in exempt clerical religious institutes (canon 198, § 1).

2. Likewise local Ordinaries and religious superiors who entrust Masses to be celebrated to their own subjects or to others should quickly enter in order into a book the Masses which they have received with their alms, and should take care according to their powers that they be celebrated as soon as possible. Indeed, all priests, whether secular or religious, must accurately note which Mass intentions each one has received and which he has satisfied (canon 844). It suffices, however, that one note the Masses through another.

232 III. Penalties. Those who have offended against the prescription of canon 827, 828, or 840, § 1 are to be punished by the Ordinary according to the gravity of the fault, not excluding, if the matter bears it, suspension or privation of an ecclesiastical benefice or office, or, if there is question of laypersons, excommunication (canon 2324). The penalties of latae sententiae previously established have been abrogated.

Scholion I. On Pious Foundations

233 I. Notion and nature. By the name of pious foundations are signified temporal goods given in any way to some moral person in the Church, with the burden, in perpetuity or for a long time, of celebrating some Masses from the annual revenues, or of fulfilling other predefined ecclesiastical functions, or of performing some works of piety and charity (canon 1544, § 1). A foundation, once legitimately accepted, takes on the nature of a synallagmatic contract: I give that you may do (canon 1544, § 2).

Note. It belongs to the local Ordinary (or, if there is question of pious foundations in churches, even parochial ones, of exempt religious, to the major superior) to prescribe norms concerning the amount of endowment below which a pious foundation cannot be admitted, and concerning the proper distribution of its fruits (canon 1545, compared with canon 1550).

234 II. Acceptance of a foundation. 1. In order that foundations of this kind can be accepted by a moral person, the consent of the local Ordinary is required, given in writing (or, if there is question of exempt religious, the consent of the major superior), who should not furnish it before he has legitimately ascertained that the moral person is able to satisfy both the new burden to be undertaken and the old burdens already undertaken. Above all, he should take care that the revenues correspond altogether to the burdens annexed, according to the custom of each diocese. In the acceptance, constitution, and administration of a foundation, the patron of the church has no right (canon 1546).

2. Foundations, even those made orally, are to be committed to writing. One copy of the records is to be kept safely in the archive of the Curia (or of the major superior), and the other in the archive of the moral person to which the foundation pertains (canon 1548).

Note 1. Money and movable goods assigned under the name of donation are immediately to be deposited in a safe place, designated by the same Ordinary (or major superior), for this end: that the same money or the value of the movable goods be preserved and, as soon as possible, be invested cautiously and usefully according to the prudent judgment of the same Ordinary, after those whose interest is involved and the diocesan council of administration (or the council of the major superior) have been heard, for the benefit of the same foundation, with express and individual mention of the burden (canon 1547).

Note 2. With the prescriptions of canons 1514-1517 and canon 1525 observed, in any church there is to be drawn up a table of the burdens incumbent from pious foundations, which is to be kept by the rector in a safe place (canon 1549, § 1). Likewise, besides the book of which canon 843, § 1 speaks, another book is to be kept and preserved by the rector, in which the individual perpetual and temporary burdens, their fulfillment, and the alms are noted, so that an exact account of all these things may be rendered to the local Ordinary (or major superior) (canon 1549, § 2).

Note 3. If there is question of churches, even parochial ones, of exempt religious, all the things set forth above must be observed, but in such a way that the assigned rights and duties belong exclusively to the major superior (canon 1550). But if there is question of churches of non-exempt religious, the rights set forth are reserved to the local Ordinary, even if the parish has been united to the religious house with full right (cited canon, compared with the response of the Pontifical Commission).[1]

[1] 25 July 1926, ad IV (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1926, p. 393).

235 III. The obligation of a foundation, as regards Masses, is both to celebrate as many Masses as have been established, and to fulfill the other things imposed by the founder, for example as to the quality of the Mass, place, altar, hour, etc. (n. 220). The obligation of celebrating as many times as is expressed in the foundation is grave. How great the obligation of the other adjuncts is must be gathered from what has been said generally about the obligation arising from a stipend (n. 222). Neglect of the adjuncts does not induce the obligation of celebrating another Mass, or of restoring the stipend or part of it, unless the priest accepted an excess of stipend in consideration of a greater inconvenience; for example, if he accepted a larger stipend for a sung Mass and did not sing it. For the rest, note:

1. Unless it is otherwise expressed, someone can fulfill the burden either personally or through another (St. Alphonsus, VI, 330).
2. If it is not determined for whom the Masses are to be applied, the obligation of applying them to the founder himself is presumed;[1] and all things are safeguarded if the application is made according to the intention of the founder.
3. If the founder did not order all the Masses to be celebrated for himself, but ordered a certain number from them to be celebrated for himself or according to his intention, he is presumed to have left free the application of the remaining Masses (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).
4. To a benefice there is sometimes annexed the burden either of celebrating daily or of celebrating and applying daily. Moreover:

a) One who is bound personally to celebrate can sometimes omit Mass for a just cause. Nevertheless he is bound to supply through another if the burden immediately falls upon the church or community; otherwise, if it immediately falls upon the beneficiary. Just causes for sometimes omitting Mass are:

alpha) Religion; namely, the beneficiary can, for the sake of reverence, according to some authors abstain from celebrating once a week, according to others once a month.

beta) A reasonable impediment, such as a journey to be made, spiritual exercises to be performed, etc. To this also belongs:

gamma) Illness. If this is brief, the beneficiary is not bound to supply through another; if it is more lasting, he is bound to supply through another. Illness is judged brief, according to some, if it is of fifteen days; according to others, of one month; according to others, of two months. This last opinion is held by St. Alphonsus as sufficiently probable[2] (VI, 333).

b) One who is bound personally to celebrate and apply can, just as one who is bound only to celebrate, sometimes omit the sacred rite for a just cause. He can also sometimes - for example six times a year - offer for himself or for others, but he cannot accept a stipend.[3] If he does not personally apply, he is bound, as was said of one who must personally celebrate daily, to supply through another if the burden was imposed immediately upon the church, etc.; otherwise, if it was imposed directly upon the beneficiary.

[1] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 18 March 1668; 26 March 1718.

[2] The declarations of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, 4 June 1689 and 17 November 1695, do not seem to settle the question.

[3] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 18 September 1683 (Collectio, n. 228); Pontifical Commission, 14 July 1922 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1922, p. 529).

236 IV. Cessation or change of the obligation. The causes of cessation are assigned as reduction, total defect of revenues, and condonation. Reduction is the concession of diminishing the works, for example the number of Masses, established by a pious foundation. Condonation is the concession of omitting works, for example Masses, which ought to have been celebrated in past time. That the Holy See enjoys the faculty of condoning and reducing Masses is clear from c. 2, Clem., de religiosis domibus (III, 11), and from the practice of the Church. For the rest, the Holy See can compensate the loss arising to founders, both by supplying from the treasury of the Church and by enjoining other works. Moreover:

1. The reduction of burdens which weigh upon pious foundations is reserved to the Apostolic See alone, unless something else is expressly provided in the tables of the foundation (canon 1551, § 1). Nevertheless, with the reduction of Masses excepted, these words of canon 1517, § 2 hold: "If, however, the execution of the imposed burdens, because of diminished revenues or another cause, without any fault of the administrators, has become impossible, then the Ordinary too, after those whose interest is involved have been heard, and with the will of the founder preserved in the better way possible, will be able equitably to diminish the same burdens." Moreover, an accidental change made for a time and for a just cause, for example the transfer of a Mass from one hour to another, does not seem to exceed the faculty of the bishop, unless there was a special reason for assigning a certain hour.

"The causes, moreover, on account of which the Apostolic See is accustomed to reduce Masses are: scarcity of priests, slenderness of the stipend or increase of the current stipend, diminution of the revenues of a monastery, or greater necessary expenses for sustenance, etc.; finally, if the necessity of the brethren, or of the fabric of the church or monastery, should press" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 331). For reduction recourse should be had to the Sacred Congregation of the Council.

Note 1. An indult of reducing founded Masses is not extended either to other Masses owed from contract or to other burdens of the pious foundation. But a general indult of reducing the burdens of pious foundations is to be understood, unless something else is clear, in such a way that the holder of the indult should reduce other burdens rather than Masses (canon 1551, §§ 2 and 3).

Note 2. It is advised that the founder insert into the document of foundation the faculty of diminishing the number of Masses if the revenues do not furnish an equitable stipend for the individual Masses.

2. Total defect of revenues; for when these fail, the title on which the burdens rest falls.[1] That the revenues are diminished, or for another reason no longer constitute an equitable stipend, does not per se suffice for the burdens to be diminished; this follows from what was said above. But if the founder assigned a stipend for individual Masses, or did not determine the number of Masses, the number can indeed be diminished proportionately according to the stipend determined for the individual Masses or according to the diocesan tax.
3. Condonation of burdens[2] is altogether reserved to the Apostolic See. Recourse is to be had for the external forum to the Sacred Congregation of the Council; for the internal forum to the Sacred Penitentiary.

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of the Council, 7 July 1686; 18 August 1705.

[2] Note from canon 1509, 5, that burdens of Masses are not extinguished by prescription.

Scholion II. On Several Masses to Be Offered on the Same Day

237 I. Except on the day of the Nativity of the Lord and on the day of the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed, on which there is the faculty of offering the Eucharistic Sacrifice three times, it is not lawful for a priest to celebrate several Masses in a day, unless by apostolic indult or by power granted by the local Ordinary (canon 806, § 1). Note, however:

1. As regards the day of the Nativity of the Lord: a) One who says only one Mass should take that Mass which corresponds to the hour of celebration, that is, at night the first, at dawn the second, during the day the third.[1] One who - as is lawful[2] - celebrates only two Masses, if he separates them and does not say both during the day, should proceed in such a way that the Masses correspond to the hour of celebration; if he does not separate them and reads both at night, he should take the first and the other; if at dawn or during the day, he should celebrate the other and the third.

b) One who by apostolic indult can celebrate daily a votive Mass or a Mass of the dead can, even on the day of the Nativity of the Lord, say the same Mass three times,[3] that is, either the votive Mass, or, as it seems, one of the three Masses of the Nativity.[4]

2. As regards the day of the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed:

a) One who says three Masses must apply one gratuitously for all the faithful departed, another gratuitously according to the intention of the Supreme Pontiff; he can celebrate the third for a stipend. It is also illicit, with the Masses for the departed and according to the intention of the Supreme Pontiff transferred to another day, to say three Masses for a stipend on the day of the Commemoration. But it does not matter which of the three Masses is celebrated for the departed, according to the intention of the Supreme Pontiff, or for a stipend.[5]

b) One who reads only one Mass should take the first Mass of the day, and he can apply it for a stipend. "Let him use the same Mass, that is, the first Mass, who is going to celebrate Mass with chant, with the power granted him of anticipating the second and third."[6] One who celebrates only two Masses should take the first two Masses of the day; he can apply one for a stipend, and is bound to say one of the two for the departed.[7]

c) One who by apostolic indult can daily celebrate a votive Mass or a Mass of the dead can, even on the day of the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed, say the same Mass three times.[8]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 19 June 1875, n. 3354; 13 February 1892, n. 3767, ad 21.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 19 June 1875, n. 3355.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 26 January 1920, n. 4356.

[4] Sacred Congregation of the Council, 15 October 1915, ad 1, 2, and 3.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, n. 4331.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 28 February 1917, n. 4342.

[7] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 29 January 1920, n. 4356.

[8] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 28 September 1837.

238 II. The Ordinary cannot impart the faculty of celebrating several times in a day unless, in his prudent judgment, because of a scarcity of priests, a notable part of the faithful cannot assist at Mass on a feast day of precept; nor is it in his power to permit more than two Masses to the same priest (canon 806, § 2). Thus:

1. The power of the Ordinary regards only feast days of precept, that is, days on which the faithful are in fact bound to hear Mass; therefore suppressed feast days are excluded.[1]

2. The power of the Ordinary regards circumstances in which, if bination is excluded, a notable part of the faithful could not hear the sacred rite. The case is present: 1. if a pastor has two parishes so distant from one another that the people of both cannot conveniently come together in the same church, and there is no priest who may celebrate in the other parish; 2. if a pastor has two groups of people in the same parish distant in the aforesaid way, and there is no priest who may celebrate the other Mass; 3. if a notable part of the parishioners - for example twenty persons[2] - cannot come together to hear one and the same Mass, whether because of domestic circumstances or because of the narrowness of the church, and no other priest is present who may say the other Mass. But the Ordinary cannot grant bination in favor of those who wish to satisfy the precept in their own private oratories;[3] nor does mere custom suffice,[4] unless it is centenary and the Ordinary judges that it cannot prudently be removed (canon 5). Moreover, since the faculty of binating has been granted in order that necessity may be met, it cannot be exercised if by chance another priest arrives who can and wishes to say the other Mass. For the rest, note:

a) A faculty granted that in a determinate church Mass may be celebrated twice by the same priest is local, so that it is communicated to another who takes his place. Otherwise one must speak of a faculty granted to someone that he may use it, because of an occurring case, now here, now there; this faculty is personal and cannot be communicated to another, unless the faculty of subdelegating has been added.

b) In a case of sudden necessity, for example if another priest suddenly falls ill and no other can be summoned, the license of the bishop can be presumed,[5] unless the statutes require that the judgment of the vicar forane intervene.

[1] Cf. Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, where it is said that the concession is to be interpreted rather benignly.

[2] Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 24 May 1870, n. 6 (Collectio, n. 792).

[3] Benedict XIV, Constitution Declarasti nobis.

[4] Cf. Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 24 May 1870, nn. 13-17 (Collectio, n. 792).

[5] Cf. Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 24 May 1870, nn. 13-17 (Collectio, n. 792).

239 III. Finally, it is sufficiently probable that it is lawful to binate if otherwise a dying person would be deprived of Viaticum.

240 IV. Whenever someone celebrates several times in a day, if he applies one Mass from a title of justice, the priest, except on the day of the Nativity of the Lord, cannot receive an alms for another Mass, apart from some remuneration from an extrinsic title (canon 824, § 2); see these things explained in n. 217.

Chapter II. On the Place of Offering

244 I. Notion of sacred places. The sacred places which come to be considered here are churches and oratories.

1. By the name of church is understood a sacred building dedicated to divine worship, chiefly for this end: that it may serve all the Christian faithful for publicly exercising divine worship (canon 1161).
2. An oratory is a place destined for divine worship, yet not chiefly for this end: that it may serve the whole faithful people for publicly cultivating religion (canon 1188, § 1). An oratory is distinguished as threefold: public, semi-public, and private.

a) It is public if it has been erected principally for the benefit of some college or even of private persons, yet in such a way that all the faithful have a legitimately established right of approaching it, at least during the time of divine offices (canon 1188, § 2, 1).

b) It is semi-public if it has been erected for the benefit of some community or group of the faithful assembling there, and it is not free for everyone to approach it (canon 1188, § 2, 2).

c) It is private or domestic if it has been erected in private homes for the benefit only of some family or private person (canon 1188, § 2, 3).

245 II. Consecration and blessing of sacred places. 1. The consecration of a church, although it belongs to regulars, belongs to the Ordinary of the territory in which the place itself is found, provided the Ordinary is marked with the episcopal character, but not to the vicar general without a special mandate, with the right of Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church to consecrate the church and altars of their title remaining firm (canon 1155, § 1). Cardinals, even non-bishops, can consecrate churches everywhere with the consent of the Ordinary (canon 239, § 1, 20); abbots and prelates nullius can do the same (canon 323, § 2).

b) The right of blessing a sacred place, if it belongs to the secular clergy or to a non-exempt religious institute, or to a lay institute, belongs to the Ordinary of the territory in which the place is found; if it belongs to an exempt clerical religious institute, to the major superior. Each, however, can delegate another priest for this (canon 1156).

Note. Notwithstanding any privilege whatever, no one can consecrate or bless a sacred place without the consent of the Ordinary, whether territorial or religious, according as the circumstances bear (canon 1157); and this also holds for Cardinals, if there is question of a church other than the church of their own title.

246 III. Places in which Mass can be celebrated. Mass can be celebrated:

1. In consecrated or solemnly blessed churches and public oratories (canons 822, § 1; 1165, § 1; 1191).
2. In legitimately erected semi-public oratories, all divine offices or ecclesiastical functions can be celebrated, unless the rubrics stand in the way or the Ordinary has excepted something (canon 1193). The oratories of Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church and of bishops, whether residential or titular, although private, nevertheless enjoy all the rights and privileges by which semi-public oratories rejoice (canon 1189).
3. In legitimately erected private oratories,[1] as follows:

a) If they have been erected from an indult of the Apostolic See, unless something else is expressly provided in the same indult, after the Ordinary has visited the oratory personally or through another and found it decently furnished, one Mass can be celebrated, and that a read Mass, on individual days, except the more solemn feasts; but other ecclesiastical functions are not to be performed there (canon 1195, § 1). The Ordinary, however, provided just and reasonable causes are present, different from those on account of which the indult was granted, can permit the celebration of Mass by way of an act even on the more solemn feasts (canon 1195, § 2).

b) Even if they have not been erected from an indult of the Holy See but by the authority of the Ordinary, the Ordinary can, in some extraordinary case, for a just and reasonable cause, permit one Mass by way of an act, even repeatedly, but not habitually (canon 1194).

c) In private cemetery chapels, of which canon 1190 speaks, the local Ordinary can permit habitually even the celebration of several Masses (canon 1194).

d) Nuncios, internuncios, and apostolic delegates, from the faculties granted to them, can grant to sick priests, during infirm health, and likewise to priests advanced in age, an indult of a private oratory in which they may celebrate Mass, with the canonical rules observed. Several bishops can do the same.

e) Regulars, by force of the communication of privileges, enjoy the privilege which Gregory XIII granted to the Society of Jesus, that Provincials can, personally and without the permission of the bishop, erect oratories in houses and colleges and in other places where some of the Society will reside; in these oratories several Masses can be celebrated on the same day even by outsiders, and those assisting can fulfill the precept.[2] Finally, Regulars, by force of the communication of privileges, have the faculty granted to several institutes of erecting private oratories in granges or rural houses; everyone who assists at Mass there can satisfy the precept.

4. Outside a church and oratories, it is lawful to celebrate as follows:

a) The privilege of a portable altar imports the faculty of celebrating everywhere upon a sacred stone, yet in an honorable and decent place, but not at sea (canon 822, § 3).

This privilege is conceded either by law or by indult of the Apostolic See alone (canon 822, § 2). By law it has been conceded to Cardinals and bishops, who can also permit another Mass to be celebrated while they are present (canon 239, § 1, 7; 349, § 1, 1).

b) The local Ordinary, or, if there is question of a house of an exempt religious institute, the major superior, can grant permission of celebrating outside a church and oratory upon a sacred stone and in a decent place, but never in a bedroom, only for a just and reasonable cause, in some extraordinary case and by way of an act (canon 822, § 4). It is said, however, never in a bedroom, that is, in a bedroom in which someone is actually lying sick.[3] For the rest, the said faculty must be interpreted restrictively.[4]

c) In order that Mass can be said at sea or on a river, a special indult of the Holy See is required, so that the privilege of an altar does not suffice (canon 822, § 3). The special indult belongs to Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church and to bishops (canon 239, § 1, 8; canon 349, § 1, 1).

The indult is customarily granted under this law: that the sea be so calm that no danger is present of spilling the sacred species from the chalice; that another priest, if present, assist; and that, if on the ship there is not a proper chapel or fixed altar, nevertheless the chosen place bear nothing indecent or unbecoming. Nor is celebration in cabins prohibited when all the circumstances remove dangers of irreverence.[5]

d) If necessity urges, and recourse cannot be had to the Ordinary, it is lawful by epikeia to celebrate anywhere, even in the open air, provided the place has nothing unbecoming. Necessity urges, for example, if a church has collapsed and a Sunday or feast still in force as a day of precept is at hand; if an army is in camp and Mass must be heard from precept; if otherwise Viaticum cannot be administered, etc. (St. Alphonsus, VI, 356, 359).

[1] Oratories, both semi-public and private, must be reserved for divine worship alone and free from all domestic uses (canon 1196, § 2).

[2] Constitution Decet Romanum Pontificem, 3 May 1575.

[3] Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, 23 December 1912.

[4] Pontifical Commission, 16 October 1919, ad 12 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1919, p. 478). Then the Sacred Congregation for the Discipline of the Sacraments, in its letters to the Ordinaries of Italy, 26 July 1924, declared that this just and reasonable cause must be taken from the good of divine worship and the spiritual good of souls (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1924, p. 370). From the response of the same Sacred Congregation, 3 May 1926, the Ordinary also cannot permit celebration at home, with the corpse present in a place commonly called camera ardente, except in some extraordinary case, when a just and reasonable cause exists. Such an extraordinary case together with a just and reasonable cause, according to the response of the same Sacred Congregation, is had on the occasion of the death of the local Ordinary or of a person from a princely family, or otherwise distinguished because of merits and good deeds toward the Church or the state, or because of most munificent largesses to the poor and needy. In this case, provided that the due obsequies are always fulfilled in the church, the Ordinary can permit the celebration of one or another Mass, but not more than three Masses, the indult of the Sacred Congregation of Rites of 29 April 1894 having been abrogated (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1926, p. 388). Thus Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 232.

[5] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, 1 March 1902, compared with 13 March 1902.

247 IV. Places in which Mass cannot be celebrated. Mass cannot be celebrated in the temple of heretics or schismatics, even if it was formerly rightly consecrated or blessed (canon 823, § 1); nor in an execrated, violated, or interdicted church or public oratory, until it has again been consecrated or blessed or reconciled, or the interdict has ceased (canons 822; 1170; 1173, § 1; and 2270, § 1, compared with canon 1191, § 1).

1. Execration is had when the holiness of a church or public oratory, inhering in it from dedication, is lost. This, with canon 1170 considered and explained, happens: 1. when the whole building is simultaneously destroyed or collapses; 2. when the greater part of the walls is simultaneously destroyed or collapses; 3. when the building is reduced by the local Ordinary to profane uses. But it does not happen: 1. when the plaster partly or entirely falls from the walls or is removed;[1] 2. when a part which is not the greater part collapses, for example only the roof or only the facade of the church; 3. when walls fall or are destroyed and restored at intervals, even if the whole church becomes new, provided, however, that the greater part does not fall or be destroyed at once (St. Alphonsus, VI, 367, 368).

Note. Once a church has been execrated, the title perishes, as does the recitation of the office and commemoration of the titular patron. An execrated church must again be consecrated or blessed as new.

2. Violation consists in this: that the holiness inhering in a church or public oratory is not indeed lost, but nevertheless is contaminated. This happens through certain criminal or at least very indecent acts. Moreover, "a church is violated only by the acts listed below, provided that they are certain, notorious, and placed in the church itself: 1. the crime of homicide; 2. injurious and grave shedding of blood; 3. impious or sordid uses to which the church has been assigned; 4. the burial of an infidel or of an excommunicated person after a declaratory or condemnatory sentence" (canon 1172, § 1). See these things set forth in vol. I, n. 616. Now:

a) In a violated church, before it is reconciled, it is forbidden to celebrate divine offices (canon 1173, § 1); moreover, a violated church must be reconciled as quickly as possible (canon 1174, § 1).

b) The rector of the same church or any priest with at least the presumed consent of the rector can reconcile a blessed church (canon 1176, § 1). The valid reconciliation of a consecrated church belongs to the bishop or, if it belongs to an exempt clerical religious institute, to the major superior; each can delegate another priest for this (canon 1176, § 2, compared with canon 1156). In a case of grave and urgent necessity, if the Ordinary cannot be approached, it is permitted to the rector of a consecrated church to reconcile the same church, after the Ordinary has afterward been informed (canon 1176, § 3).

c) The reconciliation of a blessed church can be done with common holy water; but the reconciliation of a consecrated church should be done with water blessed for this according to liturgical laws, which nevertheless not only bishops but also the priests who reconcile the church can bless (canon 1177).

3. An interdict of a church, insofar as it prevents the celebration of Mass, is explained in the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties.

[1] Once the plaster has been renewed, the crosses made in testimony of consecration should again be painted or applied (Sacred Congregation of Rites, 4 May 1882, n. 3545).

Chapter III. On the Time of Offering

248 I. Days of oblation. The sacrifice of the Mass can be celebrated on all days, except those which are excluded by the priest's own rite (canon 820). Now, with the Latin rite considered:

1. On Thursday in the Supper of the Lord and on Holy Saturday, one Mass is permitted, and indeed only a solemn one. But:

a) If some feast of precept falls on Thursday in the Supper of the Lord, "it must be accurately provided by the local Ordinaries that on that day some private Masses, to be celebrated before the celebration of the customary conventual Mass, are not lacking for the fulfillment of the precept; but nevertheless for this reason the ancient custom of the Communion of the clergy in the solemn Mass of that day, on which the Church recalls the institution and memorial of the sacrament of the Most Holy Eucharist, retained until now with the greatest religious care, is in no way omitted."[1] If the feast is no longer of precept, it is not lawful to celebrate several Masses.[2]

b) Cardinals and, provided they are not bound to celebrate in the cathedral, bishops enjoy the privilege of celebrating, or of permitting another to celebrate before them, one Mass on Thursday of the greater week (canons 239, § 1, 4; 349, § 1, 1).

c) Among Regulars, if the solemn functions of the Greater Week are not performed, the superior can personally or through another celebrate a solemn or private Mass to administer Communion to the subjects, but in a domestic chapel or in a church with closed doors.[3] "Indeed," says Vermeersch, "although the solemn functions are held, writers concede that on the same day one Mass may be read in the oratory or in the church with closed doors, for the convenience of the sick. And it is clear from the privilege which Gregory XVI granted to the Province of the Society of Jesus which was then called Upper Germany, 4 December 1841."[4]

d) It is fitting that on Thursday of the greater week all clerics, even priests who abstain from offering the sacred rite on that day, be refreshed with the Most Holy Body of Christ in the solemn or conventual Mass (canon 862).

2. On the day of Parasceve, Mass cannot be celebrated unless it would be necessary for confecting Viaticum; in that case the Mass of the Passion of the Lord should be taken. But the Mass which is called the Mass of the Presanctified is not a sacrifice.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 13 September 1692, n. 1883; 10 January 1693, ad VI, n. 1890.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 26 September 1868, n. 3179.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 31 August 1839, n. 2799.

[4] De religiosis institutis et personis, vol. I, n. 467.

249 II. Hour of oblation. 1. Object of the precept. The beginning of a Mass to be celebrated should not take place earlier than one hour before dawn or later than one hour after noon (canon 821, § 1). Dawn, or morning twilight, begins generally when the sun enters the eighteenth degree below the horizon. It differs according to different regions, insofar as they approach the pole more or less; generally it begins two hours before sunrise, but more than two hours before sunrise in northern regions, for there dawn is prolonged for a longer time. For the rest, tables inserted into calendars are accustomed to indicate the hour of dawn. Where dawn does not appear through some time of the year, it is lawful during that time to begin Mass from the beginning of civil, moral, and usual life, that is, at the time when people are accustomed to rise in the morning for work.[1] The same seems to be applicable to the time when dawn is very late in some regions. Finally, where dawn endures through the whole night during some part of the year, it seems lawful to begin at midnight. Nevertheless, it is not becoming to begin before the second morning hour, because the Church scarcely ever grants the faculty of beginning earlier. Exceptions from the ordinary rule are:

a) On the night of the Nativity of the Lord, only the conventual or parochial Mass can be begun at midnight, but not another without apostolic indult (canon 821, § 2).

b) Nevertheless, in all religious or pious houses having an oratory with the faculty of habitually reserving the Most Holy Eucharist, on the night of the Nativity of the Lord, one priest can celebrate the three ritual Masses, or, with the things to be observed being observed, only one Mass which may also avail for satisfaction of the precept for all those present, and can administer Holy Communion to those requesting it (canon 821, § 3). Moreover, the Holy Office, 26 November 1908, declared that the said Masses cannot be celebrated with the doors of the oratories open, nor in churches which serve the public use of the faithful people.

c) Cardinals and, provided they are not bound to celebrate in the cathedral, bishops enjoy the privilege of celebrating, or of permitting another to celebrate before them, three Masses on the night of the Nativity of the Lord (canons 239, § 1, n. 4; 349, § 1, n. 1).

d) It is disputed whether privileges granted to Regulars before the Council of Trent have been revoked. But the dispute is merely theoretical, since "today, from a privilege granted to the Congregation of the Purity erected at Naples, Regulars can always and everywhere celebrate two hours before dawn and after noon."[2] Likewise Gregory XVI, by his rescript of 13 May 1838, granted that the Superior General of the Society of Jesus could give the faculty to missionaries that, whether for the sake of a journey or for the sake of devotion, "for themselves or for the people, or for the sake of giving Communion to the faithful waiting, they may celebrate at the second hour after midnight."[3]

2. Gravity of the precept. The obligation of the precept is grave from its genus, as is gathered both from the Council of Trent[4] and from the Constitution of St. Pius V In Christo Pater.[5] Moreover, it would be a grave sin, without proportionate reason, to begin Mass one hour earlier or later than is lawful by law or privilege.

3. Causes for anticipating or deferring Mass are:

a) That Viaticum may be given to a dying person; in this case no hour is excepted.

b) An existing reasonable custom, for example that workers and servants may be able to hear the sacred rite very early in the morning; likewise, if on a feast day a solemn Mass is extended an hour and more beyond noon, it is lawful, if there is a custom, to celebrate a private Mass after the solemn sacred rite, lest a part of the people be without Mass.

c) A reasonable cause, for example a journey to be made, excuses if there is question of anticipating or deferring Mass briefly, for example by half an hour.

d) Finally, a bishop and the major superior of exempt clerical religious can dispense themselves and their subjects in an urgent case (canon 81; St. Alphonsus, VI, 343 and 344), indeed, as it seems, also from a just cause.[6]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 2 November 1634, n. 614.

[2] Compendium Privilegiorum Piorum Operariorum, part 2, chapter 5, § 7.

[3] Thus Gaude, Opera Moralia S. Alphonsi, book VI, n. 342, note.

[4] Session 22, Decree concerning the things to be observed and avoided.

[5] 29 March 1566.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 7 July 1899, n. 4044, ad IV.

Chapter IV. On the Rite of Offering

Article I. On the Altar and its Ornament

In order that Mass be celebrated according to the prescribed rite, the following are required:

250 I. An altar, and that consecrated (canon 822, § 1). Now either the whole altar must be consecrated, if there is question of an immovable altar, or only the portable altar-stone, if there is question of a movable altar (canon 1199, § 1). Moreover, per se Mass must be celebrated on an altar of the proper rite; but when such an altar is lacking, it is lawful for a priest to celebrate according to his own rite on an altar consecrated for another Catholic rite, but not upon the antimensions of the Greeks (canon 823, § 2).[1] Finally, on papal altars no one may celebrate without apostolic indult (canon 823, § 3). With these things summarily noted, several things about the altar must be noted.

1. Notion of an altar. In the liturgical sense it is understood: 1. by the name of an immovable or fixed altar, the upper table together with the supports consecrated with it as one thing; 2. by the name of a movable or portable altar, a stone, usually small, which alone is consecrated and which is also called a portable altar-stone or sacred stone; or the same stone together with a support which nevertheless was not consecrated together with it (canon 1197, § 1).

In a consecrated church at least one altar, especially the major altar, must be immovable; but in a blessed church all altars can be movable (canon 1197, § 2).

2. Construction of an altar. a) Both the immovable table and the sacred stone should consist of one natural stone, whole and not friable (canon 1198, § 1).

b) In an immovable altar the stone slab or table must extend to the whole altar and suitably cohere with the support; the support should be of stone, or at least the sides or little columns by which the table is supported should be of stone (canon 1198, § 2).

c) The sacred stone should be so large that it holds at least the host and the greater part of the chalice (canon 1198, § 3).

d) Both in an immovable altar and in a sacred stone there should be, according to the norm of liturgical laws, a sepulcher containing relics of Saints, closed with stone (canon 1198, § 4). Concerning this, observe that for due consecration it is required that relics from the bodies of at least two martyrs be deposited in the sepulcher, and that these be enclosed with a stone cover. Nevertheless, for the validity of consecration the relics of only one martyr suffice.[2] For the rest, relics of other Saints can be added.

3. Consecration of an altar. Portable altar-stones can be consecrated validly and licitly by Cardinals (canon 239, § 1, 20), all bishops (canon 1199, § 2), vicars and prefects apostolic within the limits of their territory and while their office endures (canon 294, § 2), and abbots and prelates nullius (canon 323, § 2). Immovable altars can be validly consecrated by the same persons who validly consecrate portable altar-stones, excepting, however, vicars and prefects apostolic who lack the episcopal character. In order that they act licitly, the Ordinary of the territory must grant permission, with the right of Cardinals to consecrate altars of their own title remaining firm (canons 1155; 1199, § 2). The consecration of an immovable altar, which is done without the dedication of a church, although it can be done on any day, is nevertheless more fittingly done on a Sunday or another feast of precept (canon 1199, § 3).

4. Execration of an altar. a) An immovable altar loses consecration if the slab or table is separated from the support even for a moment of time; in this case the Ordinary can permit a presbyter to perform the consecration of the altar again with the shorter rite and formula (canon 1200, § 1). It is not execrated if the table, not separated from the support, is transferred to another church or to another place of the same church.[3]

b) Both an immovable altar and a sacred stone lose consecration: 1. if they are broken enormously, whether by reason of the quantity of the fracture or by reason of the place of anointing (canon 1200, § 2, 1), but not if they are merely scraped; 2. if the relics are removed or the cover of the sepulcher is broken or removed, except in the case in which the bishop himself or his delegate removes the cover in order to secure, repair, or replace it, or to inspect the relics. But a slight fracture of the cover does not induce execration, and any priest can secure a little crack with cement (canon 1200, § 2, 2 and 3).

c) The execration of a church does not carry with it the execration of altars, whether immovable or movable; and conversely (canon 1200, § 4).

5. The title of an altar. a) Just as a church, so any altar of a church, at least an immovable one, should have its own title. The primary title of the major altar must be the same as the title of the church (canon 1201, §§ 1 and 2).

b) Altars cannot be dedicated to Blessed persons, even in churches and oratories to which their office and Mass have been granted, without an indult of the Apostolic See (canon 1201, § 4).

c) With the permission of the Ordinary, the title of a movable altar can indeed be changed, but not the title of an immovable altar (canon 1201, § 3).

6. Necessity of an altar. The precept of consecrating on a consecrated and not execrated altar is grave.[4] Moreover, according to some it is never lawful to celebrate outside an altar; according to others this is lawful in a most grave necessity, for example for confecting Viaticum, because, they say, the precept of receiving Viaticum is divine, while the prohibition of celebrating outside an altar is ecclesiastical.

7. Things to be noted. a) The altar-stone, that is, the portable altar-stone or sacred stone, must be inserted in an altar made of wood or of another material.[5]

b) Both an immovable and a movable altar must be reserved only for divine offices and especially for the celebration of Mass, any profane use being altogether excluded (canon 1202, § 1).

c) No corpse should be hidden under the altar; but corpses which perhaps are buried near the altar should be distant from it by a space of at least one meter. Otherwise it is not lawful to celebrate Mass on the altar until the corpse is removed (canon 1202, § 2).

[1] An antimension is a consecrated cloth in which there are relics, and which, spread upon any table, can be used for saying Mass.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 16 February 1906, n. 4180, ad III.

[3] The decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites, 3 September 1879, n. 3504, ad I, which is opposed, seems to speak of the transfer of the table alone, separated from the support.

[4] Roman Missal, General Rubrics, title XX; De defectibus, title X, n. 1.

[5] Roman Missal, loc. cit.

251 II. Three altar cloths - or two, one of which is doubled - blessed by the bishop or by another having the faculty; this faculty belongs to the same persons who enjoy the faculty of blessing sacred vestments (n. 266). The altar cloths must be made of linen or hemp.[1] The upper cloth should be long, descending to the floor on both sides; the custom of using a shorter cloth cannot be observed.[2]

It is a grave sin to celebrate without any altar cloth; nevertheless this is lawful in grave necessity. The other things oblige under venial sin, for example the precept of using several cloths, of using blessed cloths, etc. Hence a respectively just cause excuses from every sin (St. Alphonsus, VI, 375).

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 18 May 1819, n. 2600.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 9 June 1899, n. 4029, ad I.

252 III. A cross with the image of the Crucified, placed between the candlesticks and projecting in such a way "that the celebrating priest and the people assisting at the Sacrifice can easily and conveniently look upon the same Crucifix; which cannot happen if only a small cross is displayed."[1] Another cross is not required if there is a large statue of the Crucified on the altar, or if the image of the Crucified is painted on the altar panel as holding the first place;[2] nor is a blessed cross prescribed.[3] If the Most Holy Sacrament is exposed, a cross can be used or not used, according as custom bears.[4] Finally, the use of placing the cross on the throne which serves for the public exposition of the Most Holy Sacrament cannot be tolerated.[5]

The obligation of using a cross is light.

[1] Constitution of Benedict XIV Accepimus, 16 July 1746; Sacred Congregation of Rites, 16 June 1663, n. 1270, and 17 September 1822, n. 2621.

[2] Constitution of Benedict XIV, cited.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 12 July 1704, n. 2143.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 2 September 1741, n. 2365.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 2 June 1883, n. 3576, ad III; 11 June 1904, n. 4136, ad II.

253 IV. Two lighted candles.[1] Besides this, according to the rubric,[2] near the altar a candle is to be prepared, to be lighted at the elevation of the sacrament; but a contrary custom can be observed. The candles must be made of wax.[3]

Nevertheless, to the question: "Whether, considering even the great difficulty either of having true beeswax or of eliminating improper mixtures with other wax, the candles to be placed upon altars must be wholly and entirely of beeswax; or whether they can be mixed with other material, whether vegetable or animal?" the Sacred Congregation of Rites[4] responded: "Considering the asserted difficulty, Negative to the first part; Affirmative to the second and according to the mind. The mind is that bishops should, according to their powers, take care that the paschal candle, the candle to be immersed in the baptismal water, and the two candles to be lighted at Masses be of beeswax, at least in the greatest part; but it is necessary that the material of the other candles which are to be placed upon altars be of the same wax in a greater or notable quantity. In this matter pastors and other rectors of churches and oratories will be able safely to stand by the norms handed down by their respective Ordinaries, nor are private priests who are going to celebrate Mass bound to inquire anxiously about the quality of the candles." Besides, the Sacred Congregation of Rites[5] granted to missionaries in Oceania that they might use candles made and formed from whale fat, which in those regions are called bougies a l'etoile.

The candles must be placed upon the altar, not fixed to a wall almost touching the altar.[6] For the rest, note:

a) Apart from an indult, by reason of some personal distinction it is not lawful for priests below a bishop - not even for the vicar general - to use more than two candles; by reason of some greater solemnity of a feast or Mass, it is lawful.[7]

b) It is a grave sin to celebrate without any light; this is lawful only by reason of administering Viaticum or by special permission. Likewise, it is more probably mortal to celebrate without any wax light, or with only lights from tallow or oil. Nevertheless this is lawful in a case of necessity, for example so that Viaticum may be administered or so that the people may hear Mass on a Sunday (St. Alphonsus, VI, 394, doubt 1). The other things oblige under venial sin; hence, for example, if two wax candles are lacking, it is lawful for a reasonable cause, even by reason only of devotion, to celebrate with one wax candle (St. Alphonsus, VI, 394).

c) If either light goes out during the celebration, the priest can continue while it is lighted again. If every light fails and no other can be had, if this happens after the consecration the Mass must be continued; but if before it, more probably it must be interrupted (St. Alphonsus, VI, 394).

d) It is illicit above or within the altar, besides wax candles, to use stearin candles,[8] gas illumination, or electric light.[9] Moreover, "electric light is forbidden not only together with wax candles upon altars, but also in place of candles or lamps"[10] which are prescribed before the Most Holy Sacrament or relics of Saints.[11] For other places of the church and other cases, electric illumination is permitted according to the prudent judgment of the Ordinary, provided that in all things the gravity which the holiness of the place and the dignity of the sacred liturgy demand is preserved. Nor is it lawful, during private or public exposition, to illuminate the interior part of the ciborium with electric lamps placed in that very interior part, so that the Most Holy Eucharist can be better seen by the faithful;[12] these things are also to be applied to stearin candles and gas illumination.

[1] Roman Missal, General Rubrics, title XX.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 9 June 1899, n. 4029, ad II.

[3] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 1.

[4] 14 December 1904, n. 4147.

[5] 7 September 1850, n. 2985.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 16 September 1865, n. 3137.

[7] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 12 September 1857, ad IX, n. 3059.

[8] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 4 September 1875, n. 3376.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 4 June 1895, n. 3859; 16 May 1902, n. 4097; 22 November 1907, n. 4206; 17 January 1908, n. 4210, ad I; Secretariat of State to the bishops of Italy, 3 October 1923.

[10] Namely, so that it is substituted in their place.

[11] Namely, on the occasion of their solemn exposition.

[12] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 24 June 1914, n. 4322.

254 V. An antependium; namely, from the rubric:[1] "The altar is also to be adorned with a frontal of the color, as far as possible, corresponding to the feast day or office." It is required more probably under venial sin, unless the altar is of marble or another precious material, or has the form of a tomb (St. Alphonsus, VI, 395). No determinate material is prescribed, nor is it required that it be blessed. There are also those who judge that, from custom, celebration can take place without an antependium.

[1] General Rubrics, title XX.

Article II. On Sacred Vessels with Accessories

255 The following are required:

I. Chalice and paten; both of which must be consecrated.[1]

1. Matter. The chalice must be gold or silver, at least as regards the cup;[2] by reason of poverty one made of tin is permitted,[3] and, under certain conditions, one made of aluminum mixed with other metals;[4] but not one of bronze, glass, or wood. The cup, unless it is gold, must be gilded under grave obligation (canon 1305, § 2). As regards the form of the chalice, the Sacred Congregation of Rites[5] prescribed: "let them not differ from the traditional forms, because of the danger of spilling the sacred species and of exciting astonishment."

The paten should be of the same material as the chalice,[6] and unless it is gold, it must be gilded under grave obligation (canon 1305, § 2).

2. Consecration. Chalices and patens can be consecrated by: 1. Cardinals (canon 239, § 1, 20); 2. bishops (canon 1147, § 1); 3. vicars and prefects apostolic, but if they lack the episcopal character, only within the limits of their territory and while their office endures (canon 294, § 2); 4. abbots and prelates nullius, but if they are not adorned with the episcopal character, only for their churches (canon 323, § 2).

a) They lose consecration: 1. if they have undergone such injuries or changes that they have lost their former form and are no longer held suitable for their uses (canon 1305, § 1, 1), for example when a chalice is pierced in the bottom or near the bottom; when the cup is separated from the foot, unless the chalice is turnable; when it is broken or struck in such a way that it can no longer decently serve the sacrifice. They lose consecration, 2. if they have been used for indecorous uses or exposed to public sale (canon 1305, § 1, 2).

b) They do not lose consecration because of the wearing away or renewal of the gilding, with the grave obligation of gilding them again remaining safe, however, in the former case (canon 1305, § 2).

3. It is a grave sin to celebrate without a chalice or paten, likewise without consecrated ones, likewise with a chalice or paten made from prohibited material or not gilded (cf. canon 1305, § 2).

4. It is an abuse to execrate sacred vessels before they are handed over to an artisan to be repaired or recast.[7]

[1] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, title I, n. 1.

[2] Roman Missal, loc. cit.

[3] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 1.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 9 December 1866 (Acta Sanctae Sedis VI, p. 590).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 30 June 1922 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1922, p. 437).

[6] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, title I, n. 1; De defectibus, title X, n. 1.

[7] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 20 April 1822, n. 2620.

256 II. A blessed corporal.[1] It must be made of linen or hemp.[2] It is a grave sin to celebrate: 1. without a corporal; 2. without a blessed corporal; 3. with an enormously unclean corporal (St. Alphonsus, VI, 387). Grave necessity of celebrating excuses, for example so that the people may hear a Mass of precept. If it is not very unclean, strange priests are excused.

[1] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, title I, n. 1.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 18 May 1819, n. 2600. From this decree it is clear that linen and hemp are equated.

257 III. A blessed pall,[1] made of linen or hemp; nevertheless it is lawful to use a pall covered on the upper part with silk, or with gold or silver interwoven and embroidered, provided the upper material is not black and does not represent signs of death.[2]

To the question: "From the decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites n. 3832, Resolution of Doubts, 17 July 1894, ad IV, it is permitted that the chalice pall on the upper part be covered with silk cloth, or with gold or silver, and embroidered, provided that the linen pall joined beneath covers the chalice and that the upper part is not black nor with any sign of death. It is asked: Can this pall joined beneath be a linen cloth furnished with a cross and sewn beneath, after the manner of a pall, and not removable?" the Sacred Congregation of Rites responded: "Negative, and the pall joined beneath, properly so called, should be linen, clean, and easily removable."[3]

The pall, and likewise its blessing, are sufficiently probably prescribed only under light obligation. If it is lacking, the chalice should be covered with the purificator, burse, or corporal (St. Alphonsus, VI, 388).

[1] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, title I, n. 1.

[2] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, loc. cit., compared with Sacred Congregation of Rites, 17 July 1894, ad 4, n. 3832.

[3] 24 November 1905, n. 4174.

258 IV. A purificator; this can be blessed, but need not be.[1] If a purificator cannot easily be had, in its place a small towel can be used, which afterward is not to be used for another use (St. Alphonsus, VI, 389).

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 7 September 1816, n. 2572, ad XII.

259 V. The chalice veil is required under venial sin; it can be blessed, but need not be.[1] If it is not had, it is lawful to celebrate without it (St. Alphonsus, VI, 395).

[1] Roman Missal, General Rubrics, title 20.

260 VI. The burse and hand towel, which likewise can be blessed, but need not be.[1] It is fitting to use these (St. Alphonsus, VI, 390).

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 28 April 1866, n. 3149.

261 VII. A small spoon, by which water is placed into the chalice, can be used. It does not need a blessing, and can be made from any material.

262 VIII. Cruets per se must be glass,[1] but by legitimate custom gold and silver ones are permitted;[2] it is fitting to bless them.

[1] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, title I, n. 1.

[2] Roman Missal, loc. cit.

263 IX. A little bell, by which a sign is given, is prescribed under venial sin.

264 Note 1. The blessings about which there was mention above can be imparted by the same persons who enjoy the faculty of blessing sacred vestments (n. 266).

Note 2. Some have erroneously judged that vessels and other things do not need consecration or blessing if they have been used in the celebration of the sacrifice before they were consecrated or blessed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 380).

265 Question 1. To whom is it lawful to touch sacred vessels and sacred linens?

Response 1. While they contain the Holy Eucharist, they are licitly touched only by priests and deacons. To others this is prohibited under grave sin, except in a case of necessity.

Response 2. While they do not actually contain the Holy Eucharist, canon 1306, § 1 should be considered: "Care should be taken that the chalice with the paten, and before washing the purificators, palls, and corporals which have been used in the sacrifice of the Mass, not be touched except by clerics or by those who have custody of them."

The canon regards: 1. chalices and patens, as soon as they have been consecrated; 2. purificators, palls, and corporals that have been used and not afterward washed; 3. by parity of reason, ciboria and lunules that have been used, that is, after they have in fact touched the Holy Eucharist; but not ostensories, since they do not immediately touch the Holy Eucharist.

The canon permits touching: 1. to clerics; 2. to those who have custody of these things, such as sacristans, both men and women. Nevertheless, to others it is prohibited at most under venial sin; and a just cause excuses (St. Alphonsus, VI, 382).

Question 2. What things are to be observed as regards the washing of linens used in Mass?

Response. Three washings are prescribed. The first cannot be done except by a cleric constituted in major orders. The second and third, however, can also be done by laypersons. The water of the first washing should be put into the sacrarium or, if this is lacking, into the fire (canon 1306, § 2). For the rest, the first washing is prohibited at most under venial sin, so that a reasonable cause excuses (St. Alphonsus, VI, 387).

Article III. On Sacred Vestments, Etc

266 I. Sacred vestments, considered according to their importance, are distinguished into greater and lesser. The greater are the alb, chasuble, and more probably also the stole and maniple. The lesser are the amice and cincture (St. Alphonsus, VI, 377). The following things are to be explained:

1. The existence and object of the precept. "A priest about to celebrate Mass," says canon 811, § 1, "shall wear a becoming garment reaching to the ankles and the sacred ornaments prescribed by the rubrics of his rite." If such a garment cannot be had, for example by an outsider, there is an excusing reason. As regards the sacred ornaments, the amice, alb, cincture, stole, maniple, and chasuble are prescribed. Therefore the sacred vestments should be:

a) Made of the due material; likewise entire, becoming, clean, and beautiful.[1] As regards the material, the amice and alb should be of linen or hemp.[2] The cincture, without another material being reprobated, can be woolen,[3] also silken, but more fittingly[4] linen; it should not be a band but a cord.[5] The stole, maniple, and chasuble, although they need not be made of silk, should nevertheless be made of precious material, not of cotton, linen, or wool; a semi-silk or silk-threaded material suffices.[6]

b) Made according to the customary form. The Sacred Congregation of Rites declared that "it is not lawful, in making and using vestments for the sacrifice of the Mass and sacred functions, to depart from the usage received in the Church, and to introduce another mode and form, even an ancient one."

c) Blessed.[7] The blessing can be imparted by: 1. all Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church and all bishops; 2. local Ordinaries lacking episcopal character, for the churches and oratories of their own territory; 3. the pastor for churches and oratories situated in the territory of his parish, and rectors of churches for their own churches; 4. priests delegated by the local Ordinary, within the limits of the delegation and of the jurisdiction of the one delegating; 5. religious superiors - and therefore even non-exempt superiors - and priests of the same religion delegated by them, for their own churches and oratories and for the churches of nuns subject to them (canon 1304).

A sacred vestment loses its blessing: 1. if it has undergone such injuries or changes that it has lost its former form, and is no longer held suitable for its uses (canon 1305, § 1, 1); and this is valid even if one vestment is made from another. Therefore the blessing is lost if the cincture is so broken that neither part suffices for girding the minister, if the alb loses a sleeve, if a maniple is made from a stole, etc. A sacred vestment loses its blessing, 2. if it has been used for indecorous uses or exposed to public sale (canon 1305, § 1, 2).

2. The gravity of the precept. a) It is mortal to celebrate without any sacred vestment; indeed, not even the ministering of Viaticum is held to be an excusing cause. It is disputed whether fear of death excuses, scandal and contempt being excluded (St. Alphonsus, VI, 377).[8] Likewise it is grave to celebrate without any blessed sacred vestment.

b) It is also mortal to celebrate without an alb or chasuble, or with them unblessed; likewise to celebrate without a stole and without a maniple, or with them unblessed. A most grave cause would excuse, for example lest a dying person lack Viaticum (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

c) More probably it is mortal to celebrate without a stole or without a maniple, or with either one unblessed. The reason is that the aforesaid vestments seem, according to the mind of the Church, to be numbered among the greater; and this mind of the Church is evident both from the doctrine of the ancient theologians, who rather commonly hold the aforesaid vestments as greater, and from the fact that, just like the chasuble, they must be made from precious material. Nevertheless a grave cause excuses, for example that the people may hear the prescribed Mass (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

d) It is light to celebrate without an amice or cincture. A just cause excuses, for example "fervor of devotion or the opportunity of alms for a priest who is not wealthy" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

e) The color assigned by the rubrics is of precept, as is clear both from what is to be said about rubrics in general (n. 270), and from responses of the Sacred Congregation of Rites.[9] The obligation, however, apart from grave scandal, is light, so that a just cause excuses; indeed, as St. Alphonsus (VI, 378, doubt 5) teaches with Sporer, it is better "on any day whatever to say Mass in any color whatever than to omit it."

3. Things to be noted. a) Besides sacred vestments, it is prescribed that the priest about to celebrate Mass wear a becoming garment reaching to the ankles (canon 811, § 1). Moreover, he should be shod.[10] The shoes should be such as approved clerics of the diocese commonly use in public.[11] "For this, however, it suffices that he be dressed in slippers commonly called pianelle or pantofele" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 402).

b) He should abstain from the skullcap and ring, unless he is a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, a bishop, or a blessed abbot, or unless an apostolic indult permits him to use them in celebrating Mass (canon 811, § 2).

Moreover, it would be mortal to use the skullcap throughout the whole Mass; outside the Canon, however, it is venial, scandal nevertheless being excluded. Hence it is not "illicit to celebrate without a dispensation with the skullcap (except during the Canon and with scandal set aside) for a reasonable cause, if it is evident to those standing by the celebration, for example because of the priest's old age or the coldness of the place, so that one could not celebrate with head uncovered without notable inconvenience" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 397, doubt 1).

c) The use of artificial hair is illicit.[12] Authors note, however, that this prohibition has become obsolete in many regions.

d) To no celebrating priest, except bishops and other prelates enjoying the use of pontificals, is it lawful, solely for the sake of honor or solemnity, to have an assisting priest (canon 812).

[1] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, title II, n. 1.

[2] Linen and hemp are equated (n. 257).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 23 December 1862, n. 3118.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 22 January 1701, n. 2067.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 24 November 1899, n. 4048.

[6] Cf. Ephemerides liturgicae I, 24, 32; 9 December 1925 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1926, p. 58).

[7] Roman Missal, Rite of Mass, title II, n. 2; De defectibus, title X, n. 1.

[8] Cf. Constitution of Benedict XIV, Aestas anni, 11 October 1828†.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 10 December 1829, n. 2675; 12 November 1831, ad 5, n. 2682.

[10] Roman Missal, Rite to be observed, title I, n. 2.

[11] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 31 August 1872, n. 3268, ad 3.

[12] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 4 April 1699, n. 2027, ad 5; indeed it was prohibited by Innocent XI under pain of suspension (in St. Alphonsus, VI, 388).

267 II. The Missal is required, although the priest should know by memory the Mass which he intends to say;[1] indeed, considering the danger of erring gravely, it is commonly prescribed under grave obligation. Nevertheless, rather probably one celebrating without a Missal does not sin gravely "if he could not easily have one and, because of past experience, the moral danger of erring were absent. Hence they probably infer that a priest celebrates licitly who, because of weakness of sight, recites the Mass from memory, provided that, to avoid notice, he has the Missal on the altar, or another book in its place" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 390).

[1] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 1.

268 III. A cushion or small lectern for the Missal, and the altar cards of the secrets, are not of precept; nevertheless they are fittingly used.

269 IV. A server assisting at Mass is required, and indeed a male. If a man is lacking, a woman can be employed for a just cause, under this law, however, that she answer from a distance and in no way approach the altar (canon 813). Even devotion alone involves a just cause for employing a woman. When the case occurs, however, everything required for the sacrifice should first be conveniently arranged (St. Alphonsus, VI, 392, doubt 2).[1] Moreover:

1. It is mortal to celebrate without any server; nevertheless a grave cause excuses, for example the necessity of ministering Viaticum; likewise, more probably, that the people may hear a Mass of precept. Besides this, rather probably, "once Mass has begun, especially if the oblation has been made, the celebrant is permitted to proceed without a server if the latter has gone away and is not going to return shortly" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 391, doubt 1). Indeed, since nowadays celebration without a server is easily conceded if no one can be found, and this even on a weekday and without a woman answering from afar, therefore, if unexpectedly a priest in a particular case lacks a server, it seems that permission can be presumed even by reason of devotion alone.

2. It is also mortal to employ a woman who ministers immediately; nor does grave necessity excuse, because it is preferable to celebrate without a server than with a woman immediately ministering.

3. It is more easily lawful to celebrate with a server who does not know how to answer than without a server; not, however, so easily as with a woman answering from afar. For the rest, "let the celebrant not make a scruple if the server pronounces badly, nor easily correct errors, lest he disturb himself or those standing around or the order of the Mass, although Croix with Gobat admonishes that the celebrant should supply what has been omitted by the server" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 391).

[1] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, 27 August 1836, n. 2745, ad 8; 18 March 1899, n. 4015, ad 6.

Article IV. On Rubrics to Be Observed

Canon 818 states: "Any contrary custom being reprobated, the celebrating priest shall accurately and devoutly observe the rubrics of his ritual books, and shall take care not to add other ceremonies or prayers at his own discretion." And canon 819: "The sacrifice of the Mass is to be celebrated in the liturgical language of each one's rite approved by the Church." Therefore Mass in general is to be celebrated according to the rite or rubrics assigned by the Church in the Roman Missal. But authors disagree somewhat about the solution of the question, which rite or which rubrics are in fact prescribed. Hence the matter must be explained more fully:

I. The object of the precept; concerning which the following points seem to be established.

270

1. The rubrics to be observed within Mass are preceptive. This assertion, which more recent authors commonly admit, is clear from the Council of Trent;[1] likewise from the Bull Quo primum tempore of St. Pius V,[2] placed at the beginning of the Roman Missal: "commanding and strictly enjoining upon all... in virtue of holy obedience, that they sing and read Mass according to the rite, manner, and norm which are now handed down by Us through this Missal, and that in the celebration of Mass they not presume to add or recite other ceremonies or prayers than those which are contained in this Missal." Canon 818 is added to this. The opinion which excepts certain lesser things is scarcely reconcilable with the words cited (St. Alphonsus, VI, 399).

2. It is disputed whether the rubrics to be observed outside Mass, that is, before or after Mass, are preceptive or merely directive. Moreover, with St. Alphonsus (VI, 399) and most more recent authors, it seems that one must say that they are generally merely directive, unless they present those things which are obligatory from the nature of the matter. The reason is that the Bull cited speaks only of rubrics to be observed in the celebration of Mass, and canon 818 speaks only of the celebrating priest.

3. In particular it is disputed - even among those who admit the assertions under 1 and 2 - whether the following are truly prescribed or not:[3]

a) The prayers assigned before Mass in the Roman Missal. Rather commonly, and rightly, it is denied that they are truly prescribed, because they are said to be "to be said according to the opportunity of the priest" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 410, doubt 2). The same must be said of the prayers assigned after Mass.

b) The washing of hands before Mass. This seems truly to be prescribed, namely by reason of reverence toward the sacrifice, and in view both of its spiritual signification (namely, of spiritual cleanness) and of the precept given in the Old Law. It obliges under venial sin; but from the nature of the matter under grave sin, if the hands are very unclean. After Mass, however, it can be omitted, since it is not prescribed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 409).

c) The prayers to be recited while the vestments are being put on. More commonly they teach that these are truly prescribed, because they seem morally to pertain to Mass (St. Alphonsus, VI, 410, doubt 2).

d) The canticle Benedicite. Some affirm that it is imposed, because in the Order of Mass it is said: "The priest says"; but rather probably it is not truly prescribed, because by the rubric of the Roman Missal[4] it is equated with the other prayers assigned after Mass (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 410, doubt 2).

4. The Ceremonial of Bishops obliges just as the Roman Missal does. This is clear both from the three Bulls prefixed to it and from the declaration of the Sacred Congregation of Rites[5] (St. Alphonsus, Examen ordinandorum, n. 112).
5. Responses of the Sacred Congregation of Rites present obligation if they regard rubrics to be observed within Mass; otherwise they are merely directive, unless the contrary is to be drawn from the tenor.
6. As regards custom against the rubrics, note:

a) Any custom contrary to the rubrics is reprobated (canon 818), and therefore is not reasonable (canon 27, § 2); nevertheless, when circumstances have changed, more probably it can become reasonable (vol. I, n. 194).

b) Custom cannot derogate from rubrics contained in liturgical books by way of prescription; but it can by way of connivance, or by force of the legislator's personal consent (vol. I, n. 193). Besides this, a usage contrary to the rubrics can be tolerated until it can conveniently be removed by the bishop (vol. I, n. 193). If a decree of the Sacred Congregation of Rites contrary to the custom is added, the custom is of itself abrogated;[6] if it cannot conveniently be removed, the Ordinary should propose the matter to the Sacred Congregation and await the response.

[1] Session 6, canon 13; session 22, decree on what is to be observed and avoided.

[2] 12 July 1570.

[3] On the recitation of Matins with Lauds before Mass, see the treatise on the duties of clerics, n. 2.

[4] Rite to be observed, title XII, n. 6.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 8 January 1904 (Acta Sanctae Sedis XXXVI, p. 428).

[6] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 17 August 1894, n. 3839.

Article IV. On Rubrics to Be Observed

271 II. The gravity of the precept. The precept or obligation of rubrics that are truly preceptive is grave from its genus. But the gravity of the matter must be judged not only from the quantity but also from the quality of the rites, as will be clearer from the corollaries. Moreover, one can sin against the precept by omission, addition, change, breaking off, and interruption.

1. Omission. Concerning this, notice with St. Alphonsus (VI, 404 sq.): 1. that the ordinary parts, that is, those which occur in every Mass (such as the principal prayers, Epistle, Gospel, etc.), oblige more gravely than the extraordinary parts (such as the Gloria, Creed, Commemorations); 2. that among the ordinary parts, those oblige more gravely which must be said or performed within the Canon, especially from the Consecration to Communion. With these points noted, with the Doctor mentioned we resolve:

a) It is grave to omit an essential or integral part; the Confession with the other prayers to be said at the foot of the altar; the Epistle; the Gospel; the principal prayers; the mixing of water in the chalice; the oblation of the bread and wine; the Preface; the Pater noster; the Libera nos; the breaking of the host and the mixing of it with the Blood; the purification of the chalice after Communion. Likewise in the Canon it is grave to omit any prayer whatever; or to change its words so that the sense is varied; or to omit some word such that, once it is removed, the remaining words do not make sense; or to omit, for example, ten names of Saints; or finally to omit several extraordinary parts together (St. Alphonsus, VI, 404, 405).

b) It is light to omit the washing of hands before Mass with the accompanying prayers; the prayers to be said while the priest clothes himself in the sacred vestments; the Psalm Judica; Kyrie; Gloria; Creed; Commemorations; or, in place of the proper Preface, Communicantes, or Hanc igitur, to take the said prayers as they occur in the common (St. Alphonsus, VI, 409).

c) An omitted part must always be supplied when it belongs to the essence or integrity of the Mass; likewise the mixing of water in the chalice, if it is noticed before the Consecration. For the rest, one who by error or forgetfulness has omitted something: if indeed it is light, should proceed; if it is grave and the error is noticed shortly afterward, that is, after a few words, he should resume what was omitted. Hence the Gloria or Creed are not to be resumed if the following prayers have already been begun; nor the Epistle, Gospel, Preface, or Communicantes, if he has taken one for another, unless, for example, he detects the error from the beginning of the false Epistle (St. Alphonsus, VI, 403).

2. Addition. a) It is a grave sin to add anything with the intention of introducing a new rite; likewise - even without the aforesaid intention - to add something notable (St. Alphonsus, VI, 411).

b) It is light to add: 1. a collect,[1] Gloria, Creed, Pater, Ave, or something similar; 2. at the elevation, even in a low voice, certain pious words;[2] otherwise, if it is done only mentally; 3. while the Gloria and Creed are being sung in Mass, to recite a canonical Hour from a book[3] (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.).

3. Change. It is light: 1. scandal being excluded, to change the office, that is, to celebrate a Mass which cannot be celebrated on that day; 2. not to sing in solemn Mass the things which are prescribed to be sung; 3. to pronounce the words in a voice other than that prescribed. This, however, is grave: a) when someone pronounces a notable part, especially of the Canon, or the words of Consecration alone, in so loud a voice that they can be heard at a great distance, for example forty paces; b) when the priest forms the words of Consecration so secretly that he cannot even hear himself, unless perhaps deafness or noise prevents hearing. The reason is that he exposes the sacrament to the danger of nullity (n. 24; St. Alphonsus, VI, 413-416). According to the Roman Missal:[4] 1. those things which are to be said in a clear voice must be pronounced "neither... in a voice too loud, lest he disturb others who perhaps are then celebrating in the same church, nor so low that he cannot be heard by those standing around." 2. "But those things which are to be said secretly he should pronounce in such a way that he himself hears himself, and is not heard by those standing around."

4. Breaking off consists in this, that Mass begun is not continued but is dismissed. Moreover, breaking off can and must take place:

a) Before the Consecration: 1. if the priest before the Consecration notices that he is not fasting, and can withdraw without infamy or scandal; 2. if the church is polluted before the Canon; 3. if before the Canon it is known that a vitandus excommunicate is present and cannot be expelled (St. Alphonsus, VI, 353).

b) Before and after the Consecration: 1. if danger threatens, for example because of an attack by enemies, danger of death, or profanation; in which case the priest, according to the circumstances, should at once consume the sacrament or carry it with him while fleeing; 2. if, once the Consecration has certainly or doubtfully been performed, the priest fails; in which case the following should be observed: If the priest who fails is foreseen after some time - even after taking food or drink - to recover his strength, he should be awaited, so that he may complete the sacrifice. If he cannot complete the sacrifice, another should be sought - even one not fasting, if one fasting is lacking[5] - who may complete the sacrifice, beginning where the other left off; if the other still lives and can communicate, and another consecrated Host is not available, the priest who supplies the Mass should divide the Host, and give one part to the sick man, and take the other himself[6] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 355). If, however, Mass cannot be continued within an hour, it need not be completed, because the required unity is probably lacking; nevertheless it can - even after a longer time - be completed, because the said unity is also probably present (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit.). If the sacrifice is not completed, the Host and chalice should be placed in the tabernacle, and on the next day they should be consumed by the celebrant before the purification.

5. Interruption is lawful: 1. if an instruction or sermon must be given, or certain things must be announced to the people, which is customarily done after the Gospel; 2. if a religious profession is made within Mass,[7] or if it is permitted by liturgical law for another reason; 3. if necessity befalls the priest; 4. if one's neighbor falls into danger of death. But if this takes place before the Consecration, the priest can minister Baptism or Penance, Viaticum, and Extreme Unction to the dying person. If it occurs after the Consecration, he can confer Baptism or Penance upon him; he must defer the conferral of Viaticum and Extreme Unction until he has finished Mass, or at least has taken the Most Holy Blood; nevertheless Viaticum can be ministered if the dying person is so near that it is not necessary to take off the sacred vestments[8] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 353, 354). Besides this, if the necessity of one's neighbor urges after the Consecration, "let the priest take care that the Sacrament meanwhile be guarded, or let him enclose it in the tabernacle; and after he has returned, let him continue Mass from the point where he interrupted it. If the Consecration has not been made, and a short delay has intervened, for example within an hour, let him proceed where he left off; but if the delay is longer, let him begin from the beginning."[9]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 27 March 1779, ad VI, n. 2514.

[2] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, 6 November 1925, ad I (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1926, p. 21).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 20 March 1869, ad IX, n. 3201.

[4] General Rubrics, title XVI, n. 2.

[5] Indeed, if no other is available, even an excommunicate, who in the case must, after grace has been recovered, complete the sacrifice.

[6] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 3.

[7] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 27 August 1894, n. 3836; 5 June 1896, n. 3912.

[8] Sacred Congregation of Rites, 19 December 1829, n. 2672, ad 1.

[9] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia moralis, n. 259.

272 III. The excusing cause. One who because of illness or another cause cannot observe all the rubrics can nevertheless celebrate both privately and publicly, if he must omit or change only certain things that are of lesser importance, for example deep inclinations, genuflections down to the ground. If the matter is of greater importance, for example if the priest cannot approach the altar without a cane, or cannot celebrate except with both arms placed on the altar, privately indeed it is lawful to celebrate; publicly, provided the people are warned (St. Alphonsus, VI, 402). Finally, if the matter is wholly extraordinary, for example if the priest cannot celebrate except sitting or by briefly interrupting Mass or while continuously supported by another, a dispensation must be sought from the Holy See, or, for a transitory case, from the bishop.

273 Corollary I. In view of the things explained above, St. Alphonsus and most authors rightly teach with Benedict XIV[1] that "Mass should not be shorter than a third of an hour, nor longer than half an hour, because in a shorter space everything cannot be performed with due decorum, and in a longer space it would be tedious to those standing by. Hence we say that a priest who would finish Mass in under a quarter of an hour could with difficulty be excused from mortal sin, even if the Mass is among the shorter ones, or of St. Mary on Saturday; because in so brief a time he must necessarily commit two grave defects, one of grave irreverence toward the Sacrament, the other of grave scandal toward the people... But it is impossible for Mass to be completed in under a quarter of an hour without either words or ceremonies being omitted; or at least without the decency and gravity due to so great a Sacrifice being notably diminished. This must be carefully noticed; for someone perhaps will say that he pronounces the complete words of the Missal well and fulfills all the ceremonies of the Mass well. But although there may be someone so expeditious in tongue and movement that within such a time he would satisfy all the words and ceremonies of the Missal, nevertheless it is at least morally impossible that he celebrate without notably detracting, on the one hand, from the reverence to be offered by him toward the Sacrifice, and, on the other, without himself being the cause that the people assisting fail in the veneration which is owed to that same Sacrifice" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 400).

Corollary II. In conformity with the doctrine stated, St. Alphonsus (loc. cit.) notes with others that "bishops and prelates of regulars are bound under grave obligation to root out disgraceful and scandalous speed."

[1] De Sacrificio Missae, section 2, n. 217.

Scholion. On Defects to Be Corrected Both in the Dispensation of the Holy Eucharist and in the Oblation of Mass

274 I. "If a consecrated host, or some particle of it, falls to the ground, it should be reverently taken up, and the place where it fell should be cleaned and somewhat scraped, and the dust or scraping of this kind should be put into the sacrarium. If it falls outside the corporal onto the altar cloth, or in any other way onto some linen, the altar cloth or linen of this kind should be diligently washed, and the washing itself poured into the sacrarium."[1] The prescribed washing does not oblige under grave sin. Hence it should rather be omitted whenever it would excite wonder, for example if the host should fall into the beard or clothing of the communicant. If it has slipped into a woman's bosom, she herself should look for it and hand it to the priest, or herself put it into her mouth with her own hands (St. Alphonsus, VI, 250). If the host has fallen inside the enclosure of nuns, the priest should enter the enclosure.

II. If through negligence something of the Blood of Christ has fallen, one must proceed as follows:

1. If indeed it has fallen upon the ground or upon a board, it should be licked with the tongue, and the place itself scraped as much as is enough, and the scraping burned; the ashes, however, should be stored in the sacrarium.
2. But if it has fallen upon the altar stone, let the priest absorb the drop, and let the place be well washed, and let the washing be cast into the sacrarium.
3. If it has fallen upon the altar linen, and the drop has reached another linen; if even to the third, the linens are to be washed three times where the drop fell, with the chalice placed underneath, and the water of the washing is to be cast into the sacrarium.
4. But if it has fallen only on the corporal itself or on the priestly vestments themselves, it should similarly be washed, and the washing cast into the sacrarium. If it has fallen on the cloth spread under the feet, or on a carpet, it should be well washed, as above.[2]

Moreover, in the spilling of the Blood, at least some washing must be done under grave obligation.

III. If in winter the Blood freezes in the chalice, the chalice should be wrapped in warmed cloths; if this does not help, it should be placed in boiling water near the altar, provided the water does not enter the chalice, until it liquefies.[3]

IV. If the priest "discovers after the consumption of the Body and Blood, or even after the ablution, that some consecrated remnants have been left behind, let him consume them, whether they are small or large, because they pertain to the same sacrifice."[4] Let him do this also if the priest is already in the sacristy, with the vestments not yet removed. If he has removed the vestments, let him place the fragments in the tabernacle or reserve them for a priest who is to celebrate that same morning; and let him proceed in the same way if the fragments are remnants of another sacrifice, because the Rubric permits him to consume only remnants which pertain to the same sacrifice (St. Alphonsus, VI, 251, question 3). But if an entire consecrated Host has been left, "let him put it in the tabernacle with the others; if this cannot be done, let him leave it for the following priest who is to celebrate there, decently covered on the altar over the corporal, to be consumed together with the other which he is going to consecrate; or if neither of these can be done, let him preserve it decently in the chalice itself or on the paten until either it is put into the tabernacle or consumed by another; but if he has no way in which it can be preserved honorably, he can consume it himself."[5]

V. If a ciborium which another priest needs must be purified, and the server through forgetfulness took the purification of the chalice before it had been purified, it is lawful - although the natural fast has ceased - to consume the small remnants found in the ciborium, because the consumption can be counted as by way of one act with Communion. It is more difficult to say that it is lawful to consume an entire host, since it can be kept for the following day.[6]

VI. If a sick person, or "a priest, vomits the Eucharist, if the species appear whole, they should be reverently consumed, unless nausea occurs; for then the consecrated species should be carefully separated and placed in some sacred place until they are corrupted, and afterward they should be cast into the sacrarium. But if the species do not appear, the vomit should be burned, and the ashes put into the sacrarium."[7] If the sick person cannot swallow the host, or, after receiving Viaticum, immediately dies, the host, if it still appears in the mouth, should be extracted and preserved until it is corrupted.

[1] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 10.

[2] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 12.

[3] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 11.

[4] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title VII, n. 2.

[5] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title VII, n. 3.

[6] Tamburini, De methodo communicandi, chapter 2, n. 37.

[7] Roman Missal, De defectibus, title X, n. 14.

Article V. On Confession of the Dying

475 I. A dying person can be absolved who gives a sign of confession to the priest present, for example by a nod of the head, pressure of the hands, the eyes, etc. For all things required for validity, namely intention, manifested contrition, and confession, are present, or at least by law are presumed to be present.[1]

II. Likewise a dying person deprived of the senses can be absolved who showed a desire of confession before the priest approached.[2]

It is disputed whether in this case the dying person is to be absolved absolutely or under condition. Several think that he is to be absolved absolutely, because the Roman Ritual, in the cited place, seems to equate this case with the prior case and makes no mention of a condition. Others teach that absolution must be given under condition, because the accusation required for the validity of the sacrament is not certainly present, and consequently one can also doubt about the disposition (St. Alphonsus, VI, 481).

III. A dying person deprived of the senses, who neither gives a manifest sign of confession to the priest present, nor showed a desire of confession before the arrival of the priest, can be absolved under condition, whenever it is somewhat probable that the things required for validity are present. For in extremities, extreme things are to be tried. Now commonly the intention of receiving the sacrament is not certainly lacking, and perhaps some sign of confession and sorrow is exhibited by the dying person, for example a sigh, although the priest does not notice it. Added to this is that the doctrine is not certainly false which teaches that internal contrition alone, or internal attrition alone, is the necessary condition for the validity of the sacrament. Hence the following can be absolved: 1. a Catholic, whether he lived in a Christian manner or did not live in a Christian manner; 2. a Catholic who is deprived of the senses in the very act of sin, for example drunkenness or suicide; 3. an apostate who before his defection did not reject the priest, because, placed in extreme danger, he perhaps came to his senses; 4. one concerning whom it is doubted whether or not he is Catholic (St. Alphonsus, VI, 482, 483).

Observe that hearing commonly persists longer than the other senses; hence let the priest address the dying person in a loud voice, and suggest to him a general accusation and an act of contrition.

[1] Council of Orange I, chapter 12 (in Labbe, vol. 4, col. 703 sq.); Council of Carthage IV, chapter 76 (in Labbe, cited place, col. 1443; cf. canon Is qui 8, cause 26, question 6); St. Leo the Pope, Epistle 108 (otherwise 83) to Theodore, chapter 5 (in Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. 54, col. 1013 sq.); Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 1, n. 25.

[2] Council of Orange I, chapter 12 (in Labbe, vol. 4, col. 703 sq.); Council of Carthage IV, chapter 76 (in Labbe, cited place, col. 1443; cf. canon Is qui 8, cause 26, question 6); St. Leo the Pope, Epistle 108 (otherwise 83) to Theodore, chapter 5 (in Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. 54, col. 1013 sq.); Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 1, n. 25.

476 Question 1. Whether one can be absolved who, before he was deprived of the senses, rejected the priest.

Response. Having regard to the reverence due to the sacrament, it is better, as it seems, not to absolve him, unless the privation of the senses lasts rather long, or the dying person gives a sign which with some probability can be held as a declaration of a changed will.

Question 2. How often a dying person can be absolved.

Response 1. "While the sick person is still vigorous in his senses, it will help for absolution to be conferred on him several times after a brief reconciliation.

Response 2. "If the sick person now lacks the senses, it is not expedient that absolution be imparted to him more often within the same day. But in this matter the priest ought to direct himself by the conscience which they know of the sick person; for if he was habituated in evil thoughts, if he is dying from some wound, or is ensnared by some passion of hatred or impure love; if the illness is exceedingly bitter and he does not suffer with a willing spirit, then absolution can be given more often; but otherwise it suffices that a space of three or four hours intervene; more frequently, however, if he is already now about to die" (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 276).

Note. "It will not be beside the point to warn the sick person, while he is in possession of his mind, that, if he cannot speak, he should give some determinate sign while he seeks absolution, or while the priest wishes to confer it on him: for example, let him close or open his eyes, raise his hand, incline his head, and the like" (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 276).

477 IV. The apparently dead.[1] The instant of death, or of the separation of the soul from the body, can be determined by no one. As regards signs that death has followed, not even cadaveric rigidity, but only advanced putrefaction, is held as a certain sign of death. There have been and there are physicians who think that not only in a case of asphyxia, but also in other cases, life persists latently for some time after the ordinary signs of life have ceased; and this both in sudden cases and when disease has had its ordinary outcome.[2] As regards sudden cases, it is reported that several apparently dead persons have returned to the activity of life. As regards ordinary disease, they rely especially on experiments in higher animals. Therefore, having regard to those things which are asserted by some physicians, and which are not to be held as certainly false, it seems one must speak as follows:

1. In a case in which someone has died, apparently, whether from a sudden accident or from a disease which lasted for a brief time, it is strongly to be advised that the necessary sacraments - more safely first Extreme Unction, then Absolution - be administered under condition, and this even two or more hours after someone seems to have died.

2. In a case in which someone seems to have died in the ordinary way, they say that latent life commonly persists for a shorter time, say for a quarter hour or a half hour; hence during that time it is licit to administer the necessary sacraments.

3. Where there is suspicion that a case of asphyxia is present, a still longer time is admitted for administering the sacraments. Such a case can occur after uremia, epilepsy, and other diseases, concerning which Antonelli[3] and Capellmann-Bergmann[4] speak.

[1] Cf. Ferreres-Geniesse, La mort réelle et la mort apparente, et leurs rapports avec l'administration des Sacrements; Revue de Lille, 1905-1906, p. 442 sq., 481 sq.; Nouv. Rev. Théol., 1906, p. 606 sq.; 1907, p. 497 sq.

[2] Cf. Lacroix, De Poenitentia, VI, n. 1104.

[3] Antonelli, Medicina pastoralis, II, n. 612 sq.

[4] Capellmann-Bergmann, Pastoral-Medizin, p. 358 sq.

Article VI. On Confession of Baptized Non-Catholics

478 We are speaking of baptized non-Catholics who are in good faith, or at least are not certainly in bad faith. Now:

I. Outside danger of death, baptized non-Catholics cannot licitly be absolved. "It is forbidden," thus canon 731, § 2, "to minister the Sacraments of the Church to heretics or schismatics, even those erring in good faith and asking for them, unless first, having rejected their errors, they have been reconciled to the Church."

II. In danger of death. We distinguish between non-Catholics who admit confession and those who reject it.

1. Those who admit confession, as for example schismatics, can be absolved as follows:

a) If they are already deprived of the senses, they can be absolved, according to this response of the Holy Office:[1] "Whether absolution and extreme unction can be conferred on schismatics at the point of death when deprived of the senses? Response: under condition, affirmatively, especially if from the circumstances it may be lawful to conjecture that they at least implicitly reject their errors, scandal nevertheless being effectively removed, namely by making manifest to those standing by that the Church supposes that they returned to unity at the last moment."

b) If they are not deprived of the senses, of themselves they cannot be absolved, because of themselves they must first be taught revealed doctrine and fulfill the obligation of embracing it. Added to this is canon 731, § 2, cited above. They seem, however, scandal being removed, to be able to be absolved as if incidentally, whether, after warning has been given, they are judged to persevere in error in good faith, or whether they are not warned, lest perhaps they be deprived of good faith. For first, it is in no way clear what from the nature of the matter stands in the way of the defended opinion. But a merely positive prohibition, where the salvation of a person placed in danger of death is at issue, should not easily be admitted. Then the Holy Office[2], to the question "Whether material schismatics who are in good faith can ever be absolved," the Holy Office, I say, responded to that question: "Since scandal cannot be avoided: negatively; except in danger of death; and then, scandal having been effectively removed."

Objection 1. Canon 731, § 2 absolutely forbids administering the sacraments to schismatics unless first, having rejected their errors, they have been reconciled to the Church; therefore neither in danger of death is it licit.

Response. A priori it is difficult to admit that the canon cannot be combined with the response of the Holy Office. And in fact the canon can well be understood in such a way that it establishes what ought of itself to be done, which does not prevent departure from the rule on account of a very grave cause; and such a cause is certainly present in the case posited.

Objection 2. The Holy Office, on May 17, 1916, to question II, "Whether the sacraments of either absolution or extreme unction can be conferred on material schismatics placed at the point of death, asking for them in good faith, without abjuration of errors," responded: "Negatively, but it is required that, in the best manner possible, they reject their errors and make a profession of faith."[3] Therefore schismatics, at least before they are deprived of the senses, cannot be absolved.

Response. Again, a priori it is difficult to admit that this response cannot be combined with the response of July 20, 1898. And indeed the response can be understood in such a way that schismatics of themselves cannot be absolved unless they reject their errors and make a profession of faith. Indeed the Holy Office, by adding that these things are to be performed "in the best manner possible," perhaps hints that an explicit rejection of errors and profession of faith is not always to be urged.

2. Those who reject confession should not be absolved. Nevertheless, I would not condemn one who conditionally absolves them after they have been incited to penance, according to what was said in n. 41; yet proceed prudently, and especially endeavor to bring them to perfect contrition.

Corollary I. In doubt whether a dying non-Catholic, deprived of the senses, admits confession, he can be absolved under condition.

Corollary II. One who assists a dying non-Catholic should not omit to bring him to perfect contrition and to an act of charity with the other preliminary acts, so that he may be saved more securely.

[1] May 17, 1916, to 2 (in Theol.-prakt. Quartalschrift, 1916, p. 692-695).

[2] July 20, 1898 (Collectanea, n. 2012).

[3] In Theol.-prakt. Quartalschrift, 1916, p. 692-695.

Section III. On the Things to Be Observed in the Oblation of Mass

We must speak of the disposition of the one offering, of the place, time, and rite of offering.

On the Disposition of the One Offering

The priest who is going to celebrate should be fasting from midnight, in the state of grace, and duly prepared.

241 I. The natural fast. It is not lawful for a priest to celebrate unless the natural fast from midnight has been observed (canon 808). See the things which regard the natural fast set forth in n. 187 sq. Add canon 247, § 5: "It, that is, the Congregation of the Holy Office, alone is competent concerning all those things which regard the Eucharistic fast for priests celebrating Mass." Finally, the Holy Office declared[1] that priests dispensed from the Eucharistic fast can, before the second Mass, take the ablution in the first.

[1] 16 November 1923 (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 1923, p. 584).

242 II. The state of grace is required both for carrying out the consecration worthily (n. 26), and for receiving Communion (n. 179).

1. One who has lost the state of grace is bound per se to recover it through sacramental confession (canon 807); per accidens an act of perfect contrition suffices, namely if necessity urges and availability of a confessor is lacking (cited canon). See each of these things more fully explained in n. 179.
2. But if a priest conscious to himself of mortal sin has celebrated, availability of a confessor being lacking and necessity urging, yet after eliciting an act of perfect contrition, let him confess as soon as possible (canon 807).[1] It is said:

a) A priest; and so the law does not bind a layperson or a cleric not yet initiated into the priesthood (St. Alphonsus, VI, 268).

b) Availability of a confessor being lacking and necessity urging, yet after eliciting an act of perfect contrition; hence the law does not regard a priest who has celebrated without confession when either availability of a confessor was not lacking, or necessity was not urging, or the act of contrition was neglected. Those who celebrate thus commit sacrilege; but the reason why the law does not include sacrilegious persons is that it would become useless and an occasion of a new transgression (St. Alphonsus, VI, 260).

c) Without sacramental confession having been made beforehand; and so a priest is not held by the law if he celebrated after a confession in which he inculpably forgot a mortal sin, because he did not celebrate without a previous confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 267).

d) Has celebrated; therefore a priest who has merely communicated is excepted. It is disputed, however, whether the law includes a priest who, while celebrating, remembers a grave sin or becomes guilty of one. Several deny this, because in the rubric[2] it is said that a priest who before Mass remembers a sin and celebrates from necessity, not having availability of a confessor, is bound afterward to confess at the first opportunity. But speaking of one who remembers a sin in the celebration itself, the rubric[3] says: Let him be contrite with the purpose of confessing, without adding: at the first opportunity (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 267).

e) Let him confess as soon as possible. Moreover:

alpha) Here there is a true precept; hence Alexander VII condemned the proposition: "The mandate of Trent made to a priest sacrificing from necessity with mortal sin, to confess as soon as possible, is counsel, not a precept."[4] Moreover, that precept by the consent of all obliges under grave sin.

beta) This "as soon as possible," according to the common opinion, is understood as within three days, or in such a way that it is not lawful to wait beyond three days.[5] The obligation of confessing exists even if someone is not going to celebrate except after a longer time. Moreover, meanwhile the priest cannot again celebrate without previous confession unless both necessity of celebrating is present and availability of a confessor is lacking. Finally, if someone can confess now and foresees that afterward the occasion of confessing will be lacking, he is bound to confess now, for example already on the first day (St. Alphonsus, VI, 266).

[1] Council of Trent, session 13, chapter 7.

[2] De defectibus, title VIII, n. 3.

[3] De defectibus, title VII, n. 4.

[4] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1138.

[5] Alexander VII condemned the proposition: "That particle 'as soon as possible' is understood as, when the priest will confess in his own time" (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1139).

243 III. Preparation and thanksgiving. Let the priest not omit to dispose himself by pious prayers for the oblation of the Eucharistic sacrifice, and, once it has been completed, to give thanks to God for so great a benefit (canon 810).

Treatise V. On Penance

(St. Thomas, part 3, questions 84-90; Supplement, questions 1-28; St. Alphonsus, Theologia moralis, book VI, nn. 425-705; Homo Apostolicus, treatise 16.)

Before we discuss the sacrament of Penance, we shall undertake a discourse on the act itself of doing penance: both because the act of doing penance and the sacrament are intimately connected, indeed in such a way that the act of doing penance constitutes a part of the sacrament; and because, once the very act of doing penance has been explained, many things to be said about the sacrament are perceived better. Hence:

Dissertation I. On the Act of Doing Penance

(St. Thomas, part 3, question 85; St. Alphonsus, Theologia moralis, book VI, nn. 433-442.)

We shall speak of the notion, necessity, and effects of the act of doing penance; namely, of the salutary act, with which alone we are concerned.

Part I. On the Notion of the Act of Doing Penance

275 The act of doing penance consists essentially in detestation and sorrow concerning a committed sin, insofar as it is an offense against God, with the purpose of no longer sinning, or, in other words, in contrition.[1] Therefore the act of doing penance requires:

I. Detestation and sorrow. This is laid down against Luther, who taught that penance consists in recognition of one's former error and a change of purpose, with detestation and sorrow excluded. But the doctrine stated is clear:

1. From Sacred Scripture, which, besides amendment of life, requires detestation and sorrow concerning sin: "Be converted to me with all your heart, in fasting and in weeping and in mourning, and rend your hearts."[2] Again: "Now I rejoice, not because you were made sorrowful, but because you were made sorrowful unto penance."[3]
2. From the testimonies of the Fathers. Thus Tertullian,[4] St. Cyprian,[5] St. Augustine,[6] St. Ambrose.[7]
3. From reason. By sinning, a man has inflicted injury upon God. But one who has inflicted injury upon God cannot expect pardon unless he repairs the injury, at least by detesting it and sorrowing over it.

II. Concerning the sin committed, insofar as it is an offense against God, or, in other words, concerning sin taken formally, so that the offense against God is the object which the sinner detests. And indeed, in order that penance be salutary, that is, that it help to reconcile man with God, the sinner must detest his very aversion from God, or sin taken formally.

III. The purpose of no longer sinning. That this is required is clear both from Sacred Scripture,[8] and from the fact that no one can be reconciled with God unless the will is simply opposed to offense against God. But such a will involves the purpose, at least implicit, of no longer sinning.

Corollary I. The act of doing penance can proceed from the motive both of the virtue of penance and of another virtue to which sin is opposed. Moreover, to some virtues, for example charity, religion, gratitude toward God - which are called universal - all sins are opposed; hence from the motive of these virtues we can repent of all sins. But to others, which are called particular, only particular sins are opposed, for example lust to chastity; hence from the motive of those virtues an act of doing penance cannot be elicited except concerning a particular sin.

Corollary II. The act of doing penance concerning sin considered under the aspect of an offense against God is simply an act of the virtue of penance. But if the said act is elicited under the influence of the motive of another virtue, there is an act elicited by the virtue of penance, but commanded by that virtue whose motive is specifically proper. The reason for the former is that an act is specified from the formal object which; but in this case sin is considered under the aspect of offense against God, which is the formal object which of the virtue of penance. The latter is set forth by St. Thomas in these words: "This is the difference between eliciting an act and commanding: that a habit or power elicits that act which it produces with no intermediary; but it commands an act which is produced by means of an inferior power or habit concerning the object of that power" (3, distinction 27, question 2, article 4, solution 3).

[1] Cf. Council of Trent, session 14, chapter 4.

[2] Joel 2:12.

[3] 2 Corinthians 7:9.

[4] De Poenitentia, chapter 9.

[5] De lapsis, n. 35 (Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. 4, col. 492).

[6] Sermon 351, chapter 5, n. 12 (ed. Gaume, vol. 5, col. 2019).

[7] De Poenitentia, book II, chapter 10.

[8] Cf. Ezekiel 18:31 sq.

Scholion. On the Virtue of Penance

276 The virtue of penance is a habit inclining man to the destruction of his own past sin, insofar as it is an offense against God (St. Thomas, part 3, question 85, article 2). Moreover:

The remote material object is every personal sin, even one remitted. The proximate material object is its acts, whether elicited or commanded. The chief elicited acts are detestation, sorrow, and the purpose of not sinning further; the commanded acts are all those acts of other virtues which the penitent performs from the motive of penance, or which he directs to expiating the offense.

The remote formal object is the violated divine right as to be repaired by satisfaction; but the proximate formal object is the special moral goodness shining forth in repairing, by satisfaction, the violated divine right.

Corollary I. Penance is a special virtue. "The species of habits," says Aquinas, "are distinguished according to the species of acts; and therefore, where a special praiseworthy act occurs, there it is necessary to posit a special habit of virtue. But it is manifest that in penance there is found a special aspect of a praiseworthy act, namely, to work for the destruction of past sin, insofar as it is an offense against God, which does not belong to the aspect of another virtue. Hence it is necessary to posit that penance is a special virtue" (part 3, question 85, article 2).

Corollary II. The special virtue of penance is a potential part of the cardinal virtue of justice; or, in other words, it participates in the nature of justice, yet is not perfect justice. The former is clear from the fact that justice regards those things which are owed to another (vol. I, n. 755). But penance regards the reparation of an offense owed to another, that is, to God. The latter follows from the fact that perfect justice renders what is owed according to equality (vol. I, n. 755). But man cannot render according to equality the reparation of the offense owed to God.

Part II. On the Necessity of the Act of Doing Penance

The act of doing penance is necessary by necessity both of means and of precept.

277 I. Necessity of means. We are not asking whether God, absolutely speaking, can remit sin to one who does not repent - concerning which there is dispute - but we are asking whether, in the present order of Providence, penance is necessary for the sinner. Now then: some penance[1] is necessary by necessity of means for those fallen into mortal sin. This is clear:

1. From Sacred Scripture, which presents penance as a necessary condition for obtaining remission.[2]
2. From the Council of Trent: "Penance was indeed necessary at all times for all men who had defiled themselves by some mortal sin, in order to obtain grace and justice, even for those who had sought to be washed by the sacrament of Baptism, so that, perversity having been cast off and amended, they might detest so great an offense of God with hatred of sin and pious sorrow of soul."[3]
3. From the holy Fathers. Thus teach, for example, St. Ambrose,[4] St. Augustine,[5] St. Jerome.[6]
4. From the reason of fittingness. For it is not fitting that sin, that is, an injury inflicted upon God, be remitted unless the sinner repairs it - which is done by detesting it - and now wills not to afflict God with a new injury (St. Thomas, 3, question 86, article 2).

In what way the proposition proved can be reconciled with the certain doctrine which teaches that an act of charity justifies is explained in n. 282.

[1] Namely, perfect contrition, or imperfect contrition together with the sacrament, or - as others add - together with martyrdom.

[2] Cf. Sirach 2:22; Ezekiel 18:21-32; Luke 13:5; Matthew 3:7; Acts 3:19.

[3] Session 14, chapter 1.

[4] Letter 51, n. 11 (Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. 16, col. 1162).

[5] Letter 93, chapter 13, n. 53 (ed. Gaume, vol. 2, col. 377).

[6] Commentary on Ecclesiastes 8:12 (Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. 23, col. 1077 C).

278 II. Necessity of precept. This brings it about that he who neglects the act of doing penance not only does not obtain justification, but also commits a new sin.

1. The existence of the precept is clear from the fact that penance is prescribed in the Scriptures by imperative words.[1] Next, every act necessary by necessity of means is also prescribed. Finally, reason dictates that an injury inflicted upon God must be repaired.
2. The object of the precept. The precept obliges either to an act of perfect contrition in the absence of the sacrament, or at least to attrition with the sacrament of Penance (or of Baptism as regards an unbeliever); likewise to undergoing the punishments inflicted by God because of sin. It seems that, in itself, no special precept is given of taking away or lessening the debts of temporal punishment, so that in itself the sinner does not sin who defers the expiation of the temporal punishment owed into the other life. I said in itself, because often from elsewhere there is an obligation of doing works which in fact diminish temporal punishment.
3. The time of the obligation. The precept of doing penance obliges the sinner:

a) In itself, that is, by reason of penance itself: 1. in danger of death or madness, because one who then neglects penance is judged in no way to will it. 2. It is disputed whether, in itself, there is an obligation not to defer penance for a long time after sin has been committed. St. Alphonsus rightly holds the negative opinion as sufficiently probable (VI, 437); for if a long delay of reparation owed to God is injurious, it seems that the same, by the same right, must be said of every delay. But no one admits that.

b) By accident, that is, by reason of another virtue: 1. when someone must or wishes to confect a sacrament; 2. when someone must or wishes to receive a sacrament of the living; 3. when someone would suffer grave temptations which he believed he could not resist unless he elicits an act of contrition; likewise, 4. when generally the delay of penance would expose someone to grave danger of sinning gravely. Concerning this, note these words of St. Thomas: without sanctifying grace, "that one remain for a long time without mortal sin is not possible" (1-2, question 109, article 8); likewise these words of St. Gregory: "Sin... which penance does not quickly wash away... by its own weight soon draws one to another";[2] 5. when the precept of charity toward God urges, and the memory of sin occurs to the sinner (St. Alphonsus, VI, 437). "Nevertheless, I do not deny that sinners, especially the rude, can for the most part, indeed almost always, be excused from this sin of delayed penance by reason of lack of advertence" (St. Alphonsus, loc. cit., doubt 1).

[1] Matthew 4:17; Acts 2:38.

[2] Moralia, book 25, chapter 9, n. 22; in Migne, Patrologia Latina, vol. 76, col. 334. St. Alphonsus, having considered this cause, judges a delay for the space of one year excessive (VI, 437, doubt 1).

279 Corollary I. One who neglects penance obligatory from the virtue of penance commits the sin of impenitence; one who omits penance prescribed from another source sins against that virtue from which penance is prescribed.

Corollary II. The faithful can indeed be taught the obligation of not deferring penance for a long time; nevertheless no statement should be made about a span of time which would constitute grave sin. Besides this, they should be stirred up to elicit perfect contrition every morning and evening, and also soon after committing a grave sin.

Part III. On the Effects of the Act of Doing Penance

After we have explained that the act of doing penance is necessary for the remission of any sin whatever, or, in other words, that sins are not remitted without penance, it must be seen whether and to what extent the very act of doing penance remits sins, both mortal and venial; likewise whether and to what extent it produces other effects, for example the remission of remaining temporal punishment, etc. For the sake of completeness and clarity, we shall treat the individual effects in distinct sections, and we shall explain all the things which regard each effect.

Section I. On the Remission of Mortal Sins

280 I. Mortal sins can be remitted without the remission of venial sins. The reason is that one can detest mortal sins without detesting venial sins, and the formal cause of the remission of mortal sin, which is sanctifying grace, is not opposed to venial sin.

281 II. One mortal sin cannot be remitted without another. For a mortal sin is formally remitted through the infusion of grace, or at least in this order of Providence it is not remitted without that infusion. But sanctifying grace does not exist with any mortal sin.

282 III. The following proximately dispose for the infusion of sanctifying grace, and in this sense remit mortal sins:

1. Formal contrition, perfected by charity. This is clear: 1. from Sacred Scripture;[1] 2. from the Council of Trent;[2] 3. from the condemned proposition 71 of Baius.[3] But the arguments proposed also prove that no certain degree of intensity is required in order that perfect contrition proximately dispose for justification. For the documents adduced teach absolutely, with no mention made of a degree of intensity, that perfect contrition justifies.
2. An act of charity, even without formal detestation of sin. This is proved: 1. from Sacred Scripture;[4] 2. from the condemned propositions 31, 32, and 70 of Baius;[5] 3. by theological reason. For an act of charity explicitly contains that whole motive on which the dignity of perfect contrition depends, which, as was said under 1, proximately disposes for justification.

It is disputed in what way the efficacy of perfect charity must be reconciled with the necessity of penance. Moreover, some say that charity does not justify except dependently on formal penance, or except insofar as it contains the desire of formal penance. That this desire is contained at least implicitly in the act of charity is clear from the fact that one who loves God wills the things which God wills. But God wills or commands formal penance. Others judge that charity justifies because it is virtually formal penance. For it is the perfect conversion of the soul to God loved above all things, and therefore a true detestation of sin, though virtual, from the most perfect motive. Whatever the case may be, it is certain that a baptized sinner is not justified, either by perfect contrition or by charity, except dependently on the sacrament of Penance, or except insofar as these involve the reception of the sacrament in desire; but reception of the sacrament does not take place without formal penance.

3. Imperfect contrition together with the sacrament, whether of Baptism (n. 61), or of Penance (n. 357),[6] or, as others add, together with martyrdom (vol. I, n. 418).

[1] Ezekiel 18:21; 33:14 sq.

[2] Session 14, chapter 4.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1071.

[4] 1 John 4:7.

[5] Denzinger-Bannwart, nn. 1031, 1032, 1070.

[6] As regards the sacraments of the living, cf. the treatise on the sacraments in general (n. 6).

Section II. On the Conferral of Sanctifying Grace

283 That sanctifying grace is conferred upon the penitent follows from the fact that the remission of mortal sins formally takes place through the infusion of grace, or at least in this order does not take place without that infusion.

But supernatural virtues and the gifts of the Holy Spirit accompany sanctifying grace.

Section III. On the Remission of Venial Sins

284 I. No venial sin is remitted while mortal sin remains. For one who remains in divine enmity and does not offer fitting compensation for the grave injury inflicted upon God is unworthy for pardon of a lighter injury to be granted to him (St. Thomas, 3, question 87, article 4).

II. One venial sin can be remitted without another being remitted. The reason is that one can detest one venial sin, namely because of its greater malice or from its own proper motive, without detesting another.

III. Venial sins are remitted by:

1. An act of perfect contrition, according to some, remits the venial sins to which it extends formally or virtually. But others say better that perfect contrition concerning one venial sin necessarily extends itself to all, and therefore remits all. For just as in relation to mortal sins contrition is detestation and sorrow concerning sin insofar as it is an offense against God loved above all things, and therefore necessarily extends itself to all mortal sins, so also in relation to venial sins, which are offenses against God in a qualified sense, contrition is detestation and sorrow concerning venial sin insofar as it is an offense in a qualified sense against God loved above all things, and therefore necessarily extends itself to all venial sins.[1]
2. An act of perfect charity remits venial sins, of which it involves virtual penance. Hence all venial sins are pardoned by charity "when someone is borne in affection toward God and divine things in such a way that whatever should occur to him which would hinder him from this movement would displease him, and he would sorrow that he had committed it, even if he is not actually thinking about it" (St. Thomas, part 3, question 87, article 1).
3. Any attrition, whether formal or virtual,[2] seems to suffice for the remission of certain venial sins (St. Thomas, 3, question 87, article 2 and ad 3, and article 3): both because the light offenses of friends are more easily pardoned than the grave injuries of enemies, so that perfect contrition does not seem to be required for the remission of venial sins as it is - at least in the absence of the sacrament - for the remission of mortal sins; and because this attrition, as a meritorious act of a friend and son, has a greater proportion to pardon than the act of an unjust man attrite concerning mortal sins. Nevertheless, it is disputed whether any attrition suffices to destroy all venial sins to which it extends formally or virtually, or whether a more perfect attrition is required if the matter concerns a graver venial sin.[3]

4. The sacraments. Concerning these, note:

a) It is certain that Baptism, Extreme Unction, Penance, and the Holy Eucharist, at least in some sense, remit venial sins. For Baptism is a perfect washing; absolution extends itself to all things which are subjected to the keys; and the form of Extreme Unction is universal. As regards the Holy Eucharist, this is established from Trent.[4] The same is taught rather commonly concerning the three other sacraments (St. Thomas, part 3, question 87, article 2).

b) The sacraments certainly remit venial sins insofar as they move one to the acts explained under 1, 2, and 3, that is, to perfect contrition, to perfect charity, and to attrition.

It is disputed whether, besides this, the sacraments remit venial sins in another way. Moreover, some who deny that outside the sacrament any attrition suffices for destroying the venial sins to which it extends judge that in the sacrament any attrition suffices for the sacraments directly to remit the venial sins to which the attrition extends. Others - such as Suarez and many of those who teach that any attrition of itself alone suffices for the remission of venial sins - think that in the sacraments, at least in the Holy Eucharist, it is enough that "a man approach without actual complacency in venial sin and with the desire of receiving the sacrament and its fruit."[5] Finally, others teach that venial sins are never remitted immediately through the sacraments, but only by means of pious movements which are opposed to venial sin either explicitly or implicitly; concerning these see pp. 209-210, under 1, 2, and 3.

5. Sacramentals. Of these, some remit venial sins because and insofar as they have joined to them an act remissive of venial sins, for example attrition, as the striking of the breast, the Confiteor. Others conduce to their remission insofar as, from the impetration of the Church, God often - not infallibly - confers some pious movement upon those using them, for example blessed water.

Note. It is disputed in what way venial sins are remitted in those who have departed this life with the guilt of venial fault. St. Thomas, to whom St. Alphonsus adheres (Opera dogmatica, vol. I, p. 675), says as follows: "Venial sins are remitted in them after this life even as regards guilt by an act of charity toward God, repugnant to the venial sins committed in this life. Yet because after this life there is not the state of meriting, that movement of love in them indeed removes the impediment of venial fault, but does not merit absolution or diminution of punishment, as in this life" (De Malo, question 7, article 11).

IV. Venial sins are formally remitted by a contrary act, not by the infusion of grace, although this remission does not take place without a concomitant infusion or increase of grace, or at least without a right to this increase. The reason for the former is that no degree of sanctifying grace is incompatible with venial sin; this is clear from the fact that a man having however much grace can sin venially without losing anything of sanctifying grace. Therefore no degree of grace formally expels venial sins. The latter is clear from the fact that no venial sin is remitted without some penance, and therefore without a work meritorious of an increase of grace, or of a right to this increase.

[1] Cf. the Salmanticenses, Commentary on part 3, question 87, article 1, nn. 3-4, and De sacramentis in communi, disputation 10, doubt 2, n. 11.

[2] Virtual attrition is involved, for example, by a petition for pardon from God, the purpose of not committing such a sin again, an act of the opposite virtue, and any meritorious act referred to obtaining pardon (cf. St. Thomas, part 3, question 87, article 3).

[3] There are also some, though few, who require an act of formal penance for the remission of venial sins. Thus, for example, Durandus (IV Sentences, distinction 16, question 2).

[4] Session 13, on the Eucharist, chapter 2.

[5] Suarez, disputation 12, section 1, n. 9.

Section IV. On the Remission of Punishment

285 I. By sinning, man contracts: 1. the guilt of fault, by which he is formally constituted a sinner; 2. the guilt of punishment, by which, because of the guilt of fault, he becomes liable to punishments to be undergone. Moreover, while the fault remains, the punishment which follows the fault cannot be taken away. But when the fault has been removed, the guilt of eternal punishment is necessarily taken away, but not the guilt of temporal punishment. For the former cannot consist with the friendship of God and a right to eternal beatitude; but the latter must be spoken of otherwise. Indeed:

II. In fact, the whole temporal punishment is not always remitted with the fault. This is of faith from the Council of Trent.[1] It is also clear from Sacred Scripture.[2]

III. The punishment remaining after the remission of fault is remitted, or at least diminished, by:

1. Ex opere operato: the sacraments, the sacrifice, indulgences, and sacramental satisfaction, each of which applies the satisfaction of Christ.
2. Ex opere operantis: satispassion and satisfaction. Satispassion consists in this, that someone suffers the punishments which God of himself has appointed for sin. Satisfaction is situated in this, that someone performs a penal work or works which God accepts in compensation for the punishment appointed of itself. Satisfaction, however, can be offered through all good works, because all are penal to some extent. Besides this, one just person can satisfy for another just person,[3] as is deduced: 1. from the fact that we can satisfy for the souls in purgatory; 2. from the communion of Saints, by which it comes about that the members of the Church can aid one another. Nevertheless, it is not altogether certain that God always accepts satisfaction of this kind for others.
3. It is disputed whether the remission of temporal punishment can also be obtained by impetration. It seems that it must be answered affirmatively, because the Church herself in the office of the dead asks God that through the intercession of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of the other Saints he free the souls from purgatory; but it is clear that the works of those Saints are not penal.

Corollary. Sins are remitted through penance in such a way that they do not return in any way on account of a subsequent sin, neither as regards the guilt of fault nor as regards the guilt of punishment. The guilt of fault does not return; this is clear: 1. from Sacred Scripture;[4] 2. from the fact that through justification sin is truly remitted and destroyed; but what has truly been destroyed cannot be imputed again. Nor does the guilt of punishment return; for this cannot return unless the guilt of fault returns.

[1] Session 14, on Penance, canon 12.

[2] Numbers 12:14 sq.; 20:1 sq.; 27:12 sq.; Deuteronomy 34:1 sq.; 2 Samuel 12:13 sq.

[3] It is required that each be in the state of grace: the one satisfying, so that his work may be satisfactory; the one for whom satisfaction is made, so that the punishment can be remitted.

[4] Isaiah 1:18; Ezekiel 33:12, 16; Micah 7:19.

Section V. On the Reviviscence of Merits

286 I. Works are distinguished into living, death-bearing, dead, and mortified. Living works are those which are done in the state of grace, and therefore proceed from a living principle, and merit eternal life. Those are called death-bearing which deprive man of the life of grace and of the right to eternal life, or, in other words, mortal sins; likewise - others add - venial sins, since they lead to mortal sins. Dead works are called good works which are done in the state of sin, and therefore do not proceed from a living principle, nor merit eternal life. Mortified works are those which were done in the state of grace, and therefore proceeded from a living principle and merited eternal life, but because of a supervening sin have been deprived of vital force, or of value for eternal life. Moreover:

II. Mortified works, once sin has been remitted through penance, revive, or recover the value for eternal life which they had lost. This is deduced: 1. from Sacred Scripture;[1] 2. from the Council of Trent;[2] and it is affirmed by St. Thomas (3, question 89, article 5), who teaches that mortified merits remain so far as they are in themselves, and in fact do not efficaciously lead to eternal life because of the impediment of supervening sin; but this impediment is supposed to be set aside through penance.

III. As regards the mode or degree of reviviscence, it must be said that the justified person immediately receives a right to all grace previously possessed and to the total essential reward. It is disputed, however, whether the grace previously possessed is immediately infused into the soul - and indeed either all of it, or, as others wish, according to the measure of the present disposition - or only in the first instant after death. Moreover, the preferred opinion is that which teaches that all the grace possessed is immediately infused. For this alone sufficiently preserves the reviviscence of merits such as seems to be deduced from the arguments, and this alone agrees with the proper notion of reviviscence, according to which penance seems to have itself toward reviviscence as removing what prohibits, not by way of disposition.

[1] Ezekiel 33:12.

[2] Session 6, on Justification, canon 32.

[3] Other opinions seem less probable.

Dissertation II. On the Sacrament of Penance

(St. Thomas, part 3, questions 84-90; Supplement, questions 1-28; St. Alphonsus, Theologia moralis, book VI, nn. 425-705; Homo Apostolicus, treatise 16.)

287 Before we speak of the sacrament of Penance, it is pleasing to premise certain things concerning the power of the Church to remit sins. And we do this both for the sake of completeness, and so that the connection of the whole theological doctrine on this matter may be clear; since the very use of the power to be explained constitutes the form of the sacrament, so that, once that power has been explained, we shall pass by a natural path to explaining the sacrament of Penance itself. Therefore let these points be set down:

I. Christ granted to the Apostles the power of remitting sins. This is of faith from these words of the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that those words of the Lord Savior, 'Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall forgive, they are forgiven them; and whose sins you shall retain, they are retained,' are not to be understood of the power of forgiving and retaining sins in the sacrament of Penance, as the Catholic Church has always understood from the beginning, but twists them, contrary to the institution of this sacrament, to the authority of preaching the Gospel: let him be anathema."[1]

II. The power of remitting and retaining sins differs from the power of baptizing. For the former, as we shall immediately say, is judicial, and therefore does not regard any except subjects, that is, the baptized, or those upon whom the power of baptizing has already been exercised. It is added that the power of baptizing cannot be exercised again upon the same person; otherwise than the power of remitting sins.

III. The power of remitting sins is judicial. This is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that the sacramental absolution of the priest is not a judicial act, but a bare ministry of pronouncing and declaring that sins have been forgiven to the one confessing... let him be anathema."[2] And indeed three things are required for judicial power: 1. that the power be instituted by the supreme prince of the society; 2. that through it the application of law to a particular case be made; 3. that the application be made according to the merit of the cause. And all these things concur in the power of remitting and retaining sins. For: 1. the said power was instituted by Christ, the Prince of the Church (n. I); 2. through it the application of the divine law to a particular case is made, by which God has established that through his ministers he at one time remits, at another time retains, the sins of the baptized; 3. this application is made according to the merit of the cause, namely in such a way that the ministers remit or retain sins not according to their own whim, but according to the conditions required by Christ.

IV. The power of remitting sins extends itself to all sins of the baptized. This is clear from the breadth of Christ's words which were cited above. I said, however, of the baptized, because this power, as judicial, can be exercised upon subjects alone, that is, the baptized. For the rest, it is clear from elsewhere that sins committed before Baptism are remitted through Baptism (n. 61).

V. The power of remitting and retaining sins is perpetual in the Church. This is clear: 1. from the immutability with which Christ willed his Church to be furnished; 2. from the fact that until the end of the world there will exist sinners to be reconciled in the Church.

VI. The Church is bound to use the power explained, so that it is not lawful arbitrarily to repel anyone rightly disposed from the benefit of pardon to be obtained through the power of the keys. Theologians dispute concerning the right, for the public good, of repelling certain sinners in determinate cases; just as there also exists a controversy among dogmatic-historical writers concerning the existence of a universal discipline of excluding certain kinds of sin from pardon to be obtained through the ministry of the keys.[3]

With these points premised, we shall speak first of the sacrament of Penance considered in itself, then of the ministration, and then of the reception of the sacrament of Penance.

[1] Session 14, canon 3.

[2] Session 14, canon 9.

[3] Ned. Kath. Stemmen, 1909, p. 304 sq.

Part I. On the Sacrament of Penance Considered in Itself

288 Penance is the sacrament in which, through judicial absolution imparted by a legitimate minister, sins committed after Baptism are remitted to a rightly disposed member of the faithful (canon 870).

Once this definition has been handed down, we must treat first of the existence, then of the essence, then of the effects, and finally of the necessity of the sacrament of Penance.

Section I. On the Existence of the Sacrament of Penance

289 I. Penance is a true sacrament of the New Law; this proposition is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone says that in the Catholic Church Penance is not truly and properly a sacrament... instituted by Christ our Lord, let him be anathema."[1]

Note. As regards the time of institution of this sacrament, the Council of Trent teaches:[2] "But the Lord instituted the sacrament of Penance especially[3] then, when, raised from the dead, he breathed upon his disciples, saying: 'Receive the Holy Spirit; whose sins you shall forgive...' By so signal a deed and by words so clear, the consensus of all the Fathers has always understood that the power of remitting and retaining sins, for reconciling the faithful fallen after Baptism, was communicated to the Apostles and to their legitimate successors."

II. Penance is a sacrament really distinct from the sacrament of Baptism; this proposition likewise is of faith from the Council of Trent: "If anyone, confounding the sacraments, says that Baptism itself is the sacrament of Penance... let him be anathema."[4]

[1] Session 14, canon 1.

[2] Session 14, chapter 1.

[3] It is said "especially" because Christ had already promised the sacrament earlier (Matthew 16:19 and 18:18).

[4] Session 14, canon 2.

Section II. On the Essence of the Sacrament of Penance

The sacrament of Penance supposes remote matter; and once that has been posited, it is integrally constituted by proximate matter, form, and an integrating part. Now then:

290 I. The remote matter of Penance, that is, that around which the sacramental action can be concerned, is all sins committed after Baptism (n. 293; canon 902).[1]

[1] Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 1, n. 1.

291 II. Proximate matter.

1. Proximate matter strictly so called - that is, that which with absolution constitutes the essence of the sacrament - is the contrition and confession of the penitent. Thus St. Thomas (part 3, question 84, article 2), St. Bonaventure,[1] St. Alphonsus (VI, 425), the Thomists, some Scotists, and most more recent authors. But Scotus[2] and most Scotists teach that contrition and confession, externally manifested nevertheless, are only conditions required for the validity of the sacrament. Finally, some[3] hold as probable that internal contrition or attrition alone is the condition necessary for the validity of the sacrament; for the rest, that the essence of the sacrament is completed by the form alone, which, insofar as it is an external ceremony, constitutes the matter, and insofar as it has the power of signifying, constitutes the form. This opinion is almost commonly rejected. Of the opinions explained, the first is much more common and more probable; and the Roman Ritual[4] and the Roman Catechism[5] favor it. For the rest, note:

a) Contrition and confession become the matter of the sacrament insofar as by the minister, through absolution, they are assumed or elevated into parts or matter. But it is disputed whether and to what extent the aforesaid acts must be referred to the sacrament by the penitent himself; concerning this dispute there will be discussion later.

b) Contrition, which in itself is internal and spiritual, is not an essential part of the sacrament, that is, of the external sign, except insofar as it becomes sensible through confession or through the petition for or expectation of absolution (St. Alphonsus, VI, 445, 459).

c) It is disputed whether satisfaction in purpose, or the will of fulfilling the imposed satisfaction, is an essential element, or, in other words, whether it pertains to proximate matter strictly so called. Many affirm this, because the Council of Florence and the Council of Trent speak in the same way about satisfaction as about contrition and confession, so that satisfaction must be called, at least in some sense, an essential element. But satisfaction actually performed certainly is not an essential element. It remains, therefore, that we say it is essential at least in purpose. Others deny this, because ecclesiastical documents - besides the fact that they do not settle the controversy about the proximate matter of Penance[6] - understand by the word satisfaction, in the obvious sense, satisfaction actually performed, just as by the words contrition and confession they designate contrition and confession actually exhibited. Therefore from the aforesaid documents nothing can be drawn as regards satisfaction in desire.

2. Proximate matter taken more broadly - that is, that which, informed by absolution, constitutes the complete sacrament - is satisfaction actually performed. The said satisfaction is not an essential part of the sacrament of Penance, because it is not ordered to its primary effect, that is, to the remission of fault; nevertheless, it is an integrating part of it, insofar as it brings it about that the sacrament can fully attain its effect, which is the remission not only of fault, but also of punishment.

Corollary I. Contrition, confession, and satisfaction are not only the proximate matter of the sacrament of Penance, but also, together with absolution, produce the effect of the sacrament. The contrary is taught not only by many Scotists, but also by some of those who hold the acts of the penitent to be essential parts of the sacrament; and St. Thomas also at one time taught that (distinction 22, question 2, article 1, solution 1, ad 2 and 3); afterward, however, he expressly corrected that opinion (part 3, question 86, article 6). The proposition is especially supported by the fact that according to the Council of Trent[7] the force of the sacrament is situated in absolution as the form "principally" (therefore not totally, as the adversaries wish). It is added that, just as in physical things, so also in moral things, the effect must be attributed not to the form alone, but also to the matter, or, in other words, to the whole.

Corollary II. Practically it does not matter whether the acts of the penitent are called parts of the sacrament or merely conditions required for validity;[8] nor whether the effect of the sacrament is ascribed also to the aforesaid acts or to absolution alone. But it does matter somewhat, as will be clear from what is to be said later, whether or not internal contrition or attrition alone is the condition required for validity, as Ballerini teaches.

[1] IV Sentences, distinction 17, part 2, article 1, conclusion 3; distinction 22, article 2, question 1, conclusion.

[2] Disputation XVI, question 1, n. 5 sq.

[3] For example, Ballerini, Opus theologicum de Poenitentia, n. 4 sq.

[4] Title III, chapter 1, n. 1.

[5] Part 2, chapter 5, question 12.

[6] Pallavicini, Historia Concilii Tridentini, book 12, chapter 16.

[7] Session 14, chapter 3.

[8] Many Scotists indeed do not require of itself that contrition be external; but because they also hold confession as a necessary condition, and confession in fact manifests contrition, practically the matter comes back to the same thing.

292 III. The form of Penance is the words of absolution, as the Decree of Eugene IV for the Armenians and the Council of Trent expressly teach.[1]

And thus, once the summary notion of the sacrament of Penance has been handed down, we shall explain the essence of this sacrament more fully, speaking distinctly first of remote matter, then of proximate matter, then of form, and finally of the integrating part, or satisfaction. Hence:

[1] Session 14, chapter 3; Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 1, n. 1.

Chapter I. On Remote Matter

293 I. Object. Remote matter, or that around which the sacramental action is concerned, is sins committed after Baptism, and these alone and all of them (n. 287).

Question 1. Whether the sacrilegious reception of Baptism is remote matter of Penance.

Response. Most affirm it, because the reception is sacrilegious insofar as it places an obstacle to the infusion of grace. But what here and now prevents the sacrament from infusing grace seems to be posterior to the sacrament. Others deny or doubt, because the argument adduced does not convince them (St. Alphonsus, VI, 427). The same seems to have to be said of other sins, such as hatred or lust, if perhaps they are committed in the very reception. For the rest, it is certain that both sacrilegious reception and other sins are matter of penance insofar as, as usually happens, after Baptism has been received the will actually continues to adhere to them. If you posit that sacrilegious reception or other sins are at least by nature prior to Baptism itself, it must be said that they are remitted by the force of Baptism afterward reviving.

Question 2. Whether sins committed after doubtfully valid Baptism, but before the sacrament has been repeated under condition, are remote matter of Penance.

Response. They are or are not remote matter according as Baptism was in fact valid or not valid. But it is another question whether there is an obligation of confessing such sins; concerning this, later.

294 II. Division. Remote matter is chiefly distinguished into necessary and free.

1. Necessary matter is called that which must be confessed by divine precept. This is constituted by mortal sins committed after Baptism, but not yet duly submitted to the keys, or not yet directly remitted by absolution.

Moreover, a sin directly remitted is called that which - whether completely or not completely[1] - has been subjected to the keys and remitted by absolution. A sin indirectly remitted is one which was not subjected to the keys, but nevertheless was remitted by absolution insofar as the infusion of grace also carries with it the expulsion of mortal sins which are not subject to the power of the keys.

Therefore necessary matter is:

1. Mortal sins not yet submitted to the keys; and it is the same whether they have been omitted culpably or inculpably,[2] and likewise whether they have already been remitted (namely through perfect contrition or through attrition together with a sacrament of the living) or have not been remitted.
2. Mortal sins submitted to the keys, but not completely declared, as can happen, for example, in a case of necessity.
3. Mortal sins submitted to the keys, and indeed completely, but not remitted by the judge, for example because of omission of absolution, or because of defect of contrition (St. Alphonsus, VI, 425, 480).

2. Free matter is that which can, but need not, be subjected to the keys. This is constituted by:

a) Mortal sins committed after Baptism, and both duly submitted to the keys and remitted by absolution. That these can again be remitted by absolution is clear both from tradition, from the consensus of theologians and the practice of the faithful, and from canon 902. Some deduce this from the fact that the total remission of punishment is not established, and therefore the sin can again be subjected to the keys; others from the fact that one can again and again remit an injury inflicted (St. Alphonsus, VI, 425, 427, doubt 2); these things will be explained more fully in their own place.

b) Any venial sins whatever, whether already declared and remitted, or not yet declared or not yet remitted. That venial sins also are matter of Penance is clear: 1. from the Council of Trent[3] and from canon 902; 2. from the consensus of theologians and the practice of the faithful (St. Alphonsus, VI, 425).

Corollary I. Sufficient matter is any sin whatever committed after Baptism, whether remitted or not yet remitted (canon 902).

Corollary II. Not sufficient matter are moral defects which lack the nature of sin. Nevertheless, "confessors should not be rebuked because they do not hinder penitents in saying these things; both because many of those things which seem mere imperfections are not done without some venial fault, and also because it is not necessary that all the things which the penitent says in confession be determinately and absolutely matter of absolution. For many things are said because it belongs more to the confessor to discern what is and what is not matter of absolution, and so that the confessor may have a clearer view of the penitent's conscience and be able to judge better concerning his whole state, in order to apply the due remedy."[4]

[1] For example, if some sin (for instance, in a case of necessity) is declared only generically. Nevertheless, according to some authors, in that case absolution falls directly upon the generic aspect, but not upon the specific aspect of the sin, and therefore it is not called directly remitted by them.

[2] The following proposition was condemned by Alexander VII: "Sins omitted in confession or forgotten because of imminent danger of life or because of another cause, we are not bound in the following confession to subject to the absolution of the priest" (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1111).

[3] Session 14, chapter 5 and chapter 7.

[4] De Lugo, Disputation XVI, Section II, n. 103.

Chapter II. On Proximate Matter

Proximate matter is constituted by contrition and confession or accusation of the penitent (n. 291). Hence:

Article I. On Contrition

Contrition taken integrally comprises detestation, sorrow concerning sin, and purpose. We shall treat first of contrition taken integrally, then of purpose specifically.

§ I. On Contrition Taken Integrally

295 I. Notion. Contrition is "sorrow of soul and detestation concerning a committed sin, with the purpose of not sinning for the future."[1] It is said concerning a committed sin, so that sorrow over the fact that one does not sorrow over sin does not suffice; in which case not sin, but the defect of sorrow, is the object of sorrow. Nevertheless, one who sorrows over the defect of sorrow is commonly to be judged also to sorrow over the sin itself. Contrition comprises three things, namely detestation, sorrow, and purpose. Moreover:

1. Detestation is the act by which the will abhors the committed sin, turns itself away from the committed sin, and expels every affection for sin; this act of the will is expressed in this way: I would wish not to have sinned; it displeases me that I committed sin. Detestation pertains to the essence of contrition. For contrition must formally be opposed to sin; this happens through detestation, by which the sinner now does not will what he previously willed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 435).
2. Sorrow is a certain sadness of the will arising from the fact that the evil of sin is apprehended as present (St. Thomas, 1-2, question 35, article 8; question 36, article 1). In man as wayfarer sorrow necessarily follows detestation, so that it must at least be called a necessary element of contrition. But it is disputed whether sorrow pertains to the very essence of contrition. Whatever the case may be, at least this must be admitted: contrition consists principally in detestation, which is the cause of sorrow and specifies sorrow, which of itself is indifferent, and renders it morally good (St. Alphonsus, VI, 435).

The acts of detestation and sorrow, although they are distinguished from one another, nevertheless are morally so conjoined in man as wayfarer that they are regarded after the manner of one.

3. What purpose is will be explained in n. 301.

[1] Council of Trent, session 14, chapter 4.

296 II. Division. Contrition is distinguished into perfect and imperfect.

1. Perfect contrition is that which is conceived from the motive of charity. Moreover:

a) It is certainly conceived from the motive of charity if it is elicited from love of God loved above all things because of the divine goodness or perfection, insofar as this comprises the essence of God with all the attributes. But note that from love of this kind there is also elicited contrition which is conceived from the desire of possessing God, not insofar as this possession is good for the penitent, but insofar as it is pleasing to God, who is most perfectly loved in possession (St. Alphonsus, II, 24, doubt 1).

b) It is not conceived from the motive of charity if it is elicited from love of God loved because of some relative attribute, for example beneficence, as such, or insofar as it is not considered as a divine perfection pertaining to God.

c) It is disputed whether it is conceived from the motive of charity if it is elicited from love of God loved because of some divine attribute, whether absolute or relative, provided this is considered as a divine perfection pertaining to God, considered separately through formal abstraction. Many affirm this: 1. because Sacred Scripture stirs us up to charity by the motive of God's goodness toward us: "Let us therefore love God, because God first loved us";[1] therefore because of an attribute of God, a relative one; 2. because the divine attributes are not really distinguished from his essence, nor can they be conceived by us with objective precision from the other perfections and the essence of God; 3. because preachers commonly exhort the faithful to charity by unfolding the relative attribute, namely God's goodness toward us. Others, whose opinion St. Alphonsus holds as more probable, teach that some divine attribute taken separately is not sufficient for eliciting an act of perfect contrition from love of God, but that the formal object of love is constituted from the essence of God together with all his attributes. For in order that someone love God as the supreme good - which is required for an act of charity - he must antecedently conceive God thus by an act of the intellect, according to the familiar saying: nothing is willed unless known. Moreover, in the concept of one attribute taken separately, for example wisdom, God as the supreme good is contained only virtually and implicitly; but what is known only virtually and implicitly is not yet known in relation to reducing the will to act. It is added that, according to the truer opinion, the act of charity of the homeland and of the way is specifically the same; but it is established that the act of charity of the homeland subjectively has the whole divine goodness as its formal motive. Therefore it follows that this whole goodness is also subjectively required for the formal object of the act of charity of the way (St. Alphonsus, VI, 436). Nevertheless, the controversy is not practical, because commonly the case supposed does not occur except in appearance; in other words, God sometimes seems to be loved because of an attribute considered separately, but in reality he is loved because of the supreme goodness. Hence preachers do not take account of this controversy.

Corollary I. It was formerly disputed whether perfect contrition is that which is elicited from the motive of some moral virtue which has an order to God, for example gratitude, religion, obedience, penance. But this opinion is now very commonly denied, and it is taught that contrition elicited from the motives of those virtues is not that which proximately disposes for justification, that is, perfect contrition.[2]

Corollary II. Someone can elicit perfect contrition even if he does not explicitly add that he loves God for God's sake or because of his infinite perfection; in other words, even if he does not say, for example: My God, I detest my sins because I love Thee because of Thy infinite goodness; but only: I detest my sins, the offenses against Thee, because Thou art supreme goodness. Nor is it required for an act of perfect contrition that one attend to the meaning of the individual words of the formula; it suffices that he grasp with the intellect and will in the soul the general sense of the formula.

Corollary III. Besides this, for perfect contrition it is not required that one detest sin from fear of hell or another inferior motive.

2. Imperfect contrition, which commonly is called attrition, is that which is conceived from an honorable motive distinct from the motive of charity, for example from the motive of hope, gratitude, penance, etc.

[1] 1 John 4:19.

[2] Council of Trent, session 14, chapter 4.

297 III. Required contrition. Not only perfect contrition, concerning which there is no doubt, but also imperfect contrition or attrition suffices for rightly receiving the sacrament of Penance. This opinion, which today is almost commonly admitted,[1] is proved by these arguments:

1. The Council of Trent calls contrition taken generically a part and quasi-matter of the sacrament,[2] and thus sufficiently indicates that it - whether or not it is called proximate matter - suffices for the sacrament of Penance. But imperfect contrition also is contained as a species under generic contrition as circumscribed by the Council.
2. The same Council says this about imperfect contrition: "Although without the sacrament of Penance it cannot of itself lead the sinner to justification, nevertheless it disposes him to obtain the grace of God in the sacrament of Penance."[3] Therefore, according to these words of the Council, attrition disposes to justification in one way within the sacrament and in another way outside the sacrament. Now outside the sacrament it disposes remotely to justification. It remains, therefore, that we say that within the sacrament it disposes proximately to it.
3. Then it is wholly improbable that the power of remitting sins is in act never exercised upon sin not yet remitted. But this would happen if in the sacrament of Penance attrition did not suffice, but perfect contrition were required, that is, a disposition which of itself would already bring with it the remission of sin before absolution.
4. Finally, since the more benign opinion has now for many centuries been almost common, it is hard to understand why it has not been reprobated by the Church, if it were not safe; especially since this sacrament is of such frequent use.

Objection. The Council of Trent, among those things which are required for receiving justification in Baptism, lists: "and they begin to love Him as the font of all justice";[4] these words you may deservedly apply also to the sacrament of Penance.

Response 1. It cannot be admitted that an act of true charity is required by the Council for receiving justification in Baptism; for the contrary opinion as regards Baptism was almost common both before the Council (cf. St. Thomas, 4 Distinction 6, question 1, article 3) and after the Council.

Response 2. Initial love can well be understood of some good affection toward God, who is the font of our justice; one who is affected by this good affection toward God is deservedly said to begin to love God, according to these words of St. Thomas, whose doctrine the Council of Trent so greatly attended to: "Insofar as hope regards him through whom something becomes possible for us, love is caused by hope, and not conversely. For from the fact that through someone we hope goods can come to us, we are moved toward him as toward our good; and thus we begin to love him" (1-2, question 40, article 7; St. Alphonsus, VI, 442). Others explain the words of the Council differently.

[1] Otherwise Périnelle, O.P., L'attrition d'après le Concile de Trente et S. Thomas d'Aquin.

[2] Session 14, chapter 3 and canon 4.

[3] Session 14, chapter 4.

[4] Session 6, chapter 6.

298 Corollary I. From what has been said, it is gathered in what sense the solemn expression is true: the attrite, by the power of the keys, becomes contrite. Namely, he becomes equivalently contrite, insofar as the attrite person with the sacrament passes from the state of the attrite to the state of the contrite, that is, he is justified equally as one perfectly contrite. Others explain it otherwise.

Corollary II.

It is useful, in order that what has been said about imperfect contrition may be unfolded more fully, to assign the diverse motives from which it can be elicited. Moreover, the Council of Trent teaches that "attrition is commonly conceived from consideration of the baseness of sin, or from fear of hell and of punishments."[1] Now, by adding "commonly," it sufficiently indicates that, besides the motives enumerated, others are given; or it can also be said that all motives are implicitly contained in the motives assigned by the Council. Namely, the motive of the baseness of sin contains all motives of the virtues distinct from charity. Besides, the motive of hope is contained in the motive of fear of punishments, because it is equivalent whether someone detests sin from hope of eternal life or from fear of hell, that is, of losing eternal life. All these things will be clearer from what is to be said. Therefore contrition conceived, for example, from the following motives suffices:

1. From the motive of obedience: "I detest my sins because by sinning I have transgressed Thy law."
2. From the motive of special penance: "because by sinning I have injured Thy right"; "that I may compensate Thy injured right."
3. From the motive of religion: "because by sinning I denied Thee the worship owed."
4. From the motive of gratitude: "because by sinning I have shown myself so ungrateful toward Thee"; "because Thou hast heaped benefits upon me."
5. From the motive of hope, for example:

a) From hope of eternal beatitude: "I grieve concerning my sins because by sinning I have lost the right to eternal beatitude"; "that I may recover the right to eternal beatitude."

b) From hope of justification: "because by sinning I have lost sanctifying grace"; "that I may recover sanctifying grace."

c) From hope of a temporal supernatural good: "that I may embrace a salutary state of life."

Here also belongs contrition conceived:

6. From fear, simply servile,[2] of punishments. Namely:

a) From fear of hell, for example: "because by sinning I have deserved eternal punishments"; or: "lest I be eternally damned." That this motive suffices is expressly taught by the Council of Trent in the place cited. The same must be said of fear of purgatory.

b) From fear of temporal punishments of this life, as the same Council seems to signify by saying "from fear of hell and of punishments"; for these words seem to be taken not in a composite sense, as some wish, but in a divided sense, because the Council, in the place cited, adduces the example of the Ninevites, who were being struck by a temporal punishment, namely the destruction of the city. For the rest, temporal punishments must be viewed as inflicted by God, and insofar as they in some way begin the divine punishment, unless we amend ourselves. Otherwise they cannot ground contrition that is estimatively highest (n. 299). Nor then is the matter outside every controversy (St. Alphonsus, VI, 443).

7. From the motive precisely of that virtue to which the committed sin is opposed, for example: "I detest the sin of lust because chastity is so beautiful." Here also belongs attrition conceived:

8. From the special baseness of the sin committed, for example: I detest the sin of lust because lust is so foul. Likewise attrition elicited from the general baseness of sin suffices, for example: "I detest sin because it has deprived me of supernatural brightness; because my soul has been so greatly defiled through it."

Corollary III. Salutary attrition is not so difficultly resolved into perfect contrition. For the attrite person is already tending toward God; hence he easily apprehends sin as an evil to God, or as injurious to infinite Goodness, and detests it also under this respect. These things especially hold for attrition conceived from the motive of a virtue which is referred to God, namely religion, obedience, penance, and gratitude. But they hold most of all for the motive of gratitude; since one who is grateful easily wills good to his benefactor, and consequently grieves over sin insofar as it is an evil to God. But since gratitude is especially stirred up by considering the incarnation, passion, and death of Christ, and his presence in the Holy Eucharist, he who is also himself God, therefore meditation on those mysteries is the easiest way of arriving at perfect contrition.

Corollary IV. Let confessors indeed commonly exhort penitents who are not sufficiently disposed to attrition, for motives of this kind especially move such men. Nevertheless, generally let them not omit at the end, and in some way, to propose to them and also to others the motives of perfect contrition.

[1] Session 14, chapter 4.

[2] Attrition from fear or dread is twofold: attrition from filial fear and attrition from servile fear. Attrition from filial fear is had when someone detests sin because it is an offense against God, the best Father; from servile fear, when someone detests sin because of fear of punishment. Attrition from servile fear is likewise twofold: attrition from fear simply servile, and attrition from fear servilely servile. The former is detestation of sin because of fear of punishment, born from ordered love of one's own good, that is, from love subordinated, or at least subordinable, to the divine good or to our last end. The latter is detestation of sin because of fear of punishment, born from disordered love of one's own good, that is, born from love not subordinated to the divine good or to our last end; in other words, born from love of one's own good as the last end. The former is honorable; the latter is dishonorable.

299 IV. Properties of contrition. The summary of the doctrine is this: 1. For the sacrament of Penance to be received validly and fruitfully there is required contrition: a) true, b) internal, c) formal, d) supernatural, e) estimatively highest, f) universal as regards mortal sins, g) external; 2. for the sacrament of Penance to be received validly there is likewise required contrition: a) true, b) internal, c) formal, d) supernatural, e) external; but it is disputed whether, considering only validity, contrition estimatively highest and universal is required. We shall weigh the individual points.

1. True, or not merely thought to exist. Several of the ancients taught that contrition merely thought to exist, but in good faith, suffices for the validity - though not for the fruit - of the sacrament. But that opinion today is commonly and deservedly rejected. For the Council of Trent teaches that contrition is required for the essence of the sacrament (n. 297). But doctrine of this kind must manifestly be understood of true contrition, not of that which is present merely putatively (St.

Alphonsus, VI, 433, 2). Note, however, that most of those who think they grieve over sins also truly grieve over them.

2. Internal; for contrition, which by Trent is called a part and quasi-matter of the sacrament, is defined by the same Council as "sorrow of soul."

3. Formal, so that virtual contrition does not suffice, that is, that which is contained especially in an act of charity. Several older authors judged that virtual contrition sufficed for the validity and fruit of the sacrament. But: 1. this opinion is now almost commonly rejected; 2. the Council of Trent teaches that contrition is a part and quasi-matter of the sacrament. Moreover, that word in its obvious sense signifies formal contrition, not virtual contrition (St. Alphonsus, VI, 449).

Note, however: 1. Formal contrition can well be conceived in the very recollection or confession of sins; hence it is not required that someone has used a formula of contrition. 2. It will scarcely happen that someone about to receive the sacrament of Penance, and therefore thinking about his sins, elicits an act of perfect charity without formally grieving over his offenses against God.

4. Supernatural. Now:

a) Certainly it must be supernatural by reason of the eliciting principle; in other words, it must be elicited through the help of grace, which elevates the act above the order of nature. This is clear: 1. from the Council of Trent;[1] 2. it is established that no salutary act can be done by man, that is, one positively conducive to salvation, without the help of grace. Therefore neither can man salutarily repent without the help of grace.

b) It is disputed whether contrition must be supernatural by reason of the motive; in other words, whether it must be conceived from a motive apprehended through faith. For the rest, the controversy is less practical; since it is certain that for the genesis of contrition which prepares for justification, faith and hope are required,[2] although it is not required that someone reflexively elicit an act of faith and hope, but it suffices that he perform it in act exercised, as they say (St. Alphonsus, VI, 439). Moreover, it can scarcely happen that one who believes and hopes, and fulfills the other conditions required for salutary contrition, does not grieve from a motive apprehended through faith.

5. Estimatively highest. Contrition estimatively or appreciatively highest consists in this: that the penitent detests sin from a motive which, while it persists, he cannot be induced to sin; or - as others state the doctrine - in this: that the penitent detests sin more than any evil by fear of which he can be induced to sin. Moreover:

a) By the consent of all, it is required for the fruit of the sacrament. For in order that the sinner be reconciled with God, there is required a will which perfectly efficaciously, or absolutely, or with respect to every possible hypothesis, turns away from sin. But a will of this kind is lacking in one who lacks contrition estimatively highest. For the will extends itself no further than the motive on which it rests. Now one who lacks contrition estimatively highest lacks a motive which, while it persists, he cannot be induced to sin. Therefore he lacks a will which absolutely turns away from sin.

b) It is disputed whether it is required for the validity of the sacrament. Many authors deny this, or at least hold the negative opinion as probable; but the affirmative seems to be held. For: 1. the Council of Trent defines contrition, which it proposes as necessary for the existence or validity of the sacrament,[3] in this way: "sorrow of soul and detestation concerning a committed sin, with the purpose of not sinning for the future."[4] But these words in their obvious sense signify a will which absolutely detests the committed sin and absolutely purposes to abstain from sin; in other words, contrition estimatively highest. Therefore this is required for validity. 2. Contrition which is presented by the Council of Trent as necessary for validity, from the same Council, suffices with the sacrament[5] for justification or for the fruit of the sacrament. But only contrition estimatively highest suffices for justification or for the fruit of the sacrament. Therefore it is also required for validity (cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, question 29, article 8).[6] 3. True contrition is certainly required for the validity of the sacrament. But contrition which is not appreciatively highest is not true contrition. The minor is proved from the fact that true contrition consists in the act of turning oneself away from every habitual attachment to mortal sin. But contrition which is not appreciatively highest does not involve aversion from every habitual attachment to mortal sin except conditionally, or aversion under some respect.

For the will turns itself away from something insofar as the motive by which it is moved objectively excludes turning toward that thing. Hence, if the motive is only of such objective power that, while it stands, the will can still be joined with mortal sin, there is no aversion except conditionally, or aversion under some respect. But contrition not appreciatively highest has a motive which is only of such objective power that, while it stands, the will can still be joined with sin. Therefore the will in contrition not appreciatively highest is not properly an aversion from mortal sin, or is not true contrition, but only aversion or contrition conditionally or under some respect (St. Alphonsus, VI, 433, 7).

Objection 1. Contrition is matter of the sacrament only insofar as it is sensible or is manifested. But contrition is not manifested insofar as it is estimatively highest. Therefore as such it is not matter of the sacrament.

Response. I distinguish the major: contrition is matter of the sacrament only insofar as it is sensible or manifested, according to itself, I concede; according to its qualities, I deny; otherwise it would also have to be manifested as supernatural.

Objection 2. Only that penance is the object of judgment in the sacramental forum which can be known sufficiently certainly through an external act of the penitent. But this cannot be said of contrition estimatively highest.

Response. I deny the minor; for of itself confession suffices so that the contrition required for receiving the sacrament rightly may be sufficiently certainly admitted. But for receiving the sacrament rightly, contrition estimatively highest is demanded.

Corollary I. From the fact that contrition estimatively highest is required, do not infer that contrition highest intensively, that is, highest in degree of vehemence, is also required. For this does not pertain to the substance of contrition, which it is established from the Council of Trent suffices.

Corollary II. Nor is it required that a comparison be instituted between sin and temporal evils; indeed, commonly this is not even expedient, and it is dangerous (St. Thomas, Quodlibet 1, article 9; St. Alphonsus, VI, at the cited place).

6. Universal. The universality of contrition consists in this: that it extends itself to all committed sins. This takes place: 1. when someone grieves from a universal motive, even if the penitent does not recall individual sins; 2. when he grieves from particular motives which comprehend all committed sins. Now the universality of contrition:

a) As regards committed mortal sins, is certainly required for the fruit of the sacrament, since one mortal sin is not remitted without another. Hence, if contrition is lacking as regards one mortal sin, none would be remitted.

It is disputed whether universality is required for the validity of the sacrament. Some affirm this, and their principal reason seems to us to be that which we have already alleged on p. 226: "Contrition which by the Council of Trent is called the quasi-matter of the sacrament, and therefore is required for validity and suffices for it, from the same Council seems also to suffice, at least with the sacrament, for justification."[7] But particular contrition does not suffice for justification. Therefore neither does it seem to suffice for validity. St. Alphonsus (VI, 444) and most other authors deny this, and judge that particular sorrow - that is, sorrow which does not extend itself to other mortal sins, but to one only or to certain sins from those committed - suffices for the validity of the sacrament. The reason alleged is that in the case there is true contrition, so that all things required for validity seem to be present. The case would be if someone, in good faith, grieved solely from the special baseness of some sin; but this will happen very rarely, because commonly penitents grieve either from a universal motive alone, or also from one.

Finally note: if a penitent, questioned by the confessor, states sins about which he did not previously think, it is indeed useful, but not necessary, to stir him up to a new act of sorrow, because an act elicited from a universal motive is presumed to have been conceived.

b) As regards venial sins, universal contrition is required only insofar as a venial sin is not remitted to which sorrow does not extend itself. For the rest, cf. the Scholion on contrition and purpose as regards venial sins.

Corollary. From what has been said it is gathered how far the sacrament of Penance can be informe, that is, valid but not fruitful. Many deny this, but St. Alphonsus (VI, 444) and most more recent authors affirm it, namely in the case in which someone grieves solely from a particular motive concerning one or some mortal sins.[8] Others add the case in which the sinner lacks contrition estimatively highest (p. 226). But the sacrament of Penance, though informe, probably revives when the obstacle has been removed (n. 11).

7. External, that is, manifested or sensible in some way. For contrition more probably is an essential part of the sacramental sign itself; but it cannot be this unless in some way it is externally disclosed or manifested. It can be manifested, for example, by oral recitation of contrition, by confession either actually instituted or - if it has followed confession - morally enduring, or by expectation of absolution.

[1] Session 14, chapter 4; session 6, canon 3.

[2] Council of Trent, session 6, chapter 6.

[3] Session 14, chapter 3.

[4] Session 14, chapter 4.

[5] Session 14, chapter 4.

[6] On the opinion of St. Thomas, see Ter Haar, De occasionariis et recidivis, n. 237 sq.

[7] Session 14, chapters 3 and 4.

[8] Some judge that the sacrament, even in this case, is valid and fruitful, because, when the sinner grieves in order that he may receive grace, his sorrow, although in appearance particular, in reality virtually extends itself to all sins. They add that particular sorrow does not suffice without a universal purpose. But a universal purpose will scarcely be present without universal sorrow.

300 V. Relation between contrition and the other parts of the sacrament. Here note:

1. Contrition or detestation of sins must, as is clear, precede absolution from them; but it makes no difference whether it precedes or follows the act of confessing, although it is better to elicit it before confession and repeat it after confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 445).[1]

2. It is disputed whether contrition must be referred by the penitent to absolution. Some deny this, both because it belongs to the minister, not the penitent, to refer the matter of the sacrament to the form; and because from Trent[2] attrition, which excludes the will to sin, suffices in the sacrament for justification, without there being any mention of some relation to be made by the penitent. Others affirm it, because the minister cannot assume the acts of the penitent as matter unless they have been referred by the penitent to the sacrament. Others add that, just as one receiving, for example, Orders must order the touching of the matter to the sacrament, so also one receiving the sacrament of Penance must refer contrition to it. Nor should it be objected that sometimes those can be absolved who are ignorant of the sacrament, and therefore do not refer contrition to absolution. For they can, with the necessary conditions posited, be absolved conditionally, because the opinion of which we are speaking is not certain. St. Thomas seems to adhere to the affirmative opinion (3 p., question 86, article 6). Whatever the case may be, in practice you should follow the safer part (St. Alphonsus, VI, 447); but the question itself does not seem practical, because contrition, by the very fact that someone wishes to be absolved, seems sufficiently ordered to absolution.

3. It is not required that contrition actually or virtually endure until absolution, but it suffices that it persist habitually, that is, that it has not been retracted, with the things to be observed nevertheless observed, that is, those to be set forth under 4. The reason is that the penitent - although his acts are the matter of the sacrament - nevertheless is not the minister of the sacrament. Many indeed seem to require that contrition persevere actually or virtually, that is, in some effect; but in reality - many of them at least - do not speak of virtual perseverance properly so called (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 446). For the rest, it is difficult to determine how long contrition virtually endures. St. Alphonsus says this: "I, however... do not hesitate to assert that whenever confession derives from sorrow for sins, sorrow always virtually perseveres at least for one or another day, while that confession is the effect of sorrow. It is otherwise, however, if someone should confess from mere devotion, or to fulfill a vow, or a penance" (Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 20).

4. As regards the space of time which can intervene between contrition actually elicited, likewise between confession, and absolution, some judge that only so much can intervene as can intervene between the parts of a civil judgment, because the sacrament of Penance was instituted after the manner of a judgment. But most reject that, nor does the reason alleged settle the question, because from elsewhere it is clear that a sacramental judgment is a judgment of its own kind (St. Alphonsus, VI, 446); for the rest, the space of time of which we are speaking cannot be determined. In practice, however, there will be no difficulty, since one who is absolved a rather long time after contrition has been elicited and confession instituted will commonly repeat both contrition and, at least in some way, confession before absolution.

Question. Whether a new absolution requires a new act of contrition, so that one who, after receiving absolution, declares a sin inculpably omitted, or again confesses sins already declared, must, I say, in order to be absolved again, elicit a new act of sorrow.

Response. Most more recent authors, against St. Alphonsus (VI, 448) and others, hold the negative opinion as morally certain; but undeservedly. The reason for doubting is this: just as a new act of confessing is required for a new judgment, so also, at least probably, a new act of contrition is required. Nevertheless, commonly there is no obligation of imposing a new penance; but it suffices that the imposed penance, insofar as it regards sins previously declared, be commuted, and insofar as it ought to regard the sins now declared, be left unchanged.

Objection. Even if a new act of contrition is not elicited, all things necessary for the sacrament are had, namely absolution, confession, and contrition morally persevering.

Response. It is doubtful whether contrition morally persevering suffices; since probably, as we have proved, a new act of contrition is required.

For the rest, the controversy seems less practical, because the penitent, by confessing the omitted sin or by again confessing sins already declared, commonly, at least in act exercised, will elicit a new act of contrition.

[1] Some older authors taught the contrary, relying on nearly these reasons:

1. Contrition must be manifested through confession, and therefore must be prior to it. Response: contrition can also be manifested in other ways, for instance by oral recitation. Besides, contrition elicited after confession is well manifested through confession, insofar as this morally perseveres, or at least through the petition or expectation of absolution.
2. Confession must not be a mere narration of sins, but a sacramental accusation; hence let it be informed by sorrow. Response: besides the fact that confession, insofar as it morally perseveres after contrition has been elicited, is informed by sorrow, it becomes sacramental by the fact that it is instituted in order to absolution.

[2] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 4.

§ II. On Purpose Specifically

301 I. Notion. Purpose here is understood as the deliberate will of not sinning in the future. Purpose differs: 1. from a promise strictly so called, by which we intend to contract an obligation of furnishing the promised thing at its proper time, while by purpose we show only the present disposition of the soul for doing or omitting something; 2. from a vow, which is a promise strictly so called made to God. Yet this does not prevent both confessor and penitent from using the words promising and promise, namely in a broad sense, without a new obligation arising from a promise of this kind. Hence also the sinner is said only in a broad sense to have broken or violated his promises.

302 II. Division. Purpose is twofold, explicit and implicit. Implicit purpose is that which is contained in detestation and sorrow concerning committed sins. For one who truly detests the sin committed implicitly wills to abstain from sin in the future.

303 III. Necessity of some purpose for receiving the sacrament of Penance is clear from the fact that without purpose there is no contrition, since contrition is defined by the Council of Trent as "sorrow of soul and detestation concerning a committed sin, with the purpose of not sinning for the future."[1]

[1] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 4.

304 IV. Required purpose. An explicit purpose seems to be required[1] in the case in which the sinner grieves only from a particular motive; otherwise there is no universal purpose, not even implicit, for sorrow from a particular motive implicitly contains only a purpose of abstaining from those sins concerning which one grieves. Authors add the case in which the penitent thinks about future life, since in this case it can scarcely happen that one who truly grieves does not elicit an explicit purpose, so that the defect of a formal purpose would show a defect of true sorrow.

Besides the cases alleged, it is disputed what sort of purpose is required. Moreover, most authors hold as morally certain that explicit purpose is not demanded, but that implicit purpose suffices. But St. Alphonsus (VI, 450, question 1) and others deservedly teach that the opinion which teaches that explicit purpose is required is not lacking in probability. To prove this, we first note these things: 1. The question is not settled by an a priori argument, since the whole matter at last depends upon the positive institution of Christ; 2. the Council of Trent - which certainly does not intend to impose an end on this controversy - uses terms which are sufficiently explained in either opinion, so that a strict argument cannot be deduced from it. With these things posited, we reason thus: contrition consists of three elements, namely detestation, sorrow, and purpose, of which the first two regard past life and the third regards future life. Moreover, the first two must be explicit, and implicit ones do not suffice. This admitted, I do not see by what right it is said: the third, which touches future life, certainly does not have to be explicit, but an implicit one suffices. Thus, besides St. Alphonsus, among older authors especially Suarez[2] and St. Bellarmine,[3] and among more recent authors Haine[4] and Augustinis.[5]

Objection. The Council of Trent teaches that attrition disposes for justification in the sacrament when it "excludes the will of sinning."[6] But detestation of committed sin, conceived from a universal motive, does this even without an explicit purpose.

Response. The words of Trent certainly signify the same thing as those which occur in its description of contrition: "with the purpose of not sinning for the future."[7] But by these words the Council - which does not intend to settle the controversy - leaves in the middle whether or not an explicit or implicit purpose or will is required.

For the rest, let confessors commonly stir up penitents to explicit purpose, at least that they may perceive richer fruit from confession; but after the fact, in doubt they rightly presume that a sufficiently explicit purpose was not lacking.

[1] I say "seems" on account of what was said on p. 228, note 1.

[2] Disputation 20, section 4, nn. 32 and 33.

[3] De Poenitentia, book 2, chapters 6 and 7.

[4] Theologia Moralis, III, p. 242.

[5] De re sacramentaria, II, p. 253 sq.

[6] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 4.

[7] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 4.

305 V. Properties of purpose. Purpose must be:

1. Firm, that is, of such a kind that the penitent wills not to sin in the future, at least not mortally, for the sake of obtaining any advantage or avoiding any evil. Moreover, firmness of purpose is not opposed by: 1. the fact that someone is not certain that he will not sin any more; 2. the fact that someone gravely fears that he is going to relapse; indeed, 3. of itself and speaking speculatively, even the fact that someone judges certainly that he will sin again is not opposed to it. Namely, the present will of not sinning can be combined not only with fear but even with certainty of relapse or of a change of will. Nevertheless, if the penitent is certain of relapse, in practice it must be feared that he lacks firm purpose, and his will must be strengthened. I said if he is certain, because these and similar expressions commonly signify fear rather than true certainty. Hence if the penitent, otherwise of good will, says: "I do not wish to sin any more, but I foresee that I am going to relapse," the confessor, after strengthening the faint-hearted person's spirit, should commonly impart absolution. But true despair is opposed to firmness of purpose; one who despairs must be disposed so that he may hope (St. Alphonsus, VI, 451).

2. Efficacious, that is, of such a kind that the penitent also wills to employ the means necessary for avoiding sins, for example to remove voluntary proximate occasions.

3. Universal, namely as regards mortal sins, not only as regards those which have been committed, but as regards all. For the Council of Trent demands a purpose "of not sinning for the future"; likewise contrition which "excludes the will of sinning."[1]

[1] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 4.

Scholion. Sorrow and Purpose Regarding Venial Sins

306 I. If someone confesses venial sins together with a mortal sin, he receives the sacrament validly and fruitfully, even if sorrow and purpose comprehend only the mortal sin.

II. If someone confesses only venial sins, sorrow and purpose must enjoy the same properties as sorrow and purpose concerning mortal sins, except the property of universality (St. Thomas, 3 p., question 87, article 1, ad 1; St. Alphonsus, VI, 449, 451). This is not required, because one venial sin can be remitted without another. Therefore sorrow and purpose suffice:

1. Concerning all the venial sins which someone confesses.

2. Concerning some or one of those which he confesses, as follows:

a) Concerning only those fully deliberate, because someone can detest the greater malice without detesting the lesser (St. Thomas, at the cited place; St. Alphonsus, at the cited place).

b) Concerning only venial sins of a determined species, because we can detest one baseness without detesting another different from it (St. Thomas, at the cited place; St. Alphonsus, at the cited place).

3. Concerning the multitude or frequency of venial sins. Some teach absolutely that this suffices, but they suppose that then one grieves concerning determined sins, namely at least concerning the later ones, which constitute the multitude. Finally, others admit this as regards semi-deliberate sins, but not as regards fully deliberate sins (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, at the cited place, and Praxis Confessarii, n. 71). St. Thomas declares that the purpose "of preparing oneself for diminishing venial sins" suffices (3 p., question 87, article 1, ad 1).

III. Sorrow - which I note for the sake of completeness - which according to what has just been explained does not extend itself to all venial sins, cannot be perfect contrition concerning some venial sin, because perfect contrition concerning one venial sin necessarily extends itself to all venial sins, as was explained in n. 284.

Corollary I. One who confesses only venial sins concerning which he does not grieve sins gravely, because the sacrament is rendered invalid. But one who, with the value of the sacrament preserved, confesses venial sins without sorrow sins only venially; for grave irreverence is not found in this (St. Alphonsus, VI, 449, doubt 1).

Corollary II. Penitents who are accustomed to commit only venial sins should be advised to add a mortal sin, if they have committed one before, or a more serious venial sin of their past life (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, nn. 71, 99, 188).

Article II. On Confession

We shall speak first of confession considered in itself, then of the qualities of confession generally, and then of the quality of integrity specifically.

§ I. On Confession Considered in Itself

307 I. Notion. Confession, insofar as it pertains to the sacrament, can be defined: The accusation of one's sins committed after Baptism, made to a priest having jurisdiction and - most add - in order to sacramental absolution. I said insofar as it pertains to the sacrament, for something slightly different must be said if the matter concerns confession insofar as it obliges to the seal; what things are required and suffice for confession considered in that way will be said later.

308 II. Division. Confession is distinguished:

1. By reason of mode, into secret or auricular and public, insofar as it is made to the priest alone or before a multitude.
2. By reason of object, into distinct and generic, insofar as someone confesses sin according to its lowest species, or only the genus of sins. Generic confession can be subdivided three ways, namely: 1. into confession of the proximate genus, that is, of the genus which has the lowest species under itself, for example, "I accuse myself of sins of lust against nature." To this is almost equivalent confession of the less proximate genus, that is, of that which contains several proximate genera, for example, "I accuse myself of sins of lust"; 2. into confession of the remote genus, that is, of that which contains proximate and less proximate genera, for example, "I accuse myself of mortal sins"; 3. into confession of the highest genus, that is, of that which contains all sins, for example, "I accuse myself of my sins." Confession of this kind, which is also called wholly generic, can also be made by a sign, for instance by sighs, striking of the breast, inclination of the head, etc.

309 III. Necessity of confession is clear first from the Council of Trent, which expressly teaches the necessity of confession.[1] Next, it is elicited from the fact that the sacrament of Penance was instituted after the manner of a judgment, and therefore, in order that it be rightly exercised, it requires in the judge knowledge of the matter with which it is concerned, that is, of sins. But this knowledge must be supplied by the penitent himself, since he alone is a suitable witness, namely of internal acts, of many external acts, and at least of culpability.

Corollary. Confession is necessary by necessity of means. For it is necessary, as follows from what has been said, from the fact that the sacrament of Penance was instituted by Christ after the manner of a judgment. But what is required because of the nature of the sacrament is necessary by necessity of means, because the sacrament itself is required by necessity of means (n. 358).

[1] Session 14, chapter 5 and canon 7.

310 Question. How far generic confession suffices.

Response 1. Confession, even wholly generic confession, suffices both for validity and for liceity: 1. in a case of necessity, that is, when someone cannot confess otherwise, whether because of defect in the use of the senses, for instance in one dying, or because of lack of time, for instance when shipwreck or battle is imminent;[1] 2. when someone knows that he has sinned gravely, but remembers neither the species nor the proximate or less proximate genus; 3. when someone is so uneducated that no distinct accusation can be drawn out.

As regards one dying, this is clear from the Roman Ritual,[2] from the First Council of Orange,[3] from the Third[4] and Fourth[5] Councils of Carthage; namely, the cited documents declare that one deprived of the senses is to be absolved, although in the case there can be question only of wholly generic confession (St. Thomas, Opusculum 65, § on the Sacrament of Anointing; St. Alphonsus, VI, 481).

As regards the other cases enumerated, the same reason holds as in one dying, namely inability to confess distinctly.

Response 2. Outside the cases just assigned, confession, even wholly generic confession, suffices for validity if someone does not have necessary matter, but only, for example, venial sins or mortal sins already distinctly confessed and remitted.[6] For: 1. that which in a case of necessity suffices for the essence of the sacrament, with the necessary conditions posited,[7] is deservedly presumed also to suffice outside a case of necessity; 2. by the consent of all, a confession generic in some degree, that is, of the proximate and even the remote genus, suffices for validity, so that formally distinct confession is not required. But if we posit that formally distinct confession is not required, but a generic confession in some degree suffices, it is no longer apparent why a more generic confession does not suffice, especially because the arguments which are brought against wholly generic confession seem also to militate against generic confession in some degree, that is, of the proximate and less proximate genus, and therefore to prove less (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 502, doubt 3).

It is disputed whether wholly generic confession in the case of which we are speaking is also licit. Those who deny this argue from the nature of a judgment, which of itself must be instituted concerning determined matter; likewise from the practice of the faithful; likewise from the inconveniences that would follow from admitted liceity. The sacrament would be exposed to danger of nullity because of defect of sorrow; penitents would lack admonitions and counsels, etc. But since all admit that confession of the lowest species, or even of the proximate genus, is not prescribed if the matter is free, it is no longer clear that wholly generic knowledge does not suffice. Next, the practice of the faithful proves an obligation in this matter no more than, for example, as regards the accusation of doubtful sins. Finally, the confessor must watch lest the assigned danger persist; and the admonitions and counsels of which there is question here pertain to perfection, not to necessity. Nevertheless, because of the reasons alleged, it is better to accuse oneself more determinately, and that custom should be promoted.

Objection 1. From the fact that wholly generic confession is valid in a case of necessity, it does not necessarily follow that it is also valid outside a case of necessity; this is clear from the fact that confession made through a messenger in the article of death is valid, but otherwise is not valid.

Response. I deny that confession made through a messenger in the article of death is valid; you may see that it is not valid proved in n. 312.

Objection 2. The sacrament of Penance is a moral institution, namely it has itself after the manner of a judgment. But a moral institution accommodates itself to the condition of things and persons, or according to circumstances now requires these things, now those, for validity. Hence from the fact that wholly generic confession sometimes suffices for validity, it is undeservedly deduced that it always suffices.

Response. The sacrament of Penance certainly was instituted after the manner of a judgment; nevertheless, of a judgment which is of its own kind, that is, primarily reconciliatory. Moreover, I concede that even from such a moral institution, from such a judgment, now these things and now those are required so that it may be exercised prudently. But that for validity also now these things and now those are required needs proof; until it is proved, it is permitted to presume the contrary. It is added that the contrary can also be demonstrated positively. Namely, from the fact that confession of the proximate and even of the remote genus, in other words quasi-generic confession, suffices for validity even when the circumstances bear a more determined confession, from this, I say, it is rightly deduced that by no means, according to the circumstances, now these things and now those are required for the validity of this moral institution.

Objection 3. More distinct knowledge is required for the validity of a judgment; therefore also for the validity of Penance, which was instituted after the manner of a judgment.

Response. I distinguish the major: more distinct knowledge is required for the validity of a secular judgment, I concede; for the validity of a sacramental judgment, which is primarily reconciliatory, more distinct knowledge is required, I deny, because of the arguments alleged.

Objection 4. According to the Council of Trent,[8] a sacramental judgment cannot be instituted when the case is unknown.

Response. The Council treats of the prudent institution of this judgment, not of its valid institution. For it speaks of wholly distinct knowledge, that is, knowledge of sins according to their lowest species; but no one admits that this is required for validity.

[1] In circumstances of this kind let the confessor stir all to elicit a brief act of contrition and to repeat mentally what he himself is about to say; 2. to signify by a sign, for example by inclination of the head, the will of receiving absolution. Then let him say: I absolve you from all your censures and sins; in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

[2] Title 3, chapter 1, n. 24.

[3] Chapter 12, in Labbe, t. 4, col. 703 and following; cf. Decretum Gratiani, canon Qui recedunt 7, cause 26, question 6.

[4] Chapter 34, in Labbe, t. 2, col. 1404.

[5] Chapter 76, in Labbe, at the cited place, col. 1443; cf. canon Is qui 8, cause 26, question 6.

[6] If someone has necessary matter, he is bound under grave obligation to confess distinctly, and therefore, if he confessed only generically, he would receive the sacrament invalidly because of defect of disposition. Except if he proceeded in good faith.

[7] With the necessary conditions posited, namely that the penitent has sufficient sorrow and purpose.

[8] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 5.

§ II. On the Qualities of Confession Generally

Confession must be made: 1. to a priest as judge; 2. to a present priest; 3. secretly; and 4. vocally. Let it be made, I say:

311 I. To a priest as judge, so that, for example, confession, or rather a narration of sins, made to a priest as friend does not suffice. For the word "confession," which the Council of Trent uses, considering both its obvious sense and the very matter treated there,[1] signifies the exposition of sins made in sacramental judgment. Nevertheless, it suffices for validity if someone, after a friendly narration has been made, says: "I accuse myself of the sins just narrated."

Question. Whether an accusation of this kind also suffices for liceity.

Response 1. Affirmatively, if the confessor has retained a distinct memory of the sins narrated. The reason is that then the subsequent accusation, although in appearance indistinct, is in reality distinct (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 44).

Response 2. Otherwise it is disputed. Now with St. Alphonsus (VI, 502, doubt 1) it seems it must be said that this manner of acting does not suffice for liceity. For the Council of Trent declares that confession is required,[2] and that, in order that judgment be exercised prudently, it is required according to species and number.[3] But in the hypothesis posited there is no confession according to species and number: the prior narration is not such, since it was not confession; nor is the general accusation that follows such, since it was not confession according to species and number. It is added that the confessor, before he gives sentence, must have had distinct judicial knowledge. But this is not had in our case: neither by force of the prior narration, since it was made before the confessor could exercise the office of judge in relation to this person; nor by force of the subsequent confession, since it was not distinct and therefore did not supply distinct judicial knowledge. Some indeed judge that judicial knowledge is present if the priest, as friend receiving the narration of sins, already suspected in some degree that he could lead the man, who then was thinking nothing of confession, to sacramental confession. But a suspicion, or even persuasion, of this kind does not suffice for the confessor to be constituted here and now as the judge of this man.

[1] Session 14, on Penance, chapters 3 and 5.

[2] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 3.

[3] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 5.

312 II. To a present priest. For Clement VIII[1] condemned the proposition: "that it is licit, by letters or by an intermediary, to confess sins sacramentally to an absent confessor and to obtain absolution from the same while absent"; and at the same time he prohibited that "it ever be defended as probable in any case, printed, or in any way brought into practice." Moreover, from the fact that this opinion can never be brought into practice, not even in a case of necessity, it is deservedly deduced that confession of this kind is invalid; for no other reason can be assigned for that absolute prohibition. Nor should it be said that the particle "and" in the condemned proposition is to be taken in a copulative sense, not in a disjunctive one; since the Holy Office[2] declared: "The Most Holy One, namely Paul V, decreed that the said interpretation does not stand and therefore must be removed from his [Suarez's] books" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 428).

Nor from the fact that one dying, deprived of the senses, who before deprivation of the senses manifested a desire of confessing while the priest was absent, can afterward be absolved by a present priest, nor, I say, from that fact should you deduce that confession made to an absent priest in the article of death is valid. For one dying in this way can be absolved either because the testimony of the said desire, brought forward by a witness, is judged to be the confession of the dying person himself; or because the confession of the dying person, made while the priest was absent, morally perseveres when the priest is present, and as such is made here and now to the present priest; or because the dying person, with the priest present, perhaps expresses by some sign the desire of absolution. This suspicion suffices so that absolution may at least be granted conditionally (St. Alphonsus, VI, 481). From these things it is clear that our case is not comprehended by the condemnation of Clement VIII, namely because there is not, or at least probably there is not, confession made to an absent priest.

[1] July 20, 1602 (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1088).

[2] July 14, 1605; likewise June 7, 1603 and January 24, 1632 (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1089).

313 III. Secretly, that is, let confession be made to the priest alone, considering a usage which is not destitute of force.[1] Nevertheless, those who cannot confess otherwise are not prohibited, if they wish, from confessing through an interpreter, with abuses and scandals guarded against (canon 903). For the rest, confession through an interpreter can be made in such a way that the interpreter does not know the responses given by the penitent; for instance, if the confessor questions the penitent, the interpreter repeats the questions in the language of the penitent, and the penitent responds to them by signs perceived by the confessor alone.

[1] Cf. Council of Trent, session 14, on Penance, canon 6; response of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, January 10, 1920 (A.A.S. 1920, p. 43); likewise Lateran Council, chapter Omnis utriusque sexus.

314 IV. Vocally. The precept of confessing vocally was introduced by custom beyond the law,[1] and therefore is judged to persist.[2] It is also more commonly taught that the precept obliges at least under grave obligation insofar as one who, without an excusing cause, does not make the whole confession vocally sins mortally. A moderate cause suffices so that it is licit to confess by nods, signs, or writing, for example if someone because of shame cannot express a sin by mouth, or because of an impediment of the tongue confesses with difficulty by mouth; if the confessor is somewhat deaf, so that confession made by mouth could be heard by others (St. Alphonsus, VI, 493). Indeed, a just cause seems to suffice so that someone, after handing over a written confession and after it has been read by the confessor, may add: "I accuse myself of the sins read by you." Nor in practice should those who confess in writing be disturbed, nor should the confessor inquire why they proceed in that way.

[1] "Unless," as in the Extravagant Inter cunctas, on privileges, "an article of necessity occurs, oral confession is to be made to a priest."

[2] Cf. response of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, January 10, 1920 (A.A.S. 1920, p. 43).

§ III. On the Quality of Integrity Specifically

We shall treat first of the notion, division, and necessity of integrity; then of the scope of material integrity; then of the causes excusing from material integrity; finally of the means of procuring integrity, or of the examination of conscience.

Point I. On the Notion, Division, and Necessity of Integrity

315 I. Notion. Integrity consists in this: that in confession someone declares those things which must be declared by him.

316 II. Division. Integrity is distinguished as twofold, material and formal. Material integrity is had when someone declares those things which of themselves must be declared; in other words, all mortal sins committed after Baptism and not yet duly declared and directly remitted (n. 294). Formal integrity is when someone declares those things which he is bound to declare here and now.

317 III. Necessity. 1. Material integrity is required of itself. This is clear first from these words of the Council of Trent: "From the already explained institution of the sacrament of Penance, the universal Church has always understood that the complete confession of sins was also instituted by the Lord, and that it exists as necessary by divine right for all who have fallen after Baptism"[1] (cf. canon 901). Next, it is deduced from the fact that the sacrament of Penance was instituted after the manner of a judgment. But it belongs to a judge to have distinct knowledge of the matter - in the case, of sins - concerning which sentence is to be given; both lest he be constituted a blind instrument, and so that he can impose an equitable punishment.

Corollary. Material integrity is necessary by necessity of means. For, to apply to integral confession what we said of confession as such, it is necessary, as follows from what has been said, from the fact that the sacrament of Penance was instituted by Christ after the manner of a judgment. But what is required because of the nature of a sacrament instituted by Christ is necessary by necessity of means, because the sacrament itself is required by necessity of means.

2. Accidentally, material integrity sometimes is not required in reality, namely if it is physically or morally impossible; in that case material integrity in desire, or formal integrity, suffices. This is deduced from the fact that otherwise the sacrament of Penance would have been instituted unfittingly. Hence the Council of Trent: "For it is established that nothing else is required in the Church from penitents than that, after each one has examined himself more diligently and has explored all the folds and hidden places of his conscience, he confess those sins by which he remembers that he mortally offended his Lord and God; but the remaining sins which do not occur to one thinking diligently are understood to be included universally in the same confession."[2] And again: "If anyone shall say that in the sacrament of Penance for the remission of sins it is not necessary by divine right to confess all and individual mortal sins, of which memory is had with due and diligent premeditation... let him be anathema."[3]

[1] Session 14, chapter 5.

[2] Session 14, chapter 5.

[3] Session 14, canon 7.

Point II. On the Scope of Material Integrity

318 We set forth first the principal ecclesiastical documents which pertain here. Moreover, the Council of Trent says this: "For it is established that priests could not have exercised this judgment with the case unknown, nor indeed could they have preserved equity in imposing punishments, if they had declared their sins only in genus and not rather in species and individually. From these things it is gathered that all mortal sins must be recounted by penitents in confession... even if they are most hidden, and committed only against the last two precepts." Besides: "It is further gathered that those circumstances must also be explained in confession which change the species of sin, because without them the sins themselves are neither integrally exposed by penitents nor made known to the judges, and it cannot happen that they can judge rightly concerning the gravity of the crimes and impose on those penitents the punishment which is fitting."[1] Finally: "If anyone shall say that in the sacrament of Penance for the remission of sins it is not necessary by divine right to confess all and individual mortal sins... even hidden ones, and those which are against the last two precepts of the Decalogue, and circumstances which change the species of sin... let him be anathema."[2] Canon 901 teaches the same: one who after Baptism has perpetrated mortal sins which have not yet been directly remitted through the keys of the Church must confess all of which, after diligent discussion of himself, he has consciousness, and explain in confession the circumstances which change the species of sin.

With these things set forth, we conclude:

[1] Session 14, chapter 5.

[2] At the cited place; session 14, chapter 5, canon 7.

319 I. Mortal sins committed after Baptism and not yet directly remitted must be confessed. This follows from the cited documents.

Disputation 1. Whether a sin must be confessed: a) in doubt whether it was committed; b) in doubt whether it was grave.

Response 1. One who opines either that a sin was committed or that the sin which was committed was grave is bound to confess it. For according to the Council of Trent[1] and canon 901 penitents must confess mortal sins "of which, after diligent discussion of themselves, they have consciousness." But one who opines that he sinned has in some way consciousness or knowledge of the sin committed (t. I, n. 215). It is added that each person is bound to observe a law if he opines that the fact founding the law has taken place (t. I, nn. 232 and 233 at the end). But one who opines that he has sinned gravely opines that the fact, that is, sin, founding the law, namely of confessing, has taken place. Finally, one who opines that he has sinned gravely opines that he is liable to the ordinary means for obtaining remission of sin, that is, to the sacrament of Penance. But one who opines in this way seems to be bound to apply that means, with liberty excluded of using only the supplying means, that is, perfect contrition or charity.

Response 2. One who strictly doubts is bound in this way:

1. If he strictly doubts about the commission of sin, he is not bound to confess it. For, as we just noted, the Council of Trent and canon 901 teach that mortal sins of which consciousness is had must be confessed, so that a further obligation should at least practically be excluded. But in strict doubt there is not consciousness or knowledge of a committed sin. The reason seems to be this: one who strictly doubts about a committed sin is only doubtfully liable to the ordinary means for obtaining remission of sin, in the case, to Penance; indeed he is only doubtfully capable of that means in relation to that sin. But such a one, sufficiently probably, is not bound to apply that means, but enjoys liberty of using either the ordinary means or the extraordinary or supplying means, that is, perfect contrition or charity. In the case, if the sin truly took place, it is not remitted independently of the sacrament of Penance.
2. If he strictly doubts about the gravity of the committed sin, these things hold:

a) One who doubts about the gravity of the matter is bound to expose his doubt to the confessor, unless he himself is versed in moral matters.

b) One who doubts about full consent in a grave sin must confess it if he has been accustomed to consent fully, because he is presumed to have consented fully. Otherwise it must be said of the fearful and scrupulous. The former are only to be exhorted to expose doubts of this kind; the latter are to be prohibited from doing so (St. Alphonsus, VI, 473-476; Istruzione e Pratica, chapter 16, n. 30).

Disputation 2. Whether grave sins committed after Baptism doubtfully validly conferred must be confessed.

Response. It seems that this must be affirmed. For first the Holy Office, to the question whether Carolus Wippermann, doubtfully validly baptized, "is to be rebaptized; and insofar as affirmatively, whether confession is to be placed before or after Baptism to be conferred under condition," to that question, I say, responded:[2] "The Most Holy One, after the votes of the Most Eminent Fathers had been heard, said: Carolus Ferdinandus is to be rebaptized under condition, and, after Baptism has been conferred, let him confess the sins of his past life, and let him be absolved from them under condition." Besides, the same Congregation, to the request of the bishops of England, "whether sacramental confession must be required from neo-converts in England, and whether it must be integral," responded:[3] "Affirmatively, and let the decree of June 14, 1715 be given." Moreover, the Holy Office seems to signify that obligation to be universal not only by responding the same thing, but also by referring to the first response. This is confirmed by the fact that the Prefect of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, in a response to the Archbishop of Quebec,[4] declared that the decree of the year 1868 contains a universal law, and therefore obliges not only in England but also in other regions. Nor is it an obstacle that that response lacked explicit promulgation; for according to jurisprudence, especially that in force before the Code, it sufficed that such decisions were known.[5] Besides, the Holy Office, in assigning the norm for reconciling heretics, seems to suppose the affirmative opinion.[6] Next, one who certainly sinned gravely - which we now suppose to have been done by one doubtfully validly baptized after doubtful Baptism - is bound, if he can, to use at least with moral certainty some ordinary means for obtaining remission of that sin. But by receiving Baptism conditionally he uses only probably the ordinary means for obtaining remission of that sin, because that sin was probably committed after valid Baptism, and therefore probably must be remitted by Penance. Therefore it remains that he receive not only Baptism conditionally, but also conditionally Penance in relation to that sin.

Corollary I. The law explained is divine, as is clear from the intrinsic reason alleged; besides, a priori it is hard to admit that the Church has made a law of confessing sins to the confession of which Christ does not oblige.

Corollary II. What has been said about those doubtfully validly baptized must also be applied to those doubtfully baptized, since the same formal reason subsists.

Corollary III. Sins committed before the first doubtfully valid Baptism are not to be confessed; for if Baptism truly was valid, the aforesaid sins were remitted by the first Baptism; but if it was invalid, they are remitted by the second Baptism. Nor must sins committed and sacramentally declared after the first doubtfully valid Baptism be confessed again; for if the first Baptism was valid, the aforesaid sins were remitted through absolution; but if it was invalid, they will be remitted through the second Baptism.

[1] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 5.

[2] June 14, 1715 (Collectanea, n. 286).

[3] December 17, 1868 (Collectanea, n. 1338).

[4] July 12, 1869 (Collectanea, n. 1338, in note).

[5] The Cardinal Secretary of the Holy Office indeed in 1898, in the customary conference of cases of conscience at St. Apollinaris, declared that the response of December 17, 1868 was not general. But the authority of the said Secretary - since he was another than the one who was secretary in 1868, and since he put forth his opinion 30 years after the decree had been issued - is not greater than another private authority. The same must be said of D'Annibale, who was Assessor of the Holy Office after the decree had been issued, and who holds the more benign opinion as probable.

[6] July 20, 1859 (Collectanea, n. 1178); December 2, 1874 (Collectanea, n. 1426).

320 II. Sins to be confessed must be declared according to: 1. the lowest moral species, at least known confusedly; 2. number; 3. certain circumstances; 4. the external act; 5. the effect, as will be explained.

1. The lowest moral species, at least known confusedly. This follows from the Council of Trent,[1] which declares that sins must be declared "in species," which words in their obvious sense signify the lowest moral species. The reason is clear from what has been said about the necessity of integrity (n. 317). It is said:

a) Moral species; since it is not necessary to declare the physical species, so that one who has stolen, for example, 100 florins and a cow satisfies by confessing that he committed two grave thefts.

b) Lowest species, so that it does not suffice to confess, for example, the proximate genus of the sin, for instance by declaring: "I committed a sin of lust" or "of lust against nature."

c) At least known confusedly; for a species wholly unknown is not contracted.

Question. What must one confess who knows that he has sinned gravely but does not remember the lowest species?

Response. He is bound to confess the sin according to its generic aspect; for one who cannot integrally satisfy the precept is bound to satisfy it insofar as he can do that, unless the reason of the precept is not found in the defective fulfillment (St. Alphonsus, VI, 480).

2. Number. For the Council of Trent[2] declares that sins must be confessed "individually." For the rest, this is elicited also from the fact that all mortal sins must be confessed (n. 319; canon 901), which does not take place if the number is not assigned. Moreover:

a) If the true number is established, this must be declared.

b) If the true number is not established, but some number is established, for example, if someone certainly sinned eight times but doubts whether he sinned more often, say twelve times, let him either confess only the certain number or declare a truly approximate number, adding "about" or "more or less," saying, for example, in the case alleged, "about ten times I committed this or that sin." Now by an approximate number a moderate excess is comprehended, but not a notable one. And the greater the number expressed, the greater the excess comprehended. Thus, for example, by saying "three times more or less," up to 4 can be understood; by saying "ten times more or less," up to 12; by saying "thirty times more or less," up to 33; by saying "a hundred times more or less," up to 105 (St. Alphonsus, VI, 466).

c) If not even an approximate number can be assigned, let the habit of sinning be declared, the time through which it persevered, and, as far as possible, the frequency of falls in a day, week, or month (St. Alphonsus, VI, 466). But if not even that can be done at all, or not without great danger of erring, it suffices, after the time of the habit has been declared, to add that he sinned "as often as the occasion was given" or "as often as that desire occurred" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 466). Hence a prostitute commonly satisfies by declaring that she was given over to prostitution for such a time, and that as often as there was occasion she afforded the use of her body both to married and unmarried men. Nevertheless, she should determine more exactly the number of less usual species, if they occurred, for instance sins committed with clerics. Indeed, if she can, she must manifest the number more accurately. One who is accustomed to desire any women he meets satisfies by declaring that habit and the time through which he persists in it; let him add whether often married women, whether sometimes relatives, or sacred persons. One who is accustomed on any occasion to speak about shameful matters likewise satisfies by manifesting the time of a habit of this kind.

Corollary. One who has confessed an approximate number, adding "more or less" or "about," is not bound to supplement if afterward he certainly learns of a moderate excess above the number expressed. The reason is that the sacrament of Penance was instituted after the manner of a judgment to be exercised in a human way. But, considering the human manner of proceeding, in the case posited the case to be judged seems to have been so declared and judged that, if the penitent proceeded in good faith, the obligation of supplementing seems to be denied (St. Alphonsus, VI, 466). For the same reason the same seems to be said of one who, having confessed more generally and confusedly, afterward remembers the number more distinctly, unless afterward so great a multitude of sins comes to mind that they were not comprehended in the general and confused confession. Finally, it is clear that one who in good faith manifested too great a number is not bound to confess again, since the true number was included in the greater.

Question. Whether one who by one physical act committed several sins numerically, for instance by killing three men by one act, can confess thus: "I killed three men."

Response. It seems this must be affirmed, because he truly confesses the number of sins.

Objection. In the case posited the confessor is led into error as regards the number of acts; which is opposed to integrity.

Response. The confessor is led into error as regards the number of physical acts, let that pass; as regards the number of sins or malices, I deny it; namely, that act, physically one, is morally threefold. But an error induced as regards the number of physical acts is not opposed to integrity.

3. Circumstances of sin. The following must be declared:

a) A circumstance changing the theological species, as it is called, that is, one which makes a venial sin mortal or conversely; at least insofar as this is required lest the confessor take as light what was grave, or as grave what was light. Hence, for example, the circumstance of grave matter in theft must be declared, and the circumstance of half-full consent in an act gravely evil, if the penitent - to which in the case he is not bound - wishes to confess the consent.

b) A circumstance adding a new species of grave sin, or, to use the terminology of the Council of Trent[3] and of the Code (canon 901), changing the species of sin, as if someone were to kill a sacred person.

Thus the Council of Trent at the cited place and the cited canon of the Code; and it follows from what has been said about the obligation of confessing sins according to the lowest species.

Question. Whether one who by one physical act committed several sins in species, for instance if one bound by a vow of chastity pollutes himself, can confess thus: "I gravely transgressed a vow and perpetrated pollution."

Response. It seems this must be affirmed, provided he truly declares the lowest species, as in the example alleged; for nothing seems lacking to integrity. But if it is objected that the circumstance of the sin must be declared which changes its species or which adds a new species to it, whereas in the case the sin against the vow is not declared as a circumstance of the sin of lust, I respond that by objecting in this way one insists too much, as it seems, on the letter of the law.

c) Circumstances about which the confessor asks, so that he may judge better concerning the disposition and obligations of the penitent, and which especially regard habit, relapse, and proximate occasions. Hence Innocent XI condemned proposition 58: "We are not bound, when the confessor asks, to confess the habit of some sin."[4]

d) Accidentally, the circumstances must be declared on which a censure or reservation of sin depends.

Question. Whether a circumstance which notably aggravates a grave sin in the same species must be declared. I said notably, because no one teaches that a lightly aggravating circumstance must be manifested.

Response. Some affirm simply; others affirm as regards the circumstance "what," or of the object, or which regards the quantity of the thing, as in excessive theft, in incest in a very near degree. Others deny absolutely; with St. Alphonsus (VI, 468) we hold this opinion as sufficiently probable. For: 1. the Council of Trent,[5] as also canon 901, speaks only of circumstances changing the species, so that a further obligation seems at least practically to be excluded; 2. a further obligation would impose a nearly intolerable burden and would be a source of scruples and difficulties. St. Antoninus,[6] St. Bonaventure,[7] St. Thomas, as it seems (4, distinction 16, question 3, article 2, solution 5; opusculum 12 to the reader of Besancon), and all more recent authors also adhere to the more benign opinion.

Corollary. Let the confessor generally not inquire into aggravating circumstances, but let him permit the faithful, for the tranquility of conscience, to manifest them. I said generally; for: 1. as regards sins against chastity, not only should he not inquire into circumstances not to be exposed, but generally he should also advise penitents not to expose anything besides that which must be exposed; 2. as regards sins of injustice, he should for the most part inquire into the gravity of the thing taken or of the damage inflicted, both because the faithful often do not know what matter is grave, and so that he can judge about the obligation of restoring and can teach the faithful about it.

4. External act, whether committed, as fornication, or omitted, as omission of Mass. Moreover, an external act which completes the internal act in the character of sin must be declared; for it comes under the name of sin and in reality is contrary to the law. But of itself an external act which is merely the manifestation of a sin that is properly internal, for example of heresy, need not be declared. Except if it introduces a new species, for example of scandal, or if a censure or reservation of sin depends on it (St. Alphonsus, V, 42).

5. Effect. The discussion concerns grave effects which were foreseen in the cause and either intended or permitted without sufficient reason. Effects of this kind can be, for example, blasphemies uttered in drunkenness, pollution, the death of an enemy following from the giving of poison, etc. Now:

a) The effect must be declared: 1. if the confessor asks about it so that he may judge better concerning the obligation of the penitent; 2. accidentally, if a censure or reservation of sin depends on it. Otherwise:

b) The effect need not be declared if the evil will was sincerely retracted before the event; for when that has been retracted, there is no source from which true morality can accrue to the effect, so that it cannot come under the name of sin (tom. I, n. 10). If the evil will has not been retracted, it is disputed. Moreover, it seems it must be said thus: the effect must be declared which is the complement or consummation of the internal sin, or the external execution, as foreseen blasphemies uttered in drunkenness. The reason is that an effect of this kind, as an act infected by the malice of the will (t. I, n. 60), comes under the name of sin (St. Alphonsus, IV, 149; V, 10). Otherwise it must be said of an effect which cannot be called the consummation or external execution of the internal sin, as the death of an enemy following from the giving of poison.

Question 1. Whether one satisfies integrity who declares a sin not yet confessed as confessed.

Response. It seems this must be wholly denied, because by declaring necessary matter as free, he does not subject it to the judgment of the confessor, but only to repeated absolution, or at least deceives the confessor as regards the obligation of judging the sin; and that deception is grave. Namely, necessary matter must be subjected to the judgment of the confessor and judged by him, because judgment concerning it has not yet taken place; free matter is only subjected again to absolution, although it is licit to subject it to judgment again.

Question 2. Whether one satisfies integrity who, with the confessor aware, for example in a general confession, omits to distinguish between sins confessed and not confessed.

Response. Affirmatively, because it is licit to subject sins already confessed together with those not yet confessed again to the judgment of the confessor, and not only to absolution, as happens if the whole confession is made concerning free matter. In the case, however, the confessor must judge concerning each sin, and therefore also investigate the species and number of old sins, namely lest some sin which has not yet been judged be left unjudged.

Question 3. Whether one satisfies integrity who declares a confessed sin as not yet confessed.

Response. Affirmatively, because it is licit to submit free matter again to the judgment of the confessor. Nevertheless he would commit a lie and a light sacrilege, and so would sin venially (n. 324).

Question 4. Whether one satisfies integrity who falsely declares the time of the committed sin, for instance by declaring a sin recently committed as committed long ago.

Response. Some deny this, because an act recently posited is not an act posited long ago, so that in the case the act posited is not declared. But it seems this must be affirmed, provided he does not proceed for this reason, that he confesses a not-yet-confessed sin as confessed. The reason is that the act is declared primarily as posited, so that it is undeservedly said that the act posited is not declared. I said "provided he does not proceed for this reason, that he confesses a not-yet-confessed sin as confessed"; this he would do if he accused himself of a sin not yet confessed in this way: "Besides, I accuse myself of this or that sin of my past life." Besides, a penitent rightly questioned about the time is bound to open the truth.

Corollary. The penitent has satisfied the precept of integrity only when he has exposed his sins in such a way that he can prudently judge that the confessor sufficiently perceived the things to be exposed. Hence: 1. one who notices that certain grave matters were either not heard by the confessor or were wrongly understood is bound to supplement; 2. a fortiori he is bound to this, indeed he confesses sacrilegiously, who deliberately chooses a somewhat deaf confessor lest the things to be exposed be duly perceived. On the other hand, however, the penitent can presume that the confessor sufficiently perceived the things exposed, until the contrary is established.

[1] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 5.

[2] Session 14, chapter 5.

[3] Session 14, chapter 5.

[4] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1208.

[5] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 5.

[6] Summa Theologica, part 3, title 14, chapter 19, § 7.

[7] 4, distinction 17, part 3, article, question 3.

321 III. One who culpably did not satisfy integrity is bound as is explained in n. 332 sq. One who inculpably did not satisfy is bound to supplement, and indeed in the first following confession, because every confession of itself must be materially integral. Nevertheless, it is not required that confession therefore be anticipated, nor that meanwhile he abstain from the Holy Eucharist (n. 179).

Question 1. Whether one who confessed a sin as doubtful, and afterward recognizes it as certain, is bound to repeat it as certain.

Response. Most more recent authors deny this; but with the older authors and St. Alphonsus (VI, 478), it seems this must be affirmed. The reason is that the declaration of the case which is to be judged as doubtfully existing, and likewise the judgment resting on a declaration of this kind, were notably defective; this seems clear of itself, and is confirmed by the fact that that declaration and judgment did not suffice for imposing a fitting penance, that is, a grave one; for in doubt whether someone sinned gravely, a grave penance is not to be imposed.

Objection 1. One who confessed, for example, "I did that about ten times," and afterward certainly knew that he had sinned eleven times, is not bound to confess that eleventh sin again. But there is complete parity with the case just discussed.

Response. I distinguish the minor: the prior case, namely of a moderate doubtful excess, is equal to the case just discussed if the doubtful excess is considered in itself, I concede; if it is considered as part of the whole case to be judged, I deny. For the human manner in which one must proceed also in sacramental judgment brings with it that one who in good faith declared, for example, that he consented to an evil desire about ten times, is immune from the obligation of supplementing, even if afterward he knows that he consented eleven times; but the same cannot with equal right be said of one who consented once and declared it as doubtful. In conformity with this doctrine, the former according to common estimation is said to have confessed morally integrally; not so the latter (St. Alphonsus, at the cited place).

Objection 2. There is no obligation of confessing what has already been directly remitted. But the sin of which we speak has already been directly remitted.

Response. There is no obligation of confessing what has already been directly remitted if it has also been rightly declared, I concede; otherwise I deny. But the sin of which we speak was not rightly declared. Nor, in order to reject the distinction, should you appeal to canon 901, since it is not judged to settle a controversy among theologians about divine law.[1]

Objection 3. It suffices to have declared the sin as it was in conscience; which took place in the case posited.

Response. It suffices to have declared the sin as it was in a right conscience, I concede; as it was in a very defective conscience, so that a sufficiently right judgment about the existence of the case could not be formed, I deny. But the latter took place in the case posited.

Objection 4. It suffices to have declared sins according to species, number, and circumstances as explained above; this is posited as having been done.

Response. It suffices to have declared sins according to species, etc., provided the very commission of the sin has been duly declared. But that did not take place.

Question 2. Whether one who omitted a circumstance to be declared is afterward bound to repeat the whole sin.

Response. It suffices to expose the omitted circumstance, if the sin arising from the circumstance can be explained in its lowest species without the whole sin being exposed. Hence one bound by a vow of chastity who confessed fornication but omitted the circumstance of the vow satisfies afterward by confessing that he injured the vow; otherwise the whole sin must be repeated. Thus, for example, a married person who confessed mere fornication does not satisfy afterward by adding that he inflicted a grave injury on his spouse, because by this explanation the malice of the injury contained in adultery is not sufficiently exposed.

Note. One who, after receiving absolution, confesses an omitted grave sin is to be absolved again in this very confession. As regards the penance to be imposed, what was said on p. 229 can be observed.

[1] Code of Canon Law, Preface.

322 IV. One who doubts whether he has confessed a grave sin, in other words, whether he has fulfilled the precept of integrity, is bound in this way:

1. If he opines that he declared the sin, he is not bound to confess it again (t. I, n. 229). Moreover, one who has diligently received the sacrament can, in doubt, commonly presume or opine that he confessed integrally.
2. If, all things considered, he strictly doubts, he is bound to declare the sin again (St. Alphonsus, VI, 477). This follows from what has been said about doubtful fulfillment of a law (t. I, n. 229). Except, however, the scrupulous, of whom in n. 327.

Scholion. On Injury to Truth in Confessing

323 I. Truth, as it is taken here, consists in this: that the penitent declares those things which regard sacramental judgment as they are in conscience. To truth is opposed a lie, by which the penitent, in matter pertaining to sacramental judgment, denies those things which he holds as true or affirms those things which he holds as false.

1. He does not sin against truth, as it is understood here: 1. who lies about those things which do not pertain to sacramental judgment, for example, if someone falsely says that he is from this or that parish; if he falsely responds about those things concerning which the confessor lacks the right of questioning; 2. who confesses light sins to his usual confessor, but as often as he has committed a grave sin goes to another confessor. If he does this lest he expose himself to danger of keeping back the sin, he acts rightly; but badly, if it happens for this end, that he may sin more freely.

2. He sins against truth: 1. who confesses sins which he did not commit, or denies those which he perpetrated; 2. who responds falsely about those things concerning which he is rightly questioned by the confessor.

324 II. As regards the malice of a lie in confession, take these things: a lie in a matter pertaining to sacramental judgment involves a twofold malice, one of lying, the other of sacrilege; of sacrilege indeed, because it inflicts injury on the sacrament. The malice of lying is light. But the malice of sacrilege is grave or light according as the penitent deceives the confessor in a grave or light matter. Hence it is grave, for example, if he confesses a mortal sin not committed as committed, or a certainly committed sin as doubtfully committed, or a doubtfully committed sin as certain, although the latter is rather done from simplicity for greater tranquility and therefore subjectively is excused from grave sin; likewise if he declares a sin not confessed as confessed; likewise if, rightly questioned about a grave matter, he says what is false; if he falsely asserts that he grieves over the sins which he has confessed, even if he has declared only one venial sin, because it concerns a matter, that is, contrition, pertaining to validity, and therefore grave. It is light if the penitent, for example, declares a confessed mortal sin as not yet confessed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 495-497, who nevertheless does not agree as regards the malice of lying).

Question. Whether it is ever licit to use in confession a restriction that is not purely mental.

Response. Negatively, if it concerns a matter about which the confessor rightly questions. Otherwise it must be affirmed: and so if the confessor undeservedly asks, for example, whether the penitent has confessed elsewhere, the penitent can respond "Negatively," understanding underneath, for example, "so that I am bound to tell you that."

Point III. On the Causes Excusing from Material Integrity

An intrinsic inconvenience does not excuse, as, for example, shame (t. I, n. 169). Concerning extraordinary shame, confer n. 327. The following excuse:

325 I. Ignorance of the law and forgetfulness of sin, provided it is here and now inculpable or at most lightly culpable, for instance when someone after an examination made without grave negligence does not remember some sin. I said "without grave negligence," because light negligence can be combined with ordinary diligence.

326 II. Physical inability. 1. The dying and the sick who, even if helped by the confessor, cannot confess integrally at all or can do so only with great difficulty, are excused.

2. The mute and the deaf, who are bound to confess integrally insofar as they can morally do that by words or signs. It is disputed whether the mute are bound to use writing if otherwise they cannot satisfy the precept. Moreover, most more recent authors deny this. But with St. Thomas (In 4, distinction 17, question 3, article 4, solution 3, ad 2) and St. Alphonsus (VI, 479), it seems this must be affirmed. For only a grave inconvenience, or one extraordinary or unusual with respect to the penitent, excuses from a grave divine precept. But the use of writing neither involves grave inconvenience nor is judged an extraordinary or unusual means of communicating with others with respect to the mute.

Objection. No one is bound to use a means which introduces danger of revelation. But writing is of this kind, since by some accident it can come into the hands of others.

Response. No one is bound to use a means which brings with it danger of revelation worthy of note, I concede; otherwise I deny. But in the case, the danger of revelation attached to writing is not worthy of note, so that not even the burden of undergoing it deserves to be noted. Therefore it does not excuse from fulfilling a grave precept.

A somewhat deaf person should be led into a remote place, unless it is to be feared that bystanders would suspect that he sinned gravely. But this does not take place if deafness is noticed at the beginning of confession; otherwise, for the most part, if it is noticed in the course of confession (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 35).

3. Those ignorant of the language of the confessor are excused if another confessor cannot be had shortly and conveniently. If the confessor does not know only the dialect of the penitent, so that, at least after asking for explanation, he understands several or even many things, it is licit for a lesser cause to hear the confession of the penitent. For the rest, the penitent is not bound to use an interpreter (canon 903), and this holds even if he can easily declare one or another sin through an interpreter, for instance a sin which is already known to the interpreter from elsewhere (St. Alphonsus, VI, 479).

4. Those lacking opportunity of time, for instance when battle or shipwreck is imminent. The same can happen in a hospital, if all, because of the multitude of the dying, cannot confess integrally in time. Likewise the penitent is excused if it is to be feared that the confessor may die or that something grave may happen to him before confession has been integrally completed, and another cannot be approached conveniently and shortly.

A great concourse of penitents does not excuse, as follows from proposition 59 condemned by Innocent XI:[1] "It is licit sacramentally to absolve those who have confessed only by half, by reason of a great concourse of penitents, such as, for example, can happen on the day of some great feast or indulgence."

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1209.

327 III. Moral inability, which is had when the penitent cannot confess integrally without probable damage, whether spiritual or temporal, extrinsic to confession and proportionate to the gravity of the precept. It is said without probable damage; certain damage is not required, because it is already a grave inconvenience to expose oneself to grave danger. Here are referred:

1. Danger of infamy, for instance if a sick person, for example in a hospital, cannot confess sins without others hearing them; or if someone cannot omit or defer Holy Communion or Mass without notice or scandal, and has committed so many sins that he cannot confess integrally without others suspecting his evil state. Outside this case a lengthy confession rarely brings with it danger of infamy, because all know that confession is often prolonged not at all because of many grave sins to be confessed, but in order to seek counsels, etc.

2. Danger that the confessor will violate the seal; likewise if the penitent by confessing integrally would violate the seal. These will scarcely take place.

3. Danger of a fall arising from diligent examination and recollection of sins.

4. Danger of damage to be feared for a scrupulous person from integral confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 484-488).

Question. Whether extraordinary shame excuses.

Response. All concede: 1. that those who are more ashamed than others are not excused; 2. that shame which arises from a circumstance commonly occurring does not excuse. But some judge that shame arising from an extraordinary circumstance excuses, for instance if someone had to confess a very disgraceful sin to his nephew. But this opinion seems wholly to be rejected, according to what was said on p. 135.

328 IV. Damage of the confessor or of a third party to be prevented, for instance if the penitent is infected with plague, and integral confession would expose the confessor to danger of contagion; or if the penitent fears that by confessing integrally he would create danger of a fall for a confessor inclined to lust (St. Alphonsus, VI, 479; 484-488).

Question. Whether there is an obligation of confessing a sin which cannot be manifested without infamy of the accomplice or of any third party.

Response 1. It must be affirmed if the penitent, independently of the precept of integrity, enjoys the right of bringing infamy on the accomplice or third party, for instance if the accomplice, as regards the crime of which there is question, has been condemned by a judge. The reason is that in the case the natural law of preserving reputation is not opposed to the precept of integrity.

Response 2. Outside the hypothesis posited, it is disputed. Some deny. Others not only deny, but also teach that under light obligation[1] it is illicit to confess a sin of this kind, because the natural law of preserving the reputation of one's neighbor prevails over the law of integrity. Others, whose opinion we embrace, affirm, and judge that the law of integrity, according to the mind of Christ, prevails. For: 1. if the opinion of the adversaries is admitted, provision often would not be made for the prudent ministration of the sacrament. For prudent ministration commonly, as is clear from Trent,[2] requires the manifestation of all sins according to species, number, and circumstances changing the species. 2. If that opinion is admitted, the law of integrity would not rarely become illusory, since especially in smaller places the confessor can easily suspect who the accomplice is, and another confessor cannot conveniently be approached. Add that in antiquity there was the custom, and of itself the obligation, of confessing to the parish priest, who was accustomed to know his subjects and their circumstances. 3. Authors both more numerous and more outstanding in authority adhere to the stricter opinion, for example St. Thomas (in 4, distinction 16, question 3, article 2), St. Alphonsus (VI, 489), St. Bernard,[3] St. Antoninus,[4] St. Bonaventure,[5] Cajetan,[6] Suarez,[7] Lugo.[8]

Nevertheless, the penitent is bound under light obligation,[9] if it can be done conveniently, to approach a confessor to whom the accomplice is unknown. But a just cause excuses from this obligation, as if otherwise the penitent would remain for some time in the state of mortal sin, or would have to abstain from Communion or celebration which he was accustomed to institute daily; if this confessor would be especially useful to the penitent, for instance by affording him greater quiet or consolation; if the penitent would confess with more difficulty to another than to his usual confessor, etc. (St. Alphonsus, VI, 490). Besides, in practice the confessor can commonly permit penitents to expose sins, and ask them about occasions and circumstances to be confessed, even if from that accidentally he comes to knowledge of the accomplice. Nevertheless, let him generally take care that penitents expose their own sins rather than the sins of others, for example of husband or wife.

Corollary I. In order that it be licit, because of the excusing causes explained above, not to confess integrally, it is required:

1. That there be some necessity or at least a moderate cause of confessing, for instance the precept of annual Communion or confession, or if someone could not omit Communion without notice; likewise the inconvenience of remaining, for instance for a day, in sin, or of omitting Communion which he was accustomed to receive daily (St. Alphonsus, VI, 487).
2. That another confessor cannot be had without grave inconvenience, to whom integral confession can be made without the inconvenience which the penitent intends to avoid.

Corollary II. It is clear: 1. that only that sin can be kept back to the declaring of which the excusing inconvenience is attached;[10] 2. that sins kept back are afterward to be declared if the excusing inconvenience has ceased.

[1] Under light obligation only, because the manifestation of a sin to one man who will keep the secret is light, unless it concerns an enormous crime; or unless the sin is manifested to one from whom it is especially in the sinner's interest that it be hidden, for example to his superior.

[2] Session 14, chapter 5.

[3] Varia et brevia documenta, n. 1.

[4] Part 3, title 14, chapter 19, § 11.

[5] In 4, distinction 21, part 2, article 1, question 3.

[6] Summa, word Confessio, condition 3.

[7] Disputation 34, section 2, assertion 2.

[8] Disputation 16, section 7, n. 394.

[9] Under light obligation, because infamy before one trustworthy man is of itself venially evil.

[10] But it is disputed whether the whole sin or only the circumstance can be kept back if the inconvenience is attached only to the circumstance to be declared. Some teach that only the circumstance can be kept back; others judge that in the case the whole sin can be kept back when afterward the circumstance to be kept back cannot be supplied without the whole sin being exposed. Otherwise, they say, there would be an obligation of confessing the same thing twice. But the controversy is of little practical importance.

Point IV. On the Means of Procuring Integrity, or on the Examination of Conscience

329 I. The obligation of examining conscience exists insofar as it is required for confessing integrally. This is clear both from the Council of Trent[1] and canon 901, and from the fact that one who is bound to the end is also bound to the means.

[1] Session 14, chapter 5 and canon 7.

330 II. Required diligence. Ordinary or moderate diligence suffices, that is, such as a prudent man is accustomed to employ in a serious matter. It suffices even if someone judges that by examining conscience longer and more diligently he would remember more sins. Nevertheless, diligence depends on the capacity of the penitent, on the moral state of the soul, on the time concerning which the examination must be instituted, etc. (St. Alphonsus, VI, 471).

Question. Whether the penitent is bound to write down sins if otherwise he is exposed to grave danger of not confessing integrally.

Response. Negatively, because ordinary or moderate diligence suffices for knowing and retaining sins in memory. But writing exceeds the limits of ordinary diligence. Besides, very many men who confess rarely are in the said danger, and therefore, if the stricter opinion is admitted, they would be bound to writing. Now, from frequent use of that means so many inconveniences would follow - especially the manifestation of written confessions, which from carelessness, etc., would fall into others' hands - that that use cannot be held as prescribed.

331 III. Causes excusing from diligent, or at least from more accurate, examination of conscience are sufficiently clear from what has been said about the causes excusing from integrity. Thus, for example, the same examination is not required for the sick as for the healthy (St. Alphonsus, VI, 471). Add that one who arranges with the confessor about questioning can lessen diligence in examining, because examination is required only as a means.

Corollary I. Writing is generally also to be discouraged, except sometimes once or twice in life, when someone is about to institute a general confession.

Corollary II. One who is morally certain that he does not have necessary matter is not bound to examination; nevertheless it is advised, namely so that he may better know and uproot venial defects. Besides, let penitents not examine themselves longer either about doubtful sins or about temptations against chastity; it is better, with further examination omitted, to confess doubtful sins as doubtful.

Corollary III. One who is bound under grave obligation to diligent examination, and, after neglecting it, confesses, receives the sacrament invalidly and sacrilegiously if he sufficiently adverts to the grave defect; this rarely happens, so that confessions are rarely to be repeated precisely for that reason.

Corollary IV. Uneducated penitents who in confession are found to have examined their conscience negligently should commonly not be sent away so that they may examine themselves more diligently; rather the confessor himself should examine them (St. Alphonsus, VI, 471). The same holds concerning penitents who are found by the confessor to have kept back sins and not to have examined themselves regarding past sins.

Scholion I. On Repeating Confessions in General

332 Preliminary I. The obligation of repeating confessions in which necessary matter is involved can arise from a defect either of validity or of integrity, for instance if someone previously confessed sins without species and number, or if the confessor, because of deafness or sleep, did not hear or understand the things confessed.[1] But an invalid confession can be either simply invalid, or invalid and sacrilegious. It is also sacrilegious at the same time when the penitent sinned gravely in the very reception of the sacrament.

Preliminary II. Defect of validity can come:

1. From the confessor, for example if he lacked jurisdiction, if he omitted the form or changed it substantially.

2. From the penitent, for example if he was ignorant of things to be known and believed by necessity of means, if he lacked contrition or purpose, if in bad faith he kept back a grave sin.

[1] In the case, for the most part at least generic confession is had, so that one cannot seriously doubt about validity.

333 I. The obligation of repeating confessions is had:

1. If someone confessed very incompletely, that is, without species and number. Nevertheless, this is not presumed, since the confessor must be presumed to have helped the penitent sufficiently.

2. If it is morally certain that someone confessed invalidly, as if someone continually and in the same way relapsed into a habit.

3. Disputation 1. Whether one who doubts whether he confessed invalidly is bound to repeat confessions. Moreover, it seems it must be said thus:

a) If the doubt about validity comes from doubt about the way in which someone confessed, for example whether with true contrition, the penitent is not bound to repeat the confessions, because he can presume that he confessed rightly according to that principle: in doubt, what has been done is presumed to have been rightly done (St. Alphonsus, VI, 505).

b) If the doubt does not come from doubt about the way in which someone confessed, but from the fact that it is doubted whether confession instituted in that way is valid,[1] the penitent seems to be bound to repeat the confession. For then there is no reason for presuming that the confession was valid, so that it is truly doubtfully valid and remains so. But one who, all things considered, seriously doubts whether he confessed validly seems to be bound to repetition. For one who certainly sinned gravely must take care that he enjoys, at least with moral certainty, the means prescribed of itself for obtaining pardon, that is, direct absolution from sin, or such an absolution as the sacrament of Penance confers by reason of itself, not merely insofar as remission of one mortal sin necessarily brings with it the expulsion of the others. But in the hypothesis posited direct absolution from sins is uncertain and remains uncertain until the sins are again subjected to the keys (St. Alphonsus, II, 2; VI, 450).[2] Whether in a following confession the sins must again be declared distinctly, or whether it suffices to confess them generally, draw from what is to be said in n. 334.

4. Disputation 2. How far there is an obligation of repeating confession if the confessor, because of deafness or sleep, understood the things confessed only in part. Now:

a) if the penitent knows which sins were not understood, he is bound to repeat these (n. 397).

b) if the penitent does not know that, he is bound to repeat the confession if it was brief, because as regards the individual sins he doubts whether they were understood; nor is there an inconvenience which excuses. But if the confession was long, the inconvenience of repeating it and consequently many sins already confessed and understood seems to excuse from integrity, or from renewing a distinct confession; and it suffices that the penitent declare in general that there are certain sins which the confessor did not perceive (St. Alphonsus, VI, 499).

[1] For instance, if someone, having confessed two sins, was contrite solely from a particular motive of one sin; or if he confessed while ignorant of the mysteries which probably must be known by necessity of means.

[2] What St. Alphonsus teaches here coheres very well with what is said in book VI, n. 595, where he teaches that the faithful are not to be compelled to repeat confessions unless it is morally established that they were invalid. The latter is generally true, and therefore can be stated in that way; but in the exceptional case discussed by the Holy Doctor in book II, n. 2, the principle cannot be applied, as otherwise it commonly can: in doubt one must stand for the validity of the act.

"If," Gaude adds, "there were a contradiction between the two places, those things which are handed down in the present place would certainly seem to be preferred, and it is clear that the Holy Doctor changed his opinion on this matter. For what is here asserted about necessarily repeating confession is absent in the first five editions of the Theologia Moralis, and is first found in the sixth edition printed in 1767; whereas, on the contrary, the doctrine taken from the tract on Penance had already obtained a place in the earlier editions of the Theologia Moralis" (note in this place). But, as I noted, there is no contradiction.

334 II. The manner of repeating confessions. 1. If the repetition is made before the same confessor before whom the invalid confessions were made, then:

a) If the confessor has retained at least confused knowledge of the state of the penitent, it suffices, as regards the sins confessed, that these be subjected to the keys by a general accusation. For in the case there are had, or rather previously were had, confession and distinct judicial knowledge; besides, here and now there are had confession at least generic and confused judicial knowledge. That more is required is commonly and quite soundly denied. Note also that confused knowledge can sometimes be gathered from the penance itself imposed and retained in memory (St. Alphonsus, VI, 502).

b) If the confessor has not retained even confused knowledge, nor can gather it from the penance imposed and known, it suffices, but more probably is also required, that he resume confused knowledge; or that the penitent again expose in a confused way the sins previously confessed, for example by saying that he sinned against chastity, temperance, justice, religion. That this suffices is clear from what was said under a). That this is required, with St. Alphonsus (VI, 502) against several more recent authors,[1] we hold as more probable, and indeed: 1. because sentence does not seem to be pronounced unless the judge has at least confused knowledge of the state of the penitent, that is, has retained it or now resumes it; 2. because otherwise a sufficiently fitting penance cannot be imposed.

2. If the repetition is made before a different confessor, the confessions must be repeated integrally. The reason is that the confessor who pronounces sentence must have or have had distinct judicial knowledge of the sins. Nevertheless, sometimes it will suffice to question the penitent, for example, about the last year; namely if, because of a uniform manner of life, a sufficient judgment can at the same time be formed about the preceding years - that is, one equal to what would be obtained by a repetition of the confessions. The same is to be applied if the confessor, after hearing the confession of the last year, detects a defect of past confessions; in which case it suffices that the confessor has retained knowledge of the sins heard, and from that knowledge forms a sufficient judgment about the past years. In either case, however, let the penitent accuse himself in a general way concerning the preceding years (St. Alphonsus, VI, 504).

Corollary I. Whether the repetition is made before the same confessor or before a different confessor, those things which perhaps were lacking to integrity in the prior confessions must always be added by the penitent. Besides, if the prior confessions were sacrilegious, let the penitent declare how often he received the sacrament of Penance and Holy Communion, likewise whether he received other sacraments, namely Confirmation, Matrimony, Extreme Unction; finally whether and how often he injured the precepts of annual Confession and Communion, whether by neglecting them or by receiving the sacraments sacrilegiously.[2]

Corollary II. It sometimes happens that prior confessions were invalid, but not later ones; for instance if the penitent at first confessed without contrition but in good faith, and afterward with due disposition; likewise if at first sacrilegiously, but afterward, having forgotten the sacrilege, he validly received the sacrament. Now it is clear that these things are to be attended to in the repetition of confessions.

[1] They say that it suffices that the confessor remember that this penitent had confessed and been judged.

[2] Many, however, are ignorant that by sacrilegiously receiving the sacraments they injure that twofold precept.

Scholion II. On General Confession

335 I. Notion. General confession is that by which several confessions previously instituted are repeated. It can comprehend either one's whole life or a notable part of it.

336 II. How far is it to be instituted? 1. It is necessary for those who have confessed either invalidly, whether simply invalidly or at the same time sacrilegiously, or very incompletely (n. 332); likewise in the doubt about the validity of confession discussed in n. 333.

2. It must be prohibited to the scrupulous, and to those for whom the recollection of sins would become a danger of relapse or of grave temptations. If, however, the necessity of general confession were established, let it be prudently instituted. Cf. nevertheless, as regards the scrupulous, what was said in n. 327.

3. It is useful: 1. in doubt about the nullity of confessions; 2. on the occasion a) of solemn First Communion; b) of the choice of a state of life, whether conjugal, religious, or clerical through Major Orders; c) of spiritual exercises or a Mission,[1] at least from the last general confession; 3. in dangerous illness. But the choice of a new confessor commonly is not a reason for instituting a general confession. Besides, it can easily be permitted that sins of past life be repeated summarily.

[1] Postulants, before they begin the novitiate, "according to the prudent judgment of the confessor, should premise a general confession of their past life" (canon 541).

337 III. The manner of receiving it. 1. Things to be premised. First let the confessor inquire whether or not general confession is necessary,[1] and therefore in a friendly way ask the penitent for what reason he desires to institute a general confession. Next, let him inquire into the age and state of the penitent, especially whether he is married, whether he is being courted or seeking marriage; likewise sometimes about satisfactions fulfilled. Finally, let him ask whether the penitent would prefer to make the confession himself or to be questioned.

2. Things to be observed in confession. First let inquiry be made into sins committed after the last confession. When this has been done:

a) According to some, it is better to divide life into diverse epochs, for instance from infancy up to the choice of a state of life, etc., and to question separately about the individual epochs. According to others, it is more expedient, or equally expedient, to question about sins in one continuous course, meanwhile taking account of the diverse epochs. According to others, the questioning should be made about the sixth precept according to the diverse epochs, and about other sins in one continuous course.

b) In questioning, let a definite order be observed, for instance by successively inquiring into sins against: 1. the precepts of the Decalogue; 2. the precepts of the Church; 3. the duties of one's state. Others refer all sins to the Decalogue. If, however, it is clear that the penitent has kept back some sin, let him first be questioned about this. Besides, it is generally better at the beginning of confession to inquire into sins against the sixth precept, especially if the confessor suspects that the penitent has not led a chaste life.

For the rest, let each confessor set before himself a definite order which he will observe. The questions to be proposed can be compared in Aertnys.[2]

3. Things to be added. At the end let him ask the penitent whether any anxiety of conscience remains, and let him render him entirely at peace.

[1] If general confession is not necessary, the confessor can moderate the questions; but let him proceed in such a way that the penitent does not notice this; hence let him not strive to finish everything very quickly, lest he leave the penitent anxious and not content.

[2] Theologia pastoralis, nn. 247-256.

Scholion III. On Venial Sins to Be Confessed and on Doubtful Matter Alone Confessed

338 I. Since venial sins indeed can be declared (n. 294), but do not necessarily have to be declared, there is no obligation of declaring them according to species and number. Nevertheless, that they be manifested at least according to species is greatly to be advised because of the reasons alleged in n. 310. Indeed, it can happen that the confessor must ask about species and number, namely so that he may judge concerning the disposition of the penitent, or so that he may know whether, because of coalescing matter, a grave sin has been committed or a grave obligation of restoring has arisen. But the penitent, rightly questioned, is bound to respond.

339 II. A penitent who confesses only doubtful matter or doubtful mortal sins, after certain and more or less determined matter has been sought, is absolved absolutely. If matter more or less determined cannot be obtained, let the penitent, after a generic confession of all sins has been sought, be given absolution (n. 310).

Chapter III. On the Form, or on Absolution

340 The form of the sacrament of Penance is: I absolve thee from thy sins in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen. This, however, together with the things to be added, is related thus by the Roman Ritual:[1]

"May almighty God have mercy on thee, and having forgiven thy sins, bring thee to eternal life. Amen.

Then, with the right hand raised toward the penitent, he says: May the almighty and merciful Lord grant thee indulgence, absolution, and remission of thy sins. Amen. May our Lord Jesus Christ absolve thee, and I by his authority absolve thee from every bond of excommunication, suspension, and interdict, insofar as I can and thou needest.

Then I absolve thee from thy sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen.

If the penitent is a layman, the word suspension is omitted. But a bishop in absolving the faithful makes the sign of the cross three times.

May the Passion of our Lord Jesus Christ, the merits of the Blessed Virgin Mary and of all the Saints, whatever good thou hast done and whatever evil thou hast sustained, be unto thee for remission of sins, increase of grace, and reward of eternal life. Amen.

For a just cause the Misereatur, etc., can be omitted, and it is enough to say: May our Lord Jesus Christ, etc., as above, up to that part: May the Passion of our Lord, etc.

But when some grave necessity presses in danger of death, the priest will be able to say briefly: I absolve thee from all censures and sins, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen."

As regards the prayers attached to the formula of absolution, canon 885 says this: "Although the prayers attached by the Church to the formula of absolution are not necessary for obtaining absolution itself, nevertheless, unless for a just cause, let them not be omitted."

[1] Title III, chapter 2.

341 I. The essentials of the form. 1. Certainly these suffice for validity: I absolve thee from sins. It is disputed whether these suffice: I absolve thee; and: I absolve from thy sins. The words I, in the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit, and Amen oblige, but only under venial sin.

2. The formula by which the form is uttered must be formally, or as regards sense, indicative, and not only formally deprecative; in other words, the priest must manifest that by ministerial power he imparts remission to the penitent, and not only signify that he prays for remission from God for the penitent. The reason is that absolution is a judicial act; a mere prayer is not of this kind.

Question. Whether a formula grammatically, that is, considering the words alone, deprecative can be valid.

Response. Affirmatively; for: 1. A formula of this kind can, from the circumstances - others say, from use approved by the Church - have an indicative sense, or exhibit a judicial sentence; for instance, if there is a use of uttering the said formula with the intention of remitting sins. But from no head is it clear that more is required; in other words, that a formula is required which is also grammatically indicative. 2. A formula grammatically deprecative was used quite commonly in the Eastern Church, and is even now used; and the same use flourished for centuries in the Latin Church.

In the Latin Church the indicative formula has been prescribed; hence a formula grammatically deprecative is illicit. Whether it is also invalid is not clear from what has been said above.

3. The sense of the form or of absolution is presented in different ways by different authors. Some state the sense thus: I remit sins to thee. But the sense must, if the sacrament is received validly, always be verified. But the aforesaid sense is not verified: 1. if the sacrament remains informe; 2. if absolution regards sins already remitted. For it is repugnant that sins already remitted or deleted be remitted or deleted again. This cannot happen except in appearance. Indeed, it is objected that a father can say to his son: "Again I remit everything to thee." But the said words effect nothing, and are merely a new sign of a remission already carried out; and if the matter concerns the form of a sacrament, this does not suffice. Others present the sense of absolution with these words: I confer upon thee grace of itself remissive of sin. But this sense also is not verified in an informe sacrament. Others speak thus: I bestow upon thee the sacramental title of absolution. But this opinion rests on the doctrine of intentional causality, which is less pleasing according to what was said in the treatise on the sacraments in general. Therefore the sense seems to be: I confer upon thee, as much as is on the part of the sacrament, absolution from sin; or: I confer upon thee a sacrament of itself absolving from sin; or, as St. Thomas speaks: I "bestow upon thee the sacrament, understand: of itself, of absolution" (3 p., question 84, article 3, ad 5). This sense is verified even in an informe sacrament; likewise if the matter concerns sin already remitted. For the sacrament can be of itself absolving from sin, even if sin is not actually remitted, as in an informe sacrament, or when it has already been remitted.

342 II. The accidentals of the form. 1. The words Misereatur, etc., Indulgentiam, etc., and Passio Domini, etc., according to the Roman Ritual cited above and canon 885, can be omitted for a just cause, for instance, as earlier editions of the Ritual have it, if confessions are more frequent and briefer; indeed, from the fact that Trent[1] says that prayers are laudably added, they can quite probably always be omitted without sin (St. Alphonsus, VI, 430, doubt 3). The same can be said of the raising of the hand, to be continued from the word Indulgentiam up to Passio Domini, and of the sign of the cross. Nevertheless, commonly one should not depart from the rubric.

2. Absolution from censures must be premised to absolution from sins; and indeed under grave obligation if the confessor holds at least as probable that the penitent is bound by a censure which prohibits reception of the sacrament. One who by a single formula absolved from censures and from sins would sin only lightly, provided he intended to absolve first, in order, from censures; indeed, quite probably he would not sin if no probable suspicion is present that the penitent has incurred some censure (St. Alphonsus, VI, 430, doubt 4).

3. The word suspension should be omitted if the penitent is a layman. The word then, previously printed in authentic editions sometimes in red, sometimes in black type, in later editions is printed in black type, so that now it cannot be held as a mere rubric, but must be expressed. To omit it is venial, just as to omit the words in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Spirit. Amen. The words whatever good thou hast done, etc., may it be unto thee for remission of sins, according to St. Thomas (Quodlibet 3, article 28) and others, while others contradict, elevate all the good works of the penitent to sacramental satisfaction, provided the confessor intends this, at least implicitly, by intending to benefit the penitent as much as he can.

4. Where there is a custom that the penitent before confession asks for a blessing, let the confessor impart it, saying: May the Lord be in thy heart and on thy lips, that thou mayest rightly confess thy sins.

[1] Session 14, on Penance, chapter 3.

343 III. The manner of uttering the form. It is required:

1. For validity, that the form be uttered: 1. by voice; 2. upon one physically or corporally present.

a) By voice. "The form of this sacrament," says the Synod of Florence, "is the words of absolution which the priest utters when he says..." Universal Tradition is added. Therefore absolution given by letters or by a nod is not valid.

b) Upon one physically present. For from the decrees of Clement VIII and Paul V, of which we spoke in n. 312, it is licit in no case to give absolution to one absent; the sole reason of which absolute prohibition can be that absolution of this kind is invalid. It is added that sacramental judgment is judged to have been instituted as human judgments were and are accustomed to be exercised, and as it is fitting that they be exercised. But human judgments were and are accustomed to be exercised among those physically present, and it is fitting that they be exercised thus.

Moreover, the physical presence which is required must be taken morally, so that that presence suffices within which men can speak with one another in a common voice, even if a louder one. A distance of about twenty paces, considering distance alone, according to St. Alphonsus, is not opposed to validity. For the rest, note: 1. It very probably does not suffice that the penitent be seen by the confessor, because from that he is not constituted present; 2. if the penitent and confessor are in different rooms, absolution will more easily be invalid; 3. in order that absolution not be certainly invalid, such presence suffices that, if there were no impediment, the penitent could be perceived by some sense; 4. if the required presence is present, it is not required that the confessor actually see the penitent or perceive him by some sense (St. Alphonsus, VI, 428, 429); 5. if the discussion concerns absolution of a continuous multitude, presence can be taken in a broader sense; indeed, in the case nothing seems to prevent many from being far off, provided the multitude as such is near.

Corollary I. If a penitent not yet absolved has departed from the confessional, let him be absolved if he is seen nearby or is known not to be far away. Nevertheless, it is better that he be recalled, if it can conveniently be done. If the confessor because of danger of infection or another cause cannot enter the room of the sick person, let him absolve him from the doorway. If someone seems to be falling from a roof or into a river, let him be absolved under condition (St. Alphonsus, VI, 429).

Corollary II. Absolution given by telephone is very probably invalid. For truly and according to common estimation there is speech between those physically absent. This is confirmed by the fact that not even that is present which according to some constitutes sufficient presence; in other words, not even the voice itself, but, as in the phonograph, only a reproduction of the voice is heard. Nevertheless, until the authority of the Church has settled the question,[1] I would not condemn one who in a case of necessity absolves under condition by means of the telephone.

Corollary III. Absolution given through an ear-tube is commonly doubtfully valid. In the case the human voice indeed is heard; but it is doubtful whether conjunction through an ear-tube and the human voice renders persons staying in different rooms or places of the house sufficiently present. Hence in a case of necessity absolution should be granted under condition.

[1] The Sacred Penitentiary, to the question "whether in a case of extreme necessity absolution can be given by telephone," on July 1, 1884, responded: "nothing is to be answered."

344 2. For liceity, it is required that absolution be conferred: 1. only upon those who enjoy the right of receiving it, as will be explained afterward; 2. absolutely or under condition, as follows:

a) Absolution, if it is conferred, must be conferred absolutely when it is at least morally certain that the requisites for the validity of the sacrament are present. Broader moral certainty suffices (n. 398).

b) Absolution can and must be conferred under condition if it is seriously doubted whether it can be conferred validly, but grave damage threatens the penitent if it is denied; if lesser damage threatens, absolution can be given but need not be given (St. Alphonsus, VI, 431).

c) The sacrament should be conferred under the condition if thou art capable rather than under the condition if thou art disposed.[1] The reason alleged is that in this way better provision is made for the validity and reviviscence of the sacrament. For according to many, less is required for capacity of receiving the sacrament than for the required disposition by which it is fruitfully received (n. 299). And so it can happen that the sacrament conferred under the condition if thou art capable is validly ministered, and afterward, when the required disposition arrives, revives; the sacrament, I say, which, conferred under the condition if thou art disposed, would be conferred invalidly and therefore could not revive. Moreover, these things are true if by the condition if thou art disposed is understood: if thou art disposed to receive the sacrament fruitfully. For the rest, it also suffices to confer the sacrament "according to the mind of Christ or of the Church"; nor is it required that the condition be stated in words, but it suffices to have conceived it mentally.

Corollary I. Absolution under condition can and must be conferred:

1. If the confessor doubts whether he absolved a penitent who confessed a grave or doubtfully grave sin. If the penitent confessed only venial sins, the confessor can, but need not, absolve him under condition; in other words, he can prefer either the convenience of the penitent or the reverence of itself belonging to the sacrament. For the rest, in doubt about absolution having been given, it can commonly be presumed that it was granted.
2. In doubt whether the penitent still lives; whether the dying person, deprived of the senses, is Catholic, or at least enrolled in a sect which admits the sacrament of Penance.
3. In doubt about sufficient use of reason in children and in the half-witted, if they have probably sinned gravely. If this is not probable, absolution should at least sometimes be conferred.
4. In doubt about necessary remote matter, for example if the penitent has confessed only a doubtfully grave sin and certain matter cannot easily be obtained. If there is doubt about free remote matter, in other words, if the penitent has confessed only a doubtfully sinful act and certain matter can be had with difficulty, absolution should be granted at least sometimes. But these things are almost merely theoretical, since, at least by means of generic confession, matter sufficiently certain can commonly be obtained.
5. In doubt whether the penitent who confessed mortal sins is disposed, let him be absolved, as will be explained afterward.
6. In doubt about the required presence (St. Alphonsus, VI, 432; Homo Apostolicus, tract XVI, n. 9).
7. In doubt whether the confessor enjoys jurisdiction over the penitent, according to what is to be said afterward.

Question 1. Whether a penitent absolved under condition must be warned about repeating confession.

Response. Affirmatively, if it can be done prudently. But commonly an admonition of this kind will give occasion to anxieties of the penitent and perplexities of the confessor. But sins perhaps not remitted will be remitted in the following valid confession. Sometimes, however, it can be done prudently if the penitent is absolved under condition because of doubtful jurisdiction of the confessor.

Question 2. Whether a penitent absolved under condition can be admitted to Holy Communion.

Response. Strictly speaking, he cannot be admitted to Holy Communion, because he probably remains in a mortal state. Nevertheless, prudence will commonly advise that the confessor be silent (St. Alphonsus, I, 51).

[1] Formerly some taught that absolution conferred under the condition if thou art disposed is always invalid. But this opinion is now commonly rejected (St. Alphonsus, VI, 432).

Chapter IV. On the Integral Part, or on Satisfaction

We shall speak first of the notion and efficacy of satisfaction, then of the power and obligation of imposing satisfaction, and then of the obligation of accepting and fulfilling satisfaction.

Article I. On the Notion and Efficacy of Satisfaction

The discussion concerns actual satisfaction, not satisfaction insofar as it is only in purpose.

345 I. Notion. What satisfaction generically taken is has been said in t. I, n. 979. But sacramental satisfaction is compensation for temporal punishment owed because of sins, through an afflictive work. Therefore sacramental satisfaction is not a prayer which someone says in place of a penance he has forgotten. Nor does it suffice that the confessor afterward ratify that prayer, because satisfaction must be imposed before it is performed.

346 II. Efficacy. Sacramental satisfaction compensates for, and thus removes, temporal punishment not only ex opere operantis but also ex opere operato. The reason is that the said satisfaction is not only a salutary and meritorious act, satisfying de condigno for some remaining punishment, but also an integral part of the sacrament; in other words, satisfaction effects that the sacrament be an efficacious sign of integral, or more perfect, remission, or remission extending itself to the debt of remaining punishment. But through sacramental satisfaction so much punishment is removed as corresponds to the satisfaction performed, so that by a heavier penance more, and by a lighter penance less, of the punishment owed is remitted.

It is disputed whether actual satisfaction also increases sanctifying grace ex opere operato (cf. St. Thomas, 3 p., question 90, article 2, ad 2).

Article II. On the Power and Obligation of Imposing Satisfaction

347 I. Power and obligation of imposing satisfaction. The ministers of the sacrament of Penance can and of themselves must impose satisfaction. This is clear: 1. from the Council of Trent[1] and from canon 887; 2. from the universal and constant practice of the Church, which is shown in penitential books, rituals, and testimonies of Councils[2] and of the Holy Fathers;[3] 3. from theological reasons. For the confessor must, as judge, punish the accused, and, as physician, provide medicine to him; these things are done through the imposition of vindicative and medicinal satisfaction[4] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 506).

I said that the confessor of himself must impose satisfaction, because accidentally he is not bound when the penitent cannot perform any satisfaction; this, however, scarcely happens except in one dying, deprived of the senses, or lacking mental power. Those gravely sick commonly can fulfill at least a very slight satisfaction, so that very rarely is there a cause excusing from all satisfaction (St. Alphonsus, VI, 507).

[1] Session 14, canon 15 and chapter 8.

[2] Cf. Council of Laodicea (372), canon 2 (Harduin, t. 1, col. 1531); Third Council of Carthage (397), canon 31 (Harduin, t. 2, col. 1404).

[3] Cf. dogmatic theologians.

[4] Council of Trent, at the cited place.

348 II. How much satisfaction is to be imposed? This can be deduced from these words of the Council of Trent: "Therefore the priests of the Lord, so far as spirit and prudence shall suggest, ought, according to the quality of the crimes and the capacity of the penitents, to enjoin salutary and fitting satisfactions, lest, if perhaps they connive at sins and deal too indulgently with penitents by enjoining certain very light works for very grave offenses, they become participants in others' sins."[1] These words of canon 887 correspond to them: "According to the quality and number of sins and the condition of the penitent, let the confessor enjoin salutary and fitting satisfactions." Therefore satisfaction must be in some way proportioned to sins. Hence:

1. Let a light satisfaction be imposed for free matter, that is, for venial sins and for mortal sins already declared;[2] a grave satisfaction for necessary matter, that is, for a mortal sin not yet declared. Thus at least generally: since, if a penitent who confessed a mortal sin omitted a grave sin because of forgetfulness, it seems that a light satisfaction can be imposed afterward on one confessing the omitted sin. Besides, for a greater number and gravity of sins let the satisfaction be increased, but not arithmetically.

A work is judged grave which, if it were commanded by the Church, would oblige under grave obligation, for example hearing Mass, a rosary of five decades, the Litany of All Saints, abstinence or fasting of one day. Some judge that grave satisfaction is already contained in a prayer which is equivalent to a Little Hour of the divine office, because sacramental satisfaction has greater dignity and force by reason of the sacrament of which it is an integral part. But that greater force and dignity does not seem to be considered, because satisfaction must primarily compensate for the injury inflicted on God, or primarily be vindicative or punitive, so that the punitive force must primarily be regarded, not the force that deletes punishment. It is added that almost all authors require heavier matter for grave satisfaction.

2. As regards the gravity of the obligation of imposing proportionate satisfaction, take these things:

a) By the consent of all, one who imposed no satisfaction, or a very slight satisfaction, for very grave sins would sin gravely. The reason is that proportion is notably lacking.

b) According to most authors, one who enjoined no satisfaction for a mortal sin would sin gravely. The reason is that also in this case proportion is notably lacking. It is added that the sacrament is deprived of an integral part, and a grave one.

c) It is more disputed whether one who enjoined a light satisfaction for a grave sin would sin gravely. Moreover, it seems this must be affirmed, because also in this case proportion is notably lacking; indeed, morally speaking, it is equally or almost equally absent as in the case in which no satisfaction is imposed for a grave sin.

Objection. The more benign opinion is more conformable to the words of Trent cited above, which indicate that one sins gravely only when a very slight satisfaction is imposed for very grave sins.

Response. The words of Trent can well be taken by way of example.

d) Besides, it is asked whether a confessor who imposes no satisfaction for light matter sins gravely. Some affirm, because he deprives the sacrament of an integral part, which seems grave. Others sufficiently probably deny this, because it does not seem grave to deprive the sacrament of a complement or light integral part.

e) Finally, of itself, one who imposes a simply grave satisfaction for very grave sins sins lightly.

[1] Session 14, chapter 8.

[2] It is disputed whether the confessor can sometimes impose grave satisfaction for light sins which strongly dispose to mortal sin; likewise for mortal sins already remitted, for which worthy penance has not been performed (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 517). Whatever the case may be, certainly from elsewhere there is an obligation of employing the means necessary for avoiding mortal sin.

349 III. What kind of satisfaction is to be imposed? The Council of Trent[1] teaches thus: "Let them have before their eyes that the satisfaction which they impose be not only for the protection of new life and as a remedy of infirmity, but also for the vengeance and chastisement of past sins." Add canon 887 cited in n. 348. Therefore satisfaction vindicative, medicinal, and fitting for the penitent must be imposed; in other words, such as is punitive as regards committed sins, preservative as regards future ones, and congruous to the state and circumstances of the penitent. For the rest:

1. All good works can be imposed, even:

a) Internal works, since by the imposition of the confessor and the acceptance of the penitent they are sufficiently sensible so that they can be an integral part of the sacrament (St. Alphonsus, VI, 514, doubt 1). Nevertheless, meditation should not be imposed on those little accustomed to it, because it is too difficult and would give occasion to scruples.

b) Works to be applied for the dead or for others; in which case the satisfactory force which belongs to the said works ex opere operantis is granted to the dead or to others; that which belongs to them ex opere operato comes to the penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 514, doubt 2).

c) Works owed from elsewhere; for nothing prevents them from being elevated by absolution to sacramental satisfaction. Nevertheless, it is not expedient to impose works of this kind except because of the fragility of the penitent. Besides, an intention of imposing a voluntary work is presumed in the confessor, unless the contrary is understood from the circumstances (St. Alphonsus, VI, 513, doubt 1).

d) Abstinence from some good work, because abstinence can become an act of obedience or of another virtue (St. Alphonsus, VI, 514, doubt 3). Nevertheless, abstinence from Communion should not be imposed, both lest someone be impeded from frequent Communion, and because the fruit of the sacrament is to be preferred to the said acts of virtues.

e) Whether a work to be fulfilled if the penitent relapses can be imposed as the only satisfaction is disputed. With St. Alphonsus (VI, 524) and others, it seems this must be denied, because satisfaction must be performed certainly or absolutely. The adversaries indeed say that in the case the greater effort itself to guard against relapse is for satisfaction. But it is supposed that a work to be fulfilled if the penitent relapses is imposed; not, however, that greater effort, so that this cannot be for satisfaction. Nevertheless, St. Alphonsus grants with others that to proportionate satisfaction there can be added the precept of fulfilling some work if the penitent relapses.

f) Whether a work to be fulfilled only by counsel can be validly[2] imposed is likewise disputed. But with St. Alphonsus (VI, 518) we have denied it, because the act of imposing satisfaction is primarily a punitive or vindicative act. But the nature of a punitive act implies that punishment is truly imposed, not merely counseled. The adversaries object that the act of designating a punishment and elevating it to sacramental dignity is an act of jurisdiction. Let that pass; but, as follows from what has been said, it is not an act of jurisdiction such as the imposition of satisfaction requires, that is, a punitive act.

2. Certain works cannot be imposed, or at least should not be imposed, as follows:

a) A public work which suggests suspicion of a grave sin committed cannot be imposed for hidden sins; both because the Roman Ritual prohibits it,[3] and because it harms the reputation of the penitent. But a public work can be imposed for public sins, as Trent[4] and chapter 1, De poenitentiis et remissionibus, teach. Nor should it be objected that a public work could suggest suspicion of a confessed sin and therefore violation of the seal. For observance of the seal forbids only an act of the confessor which suggests suspicion of a confessed sin, not cooperation in an act of the penitent which brings with it the said suspicion and, as posited by the penitent himself, cannot be opposed to the seal (St. Thomas, in 4, distinction 14, question 1, article 5, solution 1; St. Alphonsus, VI, 511, 521). "For the rest, if public penance is not so necessary, they rightly say... that the confessor should not impose it on one resisting, since otherwise the salvation of the penitent and the repair of scandal can be obtained, namely through public frequenting of the sacraments, visitation of churches, hearing of Masses, entrance into some Congregation where works of piety are exercised, and similar things" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 512).

b) The religious state and matrimony cannot be imposed, because they require complete freedom. Besides, to impose the religious state can be dangerous for the penitent. Nevertheless, matrimony is very much to be counseled to many (St. Alphonsus, VI, 511).

c) Works to which the penitent is opposed, or which there is danger of omitting; hence, for example, it should commonly not be imposed on children that they ask pardon from their parents (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, 52-54).

d) Longer works, for example for two months, or complicated works, or uncertain and not sufficiently defined works, such as to tolerate adversities patiently (St. Alphonsus, at the cited place).

3. The following can opportunely be imposed, for example: 1. "Hearing Mass, the Rosary, the Way of the Cross, though the latter two should not be enjoined on those to whom they are unfamiliar, almsgiving, Penitential Psalms, Litanies, meditations, pious readings, etc. 2. On individual days through one or another week, or through a month, to pay certain prayers, for example, the Angelic Salutation three times morning and evening. St. Alphonsus was accustomed generally to enjoin, or at least to counsel, this penance with the invocation: 'Through thy Immaculate Conception, O Mary, make my body pure and my soul holy,' to those who were not accustomed to frequent those prayers. Besides, 3. for a fixed time every evening to elicit an act of sorrow and every morning to renew the purpose of abstaining from such a sin. 4. Besides the satisfaction imposed absolutely, to fulfill some penance as often as the penitent has relapsed into some sin, for example, the Litany of the Blessed Virgin Mary, five Our Fathers and Hail Marys, some alms; for it helps much toward restraining an evil habit. Nevertheless, this penance is to be enjoined only for a brief time, because of danger of neglect, for instance for a month, until the next confession. 5. Within a determined time to confess again, and, if it is expedient, to communicate; unless, however, danger of omission stands in the way, as will not rarely happen; then it is better to exhort urgently to frequenting the sacraments. Wherefore it must be kept before the eyes that, although of itself it would be greatly advantageous to enjoin frequenting of the sacraments and alms, experience nevertheless teaches that this becomes harmful to those who rarely exercise these good works."[5]

[1] Session 14, chapter 8.

[2] That this is done illicitly follows from the fact that confessors according to Trent (session 14, chapter 8) and canon 887 must enjoin - not merely counsel - satisfaction.

[3] Title III, chapter 1, n. 22.

[4] Session 24, chapter 8, on reform.

[5] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 322.

350 IV. Causes excusing from imposing satisfaction owed of itself. Moreover:

1. The causes because of which it is licit to impose satisfaction less proportionate to the gravity or frequency of offenses, though not light satisfaction, are:

a) Vehement contrition, even if not most vehement.

b) The occasion of a jubilee or plenary indulgence which the penitent intends to gain (St. Alphonsus, VI, 510; Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 49).

c) Fear lest the penitent, because of the proportionate penance to be fulfilled, will seek laxer confessors or will omit the sufficiently proportionate satisfaction itself; nevertheless, these dangers can commonly be forestalled by adding a work or works already owed from elsewhere (St. Alphonsus, VI, 509, 513; Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 50; cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, question 18, article 4).

d) Hope of enticing the penitent to more frequent confession by a lesser satisfaction (St. Alphonsus, VI, 510).

e) The will of the confessor to take upon himself part of the satisfaction. For it is established from the doctrine on the communion of Saints that one can satisfy for another. I said part, because if he were to take upon himself the whole satisfaction, the sacramental action to be performed by the penitent himself would be lacking. Besides, note that proposition 15, "that a penitent can by his own authority substitute another for himself, who will fulfill the penance in his place," was condemned by Alexander VII.[1] Nevertheless, the confessor can grant to the penitent that another pay the enjoined satisfaction for him, in which case the satisfaction is not the work performed by another, but the procuring of this work (St. Alphonsus, VI, 526).

f) Whether the words whatever good thou hast done, etc., are a cause because of which satisfaction can be lessened is disputed. A few affirm, because, they say, by those words the confessor probably elevates all the good works of the penitent to sacramental satisfaction, at least if he explicitly or implicitly intends to do that (n. 342). But even if that opinion is admitted, it nevertheless does not seem to be a reason for lessening satisfaction; since Trent, although it knew that the aforesaid formula was used by confessors, nevertheless seriously admonishes them to impose satisfaction fitting for sins.[2]

2. The causes because of which it is licit to impose light satisfaction for grave faults are:

a) Most vehement contrition.

b) Great satisfaction already performed.

c) Fear lest the penitent, because of the grave penance to be fulfilled, will seek laxer confessors, or will omit the grave penance itself; nevertheless, these dangers again can commonly be avoided by imposing a work already owed from elsewhere (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 509, 513; Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 50; cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, question 18, article 4).

3. A cause because of which it is licit to absolve without satisfaction imposed scarcely occurs except in one lacking mental power or in one dying, deprived of the senses. That this is licit because of a plenary indulgence Benedict XIV reprobates in the Constitution Inter praeteritos.[3] Note, however:

a) A very slight satisfaction, for example a very brief act of charity, invocation at least mentally of the names of Jesus and Mary, should be imposed in urgent danger of death (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 49).

b) As regards the sick, the Roman Ritual[4] admonishes that "a grave or laborious penance is not to be enjoined on them; but only that is to be indicated which, if they recover, they may perform at a suitable time. Meanwhile, according to the gravity of the illness, with some prayer or light satisfaction imposed and accepted, let them be absolved, as there will be need."

Finally, if the penitent after absolution confesses a sin omitted because of forgetfulness, the confessor indeed must impose a new satisfaction; but commonly he can satisfy this obligation by lessening the satisfaction imposed insofar as it regards the former confession, and leaving it unchanged insofar as it pertains to the later one. Some indeed judge that in the case a new satisfaction need not be imposed; but just as for a new absolution, at least practically, a new act of sorrow and a new confession are required, so also a new satisfaction must be imposed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 513). This opinion must be followed in practice, because otherwise the new absolution would be exposed to the danger of being deprived of an integral part.

Note. If satisfaction is diminished, it is sometimes useful to admonish the penitent about the smallness of the satisfaction imposed and to stir him up to supply voluntarily.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1115.

[2] Session 14, chapter 8.

[3] December 3, 1749.

[4] Title 3, chapter 1, n. 25.

351 V. Time of imposing satisfaction. Satisfaction can be imposed validly both before and after absolution; if it is imposed after absolution, let it not be enjoined too long after it, so that the moral unity of the judgment be preserved (p. 271). But it is expedient that it be imposed before absolution, both because this is conformable to the Roman Ritual,[1] and because the order of judgment counsels that satisfaction be enjoined and accepted before the penitent is absolved (St. Alphonsus, VI, 514).

[1] Title III, chapter 2, n. 1.

Scholion. On Commutation of Satisfaction

352 I. Nature of sacramental commutation. Commutation of satisfaction is a certain retraction or correction of the judgment, insofar as it imposed punishment; and just as in other judgments, so also in sacramental judgment it can be made by a competent judge.

353 II. The persons who can commute are confessors: both the one who imposed the satisfaction and another of the same jurisdiction. Those who are not confessors cannot commute, because commutation is a judicial act to be posited by virtue of the keys. I said "another of the same jurisdiction," for it is disputed whether a simple confessor can commute satisfaction imposed for a reserved sin. With St. Alphonsus (VI, 529, doubt 2), it seems this must be denied, because the confessor lacks power over a judgment instituted concerning a case whose treatment had been withdrawn from him. The adversaries object that reservation was removed by absolution, so that the simple confessor now has power over the aforesaid case or over those sins. I respond by conceding the assertion, but he lacks power over the judgment instituted concerning that case, so that he cannot moderate it; in other words, he cannot commute the enjoined satisfaction. Note, however, that the confessor has power over reserved matters, and therefore can commute satisfaction, in the case in which the Superior cannot conveniently be approached.

354 III. The manner of commuting. 1. For validity it is required that commutation be made in the sacramental tribunal, or in such a way that with the absolution given or to be given by the one commuting, it constitutes at least morally one thing. The reason is that satisfaction must become sacramental by force of absolution; this cannot take place unless it is united with it. Moreover, as regards the union with absolution required, take these things:

a) The commutation is certainly valid which is made either during the course of confession, or immediately after absolution, or at least while the penitent is still in the confessional. The reason is that the judgment still morally endures, so that the act of commuting morally constitutes one thing with the absolution.

b) It is disputed whether a greater space of time, and how much, can intervene between confession and the act of commuting. Now some extend the faculty of commuting to one or another day after the confession has been completed. Others judge that no space of time stands in the way of the required conjunction. Others, with St. Alphonsus (VI, 529), judge that commutation must be made immediately after absolution, or at least while the penitent is still in the confessional. As soon as, after receiving absolution, he has departed, the judicial process is finished, so that the judicial act, in the case the act of commuting, which afterward is instituted cannot constitute one thing with it, but must be directed to a new judicial process. I said that the process is finished as soon as the penitent, after receiving absolution, has departed. This indeed is pleasing in itself, and is confirmed by the fact that in the case the confessor could no longer speak with the penitent about the confession made without violating the sacramental seal.

Objection. Just as satisfaction fulfilled after a long time, so also the commutation of the same satisfaction not yet performed will always make one moral thing with the preceding confession.

Response. I deny the parity; namely, satisfaction is not a judicial action, as commutation is. But a judicial action, in order to constitute at least morally one thing with the judicial process, must be posited before the process is finished. It is added that, if the objection is admitted, commutation can be separated from absolution by as long a time as satisfaction; which few admit. For the rest, in doubt the opinion of St. Alphonsus is to be followed, lest the validity of the commutation be exposed to danger.

2. As regards liceity, a just cause is certainly required. It is not necessary for the penitent to repeat the sins, whether he confesses to the same or to another confessor. The reason is that the one commuting must not judge about sins already judged, but only about the reason for commuting. Nevertheless, a certain confused knowledge of the state of the penitent is required, because also the penance to be imposed by the confessor commuting must be, at least of itself, in some degree proportioned to the sins; likewise medicinal. But for the said ends the knowledge suffices which the confessor can gather from the very penance to be commuted; according to it and the disposition of the penitent let him direct himself in commuting (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 61; Theologia moralis, VI, 529, doubt 1).

Corollary I. The confessor, even when not asked, can commute satisfaction (St. Alphonsus, VI, 529, doubt 1).

Corollary II. Let commutation be made into a work more or less equally grave, unless according to what was explained above (n. 350) there is a cause for lessening satisfaction.

Corollary III. It is disputed whether the penitent after a commutation has been made can return to the former satisfaction, or whether this must be held as retracted. More commonly it is affirmed that the faculty of choosing either satisfaction remains to the penitent. Nevertheless, the matter is doubtful, because it is not clear that the confessor can proceed in such a way that it depends on the choice of the penitent which act will constitute the integral part of the sacrament.

Article III. On the Obligation of Accepting and Fulfilling Satisfaction

355 I. Obligation of accepting satisfaction. The penitent is bound, considering present discipline, to accept an equitable satisfaction (canon 887). This follows from the right and obligation of the confessor to impose it. Moreover:

1. The obligation of accepting satisfaction seems grave if the satisfaction imposed is grave. Nor should it be objected that the penitent can depart without grave fault, because he is not bound under grave obligation to complete the sacrament, or because it is not grave to posit only part of the rite. For even if that is conceded, nevertheless a grave obligation of accepting seems to follow from the right and grave obligation of the confessor to impose grave satisfaction.
2. The obligation of accepting satisfaction seems only light if the satisfaction imposed is light. The reason is that in the case a grave obligation of not departing is not clear.
3. Likewise the penitent is bound under grave obligation to have the will of fulfilling the satisfaction imposed, if the matter concerns grave satisfaction. If the satisfaction is light, some require under grave obligation the will of fulfilling it, because according to them the will of fulfilling pertains to the essence of the sacrament (n. 291). Others demand the said will only under light obligation, because of the contrary reason. Because the former opinion is probable, in practice it must be said that the will of fulfilling a light satisfaction is required under grave obligation, namely lest the sacrament be exposed to danger of nullity.
4. Of itself the penitent does not sin by accepting satisfaction with the intention of asking commutation from another, because a petition for commutation of itself involves nothing evil.

Corollary I. If satisfaction manifestly greater than just is imposed, the penitent can ask for diminution and, if this is denied, depart (St. Alphonsus, VI, 516). If he does not depart and receives absolution, which is also licit for him, according to some he is bound to fulfill the satisfaction, lest the sacrament be deprived of an integral part; according to others, he is not bound to fulfill the satisfaction, and it must be imputed to the confessor that the sacrament lacks an integral part. But he seems to be bound, if the matter of penance is well divisible, to fulfill the part equal to the sins.

Corollary II. Let the confessor easily acquiesce to one asking a lesser or another satisfaction and prepared to fulfill a grave one (St. Alphonsus, VI, 516).

356 II. Obligation of fulfilling satisfaction. 1. Person obligated. The penitent, as canon 887 declares, "must fulfill satisfaction himself personally." This, however, as we noted, does not prevent the confessor from granting the penitent the faculty of substituting another for himself, who will fulfill the satisfaction (n. 350).

2. Gravity of the obligation. The obligation of fulfilling satisfaction is grave if: 1. it was imposed for necessary matter; 2. it is grave; and 3. it was enjoined under grave obligation. When these conditions have been fulfilled, it is also grave to omit a grave part; nevertheless, this for the most part does not take place if the satisfaction has a successive extension, in which case, therefore, commonly it is not grave to omit once or twice what, for example, was enjoined for the individual days of some week. If one of the enumerated conditions is lacking, the obligation of fulfilling the satisfaction is light; and in the case in which the confession was invalid, the satisfaction does not oblige. I said:

a) If it was imposed for necessary matter, because for free matter grave satisfaction cannot, at least of itself, be imposed (n. 348; St. Alphonsus, VI, 517).

b) If it is grave, because light satisfaction cannot be enjoined under grave obligation.

c) If it was enjoined under grave obligation, which it is altogether expedient to do, and is presumed to have been done. Indeed there are those who judge that grave satisfaction cannot be enjoined under light obligation, because although a legislator can oblige only lightly in grave matter, nevertheless in this sacrament the confessor is not regarded as a legislator, but as a simple minister, since there he acts in the name of God. Hence he cannot impose matter of itself grave under light obligation. Others, however, admit the contrary, relying on this reason: "The confessor in this sacrament not only performs the office of Christ, but also has been constituted by Christ as true judge and legislator, who from the power handed over to him looses by remitting sins, and binds by imposing precepts concerning the obligation of fulfilling satisfaction" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 118).

A circumstance of satisfaction, for example the Way of the Cross to be performed by the penitent on bent knee, obliges under grave obligation if either in itself or with respect to the penance it is grave and - which, once the first condition has been fulfilled, is presumed - it was imposed under grave obligation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 517).

3. Time of fulfilling satisfaction. First note that imposed satisfaction can be fulfilled both before and after absolution. That it can be fulfilled after absolution is clear both from the practice now commonly in force and in force through so many centuries, and from the contrary doctrine condemned.[1] Nevertheless, it can also be fulfilled before absolution. A reason for doubting could arise from the fact that the penitent before absolution is easily in the state of mortal sin, and therefore satisfaction, that is, the integral part of the sacrament, cannot yet obtain its effect, that is, remission of punishment, so that, until the state of grace is recovered, it would remain informe. But satisfaction becomes an integral part only when it is conjoined with absolution, and at that very moment obtains its effect, so that satisfaction as an integral part was not informe. For the rest, observe:

a) If a time has been set by the confessor, this must be observed. Once the time has passed, the obligation does not cease; both because the confessor principally intends the work and accessorily the time, and because it is not licit for the sacrament to be deprived of an integral part (St. Alphonsus, VI, 525). If a time has not been set, satisfaction should not be delayed longer, and, in conformity with the mind of the confessor, should be fulfilled as soon as it can conveniently be fulfilled (St. Alphonsus, VI, 521).

b) Delay of grave satisfaction is a grave sin: 1. if it brings with it grave danger of forgetfulness or of inability that will follow; 2. if it frustrates or notably lessens the end of the satisfaction, for example if a confession to be instituted after a month is delayed beyond a week. It is disputed whether delay of itself is ever a grave sin. Moreover, with St. Alphonsus (VI, 521), it seems this must be affirmed, because a lengthy delay, for instance of six months, of a grave obligation to be fulfilled of itself at the first moral opportunity seems to involve grave disorder.

4. Manner of fulfilling satisfaction. a) The intention of satisfying seems to be required, or of performing the imposed work for satisfaction. For just as the intention of receiving the sacrament is required as regards the essentials, so also it is required as regards the integral parts, so that the sacrament may be received integrally. But it suffices that the penitent had and did not retract the intention of receiving the sacrament, since this intention regards the whole sacrament. The said intention indeed probably comprehends a work enjoined by the confessor which someone, forgetful of the satisfaction owed, has posited (cf. St. Alphonsus, III, 700, question 2); but since the matter concerns the validity of an integral part, the work seems to have to be performed again (cf. St. Alphonsus, II, 2).

Objection. The intention of satisfying is not required, since it suffices to have posited the act imposed by the confessor.

Response. From what has been said it follows that this does not suffice for the act posited to be an integral part of the sacrament.

b) Satisfaction seems to have to be fulfilled in the state of grace if it is fulfilled after absolution; for it is illicit to place an obstacle to the effect, even secondary, of a sacrament (St. Alphonsus, VI, 523).

Objection 1. The end of the precept, in the case remission of remaining punishment, does not fall under the precept.

Response. Let that pass; but the end of the sacrament falls under the precept.

Objection 2. Satisfaction will afterward revive once the obstacle has been removed.

Response. Besides the fact that this opinion is doubtful, and therefore does not hold for practice because the danger remains lest the sacrament be deprived of its secondary effect, it is illicit to fulfill satisfaction informiter, just as it is illicit to receive the sacrament as regards the essentials informiter.

If satisfaction is fulfilled before absolution, it is not required that it be done in the state of grace; for then, as we have already noted, it does not become an integral part before absolution is conferred and therefore, as is supposed, before the state of grace is recovered by the penitent. This posited, the integral part does not remain informe, but immediately obtains its effect.

c) Satisfaction can be fulfilled with another if prayers were imposed which are customarily recited with others.

5. Cessation of the obligation can come either from supervening inability or from forgetfulness.

One who has forgotten the satisfaction imposed and cannot gather it from the confessor's custom of imposing this or that penance is bound to approach the confessor, if it can conveniently be done and the confessor is presumed to have retained it in memory. Otherwise the obligation ceases. Nor should you say: he is bound to return so that the confessor, if he has forgotten the penance imposed, may impose a new one. For, since the completed judicial process has been finished, the confessor cannot impose a new penance unless the penitent institutes a new confession; he is not bound to this burden (St. Alphonsus, VI, 520).

What if the confessor omitted to impose satisfaction?

Response. In the case the penitent is bound to return, if he conveniently can, lest the sacrament be deprived of an integral part; for since the judicial process remained incomplete, it seems morally to persevere, even if the penitent has left the confessional.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, nn. 728, 1306, 1437, 1535.

Section III. On the Effects of the Sacrament of Penance

357 The effects of the sacrament of Penance are:

1. Sanctifying grace, whether first grace, or, if the penitent is already in the state of grace, second grace.
2. Sacramental grace. This consists in the fact that the sanctifying grace which the sacrament of Penance confers gives a right to actual graces by which past sins are entirely taken away and future sins are guarded against.
3. Remission of eternal punishment and the reviviscence of merits.
4. Remission of temporal punishment, proportioned to the disposition of the penitent;[1] likewise by the power of sacramental satisfaction.
5. Peace and serenity of conscience, according to these words of the Council of Trent: "Indeed the reality and effect of this sacrament, so far as its force and efficacy are concerned, is reconciliation with God, which sometimes, in devout men who receive this sacrament with devotion, is wont to be followed by peace and serenity of conscience with vehement consolation of spirit."[2]

[1] Cf. Council of Trent, Session 14, chapter 2.

[2] Session 14, chapter 3.

Section IV. On the Necessity of the Sacrament of Penance

The necessity both of means and of precept must be examined; nevertheless only that of the divine precept, because the ecclesiastical precept has been discussed in volume I, n. 1104.

358 I. Necessity of means. The sacrament of Penance is necessary for salvation by necessity of means for those who have sinned gravely after Baptism. This is clear: 1. from these words of the Council of Trent: "This sacrament of Penance is necessary for salvation for those fallen after Baptism, just as Baptism itself is for those not yet regenerated";[1] 2. from Sacred Scripture. For Christ declared that sins are retained for those for whom they are retained by the judges constituted by him.[2] But sins would not truly be retained if another means of obtaining pardon were available to the sinner apart from those judges. There are added: 3. the testimonies of the Holy Fathers; and 4. the argument of prescription. These, together with other arguments, you may compare in the Dogmatic theologians.

Corollary. From what has been said it follows that perfect contrition and the act of charity do not justify the sinner except insofar as they are at the same time a recourse to the sacrament of Penance in desire, or insofar as they at the same time include the purpose of submitting oneself to the judges constituted by Christ. Hence, for one thus justified there remains the obligation afterward of having recourse to the judge.

[1] Session 14, chapter 2.

[2] John 20:23.

359 II. Necessity by force of divine precept. 1. The existence of the precept follows from the necessity of means.

2. The time for fulfilling the precept. The precept obliges:

a) Of itself: 1. in the article of death; for one who then does not fulfill the divine law rashly exposes himself to the danger of never fulfilling it; 2. it is disputed whether it obliges at some times in life, but the affirmative seems to have to be held, because it is difficult to admit that Christ instituted a tribunal by which the sinner is reconciled with God, and at the same time granted the sinner the faculty of avoiding that tribunal until the end of life (St. Alphonsus, VI, 662, 663, 665). For the rest, it is certain: 1. that the divine precept does not oblige immediately after a sin has been committed; 2. that satisfaction is made to the said precept by fulfilling the ecclesiastical precept (St. Alphonsus, VI, 663).

b) Accidentally: 1. if confession is held to be a morally necessary means of avoiding sin (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 6, art. 5); 2. according to many, before the reception of the Eucharist, if one has sinned gravely (n. 179), in which case there is certainly an obligation, whether from divine law or from ecclesiastical law.

Part II. On the Ministration of the Sacrament of Penance

360 The minister of the sacrament of Penance is the priest alone; this is clear both from the Council of Trent and from canon 871. The Council of Trent declared: "If anyone shall say ... that priests alone are not the ministers of absolution ... let him be anathema."[1]

Having set these things down, we shall treat first of the ministration of the sacrament of Penance generally, then of its ministration to some persons specifically.

[1] Session 14, canon 10.

Section I. On the Ministration of the Sacrament of Penance Generally

We shall speak first of the power required for ministering the sacrament of Penance, then of the right use of that power.

Chapter I. On the Required Power

In the minister of Penance a twofold power is required, namely the power of order and the power of jurisdiction (can. 872). That the power of order is required follows from the fact that, as was proved above, the priest alone is the minister of this sacrament. The power of jurisdiction, that is, sacramental jurisdiction, must be treated more fully: first, sacramental jurisdiction generally; then jurisdiction over some classes of persons specifically; finally, the limitation of jurisdiction with respect to sins, or the reservation of sins.

Article I. On Sacramental Jurisdiction Generally

361 I. Notion. Sacramental jurisdiction is the power of hearing judicially the confessions of the faithful, and of absolving or binding them. In the new Code, the conferral of sacramental jurisdiction is called approval (cf. canons 872, 881, 882), so that that word no longer signifies an authentic testimony concerning someone's fitness to hear confessions.

362 II. Necessity is taught by Trent[1] and by the Code of Canon Law (can. 872), and follows from the fact that absolution is not only a sacramental action, but also a judicial one, and therefore must be exercised upon a subject.[2] But someone is constituted a subject through jurisdiction over him.[3] Hence the opinion of some who taught that jurisdiction is not required for absolving from venial sins and from mortal sins already directly remitted must be rejected, and it is commonly rejected.

[1] Session 14, chapter 7.

[2] To the question how a confessor can have jurisdiction over his superior, this answer must be given: the superior, through the jurisdiction of the external forum which he has received from Christ as Pope, or from another, confers jurisdiction of the internal forum on the confessor, who then, by this jurisdiction, by which he acts in the name of Christ, absolves the superior as a private man.

[3] The local Ordinary, although he enjoys ordinary jurisdiction over exempt religious and over travelers staying in the diocese, since the faculty of absolving them is attached to his office by the law itself, nevertheless cannot absolve the aforesaid outside the diocese, because they are not his subjects simply speaking. I said "simply speaking," because as long as they are staying in the diocese, they are subject to him in the order of absolution. Others call the jurisdiction of the local Ordinary over exempt religious and travelers staying in the diocese delegated by law, precisely because it does not extend to the same persons when they are staying outside the diocese. He can absolve everywhere non-exempt religious who dwell in the diocese, because they are his subjects.

363 III. Division. Sacramental jurisdiction is divided into ordinary and delegated, according as it is attached to an office by the law itself or committed to a person (can. 197, § 1; vol. I, n. 97).

364 IV. Ordinary jurisdiction. 1. It belongs, for the universal Church, to the Supreme Pontiff and to the Cardinals of the Holy Roman Church; for his own territory, to the local Ordinary, to the parish priest, and to others who take the place of the parish priest;[1] likewise to the penitentiary canon of a cathedral or collegiate church, for all diocesan persons, even outside the diocese, and for outsiders who are staying in the diocese. All these he can absolve even from sins and censures reserved to the Bishop. Finally it belongs to exempt religious superiors for their subjects, according to the norm of the constitutions (can. 873, §§ 1 and 2).

2. It can be exercised over subjects wherever they are, so that, for example, a parish priest can absolve his parishioners even outside the parish or diocese (can. 873, § 2). In addition, parish priests commonly receive delegated jurisdiction for the whole diocese.

3. It ceases by loss of office and, after a condemnatory or declaratory sentence, by excommunication, suspension from office, and interdict (can. 873, § 3).

[1] Who are meant by the name of local Ordinary and parish priest is set forth at length in the treatise on Matrimony. Those who are in the place of the parish priest are parochial vicars who are endowed with full parochial power; who these are, see the cited place.

365 V. Delegated jurisdiction. 1. The persons who delegate are:

a) The local Ordinary in whose place confessions are heard confers jurisdiction on priests, both secular and religious, even exempt, for hearing the confessions both of secular persons[1] and of religious, even exempt; religious priests, however, are not to use that same jurisdiction without at least the presumed permission of their superior (can. 874, § 1).

b) In an exempt clerical religion,[2] delegated jurisdiction for receiving the confessions of the professed, novices, and others of the household[3] is also conferred by their Superior, according to the norm of the constitutions; he is permitted to grant it even to priests from the secular clergy or from another religion (can. 875, § 1). In an exempt lay religion,[4] the Superior proposes the confessor, who nevertheless must obtain jurisdiction from the local Ordinary in whose place the religious house is found (can. 875, § 2).

c) For receiving validly and licitly the confessions of any religious women and novices, a special jurisdiction is required, any contrary particular law or privilege being revoked. This jurisdiction is conferred by the local Ordinary where the house of the religious women is situated (can. 876). More will be said about that special jurisdiction in n. 373.[5]

Corollary I. A Cardinal, a penitentiary canon, and a parish priest cannot delegate the ordinary sacramental jurisdiction which belongs to them by common law. For they are not enumerated in canons 874-876, in which the legislator manifestly intends to list all those who can delegate sacramental jurisdiction. Moreover, as regards the penitentiary canon this is established from canon 401, § 1, and as regards the parish priest from a response of the Pontifical Commission.[6]

Corollary II. One who has delegated sacramental jurisdiction from the Apostolic See can subdelegate it, unless the personal industry of the person was chosen or subdelegation was prohibited (can. 199, § 2). But one who has delegated sacramental jurisdiction from another than the Apostolic See cannot subdelegate it, unless by express concession (can. 199, § 4).

[1] Many thought that Regulars received from the Supreme Pontiff, through their Superiors, jurisdiction over secular persons. If that privilege ever existed, it can no longer be maintained.

[2] A clerical religion is one whose members for the most part are promoted to the priesthood (can. 488, 4).

[3] That is, of those staying day and night in the religious house by reason of service, education, hospitality, or infirm health (can. 514, § 1).

[4] A lay religion is one whose members for the most part are not promoted to the priesthood (can. 488, 4).

[5] Canon 525 states: "If the house of religious women is immediately subject to the Apostolic See or to the local Ordinary, he chooses both ordinary and extraordinary priests for confessions; if it is subject to a regular Superior, he presents confessors to the Ordinary, whose duty it is to approve them for hearing the confessions of those nuns and, if need be, to supply for the Superior's negligence."

[6] October 16, 1919, to 3 (A.A.S. 1919, p. 476).

366 2. The manner of delegating. For hearing confessions validly, jurisdiction expressly granted in writing or by words is necessary (can. 879, § 1). Therefore, for validity it is required that the jurisdiction be: 1. truly granted. Hence it is not enough that it has been requested, nor that the one delegating is presumed to be about to grant it; 2. expressly granted in writing or by words. This, however, has place sufficiently when the one delegating uses a telephone or telegraph. It is not required that the concession of jurisdiction be notified, because the conferral of jurisdiction is a favor made, or a favor which is granted without an intervening executor. Concessions of this kind have effect from the moment at which the letters are issued (can. 38). Hence a priest absolves validly after the Ordinary has signed the letters or has signified the concession by a mandatary; he absolves validly and licitly after he has in some true way been made certain of the concession, although outside a case of necessity it is expedient to await authentic notification.

We said that jurisdiction must be expressly granted in writing or by words. Yet this probably does not prevent a custom known to the Ordinary and tacitly approved by him from sufficing. For tacitly granted jurisdiction, which is disapproved by law, is one thing; a tacitly approved custom is another, so that in the case jurisdiction is at least probable and is supplied by the Church.

For the rest, the one delegating should observe these things:

a) Local Ordinaries should not habitually grant jurisdiction for hearing confessions to religious who are not presented by their own Superior; but they should not deny it without grave cause to those who are presented by their own Superior, with the prescription of canon 874, § 2 remaining firm. That canon is now set forth.

b) Neither local Ordinaries in granting jurisdiction nor religious Superiors in granting jurisdiction or permission for hearing confessions should grant it except to those who have been found fit by examination, unless the case concerns a priest whose theological doctrine they have ascertained from another source. If, after jurisdiction or permission has been granted, they prudently doubt whether a priest previously approved by them still continues to be fit, they should compel him to a new test of doctrine, even if the case concerns a parish priest or a penitentiary canon (can. 877). Hence, for someone licitly to be compelled to a new examination before his jurisdiction has elapsed, a founded doubt about his fitness is required.

c) Delegated jurisdiction or permission to hear confessions can be granted as circumscribed by certain limits (can. 878, § 1), for example for a definite time, or for men only. Nevertheless, local Ordinaries and religious Superiors should take care not to restrict jurisdiction or permission without reasonable cause too narrowly (can. 878, § 2). It would be unreasonable to except some time, for example the Easter season;[1] likewise the sick.[2]

d) The local Ordinary or religious Superior should not revoke or suspend jurisdiction or permission to hear confessions except for a grave cause. But for grave causes the Ordinary can forbid even a parish priest or penitentiary confessor to exercise his function, with recourse in devolutive effect to the Apostolic See preserved. Nevertheless it is not lawful for a Bishop, without consulting the Apostolic See, if the case concerns a formed house, to take away jurisdiction all at once from all the confessors of some religious house (can. 880). It is otherwise if it is taken away from individuals successively.

e) An Ordinary who revokes jurisdiction without just cause indeed acts illicitly, but he does not seem to act invalidly; for against a revocation notified to a parish priest or penitentiary, who have ordinary jurisdiction, only recourse in devolutive effect is granted (can. 880); a fortiori for those who possess only delegated jurisdiction.

Corollary I. Some formerly taught that jurisdiction over venial sins and over mortal sins already directly remitted is conferred by Christ in ordination itself. But this opinion, which rests on no solid foundation, has long since been commonly rejected. Nor can the opinion formerly admitted by some any longer be maintained, according to which the aforesaid jurisdiction would be granted by the Church in ordination itself.[3] The Code is silent about such a disposition, nor is the custom still in force to which some appealed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 543, 582).

Corollary II. Religious who have received jurisdiction from the local Ordinary should not use it without at least the presumed permission of the Superior (can. 519).

[1] Cf. decree of the Sacred Congregation of the Council, September 22, 1668; Sacred Congregation of Bishops, April 3, 1584.

[2] Cf. Constitution Superna of Clement X, September 13, 1641; Sacred Congregation of Bishops and Regulars, September 22, 1645; Sacred Congregation of the Council, December 14, 1658.

[3] Innocent XI, by decree of February 12, 1679, prescribed: "Let them not permit [the bishops] that confession of venial sins be made to a simple priest not approved by the Bishop or Ordinary." And the Council of Trent absolutely, without excepting confession of venial sins, established that no one can hear confessions unless he has obtained a parochial benefice or approval (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 77).

367 3. Cessation of delegation. Delegated sacramental jurisdiction ceases in the ways set forth in volume I, n. 101, where jurisdiction generally was discussed. Note also that of itself it does not cease by a mere change of domicile. If, however, jurisdiction was conferred because of an office, for example that of chaplain, which the confessor performed as a subject in some diocese, it is not judged to continue after he has resigned the office, unless the Ordinary's contrary intention is established. In addition, provincial and diocesan statutes should be attended to. Finally, observe that by force of canon 207, § 2, absolutions granted through inadvertence after the time has elapsed or after the number of cases has been exhausted are valid.

Note. Superiors should take care that religious subjects designated by them, especially in the diocese in which they dwell, when their ministry is required by local Ordinaries or parish priests for providing for the necessity of the people, both within and outside their own churches or public oratories, offer that ministry willingly, while religious discipline is preserved. Conversely, local Ordinaries and parish priests should willingly use the work of religious, especially those dwelling in the diocese, in the sacred ministry and especially in administering the sacrament of Penance (can. 608).

Article II. On Sacramental Jurisdiction Over Some Classes of Persons Specifically

368 I. Jurisdiction over soldiers. 1. It is clear that soldiers can confess to a priest who has jurisdiction from the local Ordinary in whose place the confessions are instituted. What military chaplains can do independently of the local Ordinary depends on the special prescriptions of the Holy See (cf. can. 451, § 3). Namely, if a military bishop has been constituted, or at least if a chief chaplain has been placed over the whole army, the faculty of conferring jurisdiction over soldiers on other priests is easily granted to these.[1]

2. Soldiers called to war, or mobilized as it is said, are equated with those constituted in danger of death; hence for them there hold the things which we shall say about jurisdiction over the dying (n. 370).[2]

[1] Cf. A.A.S. 1915, p. 217.

[2] Sacred Penitentiary, March 18, 1912; May 29, 1915 (A.A.S. 1915, p. 282); cf. Sacred Penitentiary, December 18, 1914 (A.A.S. 1914, p. 712); December 4, 1915 (A.A.S. 1915, p. 526).

369 II. Jurisdiction over those sailing. All priests undertaking a sea voyage, provided they have duly received the faculty of hearing confessions either from their own Ordinary, or from the Ordinary of the port in which they board the ship, or even from the Ordinary of any intermediate port through which they pass on the journey, can throughout the whole journey receive on board the ship the confessions of any of the faithful sailing with them, even though the ship on the journey passes through, or even remains for some time in, various places subject to the jurisdiction of different Ordinaries. Whenever the ship stops on the journey, they can receive the confessions both of the faithful who for any reason come to the ship and of those who, while the priests are briefly calling at land, ask to confess, and can validly and licitly absolve them even from cases reserved to the local Ordinary (can. 883). Therefore observe:

1. The proper Ordinary of a secular priest and of a non-exempt religious is the local Ordinary in whose place the aforesaid have domicile or quasi-domicile up to the undertaking of the journey. It is disputed whether jurisdiction can also be conferred on an exempt religious by his own major Superior. Some affirm this, because the Code speaks of the Ordinary, not of the local Ordinary. But under the name Ordinary there also comes a major Superior. Nevertheless, it seems this must be denied, considering the character of both the ancient[1] and the new legislation, which continually assigns the conferral of jurisdiction over secular persons and non-exempt religious to the local Ordinary. There is added the fact that in doubt one must not depart from the old law (can. 6, 4).

2. Jurisdiction is had throughout the whole journey. The journey, however, is judged to begin when the ship first leaves the port. The journey and the jurisdiction continue until the priest, having left the ship, has definitively landed.

3. The word briefly comprehends three whole days, not more. This also holds in the case in which, to continue the same journey, the confessor must leave one ship in order to board another, if he must wait so long for this ship in port.[2]

[1] Holy Office, August 23, 1905 (Collectanea, n. 2244).

[2] Pontifical Commission, May 20, 1923 (A.A.S. 1923, p. 112).

370 III. Jurisdiction over the dying. In danger of death all priests, even those not approved for confessions, validly and licitly absolve any penitents from any sins or censures whatsoever, however reserved and notorious, even if an approved priest is present, with the prescription of canons 884 and 2252 preserved (can. 882). It is said:

1. In danger of death. The article of death is not required, but grave danger of death suffices, and indeed whether truly existing or prudently, though falsely, thought to exist, whether already arisen or soon to arise. Therefore the case is present: 1. in a dangerous illness; 2. in a very difficult childbirth, or a little before it; 3. before a dangerous surgical operation; 4. before a voyage full of danger; 5. in time of plague; 6. in battle or a little before it (St. Alphonsus, VI, 561). With those constituted in danger of death are equated: 1. soldiers called to war or mobilized;[1] 2. all men and women, not excluding religious sisters, who in some way belong to mobilized armies and are staying in camps.[2] These, however, regard only kingdoms which are waging war or are in imminent danger of war, as seems to be deduced from the words "called to war" and "staying in camps."[3]
2. All priests, even those not approved for confessions; even public heretics or schismatics; likewise excommunicates, both tolerated and to be avoided (cf. can. 2261, § 3).
3. Even if an approved priest is present; hence as regards validity no priest is now excluded. Nevertheless, of itself it is illicit to receive absolution from a heretic or schismatic if another is present.
4. With the prescription of canon 884 preserved; considering that canon, absolution of an accomplice in danger of death is indeed valid, but outside a case of necessity is illicit.
5. With the prescription of canon 2252 preserved; that canon treats of the recourse sometimes to be made after recovery; this will be discussed later. In addition, note:

a) Absolution in danger of death, as regards censure, is limited to the internal forum;[4] hence for all penal effects, for example for ecclesiastical burial, recourse must be had to the ecclesiastical judge.

b) Absolution, although valid, can nevertheless be illicit because the priest acts imprudently, for example because he is not sufficiently versed in Moral Theology and another more learned one is present. In the case, an excusing cause is required, for example if the dying person desires to be absolved by such a determinate confessor.

[1] Sacred Penitentiary, March 18, 1912.

[2] Sacred Penitentiary, December 21, 1914; May 29, 1915.

[3] Sacred Penitentiary, March 11, 1915; May 25, 1915.

[4] Pontifical Commission, December 28, 1927, to II (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

371 IV. Jurisdiction over travelers and those without a domicile. All priests of either clergy approved for hearing confessions in some place, whether instructed with ordinary or delegated jurisdiction, can also validly and licitly absolve persons without a domicile and travelers from another diocese or parish who come to them, and likewise Catholics of any Oriental rite (can. 881, § 1). From these things it is deduced, as is also clear from canon 874, § 1 and from a response of the Pontifical Commission,[1] that jurisdiction over travelers is obtained from the local Ordinary. To what extent travelers can be absolved from reserved cases will be discussed later.

[1] November 24, 1920 (A.A.S. 1920, p. 575).

372 V. Jurisdiction over exempt religious. We speak only of exempt religious, because non-exempt religious, as regards jurisdiction over them, are equated with the other faithful. Over exempt religious, however, jurisdiction is possessed by:

1. Over religious of an exempt clerical religion:

a) The proper Superior of the religious, who indeed enjoys ordinary jurisdiction over them (can. 875, § 1).

b) The local Ordinary in whose place they are staying (can. 519). His jurisdiction over them seems to be delegated by law rather than ordinary, because it extends only to those who are staying in his territory (n. 362). Nevertheless, he can absolve them even from sins and censures reserved in the religion (can. 519).

c) Those to whom the Superior or local Ordinary has delegated jurisdiction (can. 519 and 875, § 1). Jurisdiction delegated by the Superior is personal, so that it can be exercised everywhere; but jurisdiction granted by the local Ordinary does not extend to religious staying outside the Ordinary's territory. With respect to those who are staying in the Ordinary's territory, however, the granted jurisdiction also includes sins and censures reserved in the religion (can. 519).

What has been said about exempt religious also holds for their novices, students, boarders, and others of whom n. 164 speaks (can. 874, § 1; 875, § 1). It can nevertheless be disputed whether the religious Superior and those delegated by him retain jurisdiction over students during holidays while they are staying outside the religious house. This seems to have to be denied, because at that time the students are not subject to the Superior's power. Otherwise one should speak if during school time they go out, for example for the purpose of making a pilgrimage.

Exempt religious staying outside their own house can confess as follows:

a) Those actually traveling can confess, just as those dwelling at home can, to one approved either by the local Ordinary in whose place the confession is made, or by their own Superior; but not to a companion or another who has been approved by neither. That jurisdiction must be received from one or the other follows from canons 519, 874, § 1, and 875, § 1, so that the contrary doctrine, formerly admitted by many, must be rejected.

b) Travelers who are staying in some convent of their own order can confess: 1. to those approved by the local Ordinary; 2. to those approved by their own Superior; 3. to the Prelate of that convent and to those approved by him, namely by custom.

2. Over members of an exempt lay religion, jurisdiction is possessed by the local Ordinary in whose place they are staying and by those to whom the local Ordinary has granted it (can. 519 and 875, § 2).

3. If a religious, even an exempt one, for the quiet of his conscience approaches a confessor approved by the local Ordinary, even though not listed among those designated, the confession, any contrary privilege being revoked, is valid and licit; and the confessor can absolve the religious even from sins and censures reserved in the religion (can. 519). Moreover:

a) A confession is made for quiet of conscience whenever from a confession made in this way greater quiet of conscience is hoped for, whether because of a more candid accusation, or because of a nearer occasion of confessing, for example if the ordinary confessor is absent. The causes assigned are of themselves accidental, and in such a case the religious would not have to approach the ordinary confessor again on that occasion, which is nowhere imposed. Besides, if a permanent cause were present, a permanent exception would also be permitted. Nevertheless, then it would be better to seek from the Superior, with permission, that different confessor who would become habitual.

b) The condition set forth under a) is not judged to pertain to validity, both because a condition so intimate is not presumed by the legislator to be intended for validity, and because that would provide occasion for doubts and anxieties. Nevertheless, to approach a non-designated confessor merely at one's own pleasure is illicit.

c) It is not lawful for a religious, if the constitutions forbid it, to leave the house without the Superior's permission for the purpose of confessing.

373 VI. Jurisdiction over religious women. Priests, both secular and religious, of whatever rank or office, need special jurisdiction for validly and licitly receiving the confessions of any religious women and novices, with the privilege of Cardinals preserved,[1] and with the cases assigned by law excepted (can. 876, § 1). This jurisdiction is conferred by the local Ordinary where the house of the religious women is situated (can. 876, § 2). Moreover:

1. The special jurisdiction of which the canon speaks is required even for validity, as authors now commonly admit and as they deduce from the very word jurisdiction, which imports power, and from the Code itself, where it is distinguished from permission (cf. for example can. 877). Special jurisdiction is required for women religious and their novices, but not for their postulants, since these are not named. It can be disputed whether it is required for women living in common without vows. The reason for doubting is drawn from the fact that canon 675, to which some appeal, indeed refers to canons 499-530, but not to canon 876, which establishes the necessity of special jurisdiction.

2. The cases in which common law confers jurisdiction over religious women are:

a) If some religious woman, for the tranquility of her conscience, approaches a confessor approved by the local Ordinary for women, the confession, made in any church or even semi-public oratory, is valid and licit, any contrary privilege being revoked; nor can the Superior forbid it or inquire about the matter, not even indirectly; and the religious women are bound to report nothing to the Superior (can. 522). It is said:

1. For the tranquility of her conscience; this is not required for validity, as has already been explained in n. 372.

2. Approaches, that is, has recourse to him. This can be done both inside and outside the house; hence it is not required that the religious woman be staying outside her own house, but she can also call the confessor.[2]

3. A confessor approved for women, that is, approved for women, whether secular or religious.[3]

4. In any church or even semi-public oratory; to these the Pontifical Commission added: or in a place lawfully designated for hearing the confessions of women[4] or of religious women.[5] Moreover, the circumstance of place is required not only for liceity but also for validity.[6]

It is disputed whether among places lawfully designated there also belongs a place in which, according to canon 910, § 1,[7] the confessions of women are sometimes licitly heard, namely by reason of sickness or another true necessity. Now although the obvious sense of the law, "in a place lawfully designated for hearing confessions of women or of religious women," seems to favor the negative opinion, nevertheless it is difficult to admit that a means of absolution of this kind is excluded for religious women, for example religious women who have difficulty approaching the place habitually designated for hearing the confessions of women or religious women. Hence jurisdiction is probably had, and certainly had when the Church supplies.

5. Nor can the Superior forbid it, that is, she cannot forbid precisely that the religious woman confess to such a confessor, although it is not lawful to leave the house without permission.

Question. Can a confessor lacking special jurisdiction, by force of canon 522, validly absolve an entire community, for example in the absence of the ordinary confessor?

Response. It must be denied, because canon 522 supposes that the case is particular, since it grants jurisdiction for the case in which some religious woman approaches or calls such a confessor.

b) All religious women, when they are gravely ill, even though danger of death is absent, can call any priest approved for receiving the confessions of women, even if he is not designated for religious women, and can confess to him as often as they wish while the grave infirmity continues; nor can the Superior prohibit them either directly or indirectly (can. 523). A grave illness is one which notably weakens health; such an illness easily becomes dangerous. Since the canon declares "any priest approved for receiving the confessions of women," according to some it is not required that he be approved by the local Ordinary in whose place the confession is made, but it suffices that he has received jurisdiction over women from some local Ordinary and still enjoys it now. This opinion, however, although the letter favors it, does not seem admissible, namely considering the character of the whole legislation, which continually requires jurisdiction conferred by the local Ordinary in whose place the confession is instituted.

c) In danger of death, for religious women as for the other faithful, canon 882 holds, as explained in n. 370.

[1] Cardinals enjoy the faculty of hearing confessions everywhere on earth, even of religious of either sex (can. 239, § 1, 1).

[2] Pontifical Commission, December 28, 1927 (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

[3] Pontifical Commission, December 28, 1927 (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

[4] November 24, 1920 (A.A.S. 1920, p. 573).

[5] December 28, 1927 (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

[6] Pontifical Commission, December 28, 1927 (A.A.S. 1928, p. 61).

[7] Canon 910, § 1 states: the confessions of women are not to be heard outside the confessional seat except by reason of sickness or another true necessity and with the precautions which the local Ordinary has judged opportune.

Scholion. On Confessors to Be Deputed for Religious

I. Clerical Religion of Men

374 I. In individual houses of a clerical religion, several confessors legitimately approved should be deputed in proportion to the number of members, with the power, if the case concerns an exempt religion, of absolving even in cases reserved in the religion (can. 518, § 1).

Note 1. Religious Superiors having the power of hearing confessions can, with the things to be observed by law observed, hear the confessions of subjects who spontaneously and of their own motion ask this from them, but they should not do this habitually without grave cause (can. 518, § 2). Grave causes are, for example, a shortage of confessors, an anxious state of conscience in a subject, and the like. But a petition made spontaneously and of one's own motion suffices for the Superior to hear confessions by way of an act.

Note 2. Superiors should take care not to induce any subject, either personally or through another, by force, fear, importunate persuasions, or in any other way, to confess sins to them (can. 518, § 3). Simple counsel or persuasion in a particular case is not excluded.

II. With the constitutions remaining firm which command or counsel confession to be made at stated times with determinate confessors, if a religious, even an exempt one, for the quiet of his conscience, approaches a confessor approved by the local Ordinary, even though not listed among those designated, the confession, any contrary privilege being revoked, is valid and licit; and the confessor can absolve the religious even from sins and censures reserved in the religion (can. 519). These things were explained in n. 372.

III. As regards novices, these things hold:

1. In proportion to the number of novices, one or more ordinary confessors should be had (can. 566, § 2, 1); these should stay in the novitiate house itself (can. 566, § 2, 2).
2. Besides ordinary confessors, some confessors should be designated whom the novices can freely approach in particular cases, and the Master should not show that he takes this ill (can. 566, § 2, 3).
3. At least four times a year an extraordinary confessor should be given to the novices, to whom all should approach at least to receive a blessing (can. 566, § 2, 4).
4. Also for novices the things said in n. 374, II hold.

Note 1. The master of novices and his associate, and the Superior of a Seminary or college, should not hear the sacramental confessions of their students staying with them in the same house, unless the students ask this spontaneously from a grave and urgent cause in particular cases (can. 891). Therefore novices cannot habitually confess to the master of novices even for a grave and urgent cause. It is not clear that the prohibition of confessing to the master of novices should also be extended to postulants, since the Master is not of himself set over postulants.

Note 2. Novices can confess to the Superior of the house for a just cause in particular cases; for a grave cause, habitually (cf. can. 518, § 2).

IV. As regards postulants, nothing special is established by the Code, so that they are subject only to the common governance of religious.

II. Lay Religion of Men

375 I. Also in lay religions of men an ordinary and extraordinary confessor should be deputed; and if a religious asks for some special confessor, the Superior should grant him, in no way inquiring into the reason for the petition nor showing that he takes it ill (can. 528).

Note. In an exempt lay religion, the Superior proposes the confessor, who nevertheless must obtain jurisdiction from the local Ordinary in whose place the religious house is found (can. 875, § 2).

II. Also for lay male religious the things said in n. 374, II hold.

III. As regards novices, the things said in n. 374, III hold. Their ordinary confessors, however, should either stay in the novitiate house itself or at least frequently come to the novitiate house to hear the confessions of the novices. Postulants are subject only to the common governance of religious.

III. Religion of Women

376 I. Different confessors. They are distinguished as ordinary, special, extraordinary, and particular.

1. Ordinary confessor. a) For each house of religious women only one ordinary confessor should be given, who receives the sacramental confessions of the whole community, unless because of their great number or another just cause there is need of another or of several (can. 520, § 1).[1]

The words "who receives the sacramental confessions of the whole community" indicate the office of the confessor rather than an obligation of the religious women to approach him in the case in which, within the time established by the rule, they have confessed to another. Nevertheless, of itself it should be counseled that all be content with the ordinary confessor and ordinarily confess to him at the stated times.

A just cause for naming several ordinary confessors could be, for example, a plurality of national languages.

b) For the office of ordinary confessor of religious women there should be deputed priests, whether from the secular clergy or religious with the permission of their Superiors, outstanding in integrity of morals and prudence. They should moreover be forty years of age, unless a just cause, in the judgment of the Ordinary, requires otherwise, and they should have no power in the external forum over those same religious women (can. 524, § 1).

If the house of religious women is immediately subject to the Apostolic See or to the local Ordinary, he chooses priests for confessions, both ordinary and extraordinary; if it is subject to a regular Superior, he presents confessors to the Ordinary, whose duty it is to approve the same for hearing the confessions of those nuns and, if need be, to supply for the Superior's negligence (can. 525).

The ordinary confessor of religious women should not exercise his office beyond three years. Nevertheless, the Ordinary can confirm him for a second, indeed even for a third, three-year period, if either because of a shortage of priests fit for this office he cannot provide otherwise, or if the greater part of the religious women, including those who in other matters do not have the right of casting a vote, has agreed by secret votes to the confirmation of the same confessor. Nevertheless, for those dissenting, if they wish, provision must be made otherwise (can. 526).[2] Outside the cases set forth, the ordinary confessor cannot again be deputed as ordinary in the same community except after a year from the completion of his office; but an extraordinary confessor can immediately be named as ordinary (can. 524, § 2).

2. Special confessor. If some religious woman, for the quiet of her soul and for greater progress in the way of God, asks for some special confessor or spiritual moderator, the Ordinary should readily grant him. Nevertheless, he should watch lest abuses creep in from this concession; but if they do creep in, he should eliminate them cautiously and prudently, with liberty of conscience preserved

(can. 520, § 2). Therefore a special spiritual director could also be granted without the office of confessor.

a) A special confessor or spiritual moderator is to be granted not for a prefixed time, but as long as the just cause of necessity or spiritual utility of the religious woman who requested him endures.[3]

b) The ordinary confessor of the community can also be deputed as moderator of conscience for some religious woman.[4]

3. Extraordinary confessor. To each community of religious women there should be given an extraordinary confessor who at least four times a year comes to the religious house, and to whom all religious women must present themselves, at least to receive a blessing (can. 521, § 1). In an extraordinary confessor the same things are required as in an ordinary one (can. 524, § 1). The same things also hold as regards his selection (can. 525), but he can be named for an indefinite time. Finally, the mind of the legislator is judged to be that, as such, he should not come to the religious house more than four times a year without the authority of the Ordinary.

4. Particular confessor. The local Ordinaries in whose places communities of religious women exist should designate some priests for individual houses, to whom the religious women can easily have recourse for the sacrament of Penance in particular cases, without its being necessary to approach the Ordinary himself as often as the case arises (can. 521, § 2). It is said, 1. for the sacrament of Penance; therefore not only for seeking direction or counsel. It is said, 2. in particular cases; therefore not habitually after the manner of the special confessor of whom under 2.

Note. If some religious woman asks for one of those confessors, no Superior is permitted, either personally or through others, directly or indirectly, to inquire into the reason for the petition, to oppose the petition by words or deeds, or in any way to show that she takes it ill (can. 521, § 3). This paragraph seems to regard both the extraordinary confessor of paragraph 1 and the particular confessor of paragraph 2. For first, canon 521 treats of both kinds of confessors, § 1 of the extraordinary confessor, § 2 of particular confessors; then § 3 says: "If some religious woman asks for one of those confessors," not "of these confessors." Then the distinct paragraph confirms this; for if this admonition regarded only particular confessors, it should have been stated in the same paragraph, not in a distinct paragraph of the same canon, which also treats of the extraordinary confessor.[5]

[1] The Sacred Congregation for Religious, July 3, 1916, declared that there was no obligation of naming an ordinary confessor for a community which did not contain at least six sisters. But the same Congregation several times, for example January 10, 1920 and January 18, 1921, ordered canon 520 to be observed even for small houses. But that canon supposes confessors who receive confessions in the house of the sisters itself. Therefore, if they are allowed to approach a church so that there they may confess in the manner of secular women, a confessor does not seem to have to be named (Vermeersch, Epitome, 4, n. 590).

[2] Sacred Congregation for Religious, April 20, 1913.

[3] Sacred Congregation for Religious, April 20, 1913.

[4] Sacred Congregation for Religious, April 20, 1913.

[5] Vermeersch, Periodica, IX, p. (3).

377 II. As regards naming confessors of women novices, the things said about the religious women themselves hold (can. 566, § 1). Postulants, as regards this matter, are numbered among religious women, although it can be disputed whether special jurisdiction is required for hearing them validly (n. 373).

378 III. Things to be observed by confessors and by religious women. 1. The confessors of religious women, both ordinary and extraordinary, should in no way involve themselves in the internal or external governance of the community (can. 524, § 3). Special confessors called to the monastery or religious house, if they understand that the religious women approach them with no just cause either of necessity or of spiritual utility, should prudently dismiss them.[1]

2. All religious women should in no way speak among themselves about the confessions of their companions, nor should they dare to criticize those sisters who make their confession to another than the deputed confessor.[2]

3. A Superior who acts against the prescriptions of canons 521, § 3,[3] 522,[4] and 523[5] should be warned by the local Ordinary. If she offends again, she should be punished by him with deprivation of office, the Sacred Congregation of Religious being immediately informed (can. 2414).

[1] Decree Cum de sacramentalibus. The things said in the text, even if perhaps they can no longer be urged by force of the cited Decree, are nevertheless worthy of mention.

[2] Cf. p. 290.

[3] Cf. p. 290.

[4] Cf. p. 286.

[5] Cf. p. 286.

IV. A Society, Whether of Men or Women, Living in Community without Vows

The things said about male religious also hold for societies of men living in community without vows; likewise the things said about women religious hold for societies of women living in common without vows (can. 675).

Article III. On the Limitation of Jurisdiction with Respect to Sins, or on the Reservation of Sins

379 I. Notion of reservation. Reservation is an act by which a Superior who by ordinary right can grant the power of hearing confessions or impose censures calls a case, that is, a sin or censure, to his own judgment, and thereby limits the power of the inferior judge (can. 893).

380 II. The end of reservation is the protection of ecclesiastical discipline,[1] both by calling some transgressions to a judge who can better guard against them, and, as others add, by making remission more difficult. The former is intended primarily (cf. can. 893, § 1 and can. 897); the latter, or the character of punishment, at most secondarily (St. Alphonsus, VI, 581, doubt 1).

[1] Session 14, chapter 7.

381 III. Division of reservation. Reservation of sins can be distinguished in three ways, according as it directly regards either the censure alone annexed to the sin, or the sin alone, or the sin and the censure. If it directly regards the censure alone, the sin is said to be reserved by reason of the censure, and once this is taken away, the reservation of the sin ceases. If it directly regards either the sin alone or the sin and the censure, the sin is said to be reserved by reason of itself (St. Alphonsus, VI, 580).

We are treating of sins reserved by reason of themselves; concerning censures we shall speak in the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties.

382 IV. The power of reserving. 1. This is to be acknowledged in the Church, as is deduced from the Council of Trent,[1] from the Constitution Auctorem fidei of Pius VI,[2] from the usage prevailing from the earlier centuries, and from the fact that the Church, to whom the conferral of jurisdiction has been entrusted, can, just as secular power can, confer it with limitation.

2. It belongs to those who by ordinary right can confer sacramental jurisdiction or establish censures, except the Capitular Vicar and the Vicar General without a special mandate (can. 893, § 1). Among Superiors of an exempt clerical religion, only the Superior general and, in monasteries sui iuris, the Abbot, each with his proper Council, can reserve sins of subjects, as above (can. 896). Understand this of personal Superiors, lest the General Chapter, enjoying supreme authority, be excluded; by force of canon 893, § 1, it also can reserve sins.

3. It regards only subjects, that is, those over whom someone can confer on others the power of absolving or of striking with censure.

Corollary I. Those without a domicile are bound by the reservation of the local Ordinary in whose place they are staying, since they are subjects of that Ordinary (can. 94, § 2).

Corollary II. Travelers are not bound by the reservation of their own territory as long as they are absent from it; and this holds even if they have departed only to obtain absolution (can. 900, § 3). They are, however, bound by the reservation of the place in which they are dwelling. The reason for the former is that jurisdiction over travelers is not received from their own Ordinary (n. 371). The latter was declared by the Pontifical Commission[3] and is deduced from the fact that travelers are absolved by force of jurisdiction obtained from the local Ordinary in whose place they confess. But the local Ordinary, with respect to travelers just as with respect to diocesan persons, restricts jurisdiction. If a traveler confesses to his own parish priest, the latter can absolve him both from the reserved cases of his own territory, since he is not bound by that reservation outside his own territory, and from those of the place in which he is staying, because the parish priest does not receive jurisdiction over his own parishioner from the local Ordinary in whose place the traveler is staying.

Corollary III. Exempt religious are bound by the reservation of the local Ordinary when they confess to one approved by him. For he confers jurisdiction over them, and consequently can confer it as limited (can. 874, § 1). Hence one who absolves them by force of jurisdiction received from the local Ordinary should take account of the aforesaid reservation; but he can absolve them from sins and censures reserved in the Religion (can. 519). If they are absolved by force of jurisdiction granted by the regular Superior, no account must be taken of episcopal reservation.

[1] Session 14, chapter 7 and canon 11.

[2] August 28, 1794.

[3] November 24, 1920 (A.A.S. 1920, p. 573).

383 V. Use of the power of reserving. 1. Local Ordinaries should not reserve sins unless, after the matter has been discussed in diocesan Synod, or outside Synod after the cathedral Chapter and some of the more prudent and more approved curators of souls of their diocese have been heard, the true necessity or utility of the reservation has been established (can. 895).

2. The cases to be reserved should be altogether few, namely three or at most four, only from the graver and more atrocious external crimes specifically determined. The reservation itself should not remain in force longer than is necessary for uprooting some public, deeply rooted vice and perhaps restoring collapsed Christian discipline (can. 897). All should entirely abstain from reserving to themselves those sins which are already reserved to the Apostolic See, even by reason of censure, and regularly from those also to which a censure, even one reserved to no one, has been imposed by law (can. 898).
3. Once reservations have been established which they have judged truly necessary or useful, local Ordinaries should take care that these be brought to the knowledge of subjects in the way that seems better to them, and they should not impart to just anyone and indiscriminately the faculty of absolving from reserved cases (can. 899, § 1).
4. The Supreme Pontiff reserved to himself only one sin, though with a censure (can. 2303), by reason of itself:[1] namely false denunciation by which an innocent priest is accused of the crime of solicitation before ecclesiastical judges (can. 894). This will be discussed later.

[1] A sin is said to be reserved by reason of itself when the reservation immediately affects the sin; by reason of censure, when the reservation immediately affects only the censure, so that the sin can indeed be remitted directly by a simple confessor, but the censure cannot be removed. While the censure remains, however, absolution from the sin is commonly gravely illicit. Finally, there is a sin reserved with censure when the sin is reserved by reason of itself and has an attached censure; in this case the reservation of the sin can be present even if the censure is not contracted or ceases.

384 VI. Conditions of reservation. It is required that the sin be:

1. Mortal, and indeed objectively, subjectively, and insofar as it is reserved. Objectively, and therefore not only by reason of an erroneous conscience; subjectively, so that, for example, an act posited with half-full advertence is not enough;[1] insofar as it is reserved, for example, if incest is reserved, it is not enough that someone has intercourse with a blood-relative, but it is also required that he know that that person is a blood-relative.
2. External and indeed externally mortal, because the Church has not been accustomed to reserve merely internal sins.[2] Nevertheless, it is sufficiently externally mortal if it manifests grave internal malice (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 132).
3. Complete according to the words of the law, in other words, that it be that work which is circumscribed by the words of the law. Hence if the law, for example, declares that homicide is reserved, it is required that death has followed. It is otherwise if it is established that an attempt, machination, and so forth is reserved; in that case it suffices that those actions themselves have been posited (St. Alphonsus, VI, 582).
4. Certain. Hence reservation is judged to be absent: 1. in doubt about the act committed, likewise about the required conditions; 2. in doubt about grave subjective fault; 3. in a doubt of law concerning the law of reservation.

Question 1. Does ignorance excuse from the reservation of sin?

Response. Some affirm this, because they regard reservation as penal. But it seems this must be denied, because the character of punishment is intended at most secondarily. This also holds as regards the one sin reserved to the Holy See by reason of itself, whose reservation most authors judged to be penal, relying on these words of Benedict XIV in the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae: "so that so detestable a crime may be restrained by fear of the greatness of the penalty," and so forth. But, considering the canons cited above, no reservation now seems to be penal, at least primarily (St. Alphonsus, VI, 581, doubt 1).

Question 2. Does grave fear excuse from the reservation of sin?

Response. Some affirm this, because a reserved sin is understood to have been committed as it is commonly accustomed to be committed, and therefore not from grave fear. But it must be denied, because the words of the law, as is supposed, are absolute and therefore also include a sin committed from fear, provided that fear does not take away full deliberation.

[1] Jurisdiction could nevertheless be limited by the Church also with respect to venial and merely internal sins, as is commonly taught against Vasquez (St. Alphonsus, VI, 582, doubts 1 and 2).

[2] See the preceding note.

385 VII. Cessation of the reservation of sin. Any reservation by which a sin is reserved by reason of itself ceases:

1. When confession is made either by the sick who cannot leave the house, or by betrothed persons for the purpose of entering marriage (can. 900, 1). Under the name of the sick, considering the mind of the legislator, there also seem to come all who because of a notable bodily injury cannot leave the house, such as the paralyzed, those detained in prison, and the aged. The disposition holds even if the sick person is staying in the same house as the confessor. For betrothed persons the exception holds even if they confess several times in order to their approaching nuptials, for example by making a general confession some time before marriage, afterward making an ordinary confession; or by now confessing in the customary way in order to marriage, afterward confessing again in order to marriage, for example because something was omitted through forgetfulness or a new reserved sin was committed. Moreover, sacramental confession sometimes takes away reservation even if the confession was invalid, so that betrothed persons can be absolved from the reserved sin even after marriage; these things are more fully explained in n. 386.
2. As often as either the legitimate Superior has denied the faculty of absolving requested for some determinate case, or, in the prudent judgment of the confessor, the faculty of absolving cannot be requested from the legitimate Superior without grave inconvenience to the penitent or without danger of violating the sacramental seal (can. 900, 2). It is said:

a) As often as the Superior has denied the faculty of absolving requested for some determinate case. Reservation ceases even if the Superior has denied the faculty for a just cause, provided that the case is determinate; for the law does not distinguish.

b) Or the faculty cannot be requested without grave inconvenience to the penitent, for example if Communion or the celebration of Mass cannot be deferred without danger of scandal or infamy until the faculty has been obtained;[1] if the penitent can return only with difficulty to the confessor who will seek the permission; if it is hard for the penitent to remain in the state of grave sin during the time required for obtaining and using the faculty. For this reason St. Alphonsus observes: "It seems hard to me for one who is in mortal sin to remain without absolution even for a day" (IV, 490). It is sufficiently probable that founded fear lest the penitent, if absolution is delayed, be driven away from the sacraments, suffices.

c) Or the faculty cannot be requested without danger of violating the sacramental seal, that is, without danger that the Superior would recognize or suspect for what person the faculty of absolving is requested.

3. Outside the territory of the one reserving, even if the penitent has departed from it only to obtain absolution (can. 900, 3; n. 382).

Corollary I. Since canon 900 declares that any reservation ceases in the cases set forth, this must also be applied to the one sin reserved to the Holy See by reason of itself, of which canon 894 speaks, that is, false denunciation of a priest concerning the delict of solicitation. This is confirmed by a response of the Pontifical Commission.[2]

Corollary II. A penitent who has committed a reserved sin and is in circumstances in which reservation ceases is bound, if he wishes to communicate, to confess, and indeed integrally, that is, even sins reserved of themselves, even if only a simple confessor is present, because the latter can absolve him directly. For the same reason, he is not bound to confess to a privileged confessor who is present, but can also make confession to a simple confessor.

Corollary III. A penitent who has committed a reserved sin and is not in circumstances in which reservation ceases seems to be bound, if a privileged confessor is lacking, to defer confession and Communion for a little while. He is bound to defer confession, because he can be absolved from the reserved sin only indirectly, which without a grave cause is gravely illicit. But a grave cause is lacking; for if it were present, reservation would cease and the penitent could be absolved even directly from the reserved sin. He is bound to defer Communion; for one who has sinned gravely cannot communicate without confession, unless a grave cause urges.

But if Corollary III is not admitted, there arises:

Question. Is one who has committed a reserved sin and is not in circumstances in which reservation ceases, if he wishes to communicate, bound, when a privileged confessor is lacking, to confess to a simple confessor?

Response 1. No, if he has only reserved sins, because with respect to this confessor these are not matter for absolution; hence there cannot be an obligation of confessing them. Accidentally he is bound to confess some venial sin or mortal sin already confessed, if he fears that he is not contrite.

Response 2. It is disputed if he also has non-reserved mortal sins. A few deny it, because there is no obligation of instituting a confession which, because of the confessor's lack of jurisdiction over the reserved sins, will necessarily lack integrity. Much more commonly it is affirmed, because the precept of putting confession before Communion prevails over the precept of material integrity. If he confesses, he is not bound to declare the reserved sins, unless he is a relapser into them or is in their proximate occasion, and is questioned about them by the confessor. The reason is that the confessor has the right and obligation of providing for the prudent ministration of the sacrament, and consequently of questioning about the aforesaid things; to this right there corresponds in the penitent an obligation of responding (St. Alphonsus, VI, 265, questions 1 and 2; 585, doubt 2 and 3).

Corollary IV. If the penitent confesses a reserved sin to a simple confessor and is not in circumstances in which reservation ceases, the confessor should either send the penitent to a privileged confessor or seek the faculty of absolving.

[1] It is not necessary, indeed it is not expedient, to seek the faculty by means of telegraph or telephone. "Considering," so the Letter of the Secretary of State, December 10, 1891, "the inconveniences that have actually arisen and easily will arise from the fact that written petitions are received by telegraphic route, the Holy Father prescribed that as an ordinary rule neither the Sacred Congregations nor other Roman Ecclesiastical Offices should henceforth receive petitions of this kind by the aforesaid route. Moreover, because the same reasons hold also for Episcopal Curias themselves, His Holiness willed that the Pastors of Dioceses also conform themselves to this prescription." And the Pontifical Commission answered on November 12, 1922, that the Ordinary must be judged unable to be approached if recourse to him can be had only by telegraph or telephone (A.A.S. 1922, p. 661).

[2] November 10, 1925 (A.A.S. 1925, p. 582).

386 VIII. Removal of the reservation of sin. Sometimes, as is commonly admitted, only the reservation of the sin is removed, whether by an inferior privileged confessor, or, as others who judge that this power is lacking to an inferior wish, by the Superior (St. Alphonsus, VI, 598, question 3). Once the reservation has been removed, however, a simple confessor can now absolve from the sin. Moreover, removal of the reservation alone has place in confession made to one having the faculty of absolving from reserved sins, in the following cases:

1. In an invalid confession, whether culpably or inculpably, in which the reserved sin was declared. The reason is that, once the end of reservation has been obtained, the reservation is judged to be removed. But in the case posited, the end of reservation has been obtained; for this is obtained by the fact that the penitent submits the reserved sin to the judgment of a competent confessor, who assigns remedies and imposes penance (St. Alphonsus, VI, 598). Except the time of Jubilee, if the penitent confesses either invalidly, whether culpably or inculpably, or without the intention of fulfilling the works required for the Jubilee, and makes confession to a confessor who has the faculty of absolving from the reserved sin only on the occasion of the Jubilee. This is deduced from these words of the Constitution Inter praeteritos of Benedict XIV:[1] "Since all the faculties which are granted are directed to the obtaining of the Jubilee and are, as it were, preparation for it, it clearly follows from this that there is no place for the use of those faculties except with one who is both prepared to obtain the Jubilee and has a certain purpose of fulfilling the enjoined works"; add § 86 (St. Alphonsus, VI, 598).

2. In a valid confession in which the reserved sin was omitted inculpably; because "it can probably be presumed that the Superior consents that the reservation be removed whenever the penitent validly confesses to one having the faculty" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 597). Yet it stands in the way that the end of reservation has not been obtained. St. Alphonsus does not reprobate this opinion because of authority (2nd catalogue of reformed questions, question 18).

3. According to some, in an inculpably invalid confession in which the reserved sin was omitted; because the Superior probably consents to the removal of reservation whenever the penitent confesses to one having the faculty, provided the confession is not culpably invalid. Indeed, according to some, in a culpably invalid or sacrilegious confession, provided the defect of validity does not proceed precisely from the fact that the reserved sin was culpably omitted. But these opinions do not seem safe enough to most authors (St. Alphonsus, VI, 598).

[1] November 28, 1749, § 62.

387 IX. Absolution from a reserved sin. The general rule is this: the following can absolve: 1. the one reserving and his successor; 2. the Superior in the sacramental forum of the one reserving or of his successor; 3. those deputed or delegated either by law or by the aforesaid persons (St. Alphonsus, VI, 599). Specifically, note:

1. From the one sin and censure reserved by reason of itself to the Holy See, that is, from false denunciation of a priest concerning the delict of solicitation, the following can absolve: 1. Cardinals from the time of their promotion (can. 239, § 1, 1); 2. the priest whom a Cardinal or Bishop, whether residential or titular, has chosen for confessions for himself and his household, namely if the chosen priest receives the confessions of the aforesaid persons (can. 239, § 1, 2; 349, § 1, 1).

2. From sins and censures which local Ordinaries have in any way reserved to themselves, the following can absolve:

a) Cardinals, as above; likewise the priest chosen by a Bishop for confessions, as above.

b) The penitentiary canon (can. 899, § 2; 401, § 1).[1]

c) Parish priests, or others who in law are judged under the name of parish priests, during the whole time useful for fulfilling the Easter precept; then individual missionaries during the time when missions to the people happen to be held (can. 899, § 3). Moreover:

a) The time useful for the Easter precept is that which has been established either by common law, or by particular law, or by a prorogation granted to someone. The faculty can also be used in a confession which is indeed instituted during the Easter season, but not in order to fulfill the Easter precept.

Under the name of missions, spiritual exercises instituted for the whole parish can also be taken, with sufficient probability.

Note. Local Ordinaries should not impart to just anyone and indiscriminately the faculty of absolving from reserved cases (can. 899, § 1), but it should be imparted habitually at least to vicars forane, with the faculty added, especially in places of the diocese more remote from the episcopal see, of subdelegating as often as confessors of their district have recourse to them for some more urgent determinate case (can. 899, § 2).

3. From sins and censures reserved by a regular Prelate, the following can absolve:

a) Cardinals, as above; likewise the priest whom a Bishop has chosen for confessions for himself and his household, namely if the chosen priest receives the confessions of the aforesaid persons, among whom perhaps a religious is found (can. 239, § 1, 1; 349, § 1, 1).

b) Those approved by the local Ordinary (can. 519).

Note. In individual houses of a clerical religion, several must be deputed with the power, if the case concerns an exempt religion, of absolving even from cases reserved in the religion (can. 518, § 1).

[1] This canon enjoys ordinary power, which, however, he cannot delegate (can. 401, § 1).

Scholion. On Supplied Sacramental Jurisdiction

388 Let the things said about supplied jurisdiction generally be compared (vol. I, n. 102 sq.).

Chapter II. On the Right Use of the Power

389 Before we speak of the use itself of the power, certain things must be noted about those things which are prerequisite to right use; these indeed are "goodness, knowledge, and prudence."[1] A few things concerning knowledge alone.

I. The necessity of knowledge needs no proof. It suffices to have noted with St. Alphonsus that "that confessor is in the state of damnation who exposes himself to receiving confessions without sufficient knowledge" (Praxis Confessarii, n. 18). That is, he is guilty of all the defects that follow from ignorance and that were foreseen at least confusedly.

II. Mediocre knowledge is required and suffices, greater or lesser, however, according to the diversity of places and penitents. In a word: it is required and suffices that the confessor know how to solve the cases commonly occurring in the place, and know how to doubt prudently about more difficult ones (St. Alphonsus, at the cited place and VI, 627). Nevertheless, greater knowledge is desired according to these words of the Roman Ritual: "That he may be able to judge rightly, distinguishing between leprosy and leprosy, and as a skilled physician prudently cure the diseases of souls, and know how to apply suitable remedies to each one, he should strive to acquire for himself as much knowledge and prudence as he can for this purpose."[2]

III. As regards the means of acquiring and preserving due knowledge, I note with St. Alphonsus:

"Those who desire this office of receiving confessions should not easily persuade themselves that they can render themselves sufficiently fit for so great an office without long study of moral science. For this, certainly, it is not enough to run through some little summary of those which are circulated; nor is it enough to know the general principles of this faculty, as some, who, despising casuists, arrogate to themselves the name of learned men, suppose. For moral science is not only very necessary to the Christian commonwealth, since the good governance of souls depends on it, but is also supremely difficult. First, because it requires a general knowledge of all the other sciences, offices, and arts; second, because it embraces so many diverse matters distant from one another; third, because in great part it consists of so many positive laws, which are found brought together only among the casuists, and especially among the more recent ones, since laws of this kind come forth day by day. Finally, it becomes most difficult because of the innumerable circumstances of cases, on which the variation of resolutions depends; for from the diversity of circumstances different principles must be applied, and in this consists the difficulty, since it cannot be done without great discussion or the careful reading of several books which examine and elucidate the matters" (VI, 628).

And in the Praxis Confessarii the Holy Doctor says thus: "No confessor should interrupt the study of moral theology; because from so many things so diverse and disparate among themselves which pertain to this science, many, although read, because they happen more rarely, fall from the mind with the progress of time. For this reason it is necessary always to recall them to memory by frequent study" (n. 18). In addition, all should prepare themselves well for the moral conferences, as they are called. Finally, especially new confessors, after a more difficult confession has been heard, should weigh whether they have acted rightly. If doubts occur, they should consult books or more learned persons, account nevertheless being taken of the sacramental seal.

Corollary I. One who doubts whether he enjoys due knowledge should acquiesce in the judgment of the Bishop or Superior (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 18).

Corollary II. One destitute of due knowledge, and a Bishop or Superior using him, are excused on account of grave cause. A grave cause is present in the article of death and generally if otherwise penitents would for a long time lack the faculty of confessing, as can happen, for example, among captives and in Missions because of a shortage of priests (St. Alphonsus, VI, 628).

Having noted these things, we shall speak first of the things to be observed in confession, then of the things to be avoided in it, finally of the things to be observed after confession.

[1] Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 1, n. 1.

[2] At the cited place, n. 3.

Article I. On the Things to Be Observed in Confession

The confessor has the office of questioning, instructing, judging sins, judging and promoting disposition, consulting for amendment of life, and rendering sentence. Each must be treated.

§ I. On the Office of Questioning

390 I. Existence of the obligation. The confessor is bound to question the penitent: 1. if he prudently fears that formal integrity is lacking, in other words, that the penitent has kept back things which he knew had to be confessed by him; 2. if he prudently fears that material integrity is lacking, in other words, that the penitent in good faith is silent about things which of themselves are to be confessed.

The first is clear from the fact that the confessor cannot expose the sacrament to danger of nullity. Add the arguments to be brought for the second part.

The second is proved: 1. by the authority of Councils, Pontiffs, and the Roman Ritual.

The Fourth Lateran Council: "Let the priest be discreet and cautious ... diligently inquiring both into the circumstances of the sinner and of the sin."[1] Leo XII in the encyclical Caritate Christi[2] teaches that necessary diligence must be applied by the confessor in questioning penitents. Benedict XIV in the Constitution Apostolica:[3] "In the first place we admonish them to remember that they do not fulfill the parts of the office they have undertaken, indeed rather all those are guilty of a graver crime who, when they sit in the sacred tribunal of Penance, listen to penitents touched by no solicitude, do not admonish, do not question, but when the enumeration of crimes has been completed, immediately pronounce the form of absolution." The Roman Ritual: "If the penitent has not expressed the number, species, and circumstances of sins necessary to be explained, let the priest prudently question him."[4]

2. The Doctors agree. St. Thomas: "It must be said that the priest ought to search out the conscience of the sinner as a physician searches a wound and a judge a cause; because frequently those things which the one confessing would keep silent through shame, when questioned he reveals" (In IV Sentences, distinction 19). St. Antoninus,[5] St. Bonaventure,[6] St. Bernardine of Siena,[7] St. Charles Borromeo,[8] and St. Alphonsus teach the same (VI, 607, 629).

3. There are added arguments from reason; namely, the obligation is deduced: a) from the fact that the confessor as minister of the sacrament must take care that all sins not yet directly remitted be directly remitted, in other words, that confession also be materially integral; b) from the fact that the character of judgment requires that the judge know the whole cause before he pronounces sentence. There is added c) that the confessor as physician must strive to detect all diseases and provide medicine for them (St. Alphonsus, VI, 629).

Question 1. Must the confessor question if he notices that the penitent, after sufficient diligence has been applied, omits some sin?

Response. Some formerly denied this, because formal integrity suffices, and in the case it is posited to be present. But with St. Alphonsus it is rightly affirmed, because the confessor, although formal integrity suffices for the penitent himself, is bound both as minister of the sacrament, and as judge, and as physician to consult, with ordinary diligence, for the integrity of the sacrament required of itself, that is, material integrity. There is added the fact that "otherwise, as Suarez says, confessors would almost never be bound to question rude and unlearned men, who, however much diligence they put forward, can never of themselves confess integrally by explaining the circumstances, species, and number of sins.... The consequence is against the practice of the Church and against the intention of the chapter Omnis utriusque sexus" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 629). Nor should you object that the confessor is not bound to greater diligence than the penitent himself, who is supposed already to have applied the required diligence. For I answer that the obligation of the confessor is one thing and the obligation of the penitent another: the latter is bound to examine himself properly, while the former must, if he prudently fears that something is lacking to integrity, supply for it; but in supplying he is not bound to greater diligence than the penitent is in examining. I said: if he prudently fears that something is lacking to integrity. This commonly does not have place if the case concerns penitents who are both sufficiently instructed and diligent in examining and confessing sins; hence priests, religious, and pious persons commonly are not to be questioned (St. Alphonsus, VI, 607).

Question 2. To what extent is there an obligation of questioning if the confessor does not understand the penitent, because the latter, for example because of an organic defect or another reason, cannot express his thoughts in an intelligible way?

Response. In the proposed case it is for the most part expedient and sufficient, once the accusation is finished, to ask whether grave sins have been committed.

[1] Chapter 21, in chapter 12, De poenitentia.

[2] December 25, 1725.

[3] June 26, 1749.

[4] Title III, chapter 1, n. 16.

[5] Summa Theologica, t. III, title 17, chapter 17, § 2.

[6] In IV Sentences, distinction 19, doubt 5.

[7] Tome II, sermon 27, article 2, chapter 3, p. 167.

[8] Instructiones Poenit., in Acta Ecclesiae Mediolanensis, 1683, part IV, p. 431.

391 II. Object of the obligation. The obligation of questioning, as follows from what has been said above, commonly regards only those things which pertain to integrity, or which must be declared. Therefore commonly there is no obligation of questioning about species entirely unknown or not sufficiently attended to, and therefore not contracted, venial sins, mortal sins doubtfully committed, sins doubtfully mortal, and circumstances aggravating grave malice in the same species. Sometimes, however, there is an obligation so that a right judgment may be made about the required disposition or about the obligation of making restitution.[1]

[1] Hence, for example, one should commonly inquire how great a sum a thief stole.

392 III. Required diligence. Mediocre diligence is required and suffices, as was said about the obligation of the penitent to examine conscience. For greater diligence cannot be demanded in the confessor, who is bound only secondarily, than in the penitent, who is bound primarily to procure integrity. For the rest, diligence should be proportioned both to the capacity of the penitent and to the character of the confession to be instituted. It is said:

1. To the capacity of the penitent: "Therefore the confessor," says Lugo, "ought to accommodate himself to the penitent and seek knowledge of sins from individual persons according to the capacity of each: subtler knowledge from the subtler, cruder from the cruder";[1] from which St. Alphonsus concludes: "When the penitent, although rude, seems sufficiently instructed and diligent in confessing sins with their circumstances according to his state and capacity, for a learned person is bound to examine himself in one way and a rude person in another, then the confessor is bound to ask nothing else" (Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 103).
2. To the character of the confession to be instituted; thus, for example, a general confession requires relatively less diligence than a confession of one month.

[1] De Poenitentia, disputation 16, n. 594.

393 IV. Gravity of the obligation. The obligation of which we have spoken is grave, although the obligation of the penitent to consult for integrity is graver than the obligation of the confessor. The reason is that the matter is grave.

Question. Does a confessor sin gravely who advertently omits one or another necessary question about species, number, and so forth? It is said advertently, that is, from grave carelessness or negligence; for it is clear that smallness of matter can be had in the negligence itself, but the question is whether smallness of matter can be admitted in the matter itself, that is, in mortal sins to be investigated.

Response. Many judge that the aforesaid confessor does not sin gravely, at least if he acted thus in a long series of confessions. But the contrary seems to have to be admitted, because the confessor advertently fails in a grave matter. Nor should you object that by this opinion too grave a burden is imposed on the confessor, since the burden imposed by this opinion scarcely differs from the burden imposed by the adversaries. For they say that then only is sin not grave when, in a long series of confessions, one or another necessary question is omitted. But this kind of diminution of the burden scarcely deserves notice (St. Alphonsus, VI, 629).

Objection. The obligation of the penitent is greater than that of the confessor.

Response. Let that pass; but the argument proves that the obligation of the confessor also is grave.

394 V. Manner of fulfilling the obligation. The questions should be:

1. Timely, or made at an opportune time. Of itself, it is better to permit the penitent to explain himself, and not to interrupt him. Practically, one should proceed for the most part in this way. If the confession is foreseen to be brief, the confessor does not interrupt the penitent by questioning him, but waits for the end of the confession. If it concerns a long confession, the confessor will easily forget something necessary unless he mixes questions into the confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 629).

2. Apt, that is, suited to the capacity, condition, and psychological state of the penitent. Generally questions should be brief, clear, and determinate, not negative ("Surely you did not consent?") nor disjunctive ("Did you sin by yourself or with others?"). A number greater rather than lesser should be proposed.

3. Kind. Therefore he should avoid harsh words ("Have you committed the most shameful sin of lust?"), likewise words which signify impatience ("What more? Have you finished? Hurry up and get yourself done"). If the confessor notices that the penitent has a sin which he declares with difficulty, let him say: Do not fear; I will gladly question you.

4. Prudent, or such that the penitent does not learn to sin from them (cf. can. 888, § 2).[1] But if this is feared, "the question ought to be made from afar, so that if the penitent committed it he may say so, and if he did not commit it he may not learn it" (St. Thomas, In IV Sentences, distinction 19, at the end).

5. Chaste. Generally the confessor should be mindful of this: in the matter of lust it is better to be deficient in many things than to abound in one; likewise of the admonition of St. Alphonsus: "Questions in the matter of chastity ought to be few and cautious" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 632). Specifically:

a) The confessor should not descend to particular modes or circumstances of the sin, nor to species which commonly do not occur. This is so that: 1. he may not be a cause of shameful temptation to the penitent or to himself; 2. he may not provide scandal to the penitent, as one who might suspect that the confessor is taking pleasure in the investigation of those things; 3. he may not bring confession into disrepute, namely, because there is danger lest some penitents narrate to others that matters of this kind were handled in this way (St. Alphonsus, at the cited place; cf. can. 888, § 2).

b) Let him use chaste terms, and such as do not teach sin to those who perhaps are ignorant of it. Hence, for example, he should not ask boys whether there was emission of seed, and so forth (St. Alphonsus, at the cited place). If a modest mode of questioning does not occur to his mind, let him rather abstain from the question.

[1] Cf. Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 1, n. 17.

395 VI. Excusing causes. The confessor is excused from questioning integrally:

1. As often as the penitent is excused from integrity, for example because of infirm health, scruples, and so forth.

2. When and insofar as the questions would be harmful, for example if they could not be made without danger being created for the penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 632).

3. When and insofar as the questions would be useless. Hence, for example, he should not commonly ask penitents whether they regarded this or that as a grave sin; nor should inquiry be made too much into the number, as was said in n. 320 (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 20).

Corollary. Just as a great number of penitents does not excuse the penitent from integrity, so neither does it excuse the confessor from the obligation of supplying the defect (n. 326).

§ II. On the Office of Instructing

396 I. If ignorance concerns either those things which certainly or probably must be known by necessity of means, or those things which are required for receiving the sacrament of Penance fruitfully, the confessor, before absolving the penitent, should instruct him or should take care that he first learn them (St. Alphonsus, VI, 608, 610). Commonly it will be better at once to instruct such a penitent summarily,[1] to stir him to an act of faith in the things to be known,[2] and to absolve him, with the obligation imposed of afterward learning more diligently the rudiments of the Christian faith.[3]

II. If ignorance concerns things to be known by necessity of precept, commonly he should absolve the penitent at once; nevertheless, he should be warned of the obligation of afterward obtaining fuller instruction.

III. If ignorance concerns an obligation of doing or omitting something, admonition of itself must always be made, because both ignorance of this kind and the material sins arising from it involve some evil and can become harmful. Practically, however, these rules are established:

1. Admonition must always be made if the common good or positive law requires it. I said "always," even if the penitent is foreseen as not going to obey the admonition. "Universally," so Benedict XIV in the Constitution Apostolica,[4] "the penitent must be admonished when ... he is in those circumstances of fact which, if the confessor dissimulates, strengthen the sinner in a wicked work, not without the scandal of others, when someone observes that those things which are practiced with impunity by those who frequent the Sacraments of the Church are judged by him to be lawful for himself." The reason for this doctrine is handed down by St. Alphonsus in these words: "Although the confessor by reason of his office is principally bound to attend to the good of the penitent, nevertheless, since he is a part of the commonwealth and has been constituted minister for the good of the Christian commonwealth, he is bound to prefer the public good to the private good of the penitent. So commonly" (VI, 615; Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 116). Hence generally the following must be admonished: 1. those who hold public offices, whether ecclesiastical or civil, and err concerning the duties of the office (St. Alphonsus, at the cited place); 2. those who have given their name to a harmful sect, for example socialism, liberalism, or the sect of Freemasons; 3. those who have been deputed by the party of liberals or socialists either to Legislative Assemblies or to Provincial or Municipal Administration; 4. those who are bound to denounce a confessor by reason of solicitation, as will be explained later.
2. Outside the case of the common good or of positive law, or considering only the good of the penitent, admonition is to be made as follows:

a) It must be made if it is judged that it will be useful or at least not harmful to the penitent. Hence it must be made: 1. if the penitent through ignorance regards as a sin what is not a sin, or as a grave sin what is light; 2. if the penitent actually doubts about liceity. Nevertheless, if the penitent asks the confessor, often "he ought not answer more than he is asked. For example, if someone bound by a vow of chastity asks whether the marriage was valid because of the vow, and whether he is bound to render the debt to his wife, the confessor should affirm both, saying nothing about the obligation of not asking, even if he knows that the marriage is null because of some diriment impediment" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 616); 3. if the ignorance is foreseen as soon going to cease, as if it concerns the first conclusions of the natural law, for example concerning the malice of pollution, the penitent should commonly be warned at once, and all the more because customs of this kind are rooted out with greater difficulty the longer they have been protracted (St. Alphonsus, III, 226); 4. if it concerns removing a proximate and voluntary occasion of sinning. Yet I would not deny that the penitent can be left in good faith in this case if it is truly feared that, after the admonition has been made and neglected, he will become wholly alienated from the sacraments; 5. if it concerns Prelates, Superiors, parish priests, or parents, both because ignorance is commonly not perfect and because the common good is involved (St. Alphonsus, VI, 615). Finally, if the penitent is judged not indeed immediately, but soon, to be going to obey the admonition, it should be deferred somewhat (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 115).

b) It must be omitted if it is judged that it will be harmful to the penitent.

c) If it is doubtful whether the admonition will help or harm, "the confessor ought to weigh the harm and the useful result, likewise the degree of fear of harm and of hope of utility, and choose that which he judges to preponderate.... For the rest, in doubt it regularly seems to me that formal evils are to be avoided rather than material ones" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 616).

[1] Let him not always require that the proposed articles be held in memory.

[2] For example by asking: Do you believe that there is one God? and so forth.

[3] Roman Ritual, title VII, chapter 1, n. 14.

[4] June 26, 1749.

§ III. On the Office of Judging Sins

397 I. For the confessor to absolve validly, it suffices that he has apprehended the act of the penitent under the aspect of sin, even if he forms no judgment either about the gravity or about the species of the sin (St. Alphonsus, VI, 627).

II. For the confessor to absolve in such a way that there does not remain for the penitent the burden of afterwards confessing the sin again, it suffices that the penitent has declared the sin, as it was committed, to an attentive confessor, even if the confessor errs both as regards gravity and as regards species (St. Alphonsus, VI, 478).

III. For the confessor to absolve licitly, he generally ought to have judged whether the sins accused were grave or light, and of what species they were (St. Alphonsus, VI, 627). To explain these things more, observe that it suffices that the confessor: 1. habitually know the gravity and species of the more obvious sins;[1] 2. equipped with that knowledge, hear the sins, even if he does not form an entirely explicit judgment about gravity and species; 3. have judged about the sins in the way set forth at the moment when the penitent declares them, and pronounce sentence from the judgment previously had, even if, while he grants absolution, he does not remember the sins declared.

Corollary I. While the confessor imposes satisfaction, he ought to retain or reassume sufficient knowledge, which is easily present, for imposing a fitting satisfaction.

Corollary II. If absolution is deferred, for example for one or two weeks, it is required that in the following confession the confessor have retained, or now reassume, at least confused knowledge of the state of the penitent (n. 334).

[1] "Let him hear the rest and absolve" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 627).

§ IV. On the Office of Judging and Promoting Disposition

398 I. For the confessor to absolve licitly, of itself at least broad moral certitude about the due disposition of the penitent is required, but that also suffices. It is said:

1. Of itself, because sometimes absolution can be granted conditionally even if the confessor lacks broad moral certitude (n. 404).
2. Broad moral certitude, that is, one which excludes strict doubt or imports the state of one opining.
3. That also suffices, for the matter concerns an internal thing, especially the sorrow of the penitent, about which greater certitude is had with difficulty, so that, if greater were required, "the administration of the sacrament would become subject to excessive scruples and difficulties" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 57). Hence apply these words of St. Thomas: "Certitude is not to be sought in the same way in all things, but in each matter according to its proper mode" (II-II, q. 47, a. 9, ad 2).

Having noted these things, the necessity of broad moral certitude is proved by these arguments:

First, the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide[1] has these words: "Confessors should deny absolution to those who provide either no signs or only signs of feigned penance; but they should defer absolution for those whose penance is uncertain and suspect."

Next, after the first proposition condemned by Innocent XI,[2] almost all, both older and more recent authors, admit and defend the doctrine stated, as Aertnys,[3] Berardi,[4] and especially Ter Haar[5] prove by the testimonies they cite.

Finally, the reverence due to the sacrament forbids its being ministered with so great a danger of nullity as the defect of broad moral certitude imports. In the case the sacrament will indeed probably be valid and probably will grant pardon to the sinner; but it cannot be admitted that for that reason alone the reverence due of itself to the sacrament may be neglected, or that the sacrament may thus be subordinated to the good of the subject, especially because a sinner who is doubtfully disposed wholly lacks an unimpeded right to absolution, since he ought to take care that he is certainly or at least sufficiently certainly disposed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 461; Homo Apostolicus, tract 16, n. 117).

Objection 1. The Roman Catechism teaches: "For if the priest, after hearing the confession, has judged that diligence was not wholly lacking to the penitent in enumerating sins, nor sorrow in detesting them, he can be absolved."[6] Therefore he to whom contrition seems not wholly lacking can be absolved; this is far different from saying that only one about whose contrition the confessor is morally certain can be absolved.

Response. The only sense corresponding to the words, or the natural sense, is this: the penitent can be absolved if the confessor has judged that some true sorrow is not lacking. But one who truly doubts whether sorrow is present does not judge that it is present (vol. I, n. 215). Therefore the Roman Catechism favors rather than opposes the opinion defended by us.

Objection 2. It suffices that the confessor administer the sacrament prudently and without rashness. But this has place when he imparts absolution to those who are probably contrite.

Response. I concede the major; I deny the minor. For he administers the sacrament imprudently and rashly when he exposes it to grave danger of nullity. But ministration made to those who are only probably attrite exposes the sacrament to grave danger of nullity.

Objection 3. In those who most need the sacrament of Penance, broad moral certitude about due disposition is scarcely had, so that, if the stricter opinion is admitted, absolution would of itself almost always have to be deferred for them.

Response. I deny the assertion, and that it must be denied will be clearer from what is to be said under II.

[1] August 1827.

[2] The said proposition is this: it is not illicit in conferring sacraments to follow a probable opinion about the validity of the sacrament, leaving aside the safer one, unless law or agreement or danger of incurring grave harm forbids it (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1151).

[3] In Nouvelle Revue Theologique, 1900, pp. 283-536.

[4] De Recidivis, n. 19 sq.

[5] Cited work, n. 408 sq.

[6] De Poenitentia, n. 60.

399 II. The very confession or assertion of the penitent provides sufficient certitude about due disposition, unless from some other source a positive prejudice against due disposition arises (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459). When such a prejudice has arisen, some other special sign of disposition should be added to the confession or assertion, by which the prejudice is removed or sufficiently weakened. It is said:

1. The confession itself provides sufficient certitude about due disposition. For no one is presumed evil or a hypocrite.
2. Unless from another source a prejudice against due disposition arises, for example from the fact that the penitent is a habituated relapser; likewise from the fact that the penitent, who several times promised that he would avoid an interrupted voluntary occasion, nevertheless has not ceased to approach it and to sin in it, even if he is not a habituated relapser. Each of these things will be developed more later.

400 III. Once a prejudice has arisen, another sign of disposition should be added by which the prejudice is removed or sufficiently weakened. Signs of this kind[1] are, for example: 1. confession following from an extraordinary motive, as from a sudden death or from a sermon; indeed a confession which is instituted neither from the precept of the Church, nor from the authority of others, nor from custom alone, can suffice, for example a confession instituted immediately or soon after a fall; 2. unusual good works, for example prayers, fasting, almsgiving, pilgrimage, performed before confession; 3. manifestation of a sin previously hidden; 4. sorrow expressed by sighs and tears, although these must not always be trusted; 5. words which signify a firmer purpose, although even these cannot always be trusted; 6. spontaneous request for means of amending oneself, and so forth (St. Alphonsus, VI, 460, 505).

[1] They are called extraordinary signs by many; but one must not insist on the character of the extraordinary.

401 IV. When a prejudice against the penitent's disposition has arisen, the confessor should try to dispose him and to elicit a sign by which the prejudice is removed. He is bound to these things under grave obligation, both because then the precept of fraternal correction is especially urgent, and because another practice is very harmful. "For if absolution is immediately denied or deferred for penitents of this kind, they will easily fall into despair or religious indifference."[1] Hence the Roman Ritual rightly says: "After hearing the confession ... he will apply opportune corrections and admonitions, as he judges there to be need, with fatherly charity, and he will try to lead the penitent to sorrow and contrition by efficacious words."[2]

Benedict XIV in the Constitution Apostolica[3] has these words: "They should not cease to exhort especially those who are accustomed to approach the sacrament of Penance either rarely or not without many crimes; they should open to them the most wretched life which they have led under the yoke of sin; they should explain the baseness of their crimes, so that, namely, they may grieve from the heart and seriously propose that they will withdraw from sins in the future. For it is settled that solid and grave exhortations of confessors, given in the forum of Penance, are far more efficacious than the sacred sermons of preachers, so that the penitent may turn his soul away from vices.... Nor should confessors reply that this cannot be done if a more frequent number of penitents suggests brevity; for that golden saying of St. Francis Xavier, in Fursellini's Life of him (book 6, chapter 17), has already solved the difficulty, conceived in these words: As for those confessing, he judged that care should be bestowed not hurriedly but diligently, admonishing that they should prefer to hear few confessions rightly made rather than many rashly hurried" (n. 22). Leo XII inculcates the same in the Constitution Charitate Christi.[4]

[1] Ter Haar, cited work, n. 351.

[2] Title III, chapter 1, n. 18.

[3] June 26, 1749.

[4] December 25, 1825.

§ V. On the Office of Consulting for Amendment of Life

402 After hearing confession, the confessor "will lead the penitent to amending and better ordering his life, and will hand down remedies for sins."[1] Hence he should inquire into the causes of sins, especially whether there was some occasion, and assign remedies. The general means are: 1. flight from occasions; 2. prayer, especially devotion toward the Blessed Virgin Mary; 3. frequency of the sacraments; 4. spiritual exercises instituted in some house of exercises. As regards particular means, compare what is to be said about the ministration of the sacrament to some persons specifically.

[1] Roman Ritual, title III, chapter 1, n. 18.

§ VI. On the Office of Rendering Sentence

One must distinguish between those certainly indisposed, those doubtfully disposed, and those sufficiently certainly disposed.

403 I. For those certainly indisposed, that is, after paternal admonition, absolution must be denied. Those certainly indisposed are those who manifestly lack contrition or purpose, or do not wish to fulfill a grave obligation. "Let him not absolve those," says the Roman Ritual, "who are incapable of such a benefit: such are those who give no signs of sorrow; who do not wish to put aside hatred and enmities, or to restore another's property if they can, or to leave a proximate occasion of sinning, or in another way to abandon sins and amend life for the better; or who have given public scandal, unless they publicly make satisfaction and remove the scandal."[1]

[1] Title III, chapter 1, n. 23.

404 II. For those doubtfully disposed, absolution of itself must be deferred (n. 398); but for a grave reason it can or even must be granted, but only under condition.

1. Those are understood as doubtfully disposed who, after paternal admonition, are not indeed held as certainly indisposed, but nevertheless do not bring those signs of penance which found broad moral certitude about due disposition.

2. A grave reason is had: 1. if someone is in danger of death; 2. if the penitent judges that he is disposed and it is prudently feared that, if absolution is delayed, he will become alienated from the sacraments and waste away in sins, or, for example by communicating or entering marriage, will commit another sacrilege (St. Alphonsus, VI, 432, 4).

405 III. To those sufficiently certainly disposed, absolution must be granted from justice, and regularly indeed immediately. In some cases, however, it can or even must be deferred, unless a special reason is present for imparting absolution immediately even then. It is said:

1. Absolution must be granted from justice and regularly immediately. For a penitent rightly confessed and disposed has by tacit contract a right to be absolved at once. Hence canon 886: if the confessor cannot doubt about the dispositions of the penitent and the latter asks for absolution, absolution is neither to be denied nor deferred.

406 2. In some cases, however, it can or even must be deferred,[1] namely if the confessor judges delay to be necessary or more useful for the amendment of the penitent. This doctrine rests first on the almost common authority of theologians. Thus teach, for example, St. Antoninus, St. Francis Xavier, St. Charles Borromeo, St. Leonard of Port Maurice, St. Alphonsus, Venerable Segneri, Fessius, Suarez, Lugo, and others, whose testimonies you will find cited in Ter Haar.[2] There is added the theological reason: namely, the confessor must perform not only the office of judge, but also that of physician (can. 888, § 1), to each of which offices, as is clear, the penitent must submit himself. But it belongs to a physician to apply means which are judged necessary or more useful. Moreover, delay of absolution is sometimes necessary or at least more useful for the amendment of the penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 462-464). It is judged necessary if otherwise there is grave danger that the penitent will break his purpose; more useful, if delay of absolution will more efficaciously guard against relapse. "This is not to be understood as though delay of itself would effect this, that the strength of the penitent against future temptations and relapses would be increased, for that would be plainly absurd, but in the sense that the penitent, often struck with salutary fear on the occasion of the delay, is stirred up so that, aided by the actual grace of God, he may better apply other remedies, for example flight from occasions, prayer, and due vigilance, and thus also in the future avoid sins more efficaciously."[3]

Corollary. Attending to what has been set forth above, absolution of itself is usefully or necessarily deferred according to the circumstances:

1. For one who is held by a very difficult obligation, such as the obligation of restoring a thing of great value which he can restore; of denouncing a confessor who is guilty of solicitation; of reconciling himself with an enemy; of physically leaving a proximate, continuous, and voluntary occasion to which someone is greatly attached; of applying the prescribed means lest he relapse in a necessary proximate occasion. In these cases absolution is deferred until the obligation has been fulfilled or the prescribed means have been applied. The reason is that otherwise there is danger lest the penitent, after receiving absolution, break a purpose very difficult to fulfill (St. Alphonsus, III, 682; VI, 454, 456).

2. For a habituated relapser from occasion, that is, for one who has contracted a habit of some sin and, after being admonished by the confessor, continued the custom of sinning for the same reason, because of the occasion, but not for a relapser from internal frailty. The reason is that the will of the relapser, unless something stands in the way, must be strengthened by a stronger means, namely by delay of absolution. I said unless something stands in the way, for in a relapser from internal frailty courage must be given and the grace of the sacrament must be conferred (St. Alphonsus, VI, 456, 459, 463, 464).

Objection. Canon 886 declares: "If the confessor cannot doubt about the dispositions of the penitent and the latter asks for absolution, absolution is neither to be denied nor deferred." Therefore absolution, if it is asked by the penitent, can never be deferred for those sufficiently certainly disposed.

Response. The cited canon is not to be interpreted thus. For: 1. a priori it seems very improbable that the canon is opposed to the doctrine commonly admitted, even by the more benign authors. Now such is the doctrine according to which absolution sometimes can, or even must, be deferred for one disposed.

2. The canon can well be understood of the general norm, or the norm to be followed of itself; this does not prevent one from departing from it accidentally or because of special circumstances. And if that is less pleasing, observe: the canon speaks of dispositions, not of the disposition of the penitent, and for that reason perhaps signifies that absolution is then not to be deferred for a penitent asking it when the confessor does not doubt about the dispositions which seem to have to be required here and now by him not only as judge but also as physician, so that absolution can be granted without grave danger of breaking the purpose. Therefore it remains that we say that nothing new is contained in the cited canon. That the canon can be well harmonized with the common doctrine seems to be admitted sufficiently commonly.[4] We said, however, that in the cases set forth absolution is to be deferred:

[1] As regards the origin of this practice, Ter Haar writes: "In antiquity, especially up to the thirteenth century, confessors generally followed the penitential books as the norm of acting.... But the more moral and pastoral Theology advanced, theologians, especially after the Council of Trent, established several rules of prudence and discretion concerning absolution to be conferred or deferred ... so that the twofold end of this sacrament, which is to remit past sins and to prevent future ones, would be obtained more efficaciously. Hence then they spoke more and more often expressly about the delay of absolution. There is added this reason indicated by Francolini (De Poenitentiae disciplina, book 3, chapter 10, nn. 5, 6), namely that in the Middle Ages sinners were accustomed to confess rarely and scarcely once a year; for these, therefore, if they were truly contrite, it was dangerous to defer absolution. Hence also the theologians of that time scarcely spoke about delay of absolution. But since from the sixteenth century the use of the sacraments had grown greatly, theologians repeatedly treated of this delay, so that the sacraments would be received with greater fruit and would serve more for the amendment of penitents. Finally, it must be noted that canonical and sacramental penances in antiquity were for the most part very grave; and therefore, if they were accepted, they were highly medicinal and very efficacious against relapse into sin. But with the progress of time, when, faith growing cold, medicinal penances were always imposed more mildly, theologians began to commend more expressly delay of absolution, even for those who were judged truly contrite, so that by this remedy, especially relapsers and occasionaries, would be incited to shake off spiritual sloth and to impose on themselves greater force, by which they would avoid occasions and apply other means" (De conferenda absolutione sacramentali iuxta canonem 886, n. 12).

[2] De conferenda absolutione sacramentali iuxta can. 886, n. 13 sq.

[3] Ter Haar, De occasionariis et recidivis, n. 437.

[4] Cf. Ter Haar, cited work, p. 63 sq.

407 3. Unless a special reason is present for imparting it immediately even then. Special reason is involved by: 1. danger of death, as is clear; 2. an extraordinary disposition of such a kind that it sufficiently guarantees future amendment. Such an extraordinary disposition, however, should not easily be presumed; 3. danger of alienation from the sacraments; 4. danger of infamy; 5. grave difficulty of returning to the same confessor, provided it is grave for the penitent to repeat the confession before another. The reason for 4 and 5 is that the very necessity of receiving absolution, which is present in the said cases, founds the hope of acquiring more efficacious graces (St. Alphonsus, VI, 454, 456). There is added the fact that in the case delay of absolution will easily be borne with difficulty, and for that reason can carry with it alienation from the sacraments (St. Alphonsus, VI, 454, 456).

Corollary I. For those who are weak in faith or negligent in religious practice, if they are sufficiently certainly disposed, absolution should commonly not be deferred.

Corollary II. On the occasion of a mission or spiritual exercises, some one of the enumerated causes is commonly present, so that then, at least for the most part, absolution can be granted at once to those sufficiently certainly disposed, and almost must be.

Corollary III. If delay of absolution is applied: 1. it should not be made for a long time, more advisedly for only one week or at most another; 2. it should be signified in the most humane words, and in such a way that it is clear that absolution is deferred not from anger or hatred, but only for the good of the penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 463); 3. the confessor should take pains that the penitent grasp the usefulness of the delay and consent to it willingly; 4. it should be made together with the indication of means of amendment and with an exhortation that he return without fear.

Question. What sentence should be rendered by a confessor who prudently fears that the penitent is sacrilegiously keeping silent about, or denying, a committed sin? Moreover, in order that he sacrilegiously keep silent about or deny it, it is required that the penitent: 1. have sinned subjectively gravely; 2. not yet have confessed the sin; 3. now remember the sin; 4. judge that there is no cause excusing from integrity. With these things noted:

Response 1. If the confessor doubts, absolution should commonly be granted, and indeed absolutely, according to this principle: the penitent is to be believed whether he speaks for himself or against himself. If, however, all things considered, the doubt persists, one must distinguish. If it persists independently of the confession of another, for example from the report of others, let the penitent be absolved conditionally. If it persists dependently on the confession of another,[1] according to some the penitent is to be absolved, and indeed absolutely, because, they say, it is not licit to use that sacramental knowledge. According to others, he is to be absolved conditionally.

Response 2. If the confessor is certain, which, considering the state of the question, will scarcely have place, one must distinguish. If he is certain independently of the confession of another, absolution should be denied. If he is certain from the confession of another,[1] according to some the penitent must be absolved, and indeed absolutely, because, they say, it is illicit to use that sacramental knowledge. According to others, absolution must be denied; nevertheless, to conceal the denial, some prayer should be recited (St. Alphonsus, VI, 631).

[1] In this case he cannot question the penitent more or otherwise than he would do if he had not known it, unless he has received express permission. Sometimes it is expedient to ask permission to use sacramental knowledge for helping another penitent, for example an accomplice.

Article II. On Things to Be Avoided in Confession

Here especially these things must be treated: 1. inquiry into the name of an accomplice; 2. absolution of an accomplice; 3. solicitation to shameful acts.

§ I. On Inquiry into the Name of an Accomplice

408 Canon 888, § 2 establishes: "Let the confessor take care altogether not to inquire into the name of an accomplice." This canon takes the place of the ecclesiastical documents[1] which before the Code governed this matter. Therefore, of itself it is forbidden to induce the penitent to reveal the name of an accomplice, and indeed under grave sin or, as commonly happens, under light sin, according as, considering the rules on defamation of neighbor (vol. I, n. 1069), it is grave or light to reveal the sin of a third person to one upright man. Scandal can be added, and the danger that the penitent may be somewhat alienated from the sacrament. Moreover, of itself it is always a grave sin to inquire into the name of an accomplice under denial of absolution.

And so the matter stands of itself, since, when a proportionate cause is added, inquiry into the name becomes licit.

Corollary I. It is lawful for the confessor to inquire into the name of an accomplice if the penitent is bound from another source to denounce the accomplice, and either the confessor is the superior to whom the accomplice must be denounced, or the denunciation cannot conveniently be made except through the mediation of the confessor, who has been made certain of the accomplice's name. But commonly, even in these cases, it is better that the name be revealed outside confession. If it is done through the mediation of the confessor, it can commonly be done without the name of the accomplice being manifested to the confessor, namely by handing to him a closed note on which the name of the accomplice is written, or even by handing to the confessor a closed note which contains both the facts to be manifested and the name of the accomplice, and which is handed over by the confessor to the one to whom it belongs by law.

Corollary II. The confessor can and must question the penitent insofar as the integrity of confession and the prudent ministration of the sacrament require it, even if from this he comes to knowledge of the accomplice, as was explained in n. 328 (St. Alphonsus, VI, 491, 492).

[1] The documents were: the Constitutions Suprema of Benedict XIV, July 7, 1745; Ubi primum, June 2, 1746; Ad eradicandum, September 28, 1746; and the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis of Pius IX, October 12, 1869. The law, however, not only prohibited inquiry into the name of an accomplice, but also, when the conditions were posited, established penalties; these have now been removed.

§ II. On Absolution of an Accomplice

The principal documents pertaining here are: canon 884, which refers to the Apostolic Constitutions; the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV;[1] the Brief Apostoli muneris of Benedict XIV;[2] the Constitution Apostolicae Sedis of Pius IX;[3] canon 2367.

Moreover, considering the documents cited, two things must be distinguished here, namely a certain subtraction of jurisdiction and an excommunication reserved to the Apostolic See in the most special manner. The former is established against the confessor accomplice who absolves the other accomplice party.

[1] June 1, 1741.

[2] February 8, 1745.

[3] October 12, 1869.

409 1. Subtraction of jurisdiction. Canon 884 establishes: "Absolution of an accomplice in a shameful sin is invalid except in danger of death; and even in danger of death, outside the case of necessity, it is illicit on the part of the confessor according to the norm of the Apostolic Constitutions and especially the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV, June 1, 1741." We shall speak first of the requisites for subtraction of jurisdiction to have place; then of the way in which subtraction of jurisdiction must be understood; finally we shall assign exceptions to the general rule.

1. Requisites for subtraction of jurisdiction to have place. A sin is required:

a) Against chastity. It does not matter whether it is a sin of deed, of sight, or of speech[2] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 554).

b) Committed with another, whether with a male or with a female, whether with one mature or one immature, and, as the Sacred Penitentiary[3] responded, whether before or after the priesthood was received. Nor does it stand in the way that in the latter case the danger of relapse has almost vanished; for a law which is founded on the presumption of common danger persists, even if in a particular case the danger has ceased. There is added the fact that, besides the danger of relapse to be avoided, other ends of the law are also assigned, such as the indecency of a confession of this kind.

c) Grave, and indeed subjectively and externally. It is nevertheless sufficiently externally grave if it shows grave internal malice (St. Alphonsus, VI, 554).

d) As grave and known to the other party, and indeed at the time when the sin is committed. Otherwise there is not complicity, or participation in the same grave external sin. Moreover, this condition is presumed to be present if the case concerns a mutual act of itself gravely influencing venereal commotion. But if the discussion is of an act not gravely influencing of itself, but posited with lustful intention or with venereal commotion, that intention or commotion must become known from the circumstances; otherwise the act is indeed common, but it is not common insofar as it involves grave sin.

e) Such in both parties as has been described. Hence the case is not present if the other party did not consent, or was ignorant of the malice, even if he or she was led into that error by the accomplice; nor is it present if the sin was committed with one sleeping, with one drunk, or with one not yet possessing the use of reason (St. Alphonsus, VI, 554).

f) That the confessor and the penitent know themselves as accomplices, whether previously, for example at the time of the sin, or now. This is required with sufficient probability, because otherwise it can happen that the confessor would have to defame himself before the penitent. Suppose some person presents herself to the confessor, ignorant that she has sinned with that priest, while the confessor notices that the person is present with whom he perpetrated lust. Otherwise one must speak if the confessor and penitent previously knew themselves as accomplices, and only the penitent did not notice that he or she was confessing to the confessor with whom he or she had sinned.

g) That the aforesaid things are at least morally certain. Doubt sometimes concerns the gravity of a touch, and so forth.

Corollary. When the conditions have been fulfilled, subtraction of jurisdiction has place:

a) Even if the confessor is ignorant of the law which establishes the subtraction of jurisdiction; for "ignorance of invalidating or inhabilitating laws does not excuse from them unless something else is expressly said" (can. 16, § 1), or unless the incapacity is established only by way of penalty, which does not have place in the case, since the law was principally issued so that relapses might be guarded against.

b) Even if the confessor does not recognize the penitent; for if ignorance of an inhabilitating law does not excuse from it, still less does ignorance of the fact on which the application of the law depends. Nor should you object that Benedict XIV takes jurisdiction away from the confessor who "dares to receive the sacramental confession of the accomplice person," but that in our hypothesis rash daring is lacking. For the Supreme Pontiff subtracts jurisdiction from the confessor "lest he dare to receive the confession."

c) Even if the penitent does not notice that he or she is confessing to the confessor with whom he or she sinned, provided nevertheless that the confessor and penitent previously knew themselves as accomplices. For when this latter hypothesis has been fulfilled, the confessor admonishing the penitent does not defame himself.

[1] Cf. De Smet, De absolutione complicis et sollicitatione, 2nd ed.

[2] Holy Office, May 28, 1873.

[3] January 22, 1879.

410 2. The way in which subtraction of jurisdiction must be understood. a) The confessor certainly cannot directly absolve the accomplice from the sin of complicity as long as another confessor has not yet directly absolved him or her from it. After the sin has been directly remitted, even the confessor accomplice validly absolves directly from it (St. Alphonsus, VI, 555). I said validly, because commonly he acts illicitly; for the Holy See is accustomed to enjoin on one who, when the sin of complicity has not yet been directly remitted, absolves or feigns to absolve an accomplice, that he abstain in the future from hearing the confessions of the accomplice.

b) It is disputed whether jurisdiction has also been taken away with respect to other sins, or whether it persists with respect to them, so that the confessor can absolve directly from the others, and thus indirectly from the sin of complicity. Some affirm simply. Others affirm if the penitent declares the sin of complicity, otherwise they deny. Others simply deny, or judge that jurisdiction persists with respect to other sins. This opinion is sufficiently probable, both because the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae declares that jurisdiction has been taken away "for absolving any person whatever from a fault of this kind; so indeed that absolution, if he shall have imparted any, is altogether null and void," namely absolution from that sin, since as not direct it is null as such, so that the sin must be confessed anew and remitted directly; and because the Sacred Penitentiary responded[1] that "privation of jurisdiction ... is in order to the shameful sin itself in which the same confessor was an accomplice." This opinion is at least probable, so that the Church supplies for caution.

[1] May 16, 1877.

411 3. Exceptions. a) The confessor validly absolves even from the sin of complicity in danger of death; likewise in the same danger he licitly absolves if necessity urges (the cited documents). It is said:

1. In danger of death; who are said to be in danger of death, see n. 370.

2. In danger of death he also absolves licitly if necessity urges, that is: 1. if another, even one not approved, cannot be used without danger of infamy or scandal (can. 2367, § 1).[1] Nevertheless, fear of infamy to be incurred before that one confessor, in the confession itself, does not excuse. Moreover, the priest accomplice is bound under grave obligation, if it can be done, to remove or anticipate the danger of infamy or scandal, for example by pretending illness or by going away for some time. Nevertheless, danger of infamy or scandal will easily be present if only one not approved can be called; still more, if only one suspended or excommunicated, known as such, remains. There are even those who judge that the obligation of calling the latter persons is simply absent. Necessity urges: 2. if another refuses to receive the confession; 3. if the penitent refuses to confess to another, for example to a blood-relative, or manifests grave repugnance to doing so, in which case there is danger of sacrilege (can. 2367, § 1). The reason for 2 and 3 is that then another priest is morally absent.

Corollary. One who has begun a confession licitly continues and directly absolves the accomplice from the sin of complicity, even if now another priest can receive the confession: 1. if he began licitly, that is, when another could not conveniently be present, even perhaps because of preceding culpable negligence by the one beginning; 2. with sufficient probability, if he began illicitly, that is, when another could be present. As regards excommunication, however, in the case one must speak thus: if he began licitly, he does not incur excommunication, and this is probable even if he culpably neglected to anticipate the danger which, when he began the confession, could no longer be anticipated. If he began illicitly, that is, when another could conveniently be present, he escapes or does not escape excommunication according as before absolution he repents or does not repent of the sin committed.

b) It is disputed whether the confessor ever validly absolves from the sin of complicity even outside danger of death, for example if the accomplice would for a long time, or at least for a very long time, lack the occasion of confessing to another. Now it seems this must be denied. For the law expressly and repeatedly declares that only danger of death is excepted. So also canon 884. Likewise the Holy Office declared[2] that jurisdiction is taken away "unless the most extreme necessity entirely urges, namely if in the very article of death another priest is lacking." Finally, the end of the law, which is that priests be turned away from sin and relapse, advises that the law be urged, even if the penitent sometimes suffers some harm from it. For the rest, that harm scarcely deserves notice, since the penitent in the cases here supposed can be absolved directly from other sins, and thus indirectly from the sin of complicity, as we shall now note.

c) As we said, the confessor enjoys jurisdiction over the other sins of the accomplice (n. 410). Moreover, if a truly grave reason is present and another cannot be approached without grave inconvenience, it is lawful to absolve the accomplice directly from other sins, indirectly from the sin of complicity. A truly grave reason, considering the most severe law which forbids absolution of an accomplice, is, for example, an annual confession to be made, Easter Communion, or another Communion which cannot be omitted without danger of infamy or scandal. Nevertheless, in the case the penitent can also be content with perfect contrition; indeed, this of itself is to be preferred. A grave cause on the part of the confessor is had if the penitent knows the confessor accomplice only by face, not by name, and denial of absolution perhaps brings danger that the name of the confessor will afterward be inquired into.

[1] Constitution Apostolici muneris, § 3.

[2] February 20, 1867.

412 II. Excommunication. Canon 2367 establishes: one absolving or feigning to absolve an accomplice in a shameful sin incurs by the very fact an excommunication reserved in a most special manner to the Apostolic See. And this also in the article of death, if another priest, even one not approved for confessions, can receive the confession of the dying person without some grave infamy and scandal going to arise, except the case in which the dying person refuses to confess to another (§ 1). The one absolving or feigning to absolve an accomplice who indeed does not confess the sin of complicity, from which he or she has not yet been absolved, does not escape the same excommunication if he or she conducts himself or herself in this way because he or she was induced to this either directly or indirectly by the accomplice confessor (§ 2). We shall speak of the requisites for excommunication to be incurred, and of absolution from it, with some things to be noted added.

413 1. Requisites for excommunication to be incurred. It is required:

a) That, as regards the sin, the things set forth above in n. 409, under I, 1 be present.

b) That the sin of complicity has not yet been directly remitted by another confessor (cf. can. 2367, § 2).

c) That the confessor either has directly absolved or feigned to absolve the accomplice from the sin of complicity, or has absolved or feigned to absolve the accomplice who keeps back the sin of complicity, but does so because he or she has been induced to this by the confessor, either directly or indirectly. It is said:

a) Either has absolved or feigned to absolve; hence it does not suffice that he only received the confession. The fiction, moreover, is required with respect to the penitent, in other words, it is required that with respect to the penitent he acted in such a way that the latter ought to judge that he or she was being absolved. It is not required, nor does it suffice, that only others ought to think that the penitent was being absolved. But it does not matter whether the confessor simulates absolution, that is, pronounces the form without the intention of absolving, or dissembles the denial of absolution by reciting some prayer, or by pronouncing other words, or even by keeping silence, yet in such a way that because of signs or gestures of the hands he seems truly to loose the penitent from sins.

b) Or has directly absolved or feigned to absolve the accomplice from the sin of complicity. Hence he does not incur excommunication who, after the sin of complicity has been declared by the penitent, signifies to the penitent that he can absolve only from other sins, but not from that sin. Nor does one incur excommunication who absolves or feigns to absolve an accomplice who keeps back the sin of complicity, except in the case now to be assigned.

c) Or has absolved or feigned to absolve an accomplice who keeps back the sin of complicity, but does so because he or she has been induced to this by the confessor, either directly or indirectly;[1] although in the case the confessor neither directly absolves nor feigns to absolve directly from the sin of complicity, nevertheless excommunication is contracted.

d) That the confessor, if he absolved the accomplice, has acted objectively illicitly. Moreover, it was set forth above when the confessor licitly absolves the accomplice.

e) That the confessor has both sinned subjectively gravely and known the censure and adverted to it. Defect of grave subjective fault can arise, for example, from ignorance of the law forbidding absolution, from the fact that he is ignorant that an unconsummated sin suffices, or does not know that the person confessing is an accomplice. Ignorance of the censure excuses, even if it is vincible, provided it is not affected, crass, or supine (can. 2229).

[1] "The confessor directly induces the penitent when he positively and explicitly forewarns him or her about keeping silent concerning the sin of complicity, because, for example, he already knows it and its declaration would be useless. But he induces indirectly when the confessor tries to persuade the penitent either that the shameful action committed with him is not a sin, or at least is not so grave that he or she ought to be disturbed about it; whence the penitent concludes that it is lawful for him or her not to declare such a sin, and really abstains from declaring it" (Sacred Penitentiary, February 19, 1896).

414 2. Absolution from the excommunication can be granted as follows:

a) In more urgent cases any confessor can absolve from this excommunication in the sacramental forum, with the burden enjoined of having recourse, under penalty of reincidence, within a month, at least by letter and through the confessor, if this can be done without grave inconvenience, the name being kept back, to the Sacred Penitentiary and of standing by its mandates (can. 2254, §§ 1 and 3). It is said:

a) Confessor, that is, every priest approved for hearing confessions.

b) In more urgent cases; a more urgent case is had if the censure cannot be observed externally without danger of grave scandal or infamy, or if it is hard for the penitent to remain in the state of grave sin for the time necessary for the competent Superior to provide (can. 2254, § 1).

c) The confessor must, under penalty of reincidence, impose the burden of having recourse to the Sacred Penitentiary within a month from the absolution received. Recourse is always necessary, so that the disposition of canon 2254, § 3, by force of which sometimes the penitent can be absolved without the burden of having recourse, cannot, as the cited canon adds, be applied to this excommunication. Therefore the obligation of having recourse urges until it has been fulfilled. The recourse is made with the name kept back, and can be made either through the confessor or by the penitent himself. If the penitent can conveniently approach the same confessor, it is better that the recourse be made through the confessor; otherwise let the penitent have recourse, unless he wishes to approach another confessor who is willing to have recourse. If the confessor refuses, the penitent is bound, unless however he is impeded by sickness or by inability to write; in that case he is excused until the impediment has ceased.

b) In danger of death any priest, even one not approved, can absolve from this excommunication, while there remains, however, for the sick person, under penalty of reincidence, the obligation of having recourse, after he has recovered, unless he has been absolved by one endowed with a special faculty, to the Sacred Penitentiary and of obeying its mandates (can. 882 compared with can. 2252). The obligation of having recourse urges from the time health has been recovered, so that recourse must be instituted as soon as possible. If it is delayed longer, the penitent falls back into the censure. For the rest, as regards recourse, the things said above under a) hold.

415 3. Things to be noted regard both the petition to be directed to the Sacred Penitentiary, and the execution of the rescript to be received, and the clauses contained in the rescript. To these we shall add a formula for having recourse to the Sacred Penitentiary.

a) In the petition, with the assumed name of the penitent used, let there be set forth: 1. that the penitent has fallen into excommunication; 2. how many accomplice persons and how many times he absolved them; 3. whether and how many times he has been absolved from the same delict and excommunication; 4. whether he has contracted one or more irregularities from violation of the censure. This, however, can be omitted if he has already been dispensed from the irregularity by the confessor; 5. that the penitent has been absolved in danger of death, or in an urgent case, but now has recourse to the Sacred Penitentiary; 6. according to the circumstances it is laudably added that the sin of complicity was less grave, that the occasion of relapse has been removed, that a long time intervened between the grace obtained and the relapse, and that through the interval he conducted himself well.

b) If the rescript is granted in gracious form, it suffices that the penitent read it and fulfill the obligations imposed. If the confessor wrote, it is enough that the received rescript be communicated to the penitent, whether in confession or outside it. If the rescript is granted in commissory form, the execution is committed to the confessor chosen or to be chosen by the penitent, so that it can be carried out by any confessor whom the penitent has chosen. The execution must be done in sacramental confession, and indeed so that first absolution from the censure is given, then absolution from sins, finally dispensation is granted in the irregularity.

If the penitent can return to the confessor only with difficulty, it is better that the rescript be sought in gracious form.

c) Several clauses are commonly inserted into the rescript of the Sacred Penitentiary, for example:

1. The guilty person, if the penitent again approaches him, should admonish the penitent concerning the nullity of the past confessions.
2. Let him abstain, insofar as this can be done without grave scandal, from hearing the confessions of the accomplice person. This clause obliges under grave obligation.
3. Let the guilty person be warned that, if he commits another crime of absolution and obtains a similar favor from the Sacred Penitentiary, this favor will in no way profit him unless he has made mention of the present favor.
4. As regards the clause of giving up the office of confessor, if it is added, note these things:

This clause is imposed either absolutely, or with mitigation, namely insofar as, before the term fixed for giving up the office, a new recourse to the Sacred Penitentiary is permitted, if it is judged that grave causes stand in the way of resigning the office.

If it is imposed with mitigation, recourse can be had to the Sacred Penitentiary for the purpose of obtaining relaxation of the clause, after the reasons have been set forth and, according to the circumstances, also the good disposition of the penitent and the amendment of his morals have been invoked.

If it is imposed absolutely, nothing prevents the confessor from having recourse again and obtaining either relaxation of the clause or at least prorogation of the term.[1]

d) Formula for having recourse to the Sacred Penitentiary.

Most Eminent Prince,

Titius, a priest, has incurred the excommunication reserved to the Supreme Pontiff in the most special manner, because once, or twice, or three times, he absolved an accomplice, or feigned to absolve an accomplice. Since he could not be dismissed without absolution, he received it. Now, however, through me he has recourse to the Holy See, prepared to execute the mandates which it may please Your Eminence to impose, in gracious form. Titius continued to celebrate before absolution. The office which he holds cannot be given up without grave inconvenience.

May Your Eminence deign to direct the response to me, the undersigned.

Reverently kissing the sacred purple, I subscribe with the greatest reverence which is fitting.

Your Eminence's most humble servant.

Notes. The name and domicile of the confessor should be clearly noted. The letter, however, should be addressed thus: A sua Eminenza Reverendissima - Il Cardinale Penitenziere-Maggiore - Palazzo del S. Uffizio, Roma.

[1] De Smet, De absolutione complicis et sollicitatione, 2nd edition, n. 40.

§ III. On Solicitation to Shameful Things

416 The principal ecclesiastical documents which pertain here are:

I. The Constitution Cum sicut nuper of Pius IV;[1] the Constitution Universi gregis of Gregory XV,[2] to which the Holy Office added sixteen responses on February 11, 1661; the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV,[3] and Etsi Pastoralis, § 9, n. 5;[4] the Instructions of the Holy Office.[5]

II. Canon 904 establishes as follows: "According to the norm of the apostolic constitutions, and especially of the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV, June 1, 1741, a penitent must, within a month, denounce to the local Ordinary, or to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, the priest guilty of the delict of solicitation in confession; and the confessor must, with the penitent's conscience gravely burdened, admonish the penitent concerning this obligation."

III. Canon 2368 declares that these penalties are to be decreed against those soliciting: "Whoever has committed the crime of solicitation of which canon 904 treats is to be suspended from the celebration of Mass and from hearing sacramental confessions, or even, according to the gravity of the delict, is to be declared incapable of receiving them; he is to be deprived of all benefices, dignities, active and passive voice, and is to be declared incapable of all these things; and in graver cases he is also to be subjected to degradation."

The law also affects the Eastern Church,[6] not indeed by force of the Code (cf. can. 1), but by force of the earlier legislation, which the Code left in its vigor with respect to the Eastern Churches.

With these things premised, we shall speak first of those who must be denounced, then of those who must denounce, then of the manner of denouncing, finally of the obligation of the confessor with respect to the penitent who is bound to denounce; a scholion being added on the manner of receiving a denunciation.

[1] April 16 (17), 1561.

[2] August 30, 1622.

[3] June 1, 1741.

[4] May 26, 1742.

[5] February 20, 1867, and July 20, 1890.

[6] Holy Office, June 13, 1740; April 25, 1838 (Collectanea, n. 1282); Constitution Etsi pastoralis of Benedict XIV; Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, August 26, 1775 (Collectanea, n. 1732).

Point I. On Those who Must Be Denounced

417 All and only priests must be denounced who themselves have provoked someone to shameful things, or who have had with someone illicit and dishonest conversations or dealings with rash daring in one of the circumstances soon to be set forth. It is said:

I. All priests, both seculars and regulars, both approved and not approved. It is disputed, however, whether even Bishops must be denounced. It seems that an affirmative answer must be given, because the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae of Benedict XIV declares that "all priests ... of whatever dignity and preeminence" must be denounced (St. Alphonsus, VI, 685).

Objection. The denunciation must be made to the local Ordinary or to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office (can. 904). But criminal causes of Bishops, according to canon 1557, § 1, 3, and canon 2227, § 1, must be judged by the Supreme Pontiff.

Response. By establishing that all priests of whatever dignity must be denounced, the legislator seems to signify sufficiently that Bishops, as regards this cause, must be denounced to the Holy Office.

II. And only priests, so that laymen and lower clerics who solicit in confession while pretending to be confessors are excluded. Nevertheless, by receiving sacramental confession, according to canon 2322, 1, they contract an excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See; moreover, the cleric is to be deposed, the layman is to be deprived of pension or ecclesiastical office, and punished with other penalties according to the gravity of the fault.

III. Who themselves, etc. Therefore neither those commanding or advising solicitation, nor interpreters, are to be denounced, since they act in the name of another.[2]

IV. Someone; it is the same whether the matter concerns a male or a female, and of whatever age the person may be.[3]

V. They have provoked to shameful things; wherefore observe:

1. A provocation to venereal matters is required, and therefore to grave sin, "since in venereal matters there is no smallness of matter."[4] Moreover the provocation, as the Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae has it, can be made "whether by words, or by signs, or by nods, or by touch, or by writing." Nor does it stand in the way that the provocation is made by way of advice given.

The Sacred Penitentiary[5] declared that the crime of solicitation is present in the following case. Tibullus, hearing the confessions of women whose husbands are often accustomed to be absent and who do not easily contain themselves, teaches and persuades these same women that they do not sin in the following cases: 1. if, by desiring their own absent husband, they suffer sensual commotion or pollution; 2. if they desire to experience this same pollution in themselves from burning love of the absent husband; 3. if they excite pollution in themselves by touches performed with themselves, provided that they refer these acts to the absent husband. The Sacred Penitentiary adds that "this Holy Tribunal has already twice responded on this matter, and that acts of this kind are gravely illicit and that a confessor approving them must be denounced."

It is required, however, that the confessor have sinned gravely not only objectively but also subjectively. Still, subjective fault is commonly presumed to correspond to objective malice (St. Alphonsus, VI, 683).

2. It is the same whether the penitent is provoked to sin with the confessor, or with himself or herself, or with a third party. Likewise a confessor must be denounced who solicits the penitent to excite another to a sin of lust, whether to be perpetrated solitarily or with another (St. Alphonsus, VI, 691).

VI. Or they have had illicit and dishonest conversations or dealings with rash daring. Dealings, conversations, or words gravely dishonest are understood; and this even if explicit provocation to venereal matters is lacking, for conversations of this kind of themselves move toward shameful things (St. Alphonsus, VI, 680). Hence authors teach that a confessor must be denounced who would ask a married person, or one accusing himself or herself of a guilty carnal act, whether it would please him or her to be engaged in those things, what conversations the sinning person would have, what acts or motions the person would perform, and the like. If rash daring is lacking, there is no place for denunciation, when the confessor necessarily, usefully, or at least without grave fault asks about a shameful sin. Nevertheless, let him beware lest he inquire into circumstances of carnal sin which there is no obligation of declaring. For the rest, as regards V and VI, observe:

1. It is not required that the sinful act or conversation be consummated, but it suffices that it be begun, provided, however, that the confessor, when beginning these things, has the intention afterward of gravely delinquent conduct even externally and objectively. Thus, if a confessor asks the penitent where he or she lives with the intention of afterwards approaching and soliciting that person; if he hands to the penitent a paper to be read later, in which he solicits the person,[6] or treats dishonest things (St. Alphonsus, VI, 676).
2. It is not required that the penitent consent to the provocation or shameful conversation; indeed, it is not even required that the penitent perceive the provocation or the shameful meaning of the conversation. Hence the Holy Office[7] declared that "a girl situated in simplicity and without knowledge of the dishonesty is bound to denounce the soliciting confessor after she has become in possession of herself and has acquired knowledge of the past solicitation."
3. Finally, it is not required that the provocation or shameful conversation have been begun by the confessor; it suffices that they were begun by the penitent and that the confessor consented, provided however that he did or said something shameful, even if he immediately desists from it.[8] Nor does it stand in the way that the confessor consented after being induced by fear.[9]

[1] Cf. De Smet, De absolutione complicis et sollicitatione, 2nd ed., n. 40.

[2] Holy Office, February 11, 1661, responses 6 and 7.

[3] Constitution Cum sicut nuper, § 4; Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, § 1; Instruction of the Holy Office, February 20, 1867, response 1.

[4] Holy Office, February 11, 1661, response 3.

[5] September 2, 1904.

[6] Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, § 1; Holy Office, February 11, 1661, response 1; Proposition 6 condemned by Alexander VII (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1106).

[7] May 11, 1707.

[8] Holy Office, February 11, 1661, response 2; February 20, 1867, response 2 (Collectanea, n. 1282).

[9] Holy Office, February 11, 1661, response 9.

418 VII. In one of the circumstances soon to be set forth. Namely, it is required that the solicitation or dishonest conversation have a connection with the sacrament of Penance, and indeed that they have place "either in the act of sacramental confession, or before or immediately after confession, or on the occasion or pretext of confession" ("even if confession itself has not followed," adds the Constitution Cum sicut nuper),[1] "or even outside the occasion of confession in the confessional, whether in another place destined or chosen for hearing confessions, with simulation of hearing confession there."[2] It is said:

1. In the act of sacramental confession, that is, once the accusation of the penitent has been begun, even if after the solicitation or shameful conversation the confession is not completed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 676).
2. Before or immediately after confession. The word "immediately" regards both before and after, so that the sense is "either immediately before or immediately after confession." This is clear both from the grammatical construction in the Constitution of Gregory XV, and from the fact that otherwise the time preceding confession would not be determined. Moreover the aforesaid word must be understood in a rather strict sense, so that no other serious action or grave business intervenes between confession and solicitation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 677).
3. On the occasion of confession; this has place: 1. if the confessor and the penitent are already actually prepared for confession, for example if the confessor is already seated and the penitent is already kneeling or about to kneel; 2. according to St. Alphonsus and others, with others contradicting, if the confessor invites someone to make confession immediately; if the penitent asks the confessor to hear his or her confession immediately; if the confessor, from the confession heard, for instance from the revealed frailty of the penitent, takes occasion afterward to solicit the penitent. The reason for all these is that in the cases enumerated the solicitation is rightly said to be made on the occasion of confession, since in the first two cases confession is proposed as immediately to be made, but in the later case[3] confession furnished occasion or impulse for the solicitation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 678). Practically, however, a confessor who from a confession heard took occasion afterward to solicit the penitent will scarcely ever have to be denounced; both because it will not easily be clear that he was led to a gravely dishonest act from the knowledge received, for it could have happened that he sinned, or at least sinned gravely, from a conversation begun or from prolonged association; and because denunciation in the case can scarcely be made without defamation of the penitent himself or herself.

The case, at least practically, should not be judged to be present if the confessor invites, or the penitent asks, that confession be made not immediately but afterward.[4]

4. On the pretext of confession; this case is held, with sufficient probability, only when the confessor himself, with respect to the very person to be solicited, proposes confession with the intention of soliciting. The case is not held: 1. if the confessor, under pretext of hearing confession, obtains from the Superior permission to visit a person whom he then solicits to shameful things, because the pretext was not with respect to the solicited person; 2. if the confessor, lest household members accompany him, puts forward as a pretext that he is going to hear the confession of a sick woman, whom he afterward solicits. The reason again is that the pretext was only with respect to the household members; 3. if a woman under pretext of confession summons the confessor and afterward perpetrates sin with him, because the pretext did not arise from the confessor. But the case seems to be present "if the confessor were to solicit outside confession, and the woman refused, fearing defamation; and therefore the confessor persuaded her that, feigning herself sick, she should summon him for sinning. For then the confessor is rightly said to have solicited the woman under the pretext of confession to furnish consent" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 679).

5. Outside the occasion of confession in the confessional, or in another place destined or chosen for hearing confessions, with simulation of hearing confession there. In order that someone be denounced by force of this clause, it is required: 1. that he solicited or had a shameful conversation in the confessional, or in another place destined or chosen for hearing confessions; and 2. that he did these things while simulating confession. Moreover:

a) A place destined for hearing confessions is a place which, although it lacks the customary form of a confessional, is nevertheless stably destined for hearing confessions, as for example a cell in which there is a seat for the confessor and a kneeler for the penitent; or also, for instance in the sacristy or in the parlor, the very chair for the confessor together with a kneeler for the penitent.

A place chosen for hearing confessions is any other place, for instance the room of a sick person, provided however that at least by one or the other party it has truly been chosen for instituting confession.

b) Besides this, simulation of confession is required. A simulated confession is had if those who are present must judge from the circumstances, or those who would be present would have to judge from the circumstances, that true confession is being instituted. Now some hold that simulation of confession is not required if the solicitation takes place in the confessional. But this is deservedly rejected, since: 1. the rule of law is, "A clause placed in the last place is referred to all the connected preceding things"; 2. the Holy Office agrees.[5] Here, however, note that simulation of confession is present of itself (that is, unless positive indications to the contrary are had), if the confessor and penitent are either in the confessional or in a place destined for hearing confessions; and is absent of itself (that is, unless positive indications to the contrary are at hand), if they are in a place only chosen for hearing confessions.

[1] Constitution Cum sicut nuper.

[2] Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, § 1.

[3] Santi-Leitner (Praelectiones Iuris Canonici, p. 230) appeal to a rescript of the Sacred Penitentiary inspected by them, in which this case is considered as comprehended by the law. Cf. De Smet, cited work, p. 46.

[4] Holy Office, February 11, 1661, response 4.

[5] February 11, 1661, response 15.

419 Question 1. Whether one who is certainly amended must be denounced.

Response. The affirmative answer must be given, both because the law does not distinguish, nor do authentic declarations found this exception; because the law intends to instill fear into all, and this end is obtained more securely if even one amended must be denounced; and because the more benign opinion gives an occasion for weakening the law. Nevertheless, in the denunciation mention should be made of the amendment (St. Alphonsus, VI, 686). Therefore only a deceased priest is excepted.[1] Some extend this to a priest who, worn out by old age and impeded by chronic illnesses, is now never going to hear confessions. But that seems altogether to be rejected for the reasons just given.

Question 2. Whether someone must be denounced in doubt whether the required solicitation took place.

Response. The answer is negative, because a law does not oblige in doubt about the fact founding the law (vol. I, n. 228). There is added that no one is to be deprived of reputation in doubt. Therefore denunciation can be omitted: 1. in doubt whether the crime here required was present; 2. in doubt whether the crime was committed in the circumstances required by law; 3. in doubt who was the soliciting confessor, unless the judge can become certain about the person soliciting from the indicated circumstances. Sometimes, however, circumstances can be such that the common good demands some denunciation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 702).

Note. The crime of solicitation is not reserved by common law.[2]

[1] Holy Office, March 6, 1839; Sacred Penitentiary, April 24, 1884.

[2] Holy Office, September 15, 1859.

Point II. On Those who Must Denounce

420 I. The persons who are bound to denounce are:

1. The solicited persons themselves (can. 904 and 2368, § 2), even immature persons. One who because of simplicity did not understand the solicitation is bound "after he or she has become in possession of himself or herself and has acquired knowledge of the past solicitation."[1] Moreover the solicited persons themselves, and they alone, are bound under penalty of excommunication according to canon 2368, § 2, as follows: "But the faithful person who knowingly has omitted, within a month, to denounce the one by whom he or she was solicited, contrary to the prescription of canon 904, incurs an excommunication latae sententiae reserved to no one, and is not to be absolved unless after he or she has satisfied the obligation or has seriously promised that he or she will satisfy it." Immature persons, however, are not liable to excommunication (can. 2230). It is said "within a month," that is, within a month from the obligation having become known. Moreover the solicited person is bound, even if he or she cannot prove the crime (St. Alphonsus, VI, 695).
2. It is disputed whether others who know the crime with sufficient certainty are bound to denunciation. Moreover the guilty person certainly is not bound to denounce himself.[2] Likewise, as regards others, who certainly are not bound under censure, once the law set forth is considered, the negative answer is given with sufficient probability, because canon 904 speaks only of the solicited penitent. The Code indeed refers to the apostolic constitutions; but, apart from the fact that the apostolic constitutions do not speak of others,[3] the Code declares only that the penitent is bound according to the norm of the said constitutions. It is clear, however, that others can be obligated by reason of the common good to be protected, and this also by force of canon 1935, § 2.

[1] Holy Office, May 11, 1707.

[2] Holy Office, November 17, 1626.

[3] Others, however, before the Code were bound to denounce (Holy Office, February 11, 1661, response 14; March 10, 1677).

421 II. Causes excusing from the obligation. From the obligation there excuse, or at least suspend it:

1. Grave extrinsic damage or inconvenience prudently feared. The case could be present if the priest to be denounced were one who supported the solicited person; likewise if a sick person would be so disturbed by this burden that the illness would be aggravated. When the inconvenience ceases, the obligation urges.
2. An entrusted secret, but not a natural or promised secret. "No one," says St. Alphonsus, "is bound to a secret, even promised by oath, when the secret tends toward common damage. But otherwise ... if the solicitation was manifested for the purpose of asking counsel; for disclosure of the secret would then be contrary to human intercourse, and also contrary to the public good, which certainly intervenes in counsels being sought" (VI, 698).
3. In remote regions, impossibility of approaching the competent Authority without grave inconvenience excuses.[1]

Intrinsic inconvenience does not excuse, such as the shame of the solicited person, or fear of arousing hatred of the one denounced.[2] A truly founded fear of one's own infamy, however, would excuse (St. Alphonsus, VI, 681). Nevertheless, here observe that the circumstance that the denouncing person first solicited, or consented to the solicitation, would not excuse. Still, the person cannot be questioned about consent, nor is he or she bound to manifest it; and if it is manifested, it cannot be noted in the acts.[3] Moreover, "if a person known to the Ordinary himself fears some infamation from the denunciation to be made before him, the Sacred Penitentiary, having been consulted, will delegate a confessor to receive the denunciation in the name of the Holy See and to transmit it to that Apostolic See."[4]

[1] Holy Office, January 22, 1727 (Collectanea, n. 308); May 20, 1842 (Collectanea, n. 949).

[2] Note that the name of the denouncer is never to be manifested to the priest.

[3] Holy Office, July 25, 1624; February 20, 1867.

[4] Planchard, De Const. Bened. XIV quae incipit "Sacra Poen.", p. 48, note.

Point III. On the Manner of Denouncing

422 I. The denunciation must be made to the local Ordinary or to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office (can. 904). Moreover, the denunciation can be made to the Ordinary of the place, whether of the denouncing person, or of the one denounced, or of the place in which the delict was committed. I said "can," because it is better that the denunciation be made to the Ordinary of the denouncing person, that is, of the solicited penitent. If it is made to an Ordinary who is not the Ordinary of the one denounced, it belongs to that Ordinary to transmit the act to the proper Ordinary of the one denounced, who can instruct the process, or to the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office. If the Ordinary refuses to accept the denunciation, the penitent is freed from further obligation.

II. Considering the norms prescribed of themselves, the person denouncing should appear personally either "before the Bishop or his delegate with the intervention of an ecclesiastical man who holds the part of notary, and with oath and with expression and subscription of his or her name";[1] or before a confessor or another ecclesiastical man deputed by the Bishop without the intervention of a notary.[2] The deputed person can summon the denouncing person to himself, or he himself can approach that person.

III. Practically, let the procedure be as follows:

1. The person about to denounce, if it can conveniently be done, should approach the Ordinary, set forth the cause to him, and carry out his mandates.
2. If the person cannot conveniently approach the Ordinary, let him or her write letters to him in which the fact of solicitation, the place of the delict, the name and office of the delinquent confessor, and his or her own address are set forth. If the solicited person cannot afterward present himself or herself to the Ordinary, let this be added in the letter so that the Bishop can depute another who may receive the denunciation. If a grave reason stands in the way of someone other than the confessor being deputed, let this also be added so that the Bishop, if it pleases him, may depute the confessor, who, according as the Ordinary prefers, may receive the denunciation outside or in the confessional, but outside the act of confession.
3. If the person about to denounce can neither approach the Ordinary nor write to him, let him or her do this through another person well-disposed toward him or her. The confessor of himself is not bound to this. But if nevertheless he does it, with the names both of the one to be denounced and of the one about to denounce kept back, let him inform the Ordinary of the fact of solicitation and of the inability of the solicited person to appear and to write. Let him add whether the solicited person can conveniently and is willing to present himself or herself to a delegate from the Bishop, at least if a confessor is delegated. I said that the confessor of himself is not bound to this; nevertheless, we do not deny "that in some case, for instance if public damage were threatening somewhere and no other way were open for avoiding it, the confessor could be bound by the law of charity to undertake a burden of this kind; but this will rarely happen" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 699). Indeed St. Alphonsus at the cited place, with others, observes that "in practice it is not expedient that the confessor take upon himself this burden of carrying the denunciation in place of the penitent or of receiving it."
4. If the penitent can neither approach the Ordinary, nor write to him, nor find someone who would do either, he or she will be able to await an occasion.
5. Religious Superiors are strictly prohibited from involving themselves in these causes (can. 501, § 2).

[1] Instruction of the Holy Office, February 20, 1867, n. 6.

[2] Cited Instruction, n. 8.

Point IV. On the Obligation of the Confessor with Respect to a Penitent who Is Bound to Denounce

423 I. The confessor must, with the penitent's conscience gravely burdened, admonish a penitent solicited by another concerning the obligation of denouncing; nor does the penitent's good faith excuse the confessor from admonishing him or her, although even here there is sometimes place for epikeia. This is clear from the ecclesiastical documents cited or to be cited. It is said:

1. The confessor (can. 904); and indeed every confessor, not only one who habitually enjoys jurisdiction, but also one who possesses it only transiently, for instance by hearing the confession of a dying person.
2. The penitent ... solicited. Others who are not solicited but perhaps are bound by the law of charity to denounce (n. 420) must be admonished according to the common rules of admonishing.
3. The penitent solicited by another. For a confessor is not bound to admonish a penitent solicited by himself (n. 420). Nevertheless, for this reason the penitent is not freed from the burden of denouncing, and once the burden is known, he or she must fulfill it.[1]
4. Concerning the obligation of denouncing. Concerning the excommunication which the penitent incurs unless within a month, from the obligation having become known, he or she has satisfied the obligation (n. 424), the penitent must be admonished according to the common rules.
5. Nor does the penitent's good faith excuse the confessor from admonishing him or her.[2] Therefore admonition concerning the obligation of denouncing must be made even if the penitent is foreseen not to be going to obey. Thus, namely, the Church established on account of the common good; for a disposition of this kind more greatly deters confessors, and more greatly consults for denunciation (St. Alphonsus, VI, 694).
6. Even here there is sometimes place for epikeia. Moreover, the admonition can be omitted if the penitent is in danger of death and is foreseen to be going to refuse denunciation; likewise if danger of disclosure and scandal is feared, for instance if the matter concerns a very frivolous and talkative person; likewise if the penitent did not understand the solicitation and the admonition cannot be made without scandal. If, however, he or she later understands it, the person must be admonished. Other excusing causes which are alleged by some, though few, cannot be reconciled with the severity of the law and give occasion for weakening discipline. Observe, however, that the admonition can be deferred if there is hope that the penitent on another occasion will do what would now be demanded in vain.

[1] Proposition 7 condemned by Alexander VII (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1107).

[2] Instruction of the Holy Office, February 20, 1867, response 3.

424 II. Penitents who have been admonished and entirely refuse cannot be absolved;[1] but those who can defer denunciation for a just cause, and who pledge and seriously promise that they will make it as soon as they can, can be absolved. For the rest, observe:

1. A penitent who without just cause has omitted to denounce the one soliciting within a month from knowledge of the obligation of denouncing incurs an excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to no one; nor is the penitent to be absolved from it unless after he or she has satisfied the obligation or has seriously promised to satisfy it (can. 2368, § 2).
2. But if the penitent, "detained by no impediment, absolutely refuses denunciation, in this case ... the confessor is to be praised who has not denied his service to the penitent and has consulted either the Ordinary or the Holy See for opportune provisions, with the name of the penitent, however, suppressed";[2] namely, afterwards dispensation from the burden of denouncing was granted by the Holy See.

[1] Cited Instruction, response 5.

[2] Cited Instruction, response 7.

425 III. If the case occurs, let the confessor:

1. Weigh: 1. whether all the requisites, both on the part of the act and on the part of the circumstances, are present; 2. whether the penitent is worthy of faith.

a) As regards the first: if the external act is not ambiguous, the intention of the priest is judged to be consonant with the act; if the act is ambiguous, commonly the gravely depraved intention of the priest will also be doubtful.

b) As regards the other: a reason for doubting the sincerity of the penitent exists if he or she readily acquiesces in denunciation; likewise if, once the obligation has been proposed, the person begins to speak doubtfully. If doubt about sincerity remains, it is better to say only: If the things you say are true, you must admonish the Bishop; and the confessor should not provide his services to that person.

2. In doubt he cannot impose the obligation, according to the norm of the things we noted in n. 419.

3. Generally, unless the matter is manifest, before he imposes the obligation he should prudently consult someone more learned, and enjoin on the penitent that on another occasion he or she speak about the same matter.

Scholion I. On the Manner of Receiving a Denunciation, And, Once It Has Been Received, of Proceeding Further Against Those Denounced 426 I. The denunciation must be made before the Bishop or his delegate, with the intervention of an ecclesiastical man who holds the part of notary. Other witnesses cannot be present, and the Bishop can dispense from the intervention of the notary for a reasonable cause.[1] For the rest, the deputation of the delegate and of the notary, if the latter is used, must be made in writing.

II. If a confessor or another person is delegated to receive the denunciation without the intervention of a notary, a formula to be followed is handed to him by the Ordinary, or by the Holy Office.

III. Let the one who receives the denunciation see that the crime of false denunciation is reserved to the Supreme Pontiff, and let him signify to the denouncing person that no inquiry concerning consent furnished is to be instituted. For the rest, this order is regularly prescribed: first, the oath concerning speaking the truth, to be given by touching the Holy Gospels, is to be asked from the denouncing person; then he or she is questioned according to the formula handed down by the Ordinary or by the Holy Office, with the responses immediately put into writing not only as regards substance but also as regards words; then the entire instrument is to be read aloud to the denouncing person, with the faculty being given of adding, suppressing, correcting, and changing; finally the signature of the denouncing person is to be required, or, if he or she cannot write, the sign of the cross; and while the denouncing person is still present, there is to be added the signature of the one receiving it and, if one was used, of the notary. Lastly, an oath of preserving secrecy is to be demanded from the denouncing person, with excommunication reserved to the local Ordinary or to the Holy See being threatened if necessary.[2]

Note. "Sometimes for a grave reason it can be permitted that one or another of the prescribed forms, with the substance being preserved, be omitted, for example the touching of the Gospels. In more difficult cases it is also permitted that the denunciation, with the prior permission of the denouncing person, lest the sacramental seal seem to be violated, be received by the confessor in the confessional seat. Indeed, when a wholly grave and altogether extraordinary cause is urgent, the denunciation will also be able to be made through a report written by the denouncing person, provided however that it is afterward confirmed by oath and signed before the local Ordinary or his delegate and notary, if one is present."[3]

IV. Once the denunciation has been juridically received, whether by himself or through a delegate, the Ordinary under grave obligation must signify it to the promoter of justice, who is to declare whether the crime of solicitation is present or not. Once this has been done:

1. If the Ordinary dissents from the promoter of justice, the latter must refer the matter to the Holy Office within ten days.
2. If the Ordinary agrees with the promoter of justice, or if the promoter in any way does not have recourse to the Holy Office, let the procedure be as follows:

a) If the Ordinary judges that the crime of solicitation is lacking, let him place the acts in the secret archive or, considering the gravity of the matters denounced, use his own right, for instance by admonishing or punishing the denounced person, although he is not guilty of the crime of solicitation.

b) If the Ordinary judges that the crime is present, let him proceed to an inquiry (cf. can. 1939, § 1).

IV. Let the inquiry be made in the manner set forth in the Instructions of the Holy Office of February 20, 1867, n. 9, and July 20, 1890.

V. Once the inquiry has been completed:

1. If it is established that the denunciation lacks all foundation, let this be reported in the acts, and let the documents of accusation be destroyed.
2. If vague or uncertain indications are at hand, let the acts be placed in the secret archive until something else arises.
3. If sufficiently grave indications are at hand, but not indications sufficient for an accusatory action, let the guilty person be admonished in a different manner according to the diversity of the case.
4. If certain or at least probable indications are had for an accusatory action, the guilty person must be cited (cf. can. 1946); however, an oath concerning speaking the truth cannot be administered to him (cf. can. 1744).

VI. Once the guilty person has been cited and appears, the procedure must be as follows:

1. If the guilty person confesses the crime, and his confession agrees at least substantially with the accusation, a definitive sentence can be pronounced. Nevertheless, the guilty person can either accept it or demand the regular development of the process.
2. If he does not confess the crime, or if his confession does not agree even substantially with the accusation, let the acts of inquiry be handed over to the promoter of justice, who is to draw up the libellus of accusation (can. 1954 and 1955). In the meantime the guilty person can already be suspended from sacred ministry or from hearing confessions until the end of the trial. Then let him be questioned carefully, while avoiding manifestation of the denouncing persons or of the sacramental seal. After a suitable time has elapsed, in which the defender of the guilty person prepares and exhibits the defense, and the promoter of justice prepares and exhibits the libellus of accusation or his requisition of justice, let the judge pronounce the definitive sentence according to the acts and the proofs, that is: if he is certain of the crime, let him condemn the guilty person; if he is certain of innocence, let him absolve him; if he is doubtful, let him dismiss him.

3. From the pronounced sentence both the guilty person and the promoter of justice can appeal to the Holy Office within ten days. The appeal is suspensive, while nevertheless the suspension of the guilty person perhaps issued before the definitive sentence remains firm. If appeal is made, let the acts, or an authentic copy of them, be transmitted to the Holy Office.[4]

VII. Certain things remain to be noted:

1. The Ordinary is bound to manifest at once to the Holy Office the denunciation juridically received. In addition, if the one denounced lives in another territory, let him send to the Ordinary of that place an authentic copy of the denunciation with the inquiries and declarations of the guilty person.
2. The Ordinary must signify the outcome of the juridically received cause to the Holy Office and, if the denounced person is a religious, to his Superior General.
3. If a priest who has been condemned, or only admonished, transfers his residence into another territory, the Ordinary a quo is bound as soon as possible to admonish the Ordinary ad quem concerning the antecedents and juridical status of the denounced person.
4. If the denounced person, suspended from hearing confessions but not from preaching, goes into another territory for preaching, the Superior of the denounced person, whether secular or religious, must admonish the Ordinary of the other territory that he cannot be used for hearing confessions.[5]
5. Those who are assumed for treating or defending these causes, namely the judge, the promoter of justice, the defender of the guilty person, the notary, and so forth, are bound to the secrecy of the Holy Office: the Ordinary by force of office; the ministers by oath; others absent by a precept to be imposed on them; and indeed under penalty of excommunication latae sententiae, reserved to the Supreme Pontiff alone, even the Sacred Penitentiary being excluded.[6]
6. If the things set forth are difficult to observe exactly, the Holy See sometimes permits that the matter be treated in an easier manner.[7]
7. If the treatment of the matter carries with it grave difficulties, the matter, with the acts transmitted, can be referred to the Holy Office, which can hand down particular instructions.[8]

[1] Instruction of the Holy Office, February 20, 1867.

[2] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis, II, n. 426.

[3] Aertnys-Damen, cited work, n. 427.

[4] Aertnys-Damen, cited work, n. 428.

[5] Aertnys-Damen, cited work, n. 429.

[6] Aertnys-Damen, cited place, n. 15.

[7] Cited Instruction, n. 16.

[8] Cited Instruction.

Scholion II. On False Denunciation

427 I premise the canons which regard false denunciation. Canon 894 establishes: "The sole sin reserved to the Holy See by reason of itself is false denunciation by which an innocent priest is accused of the crime of solicitation before ecclesiastical judges." And canon 2363 decrees: "If anyone, by himself or through others, has falsely denounced a confessor for the crime of solicitation before Superiors, he incurs by the fact itself an excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See, from which in no case can he be absolved unless he has formally retracted the false denunciation, and has repaired, according to his powers, the damages if any have followed from it, with a grave and lasting penance having also been imposed, the prescription of canon 894 remaining firm." Therefore two things must be distinguished: namely, the crime of false denunciation is: 1. a sin reserved by reason of itself, and indeed to the Holy See; 2. a sin reserved by reason of the censure, or one which has annexed to it an excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See. These things having been noted, let these be the conclusions:

I. Requisites in order that the crime be reserved by reason of itself to the Holy See. There is required a false denunciation by which an innocent priest is accused of the crime of solicitation before ecclesiastical judges. It is said:

1. A false denunciation, made either by oneself or through another, namely "by wickedly procuring that it be done by others";[1] it can be procured by mandate, threats, or efficacious counsel. According to the more common and safe opinion, it is required that the denunciation be made juridically, that is, either personally and with the intervention of an ecclesiastical man who holds the part of notary, and with oath and subscription of one's name, or personally without the intervention of a notary.[2] Hence letters directed to the Ordinary do not suffice, even if they are subscribed; a fortiori anonymous letters are excluded, which have no force.[3]
2. For the crime of solicitation, that is, for a crime which, if it had taken place, would carry with it the obligation of denouncing.
3. Before ecclesiastical judges, that is, before the Sacred Congregation of the Holy Office, or the local Ordinary, or another delegated by them for this affair. It suffices that the denunciation has been made before them, whether they institute a further inquiry or do not institute it. Knowledge of the reservation does not seem to be required (n. 384).

II. Requisites in order that the crime be reserved by reason of the censure, or that it have annexed to it an excommunication reserved in a special manner to the Apostolic See. First the same things are required which were set forth under I,[4] then knowledge of the censure and puberty. It is said:

1. Knowledge of the censure; ignorance excuses from it unless it was affected (can. 2229, § 1), crass, or supine (can. 2229, § 3, 1). Ignorance only of the reservation does not excuse (cited canon).
2. Puberty; since "the immature are excused from penalties latae sententiae" (can. 2230).

III. Absolution from false denunciation.

1. Absolution from the censure, if it has been contracted, must be put before absolution from the sin; but insofar as one can be absolved from the censure, this is explained in the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties.
2. As regards absolution from the sin, which is also reserved by reason of itself, by whom it can be given, see n. 387; but note that the reservation of the sin ceases in the cases set forth in n. 385.

[1] Constitution Sacramentum Poenitentiae, § 3.

[2] Cf. Instruction of the Holy Office, February 20, 1867.

[3] Cited Instruction, n. 6.

[4] Canon 2363, which treats of the censure annexed to the crime, indeed speaks of denunciation before Superiors, while canon 894 speaks of denunciation before ecclesiastical judges. Hence some think that, for the censure, it suffices that the denunciation be made before ecclesiastical Superiors. But by "Superiors" there seem to be understood the Superiors competent here, that is, the ecclesiastical judges of whom canon 894 speaks. Major Superiors, even of exempt religious institutes, are prohibited from involving themselves in this affair (can. 501, § 2).

Article III. On Things to Be Observed After Confession

Two things come to be treated, namely the office of preserving the sacramental seal and the obligation of repairing defects admitted in confession.

§ I. On the Office of Preserving the Sacramental Seal

428 The law of the sacramental seal[1] can be taken in a broad and in a stricter sense. Taken in a broad sense, it is the law which forbids the use of sacramental knowledge which is of a nature to redound to the burden of the penitent, and therefore, if it were licit, would render confession more difficult. I said "which is of a nature," etc., because it does not matter whether the penitent notices the use or not; it suffices that in itself it involves a burden.

Taken in the stricter sense, it is the law which forbids the use of sacramental knowledge together with manifestation, or danger of manifesting the penitent.

The prohibited use of sacramental knowledge, or violation of the sacramental seal, is distinguished as twofold: direct and indirect (cf. can. 2369, § 2). Direct violation is the use of knowledge acquired from confession together with manifestation of the sinner. Wherefore observe that it is not required that the person of the penitent be known, but it suffices that the person be sufficiently determined; for instance, if I say concerning a person meeting me and unknown to you that he or she confessed this or that. Indirect violation is judged to be the use of knowledge acquired from confession which has annexed to it the danger that the sinner be betrayed, or which involves a burden of the penitent with or without danger of manifestation of the sinner.

These things having been noted, we shall speak first of the obligation, then of the object, then of the subject of the sacramental seal, and finally we shall deduce certain corollaries from the things set forth.

[1] So called because that law covers the things heard in confession as with a seal.

Point I. On the Obligation of the Sacramental Seal

429 I. Existence of the obligation. This is clear first from the fact that Christ, by instituting and imposing confession, must be judged to have imposed on the confessor an obligation without which the reception of confession would be morally impossible. But the obligation of preserving the seal is such an obligation. Add that between the penitent and the confessor there intervenes a tacit contract; to this there is added the obligation of the confessor to preserve the right of the penitent to reputation. Finally, the Church confirms the obligation of the seal and decrees that both direct and indirect violation are prohibited. Thus canon 889, § 1, says: the sacramental seal is inviolable; wherefore let the confessor diligently beware lest by word or sign, or in any other way and for any cause whatever, he betray the sinner in any manner (direct violation).[1] And canon 890 says: the use by the confessor of knowledge acquired from confession, with burden to the penitent, is altogether prohibited, even any danger of revelation being excluded (§ 1).[2] Both Superiors existing for the time and confessors who afterward have been appointed Superiors can in no way use for external governance the knowledge which they have had concerning sins in confession (§ 2; St. Alphonsus, VI, 635).

Corollary I. The obligation of the seal is of natural law, insofar as it flows from the tacit contract and from the right of the penitent to reputation; of divine-natural law, as it is said,[3] insofar as it follows upon the sacrament; and of ecclesiastical law, insofar as it is confirmed by the Church (cf. St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 11, a. 1, ad 2).

Corollary II. The obligation of the seal exists even in doubt: 1. whether some object falls under the seal; 2. whether something is known by sacramental knowledge or otherwise; 3. whether something to be said or done is opposed to the seal. The reason is that otherwise provision would not be made sufficiently for the security of the faithful who confess (St. Alphonsus, VI, 633, 637).

[1] Thus also the ancient law. In the Decree of Gratian (c. 2, dist. 6, De poenit.) it is declared: "Let the priest before all things beware lest he recount to anyone the sins of those who confess to him. For if he has done this, let him be deposed and go about all the days of his life as an ignominious pilgrim." Lateran IV: "Let the priest beware altogether lest by word or sign or in any other way he betray the sinner in any manner. But if he needs more prudent counsel, let him cautiously seek it without any expression of the person, since we decree that one who has presumed to reveal a sin disclosed to him in the penitential judgment is not only to be deposed from priestly office, but also to be thrust into a strict monastery for doing perpetual penance."

[2] Likewise Clement VIII, May 26, 1593; and the proposition condemned by decree of the Holy Office, November 18, 1682 (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1220).

[3] There are those who think that such an obligation, which excludes exception, flows from the positive law of Christ.

430 II. The proximate source of the obligation. The obligation of the seal arises from every confession such that use of the knowledge received from it would turn the faithful away from confession. If the confession is sacramental, the benefit of the seal belongs to it principally; if it is not sacramental, it belongs to it participatively. Hence it arises:

1. From confession made in order to the power of the keys to a priest who can and wills to discharge the office of judge, or to use jurisdiction. Such a confession is certainly sacramental.
2. From confession made in order to the power of the keys: 1. to a priest who enjoys jurisdiction but does not will to use it; 2. to a priest who lacks jurisdiction; 3. to one who is not a priest but is regarded as a priest by the penitent; whether the aforesaid confessions are called sacramental or are not called such. The reason is that the use of knowledge received from a confession of this kind, if it were licit, would at least redound to the detriment of the sacrament, or would turn the faithful away from confession in some measure. But if it is asked whether the said confessions are sacramental, I respond that the first, which is made to a priest who does not will to use jurisdiction merely internally, seems sacramental; as regards the later ones, a reason for seriously doubting is taken from the fact that the objective relation of confession to the sentence to be rendered seems to be lacking.
3. It is disputed whether it arises from confession made to one who is neither a priest nor regarded as a priest by the penitent; for instance if someone thought that a layman could absolve in a case of necessity. Moreover, the negative answer seems to be given, because the use of knowledge drawn from such a confession does not turn one away from confession to be made before a priest.

For the rest, the obligation of the sacramental seal arises from a confession both perfect and only begun, both valid and invalid. It is also the same whether absolution is granted, denied, or deferred.

Corollary I. The obligation of the sacramental seal does not arise from a confession made without the will of receiving the sacrament, but only with the intention of speaking with the confessor, or of mocking or seducing him (St. Alphonsus, VI, 636); nor from a confession made to one who is known by the penitent to lack jurisdiction, because then there is also lacking an accusation made in order to the power of the keys.

Corollary II. The fact that someone manifests something outside confession "under the seal of confession," as they say, and another receives it in that way, cannot effect that something be covered by the seal of sacramental confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 636). Nevertheless, "someone ought not readily receive something in this way" (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 11, a. 2).

431 III. Quality of the obligation. The obligation of the seal is threefold, namely: 1. of religion, insofar as it arises from the signification of the sacrament, and the law has been issued from reverence for the sacrament; 2. of justice from the tacit contract between confessor and penitent; 3. of another species of justice, namely that which commands preserving the reputation of one's neighbor (St. Alphonsus, VI, 635).

432 IV. Gravity of the obligation.

1. The obligation of the law, insofar as from religion it prohibits direct violation of the seal, or revelation of the sin together with revelation of the sinner, is grave from its whole genus. The reason is that, if small matter were admitted, it would be gravely opposed to the end of the sacrament, since the faithful would be turned away from confession of venial sins, indeed even of mortal sins, fearing that the confessor might take as light what was mortal.
2. The obligation of the law, insofar as it prohibits indirect violation of the seal, is grave from its genus, but in such a way that sufficiently grave matter for constituting grave sin is easily present. Hence:

Under grave obligation there is prohibited: 1. manifestation of a thing closed by the seal together with grave or middling danger of betraying the sinner; 2. use of sacramental knowledge which involves a notable or middling burden of the penitent.

Under light obligation there is prohibited: 1. manifestation of a thing closed by the seal together with danger altogether light of betraying the sinner; 2. use of sacramental knowledge which involves a burden of the penitent altogether light.

There are not prohibited: 1. manifestation of a thing closed by the seal together with a danger of betraying the sinner which does not deserve to be noted; 2. use of sacramental knowledge which involves a burden which is not worthy of note.

433 V. Cessation of the obligation. The obligation of the sacramental seal, at least insofar as it forbids direct violation, never ceases without the license of the penitent. The penitent, however, can grant license. It is said:

1. The obligation of the sacramental seal, at least insofar as it forbids direct violation, never ceases. This is clear from tradition. The reason seems to be that, on account of the spiritual and common good of the faithful, sacramental knowledge, by the intention and institution of Christ, has been ordered to the sacramental forum alone, or to the good of the penitent, and as such has been altogether withdrawn from the common intercourse of men (St. Alphonsus, VI, 634). It is disputed, however, whether for protecting the seal it is licit to posit an act which, independently of the law of the seal, is intrinsically evil; for instance, whether it is licit for a married priest to use marriage which he certainly knows from sacramental confession to be invalid by natural law. The matter is doubtful to me; while the doubt stands, however, one may act according to one's pleasure.
2. Without the license of the penitent; and that license freely, expressly, and certainly granted, and not revoked. Presumed license is judged not to suffice, because confessors can be deceived in this matter, so that the sufficiency of presumed license would render confession odious. For the rest, license can be granted explicitly and implicitly, for instance by the very fact that the penitent begins to speak outside confession about a matter of itself closed by the seal. Nevertheless, let the confessor beware lest he extend the concession beyond the intention of the penitent. Besides this, the penitent can revoke the granted license according to his or her pleasure. Finally, note that license of this kind is not to be sought except for a grave cause, and only from those whose consent can certainly be expected to be altogether free (St. Alphonsus, cited place).
3. The penitent can grant license because the seal has been imposed in his or her favor, and the penitent can renounce that favor.

434 Corollary I. One who has known something by both sacramental and extra-sacramental knowledge licitly uses the extra-sacramental knowledge; nevertheless let him proceed prudently and avoid scandal (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 11, a. 5; St. Alphonsus, VI, 638, 4).

Corollary II. One who is questioned about a matter closed by the seal should of himself repel the questioner. But if otherwise he cannot with sufficient certainty repel suspicion against the penitent, let him answer, even with an oath, that he knows nothing. "A man," says St. Thomas, "is not brought in as a witness except as man, and therefore without injury to conscience he can swear that he does not know what he knows only as God" (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 11, a. 1, ad 3). And thus he can say or swear, even if "he has been asked to answer not as man but especially as a minister of God," indeed even if "he is additionally asked to answer without equivocation" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 646).

Point II. On the Object of the Sacramental Seal

435 The object or matter of the seal is all things known from confession which, according to what was set forth in n. 430, carry with them the obligation of the seal, and whose revelation or use would render confession more difficult. Therefore the object of the seal is:

I. Mortal sins, both in species and in genus, namely that such a penitent has sinned gravely.

II. Venial sins, both in species and in some other manner at least somewhat determinate, for instance by saying that such a penitent declared a venial sin in this confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 640). It is otherwise if he said only that the person had at some time sinned venially.

Notorious sins also are matter of the seal: both because the confessor, insofar as he knows something as God, must always be silent; and because the liceity of manifesting a notorious confession would render confession more difficult, since penitents would easily fear that the confessor might take as notorious what was not notorious. There is added the fact that the said sins, by the declaration of the confessor, would commonly be rendered more notorious and more certain.

III. The causes, object, and circumstances of sins; for example, the blasphemies of the father on account of which the penitent was angry, or the homicide concerning which he rejoiced. If, however, the matter concerns a public fact, the penitent commonly is not judged to close it by the seal (St. Alphonsus, VI, 641, doubt 2).

IV. An accomplice and his or her sin; for the liceity of revealing these things would render confession more difficult (St. Alphonsus, VI, 640). It is licit, however, with the license of the penitent, to admonish the accomplice (St. Alphonsus, 641, doubt 1).

V. The penance imposed, unless it is very slight (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 16, n. 153).

VI. Natural and moral defects are the object of the seal: 1. if they are manifested by the penitent for explaining sins; 2. probably, if they become known to the confessor from the penitent's manner of confessing or acting, and are odious or occult; but not if they are not odious and are public, such as stammering, deafness, blindness. For in this case, contrary to the former ones, no burden to confession would arise from manifestation (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 16, n. 154; VI, 642, 643).

VII. The condition and status of the penitent are to be judged in the same way as defects. Hence it is not matter of the seal that someone is unmarried, married, a magistrate, a workman. Nevertheless, let the confessor beware lest he speak of these things in such a way that he suggests that the penitent has sinned against the obligations of his or her state (St. Alphonsus, cited place).

VIII. Scruples are the object of the seal; for they are declared by the penitent as sins, at least doubtful ones. Likewise scrupulosity, insofar as it designates, as commonly happens, a confused and wavering conscience, is the object of the seal, and this holds even if the scrupulosity is publicly known; for it is an odious defect, or one which is a cause of shame (St. Alphonsus, VI, 644).

IX. Virtues and gifts are not the object of the sacramental seal, unless "they are spoken of in order to explain some defect or one's own ingratitude toward God" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 641). This, however, does not prevent them from being able to be the object of a non-sacramental secret.

Point III. On the Subject of the Sacramental Seal

436 Besides the confessor, who, as minister of the sacrament to which the seal is annexed, is obligated primarily and principally, secondarily and participatively "the interpreter also and all others to whom knowledge of confession has come in any way whatever are held by the obligation of preserving the sacramental seal" (can. 889, § 2). Except the case in which the penitent himself manifests the things confessed by himself. Under the name of confession comes every accusation to which, according to what was said in n. 430, the benefit of the sacramental seal belongs principally or participatively.

The reason for the rule stated is that "otherwise provision would not have been made sufficiently for the reverence of this sacrament, nor would hatred of confession have been sufficiently removed" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 648). The penitent, who is immune from the burden of the sacramental seal, transfers the knowledge of the confession made by himself even without that burden.

Therefore, besides the confessor, the following are bound:

I. The interpreter; for he, just as one hearing a confession, of whom we shall speak immediately, has received knowledge of the confession from the very confession of the penitent. The same must be said for the same reason about one who within confession writes the sins for the penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 647, 3 and 8).

II. One who has heard the confession of another, whether by chance or deliberately; one who deliberately hears, by that very act, violates the sacramental secret. Those are not held to the seal who have heard a confession which someone has freely made publicly; for such a manner of acting by its nature deprives confession of the benefit of the sacramental secret.

III. Those to whom a matter closed by the seal has been sacrilegiously or imprudently revealed; likewise one to whom the confessor, with the license of the penitent, for instance for the sake of seeking counsel, has revealed the matter, unless, what cannot be presumed, the license was granted indefinitely, so that the knowledge became extra-sacramental (St. Alphonsus, VI, 647, 5; 648).

IV. A Superior or another reading letters in which the faculty is sought of absolving someone from reserved sins, or something similar, is held by the sacramental seal as follows:

1. He is held if the letters were written by the confessor after confession had at least been begun, because the one reading received knowledge of the confession through the mediation of a confessor already bound to the sacramental seal.
2. Likewise he seems to be held if the letters were written by the confessor in order to a confession to be made, or by the penitent either before or after confession. The reason is that the liceity of using knowledge received in this way seems to redound to the detriment of confession, which cannot rightly be made without the faculty having been obtained.

V. One consulted about a confession to be made to him, that is, to the one consulted, probably is held by the sacramental seal, because the consultation of the one to whom, according to the intention of the one consulting, confession will be made is so closely united with the confession that will follow that the liceity of using knowledge received in this way seems to redound to the detriment of the sacrament. The opposite must be said if someone is consulted about confession to be made before another; authors more commonly adhere to this solution of the case (St. Alphonsus, VI, 649). The opposite also must be said if the penitent consults a priest, for instance about a special case, without thinking of confession to be made to him, and, after counsel has been received, makes confession. But let the confessor beware of scandal.

VI. One reading a paper on which the penitent wrote the confession:

1. Of himself he is not held by the sacramental seal, because a paper of this kind is neither a confession nor a necessary means of making confession, so that the liceity of using knowledge of confession received in this way does not redound to the detriment of confession; in other words, it renders not confession but only the writing odious (St. Alphonsus, VI, 650).
2. He is held by the sacramental seal: 1. who reads the paper while the confessor reads it, since in that case by the writing itself sins are manifested here and now to the confessor, and he is rightly said to have drawn knowledge of the confession from the confession of the penitent; 2. who reads the paper while the penitent reads the confession from it, because, at least morally speaking, he comes to knowledge of the confession by means of confession; 3. probably, who reads the paper left behind by the confessor after confession, because in the case it seems possible to say that, through the mediation of the confessor, he received knowledge of the confession, and therefore he is held by the seal, as those assigned under III; 4. who reads the paper in the case in which it was the prescribed means of making confession, as can happen in a mute person (n. 326). The reason is that the liceity of using knowledge of confession drawn from a necessary means of confessing would redound to the detriment of confession (St. Alphonsus, cited place).

VII. One reading letters written by the confessor to the penitent, in which matters closed by the seal are treated, is held by the sacramental seal, because he receives knowledge of the confession from the confessor (cf. n. III). But one who reads letters sent by the penitent to the confessor, in which confessed matter is treated, is not held by the sacramental seal, whether this is done for the sake of completing confession or is not done for that end. The reason is that the said letters are in no way confession, nor does that so-called complement of confession have anything of confession properly so called. Moreover, the liceity of using knowledge drawn from those letters does not render confession odious, but only that so-called complement added outside a new confession.

Point IV. Corollaries from the Doctrine Handed Down

437 I. The sacramental seal is violated:

1. By one who either reproves the penitent in a loud voice or questions the penitent about sins.
2. By one who speaks about the sin of someone with another confessor, even if the penitent confessed that same sin to both.
3. By one who, for example, says about a notorious homicide that he confessed the homicide.
4. By one who, after hearing the confessions of a few, says that he heard such a sin.
5. By one who praises one penitent before the rest whom he heard by saying that the penitent confessed only venial sins (St. Alphonsus, Homo Apostolicus, tr. 16, n. 156).
6. By one who says that he heard a grave sin in such a convent; for then individual members of that convent, and therefore also the penitent, suffer detriment. If someone said the same about such an Order, it depends on the circumstances whether a grave, light, or almost no burden is created, and therefore whether there is grave, light, or no violation of the seal. Namely, it must be considered: 1. whether the Order is numerous; 2. whether it is notoriously relaxed or not; 3. before whom that is said; 4. whether suspicion falls upon the inhabitants of a few houses (cf. St. Alphonsus, VI, 654, doubt 2).
7. By one who without the permission of the penitent speaks with the penitent outside confession about things heard in confession.
8. By one who after confession looks upon the penitent with stern eyes, does not speak to him as he had previously been accustomed, and so forth. Likewise by one who, on account of things heard in confession, would dismiss a servant, or take keys away from him, or remove money from a chest lest he steal it. Likewise by one who, on account of things known from confession, would deny a vote to someone (St. Alphonsus, VI, 657). Likewise by one who, on account of sins declared in an earlier confession or on account of a defect of disposition then revealed, would refuse to receive someone's confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 659).

438 Question 1. Whether one violates the seal who from the confession of the penitent has known that snares are being laid for him, and without the license of the penitent uses the knowledge received for his own defense.

Response. Affirmatively, if, for example, accomplices could suspect that that sin had been accused by the penitent, or if some other burden would come to the penitent from it. For the liceity of directing oneself in this way, without the license of the penitent, from the knowledge of confession would turn the faithful away from confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 659). If the penitent threatens to inflict death on the confessor at an opportune time unless he is absolved, the confessor can avert the danger of death, because by doing this he neither betrays the sin of the penitent in any way, as is supposed, nor does the liceity of acting in this way render confession itself odious.

Question 2. Whether one violates the sacramental seal who says that in some place such a vice is spreading.

Response 1. He does not violate the seal if the vice is notorious and the place is sufficiently large, for instance about 3,000 persons; or, if the matter concerns a very infamous vice, such as sodomy or bestiality, 6,000-7,000 Catholics. The reason is that the burden which from this comes to penitents does not deserve to be noted.

Response 2. He violates the seal if the vice is occult; likewise if the vice is notorious but the place is sufficiently narrow, for instance less than 3,000; or, if the matter concerns a very infamous vice, less than 6,000-7,000 Catholics (St. Alphonsus, VI, 654, doubt 1; Homo Apostolicus, tr. 16, n. 158).

If, however, the discussion concerns a notorious vice, it can easily happen that the burden is only altogether light, or even such that it does not deserve to be noted, so that there is only venial fault or even no fault.

Note. As has already been indicated above, one who does not expressly say that such a vice flourishes in some place, but on account of things heard in confession more vigorously attacks certain not unaccustomed vices, for instance drunkenness, lust, dishonest courtships, does not create a burden worthy of note, and therefore acts licitly.

Question 3. Whether one violates the sacramental seal who says that such a person confessed to him.

Response. Of itself, negatively. If, however, by a manifestation of this kind, for instance if the penitent came secretly, the confessor would introduce suspicion of grave sin, he would not only sin gravely, but also seems to violate the sacramental seal, insofar as only from the confession actually made did he know the fact of confession, and relying on that knowledge he signified the said fact to others, and by that very signification introduced suspicion of grave sin (St. Alphonsus, VI, 638). If in the case posited the confessor merely said that such a person had asked that he might make confession, he would violate a natural secret, but not the sacramental seal.

Question 4. Whether one violates the seal who says that such a person was absolved by him.

Response. Negatively, but let the confessor abstain from this, lest a burden be created for the penitent concerning whom he cannot testify to that fact.

In certificates of confession, only mention of confession should be made. But let him refer to the penitent a sacristan asking whether someone wishes to receive Communion (St. Alphonsus, VI, 639).

Question 5. Whether one violates the seal who denies a certificate of confession to an indisposed penitent.

Response 1. The affirmative answer must be given: 1. if it is denied to one asking for it outside confession; 2. if it is denied within confession in those circumstances in which it is customary to give it, or it is demanded by Superiors or by the pastor. The reason is that the denial, although it has place in confession, nevertheless produces an effect after confession, or creates a burden for the penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 639).

Response 2. The negative answer must be given if the certificate is sought outside the aforesaid cases; likewise, as is clear, if the confession was fictitiously made.

Objection 1, against response I. By denying the certificate the confessor says nothing, but only does not approve that confession by positive testimony, to which he is not bound.[1]

Response. It is the same whether the burden follows for the penitent from a positive act or from the omission of an act. If from omission, the confessor is bound to a positive act; just as, for example, he is bound to continue conversations with the penitent with whom he had previously been accustomed to converse, and cannot in the future abstain from them on account of the confession heard.

Objection 2. Nor does it stand in the way that St. Alphonsus objects that he is held to avoiding indirect revelation, which cannot be avoided when the certificate is denied. For by the same right it would have to be said that the seal is violated by one who denies absolution; for often, when the penitent is seen to abstain from Holy Communion, for example in colleges, scarcely any other reason for his abstinence can occur to the mind of those looking on than absolution denied.[2]

Response. I deny the parity; since denial of absolution is not, as denial of a certificate is, the cause of the burden. The cause of the burden in the case of absolution denied is the defect of disposition in the penitent, which defect prevents him from receiving Holy Communion.

Question 6. Whether one violates the seal who from sins alone heard in confession takes occasion to ask who that penitent was.

Response 1. Affirmatively, as is clear, if from the question instituted suspicion is introduced against the penitent.

Response 2. With suspicion to be introduced excluded, it likewise seems that the affirmative answer must be given, because inquiry of this kind, relying on sacramental knowledge, seems to render confession odious.

[1] Thus some adversaries.

[2] Thus some adversaries.

439 II. The sacramental seal is not violated:

1. By one who remembers the sins accused; nor by one who prays for the penitent or acts more kindly toward him (St. Alphonsus, VI, 657).
2. By one who consults books and more learned persons, provided the danger that the penitent be recognized is absent.
3. By one who better fulfills the offices of his duty, for instance by questioning and instructing penitents more prudently, by watching over subjects more diligently; nevertheless let him proceed cautiously, lest the penitent be burdened or implicitly reproved (St. Thomas, in IV, dist. 21, q. 3, art. 1, sol. 1, ad 1; St. Alphonsus, cited place).

4. By one who in a sermon treats not unaccustomed matter, or more strongly turns hearers away from some not unaccustomed occasion (St. Alphonsus, VI, 654, doubt 1).

5. By one who praises the conscience of the penitent, provided an evil suspicion against others is not introduced (St. Alphonsus, VI, 638, 1).

6. By one who after absolution in the confessional speaks with the penitent about things heard in confession; nor by one who in confession speaks about those things which were declared in a previous confession (St. Alphonsus, VI, 652, 653).

7. By one who before others relates sins and so forth accused by the penitent, without naming the person and with danger of recognizing that person excluded (St. Alphonsus, VI, 638, 3). Here, however, carefully observe that a manner of acting of this kind, if it is done rashly, although the sacramental seal is not violated, is altogether to be disapproved, as follows from the Instruction of the Holy Office to the Ordinaries of places and Moderators of Religious institutes;[1] concerning this Instruction certain things must be noted. Moreover:

a) The praised Instruction, "so that even the appearance and suspicion of injury inflicted on the sacrament may be avoided, so that the pious ears of hearers may not be offended and mistrust against the sacrament may not be stirred up," 1. disapproves the manner of acting of those "who, although all things which can in any way betray the person of the penitent have been kept back, do not fear rashly to speak, whether in private conversations or in public sermons to the people, as they say, for the edification of hearers, about things submitted in sacramental confession to the power of the keys"; 2. commands the Ordinaries of places and Superiors of Religious institutes, with their conscience gravely burdened, "that if they detect any abuses of this kind anywhere, they strive to restrain them promptly and efficaciously; and that in the future, both in theological schools and in conferences on cases of morals, as they call them, and in public and private addresses and exhortations to the clergy, they take care that the priests subject to them be diligently instructed never to dare, especially on the occasion of sacred Missions and Spiritual Exercises, to touch upon anything pertaining to the matter of sacramental confession, under whatever form and under whatever pretext, not even in passing, and neither directly nor indirectly, except in the case of necessary consultation to be proposed according to the rules handed down by approved authors, in their public or private discourses; and that in the examinations for their habilitation to receive confessions they be examined particularly on this matter"; 3. "trusts that none of the Confessors will contravene prescriptions of this kind; but if the contrary happens, let the aforesaid Ordinaries and Superiors gravely admonish transgressors, strike recidivists with fitting penalties, and in graver cases refer the matter as soon as possible to this Supreme Sacred Tribunal."

b) The Instruction certainly commands the Ordinaries of places and Superiors to remove abuses, if they exist. But it is disputed: 1. whether it imposes a true precept on confessors, or merely provides and inculcates a directive norm; 2. whether or not it had the force of law; 3. whether, if it had that force, it retained it. Namely, the aforesaid Instruction was never promulgated in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis; it lacks the approval of the Supreme Pontiff in specific form, indeed even in common form, which nevertheless according to the Constitution Sapienti Consilio[2] is required in order that Congregations may issue law. There is added that the Code did not retain the dispositions of the Instruction, nor does it refer to it in the sources, and that ecclesiastical Authority afterward was in no way accustomed to urge the said dispositions. These difficulties, although they can be weakened and partly solved, nevertheless bring it about that the Instruction can practically, at least as regards confessors, be held as a merely directive norm.

Note. As incapable of bearing testimony there are excluded "priests, as regards all those things which became known to them from sacramental confession, even if they have been released from the bond of the seal; indeed things heard by anyone and in any way on the occasion of confession cannot even be received as an indication of truth" (can. 1757, § 3, 2).

[1] June 19, 1915 (Monitor Ecclesiasticus 1917, p. 199).

[2] June 29, 1908.

Scholion. On the Penalties Established Against Transgressors

440 I. The confessor who has presumed to violate the sacramental seal directly (n. 428) is subject to excommunication reserved in the most special manner to the Apostolic See (can. 2369, § 1).

II. A confessor who has violated the sacramental seal "only indirectly" (n. 428) is liable to the penalties of which canon 2368, § 1, treats (cited canon), that is, he is to be suspended from the celebration of Mass and from hearing sacramental confessions, or even, according to the gravity of the delict, is to be declared incapable of receiving them; he is to be deprived of all benefices, dignities, active and passive voice, and is to be declared incapable of all these things; and in graver cases he is also to be subjected to degradation.

III. Others who have rashly violated the sacramental seal are to be punished according to the gravity of guilt with a salutary penalty, which can even be excommunication (can. 2369, § 2).

§ II. On the Obligation of Repairing Defects Admitted in Confession

A defect committed in confession can regard either the validity, or the integrity of the confession, or another obligation.

441 I. A defect concerning validity is committed if the confessor does not absolve the penitent who is to be absolved, or does not absolve validly. Now a defect of this kind must of itself be repaired, and indeed from justice, because a tacit contract has intervened between confessor and penitent (St. Alphonsus, VI, 619). I said "of itself," for, considering the inconvenience often annexed to reparation, the obligation of repairing the defect is often lacking. For the rest, the obligation is more determined by these points:

1. If grave damage threatens the penitent, for instance if there is danger that he or she will die in the state of sin or remain in it for a long time, the confessor must repair the defect, and indeed with grave inconvenience: 1. if he committed it with grave fault; 2. if, although grave fault is absent, the confessor is a pastor, or the penitent is in grave danger of eternal damnation (St. Alphonsus, cited place).
2. If grave damage does not threaten the penitent, for instance if he or she has confessed again to another confessor, or is judged shortly to be going to confess; if, being at least attrite, which disposition can be presumed, he or she received the Holy Eucharist, the obligation of repairing the defect committed, and of admonishing the penitent about the invalidity of the prior confession, is had almost only insofar as there is an obligation of consulting for the integrity of the confession that will follow; in other words, the obligation of procuring that the penitent in the following confession subject again to the keys the sins of the prior confession. Of this obligation there will be discussion under II.

Corollary. If a penitent, not absolved or not validly absolved, returns to the same confessor, the latter is not bound to admonish him or her about the invalidity of the prior confession, provided that he consults for the integrity of the confession; to obtain this end it suffices to induce the penitent to accuse himself or herself collectively of the sins already confessed in the prior confession.

442 II. A defect concerning integrity must be repaired or supplied in this way:

1. If the confessor acted negatively, by not questioning when there was an obligation of questioning, he is not bound to supply the defect unless the penitent returns; in that case he is bound, because otherwise this new confession would not be integral (St. Alphonsus, VI, 620).
2. If the confessor positively induced the penitent to a defect of integrity, he is bound from justice to reparation, and indeed with grave inconvenience if he sinned gravely, with lesser inconvenience if he sinned lightly. If he did not sin, he is not bound, because admonition outside confession cannot be made without inconvenience (St. Alphonsus, cited place). I said above: he is bound from justice, because by a lie he took from the penitent the liberty of confessing in such a way as to be immune from the burden of integrity.

443 III. A defect concerning an obligation distinct from the obligation of integrity is to be repaired or supplied in this way:

1. If the confessor acted negatively, one must distinguish:

a) If from the uncorrected defect no grave damage threatens either the penitent or a third party, he is not bound to supply the defect unless the penitent returns.

b) If from the uncorrected defect grave damage threatens either the penitent or a third party, for instance if he did not admonish the penitent concerning the obligation of avoiding an occasion or of making restitution, the confessor is bound from charity to correct the defect, if it can conveniently be done. A graver or lighter inconvenience excuses according as the defect was committed with grave or light fault or without fault (St. Alphonsus, VI, 621).

2. If the confessor positively induced an error, one must likewise distinguish:

a) If from the uncorrected defect no grave damage threatens either the penitent or a third party, for instance if the confessor undeservedly exempted the penitent from the obligation of fasting, he is indeed bound of himself to correct the defect, because he is bound to prevent the cause of violating the law from remaining. But in practice there will easily be an excusing reason, especially if the confessor was not gravely culpable (St. Alphonsus, cited place).

b) If from the defect grave damage threatens either the penitent or a third party, for instance if he undeservedly exempted the penitent from the obligation of avoiding an occasion or of making restitution, he is bound from justice to repair the defect, and indeed with grave inconvenience if he committed the defect with grave fault; otherwise with lesser inconvenience (St. Alphonsus, cited place).

Insofar as the confessor himself can be bound to restitution because of a defect committed, see vol. I, n. 1005.

Corollary. If the penitent has departed but is foreseen to be going to return in time, it suffices to wait and to repair the defect in confession. Outside this case the defect cannot be repaired without the penitent being admonished about it outside confession. Now admonition of this kind, as being of a nature to introduce shame, cannot be made without the license of the penitent, except in the case in which the confessor omitted absolution through forgetfulness; for manifestation of this omission brings in no burden (St. Alphonsus, VI, 622).

Section II. On the Ministration of the Sacrament of Penance to Certain Persons in Particular

(St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii.)

Chapter I. On the Confession of Children

446 I. "With children he ought to use every charity and gentler ways, as far as can be done" (Praxis, n. 90); nevertheless the confessor, especially as regards girls, should always be mindful of due gravity.

II. Sometimes it must be seen whether they enjoy sufficient use of reason, although those who present themselves to the confessor can commonly be presumed sufficiently instructed.

III. Let the confessor take care that from the beginning they learn to confess rightly according to species and number. In questioning let him be cautious, lest the child learn to sin; besides this, let him correct an erroneous conscience when they take for a sin, or for a grave sin, what is no sin or only a light sin. Let the confessor strive especially for this: that he excite the child to true contrition. If some child is found prone to a more harmful sin, for instance to a shameful sin, let him take pains that the vice be eradicated in time (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, nn. 90 and 91). Let the admonition be brief.

IV. As regards the sentence to be rendered, let the confessor follow this norm:

1. Those sufficiently certainly disposed are to be absolved, even if they have confessed only venial sins; since disposed children have a right to absolution just as adults do. Besides this, let him not easily defer absolution for a relapsing child sufficiently certainly disposed, lest, namely, the child be turned away from the sacrament or keep back sins.
2. Those doubtfully disposed are to be absolved under condition: 1. if they have certainly sinned gravely, they are to be absolved in the cases enumerated in n. 404; 2. in doubt whether they are guilty of grave sin, they are always to be absolved, whether the doubt proceeds from the matter of the sin, or from doubt about the full use of reason, or from suspicion of an erroneous conscience by which what is not grave is taken as grave; 3. if either they have sinned only venially, or it is doubted whether any sin was present, sometimes they are to be absolved (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 91; VI, 432). If they are dismissed with only a blessing, this should be signified to them.

Corollary I. Even to children there must be left the faculty of confessing to whomever they prefer; hence one who would establish that children should confess only to him who taught them Christian doctrine, or that girls should confess to the pastor and boys to the vicar, is especially to be reprehended.

Corollary II. A recent question was moved whether boys and girls before the years of puberty can sin gravely. Moreover, the affirmative answer must altogether be given. For first, the decree Quam singulari, issued by Pius X through the Sacred Congregation of the Sacraments,[2] declares that children around the seventh year of age are bound by the precept of annual confession. But it would not declare these things unless it judged that children from that age are capable of mortal sin, because only those who have committed mortal sin are in fact bound to confession. There is added that the decree, with the Council of Trent, on one side teaches that children are held by the obligation of Communion "when by sinning they can lose grace"; in other words, when they can sin gravely; on the other side it declares that they are bound by the said obligation around the seventh year. Therefore, according to the mind of the one issuing the decree, grace can be lost at that age; in other words, grave sin can be committed. In addition, the decree disapproves delay of Communion for this reason, that it exposes children to the danger of losing their first innocence; this demonstrates that they are held as capable of grave sin. Finally, the whole manner of acting of children before the years of puberty shows sufficiently that they are capable of fully deliberate acts and therefore also of gravely sinful acts.

[1] Cf. Reuter, Neoconfessarius; Berger, Pastoraltheologie; Gaume, Manuel des confesseurs; Aertnys, Theologia Pastoralis; Krieg, Wissenschaft der Seelenleitung; Schuch-Polz, Pastoraltheologie.

[2] August 8, 1910.

Chapter II. On the Confession of the Rude, the Slow, and the Semi-Feeble 447 I. The confession of the rude and the slow. Insofar as and in what manner they are to be instructed if perhaps they are ignorant of the things to be known by necessity of means and of precept, this has been said in n. 396. For the rest, in accusation and in eliciting contrition they must often be helped by the confessor. If they have omitted a diligent examination of conscience, they should not be dismissed so that they may search their conscience better.

Note. The things that have been said about the rude and the slow are also to be applied to deaf-mutes who are little instructed; for the rest, compare the things said in n. 396.

448 II. The confession of the semi-feeble.

1. If with sufficient certainty they are only semi-feeble, and therefore capable of moral acts, they can rather often be admitted to the sacraments, for instance every month, provided however that here and now they are judged to have posited the acts required for penance. If it is somewhat probable that they are capable of mortal sin and guilty of it, the necessity of absolving them is to be urged still more.
2. If it is doubted whether they are capable of moral acts, they are to be absolved under condition: 1. in danger of death; 2. at Easter; 3. several times in the year, especially if there is some fear that perhaps they have sinned gravely (St. Alphonsus, VI, 432).

Chapter III. On the Confession of Habituated Persons

449 I. Notion of the habituated person. A habituated or customary person is one who has contracted a habit of some sin. Moreover, a habit of sin is a quality stable of itself by which someone is disposed to sin (vol. I, n. 333). Furthermore:

1. A habit of sin is obtained by frequency of acts. Nevertheless, frequency by itself alone does not suffice; rather it is required that contrary acts not be opposed to the sinful acts leading to the habit, by which contrary acts the origin of the habit would be prevented (vol. I, n. 341). Hence those who commit sins which of themselves arise rather from frailty or from a passing passion do not contract a habit of sin so easily as those who perpetrate sins which of themselves proceed more from malice. The reason is that the former, after the sin has been committed, more easily come to their senses and exercise contrary acts. Sins of the former kind are, for example, pollution and blasphemies; of the latter kind are hatred, theft, conjugal onanism, transgressions of the precepts of the Church, and so forth.

2. The habituated person has the will in some way fixed in sin, and therefore sins from a bad will, that is, from a will constantly inclined to evil, and therefore promptly and even from slight concupiscence, and as though without an effort of resisting; whence he comes to his senses with difficulty. "When someone," says St. Thomas, "sins from habit, which is to sin from malice, then the will tends by itself into the act of sin, as though now totally inclined from habit by way of a natural inclination into the act of sin" (De malo, q. 3, a. 13; cf. I-II, q. 78, aa. 2, 3, and 4; II-II, q. 156, a. 3; St. Alphonsus, V, 4, 2, 3; VI, 459; Praxis Confessarii, nn. 70, 73).

3. It cannot be accurately defined what frequency of acts, and how much time, is required for someone to be able to be judged to have contracted a habit of sin.

a) As regards frequency of acts, a greater number of sins committed through a certain time is required if the discussion concerns internal sins, to which sins of the mouth are equated, than if the discussion concerns external sins; greater, if it concerns solitary external sins than if mutual ones are concerned. The reason for the distinction is that a habit is formed the more easily, the greater the deliberation that preceded, as is usually the case in external acts, especially in mutual ones; and the more intense the deliberate acts are, as likewise customarily happens in external acts, especially in mutual ones. Hence a lesser frequency is required in these.

b) As regards time, this likewise depends on the intensity of the acts; likewise on the manner of acting more or less uniformly. Hence, for example, you would more easily call habituated one who through a notable time pollutes himself every week than one who sins frequently in one or another week and in other weeks resists temptation.

Corollary. "One who, for example, fornicated once a month for a year can well be called habituated here" (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 70); likewise one who for a year once a month has given himself to drunkenness; likewise one who through a notable time either commits pollution once a week, or two or three times a week indulges in morose delectations (St. Alphonsus, cited place).

[1] Cf. Cardinal van Rossum, Commentarius de iudicio sacramentali Ioan. B. Pighi ad trutinam vocatus; Berardi, De recidivis et occasionariis; Ter Haar, De occasionariis et recidivis.

450 II. Division of habituated persons. For our purpose, habituated persons are divided into habituated persons who are not relapsers and habituated persons who are relapsers.

1. By us a habituated person who is not a relapser is understood as one who either has not yet confessed after the habit was contracted, or indeed has confessed but was not seriously admonished by the confessor (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459).

2. A habituated relapser is a habituated person who, having confessed and having been admonished by the confessor, has continued the custom of sin in the same manner. Thus theoretically (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459; Praxis Confessarii, n. 71; Selva, II, Instruction 4, n. 17). Practically, a habituated relapser is a habituated person who, notwithstanding confession and admonition by the confessor,[1] has relapsed: 1. quickly (St. Alphonsus, V, 505); 2. frequently (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459); 3. in almost the same circumstances as before, not on account of singular circumstances; 4. with no assigned remedy having been used and with no effort or quasi-effort or resistance (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459, 505).

[1] The assignment of means for amending oneself also pertains to admonition.

451 III. Absolution of the habituated person.

1. A habituated person who is not a relapser, even if he furnishes only ordinary signs of disposition, can be held as sufficiently disposed and absolved. The ordinary signs are the confession itself and the assertion of the penitent (n. 399). The proposition is clear from the fact that a multitude of sins of itself does not constitute a reason for seriously doubting the sincerity of the penitent who, whether explicitly or implicitly, namely by the very accusation of himself in order to obtain absolution, asserts his sorrow for sins (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459; Praxis Confessarii, n. 70).

Corollary. A habituated person who has confessed and relapsed after confession can not rarely be absolved, even if he furnishes only an ordinary sign of disposition, because, if some one of the conditions indicated in n. 459 is lacking, he is often not a relapser in the strict sense.

452

2. A habituated relapser who brings only ordinary signs of disposition, and, although admonished by the confessor, continues to furnish only ordinary signs:

a) Cannot be absolved as often as he comes. For first, the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, in the Instruction of April 29, 1784, declares that before the confessor grants absolution, it must be seen whether penitents "have used the remedies previously proposed to them, by whose help they may avoid sin in necessary and involuntary occasions; whether they have cast off the custom of sinning; whether, if at other times they have obtained the benefit of absolution, they have again relapsed from their own malice into the same crimes and have wallowed in the same mire." But these things clearly signify that, according to the mind of the Congregation, a habituated relapser who brings only ordinary signs of disposition cannot be absolved as often as he comes.

Next, as we shall say immediately, a habituated relapser who brings only ordinary signs of disposition cannot of himself be absolved even the first time, namely on account of his doubtful disposition. How much more do these things hold concerning a habituated relapser who is a relapser again and again; indeed a relapser of this kind, if he brings nothing except an ordinary sign of disposition, seems to be judged not only doubtfully disposed, but much more probably indisposed (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459, 505).

There is added experience, which teaches that "many relapsers who furnish only ordinary signs are not disposed, or at least are very doubtfully disposed."

"And truly so; for whoever has some practice of the sacred tribunal will confess that very many come to the sacrament of Penance not sufficiently disposed and not truly contrite, especially among those who in the same way continually relapse into a habit of sinning. Some are not sufficiently instructed in religious matters and are little taught concerning the necessity or conditions of true contrition which, according to Trent, are required for penance. They are so accustomed to external signs of religion that they even hold confession as a certain external ceremony, and are content provided that they obtain absolution. Others take some slight displeasure, or some feeble wish of amending themselves, as sufficient sorrow and purpose. Others approach the sacraments rather from a certain domestic usage or ancestral custom or from a certain human respect, although without an evil design, without seriously turning their mind to correcting morals. Others are so light in mind that they scarcely think of eliciting a true act of sorrow; or, with mind rather distracted, they recite from memory or read from a book a simple formula of contrition, without serious consideration and an internal act of detestation arising from a supernatural motive. Preachers and missionaries who give to the people a series of instructions on contrition and purpose can commonly testify to these defects of true disposition; and they find them not only among the illiterate, but also among more cultivated persons who not rarely are little instructed in the matter of religion. Indeed in our age these defects are often to be feared so much the more, inasmuch as the spirit of this world, which bears before itself indifference and levity in supernatural matters but the greatest industry in earthly goods, has also bespattered with its stains quite a number of Catholics who have not yet abandoned the use of the sacraments. Come now, these generally, when asked by the confessor whether they truly grieve for their sins, give an affirmative response, and this not with a feigned but, as they think, sincere mind, and therefore they furnish an ordinary sign of disposition; and nevertheless before God they are not truly contrite."[1]

Ter Haar confirms this sad experience by these testimonies.[2]

Leo XII: "Many present themselves to the ministers of the sacrament of Penance altogether unprepared."[3]

The Roman Catechism: "Charity has so grown cold that already very many of the faithful think that no intimate sorrow of soul and groaning of heart is necessary for obtaining pardon of sins, but judge that it is enough if they have only the appearance of one grieving."[4]

Segneri says: "How many there are who, through defect of purpose, make confessions invalid and often even sacrilegious! It is not one or another, but whole generations of men and women, nobles and commoners, who say: I have always confessed the evil that I did; for so many years indeed I have lived in this depraved practice, but I have always accused it. They believe themselves clean, but they are not, because they confessed without true purpose... It is indeed easy to throw oneself at the feet of the confessor, strike the breast, and say: I repent. But the chief point of the matter is to see whether you have the purpose of changing life."[5]

The Directory for the spiritual exercises of St. Ignatius, edited by the Superior General of the Society of Jesus, Claudio Aquaviva, declares concerning the usefulness of general confession: "If there were no other usefulness, this surely ought to be enough, that we experience that men commonly approach confession either without sufficient examination, or without due sorrow, with no purpose of a better life or with a very weak one."[6]

As regards the doctrine of theologians we note:[7] the ancient theologians almost commonly teach that a formal relapser who furnishes only an ordinary sign can in no way be absolved as often as he comes. Ter Haar proves this proposition by the very testimonies of the ancient theologians.[8] Thus, to name some, St. Thomas of Villanova, St. Charles Borromeo, St. Bellarmine, St. Francis de Sales, Venerable

Louis of Granada, St. Leonard of Port Maurice, Paul Segneri, Lessius, and De Lugo, whose testimonies you may see in Ter Haar.[9]

[1] Ter Haar, De occasionariis et recidivis, n. 264.

[2] Ter Haar, cited work, n. 265.

[3] Constitution Charitate Dei, December 25, 1825.

[4] De Poenitentia, n. 67.

[5] Penitenza istruita, chapter 8.

[6] Chapter 16.

[7] St. Thomas has these things: "Many things are expedient for the spiritual health of one relapsing ... namely, that greater caution be used concerning him" (IV Sent., dist. 32, a. 1, a. 4).

[8] Ter Haar, cited work, n. 295 sq.

[9] Ter Haar, cited place.

453 b) A habituated relapser who brings only ordinary signs of disposition, and, although admonished by the confessor, continues to furnish only ordinary signs, of himself cannot be absolved even the first time. This is first drawn from the Instruction of the Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide cited above, which sufficiently manifests that according to the mind of the Sacred Congregation, ordinary signs of disposition do not suffice even the first time if the matter concerns a habituated relapser.

Next, one who is doubtfully disposed cannot of himself be absolved (n. 398). But the penitent of whom we speak must be held as doubtfully disposed.

The minor is proved. Since the same signs of disposition are supposed to be at hand, no greater certitude can be had about the present disposition than is had about the disposition had in the past confession; indeed, on account of the continued and confirmed habit, rather less certitude must be had about the present disposition. But it is rightly doubted whether the penitent was well disposed in the past confession.

The subsumed minor is proved. If right disposition in the past confession were admitted, we would posit a penitent who had had contrition estimatively supreme and a universal, firm, and efficacious purpose, and besides this had been fortified by the grace of the sacrament; and notwithstanding all these things, he would have relapsed quickly, frequently, in the same morally considered circumstances, with no means assigned by the confessor having been used and with no effort or resistance, into the same sins. This indeed can happen, but nevertheless it is deservedly doubted whether it had place (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459, 505; Praxis Confessarii, n. 20). Indeed, as we have said, less certitude concerning the present than concerning the earlier disposition must be had, because the habit and culpability have increased since the prior confession, and so true aversion from sin has become more difficult.

As regards the doctrine of theologians, we note that very many support the doctrine of St. Alphonsus, as for example St. Thomas of Villanova, St. Francis de Sales, Segneri, Benedict XIII, Archbishop of Benevento, etc., whose testimonies Ter Haar brings forward.[1]

Objection 1. Theologians earlier than St. Alphonsus commonly teach the contrary.

Response. By referring to those things which we noted above concerning the doctrine of theologians.

Objection 2. The penitent is to be believed, whether speaking for himself or against himself.

Response. The principle stated certainly cannot be admitted without limitation, as is clear from proposition 60 condemned by Innocent XI: "To a penitent having a custom of sinning against the law of God, of nature, or of the Church, even if no hope of amendment appears, absolution is neither to be denied nor deferred, provided that with his mouth he says that he is sorry and proposes amendment." Besides this, the principle holds more for integrity than for the disposition of the penitent, since the penitent can err more easily as regards the latter. Finally, the principle can be urged less when, as in our hypothesis, there is deserved doubt about the truth of the past testimony. Nor nevertheless should the penitent for that reason be called guilty of lying; since commonly he deceived himself.

Objection 3. To return with the same sins is not of itself a sign either that true sorrow and purpose of amendment was lacking or that it is lacking; certainly not more than if he returned with other sins. Rather, it is only a sign of human frailty.

Response. The discussion concerns a habituated person, and such a one as not only returns with the same sins, but, after being admonished, has relapsed quickly, with no means assigned by the confessor having been used and with no effort or resistance having been furnished. In this case we do not contend that there is a certain sign that sorrow was lacking, but that there is a reason for seriously doubting whether right disposition was present, and still more whether it is present.

Instance. "That someone," says St. Thomas, "afterwards, that is, after penance, sins either in act or in purpose, does not exclude that the first penance was true, for the truth of a prior act is never excluded through a contrary subsequent act; for just as one truly ran who afterwards sits, so one truly repented who afterwards sins" (III, q. 84, a. 10, ad 4).

Response with Billuart:[2] "His words, that is, St. Thomas's, are not to the point. For there the Holy Doctor means that a following sin does not exclude preceding penance, supposing that it was true; because, he says, the truth of a prior act is not excluded through a contrary subsequent act. Hence, just as he truly ran who afterwards sits, so he truly repented, if he truly repented, who afterwards sins; for what has been done cannot become undone. All admit this. But the Holy Doctor does not deny that frequent following relapses are indications that the prior penance was not true," or at least that it is to be doubted.

I said that a habituated relapser who brings only ordinary signs of disposition cannot of himself be absolved; since, although he is doubtfully disposed, nevertheless he can be absolved under condition if some one of the causes assigned in n. 404 is present.

[1] Ter Haar, cited work, n. 295 sq.

[2] Tractatus de Sacramento Poenitentiae, dissertation 6, article 10.

454

3. If a habituated relapser either of himself, or after being admonished by the confessor, furnishes an extraordinary sign of disposition, he can be held as sufficiently certainly disposed, and therefore can be absolved by the confessor as judge, though not always as physician (St. Alphonsus, VI, 459). It is said:

a) Either of himself, or after being admonished by the confessor. Namely, let the confessor admonish the doubtfully disposed penitent paternally and try to elicit an extraordinary sign of disposition by which the prejudice against his disposition is removed (n. 401).

b) An extraordinary sign of disposition; what the extraordinary signs of disposition are, see n. 400.

c) He can be absolved by the confessor as judge, though not always as physician. Namely, generally let him be absolved at once if he is a relapser from internal frailty; otherwise, if from an occasion, especially a continuous one (St. Alphonsus, VI, 456, 450, 463, 464; Praxis Confessarii, nn. 76, 77). I said:

a) Generally let him be absolved at once if he is a relapser from internal frailty; because sometimes delay is expedient or even necessary for strengthening the will, as if remedies have long been used in vain.

b) Otherwise, if from an occasion, especially a continuous one; in this case delay of absolution should be used, unless there is a special reason for granting absolution at once. What the special reasons are, see n. 407.

Note. If a habituated relapser in venial sins occurs, let the confessor take care either to elicit an extraordinary sign of contrition, or to "dispose the penitent to grieve especially over some light fault from which he has greater horror, or to suggest to him that he confess some graver sin of past life against some precept, for it suffices that he confess in general without number, so that he may have certain matter on which absolution can rest" (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 71).

Scholion. On the Confession of Those Given to Pollution or Onanism

Cf. our little work: De virtute castitatis et vitiis oppositis, nn. 138 sq., 114 sq.

Chapter IV. On the Confession of Those in Occasions of Sin

Article I. On Those in Occasions in General

455 I. Notion of occasion. An occasion is a person or external thing which creates for a person a danger of sinning.

456 II. Division of occasion.

1. Occasion is distinguished into remote and proximate. Remote is that which creates a light danger; proximate is that which creates a grave danger, that is, such a danger in which someone is certainly, more probably, or probably going to fall. Such are, for example, a tavern for a drunkard, a master for a maidservant seduced by him. For the rest, the presence of a proximate occasion can be gathered both a priori and a posteriori. It is gathered a priori when, considering the enticement of the object and the disposition of the subject, it is at least probable that someone is going to fall. It is gathered a posteriori through experience or frequency of falls, namely if someone in a certain occasion, considering the times in which he was exposed to the occasion, has fallen so frequently that it is probable that, with the occasion present, he is going to fall again (St. Alphonsus, VI, 452).

Many call a proximate occasion that in which someone is certainly, or almost certainly, or very probably going to fall. Hence, in order to gather from experience whether an occasion is proximate, they require that someone always, or almost always, or altogether more frequently, has sinned in it. But that the definition of St. Alphonsus handed down by us is right will be clear from what is to be said, since an occasion is already rightly called proximate when there is of itself an obligation of avoiding it physically. But, as we shall prove, there is of itself an obligation of avoiding even that occasion in which someone is only probably going to fall.

2. Proximate occasion is subdivided into:

a) Absolute and relative, according as it creates a danger for people commonly or for a certain person.

b) Continuous and interrupted, according as it occurs habitually or at intervals.

c) Voluntary and necessary. Voluntary is that which can be avoided without grave inconvenience. Necessary is that which either physically cannot be avoided or cannot be avoided without grave inconvenience. But in order that an occasion can be called necessary, an inconvenience is required the graver in proportion as the danger of damnation, the danger of sinning, the sin to be feared, and the scandal to arise from the occasion are greater. Wherefore note two condemned propositions, namely proposition 62 proscribed by Innocent XI: "A proximate occasion of sinning is not to be fled when some useful or honest cause for not fleeing occurs";[2] and proposition 41 condemned by Alexander VII: "A concubinary is not to be obliged to cast out the concubine if she would be too useful for the pleasure of the concubinary, commonly regalo, since, with her lacking, he would live life too bitterly, and other banquets would affect the concubinary with great weariness, and another female servant would be too difficult to find."[3] Therefore an occasion should not easily be held as necessary. In addition note that the difficulty of renouncing the occasion is commonly exaggerated by penitents (St. Alphonsus, 452, 454).

[1] Cf. Ter Haar, De occasionariis et recidivis.

[2] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1212.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1141.

457 III. Obligation of avoiding occasions. First it must be noted that an occasion of sinning can be avoided physically or morally: physically, that is, by removing or abandoning it; morally, that is, by bringing it about in another way that the danger of sinning ceases to persist. Next it must be observed that we are speaking expressly of occasions of sinning gravely. Now:

1. There is no obligation of avoiding remote occasions of sinning gravely. The reason is that such an obligation would bring with it an intolerable burden to be borne through one's whole life and continual anxieties; for occasions of this kind continually occur to a person. But it cannot be admitted that a burden of this kind has been imposed on people. Some indeed think that of itself there is a venial obligation; but the argument seems also to exclude that obligation.

458

2. As regards proximate occasions of sinning gravely, these things hold:

a) There is a grave obligation of physically avoiding a voluntary proximate occasion of sinning gravely. The proposition thus stated now seems commonly to be admitted, and it is deduced from proposition 61 condemned by Innocent XI: "One who is in a proximate occasion of sinning, which he can and does not will to omit, indeed directly and deliberately seeks or thrusts himself into it, can sometimes be absolved." Now the words of omitting, seeking, and thrusting oneself into it seem altogether to have to be understood of physical avoidance. Next, the proposition stated is proved by the same argument by which the proposition now to be stated is proved.

459 b) There is a grave obligation of physically avoiding a voluntary proximate occasion, as it has been defined by us; in other words, there is a grave obligation of physically avoiding also that voluntary occasion in which someone is only probably going to fall. For each person is held to avoid a danger, here and now grave, of sinning formally; or to proceed here and now in such a way that he is not probably going to sin gravely. But one who does not physically avoid a voluntary occasion in which he is probably going to fall does not avoid a danger, here and now grave, of sinning formally.

The major is clear from the fact that one who does not avoid a danger, here and now grave, of sinning formally does not truly and simply turn away from the formal offense of God, nor truly and simply turn away from his own supreme evil.

The minor is proved thus: one who does not physically avoid a voluntary occasion in which he is probably going to fall cannot avoid a danger, here and now grave, of sinning formally, except through the help of God, by which the danger here and now ceases to be grave. But one who does not physically avoid a voluntary occasion, that is, an occasion which he can easily avoid, cannot without rashness expect the help of God.

The subsumed minor is proved. The help of God, as gratuitous, cannot legitimately be expected except insofar as it is necessary. But it is in no way necessary where the occasion is voluntary, because this can easily be physically avoided; and once it has been avoided, help for resisting it is no longer required (St. Alphonsus, V, 63; VI, 452). These words of the Council of Trent are added: God does not command impossibilities, but by commanding admonishes both to do what you can and to ask for what you cannot, and he helps so that you can.[1] Likewise these words of St. Thomas: "Tempting God consists in this, when a man omits to do what he can for escaping dangers, looking only to divine help" (II-II, q. 97, a. 1).

Nor should you object that divine help can be expected, provided it is asked for. For the said help can be expected by one asking only when it is necessary. Indeed, a petition of this kind is not even honest, and therefore it can exercise no influence upon God: the petition of departing from the occasion is honest; the petition of conquering while you remain in the occasion is dishonest.

As regards the doctrine of theologians, I note that most earlier theologians of greater note adhere to the opinion defended, as Ter Haar proves by the testimonies brought forward.[2] St. Thomas has these things: "The weak in faith, whose subversion can probably be feared, are to be prohibited from association with unbelievers" (II-II, q. 10, a. 9). St. Alphonsus strenuously defends the same opinion in the places cited, and very many, even those who wrote after St. Alphonsus, defend it, as the praised Ter Haar again shows.[3]

Corollary. The genuine definition of proximate occasion is this: it is an occasion in which someone is at least probably going to fall. For a proximate occasion is that which there is of itself an obligation of avoiding physically. But from what has been said it follows that there is of itself an obligation of physically avoiding an occasion in which someone is at least probably going to fall.

Objection 1. It does not appear why he truly sins gravely who has an altogether notable probability that in this occasion which he approaches he is not going to sin gravely; for he does not choose a thing which by moral necessity brings sin with it.

Response. It suffices, as follows from the argument brought forward, that someone choose a thing such that, once it is posited, he will probably commit sin.

Objection 2. If from the nature of things or from experience it is clear that probably the sin will be avoided, this is a sign that the danger can be avoided with those ordinary helps of grace which can prudently be expected and asked by any person.

Response. I deny the consequent, since the divine help of which there is discussion cannot prudently be expected and asked in the hypothesis posited, because it is not necessary, as we have said.

Objection 3. Because by hypothesis it is also probable that sin will not follow, one who for a reasonable cause commits himself to such an occasion cannot be accused of rashness and said to will sin.

Response. I deny the consequent, since one who without grave cause exposes himself to a grave danger of a grave evil is deservedly accused of rashness. But since in the hypothesis posited it is also probable that sin will follow, the matter concerns a grave danger of a grave evil, that is, of sinning mortally.

Objection 4. In several texts of authors alleged by Berardi and Ter Haar in their favor, the question is only of probable danger, and it is not established that the authors did not understand a probability to which nothing is opposed, and which therefore would be equivalent to moral certitude.

Response. An interpretation of this kind does not agree with the customary meaning of the words.

Note. If someone without cause enters into a danger, but uses such means as remove the very impulse to sin, he is not to be said to expose himself rashly to danger; rather the danger is now not present. For example, if someone always steals when he is alone in some house, he can go there if people are present.

[1] Session 6, chapter 11.

[2] Ter Haar, cited work, nn. 53-55; nn. 63, 64.

[3] Ter Haar, cited work, n. 65.

460 c) There is no obligation of physically avoiding a necessary proximate occasion. For one who for a grave reason exposes himself to a grave danger cannot be accused of rashness, and therefore can rightly hope that, with means having been used, he will acquire divine help by which the proximate occasion ceases to be such. "And thus surgeons are excused if they expose themselves to danger in treating women, when sometimes in the past they have already fallen because of such an occasion. And thus pastors who have experienced the same misery in receiving confessions. Thus also others are excused who cannot abandon their own office, for instance that of clerk, soldier, tavern-keeper, or merchant, without grave detriment" (St. Alphonsus, V, 63; VI, 455). The same must be said of those for whom, on account of a vehement inclination to evil, innumerable things are proximate occasions. They are indeed held to use means of not sinning, but they are not held to avoid all those things; this would be a very grave burden, and by itself alone already excuses.

461 Question 1. Whether one is bound, even with very grave damage, to abandon the occasion if he continually neglects to use remedies, and therefore continually relapses.

Response. The affirmative answer seems altogether to be given; for each person is held to avoid a danger, here and now grave, of sinning formally, or is held here and now to proceed in such a way that he is not probably going to sin gravely (St. Alphonsus, VI, 457). But the person of whom we speak is probably, not to say almost certainly, going to sin formally unless he abandons the occasion. Therefore he is bound to abandon it.

The minor is drawn from the fact that one who has continually neglected the remedies to be used will probably, not to say almost certainly, neglect them again, and therefore will probably sin again.

Objection. The penitent is bound only either to use the means or to avoid the occasion. Therefore the confessor cannot impose on him the obligation of avoiding the occasion.

Response. In the case the penitent is held to choose the means of avoiding the occasion, because he probably, indeed almost certainly, is not going to use the other means. Nor does the confessor impose that obligation on him, but the law of nature does. But let the confessor teach the penitent the obligation; nor of itself should he abstain from admonition for this reason, that the penitent who neglects the means will not use the more difficult means of abandoning the occasion. For, as Ter Haar observes, "often it is easier for a rightly disposed penitent to posit one very difficult and quasi-heroic act, namely to break off a morally necessary occasion, than afterward, when fervor has diminished and temptation has increased, through a long time, perhaps through months and years, daily to use those remedies of vigilance and prayer with constant struggle against his own passions and the snares of enticements."[1]

Question 2. Whether one is bound, even with very grave damage, to abandon the occasion if, although he uses remedies, he nevertheless always relapses in the same way.

Response. The case will not easily occur, because a penitent who diligently uses the means will commonly be amended little by little. But if it occurs, the affirmative answer must be given, because, as we have just said, each person is held to avoid a danger, here and now grave, of sinning formally. But the one of whom we speak is probably, not to say almost certainly, going to sin formally unless he abandons the occasion. There is added that, at least in the hypothesis posited, these words of Christ urge: "If your eye scandalizes you, pluck it out and cast it from you: it is good for you to enter into life with one eye, rather than having two eyes to be cast into the hell of fire."[2] (St. Alphonsus, VI, 457). Finally, in the work of Pellizzari De Monialibus, the Sacred Congregation of the Index willed the contrary opinion to be suppressed by decree of April 21, 1693.

[1] Ter Haar, De occasionariis et recidivis, n. 176.

[2] Matthew 18:9.

462 IV. Absolution of those in occasions. As regards the absolution of those in occasions, these things especially come to be noted:

1. One who is in a proximate, voluntary, and continuous occasion to which he is strongly attached should not be absolved before he has physically or quasi-physically[1] abandoned the occasion, unless there is a special reason for granting absolution at once. This is deduced first from the fact that "such a penitent is indisposed for absolution if he asks for it before he removes the occasion" (St. Alphonsus, Praxis Confessarii, n. 66). Moreover, he is indisposed because he exposes himself to a grave danger of breaking his purpose, that is, of not removing the proximate occasion. St. Alphonsus explains this in this way: "Removal of the occasion is a greatly arduous thing, and does not happen unless one inflicts great force on himself, so that he may be torn away from that occasion to which, because of the past adhesion of his mind, he remains strongly inclined. And therefore, if the occasion is not removed before absolution, the penitent will easily deceive himself after absolution, falsely persuading himself that he will resist temptations; and thus, with the occasion not dismissed, he will certainly return to his vomit" (VI, 454; III, 436). But if the penitent does not notice the danger, of itself he must be admonished by the confessor; and once admonished he becomes indisposed if nevertheless he wills to receive absolution immediately. There is added that the confessor as physician is of himself held to use a means without which the penitent is exposed to grave danger of breaking his purpose (St. Alphonsus, cited place). Finally, theologians by far more commonly admit the proposition stated. Thus, for example, St. Charles Borromeo, St. Thomas of Villanova, St. Francis Xavier, St. Leonard of Port Maurice, Venerable Paul Segneri, Lehmkuhl, Bucceroni, Prummer, and others, whose testimonies Ter Haar brings forward.[2]

What the special reasons are for departing from the rule, or granting absolution at once, see n. 407.

Objection 1. The opinion of St. Alphonsus rests on a doubtful foundation, namely that he sins gravely who exposes himself only to probable sin.

Response. By referring to the proof of that doctrine and the refutation of those things which are opposed to it (n. 468).

Objection 2. The earlier theologians only counsel, and do not prescribe, the opinion which St. Alphonsus defends.

Response. An interpretation of this kind is opposed to the obvious and clear sense of the testimonies of which there was discussion above.

[1] For instance, if the matter concerns a maidservant, by renouncing service, even if she does not depart immediately.

[2] Ter Haar, cited work, n. 117 sq.

463

2. One who is in a proximate, voluntary, and continuous occasion should not be absolved before he has used the assigned means, unless there is a special reason for granting absolution at once. The reason is that, considering the very great blandishments of the present occasion and the danger arising from it of neglecting the assigned means, the will of the penitent must be sustained by the remedy of delay. "For I judge," says St. Alphonsus, "that the confessor as physician is bound to apply to his penitent the more opportune remedies, so that he may work his salvation; and I think that no more apt antidote can be administered to one who is in a proximate occasion than delay of absolution. For experience teaches that penitents, after they depart absolved, for the most part neglect to use the prescribed means, and thus they relapse most easily. On the contrary, when absolution is denied to them, they strive more vigilantly to carry out the remedies and to resist temptations, moved indeed by fear lest, when they return to the confessor, they again be dismissed without absolution" (VI, 456). What the special reasons are for departing from the rule or granting absolution at once, see n. 407.

464

3. One who approaches a proximate, voluntary, and interrupted occasion, and returns twice or three times after being absolved without any amendment:

a) If he shows only ordinary signs of disposition, of himself he cannot be absolved; for since he has already several times not avoided the occasion, although he could easily have avoided it, there is deserved doubt about the disposition. He can be absolved under condition if some one of the causes assigned in n. 404 is present.

b) If either of himself or after being admonished by the confessor he shows an extraordinary sign of disposition, he can be held as sufficiently disposed and absolved (St. Alphonsus, VI, 454; Praxis Confessarii, n. 66).

465

4. One in an occasion who is a habituated relapser is to be treated according as was set forth in nn. 461-463, where we spoke about habituated relapsers (St. Alphonsus, VI, 455, 456).

Corollary. Let the confessor not omit to assign to the penitent who is in or approaches a necessary proximate occasion remedies for not sinning; these are:

1. To diminish the force of the occasion. Not rarely a few words said with strong spirit, a serious threat or reproach, an opening of the mouth to cry out, or reporting the matter to someone who can apply a remedy, suffice so that the perfidious insidiator is cast down in spirit and ceases from every annoyance. Then he ought to avoid being alone with a lone person, flee all familiarity, and as far as can be done even the sight of the accomplice, not speak about him or her, not think about him or her, and similar things. In addition, if the occasion is not presently existing, he ought, insofar as can be done, to shorten his stay in it and quickly finish the necessary business.
2. To diminish the force of passion by furnishing no encouragement to it through idleness, liberty of the senses, depraved thoughts, depraved reading, intemperance, and so forth; likewise by subjecting it through labor, fasts, and other mortifications, if possible.
3. To increase spiritual strength by prayer, frequenting of the sacraments, and meditation on eternal truths. Daily, especially in the morning, let him renew the purpose of sinning no more, more profitably before a Crucifix. If the occasion is not presently existing, let him always renew the same purpose before he approaches it.[1]

[1] Berardi, nn. 79-83; Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 478.

Article II. On Some Occasions in Species

§ I. On Concubinage

One must distinguish between concubinaries who are in ordinary circumstances and those who are in danger of death.

466 I. Concubinaries living in ordinary circumstances.

1. If the concubinage is public, it must be removed either by marriage or by separation; but commonly not through means by which the occasion would become remote, because in that way the danger and scandal can scarcely be removed. If that is permitted in a very rare case, let the scandal, insofar as can be done, be removed by making public the absolute necessity of the occasion and by instituting a truly Christian life.
2. If the concubinage is occult, it can and must be removed either by marriage or by separation or, if inescapable difficulties stand in the way both of marriage and of separation, through means by which the occasion would become remote. It is said:

a) Either by marriage; and indeed this of itself is especially to be urged. Nevertheless, commonly one should not have recourse to secret marriage or marriage of conscience, unless the concubinaries are publicly judged to be joined in marriage (cf. treatise on marriage).

b) Or by separation. If marriage is morally impossible or at least is not chosen, and separation is morally possible, this must be imposed. If separation can be made shortly, the concubinaries should not be absolved before they are separated, unless there is a special reason for immediately imparting absolution (n. 471). If separation cannot be made shortly, let the concubinaries take pains that it be done as soon as possible; and then, unless a special reason is present, absolution should not be granted before they have used means of not relapsing (St. Alphonsus, III, 436). Of these means it will now be said:

c) Or through means by which it would become remote. The means, besides the general ones (n. 474)†, are:

a) If the concubinaries live in the same house: 1. let each openly declare to the accomplice that he or she no longer wills to lead such a life; 2. if the concubinary turns aside to her at night, let her close the door in such a way that it cannot be opened.

b) If the concubinaries live in different houses: 1. let the concubine not open the door to the concubinary when he comes; 2. let her take care to live with another woman or at least not be found alone; 3. sometimes let it be advised that she change domicile.

467 II. Concubinaries living in danger of death.

1. If the concubinage is public, one must speak as follows:

a) If the concubinary is now deprived of the senses, let him or her be absolved under condition, and also be given Extreme Unction (cf. nevertheless n. 485).

b) If indeed the person uses the senses, but nevertheless is in extremis, so that there is no time available either for contracting marriage or for effecting separation, the concubinary, having been reduced to penance, must be absolved and fortified with the remaining sacraments. Nevertheless, care must be taken, insofar as will be possible, that the accomplice not show himself or herself, and that the dying person repair the scandal, either by himself or herself or through the priest, by asking pardon before witnesses. If this manner of repairing scandal cannot prudently be used, the very carrying of Viaticum seems to involve sufficient reparation of scandal.

c) If the illness allows delay, the occasion and scandal are to be removed through marriage or separation. If neither marriage nor separation can have place, let the person declare before witnesses as soon as possible that this impossibility is to be made public, and at the same time promise that, if perhaps he or she recovers, he or she will effect separation and will have no further association with the accomplice. In addition, let the means assigned in n. 475 be used.

2. If the concubinage is occult, the procedure is as follows:

a) As was said above under a).

b) As above under b); but reparation of scandal, as is clear, is not required.

c) As above under c); but note that in the case one can sometimes have recourse to marriage of conscience (cf. treatise on marriage).

§ II. On Courtships

468 I. Courtships or visits of lovers with a view to marriage, considering present-day morals, can be held as necessary. Nevertheless, they are commonly not made without danger, although the danger arises more from solitary courtship than from courtship as such. Solitary courtship is understood as that which has place outside the sight of others.

II. Solitary courtship for many is already a priori, so to speak, a proximate occasion; for many it can become a proximate occasion; and as soon as the courting persons have sinned gravely, it has become a proximate occasion and must be treated as such by the confessor.

III. That the danger may be diminished the more, let the following precautions be used:

1. Courtship should be permitted only to those who can and will enter marriage within a reasonable time. If younger persons have begun courtship, let it be deferred; if the hope of entering marriage sufficiently soon is lacking for a reason other than age, and the courtship cannot conveniently be interrupted, let the visits be diminished.
2. Let the lovers not dwell under the same roof.
3. Let them obtain the consent of parents as soon as possible; this does not prevent certain beginnings of love from sometimes being tolerated even without the parents' knowledge, namely so that they may know whether some reciprocal affection is present.
4. Let one not be alone with a lone person, or let courtship not be made outside the sight of others. This happens if it is done in a closed room; in a house while no one is present or all have gone away to bed; when a girl follows a young man to the door of the house toward evening or at night; in a remote place; in darkness, even if in a public place. It happens less when they are in a room and the mother now and then leaves very briefly on account of domestic business; scarcely or not at all when by day a young man accompanies a girl along a public road. It is also more dangerous if the courting persons deliberately seek solitude.
5. Let the visits not be too frequent, nor too prolonged.
6. If it happens that they are alone, let them not approach each other; this in itself is dangerous and gives occasion to immodest touches.
7. Let them fortify themselves with spiritual helps, especially frequency of the sacraments.

Corollary. The breaking off of a courtship should not easily be imposed on account of sins alone, namely if otherwise nothing stands in the way of the courtship; rather, in every way, even by delaying absolution for those who relapse, let care be taken that one is not alone with a lone person. I would say this: 1. because solitary courtship, rather than courtship itself, is the occasion of sinning; 2. because a courtship to which otherwise nothing is opposed cannot be broken off without sufficiently grave inconvenience; and 3. because, even if it is broken off, afterward it is easily renewed. But if courting persons who have sinned can, on account of singular circumstances, converse only alone, the courtship is rightly called a necessary occasion, since to renounce a courtship to which otherwise nothing stands in the way is a grave inconvenience.

§ III. On Domestic Dangers

469 I. A maidservant who yesterday yielded to solicitation, or who because of frailty is exposed to grave danger of yielding to it, is bound to seek another service; and, if for this purpose it is necessary, to warn her parents that she is exposed to danger. "These things, however," adds St. Alphonsus, "are to be understood if a person of this kind is frail and little devout; for if she were given to piety and cautious, and used suitable remedies for repelling temptations and for meeting passion, then I would not bind her to remove the occasion" (VI, 452). Likewise a maidservant must seek another service if the son of the household or a fellow servant is for her a proximate occasion of sinning, unless by warning the master or the son's parents she can put an end to the occasion and prefers to do so (St. Alphonsus, VI, 439). The master himself is bound, if it can be done without grave inconvenience - of which kind would be his wife's suspicion - to dismiss the maidservant under one pretext or another.

II. A young man for whom a brother lying in the same bed is an occasion of sinning is bound, if there is hope, to seek a change of bed, and, if for this purpose it is necessary, to warn his parents about his brother's wickedness. If a change of bed cannot be hoped for, he is nevertheless bound to warn his parents, unless the brother wholly desists from shameful acts.

§ IV. On Dances

470 I. "Dances according to themselves are not evil, nor acts of lust, but of joy" (St. Alphonsus, III, 429). Nevertheless, they can be illicit by reason of the end, for example for the sake of seeking lust, which more easily happens in masked dances than in others; by reason of danger, especially because of the manner in which they are held; by reason of scandal; likewise by reason of danger arising from the fact that young men and girls, after dances have been held, go home without a companion. Besides this, even respectable dances should therefore also, as far as can be done, be kept away, because, especially if they become more frequent, they foster levity of mind both in young men and in girls, and diminish their devotion. Children's dances (bals d'enfants) likewise are greatly to be disapproved.

As regards the danger attached to dances, note: dances which are held publicly are commonly more dangerous than those which are led among a few families; likewise there is greater danger in dances which are conducted with masks; dances of the wealthy, by reason of dress, and popular dances, by reason of levity in acting and speaking, not at all rarely carry grave danger with them; and generally the matter depends much on social condition and education.

II. As regards the proximate occasion which dances are naturally suited to constitute, I would say as follows:

1. Very immodest dances, whether by reason of dress or nakedness, or by reason of the manner in which they are conducted, are commonly a proximate occasion of sinning.
2. Fairly immodest dances create a proximate occasion for many, especially young men. To these are numbered many dances used today, which require a close embrace of the dancers and also furnish occasion for contacts of bodies. The reason why the said dances, although fairly immodest, constitute a proximate occasion only for many - but not commonly, especially as regards girls - is this: because the mind during dancing is distracted to other things and especially occupied with rhythmic movements, which keeps many from intense impure thoughts.
3. Respectable dances by reason of themselves are a proximate occasion for some. They can, however, easily be - and this is also to be applied to other dances - a proximate occasion by reason of the lack of a companion on the return.

Corollary. Very immodest dances are to be prohibited. As regards others which are a proximate occasion for the penitent, one must see whether they create danger by reason of themselves or by reason of the lack of a companion. If the first has place, the dances themselves are to be wholly prohibited to the penitent, unless a grave reason excuses, for example the absolute will of parents or of a husband; and this prohibition, if the matter concerns fairly immodest dances, is to be urged even more because of the scandal attached to them. If the second happens, the obligation of not going home without a companion is to be urged.

III. Those who introduce dances easily sin gravely, whether by promoting them, or by holding them, or by giving over a house for holding them. If, however, the custom flourishes in all neighboring parishes, it is almost equivalent to existence in one's own parish. Besides this, innkeepers are bound to take care that all things are done respectably.

IV. Where the custom of dances does not exist, the pastor and confessors should prudently keep them away, even respectable ones. Where it exists and cannot prudently be abolished, one must labor so that they are not prolonged too much, and so that young men and girls do not return home without a trustworthy companion. Besides this, pastors and confessors, insofar as it can prudently be done, should turn the faithful away from dances.

§ V. On Theatrical Spectacles

471 I. Theatrical spectacles can be dangerous both by reason of themselves and by reason of dances which are inserted; and rather often, because of the dancers' dress, manner of dancing, and lascivious gestures, they strongly excite to venereal things.

II. As regards the proximate occasion which they are naturally suited to constitute, hold these things:

1. Very immodest spectacles and dances are a proximate occasion for very many. Likewise spectacles notably contrary to religion create grave danger for many.
2. Fairly immodest spectacles and dances are a relative occasion; lighter ones are a grave danger for some (St. Alphonsus, III, 427).
3. If spectacles are attended especially for hearing music, the danger is more easily removed, provided the theaters are not too foul. And as regards dances, it must be noted that spectators can more easily leave on occasion of them.

III. In doubt whether a spectacle which will be exhibited is shameful or contrary to religion, to attend it is of itself illicit. Besides this, the confessor should prudently turn penitents away, especially from attending public theaters, also for this reason: because frequenting theaters, just as frequenting dances, promotes levity of mind and diminishes devotion.

§ VI. On Evil Writings

472 I. Books and newspapers professedly or notably contrary to religion or good morals are commonly a proximate occasion. Of this kind are, for example, socialist newspapers and many novels. Books and newspapers which do not oppose religion or good morals so notably are a relative occasion. To this are referred several liberal newspapers and many novels, as being erotic.

II. In doubt whether a book is dangerous, to read through it is illicit.

§ VII. On Evil Associations

473 I. As regards societies properly so called, compare what was said in volume I, n. 509.

II. As regards the danger which associates create in a workshop, in military houses, etc., these occasions are commonly necessary. Let the confessor be greatly intent on this: that those living in the occasion frequent the sacraments.

III. Frequenting unbelievers, if the matter concerns familiar and habitual conversation, easily carries grave danger with it. Otherwise one must speak about rare and interrupted conversation. Nevertheless, the so-called circles are more dangerous, especially those of younger people, which are set up, for example, for the sake of playing games or cultivating musical art, whether young men and girls come together at the same time, or both Catholics and non-Catholics are enrolled in them.

§ VIII. On Evil Schools

474 These matters were treated at length in volume I, n. 714 sq.

Appendix. On External Circumstances to Be Observed

444 I. Place.

1. The proper place of sacramental confession is a church or a public or semi-public oratory (can. 908); hence, of itself, it is better that even the confessions of men be received in some one of the places assigned. As regards women, there is an obligation insofar as the confessional seat in which they must be heard is generally to be placed in such a place. But "it is licit to receive the confessions of men even in private houses" (can. 910, § 2).
2. The confessions of women should not be heard outside the confessional seat except for a cause of illness or other true necessity, and with the precautions which the local Ordinary has judged opportune (can. 910, § 1). For the rest, observe:

a) The confessional seat for hearing the confessions of women is always to be placed in an open and conspicuous place, and generally in a church or public or semi-public oratory destined for women (can. 909, § 1). Since "generally" is said, for a just cause it is licit to erect the confessional seat in another open and conspicuous place, for instance in the sacristy or in a room annexed to the church or oratory.

b) The confessional seat should be furnished with a fixed grating, finely perforated, between penitent and confessor (can. 909, § 2).

c) Even the confessions of men must be received in such a seat if they are received in a church or public oratory.[1]

[1] Pontifical Commission, November 24, 1920 (A.A.S. 1920, p. 573).

445 II. Vesture. "Let him use a surplice and a violet stole, as time or the custom of places will allow."[1] Moreover, many regulars, either through direct concession or through communication of privileges, enjoy the faculty of using only the stole in church.

As regards the custom of using nothing except the stole alone or only the surplice, the response was: "Let the Roman Ritual be observed."[2] And finally it was declared: "It is fitting that in church a stole be used, according to the decrees of the Sacred Congregation of Rites."[3]

[1] Roman Ritual, title III, chapter I, n. 10.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Rites, March 23, 1882 (n. 3542, response 3); cf. Sacred Congregation of Rites, July 7, 1877 (n. 3426, response 4).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Rites, August 31, 1867 (n. 3158, response 2).

Part III. On the Reception of the Sacrament of Penance

479 Since the acts of the penitent, placed in order to the reception of the sacrament of Penance, constitute its proximate matter, those things which regard the reception of the sacrament are already comprehended in what has been set forth above. Hence it suffices, by way of very brief repetition, to note these things:

I. In order that someone be capable of receiving the sacrament of Penance, it is required that he be baptized and have sinned after baptism. If he has not sinned after baptism, the matter concerning which the sacrament is engaged is lacking.

II. In order that someone validly receive the sacrament of Penance, besides intention it is required that he be contrite and subject his sins to the keys. For contrition and confession constitute the proximate matter of the sacrament.

III. In order that someone receive the sacrament fruitfully, contrition is required which is estimatively supreme and universal; whether such contrition is required for validity is disputed (n. 299).

IV. In order that someone licitly receive the sacrament of Penance, it is required that, if he is excommunicated or personally interdicted, he first be absolved from the censure (cf. the treatise on ecclesiastical penalties). One who receives the sacrament illicitly, because of defect of contrition, also receives it invalidly, unless he proceeds in good faith.

Appendix. On Indulgences

480 (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 25-27; St. Alphonsus, Theologia Moralis, book VI, n. 531-538; Homo Apostolicus, treatise 16, n. 62-72).

The sacrament of Penance was instituted by Christ the Lord for remitting both guilt and eternal and temporal punishment due for sins committed. It happens, however, that not every temporal punishment is remitted through the sacrament. Now the punishment surviving can be remitted both through other sacraments, and through good works - since in each there is a satisfactory value - and through indulgences. Hence the dissertation on indulgences is suitably attached to the treatise on the Sacrament of Penance, inasmuch as it is ordered to the integral remission of sins.

We shall speak first of indulgences generally, then of some indulgences in particular.

Part I. On Indulgences Generally

We shall discuss first the notion or essence, existence, and division of indulgences; then their concession; then their gaining; finally the transfer, suspension, and cessation of indulgences.

Section I. On the Notion, Existence, and Division of Indulgences

481 I. Notion. An indulgence is the remission before God of temporal punishment due for sins which, as far as guilt is concerned, have already been blotted out, which ecclesiastical authority grants from the treasury of the Church outside the sacrament, for the living by way of absolution, for the departed by way of suffrage (canon 911).

It is said:

1. Remission of temporal punishment; but not of guilt, whether mortal or venial; nor of eternal punishment, but only temporal punishment.
2. Before God. This is clear both from proposition 19 of Luther condemned by Leo X: "Indulgences are of no value for those who truly gain them for the remission, before divine justice, of punishment due for actual sins;"[2] and from the authentic declaration of Pius VI issued against propositions 40 and 41 of the Synod of Pistoia.[3]

Besides this, indulgences are worth as much before God as the Church expresses in her words; so that, for example, a plenary indulgence of itself remits all temporal punishment, and an indulgence, for example, of one year of itself is worth only as much as one year of penance would be worth, passed according to the penitential canons, independently of the devotion or fervor of the subject. The reason is that "the quantity of the effect follows the quantity of its cause. But the cause of the remission of punishment in indulgences is nothing except the abundance of the merits of the Church, which is sufficient for expiating the whole punishment; but the devotion, or labor, or gift of the one receiving the indulgence, or the cause for which the indulgence is given, is not the effective cause. Hence the quantity of the remission ought not to be proportioned to any of these things, but to the merits of the Church, which always superabound" (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 25, a. 2). "Nor in this is too great a market made of the mercy of God, as some say; nor is derogation made from divine justice, because nothing of the punishment is remitted, but the punishment of one is reckoned to another" (St. Thomas, cited place).

3. Due for sins which, as far as guilt is concerned, have already been blotted out. For while the guilt remains, the punishment corresponding to it cannot be remitted. But once guilt has been remitted, not necessarily every temporal punishment is remitted.
4. Ecclesiastical authority, since to it alone belongs disposing of the common treasury. Who are the subjects of this power is explained in n. 494.
5. From the treasury of the Church. By the treasury of the Church is understood the accumulation of satisfactions of the Saints, both those reigning in heaven and those dwelling on earth, which they did not apply to others. Namely, to every good work proceeding from grace there belongs a threefold value: meritorious, insofar as, when the other conditions have been fulfilled, it confers a right to a just reward; impetratory, insofar as it has the force of obtaining goods from God by supplication; satisfactory, insofar as by reason of the difficulty of the work itself and at least by reason of the reluctance of our nature, it can satisfy the injured justice of God. Now the satisfactions of Christ, certainly of infinite value, and likewise the satisfactions of the saints, insofar as they were neither necessary for blotting out their own punishment nor applied by them to other persons, constitute, as it is called, the treasury of the Church.

6. Outside the sacrament; by which indulgence is distinguished from the remission of punishment which is made by the power of the keys in the sacrament of Penance.

7. Grants for the living by way of absolution, for the departed by way of suffrage. Namely:

a) An indulgence granted to the living is a judicial act by which the Church definitively applies the satisfactions of Christ and the Saints to her subjects in substitution for the temporal punishment still due for guilt that has been remitted. Therefore it is made by way of absolution, or is a quasi-absolution; but it is not a pure and simple absolution, because it has payment attached, insofar as it applies to the faithful satisfactions rendered by others. Hence St. Thomas says: "One who receives indulgences is not, simply speaking, absolved from the punishment due, but it is given to him so that he may pay the debt" (Supplement, q. 25, a. 1, ad 2).

b) An indulgence for the departed - over whom the Church lacks jurisdiction - involves the Church, from her power of administering her treasury, offering - or granting the one gaining the indulgence the right of offering in her name - to God the satisfactions of Christ and the Saints, praying to Him that He will accept them in substitution for the punishment to be paid by the departed. Hence an indulgence of this kind is valid only by way of suffrage.

From what has been said it follows that an indulgence granted to the living, when the things to be observed have been observed, has an infallible effect. But as regards the effect with respect to the departed, it is disputed whether or not it is infallible. Some affirm, because God, by the very fact that He gave the Supreme Pontiff the power of granting indulgences for the departed, seems also to have bound Himself by a promise to apply indulgences to them. Others deny this, or at least think that the application of the whole value, and to the designated souls, is not infallible, because such a divine promise is not proved in any way. For the power of the Church to grant indulgences for the departed involves only the competence of offering to God for the departed the spiritual treasury entrusted to herself, that is, to the Church. But a competence of this kind does not prove a divine promise of accepting what is offered. The response of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, dated July 28, 1840, taken in its obvious sense, favors this opinion: "By an indulgence of a privileged altar, if the mind of the one granting and the use of the power of the keys are considered, there is to be understood a plenary indulgence which immediately frees the soul from all the punishments of purgatory. But if the effect of the application is considered, there is to be understood an indulgence whose measure corresponds to the good pleasure and acceptance of divine mercy" (St. Alphonsus, VI, 534, under 10).

[1] Cf. Beringer-Steinen, Die Ablässe; Fanfani, De indulgentiis: manuale theoretico-practicum; Stein, De indulgentiis lucrandis.

[2] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 759.

[3] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1540 and 1541.

482 II. Existence of indulgences. The existence of indulgences must be admitted if it is proved: 1. that there exists in the Church a treasury of satisfactions which in itself suffices for blotting out before God the temporal punishment due for sins; 2. that these satisfactions are applicable to the faithful; 3. that the Church enjoys the power of applying them. Now:

1. There exists in the Church a treasury of satisfactions which in itself suffices for blotting out before God the temporal punishment due for sins. This follows from the propositions of Luther condemned by Leo X. For, as we noted above, in proposition 19 he condemned Luther's doctrine which teaches that indulgences are not of value for the remission, before divine justice, of punishment due for actual sins; and in proposition 17 the same Supreme Pontiff condemns this: "The treasures of the Church, from which the Pope gives indulgences, are not the merits of Christ and of the Saints."[1] Hence there exists in the Church a treasury of satisfactions which in itself suffices for blotting out before God the temporal punishment due for sins. Besides this, the existence of such a treasury is clear from the superabundant and infinite satisfaction which belongs to the works of Christ, as being a divine Person, and which He offered to God the Father for us.

2. The said satisfactions are applicable to the faithful. This is clear from the condemned propositions cited; as regards the satisfactions of Christ, it is furthermore clear from the work of redemption, by which the Savior satisfied God for us; as regards the superabundant satisfactions of the Saints, it follows from the dogma of the communion of Saints, by virtue of which a mutual participation of goods is had in the Church.

3. The Church enjoys the power of applying them; this is proved in Section II.

[1] Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 757.

483 III. Division of indulgences. Indulgences are chiefly divided:

1. Into plenary and partial, according as of themselves they wholly or partially remit the punishment due for sins. Now when an indulgence is granted, for example, of one year, the sense is that so much punishment is remitted to someone as would be remitted to him if for a year he performed the penance once customarily imposed for sins according to the canons (St. Alphonsus, VI, 535). By quarantines, however, which are sometimes attached to years - for example, an indulgence of seven years and seven quarantines - there is not understood some time beyond the years themselves, but that part of the year in which a harder penance was prescribed, namely the time of Lent.

2. Into personal, local, and real, according as they are granted only to certain persons, for example religious or members of a confraternity; or are affixed to certain places, for example to a church or altar, that is, to their pious visitation, etc.; or are attached to certain things, for example rosaries, medals, etc., that is, to the pious use of them.

3. Into temporary and perpetual, according as they are granted in perpetuity or only for a definite time.

4. Into indulgences for the living only, for the departed only, and for both the living and the departed.

Corollary I. From what has been said it follows how deservedly canon 911 states that indulgences are to be held in great esteem, and that their use - which is of faith[1] - is most salutary. For indulgences, besides remitting temporal punishment, stir the faithful to contrition and other salutary works, since they are not granted except to penitents and under definite conditions.

Corollary II. Those who make gain from indulgences are guilty of simony (vol. I, n. 621); indeed, by canon 2327 they are punished ipso facto with excommunication simply reserved to the Apostolic See.

[1] Council of Trent, session 25, Decree on Indulgences.

Section II. On the Concession of Indulgences

484 I. Existence of the power in the Church of granting indulgences. That the power of dispensing indulgences belongs to the Church is of faith from Trent;[1] and it follows from the power which Christ conferred on the Church of remitting sins and opening the kingdom of heaven to believers;[2] for to the perfect remission of sin and to the opening of the kingdom of heaven there also belongs the removal of temporal punishment still remaining after the guilt of sins has been remitted. That this power can be used outside the conferral of the sacrament is clear from the general sense of the words, which also contain the power of teaching and of making laws; and this certainly has place outside the sacrament. Besides this, the whole tradition from the first centuries has recognized this power in the Church.[3]

[1] Council of Trent, session 25, Decree on Indulgences.

[2] Matthew 16:18.

[3] Cf. Fanfani, cited work, p. 19-22.

485 II. Subject of the power. The Supreme Pontiff alone, by his own and full right, can grant indulgences (canon 912). The reason is that he, and he alone, can dispose of the common treasury of the Church to whom the government of the whole Church has been committed. Now the Supreme Pontiff commonly exercises the said power through the Sacred Penitentiary, whose office it is to judge all those things which regard the use and concession of indulgences, without prejudice to the right of the Holy Office to see to those things which regard dogmatic doctrine concerning the same indulgences or concerning new prayers and devotions (canon 258, § 2). Those inferior to the Supreme Pontiff can dispense indulgences by ordinary power only insofar as this has been expressly granted to them by law. Now the law states:

1. As regards a plenary indulgence.

a) Bishops, each in his own diocese, can impart the papal blessing with a plenary indulgence, according to the prescribed formula, twice a year, that is, on the solemn day of the Resurrection at Easter and on another solemn feast day designated by themselves, even if they have only assisted at the solemn Mass (canon 914). If some Bishop has several dioceses to be governed, he cannot, by his own right, transfer in one of them to another day the papal blessing attached to Easter of the Resurrection.[1]

b) Abbots or Prelates nullius, Apostolic Vicars and Prefects, even if they lack episcopal dignity, can do the same, namely impart the papal blessing with a plenary indulgence according to the prescribed formula, in their territories on only one of the more solemn days during the year (cited canon).

c) Regulars who have the privilege of imparting the papal blessing are not only bound by the obligation of observing the prescribed formula, but also cannot use this privilege except in their own churches and in the churches of nuns or tertiaries lawfully aggregated to their Order; but not on the same day and in the same place[2] where the Bishop imparts it (canon 915).[3]

d) A pastor or another priest who assists the sick has the faculty of granting to them the apostolic blessing with a plenary indulgence at the point of death, according to the form handed down by approved liturgical books, and he should not omit to impart this blessing (canon 468, § 2).

e) Bishops, Abbots or Prelates nullius, Apostolic Vicars and Prefects, and major Superiors of exempt clerical religious institutes can designate and declare one daily perpetual privileged altar, provided another is not already had, in their cathedral, abbatial, collegiate, conventual, parochial, and quasi-parochial churches, but not in public or semi-public oratories, unless they are united to a parish church or are subsidiary to it (canon 916).

2. As regards partial indulgences.

a) Cardinals, from their promotion in Consistory, enjoy the faculty of granting indulgences of two hundred days, even to be gained as often as often, in places or institutes and for persons of their jurisdiction or protection; likewise in other places, but to be gained only by those present, on each occasion (canon 239, § 1, 24°).

b) Metropolitans or Archbishops can grant indulgences of one hundred days both in their own diocese and in suffragan dioceses (canon 274, 2°).

c) Residential Bishops, from taking possession of the diocese, enjoy the right of granting indulgences of fifty days in places of their jurisdiction (canon 349, § 2, 2°). But the words "in places of their jurisdiction" are not to be understood so that Bishops are prohibited from granting indulgences to exempt religious or in their churches.[4]

d) Apostolic Vicars and Prefects, even those who lack episcopal character, possess the same faculty as residential Bishops (canon 294, § 2).

e) The consecrating Bishop, when a church or altar is consecrated, even though he lacks jurisdiction in the territory, grants an indulgence of one year to those visiting the church or altar on the day of the consecration itself; but on the anniversary day, one of fifty days if he is a Bishop, one hundred if an Archbishop, and two hundred if a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church (canon 1166, § 3). Capitular Vicars and Vicars General lack ordinary power of granting indulgences, since the Law does not enumerate them. They therefore, like the others not enumerated above, cannot grant indulgences except by commission or delegation of the Supreme Pontiff or of another to whom the faculty of delegating has been expressly granted.

f) What Nuncios can do is to be drawn from their letters.

Note 1. Those inferior to the Roman Pontiff cannot: 1. commit to others the faculty of granting indulgences, unless this has been expressly granted to them by the Apostolic See; 2. grant indulgences applicable to the departed; 3. add other indulgences to the same thing or act of piety or sodality to which indulgences have already been granted by the Apostolic See or by another, unless new conditions to be fulfilled are prescribed (canon 913).

Note 2. Generals of Orders and Prelates of Religious, having regard to common law, enjoy no power of issuing Indulgences; but some of them have the privilege of reserving to themselves and of granting to others the faculty of imparting certain blessings - for example, the blessing of a rosary of the Most Holy Rosary - to which Indulgences are attached.[5]

[1] A.A.S. XXII, p. 195.

[2] Cited place: in the city, town (Brief of Leo XIII, July 2, 1882).

[3] Here, however, the matter is not the papal blessing which religious missionaries are permitted to impart at the end of missions or in similar circumstances, but the privilege by which regulars, without another condition of function, are able to impart that blessing (Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis, 5th ed., II, n. 1112).

[4] Pontifical Commission, December 6, 1930 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 25).

[5] Fanfani, cited work, p. 17.

486 III. Interpretation of the power of granting indulgences. Both ordinary and delegated power must be interpreted according to the proper meaning of the words and the common usage of speech; but in doubt it is to be taken broadly (canons 49, 50; St. Alphonsus, 534).

487 IV. Use of the power of granting indulgences.

1. In order that a concession be valid, a just cause is required. The reason is that the Supreme Pontiff is not the owner of the treasury of the Church, but has been constituted only its dispenser. But a dispenser is not judged to have been granted the faculty of disposing of goods at will, that is, without a just cause (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 25, a. 2; St. Alphonsus, n. 532).
2. Furthermore, for liceity there is required a cause proportioned to the quantity of the indulgence, so that for a greater indulgence a greater cause is required. But the gravity of the cause is to be judged "not only from the difficulty of the work, but from the intended end and the usefulness of the work for that end" (St. Alphonsus, cited place).

It is disputed whether the proportion of the cause is required for validity. Now with St. Alphonsus (cited place) and the more common opinion, it seems one must affirm this, because a dispenser does not seem to have been granted the faculty of disposing prodigally of goods. Besides this, once an indulgence has been granted, a proportionate cause is always presumed to be present. Furthermore, even if a proportionate cause were lacking, nevertheless the privileges attached to the indulgence would certainly be valid, for example the faculty of absolving from reserved cases, since these are matters of ecclesiastical law.

Note. The Supreme Pontiff or a Bishop can sometimes grant an indulgence without the injunction of any work, because there can be a just and reasonable cause for granting an indulgence in this way, for example to a worthy man, or at the point of death.[1]

[1] Aertnys-Damen, Theologia Moralis, 11th ed., II, n. 1113.

488 V. Publication of granted indulgences.

1. Indulgences promulgated at Rome need no further publication. Indulgences are understood to have been promulgated at Rome whether they have been granted through Briefs or through decrees contained in the Acta Apostolicae Sedis.
2. New indulgences, even those granted to churches of regulars, which have not been promulgated at Rome, are not to be published abroad without consulting the Ordinary of the place. In publishing books, booklets, etc., in which concessions of indulgences for various prayers or pious works are listed, the prescription of canon 1388 is to be observed.[1]
3. Those who have obtained from the Supreme Pontiff concessions of indulgences for all the faithful are bound, under penalty of the nullity of the grace obtained, to bring authentic copies of those concessions to the Sacred Penitentiary (canon 920). It is said:

1. Concessions for all the faithful. Indulgences granted for all the faithful are understood as those which all the faithful can always and everywhere gain without the special use of a blessed thing, or participation in a pious confraternity, or visitation of a determinate church.[2]
2. Authentic copies, that is, a written document, either signed by the Supreme Pontiff's own hand or subscribed by a Cardinal of the Holy Roman Church, which testifies to an oral oracle.

[1] That canon states: all books of indulgences, summaries, booklets, sheets, etc., in which their concessions are contained, are not to be published without the license of the Ordinary of the place. But the express license of the Apostolic See is required in order that it be lawful to publish in print, in any language, both the authentic collection of prayers and pious works to which the Apostolic See has attached indulgences, and the list of apostolic indulgences, and a summary of indulgences either previously collected but never approved, or now for the first time to be gathered from diverse concessions.

[2] Beringer-Steinen, cited work, I, n. 199-200.

489 VI. Interpretation of some indulgences granted or to be granted.

1. A plenary indulgence granted for the feasts of Our Lord Jesus Christ or for the feasts of the Blessed Virgin Mary is understood to have been granted only for the feasts which are found in the universal calendar. A plenary or partial indulgence granted for the feasts of the Apostles is understood to have been granted only for their natal feast. A plenary indulgence granted as daily perpetual, or for a time, to those visiting some church or public oratory is to be understood in such a way that on any day, but only once in the year, it can be acquired by each member of the faithful, unless something else is expressly said in the decree (canon 921).
2. An indulgence affixed to some Feast is acquired by the faithful on the fixed day duly constituted in their Diocese; by Regular Orders, on the fixed day duly constituted in their Calendar; by those enrolled in a sodality of some Regular Order, on the fixed day duly constituted in the Calendar of the Diocese or in the Calendar of the Order, but not on both days. Thus the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences.[1]
3. When a plenary indulgence once in a month is granted to those who have performed a certain good work through an entire month, the month is not necessarily to be computed from the first day to the last, but is understood as a continuous space of a month, that is, of thirty days.[2]

[1] August 29, 1864; January 12, 1878.

[2] Aertnys-Damen, II, n. 1120.

Scholion. On the Faculty of Blessing Things with the Application of Indulgences

490 I. One who has received the faculty of blessing crosses, medals, scapulars, rosaries, etc., with the application of indulgences, is not bound to exhibit it to the Ordinary unless this is expressed in the concession.[1] One who has obtained the faculty of privately blessing pious things with the application of indulgences cannot use that faculty publicly, for example in a church or oratory before the faithful gathered there and holding in their hands the things to be blessed.[2]

II. As regards the form or rite to be observed in blessings, hold these things:

1. The ordinary or customary form - which is done by forming the cross over the thing to be blessed, without pronouncing any formula and without sprinkling holy water - suffices for crosses, medals, and rosaries, except, however, rosaries of the Most Holy Rosary and of the Seven Sorrows;[3] it also suffices for crucifixes with a plenary indulgence at the point of death; likewise for the crucifix of the Way of the Cross in favor of the faithful who are impeded; and it always seems to suffice when no proper form is prescribed. In that case, the sign of the cross with the words "In the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit," together with the sprinkling of holy water over the object to which indulgences are to be attached, certainly suffices.[4]

2. The proper form must be used for rosaries of the Most Holy Rosary and of the Seven Sorrows, for crosses of the stations of the Way of the Cross, for a plenary indulgence at the point of death or the Apostolic Blessing, as it is called, for enrollment in the Confraternity of the sacred Scapular, etc.[5]

Cardinals, by canon 239, § 1, 5° and 6°, from their promotion enjoy the faculty of blessing everywhere, by the sign of the cross alone, with all the indulgences customarily granted by the Holy See, rosaries and other prayer-beads, crosses, medals, statues, and scapulars approved by the Apostolic See, and of imposing them without the burden of registration; likewise, by a single blessing, of erecting in churches and oratories, even private ones, and other pious places, stations of the Way of the Cross with all the indulgences which have been imparted to those performing such a pious exercise; and also of blessing for the faithful who, because of illness or another legitimate impediment, cannot visit the sacred stations of the Way of the Cross, Crucifix images with the application of all indulgences attached by the Roman Pontiffs to the devout exercise of the same Way of the Cross.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 5, 1841.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 7, 1843.

[3] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, April 14, 1840; January 7, 1843; February 29, 1864; Holy Office, May 18, 1914 (A.A.S., p. 346).

[4] Cf. Beringer-Steinen, cited work, I, n. 836.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 5, 1841; March 12, 1855; February 29, 1864; March 22, 1879.

Section III. On the Gaining of Indulgences

First one must speak of the subject capable of gaining indulgences; then of the requisites so that a capable subject may gain indulgences.

Chapter I. On the Subject Capable of Gaining Indulgences

491 In order that someone be capable of gaining indulgences for himself, he must be baptized, not excommunicated, in the state of grace at least at the end of the prescribed works, and a subject of the one granting (canon 925, § 1). It is said:

1. For himself. To what extent the enumerated things are required so that someone may apply an indulgence to the departed, we shall say later.
2. Baptized; because the Church lacks jurisdiction over the non-baptized, even over catechumens.
3. Not excommunicated, because the concession of indulgences belongs to the communion of Saints, of which the Church deprives the excommunicated.

It can be disputed whether material heretics and schismatics can acquire indulgences. It seems one must deny this; for such heretics and schismatics indeed belong by will to the body of the Church, but in the external forum they seem to be considered by the Church as formal heretics and schismatics; for she does not judge concerning internal matters. Now in this case the Church does not seem to extend her act of jurisdiction to those who are considered by her, in the external forum, as formal heretics.

4. In the state of grace at least at the end of the works. The reason is that "a dead member does not receive influence from the other living members; but one who is in mortal sin is, as it were, a dead member; therefore through indulgences he does not receive influence from the merits of the living members" (St. Thomas, Supplement, q. 27, a. 1). Added to this is the response of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences,[1] which declares that the sense of the clause "with heart at least contrite" is that contrition is required "insofar as someone placed in mortal sin and therefore incapable of gaining any indulgence is restored to the state of grace by perfect contrition with the purpose of confession, and becomes capable of obtaining indulgences." Finally, canon 925, § 1 absolutely requires the state of grace in order that someone acquire an indulgence for himself. Hence even if it were admitted that the Church can grant a partial indulgence to one constituted in mortal sin, namely the remission of punishment due because of sins already previously remitted, nevertheless that this actually occurs seems altogether to have to be denied (St. Alphonsus, n. 534, under 9).

To what extent the state of grace is required so that someone may apply an indulgence to the departed, we shall investigate immediately.

This, however, is the place for noting these words of St. Alphonsus: "No one gains a plenary indulgence of all sins unless he is free from every guilt, even venial, when he completes the last work... for it is certain that venial sin not remitted as to guilt cannot be remitted as to punishment... That venial sin, however, does not prevent the punishment due to other sins already remitted from being remitted" (n. 534, under 19). Hence nothing of itself prevents one who lacks the disposition required for gaining a plenary indulgence integrally from gaining it partially. And in fact canon 926 states: a plenary indulgence granted in such a way is understood so that, if someone cannot gain it plenarily, nevertheless he gains it partially according to the disposition which he has.

5. A subject of the one granting, because an act of jurisdiction, such as is the concession of an indulgence for the living, can be exercised only upon subjects. But since an indulgence is granted after the manner of a privilege, nothing prevents non-subjects also, after it has been granted, from being able to gain it according to the norm of canon 927: unless something else appears from the tenor of the concession, indulgences granted by a Bishop can be gained both by subjects outside the territory and by pilgrims, vagi, and all exempt persons dwelling in the territory.

[1] December 17, 1870.

Chapter II. On the Requisites So That a Capable Subject May Gain Indulgences

492 But in order, thus canon 925, § 2, that a capable subject actually gain them, he must have at least a general intention of acquiring them and fulfill the enjoined works at the appointed time and in the due manner according to the tenor of the concession.

Therefore, first, intention is required, because the Church does not bestow her benefits except on one willing. But a general intention suffices, by which someone wills to gain all the indulgences which he can gain through the works to be performed; and this can be habitual, that is, once elicited and not retracted (St. Alphonsus, VI, 534, 14°). Namely, the Church, on whose benign mind this whole matter depends, is not judged to require a virtual intention, much less an actual one; indeed canon 925, § 2, which speaks only of intention without addition, sufficiently signifies that every intention, even habitual, suffices. Nevertheless, it is advised that each morning one elicit the intention of gaining all indulgences perhaps attached to the works to be performed during the day.[1] Finally, an implicit intention seems to suffice, that is, one by which someone wills that his works profit as much as they will be able to profit.[2]

Besides intention, fulfillment of the enjoined works is required, concerning which one must treat more fully. We shall speak first of the works to be fulfilled generally, then of some works in particular, finally of the commutation of works.

[1] Cf. Raccolta, p. XI.

[2] Raccolta, VIII.

493 I. Works to be fulfilled considered generally. The fulfillment of works is a condition without which an indulgence cannot be acquired, so that neither ignorance, nor good faith, nor impotence excuses anyone. Nor does it help to substitute a work equivalent to, or even more excellent than, the prescribed work. But the works must be fulfilled integrally, personally, morally well, at the appointed time, and in the due manner. It is said:

1. Personally; except, however, almsgiving, according to what will be said in n. 566.
2. Integrally. "But if one of the enjoined works is omitted, either wholly or in a notable part, through ignorance, negligence, or impotence... except in the case of legitimate commutation, the indulgence is not acquired."[1] Nevertheless, omission of a slight part, both in itself and with respect to the prescribed work, does not stand in the way of gaining the indulgence, as if you eat a little in a fast, or in the recitation of the Rosary omit three Hail Marys. The reason is that the work is judged to have been placed morally. It is otherwise if, for example, from the five Our Fathers and Hail Marys prescribed, one is omitted (St. Alphonsus, n. 534, under 14 and 16). What must be kept before one's eyes if a particular prayer is assigned, see n. 507.
3. Morally well, according to what was said in volume I, n. 242; hence an act not even partly good, such as an act placed from vanity alone, is unsuited for gaining an indulgence.
4. At the appointed time. Now the determination of time is for beginning and for ending the privilege, so that fulfillment carried out before or after the assigned time is invalid.
5. In the due manner, for example if a prayer is established as to be recited kneeling. It does not matter in what order the works are fulfilled.[2]

Note 1. By a work which someone is bound by law or precept to perform, an indulgence cannot be gained, unless something else is expressly said in the concession of the same; nevertheless, one who performs a work enjoined on him as sacramental penance and perhaps enriched with indulgences can at the same time both satisfy the penance and gain the indulgences (canon 932). Hence someone cannot gain an indulgence by reciting the canonical hours owed. Sacramental penance is excepted, as the cited canon has it; likewise Easter communion, as the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences declared,[3] excepting, however, the case in which the indulgence is granted in the form of a jubilee. Those things imposed by a rule are also excepted, if the rule does not oblige under sin. Nor does anything prevent someone from gaining an indulgence by performing a work owed by vow or promise, because a vow and promise are neither law nor precept.

Note 2. By one and the same work, to which indulgences are attached by various titles, several indulgences cannot be acquired, unless the required work is confession or communion, or unless something else has been expressly provided (canon 933). Thus, for example, since it has been expressly provided, Apostolic indulgences and those of the Most Holy Rosary, perhaps attached to a rosary, can be acquired at the same time;[4] likewise indulgences of the Most Holy Rosary and of the Cross-bearers, attached to the same rosary.[5]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 19, 1759 (Decreta authentica, n. 214).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 19, 1759 (Decreta authentica, n. 214).

[3] December 13, 1841; May 10, 1844.

[4] Sacred Penitentiary, February 17, 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 143); June 14, 1922 (A.A.S. 1922, p. 394).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 12, 1907.

494 II. Works to be fulfilled considered in particular. The works which are rather often prescribed for gaining at least a plenary indulgence are: Confession, Holy Communion, visitation of some church or public oratory, and prayer according to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff. That these are designated by the well-known clause "under the usual conditions" is clear from the new collection published by order of the Sacred Penitentiary and approved by the decree of February 22, 1929.[1]

[1] A.A.S. 1929, p. 200.

495

1. Confession. Whenever an indulgence is granted with the clause "to the contrite and confessed" or a similar clause, sacramental confession is established as a condition, even for those who do not have mortal sin, although absolution is not required for these.[1] Nevertheless:

a) For gaining any indulgences whatever, the confession perhaps required can be made within the eight days which immediately precede the day to which the indulgence was affixed, and likewise within the whole subsequent octave (canon 931, § 1).

b) For gaining indulgences granted for pious exercises of three or more days, confession can also be made within the octave which immediately follows the completed exercise (canon 931, § 2).

c) Actual confession is necessary for gaining no indulgence for those who are accustomed, unless legitimately impeded, to approach the sacrament of penance at least twice in the month, or to receive Holy Communion daily in the state of grace and with a right and pious mind, although once or twice during the week they abstain from it (cf. canon 931, § 3). Except the indulgences of either an ordinary or extraordinary jubilee or in the likeness of a jubilee (cited canon).

[1] If the clause "with heart at least contrite" is added in the concession of an indulgence, it signifies this one thing: that the state of grace is required for the indulgence to be acquired; it does not require that one who is in the state of grace elicit an act of contrition (Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 17, 1870, Decreta authentica, n. 427). The same is signified if an indulgence is said to be granted "in the customary form of the Church."

496

2. Holy Communion. This can be received in any church, etc., even if the visitation of a determinate church is prescribed. Besides this:

a) Communion can be received on the vigil of the day to which the indulgence is affixed and within the whole subsequent octave (canon 931, § 1).

b) For gaining indulgences granted for pious exercises of three or more days, communion can also be made within the octave which immediately follows the completed exercise (canon 931, § 2).

497

3. Visitation of a church; concerning this, observe:

a) Visitation of a church requires entrance into it, and indeed with the intention of worshiping God.[1] If, however, because of the multitude of the faithful someone cannot enter it, it suffices to join himself to the multitude (St. Alphonsus, n. 538, q. 10). But if the visitation of the church is made processionally, it does not suffice, for carrying out the prescribed visitation, that the clergy and people pass by praying before the Church, nor that the clergy with some from the procession enter the church and recite the common prayer while the rest remain outside the church; rather, it is required that all who can be contained in it enter the church and recite the common prayer there.[2] Entrance into the church for the purpose of receiving Holy Communion can also be counted for the visitation.

b) If the visitation of a determinate church or public oratory is prescribed, these must be visited. If the visitation of a non-determinate church is prescribed, it suffices to visit any church or public oratory, but not a semi-public or private one. Nevertheless:

1. Whenever for gaining indulgences there is prescribed the visitation of some non-determinate church or of some indeterminate public oratory, the faithful of either sex who, for the sake of the pursuit of perfection, or of instruction or education, or even of health, live a common life in houses lacking a church or public chapel and established with the consent of the Ordinaries, and likewise all persons dwelling there to minister to them, can visit the chapel of their own house in which they can satisfy by law the obligation of hearing Mass, provided they have duly performed the other enjoined works (cf. canon 929).[3]
2. Cardinals from their promotion in Consistory, Archbishops, and Bishops enjoy the faculty of gaining in their own chapels indulgences for the acquiring of which the visitation of some temple or public shrine of the city or place in which the Cardinals actually reside has been prescribed, and their household members can also enjoy this privilege (canon 239, § 1, 11°; canon 349, § 1, 10°).

Finally, if the visitation of a determinate chapel or altar is prescribed, it does not suffice merely to enter the church; rather, it is necessary to betake oneself to the determinate chapel or altar, or at least to stand in a place from which the chapel or altar can be seen.[4]

c) For gaining an indulgence affixed to some day, if the visitation of a church or oratory is required, this can be done from noon of the preceding day up to the midnight which closes the appointed day (canon 923).

d) One who wishes to gain several indulgences, each of which requires visitation of a church, is bound to make as many visitations - namely, by going out after each visitation and entering again - as the indulgences he intends to gain. This also holds if some indulgence can be acquired as often as the church is visited.[5]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 19, 1759 (Decreta authentica, n. 214); August 20, 1822 (Decreta authentica, n. 253, to II); December 15, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 295).

[2] Raccolta, p. XVI.

[3] The concession cannot be applied to the Portiuncula indulgence, since for it the visitation of a determinate church is prescribed, unless nevertheless this has been specially granted to some persons (A.A.S. XVI, p. 346, to VI).

[4] Adrian VI, April 1, 1523; Clement VIII, April 4, 1524; Fanfani, cited work, p. 47.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 29, 1864 (Decreta authentica, n. 399, to II and III).

4. Recitation of prayers, which, if visitation of a church is prescribed, is usually imposed as to be made in the visitation itself. Besides this, observe:

a) If, for gaining indulgences, prayer in general according to the mind of the Supreme Pontiff[1] is prescribed, mental prayer alone does not suffice; but vocal prayer can be chosen at the judgment of the faithful, unless some particular prayer is assigned (canon 934, § 1). Therefore, in the case posited, mental prayer alone does not suffice; yet it is enough to add some vocal prayer - not, however, a minimal one - to mental prayer (St. Alphonsus, n. 538, q. 10).[2]

According to the common opinion, five Our Fathers and Hail Marys suffice, or equivalents to be chosen at will, unless a particular prayer is prescribed. But for gaining the Portiuncula Indulgence, by decree of the Sacred Penitentiary dated July 10, 1924, the recitation of six Our Fathers, Hail Marys, and Glory Bes is required, and other equivalent prayers cannot be recited.[3]

b) If a particular prayer has been assigned, indulgences can be acquired in whatever language the prayer is recited, provided that the fidelity of the version is established from a declaration either of the Sacred Penitentiary or of one of the Ordinaries of the place where the language into which the prayer is translated is vernacular; but indulgences entirely cease because of any addition, subtraction, or interpolation (canon 934, § 2). Hence, for example, indulgences are not acquired if, in sung litanies of the Blessed Virgin Mary, the Kyrie eleison is sung only once, nor if after each title Ora pro nobis is not recited.[4] But the custom of announcing before each decade the mystery to be meditated upon does not seem to harm, since in the case there is no interpolation in the prayers themselves. As regards the practice of recalling the mystery in the middle of the Angelic Salutation, the Sacred Penitentiary, privately asked, declared[5] that it cannot be kept and propagated while the indulgences remain intact. Nevertheless, the same Congregation judges that by canon 934, § 3 there was in no way revoked the indult by which Pius IX in the year 1859, for places where the custom had already grown up, granted that the faithful reciting the Rosary in such a manner could gain its indulgences; and Benedict XV, at the petition of the Sacred Penitentiary, extended that indult to all who according to the aforesaid custom had been accustomed to recite the Holy Rosary in any places whatever.[6]

c) For the acquisition of indulgences, it is enough to recite the prayer alternately with a companion, or to follow it mentally while it is recited by another (canon 934, § 3).

d) Mutes can gain indulgences attached to public prayers if, together with the rest of the faithful praying in the same place, they lift up their mind and pious sentiments to God; and if the matter concerns private prayers, it is enough that they recall them mentally, or express them by signs, or merely run through them with the eyes (canon 936). Finally, by concession of Benedict XV, maimed persons can gain indulgences for the gaining of which the recitation of prayers together with some bodily act which they are unable to perform is enjoined, by pouring forth prayers alone.[7]

Finally, I note that by the faithful enrolled in some sodality, indulgences granted to the sodality can be acquired even if they do not observe the statutes of the society,[8] provided they fulfill the works imposed for the indulgences.

Question. Whether one who performs the enjoined works more perfectly, for example with greater fervor, becomes a participant in the indulgence in a greater measure than one who acts less perfectly.

Response 1. Of itself, no; because the Church is content with common fervor, and in applying the indulgence does not take account of that which is performed beyond what is due.

Response 2. Incidentally, it will easily happen that one who performs beyond what is due participates more in the indulgence, insofar namely as contrition, and therefore remission of guilt, is more universal.

[1] The Supreme Pontiff intends the prosperity and exaltation of the Church, the extirpation of heresies, the conversion of sinners, and finally the peace of the Christian people.

[2] Cf. Benedict XIV, Constitution Inter praeteritos, § 83.

[3] A.A.S. XVI, p. 343, to IX; Sacred Penitentiary, January 30, 1930 (A.A.S. 1930, p. 43).

[4] Sacred Penitentiary, July 21, 1919.

[5] July 27, 1920.

[6] Sacred Penitentiary, January 22, 1921 (A.A.S. 1921, p. 163).

[7] Sacred Penitentiary, October 22, 1917 (A.A.S. 1917, p. 539).

[8] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 25, 1842 (Decreta authentica, n. 298, to II); cf. canon 692.

499 III. Commutation of works. Confessors can commute pious works enjoined for gaining indulgences into others for those who, detained by a legitimate impediment, cannot perform the same works (canon 935). To pious works here do not belong those which constitute the cause or occasion of the indulgence, as, for example, the use of a crucifix which ought to supply for the Way of the Cross. By confessor is understood one who enjoys sacramental jurisdiction over the faithful person to whom commutation seems to be granted, so that he can at least validly hear the confession. Commutation, however, can be made not only within confession, but also outside confession (St. Alphonsus, n. 534, 15°).

Members of some confraternity who, because of illness or imprisonment, are impeded from visiting the church, can gain the indulgences granted to the confraternity, even with the visitation perhaps prescribed being omitted.[1]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 20, 1887 (Collectanea, n. 1680).

500 Question. To what extent several indulgences can be acquired on the same day.

Response 1. A plenary indulgence, unless something else has been expressly provided, can be acquired only once in the day, even if the same prescribed work is placed several times (canon 928, § 1).

Response 2. A partial indulgence, unless the contrary is expressly noted, can be gained several times during the day, the same work being repeated (canon 928, § 2).

Response 3. As is sufficiently clear of itself, diverse indulgences can be acquired on the same day, provided the works enjoined for each are fulfilled, or if the same works are prescribed, are repeated insofar as they must be repeated. Now one and the same confession and communion suffices for gaining several indulgences (n. 502).[1] The faculty of gaining diverse indulgences on the same day regards both indulgences concurring on one day because of a festivity, and those which someone out of his devotion has affixed to such a day in the week or month.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 29, 1864; January 12, 1878 (Decreta authentica, n. 434, to 3).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 29, 1864.

Scholion. On the Application of Indulgences to the Souls in Purgatory

501 Preliminary note. Although the Supreme Pontiff can grant that we gain indulgences for other living persons, in fact, the Pontiff himself so disposing, no one acquiring indulgences can apply them to others living in this life (canon 930).[1] As regards the application of indulgences to the souls in purgatory, however, we note these things:

[1] The "privilege of the altar for the dying" does not conflict with the cited canon, because in that case the priest celebrating does not acquire the indulgence; rather, the indulgence attached to the Holy Mass is applied directly by the Church to the dying person by way of absolution. Hence the Holy Office, November 9, 1922, to 1, answered affirmatively to the question whether, after canon 930 of the new Code, the existence of an altar for the dying still persisted.

502 I. The power of the Supreme Pontiff to grant indulgences for the departed. That the Supreme Pontiff enjoys this faculty is proximate to faith, because of the condemnation, and that repeated several times, of the contrary opinion.[1] It is established from the practice of the Church, by which the Supreme Pontiffs have established various indulgences applicable to souls in purgatory; and it follows from the dogma of the communion of Saints, by virtue of which a mutual communication of goods has place in the Church.

The manner of granting indulgences for the departed was explained above, on p. 377.

[1] Thus, for example, proposition 42 condemned by Pius VI against the Synod of Pistoia (Denzinger-Bannwart, n. 1542).

503 II. Requisites so that one acquiring indulgences may apply them to the departed. It is required: 1. that the Supreme Pontiff has granted them as applicable to the departed; since, as canon 913, 2°, states, those inferior to the Roman Pontiff cannot grant indulgences applicable to the departed. Besides this, all indulgences granted by the Roman Pontiff, unless something else is established, are applicable to souls in purgatory (canon 930). 2. The intention of the one acquiring is required, by which he wills this and determines, in general or in particular, to whom the indulgence acquired by him is to be applied. The reason is that the Supreme Pontiff makes indulgences only applicable, as follows from canon 913, 2°, and 930. A virtual intention suffices, or even, because the matter concerns a quasi-donation, a habitual one.

It is disputed whether the state of grace is required in the one gaining. The Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, when asked several times concerning this matter, answered on August 20, 1822: Deferred; and on February 22, 1847: Let approved authors be consulted. Now from the approved authors, some[1] deny it, because the state of grace is required only as a disposition for obtaining the effect of the indulgence, that is, the remission of punishment. Therefore, if the effect is to be received by the departed person, it suffices that this person be in the state of grace, but the said state is not required in the living person who fulfills the conditions of the indulgence. Nevertheless, with St. Alphonsus (n. 534, under 10) and others,[2] it seems the contrary must be admitted. For by granting indulgences for the departed, the Supreme Pontiff constitutes them only as applicable, as follows both from concessions of the Supreme Pontiff and from canon 913, 2°, and canon 930; in other words, he grants to the faithful a certain right in the satisfactions of Christ and the Saints, or at least a right of offering those same satisfactions to God in the name of the Church. Now, if the matter concerns a sinner, the former cannot be admitted, since a sinner cannot merit any satisfaction for himself. As regards the latter, it likewise is admitted with difficulty that a right of this kind is granted to a subject who, even at the end of the works to be performed by him, persists in enmity with God; all the more because then the Church would grant to a sinner the faculty of doing for others what he cannot do for himself as regards previously remitted sins.

To what extent indulgences applied to the departed produce an infallible effect was explained above, on p. 377.

[1] St. Bellarmine, De Indulgentiis, book I, chapter 14; Billuart, De Indulgentiis, single dissertation, article 6.

[2] De Lugo, Disputation XXVII, n. 75; Tournely, De Poenitentia, last question, article 6; Wignandt, Tribunal Confessariorum, treatise 14, n. 96.

504 III. The measure according to which an indulgence comes to the departed.

1. If the indulgence is plenary and is applied to one person, it is understood, if we suppose that God assents to the Church making suffrage, to remit all the remaining punishments of the soul. If it is plenary and is applied to several or to all, which can be done,[1] the distribution is left to Divine Providence.
2. If the indulgence is partial, for example of one year, it is understood to remit so much punishment as would be remitted to someone if for a year he performed the penance once customarily imposed for sins according to the canons. If it is partial and is applied to several or to all, the distribution is left to the Providence of God.

[1] Raccolta, p. XI.

Section IV. On the Transfer, Suspension, and Cessation of Indulgences

505 I. Transfer of indulgences consists in this, that they are transferred from one place to another or from one time to another. Some things must be noted only about transfer with respect to time. Now, having regard to canon 922:

1. If the external solemnity of a feast is transferred, the indulgences attached to the feast are transferred to the day on which the external solemnity is held; otherwise, if only the Office and Mass are transferred and the external solemnity is held on the proper day.
2. If the matter concerns feasts which are celebrated without external solemnity, then the indulgences are transferred if the feast is only occasionally transferred.
3. Indulgences attached to sacred supplications or to novendial, septenary, or triduan prayers, which are performed before or after the feast or even while its octave lasts, are transferred or not transferred according as the indulgences attached to the feast day itself are transferred or not transferred.

Note. Nevertheless, observe that the same indulgence cannot be acquired twice, even at a different time. Thus one who, for example, in one diocese has gained the indulgence attached to the feast of the Immaculate Conception cannot gain the same indulgence again in another diocese if he is there on the day on which the external solemnity of the feast is celebrated in that place.[1] But for the Portiuncula Indulgence it was declared on January 13, 1930[2] that Christ's faithful can obtain it on the second day of the month in one church and on the Sunday next following in another church where that day has been substituted according to the norm of the Decree of the Sacred Penitentiary dated July 10, 1924, to VII.[3]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 12, 1878 (Decreta authentica, n. 435, to III).

[2] A.A.S. 1930, p. 23.

[3] A.A.S. 1924, p. 346.

506 II. Suspension of indulgences consists in this, that indulgences cease for a time, but when the time has passed, they revive without a new act of the superior. Now:

1. Indulgences attached to some church are suspended if the church is overturned from its foundations; they revive, however, if within fifty years it is built in the same or almost the same place and under the same title (canon 924, § 1). It is said "almost the same place," that is, at a small distance, for example twenty or thirty paces. If a church is renewed even totally through successive repairs, the indulgences persist.

2. Likewise indulgences attached to an altar are suspended if the altar is destroyed; but they revive if it is rebuilt under the same title and in the same church, even in another place.[1] Indulgences attached to a mission cross are continued if a new cross is substituted for a fallen or destroyed cross, provided the new cross is erected in the same or almost the same place, with at least the tacit consent of the Bishop.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 16, 1623† (Decreta authentica, n. 317); July 18, 1902 (A.S.S. 1902, p. 62).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 22, 1888 (cf. Analecta ecclesiastica 1902, p. 261); July 20, 1901.

507 III. Cessation of indulgences has place:

1. By the lapse of the time for which they were granted.

2. By revocation by the one granting or his Superior.

3. By the death of the one granting or by the resolution of his right, they cease only if they were given with the clause "at our good pleasure," or another equivalent clause; but not if they were given absolutely, without a clause, or with the clause "at the good pleasure of the Holy See" or a similar one (cf. canons 70 and 73).

4. By the death of the one to whom the indulgences were granted, if the matter concerns a purely personal privilege; likewise by the extinction of a Confraternity, if the extinction lawfully had place; otherwise, if unlawfully, in which case the indulgences revive when the Confraternity has been restored.[1]

5. By the destruction or sale of the thing enriched with indulgences; namely, canon 924, § 2 states: Indulgences attached to rosaries or other things cease only when the rosaries or other things entirely cease to be or are sold. The exchange of one thing for another, however, seems to be equivalent to sale.[2]

Therefore indulgences do not cease because a price is paid after the rosary or blessed thing has been blessed, provided the sale itself had place before the blessing; nor do they cease from the fact that rosaries, crosses, etc., enriched with indulgences are given or lent to another for gaining indulgences; and this holds even if the one giving or lending the said rosaries, crosses, etc., has already used them for acquiring indulgences.[3] Nor is it an obstacle that something is received or even asked, provided it is not done under the title of sale.

As regards rosaries, note that the indulgences are attached to the beads; hence the chain can be changed. If the beads are bound by a thread and this is broken so that the beads are gathered into one, the indulgences seem to be suspended and, when the rosary has been restored, to revive.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 26, 1840 (Decreta authentica, n. 285).

[2] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 4, 1721 (Decreta authentica, n. 78).

[3] Cf. Sacred Penitentiary, February 18, 1921 (A.A.S. 1921, p. 164).

Part II. On Some Indulgences in Species

Section I. On the Privileged Altar

508 I. Notion. The privilege of an altar is a privilege by virtue of which a plenary indulgence, under certain conditions, is attached to the celebration of Mass. This indulgence indeed has chiefly been granted for the departed, but sometimes also for the living.[1] Today, however, it is usually granted for the departed only. As regards it, the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences responded on July 28, 1840 - and these things otherwise agree with general principles - that "by an indulgence attached to a privileged altar, if the mind of the one granting and the use of the power of the keys are considered, there is to be understood a plenary indulgence which immediately frees the soul from all the punishments of Purgatory; but if the effect of the application is considered, there is to be understood an Indulgence whose measure corresponds to the good pleasure and acceptance of divine mercy."[2] Now this indulgence obtains its effect more certainly than others, insofar as on the part of the priest it requires nothing except the application of the Mass (n. 521).

As regards the sense of the privilege, observe furthermore: the indulgence is applied only to him for whom the Mass is said,[3] and indeed only to one person, even if the Mass is celebrated for several.[4]

[1] If this indulgence has been granted for the living and the departed, it "is to be interpreted in such a way that a Plenary Indulgence is understood to be granted both for the living, if the sacrifice of the Mass is applied on the altar in question, and for the departed, if the Holy Sacrifice is applied for them: for the living by way of jurisdiction, for the departed by way of suffrage" (Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 25, 1897).

[2] Decreta authentica, n. 283.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 18, 1885; August 25, 1897.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 29, 1864 (Decreta authentica, n. 402, to I); June 19, 1880 (Decreta authentica, n. 451, to II).

509 II. Division. The privilege is distinguished as local, which is attached to an altar, so that all celebrating on it enjoy the privilege; personal, which inheres in the priest, so that, on whatever altar he celebrates, he enjoys the privilege; and mixed, which affects both altar and priest, so that only determinate priests, for example members of some Confraternity celebrating on such an altar, possess the privilege.

510 III. Local privilege.

1. First note these things, although less properly they constitute a local privilege: on the day of the Commemoration of all the faithful departed, all Masses enjoy the privilege as if they were celebrated at a privileged altar (canon 917, § 1).
2. All altars of a church, during those days on which the supplication of the Forty Hours is held in it, are privileged (canon 917, § 2). Understand: provided that in that supplication those things are observed which Pius X established by decree of the Holy Office on June 22, 1914.[1]
3. Who besides the Roman Pontiff can designate some privileged altar, and to what extent, see n. 494.

Note 1. In order that the privilege be attached to some altar, the altar must be fixed. But it suffices that it be fixed in the broad sense, or such that its structure has some firmness, insofar namely as, even if it is not fixed to a wall, nevertheless ordinarily it is not moved, although it could be moved.[2] It is not an obstacle that the consecrated stone can be removed or another substituted for it.[3] To what extent the privilege revives if a destroyed altar is rebuilt, see n. 515.

Note 2. In order to indicate that an altar is privileged, nothing else should be inscribed except: privileged altar, perpetual or for a time, daily or not, according to the words of the concession (canon 918, § 1).

[1] A.A.S. 1914, p. 74.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, July 18, 1902.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 27, 1843 (Decreta authentica, n. 324).

511 IV. Personal privilege. By force of common law, Cardinals (canon 239, § 1, n. 10), Bishops, whether residential or titular (canon 349, § 1, 1°), and Apostolic Vicars and Prefects (canon 294, § 1) enjoy this privilege.

Note 1. One who obtains a personal privilege from the Apostolic See is not bound to exhibit the said faculty to the Ordinary unless otherwise disposed in the concession obtained.[1]

Note 2. One who enjoys a personal privilege for three or four times in the week and is aggregated to some Congregation which also enjoys such a privilege can use both, provided that in the indult something else is not expressly disposed.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 5, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 286, to II).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 27, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 272).

512 V. Conditions to be fulfilled.

1. For Masses to be celebrated on a privileged altar, a greater Mass alms cannot be demanded under pretext of the privilege (canon 918, § 2).
2. The Mass must be offered for the departed only, one or several; since the privilege has no place if the Mass is offered for the living or for the living and departed at the same time.[1]
3. The Mass should be offered for one soul only, or, if it is celebrated for several, also for the soul to whom the priest wills that the indulgence be applied. For the indulgence, as was said in n. 517, is not applied except to him for whom it is celebrated.

It is not required that either the one offering the alms or the priest intend to apply the privilege; for this, by the very fact that the celebration has place, is applied to the soul, or to one of the souls, for whom it is celebrated. This is deduced from responses of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences: in the case, the Church herself seems to ask God that, if the Mass is celebrated for one, He apply the indulgence to this one; if for several, to him to whom He Himself shall prefer. Hence it seems one must say that in the privilege of the altar the faculty of applying the indulgence does not belong to the celebrant himself. Finally, for validity the quality of a Requiem Mass, or of a feria or vigil, is now not required, nor the addition of the Prayer for the departed.[2]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 23, 1901.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 12, 1855 (Decreta authentica, n. 366, to I); June 19, 1880 (Decreta authentica, n. 451, to III); Holy Office, March 20, 1913.

513 VI. Gregorian altar; concerning this, some things must be noted in particular. Now by Gregorian Altar is understood the altar of St. Gregory on Monte Coeli in Rome. Moreover, the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences responded on March 15, 1884, that the trust by which the faithful hold the celebration of thirty Masses, which are commonly called Gregorian, as specially efficacious from the good pleasure and acceptance of divine mercy for the liberation of a soul from the punishments of purgatory, is pious and approved in the Church.[1] And the Holy Office, on December 2, 1912,[2] declared that the said Altar is truly and properly privileged, that is, such that a plenary indulgence is attached to it. There are also altars called Gregorian ad instar, namely which are privileged after the likeness of the Gregorian altar; these, however, after the decree of the Holy Office of December 11-12, 1912, to VII,[3] are no longer granted.

We spoke of the so-called Gregorian Masses in the treatise on the Most Holy Eucharist, n. 222.

[1] A.S.S. XVI, p. 500.

[2] A.A.S. V, p. 33, to VII.

[3] A.S.S. 1913, p. 33.

Section II. On the Way of the Cross and on the Crucifix of the Way of the Cross

514 The Way of the Cross is: "A pious exercise by which the whole series of the Lord's passion, expressed in painted tablets where this can conveniently be done and distributed into several stations, is proposed for contemplation in the manner in which pilgrims visiting the City of holy Jerusalem look upon the very places where Christ suffered, recalling and frequenting them."[1]

We shall speak first of the erection of the Way of the Cross, then of the indulgences attached to it and of acquiring them, and then of the Crucifix of the Way of the Cross.

[1] Constitution of Benedict XIII Inter plurima, March 9, 1726.

Chapter I. On the Erection of the Way of the Cross

515 I. The power of erecting the Way of the Cross belongs:

1. To Cardinals, who from their promotion in Consistory enjoy the faculty of erecting by a single blessing, in churches and oratories, even private ones, and in other pious places, stations of the Way of the Cross with all the indulgences which have been imparted to those performing a pious exercise of this kind (canon 239, § 1, 6°).
2. To Bishops, even titular ones, who from receiving authentic notice of canonical provision having been completed can do the same as Cardinals, but with the rites prescribed by the Church (canon 349, § 1, 1°).
3. To Apostolic Vicars and Prefects, in their territory (canon 294, § 1).
4. To Superiors of the Order of Friars Minor, even excluding the Capuchin and Conventual Minors.[1] Now:

a) The Minister General, by himself or through others, can erect Stations everywhere in the world; the Provincial Minister, within the Province; the Guardian or President, within his own guardianship or district - not to be taken too rigorously, since Benedict XIV left to the judgment of pastors the choice of the religious man whom they judged more suitable, so that with the license of his local superior he might proceed to make the erection.[2]

b) The Minister General can delegate the faculty of erecting within and outside the Order; he can also grant authority of subdelegating. The other Superiors are wholly without this right, and furthermore can delegate for the erection of the Way of the Cross only their own subjects who are approved preachers or confessors.[3]

Note. The competent authority in the Order of Friars Minor, from whom the faculty is requested, commonly restricts this to places where the said Order does not exist. By the name of places here are meant a city, town or village, with the respective suburbs or places adjacent to them, but not a parish, or a whole diocese, or any other section or part of a diocese.[4]

[1] Cited Monita, n. I.

[2] Stein, p. 32.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 14, 1857 (Decreta authentica, n. 382, to I and II).

[4] Brief of Clement XII Exponi nobis, January 16, 1731, together with the Rescript of the Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, March 15, 1884; cited Monita of Clement XII, nn. III and IV. From practice it seems that what is read as prescribed in the cited Decree, n. III, is not to be taken so strictly: "But where the Way of the Cross should be erected outside a church... care must always be taken that it begin from a church or sacred place, or have its end as far as a church or sacred place" (Sleutjes, n. 19).

516 II. Places suitable for erection are: churches, public and semi-public oratories; likewise private or domestic oratories in which there is the privilege of celebrating Mass; likewise common and decent places of convents, seminaries, hospitals, and other pious places; finally public and decent places under the open sky, as in cemeteries, at the entrance of churches, in gardens, in groves. For private or domestic oratories in which Mass cannot be said, a special indult is required.[1]

Nothing also prevents several Ways of the Cross from being erected in the same place.[2]

[1] Cf. cited Monita, n. IV.

[2] Cited Monita, n. III; Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 20, 1838 (Decreta authentica, n. 261), January 30, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 270, to II), November 23, 1878 (Decreta authentica, n. 442, to I).

517 III. Required documents. Before the erection, under penalty of nullity, the following are required in writing: 1. the deputation of the priest erecting, unless he himself is the Superior;[2] 2. for individual cases, the license of the Ordinary of the place, the consent of the pastor, and the consent of the superiors of the church, monastery, hospital, or pious place where the Stations of the holy Way of the Cross are to be set up.[3] Nevertheless:

1. The license of the Bishop is not required if the matter concerns an exempt place, such as churches, oratories, and internal places of exempt religious;[4] but strictly domestic oratories and other decent places of private houses are not excepted.[5]
2. Nor is the consent of the pastor required if the matter concerns places which by law, or at least in fact, for example by force of diocesan statute, are exempt from the jurisdiction of the pastor;[6] but in the latter case, the consent of the rector to whom the place has been entrusted is required. Nor is the consent of the pastor demanded for strictly private oratories and other decent places of private houses.
3. It suffices that the deputation, license, and consent to be exhibited in writing be implicit. Hence if, for example, the Bishop has deputed someone in writing to erect the Way of the Cross in a determinate place, no other document expressing the license is required.

An instrument of the completed erection must be drawn up and signed by the erector's own hand.[7] Furthermore, the petition and concession of the erection are to be preserved in the episcopal archive; the other documents, such as the instrument of erection of which we have spoken, in the archive of the place.[8] These things, however, are not prescribed under penalty of nullity.[9]

[1] Cf. Sleutjes, Instructio de Stationibus S. Viae Crucis.

[2] Cf. Brief of Clement XII Exponi Nobis and Brief of Benedict XIV Cum tanta.

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 26, 1892, to IX.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 26, 1892, to VI.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 21, 1879 (Decreta authentica, n. 445, to I); September 26, 1892.

[6] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 25, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 294).

[7] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 3, 1748 (Decreta authentica, n. 175); September 25, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 294).

[8] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 6, 1890, to IV.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 6, 1890, to IV.

518 IV. Matter of erection. For validity there are required fourteen wooden crosses visible to those standing by.[1] Although no decree clearly prescribes that the crosses must be visible as wooden, nevertheless this is the mind of the legislator. To the crosses are joined, though not necessarily,[2] tablets, whether painted or sculpted, which represent the same mysteries of the passion as the Stations of the holy Way of the Cross at Jerusalem.

[1] Cited Monita, n. III; Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 20, 1838 (Decreta authentica, n. 261); January 30, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 270, to II); November 23, 1878 (Decreta authentica, n. 442, to I).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, November 13, 1837 (Decreta authentica, n. 258); September 20, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 275, to I).

519 V. Form of erection is constituted by the blessing and affixing of the crosses, and of the tablets if they are used, with some distance preserved.

1. The blessing of the crosses is required for validity;[1] the tablets, if they are present, can be blessed,[2] but do not have to be blessed. The blessing of the crosses must be made by a legitimate minister, in the place where the Way of the Cross is to be erected.[3] If, however, the Way of the Cross is to be erected in a monastery of nuns, it is not required that the one erecting enter the cloister, but it suffices that he bless the crosses at the grates.[4] Besides this, the blessing can be made both before and after their affixing.[5]

2. The affixing of the crosses, for example to a wall or upon benches, provided these are immovable and sufficiently upright, likewise belongs to validity.[6] Nevertheless, it makes no difference whether it is done before or after the blessing, by the erector himself or by another; and if it is done by another, it is not required that the erector be present, so that after the blessing has been made he can depart.[7]

3. Some distance between the various stations is required, so that validity would be lacking if the whole way were completed in very few paces.[8] It does not matter, however, whether the way begins on the Gospel side or on the Epistle side.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 30, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 270, to II).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 28, 1838 (Decreta authentica, n. 246, to IV) indeed declares that images, or tablets, are never blessed; but since the formula for blessing them has been retained in the Roman Ritual, the said declaration should be understood so that it is not of necessity that the images be blessed.

[3] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 26, 1872.

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 21, 1879 (Decreta authentica, n. 447).

[5] Cited Monita, n. VIII.

[6] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 16, 1760 (Decreta authentica, n. 223, to II).

[7] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 22, 1842 (Decreta authentica, n. 311, to I and II); June 21, 1879, n. 447; September 26, 1892, to II.

[8] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 26, 1752 (Decreta authentica, n. 194, to I).

520 VI. Invalidation of the erection has place:

1. If all the crosses originally blessed, or at least seven, perish, whether simultaneously or successively.[1] In this case a new erection is required; but that new erection or renewal in the same place is made by the blessing alone of new crosses, without the license of the Bishop and consent of the pastor being required again, provided these can be presumed to persevere.[2] Delegation, however, must be made in writing.[3]

In the case in which the crosses perish in a smaller number, the erection is not invalidated, and it suffices to substitute other crosses for the lost ones without a blessing.[4]

2. If the crosses are definitively transferred to another place;[5] but not if they are removed for a time, or are arranged in the same place in another way.[6]

In the case in which the crosses are definitively transferred to another place in which the Way of the Cross had not yet been erected, all and each of the conditions must be fulfilled which were fulfilled in the former erection. But if in that other place the Way of the Cross had already been lawfully erected, the blessing of the transferred Way of the Cross suffices, after delegation granted in writing has been had, and without renewal of the other documents, provided the license of the Bishop and consent of the pastor are presumed to persevere.

The privilege of the Way of the Cross does not cease if, the old church having been destroyed, a new one is built in almost the same place and under the same title, and the same crosses which had been affixed in the old church are affixed there.[7]

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 30, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 270, to V).

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 11, 1896.

[3] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 22, 1844 (Decreta authentica, n. 328).

[4] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 30, 1839; September 20, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 270, to V; n. 275, to II).

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 30, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 270, to IV).

[6] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, September 20, 1839 (Decreta authentica, n. 275, to III); August 22, 1842 (Decreta authentica, n. 311, to IV); August 20, 1844 (Decreta authentica, n. 328).

[7] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 11, 1896.

521 VII. Convalidation of the erection, or sanation of its invalidity, belongs to the Sacred Penitentiary, which will not omit to designate the conditions to be fulfilled.

Chapter II. On the Indulgences Attached to the Way of the Cross and on Acquiring Them

522 I. Attached indulgences. By Decree of the Sacred Penitentiary,[1] all and each of the Indulgences previously granted in performing the Way of the Cross have been abrogated, and the following new indulgences have been established: all the faithful who, whether individually or in company, with heart at least contrite, perform the pious exercise of the lawfully erected Way of the Cross according to the prescriptions of the Holy See can gain:

1. A plenary indulgence as often as they complete the pious exercise itself.
2. Another plenary indulgence, if on the same day on which they have performed the mentioned pious exercise, or even within a month after it has been performed ten times, they approach the Sacred Synaxis.
3. A partial indulgence of ten years and as many quarantines for individual stations, if perhaps, for any reasonable cause, they have not brought the exercise begun to the end.

[1] October 20, 1931 (A.A.S. 1931, p. 522).

523 II. Acquisition of the indulgences. In order that the indulgences be acquired, there are required:

1. Visitation of the Stations, by going from one station to another.[1] Now:

a) In a private exercise, or one performed by individual persons, passage from one Station to another is always required "insofar as either the multitude of persons who visit them or the narrowness of the place where they are erected permits."[2]

b) In a public exercise, or one performed after the manner of a public sacred function, when disturbance can be excited, it suffices that, each one of the people keeping his own place, the priest with two clerics or cantors go around, and, stopping at each station, recite there the particular customary prayers, the rest responding alternately.[3] But in the case in which, because of the size of the church or other circumstances of the place, the priest reciting prayers at each station can scarcely, or not even scarcely, be understood, it suffices that the same prayers be recited by the priest from the pulpit, from which he is understood by all, provided that another priest with two clerics or cantors goes around and stops at each station.[4]

c) In a common exercise, namely one performed by several at the same time but not after the manner of a public function, passage of all is required unless the narrowness of the place stands in the way; if this stands in the way, in the case in which the matter concerns a religious community, it suffices that one, even a layperson or woman, go around and, stopping at each station, recite the prayers.[5]

2. Meditation on the passion of Our Lord Jesus Christ; nor is any vocal prayer prescribed.[6] Meditation on the passion in general suffices, and that however brief and according to each one's capacity.[7]
3. The exercise performed morally in one stretch.[8] A brief interruption for any cause, indeed a longer one from a religious cause, does not stand in the way.[9]

[1] Cited Monita, n. VII.

[2] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 26, 1841 (Decreta authentica, n. 287).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, July 23, 1757 (Decreta authentica, n. 210).

[4] Sacred Congregation of Propaganda Fide, March 1, 1884.

[5] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, February 27, 1901; May 7, 1902.

[6] Cited Monita, n. 6.

[7] Cf. Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, June 2, 1838 (Decreta authentica, n. 259); Raccolta, n. 88.

[8] Cf. Raccolta, n. 88.

[9] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, January 22, 1858 (Decreta authentica, n. 385, to I); Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, December 16, 1760 (Decreta authentica, n. 223, to IV).

Chapter III. On the Crucifix of the Way of the Cross

524 I. Notion. By Crucifixes of the Way of the Cross are understood crosses with an image of the Redeemer, to which the indulgences of the Way of the Cross are attached, as will be explained under III. Now the indulgences are affixed not to the cross, but to the image of Christ, so that this image can be transferred from one cross to another without danger to the indulgences.[1] Besides this:

1. The image of the Crucified must be prominent, so that a cross with an image of the Redeemer depicted or impressed does not suffice. This is deduced from the authentic document of concession which is preserved in the archive of the convent of St. Bonaventure in Rome.[2] But crucifixes cast in bronze in such a way that the image of the divine Redeemer is indeed slightly prominent, yet cannot be detached or separated from the cross, do suffice.[3]
2. The image must be of brass or of any other non-fragile material.[4] Under the name of fragile material here tin and lead also seem to be included, just as will be said of objects to which papal indulgences are attached (n. 536). The cross seems able to be made of any material.

[1] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 24, 1883.

[2] Cited authentic document; Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, August 8, 1859 (Decreta authentica, n. 387, to II).

[3] Sacred Congregation of Indulgences, May 24, 1883.

